AppendixBill of Rights

PREFACE TO SECOND EDITION

Seventeen years ago, I wrote in the preface The Complete Bill of Rights that my project is "to provide the most complete, accurate, and accessible set of texts" for interpreting the Bill of Rights. The texts to which I referred and had collected were those written or printed through 1791, the year that Virginia became the tenth of fourteen states to approve the third through twelfth proposed amendments to the Constitution, making the renumbered First through Tenth Amendments the "Bill of Rights" of the Constitution.

More than two centuries after ratification, when I decided to edit the project, there was no available single-volume edition providing for each of the Bill's clauses in a categorized, chronological, and unedited form its drafts, proposals, sources, debate, case law, and other background materials. As reviewers noted, there was and remains a masterful project collecting the documentary history of the Constitution and its Amendments.[1] But The Complete Bill of Rights satisfied a need for readily accessible texts, taken and reproduced from their originals and arranged in a useful and readable edition.[2] Moreover, as the work of a professionally trained historian and lawyer, the edition collected original legal texts important to understand the Bill of Rights and not found and collected in other collections.

The first edition apparently satisfied the needs of many. I was delighted, as any editor would be, with the many citations to the book by the United States Supreme Court and other federal and state courts, and by authors of articles and books. Memorably, I received a handwritten note from the late venerated scholar, Professor Gerald Gunther of Stanford Law School, who told me that he stayed up late at night when he received the volume to read history that he had not previously known. That kind of message, so seldom received, is a blessing and treasure for late nights and lonely editing and proofing.

This second edition expands the first in two respects. It adds two new chapters —chapter 17, the Writ of Habeas Corpus Clause in Article I, Section 9 of the Constitution; and chapter 18, the Privileges and Immunities Clause of Article IV, Section 2, Clause I. The protections in these two clauses of the 1789 Constitution were deemed essential to control federal and state power even before the proposals to add the amendments that became the Bill of Rights.

The second edition also expands the background material for the Bill by collecting substantial excerpts from dictionaries and treatises that were available to the Framers and were found in libraries in Massachusetts, New York, North Carolina, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, and Virginia. Frequently, the excerpts are taken from books held in the private library of John Adams and bear Mr. Adams' nameplate. These include, for example, Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown, books I and II (1762); and Burn, Justice of the Peace, volumes 1 through 4 (1766).

As the editor of a collection, what is otherwise the work of an archivist with the privilege of a publisher, I acknowledge that I am both expanding what is accessible and narrowing what might be accessible. The decisions about what document is in or not in the archive; how an archived document is replicated; and where an archived document is located, each and together inevitably narrow the archive. Nonetheless, I am confident that both the first and second editions have substantially expanded the accessibility of accurate original materials that will assist everyone wanting ready access to accurate and complete documents about our fundamental rights and liberties.

The archival plan for the editions was and remains to divide documents into three groups. For each clause of the Bill of Rights, the first section replicates each proposal, draft, and source. The second section replicates the discussion of the proposals and drafts. And the third section replicates the discussion within legal treatises and case decisions, the background for the proposals. This plan makes the documents easy to locate from the table of contents, without an index search.

In addition to accessibility, the implementation of the plan assures accuracy. For each document in the first section, in both the first and second editions, the collection replicates the original, whether it exists in printed or handwritten form, and does so from the original copy or printing, and not from subsequent printings. That is, the original is replicated either from a handwritten original or a pre-1789 printed document or book. Further, the document in this collection duplicates the spelling, punctuation, capitalization, and underlining, of each document. The two changes made in this second edition from the first, in order to enable digital search, are that titles and captions do not necessarily reflect their original placement in a line of text, their font size and italicization, and paragraphs do not necessarily reflect their original indentation.

The second edition, like the first, has the word "complete" in its title. As noted above, the editor does not intend and never intended to to convey a message that a one-volume collection has every text that a user might possibly wish in order to understand American fundamental rights and liberties. The documents in each first and third section of a clause's history are, within their contexts, whole and unedited documents. Moreover, in mimicking other "compleat" books, both editions collect and locate documents in a manner that trained researchers are likely to pursue in achieving understanding and at least the beginning of expertise. To reduce the subjectivity of a socially constructed archive, the editor replicated the texts as he found them in the originals, no editorial ellipses or other changes. And in the first section of each chapter—the sources for the rights—, the editor included every proposal and every published source with which a proponent and participant would have been familiar.

It is in the second and third sections of each chapter where the editor truly edited. In the second section—the discussion of a proposal—, the editor included discussion about each proposal, but he erred on the side of including more rather than less discussion. Nonetheless, admittedly, the editor unavoidably removed the discussion from the entirety of the context. In the third section—the legal treatise and decisional law context—, the editor in the first edition relied principally upon Blackstone's Commentaries for the background of the Bill. The second edition corrects that deficit, if it was one. The second edition includes the leading dictionaries and treatises, including their margin notes (inserted as numbered footnotes), which were in the libraries in the 1780's and with which the Framers would have been familiar. With these changes, the editor believes that this second edition is more complete that the first.

There is no political agenda in publishing the first and second editions of The Complete Bill of Rights. The renewed interest, beginning with Attorney General Edwin Meese's urging in the 1980's, to locate the original meaning, intention, and understanding of the Constitution and its Amendments, may have had a political motivation, but it was also an important call to everyone to pay closer attention to our founding texts, principles, and discussions. While the editor believes that constitutionalism takes into account the history and traditions of text, principles, structures, practices, and precedents, at the same time he believes that the starting place and sometimes the ending place are the text and related materials such as those in these editions. This belief, the editor respectfully submits, fits one aspect of Mr. Chief Justice Marshall's instruction that it is, after all, "a constitution we are expounding."

This second edition would not be possible without the assistance of many kind persons: First, I thank student research assistants at Whittier College School of Law, Heather Gutterud, Brian Pelanda, Nancy Strogoff (Class of 2012), Stacey Kim-Jackson, Anastasia Goncharko, and Ivan Krimker (Class of 2013), Lance Hobbie, Erin McCusker, Jami Perez, Mark Sanchez, and Jay Schrecengost (Class of 2014), and Diego Brito, Hannah Chandoo, Aaron Cohen, and Nicholas

Jacobus (Class of 2015). Second, I give special thanks and appreciation to Aviel Pret, M.A. (University of Edinburgh) who brought her superb skills in history and library science to read and correct the final proof of this edition. I thank as well Tobias Pret for his careful reading of the final proof. Third, I give special thanks and appreciation to three others with superb skills, the librarians at Whittier, Hugh Treacy, Interim Librarian, Curtis Jones, Reader Services Librarian, and Chris Osborne Public Services Assistant.

I acknowledge the special debt I owe to the outstanding editors at Oxford University Press, Alex Flach, Commissioning Editor, and Jennifer Gong, former Associate Editor. Without their enthusiastic support and encouragement and their untiring patience, this edition would not have emerged. I will always be grateful to them. I also owe a special debt also to Mr. Balamurugan Rajendran, Project Manager, Newgen Knowledge Works Pvt. Ltd, and to Bala's staff, who brought their professional expertise and abundant care to the difficult tasks presented by old and worn manuscripts. They were patient with me, and I apologize for my sometimes impatience.

As always, I am indebted beyond measure to my spouse, Mannette Antill, for her unwavering love for our family and me, and her continuing devotion to someone with what might be deemed a happily undiagnosed obsession with completeness. She has my eternal love.

In addition to my late parents, Elizabeth and Jacob Cogan, to whom the first edition was dedicated, I am privileged to add a dedication to my mother-in-law and late father-in-law, Anna Maud and Don Arthur Dodge, all of whom taught their children the promise of this Land of Liberty.

1 The project began and continues as a project based at the University of Wisconsin and led initially by Merrill Jensen and, as of this writing, John P. Kaminski. Still uncompleted in 26 volumes, The Documentary History of the Ratification of the Constitution (Madison, Wisconsin, 1976 to present), provides many but not all the texts in this volume. It does not provide, and is not intended to provide, the sources of the Bill's clauses in state constitutions and laws and colonial charters and laws. Nor does it provide the background of the Bill's clauses in the treatises and case law of the prior two centuries. And, the texts in The Documentary History are not organized clause by clause, so that drafts, proposals, sources, etc., pertinent to each clause are available in a single chapter.

2 The texts in the first and third parts of each chapter are collected from their originals; however, many of the texts in the second part of each chapter (texts about discussion of the drafts and proposals) are taken from reliable collections.

PREFACE

THIS BOOK'S AIM IS TO PROVIDE THE MOST COMPLETE, ACCURATE, and accessible set of texts available for interpreting the Bill of Rights, the first ten amendments to the United States Constitution. Well into the third century since its ratification, the importance of and necessity for a collection such as this are as great as ever; indeed, because of the Bill's continually increasing significance, perhaps the need for this book is greater than ever.

Significance of the Bill of Rights

Interpreting the Bill of Rights, which represented for Madison "the great rights of mankind," is of surpassing importance. Originally intended to limit the power of the federal government, most provisions of the bill now limit the power of all government within the United States—federal, state, and local. Put somewhat more didactically, the bill's limit upon power arises from the Constitution's principle of constitutional supremacy. By that principle, when a provision of federal, state, or local law—be it statute, rule, order, or other exercise of legal authority—conflicts with an applicable provision of the Bill of Rights, the latter deprives the former of some or all of its effect and thereby limits the power of government.

In the United States, at the turn of the twenty-first century, Americans file thousands of lawsuits each year in federal and state courts, asking judges to interpret the Bill of Rights in order to decide whether government has exceeded its power. In innumerable instances each day, Americans of all kinds—governors and legislators, school teachers and school children, police officers and motorists—ponder whether government, by the exercise of its authority, is violating the Bill of Rights and is, accordingly, acting beyond its constitutional powers. And they ponder how a judge, if presented with the question, would interpret the Bill and decide the question.

The Inevitability of Interpretation and the Inevitability of Disagreement

Whether there is a conflict between a provision of federal, state, or local law and the Bill of Rights inevitably depends upon interpretation, including an interpretation of the applicable provision of the Bill of Rights. “Tis funny about th’ constitution,” Finley Peter Dunne’s Mr. Dooley said, “It reads plain, but no wan can undherstant it without an interpreter.”

Not everyone agrees with Mr. Dooley. There are those who believe that judges do not interpret or, perhaps better, should not interpret. They should simply apply the applicable provision. But inevitably, even persons who agree that the task is simply to apply a provision engage in interpretation by their selection process, that is, by the dictionaries or treatises or cases they choose to read in order to learn the meaning of a provision, not to mention the personal experiences they bring to the reading process.

But even if we lay aside the controversy concerning the inevitability of interpretation, it is noteworthy and surprising that in the third century after the proposal and ratification of the Constitution and the Bill of Rights, significant controversy persists about such matters as whether there is an ultimate interpreter of the Constitution and Bill of Rights, and, if so, who that interpreter is. Related controversies concern the processes of constitutional interpretation and the proper texts to be used in constitutional interpretation.

The Importance of Originalism, More or Less

Regardless of whether the Supreme Court of the United States is the ultimate interpreter of the Constitution and Bill of Rights, as the Court itself has said, or whether each official sworn to uphold the Constitution is an interpreter of authority and competence equal to the Supreme Court, as several presidents and governors have said, most (but not all) interpreters agree that some form of originalism is the beginning, if not also the end, of interpretation. That is, most interpreters have said that one or more of the following conditions must be met in order to interpret a provision of the Constitution or Bill of Rights, with the important caveat that many would impose further conditions.

For some interpreters, originalism requires that one discern the original meaning of the applicable provision. This might require learning the meaning of words from contemporaneous dictionaries, examining the meaning of words in other constitutional and colonial provisions, provisions that were or might have been the source of the applicable provision or that simply show contemporaneous usage. And it might entail a study of words in caselaw and treatises, again in order to show contemporaneous usage.

For some interpreters, originalism requires that one seek the original intention of the drafters of the applicable provision, an intention that might differ from the meaning of the words. This inquiry might require, as above, reading the sources of the applicable provision. It might also involve reading the proposals for the provision and the provision's drafts as they made their way through the legislative process. And it might necessitate reading the discussion of the provision both by those engaged in the legislative process and by those outside the process who sought to influence the discussion or, at least, to comment on the discussion.

For some interpreters, originalism requires that one determine the original understanding of the ratifiers, an understanding that might differ from the original meaning of the words and the original intentions of the drafters of the provision. This might require reading many of the same materials described above. Unfortunately, in the case of the Bill of Rights, there is no record of the discussion by the ratifiers in the legislative chambers.

In addition, many interpreters, though holding to originalism in one or more of its senses, emphasize more strongly the principles of a particular provision and related provisions. Of course, to learn what those principles are one must read the materials described above. Some of these interpreters emphasize the meaning and understanding of the text and its principles over the centuries in the minds and lives of the people of the United States. Such a historical understanding can be gained through studying caselaw, legislation, and customs and their attendant applications, refinements, and discussions. And for some interpreters, the emphasis is some part or some variation of all of these.

The Need for a Set of Originalist Texts

However an interpreter approaches her or his task, whether as an originalist exclusively or partially, some set of complete, accurate, and accessible texts is necessary. But, once again, more than two hundred years after the proposal and ratification of the Bill of Rights, it is surprising—especially in light of the historic references to and reliance on originalism in some sense—that there is no satisfactory set of texts for these purposes.

While there have been authoritative sets of texts arranged in chronological order, the published materials do not provide all the texts that many interpreters would choose to read. For example, there is no place where one can read all the drafts of the provisions of the Bill of Rights. One must piece the drafts together from journals, newspaper reports, and manuscripts.

Moreover, even if one can gain access to a complete set of printed materials, they often do not provide accurate versions of what many interpreters would want. For example, there is no single source that provides all the pertinent constitutional and statutory sources for the Bill of Rights. One must seek out each state's legislative texts. And even if there are libraries where one can gather all the sources from each state's legislative texts, it is unlikely that, with the exception of a few libraries, one will find the sources in a form that would have been available to the framers of the Bill of Rights. Rather, the form of these texts that one finds reprinted in state legislative materials or in secondary sources often differs in grammar, wording, punctuation, and capitalization from pre-1791 versions.

Plainly, from what I have noted, there are significant problems of completeness, accuracy, and accessibility. When representing a client in my role as an advocate, both in district courts and courts of appeals, I have often wished that I could, within a reasonably brief period of time, have access to all the pertinent materials to assist me in illuminating for a court the bearing of a constitutional amendment upon the issue before the court. But that has not existed, leaving me dissatisfied that I had done all I could to represent my client well.

The Methodology of the Collection

To remedy these problems and to assist lawyers, judges, scholars, and lay persons, I have compiled and edited the materials in this book. While many interpreters—whether lawyers, judges, historians, political scientists, or scholars in other fields—use and value materials that appeared after the ratification of the Bill of Rights, I decided to limit these materials to those that are of significant use and value to originalists and the many non-originalists who include originalist texts in their interpretations and other work. Like any edition, there have been choices and difficulties.

To compile a reasonably complete set of relevant texts up to the point of ratification, I sought out those materials that were produced by members of the First Congress—the Congress that considered, passed, and sent to the state legislatures the proposed amendments to the Constitution. These materials consist of journals and manuscripts held by the National Archives in Washington, D.C., and pamphlets and manuscripts held by the Library of Congress. I also located the proposals for constitutional amendments submitted by the state conventions that considered ratification of the Constitution, also held by the National Archives.

Readers will note that I have included texts from three versions of the Senate Journals, which were written out by hand from notes and later printed. The first handwritten Senate Journal for the First Session of the First Congress, the session during which the amendments were considered, was damaged by water and was replaced by a second handwritten version. Because there are some differences between these handwritten versions, I have included both the first, designated the Rough Journal, and the second, designated the Smooth Journal, as well as the printed version.

For source texts, I sought out materials that would have been available to the members of the First Congress or with which they would have been familiar. With just a few exceptions, these consist of collections of constitutions, statutes, laws, and charters published before 1789 and available in libraries in New York and other important cities. In addition, these materials include such widely known and widely held texts as the basic English constitutional materials, Blackstone's Commentaries on the Laws of England, and American and English caselaw.

For the debate in the Congress, I sought out the four contemporaneous newspaper reports, not the report from the Annals, a frequent reference in interpretative decisions despite its later compilation. The newspaper reports are available on microfilm. For the debate in the ratifying conventions and in the press and pamphlets, I relied upon the excellent published collections now available. For letters and diaries, I did the same.

To compile an accurate set of texts, I examined the original documents myself, including the materials in the vaults of the National Archives and Library of Congress. Of course, the able staff of these institutions handled the documents with protective gear, but I was privileged to see the materials and compare them to my own texts. Despite these efforts, the reader should realize that seeing and comparing does not assure absolute accuracy or, better, agreed accuracy. Besides the errors to which we are all prone, differences of opinion inevitably arise regarding orthography. For example, it may sometimes be virtually impossible to distinguish whether a handwritten letter is capitalized or whether an aging mark is a semicolon, a comma, or a random mark or spot. I have used my best judgment. Others may disagree.

To limit this collection to a single volume, I have had to make some choices. While every draft, proposal, and congressional discussion is included, there may be some sources and some ratification and pamphlet debate that readers would have preferred that I include. Moreover, I have limited treatise discussion to Blackstone's Commentaries, with an occasional additional reference, and I have limited caselaw discussion to the most prominent cases. With a few exceptions, I have not included philosophical, political, or religious tracts. I apologize to those who would have preferred that I include Hale or Locke or another writer or yet another opinion. Perhaps, if this book proves useful, there may be an opportunity for an expanded edition.

How to Use this Book

A book claiming accessibility should be easy to use, and I have made every effort to ensure that this volume is user-friendly. I have assigned a chapter for each clause of the Bill of Rights, with the exception of the criminal clauses of the Sixth Amendment, which are found together in Chapter 12. I have divided the materials relating to each clause into three sections: texts, that is, the texts of the drafts, proposals, and sources of the clause; discussion of the clause's drafts and proposals; and discussion of the rights that are protected by the clause.

Thus, in Chapter 1, all of the drafts, proposals, and sources for the Establishment and Free Exercise Clauses are found in the first section, designated 1.1. All discussion of these drafts and proposals are found in the second section, designated 1.2. All discussion of the rights protected by the clauses, for example in Blackstone or pertinent caselaw, were there such, would be found in a third section, designated 1.3. Within each section the reader will find subsections for drafts of the clauses, designated 1.1.1, proposals for the clauses, designated 1.1.2, state and Colonial sources for the clauses, designated 1.1.3, and so on. Numbering continues within each subsection; thus, Madison's proposal for the clauses is designated 1.1.1.1, Sherman's proposal to the House Committee of Eleven is designated 1.1.1.2, and so on. The full structure of the volume can be seen by consulting the table of contents, which begins on page ix.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

I have many persons to thank for their assistance and support. I began the project that became this book in a civil rights seminar at Southern Methodist University School of Law. The students in that seminar were David Lindsay Adams, Cynthia Beatrice Asensio, Charla Hopkins Bradshaw, Janet Lee Ebanks Booker, Sharlee Ann Cole, Kathleen Denise Garcia, Ricky Donnell Green, Teresa Lynn Harvey, Christopher M. Joe, Karen Ann Holt, Charlotte Coleman Landry, Tonya Johnson Myck, Scarlett Dawn Orenstein, Courtney E. Pellegrino, Kathryn Ann Richardson, Gina Kay Robeen, Steven Dillon Roberts, and Stacy Holt Wadsworth. Two of those students, Mr. Adams and Ms. Harvey, continued work on the project as research assistants and deserve special recognition for their careful and devoted work.

I owe thanks also to Roy Mersky, librarian of the Tarlton Law Library of the University of Texas; Gail Daly, librarian of the Underwood Law Library of Southern Methodist University; and Bruce Muck, assistant librarian of Underwood.

In addition, I thank the typists and proofreaders, Pam Castellano, Susan M. Coassin, Jody DeStafanis, Rosanne Ferraro, Rosemary T. Golia, Shaun Jensen, Les Lane, Eileen Lennox, Laurie Mentz, Dana Mariano, Gillian Moses, Sue Passander, June Stanton, Bonnie Trexler, Rita E. Watson, and Teresa Zajac. Ms. Watson is blessed with skill and good humor, as is Ms. Stanton, who is assisting with the preparation of my book collecting the drafts, debates, sources, and discussion of the amendments to the United States Constitution ratified during Reconstruction, as well as related statutes.

I thank the outstanding professionals of the Quinnipiac College School of Law Library, Ann Deveaux, director, Michael Hughes, associate director, and Christina DeLucia and Larry Raftery, reference librarians. Ms. DeLucia was especially helpful in locating rare materials, as were my colleague Stanton Krauss, and my son (and future professor), Jacob K. Cogan.

Two archivists at the National Archives, Charles E. Schamel and John Van

Derweedt, gave me more time and attention than the equitable division of services should allow. They gave me the special privilege of reading original materials, including the amendment proposals and the Senate journals. They work under difficult conditions in a time of significant underfunding for the preservation of our nation's history.

Phil Lapsansky of the Library Company of Philadelphia was also more than generous with his time and attention. He allowed me the privilege of reading the Library Company's superb collection of pre-nineteenth-century American law books, including the special privilege of reading several books from the library of President Washington.

None of this work would have been possible without the support of two colleagues, President John L. Lahey and Provost John B. Bennett of Quinnipiac College. They have supported all of my efforts above and beyond any reasonable expectation. They have a profound understanding of the importance of scholarship, including scholarship by their deans.

I stand in the long line of persons who are indebted to Stanley N. Katz, professor in the Woodrow Wilson School, Princeton University, and president of the American Council of Learned Societies, who provided his very special encouragement and support for this project. We reconstruct the world by our own works and by the works we assist. Dr. Katz merits a special place on both grounds.

None of this work would have been possible, either, without the support, encouragement, and love of my spouse, Mannette Antill Dodge. She understands my drive to learn what is true and what is just.

1.1.1.4Motion by Madison in House, August 15, 1789

Mr. Madison

Thought, if the word national was inserted before religion, it would satisfy the minds of honorable gentlemen. He believed the people feared one sect might obtain a preeminence, or two combine together and establish a religion to which they would compel others to conform; he thought if the word national was introduced, it would point the amendment directly to the object it was intended to prevent.

1.1.3.5.cDeclaration of Rights, 1776

33. That as it is the duty of every man to worship God in such manner as he thinks most acceptable to him, all persons professing the christian religion are equally entitled to protection in their religious liberty, wherefore no person ought by any law to be molested in his person or estate on account of his religious persuasion or profession, or for his religious practice, unless under colour of religion any man shall disturb the good order, peace or safety of the state, or shall infringe the laws of morality, or injure others, in their natural, civil or religious rights; nor ought any person to be compelled to frequent or maintain, or contribute, unless on contract, to maintain, any particular place of worship, or any particular ministry; yet the legislature may, in their discretion, lay a general and equal tax for the support of the christian religion, leaving to each individual the power of appointing the payment over of the money collected from him, to the support of any particular place of worship or minister, or for the benefit of the poor of his own denomination, or the poor in general of any particular county; but the churches, chapels, glebes, and all other property now belonging to the church of England, ought to remain to the church of England for ever. . . .

34. That every gift, sale, or devise of lands, to any minister, public teacher, or preacher of the gospel, as such, or to any religious sect, order or denomination, or to or for the support, use or benefit of, or in trust for, any minister, public teacher, or preacher of the gospel, as such, or any religious sect, order or denomination; and also every devise of goods or chattels to, or to or for the support, use or benefit of any minister, public teacher, or preacher of the gospel, as such, or any religious sect, order or denomination, without the leave of the legislature, shall be void; except always any sale, gift, lease or devise of any quantity of land not exceeding two acres, for a church, meeting, or other house of worship, and for a burying ground, which shall be improved, enjoyed or used only for such purpose, or such sale, gift, lease or devise, shall be void.

35. That no other test or qualification ought to be required on admission to any office of trust or profit, than such oath of support and fidelity to this state, and such oath of office, as shall be directed by this convention, or the legislature of this state, and a declaration of a belief in the christian religion.

36. That the manner of administering an oath to any person ought to be such as those of the religious persuasion, profession or denomination of which such person is one, generally esteem the most effectual confirmation, by the attestation of the Divine Being. And that the people called quakers, those called dunkers, and those called menonists, holding it unlawful to take an oath on any occasion, ought to be allowed to make their solemn affirmation in the manner that quakers have been heretofore allowed to affirm, and to be of the same avail as an oath, in all such cases as the affirmation of quakers hath been allowed and accepted within this state instead of an oath. And further, on such affirmation warrants to search for stolen goods, or the apprehension or commitment of offenders, ought to be granted, or security for the peace awarded; and quakers, dunkers, or menonists ought also, on their solemn affirmation as aforesaid, to be admitted as witnesses in all criminal cases not capital.

Now forasmuch as We have been in like Manner humbly petitioned unto by our trusty and well beloved Servant, Sir fferdinando Gorges, Knight, Captain of our ffort and Island by Plymouth, and by certain the principal Knights and Gentleman Adventurers of the said Second Collonye, and by divers other Persons of Quality, who now intend to be their Associates, divers of which have been at great and extraordinary Charge, and sustained many Losses in seeking and discovering a Place fitt and convenient to lay the Foundation of a hopeful Plantation, and have divers Years past by God's Assistance, and their own endeavours, taken actual Possession of the Continent hereafter mentioned, in our Name and to our Use, as Sovereign Lord thereof, and have settled already some of our People in Places agreeable to their Desires in those Parts, and in Confidence of prosperous Success therein, by the Continuance of God's Devine Blessing, and our Royall Permission, have resolved in a more plentifull and effectual Manner to prosecute the same, and to that Purpose and Intent have desired of Us, for their better Encouragement and Satisfaction herein, and that they may avoide all Confusion, Questions, or Differences between themselves, and those of the said first Collonye, . . . And also for that We have been further given certainly to knowe, that within these late Years there hath been by God's Visitation raigned a wonderfull Plague, together with many horrible Slaugthers, and Murthers, committed amoungst the Sauages and brutish People there, heertofore inhabiting, in a Manner to the utter Destruction, Deuastacion, and Depopulacion of that whole Territorye, so that there is not left for many Leagues together in a Manner, any that doe claime or challenge any Kind of Interests therein, nor any other Superiour Lord or Souveraigne to make Claime thereunto, whereby We in our Judgment are persuaded and satisfied that the appointed Time is come in which Almighty God in his great Goodness and Bountie towards Us and our People hath thought fitt and determined, that those large and goodly Territoryes, deserted as it were by their naturall Inhabitants, should be possessed and enjoyed by such of our Subjects and People as heertofore have and hereafter shall by his Mercie and Favour, and by his Powerfull Arme, be directed and conducted thither. In Contemplacion and serious Consideracion whereof, Wee have thougt it fitt according to our Kingly Duty, soe much as in Us lyeth, to second and followe God's sacred Will, rendering reverend Thanks to his Divine Majestie for his gracious favour in laying open and revealing the same unto us, before any other Christian Prince or State, by which Meanes without Offence, and as We trust to his Glory, Wee may with Boldness goe on to the settling of soe hopefull a Work, which tendeth to the reducing and Conversion of such Sauages as remaine wandering in Desolacion and Distress, to Civil Societie and Christian Religion, to the Inlargement of our own Dominions, and the Aduancement of the Fortunes of such of our good Subjects as shall willingly intresse themselves in the said Imployment, to whom We cannot but give singular Commendations for their soe worthy Intention and Enterprize. . . . And lastly, because the principall Effect which we can desire to expect of this Action, is the Conversion and Reduction of the People in those Parts unto the true Worship of God and Christian Religion, in which Respect, Wee would be loath that any person should be permitted to pass that Wee suspected to affect the Superstition of the Chh of Rome, Wee do hereby declare that it is our Will and Pleasure that noe be permitted to pass, in any Voyage from time to time to be made in the said Country, but such as shall first have taken the Oathe of Supremacy. . . .

[Part I, Article] IV. Among the natural rights, some are in their very nature unalienable, because no equivalent can be given or received for them. Of this kind are the RIGHTS OF CONSCIENCE.

V. Every individual has a natural and unalienable right to worship GOD according to the dictates of his own conscience, and reason; and no subject shall be hurt, molested, or restrained in his person, liberty or estate for worshipping GOD in the manner and season most agreeable to the dictates of his own conscience, or for his religious profession, sentiments or persuasion; provided he doth not disturb the public peace, or disturb others in their religious worship.

VI. As morality and piety, rightly grounded on evangelical principles, will give the best and greatest security to government, and will lay in the hearts of men the strongest obligations to due subjection; and as the knowledge of these, is most likely to be propagated through a society by the institution of the public worship of the DEITY, and of public instruction in morality and religion; therefore, to promote those important purposes, the people of this State have a right to empower, and do hereby fully empower the legislature to authorize from time to time, the several towns, parishes, bodies-corporate, or religious societies within this State, to make adequate provision at their own expence, for the support and maintenance of public protestant teachers of piety, religion and morality:

Provided notwithstanding, That the several towns, parishes, bodies-corporate, or religious societies, shall at all times have the exclusive right of electing their own public teachers, and of contracting with them for their support and maintenance. And no portion of any one particular religious sect or denomination, shall ever be compelled to pay towards the support of the teacher or teachers of another persuasion, sect or denomination.

And every denomination of christians demeaning themselves quietly, and as good subjects of the state, shall be equally under the protection of the law: and no subordination of any one sect or denomination to another, shall ever be established by law.

And nothing herein shall be understood to affect any former contracts made for the support of the ministry; but all such contracts shall remain, and be in the same state as if this constitution had not been made.

(As the country comes to be sufficiently planted, and distributed in fit divisions, it shall belong to the Parliament to take care for the building of churches and the public maintenance of divines, to be employed in the exercise of religion, according to the Church of England; which being the only true and orthodox, and the national religion of all the king’s dominions, is so also of Carolina, and therefore it alone shall be allowed to receive public maintenance by grant of parliament.)

97th. But since the natives of that place, who will be concerned in our plantation, are utterly strangers to Christianity, whose idolatry, ignorance or mistake gives us no right to expell or treat them ill, and those who remove from other parts to plant there will unavoidably be of different opinions, concerning matters of religion, the liberty whereof they will expect to have allowed them, and it will not be reasonable for us on this account to keep them out; that civil peace may be obtained amidst diversity of opinions, and our agreement and compact with all men, may be duly and faithfully observed, the violation whereof, upon what pretence soever, cannot be without offence to Almighty God, and great scandal to the true religion which we profess; and also that Jews, Heathens and other dissenters from the purity of the Christian religion, may not be scared and kept at a distance from it, but by having an opportunity of acquainting themselves with the truth and reasonableness of its doctrines, and the peaceableness and inoffensiveness of its professors, may be good usage and persuasion, and all those convincing methods of gentleness and meekness, suitable to the rules and design of the gospel, be won over to embrace and unfeignedly receive the truth; therefore any seven or more persons agreeing in any religion, shall constitute a church or profession, to which they shall give some name, to distinguish it from others.

98th. The terms of admittance and communion with any church or profession shall be written in a book, and therein be subscribed by all the members of the said church or profession; which book shall be kept by the public Register of the Precinct wherein they reside.

99th. The time of every one, subscription admittance, shall be dated in the said book or religious record.

100th. In the terms of communion of every church or profession, these following shall be three, without which no agreement or assembly of men upon pretence of religion, shall be accounted a church or profession within these rules:

1st. “That there is a God.”

2nd. “That God is publickly to be worshipped.”

3rd. “That it is lawful and the duty of every man being thereunto called by those that govern, to bear witness to truth; and that every church or profession shall in their terms of communion, set down the eternal way whereby they witness a truth as in the presence of God whether it be by laying hands on or kissing the Bible, as in the Church of England, or by holding up the hand, or any other sensible way.”

101st. No person above seventeen years of age, shall have any benefit or protection of the law, or be capable of any place of profit or honor who is not a member of some church or profession, having his name recorded in some one, and but one religious record at once.

102nd. No person of any other church or profession shall disturb or molest any religious assembly.

103rd. No person whatsoever, shall speak anything in their religious assembly irreverently or seditiously of the government or governors, or of state matters.

104th. Any person subscribing the terms of communion, in the record of the said church or profession, before the precinct register and any five members of the said church or profession, shall be thereby made a member of the said church or profession.

105th. Any person striking out his own name out of any religious record, or his name being struck out by any officer thereunto authorized by such church or profession respectively, shall cease to be a member of that church or profession.

106th. No man shall use any reproachful, reviling, or abusive language against any religion of any church or profession; that being the certain way of disturbing the peace, and of hindering the conversion of any to the truth, by engaging them in quarrels and animosities, to the hatred of the professors and that profession which otherwise they might be brought to assent.

107th. Since charity obliges us to wish well to the souls of all men, and religion ought to alter nothing in any man’s civil estate or right, it shall be lawful for slaves as well as others, to enter themselves and be of what church or profession any of them shall think best, and thereof be as fully members as any freemen. But yet no slave shall hereby be exempted from that civil dominion his master hath over him, but be in all things in the same state and condition he was in before.

108th. Assemblies upon what pretence soever of religion, not observing and performing the above said rules, shall not be esteemed as churches, but unlawful meetings, and be punished as riots.

109th. No person whatsoever shall disturb, molest, or persecute another, for his speculative opinions in religion, or his way of worship.

110th. Every freeman of Carolina, shall have absolute power and authority over his negro slaves, of what opinion or religion soever.

Fifth, That it is lawful, and the Duty of every Man, being thereunto called by those that govern, to bear witness to the Truth.

And that every Inhabitant of this State, when called to make an Appeal to God, as a Witness to Truth, shall be permitted to do it in that Way which is most agreeable to the Dictates of his own Conscience. And, that the People of this State may forever enjoy the Right of electing their own Pastors or Clergy; and, at the same Time, that the State may have sufficient Security, for the due Discharge of the Pastoral Office, by those who shall be admitted to be Clergymen; no Person shall officiate as Minister of any established Church, who shall not have been chosen by a Majority of the Society to which he shall minister, or by Persons appointed by the said Majority to chuse and procure a Minister for them, nor until the Minister so chosen and appointed, shall have made and subscribed to the following Declaration, over and above the aforesaid five Articles, viz.

That he is determined, by God's Grace, out of the Holy Scriptures, to instruct the People committed to his Charge, and to teach nothing (as required of Necessity to Eternal Salvation) but that which he shall be persuaded may be concluded and proved from the Scripture; that he will use both public and private Admonitions, as well to the Sick as to the Whole, within his Cure, as Need shall require and Occasion shall be given; and that he will be diligent in Prayers, and in reading of the Holy Scriptures, and in such Studies as help to the Knowledge of the same; that he will be diligent to frame and fashion his own self, and his Family, according to the Doctrine of Christ, and to make both himself and them, as much as in him lieth, wholesome Examples and Patterns to the Flock of Christ; that he will maintain and set forwards, as much as he can, Quietness, Peace, and Love, among all People; and especially among those that are or shall be committed to his Charge.

No Person shall disturb or molest any religious Assembly, nor shall use any reproachful, reviling, or abusive Language, against any Church; that being the certain Way of disturbing the Peace, and of hindering the Conversion of any to the Truth, by engaging them in Quarrels and Animosities, to the Hatred of the Professors, and that Profession which otherwise they might be brought to assent to. No Person whatsoever shall speak any Thing, in their religious Assembly, irreverently, or seditiously, of the Government of this State. No Person shall, by Law, be obliged to pay towards the Maintenance and Support of a religious Worship that he does not freely join in, or has not voluntarily engaged to support: But, the Churches, Chapels, Parsonages, Glebes, and all other Property, now belonging to any Societies of the Church of England, or any other religious Societies, shall remain, and be secured, to them for ever. The Poor shall be supported, and Elections managed, in the accustomed Manner, until Laws shall be provided, to adjust those Matters in the most equitable Way.

1.1.3.15.d An Act, October 7, 1776

CHAP. II

An act for exempting the different societies of Dissenters from contributing to the support and maintenance of the Church as by law established, and its Ministers, and for other purposes therein mentioned.

I. WHEREAS several oppressive acts of Parliament respecting religion have been formerly enacted, and doubts have arisen, and may hereafter arise, whether the same are in force within this commonwealth or not: For prevention whereof, Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the commonwealth of Virginia, and it is hereby enacted by the authority of the same, that all and every act of Parliament, by whatever title known or distinguished, which renders criminal the maintaining any opinions in matters of religion, forbearing to repair to church, or the exercising any mode of worship whatsoever, or which prescribes punishments for the same, shall henceforth be of no validity or force within this commonwealth.

II. AND whereas there are within this commonwealth great numbers of dissenters from the church established by law who have been heretofore taxed for its support, and it is contrary to the principles of reason and justice that any should be compelled to contribute to the maintenance of a church with which their consciences will not permit them to join, and from which they can therefore receive no benefit: For remedy whereof, and that equal liberty, as well religious as civil, may be universally extended to all the good people of this commonwealth, Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the commonwealth of Virginia, and it is hereby enacted by the authority of the same, that all dissenters, of whatever denomination, from the said church, shall, from and after the passing this act, be totally free and exempt from all levies, taxes, and impositions whatever, towards supporting and maintaining the said church, as it now is or hereafter may be established, and its ministers.

III. PROVIDED nevertheless, and it is further enacted, by the authority aforesaid, that the vestries of the several parishes, where the same hath not been already done, shall and may, and they are hereby authorized and required, at such time as they shall appoint, to levy and assess on all tithables within their respective parishes, as well as dissenters as others, all such salaries and arrears of salaries as are or may be due to the ministers or incumbents of their parishes for services to the first day of January next; moreover to make such assessments on all tithables as will enable the said vestries to comply with their legal parochial engagements already entered into; and lastly, to continue such future provision for the poor in their respective parishes as they have hitherto by law been accustomed to make.

IV. AND be it further enacted, by the authority aforesaid, that there shall in all time coming be saved and reserved to the use of the church by law established the several tracts of glebe land already purchased, the churches and chapels already built, and such as were begun or contracted for before the passing of this act for the use of the parishes, all books, plate, and ornaments, belonging or appropriated to the use of the said church, and all arrears of money or tobacco arising from former assessments or otherwise; and that there shall moreover be saved and reserved to the use of such parishes as may have received private donations, for the better support of the said church and its ministers, the perpetual benefit and enjoyment of all such donations.

V. AND whereas great variety of opinions hath arisen, touching the propriety of a general assessment, or whether every religious society should be left to voluntary contributions for the support and maintenance of the several ministers and teachers of the Gospel who are of different persuasions and denominations, and this difference of sentiments cannot now be well accommodated, so that it is thought most prudent to defer this matter to the discussion and final determination of a future Assembly, when the opinions of the country in general may be better known: To the end, therefore, that so important a subject may in no sort be prejudged, Be it enacted, by the authority aforesaid, that nothing in this act contained shall be construed to affect or influence the said question of a general assessment, or voluntary contribution, in any respect whatever.

VI. AND whereas, by the exemptions allowed dissenters, it may be too burthensome in some parishes to the members of the established church if they are still compelled to support the clergy by certain fixed salaries, and it is judged best that this should be done for the present by voluntary contributions: Be it therefore enacted, by the authority aforesaid, that so much of an act of the General Assembly made in the twenty-second year of the reign of King George the Second, entitled An act for the support of the clergy, and for the regular collecting and paying the parish levies, or any other act as provides salaries for the ministers, and authorizes the vestries to levy the same, except in the cases before directed, shall be, and the same is hereby suspended, until the end of the next session of Assembly.

VII. AND whereas it is represented that in some counties lists of tithables have been omitted to be taken: For remedy whereof, and for the regular listing all tithable persons, Be it further enacted, that the court of every county where lists of the tithables, agreeable to the directions of the laws now in force, are not already taken, it shall and may be lawful for the courts of such counties, and they are hereby required, at the first or second court after the end of this session of Assembly, to divide their counties into convenient precincts, and appoint one of the Justices for each precinct to take a list of all the tithables therein; and every such Justice so to be appointed, shall give public notice of his being so appointed, and at what place or places he intends to receive the lists, by advertisements thereof affixed to the doors of churches and meeting-houses in the parish where the precinct lies, and shall accordingly attend on the said day by him to be appointed and at the second court next following shall deliver a fair list of the names and number of the tithables by him taken, to the clerk of the court who on the next court day shall set up fair copies of such lists in his courthouse, there to remain during the sitting of that court, for the better discovery of such as shall be concealed.

VIII. AND if the Justices of any county, where lists of tithables have not been already taken, shall fail to appoint some of their members to take the list of tithables in the manner directed by this act, every such Justice so failing shall forfeit and pay ten pounds; to be recovered in the General Court with costs, by action of debt or information against such Justices jointly. And if any Justice so appointed shall refuse or fail to give notice as aforesaid, and to take and return such list as aforesaid, he shall forfeit and pay two thousand pounds of tobacco, or ten pounds; to be recovered with costs, in any court of record in this commonwealth. And every master or owner of a family, or in his absence or non-residence at the plantation, his or her agent, attorney, or overseer, shall, on the said time appointed by the Justice for taking in the lists, deliver, or cause to be delivered, under his or her hand, to the Justice appointed for that precinct, a list of the names and number of all tithable persons who were abiding in or belonging to his or her family on the ninth day of June last. Every master or owner, or in his or her absence or non-residence, every overseer, failing herein, shall be adjudged a concealer of such and so many tithables as shall not be listed and given in, and for every tithable person so concealed shall forfeit and pay five hundred pounds of tobacco, or fifty shillings; to be recovered by action of debt or information, in any court of record. And when any overseer shall fail to list the tithables upon the plantation whereof he is overseer, the master or owner shall be subject to the payment of his levies, in the same manner as he would have been if they had been listed. Every person, at the time of giving in lists of tithables, shall also give in a list of his or her wheel carriages subject to a tax, to the several Justices appointed to take the list of tithables, under the like penalty for each failure, and to be recovered in the same manner as herein directed for concealing tithables. All the penalties hereby imposed shall be, one moiety to the informer, and the other moiety to the use of the county where the offence shall be committed, towards lessening the county levy.

1.1.3.15.eMemorial and Remonstrance Against Religious Assessments, 1786

We, the subscribers, citizens of the said Commonwealth, having taken into serious consideration, a bill printed by order of the last session of General Assembly, entitled “A Bill establishing a Provision for Teachers of the Christian Religion,” and conceiving that the same, if finally armed with the sanctions of a law, will be a dangerous abuse of power, are bound as faithful members of a free state, to remonstrate against it; and to declare the reasons by which we are determined. We remonstrate against the said Bill,

BECAUSE, We hold it for a fundamental and undeniable truth, “That religion, or the duty which we owe to our Creator, and the manner of discharging it, can be directed only by reason and conviction, not by force or violence.” The religion then of every man must be left to the conviction and conscience of every man; and it is the right of every man to exercise it as these may dictate. This right is in its nature an unalienable right. It is unalienable; because the opinions of men, depending only on the evidence contemplated by their own minds, cannot follow the dictates of other men: It is unalienable also; because what is here a right towards men, is a duty towards the Creator. It is the duty of every man to render to the Creator such homage, and such only, as he believes to be acceptable to him; this duty is precedent, both in order of time, and degree of obligation, to the claims of civil society. Before any man can be considered as a member of civil society, he must be considered as a subject of the Governour of the Universe: And if a member of civil society, who enters into any subordinate association, must always do it with a reservation of his duty to the general authority, much more must every man who becomes a member of any particular civil society, do it with a saving of his allegiance to the Universal Sovereign. We maintain therefore, that in matters of religion, no man's right is abridged by the institution of civil society; and that religion is wholly exempt from its cognizance. True it is, that no other rule exists, by which any question which may divide a society, can be ultimately determined, but the will of the majority; but it is also true, that the majority may trespass on the rights of the minority.

Because, If religion be exempt from the authority of the society at large, still less can it be subject to that of the legislative body. The latter are but the creatures and vicegerents of the former. Their jurisdiction is both derivative and limited: it is limited with regard to the co-ordinate departments, more necessarily is it limited with regard to the constituents. The preservation of a free government requires, not merely that the metes and bounds which separate each department of power may be invariably maintained, but more especially, that neither of them be suffered to overleap the great barrier which defends the rights of the people. The rulers who are guilty of such an encroachment, exceed the commission from which they derive their authority, and are tyrants. The people who submit to it are governed by laws made neither by themselves, nor by an authority derived from them, and are slaves.

Because, It is proper to take alarm at the first experiment on our liberties. We hold this prudent jealousy to be the first duty of citizens, and one of the noblest characteristicks of the late revolution. The freemen of America did not wait till usurped power had strengthened itself by exercise, and entangled the question in precedents. They saw all the consequences in the principle, and they avoided the consequences by denying the principle. We revere this lesson too much soon to forget it. Who does not see that the same authority which can establish Christianity, in exclusion of all other religions, may establish, with the same ease, any particular sect of Christians, in exclusion of all other sects? That the same authority which can force a citizen to contribute three-pence only of his property for the support of any one establishment, may force him to conform to any other establishment in all cases whatsoever.

Because, The bill violates that equality which ought to be the basis of every law; and which is more indispensable, in proportion as the validity or expediency of any law is more liable to be impeached. If "all men are by nature equally free and independent," all men are to be considered as entering into society on equal conditions, as relinquishing no more, and therefore retaining no less, one than another, of their rights. Above all are they to be considered as retaining an "equal title to the free exercise of religion according to the dictates of conscience." Whilst we assert for ourselves a freedom to embrace, to profess and to observe the religion which we believe to be of divine origin, we cannot deny an equal freedom to those, whose minds have not yet yielded to the evidence which has convinced us. If this freedom be abused, it is an offence against God, not against man: To God, therefore, not to men, must an account of it be rendered. As the bill violates equality by subjecting some to peculiar burdens, so it violates the same principle, by granting to others peculiar exemptions. Are the Quakers and Menonists the only sects who think a compulsive support of their religions unnecessary and unwarrantable? Can their piety alone be intrusted with the care of publick worship? Ought their religions to be endowed, above all others, with extraordinary privileges, by which proselytes may be enticed from all others? We think too favourably of the justice and good sense of these denominations, to believe, that they either covet preeminencies over their fellow citizens, or that they will be seduced by them, from the common opposition to the measure.

Because, The bill implies, either that the civil magistrate is a competent judge of religious truth; or that he may employ religion as an engine of civil policy. The first is an arrogant pretension, falsified by the contradictory opinions of rulers in all ages, and throughout the world: The second an unhallowed perversion of the means of salvation.

Because, The establishment proposed by the bill is not requisite for the support of the Christian religion. To say that it is, is a contradiction to the Christian religion itself; for every page of it disavows a dependence on the powers of this world: It is a contradiction to fact; for it is known that this religion both existed and flourished, not only without the support of human laws, but in spite of every opposition from them; and not only during the period of miraculous aid, but long after it had been left to its own evidence, and the ordinary care of Providence: Nay, it is a contradiction in terms; for a religion not invented by human policy, must have pre-existed and been supported, before it was established by human policy. It is moreover to weaken in those who profess this religion, a pious confidence in its innate excellence, and the patronage of its author; and to foster in those who still reject it, a suspicion, that its friends are too conscious of its fallacies, to trust it to its own merits.

Because, Experience witnesseth, that ecclesiastical establishments, instead of maintaining the purity and efficacy of religion, have had a contrary operation. During almost fifteen centuries, has the legal establishment of Christianity been on trial. What have been its fruits? More or less in all places, pride and indolence in the clergy; ignorance and servility in the laity; in both, superstition, bigotry and persecution. Inquire of the teachers of Christianity for the ages in which it appeared in its greatest lustre; those of every sect point to the ages prior to its incorporation with civil policy. Propose a restoration of this primitive state, in which its teachers depended on the voluntary rewards of their flocks; many of them predict its downfall. On which side ought their testimony to have greatest weight, when for, or when against their interest?

Because, The establishment in question is not necessary for the support of civil government. If it be urged as necessary for the support of civil government, only as it is a means of supporting religion; and it be not necessary for the latter purpose, it cannot be necessary for the former. If religion be not within the cognizance of civil government, how can its legal establishment be said to be necessary to civil government? What influence, in fact [sic] have ecclesiastical establishments had on civil society? In some instances they have been seen to erect a spiritual tyranny on the ruins of civil authority; in many instances they have been seen upholding the thrones of political tyranny; in no instance have they been seen the guardians of the liberties of the people. Rulers who wished to subvert the publick liberty, may have found an established clergy, convenient auxiliaries. A just government, instituted to secure and perpetuate it, needs them not. Such a government will be best supported by protecting every citizen in the enjoyment of his religion, with the same equal hand, which protects his person, and his property; by neither invading the equal rights by any sect; nor suffering any sect to invade those of another.

Because, The proposed establishment is a departure from that generous policy; which, offering an asylum to the persecuted and oppressed of every nation and religion, promised a lustre to our country, and an accession to the number of its citizens. What a melancholy mark is the Bill of sudden degeneracy? Instead of holding forth an asylum to the persecuted, it is itself a signal of persecution. It degrades from the equal rank of citizens all those whose opinions in religion do not bend to those of the Legislative Authority. Distant as it may be, in its present form, from the Inquisition, it differs from it only in degree. The one is the first step, the other the last, in the career of intolerance. The magnanimous sufferer under this cruel scourge in foreign regions, must view the Bill as a beacon on our coast, warning him to seek some other haven, where liberty and philanthropy, in their due extent, may offer a more certain repose from his troubles.

Because, It will have a like tendency to banish our citizens. The allurements presented by other situations are every day thinning their number. To superadd a fresh motive to emigration, by revoking the liberty which they now enjoy, would be the same species of folly, which has dishonoured and depopulated flourishing kingdoms.

Because, It will destroy that moderation and harmony which the forbearance of our laws to intermeddle with religion, has produced amongst its several sects. Torrents of blood have been spilt in the old world, by vain attempts of the secular arm to extinguish religious discord, by proscribing all differences in religious opinion. Time has at length revealed the true remedy. Every relaxation of narrow and rigorous policy, wherever it has been tried, has been found to assuage the disease. The American theatre has exhibited proofs, that equal and complete liberty, if it does not wholly eradicate it, sufficiently destroys its malignant influence on the health and prosperity of the State. If, with the salutary effects of this system under our own eyes, we begin to contract the bounds of religious freedom, we know no name that will too severely reproach our folly. At least let warning be taken at the first fruit of the threatened innovation. The very appearance of the Bill has transformed that “Christian forbearance, love and charity,” which of late mutually prevailed, into animosities and jealousies, which may not soon be appeased. What mischiefs may not be dreaded, should this enemy to the publick quiet be armed with the force of a law?

Because, The policy of the Bill is adverse to the diffusion of the light of Christianity. The first wish of those who enjoy this precious gift, ought to be that it may be imparted to the whole race of mankind. Compare the number of those who have as yet received it, with the number still remaining under the dominion of false religions; and how small is the former? Does the policy of the Bill tend to lessen the disproportion? No: It at once discourages those, who are strangers to the light of revelation from coming into the region of it; and countenances, by example, the nations who continue in darkness, in shutting out those who might convey it to them. Instead of levelling as far as possible, every obstacle to the victorious progress of truth, the Bill, with an ignoble and unchristian timidity, would circumscribe it, with a wall of defence, against the encroachments of errour.

Because, Attempts to enforce by legal sanctions, acts obnoxious to so great a proportion of citizens, tend to enervate the laws in general, and to slacken the bands of society. If it be difficult to execute any law which is not generally deemed necessary or salutary, what must be the case, where it is deemed invalid and dangerous? And what may be the effect of so striking an example of impotency in the government, on its general authority?

Because, A measure of such singular magnitude and delicacy ought not to be imposed, without the clearest evidence that it is called for by a majority of citizens: And no satisfactory method is yet proposed, by which the voice of the majority in this case may be determined, or its influence secured. “The people of the respective counties are indeed requested to signify their opinion respecting the adoption of the Bill to the next session of Assembly.” But the representation must be made equal, before the voice either of the Representatives, or of the counties, will be that of the people. Our hope is that neither of the former will, after due consideration, espouse the dangerous principle of the Bill. Should the event disappoint us, it will still leave us in full confidence, that a fair appeal to the latter will reverse the sentence against our liberties.

Because, Finally, “The equal right of every citizen to the free exercise of his religion according to the dictates of conscience,” is held by the same tenure with all our other rights. If we recur to its origin, it is equally the gift of nature; if we weigh its importance, it cannot be less dear to us; if we consult the “declaration of those rights which pertain to the good people of Virginia, as the basis and foundation of government,” it is enumerated with equal solemnity, or rather studied emphasis. Either then we must say, that the will of the Legislature is the only measure of their authority, and that in the plenitude of this authority, they may sweep away all our fundamental rights; or that they are bound to leave this particular right untouched and sacred: Either we must say, that they may controul the freedom of the press, may abolish the trial by jury, may swallow up the Executive and Judiciary Powers of the State; nay, that they may despoil us of our very right of suffrage, and erect themselves into an independent and hereditary Assembly: or we must say, that they have no authority to enact into law the Bill under consideration. We the subscribers say, that the General Assembly of this Commonwealth have no such Authority: And that no effort may be omitted on our part against so dangerous an usurpation, we oppose to it, this remonstrance; earnestly praying, as we are in duty bound, that the Supreme Lawgiver of the Universe, by illuminating those to whom it is addressed, may on the one hand, turn their councils from every act which would affront his holy prerogative, or violate the trust committed to them: And on the other, guide them into every measure which may be worthy of his blessing, may redound to their own praise, and may establish more firmly the liberties, the prosperity and the happiness of the Commonwealth.

1.1.3.15.fBill for Religious Freedom, 1786

Well aware that Almighty God hath created the mind free; that all attempts to influence it by temporal punishments or burdens, or by civil incapacitations, tend only to beget habits of hypocrisy and meanness, and are a departure from the plan of the Holy Author of our religion, who, being Lord both of body and mind, yet chose not to propagate it by coercions on either, as was in his Almighty power to do; that the impious presumption of legislators and rulers, civil as well as ecclesiastical, who, being themselves but fallible and uninspired men have assumed dominion over the faith of others, setting up their own opinions and modes of thinking as the only true and infallible, and as such endeavoring to impose them on others, hath established and maintained false religions over the greatest part of the world, and through all time; That to compel a man to furnish contributions of money for the propagation of opinions which he disbelieves, is sinful and tyrannical; that even the forcing him to support this or that teacher of his own religious persuasion, is depriving him of the comfortable liberty of giving his contributions to the particular pastor whose morals he would make his pattern, and whose powers he feels most persuasive to righteousness, and is withdrawing from the ministry those temporal rewards, which proceeding from an approbation of their personal conduct, are an additional incitement to earnest and unremitting labors for the instruction of mankind; that our civil rights have no dependence on our religious opinions, more than our opinions in physics or geometry; that therefore the proscribing any citizen as unworthy the public confidence by laying upon him an incapacity of being called to the offices of trust and emolument, unless he profess or renounce this or that religious opinion, is depriving him injuriously of those privileges and advantages to which in common with his fellow citizens he has a natural right; that it intends also to corrupt the principles of that very religion it is meant to encourage, by bribing, with a monopoly of worldly honors and emoluments, those who will externally profess and conform to it; that though indeed these are criminal who do not withstand such temptation, yet neither are those innocent who lay the bait in their way; that to suffer the civil magistrate to intrude his powers into the field of opinion, and to restrain the profession or propagation of principles, on supposition of their ill tendency, is a dangerous fallacy, which at once destroys all religious liberty, because he being of course judge of that tendency, will make his opinions the rule of judgment, and approve or condemn the sentiments of others only as they shall square with or differ from his own; that it is time enough for the rightful purposes of civil government for its offices to interfere when principles break out into overt acts against peace and good order; and finally, that truth is great and will prevail if left to herself, that she is the proper and sufficient antagonist to error, and has nothing to fear from the conflict, unless by human interposition disarmed of her natural weapons, free argument and debate, errors ceasing to be dangerous when it is permitted freely to contradict them.

Be it therefore enacted by the General Assembly, That no man shall be compelled to frequent or support any religious worship, place or ministry whatsoever, nor shall be enforced, restrained, molested, or burthened in his body or goods, nor shall otherwise suffer on account of his religious opinions or belief; but that all men shall be free to profess, and by argument to maintain, their opinions in matters of religion, and that the same shall in nowise diminish, enlarge, or affect their civil capacities.

And though we well know that this Assembly, elected by the people for the ordinary purposes of legislation only, have no power to restrain the acts of succeeding Assemblies, constituted with powers equal to our own, and that therefore to declare this act irrevocable, would be of no effect in law, yet we are free to declare, and do declare, that the rights hereby asserted are the natural rights of mankind, and that if any act shall be hereafter passed to repeal the present or to narrow its operation, such act will be an infringement of natural right.

1.2DISCUSSION OF DRAFTS AND PROPOSALS

1.2.1THE FIRST CONGRESS

1.2.1.1June 8, 1789

1.2.1.1.a Mr. Madison.

. . . The first of these amendments, relates to what may be called a bill of rights; I will own that I never considered this provision so essential to the federal constitution, as to make it improper to ratify it, until such an amendment was added; at the same time, I always conceived, that in a certain form and to a certain extent, such a provision was neither improper nor altogether useless. I am aware, that a great number of the most respectable friends to the government and champions for republican liberty, have thought such a provision, not only unneccessary, but even improper, nay, I believe some have gone so far as to think it even dangerous. Some policy has been made use of perhaps by gentlemen on both sides of the question: I acknowledge the ingenuity of those arguments which were drawn against the constitution, by a comparison with the policy of Great Britain, in establishing a declaration of rights; but there is too great a difference in the case to warrant the comparison: therefore the arguments drawn from that source, were in a great measure inapplicable. In the declaration of rights which that country has established, the truth is, they have gone no farther, than to raise a barrier against the power of the Crown, the power of the legislature is left altogether indefinite. Altho' I know whenever the great rights, the trial by jury, freedom of the press, or liberty of conscience, came in question in that body [Great Britain], the invasion of them is resisted by able advocates, yet their Magna Charta does not contain any one provision for the security of those rights, respecting which, the people of America are most alarmed. The freedom of the press and rights of conscience, those choicest privileges of the people, are unguarded in the British constitution.

But altho' the case may be widely different, and it may not be thought necessary to provide limits for the legislative power in that country, yet a different opinion prevails in the United States. The people of many states, have thought it necessary to raise barriers against power in all forms and departments of government, and I am inclined to believe, if once bills of rights are established in all the states as well as the federal constitution, we shall find that altho' some of them are rather unimportant, yet, upon the whole, they will have a salutary tendency.

It may be said, in some instances they do no more than state the perfect equality of mankind, this to be sure is an absolute truth, yet it is not absolutely necessary to be inserted at the head of a constitution.

In some instances they assert those rights which are exercised by the people in forming and establishing a plan of government. In other instances, they specify those rights which are retained when particular powers are given up to be exercised by the legislature. In other instances, they specify positive rights, which may seem to result from the nature of the compact. Trial by jury cannot be considered as natural right, but a right resulting from the social compact which regulates the action of the community, but is essential to secure the liberty of the people as any one of the pre-existent rights of nature. In other instances they lay down dogmatic maxims with respect to the construction of the government; declaring that the legislative, executive, and judicial branches shall be kept separate and distinct: Perhaps the best way of securing this in practice is to provide such checks, as will prevent the encroachment of the one upon the another.

But whatever may be form which the several states have adopted in making declaration in favor of particular rights, the great object in view is to limit and qualify the powers of government, by excepting out of the grant of power those cases in which the government ought not to act, or to act only in a particular mode. They point these exceptions sometimes against the abuse of the executive power, sometimes against the legislative, and in some cases, against the community itself; or, in other words, against the majority in favor of the minority.

In our government it is, perhaps, less necessary to guard against the abuse in the executive department than any other; because it is not the stronger branch of the system, but the weaker: It therefore must be levelled against the legislative, for it is the most powerful, and most likely to be abused, because it is under the least controul; hence, so far as a declaration of rights can tend to prevent the exercise of undue power, it cannot be doubted but such declaration is proper. But I confess that I do conceive, that in a government modified like this of the United States, the great danger lies rather in the abuse of the community than in the legislative body. The prescriptions in favor of liberty, ought to be levelled against that quarter where the greatest danger lies, namely, that which possesses the highest perogative [sic] of power: But this not found in either the executive or legislative departments of government, but in the body of the people, operating by the majority against the minority.

It may be thought all paper barriers against the power of the community, are too weak to be worthy of attention. I am sensible they are not so strong as to satisfy gentlemen of every descripton who have seen and examined thoroughly the texture of such a defence; yet, as they have a tendency to impress some degree of respect for them, to establish the public opinion in their favor, and rouse the attention of the whole community, it may be one mean to controul the majority from those acts to which they might be otherwise inclined.

It has been said by way of objection to a bill of rights, by many respectable gentlemen out of doors, and I find opposition on the same principles likely to be made by gentlemen on this floor, that they are unnecessary articles of a republican government, upon the presumption that the people have those rights in their own hands, and that is the proper place for them to rest. It would be a sufficient answer to say that this objection lies against such provisions under the state governments as well as under the general government; and there are, I believe, but few gentlemen who are inclined to push their theory so far as to say that a declaration of rights in those cases is either ineffectual or improper. It has been said that in the federal government they are unnecessary, because the powers are enumerated, and it follows that all that are not granted by the constitution are retained: that the constitution is a bill or powers, the great residuum being the rights of the people; and therefore a bill of rights cannot be so necessary as if the residuum was thrown into the hands of the government. I admit that these arguments are not entirely without foundation; but they are not conclusive to the extent which has been supposed. It is true the powers of the general government are circumscribed, they are directed to particular objects; but even if government keeps within those limits, it has certain discretionary powers with respect to the means, which may admit of abuse to a certain extent, in the same manner as the powers of the state governments under their constitutions may to an indefinite extent; because in the constitution of the United States there is a clause granting to Congress the power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution all the powers vested in the government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof; this enables them to fulfil every purpose for which the government was established. Now, may not laws be considered necessary and proper by Congress, for it is them who are to judge of the necessity and propriety to accomplish those special purposes which they may have in contemplation, which laws in themselves are neither necessary or proper; as well as improper laws could be enacted by the state legislatures, for fulfilling the more extended objects of those governments. I will state an instance which I think in point, and proves that this might be the case. The general government has a right to pass all laws which shall be necessary to collect its revenue; the means for enforcing the collection are within the direction of the legislature: may not general warrants be considered necessary for this purpose, as well as for some purposes which it was supposed at the framing of their constitutions the state governments had in view. If there was reason for restraining the state governments from exercising this power, there is like reason for restraining the federal government.

It may be said, because it has been said, that a bill of rights is not necessary, because the establishment of this government has not repealed those declarations of rights which are added to the several state constitutions; that those rights of the people, which had been established by the most solemn act, could not be annihilated by a subsequent act of that people, who meant, and declared at the head of the instrument, that they ordained and established a new system, for the express purpose of securing to themselves and posterity the liberties they had gained by an arduous conflict.

I admit the force of this observation, but I do not look upon it to be conclusive. In the first place, it is too uncertain ground to leave this provision upon, if a provision is at all necessary to secure rights so important as many of those I have mentioned are conceived to be, by the public in general, as well as those in particular who opposed the adoption of this constitution. Beside some states have no bills of rights, there are others provided with very defective ones, and there are others whose bills of rights are not only defective, but absolutely improper; instead of securing some in the full extent which republican principles would require, they limit them too much to agree with the common ideas of liberty.

It has been objected also against a bill of rights, that, by enumerating particular exceptions to the grant of power, it would disparage those rights which were not placed in that enumeration, and it might follow by implication, that those rights which were not singled out, were intended to be assigned into the hands of the general government, and were consequently insecure. This is one of the most plausible arguments I have ever heard urged against the admission of a bill of rights into this system; but, I conceive, it may be guarded against. I have attempted it, as gentlemen may see by turning to the last clause of the 4th resolution.

It has been said, that it is unnecessary to load the constitution with this provision, because it was not found effectual in the constitution of the particular states. It is true, there are a few particular states in which some of the most valuable articles have not, at one time or other, been violated, but it does not follow but they may have, to a certain degree, a salutary effect against the abuse of power. If they are incorporated into the constitution, independent tribunals of justice will consider themselves in a peculiar manner the guardians of those rights; they will be an impenetrable bulwark against every assumption of power in the legislative or executive; they will be naturally led to resist every encroachment upon rights expressly stipulated for in the constitution by the declaration of rights. Beside this security, there is a great probability that such a declaration in the federal system would be inforced; because the state legislatures will jealously and closely watch the operations of this government, and be able to resist with more effect every assumption of power than any other power on earth can do; and the greatest opponents to a federal government admit the state legislatures to be sure guardians of the people’s liberty. I conclude from this view of the subject, that it will be proper in itself, and highly politic, for the tranquility of the public mind, and the stability of the government, that we should offer something, in the form I have proposed, to be incorporated in the system of government, as a declaration of the rights of the people.

I wish also, in revising the constitution, we may throw into the section, which interdicts the abuse of certain powers in the state legislatures, some other provisions of equal if not greater importance than those already made. The words, “No state shall pass any bill of attainder, ex post facto law, &c.” were wise and proper restrictions in the constitution. I think there is more danger of those powers being abused by the state governments than by the government of the United States. The same may be said of other powers which they possess, if not controuled by the general principle, that laws are unconstitutional which infringe the rights of the community. I should therefore wish to extend this interdiction, and add, as I have stated in the 5th resolution, that no state shall violate the equal right of conscience, freedom of the press, or trial by jury in criminal cases; because it is proper that every government should be disarmed of powers which trench upon those particular rights. I know in some of the state constitutions the power of the government is controuled by such a declaration, but others are not. I cannot see any reason against obtaining even a double security on those points; and nothing can give a more sincere proof of the atachment [sic] of those who opposed this constitution to those great and important rights, than to see them join in obtaining the security I have now proposed; because it must be admitted, on all hands, that the state governments are as liable to attack those invaluable privileges as the general government is, and therefore ought to be as cautiously guarded against.

I think it will be proper, with respect to the judiciary powers, to satisfy the public mind on those points which I have mentioned. Great inconvenience has been apprehended to suitors from the distance they would be dragged to obtain justice in the supreme court of the United States, upon an appeal on an action for a final debt. To remedy this, declare, that no appeal shall be made unless the matter in controversy amounts to a particular sum: This, with the regulations respecting jury trials in criminal cases, and suits at common law, it is to be hoped will quiet and reconcile the minds of the people to that part of the constitution.

I find, from looking into the amendments proposed by the state conventions, that several are particularly anxious that it should be declared in the constitution, that the powers not therein delegated, should be reserved to the several states. Perhaps words which may define this more precisely, than the whole of the instrument now does, may be considered as superfluous. I admit they may be deemed unnecessary; but there can be no harm in making such a declaration, if gentlemen will allow that the fact is as stated, I am sure I understand it so, and do therefore propose it.

These are the points on which I wish to see a revision of the constitution take place. How far they will accord with the sense of this body, I cannot take upon me absolutely to determine; but I believe every gentleman will readily admit that nothing is in contemplation, so far as I have mentioned, that can endanger the beauty of government in any one important feature, even in the eyes of its most sanguine admirers. I have proposed nothing that does not appear to me as proper in itself, or eligible as patronised by a respectable number of our fellow citizens; and if we can make the constitution better in the opinion of those who are opposed to it, without weakening its frame, or abridging its usefulness, in the judgment of those who are attached to it, we act the part of wise and liberal men to make such alterations as shall produce that effect.

Congressional Register, June 8, 1789, vol. 1, pp. 429–36.

1.2.1.1.b Mr. MADISON replied in a long and able speech, in which he enforced the propriety of entering, at an early period, into the subject of amendments. He had no design to propose any alterations which in the view of the most sanguine friends to the constitution could affect its main structure or principles, or do it any possible injury — His object was to quiet the mind of the people by giving them some early assurance of a disposition in the house to provide expressly against all encroachments on their liberties, and against the abuses to which the principles of the constitution were liable.

He then stated a number of amendments which he thought should be incorporated in the constitution, and enforced the propriety of each by various explanations and arguments.

The opposition the original motion received, induced him at last to withdraw it in order to propose, that a special committee should be appointed to consider and report what amendments it would be proper to adopt.

He afterwards waved this proposition; and offered to the house a resolution comprehending the amendments at large, together with a bill of rights, which he moved might be referred to the committee of the whole, when fitting on the state of the Union. This was carried.

Daily Advertiser, June 9, 1789, p. 2.

1.2.1.1.c . . . He then observed, That he thought it would be attended with salutary effects, should Congress devote, at the present time, so much at least as one day to this business, to convince the world, that the friends of the Constitution were as firm friends to liberty as those who had opposed it:

The advocates for amendments are numerous and respectable — some alteration of the Constitution lays with great weight upon their minds — they merit consideration. — He urged the expediency of the measure, from the situation of Rhode-Island and North-Carolina — He had no doubt that it would conciliate them towards the Union, and induce them to unite, and again become branches of the great American Family. — He was, he observed, in favour of sundry alterations, or amendments, to the Constitution — he supposed that they could be made without injury to the system — He did not wish a reconsideration of the whole — but supposed that alterations might be made, without effecting the essential principles of the Constitution, which would meet with universal approbation; — those he would propose should be incorporated in the body of the Constitution. — He then mentioned the several objections which had been made by several of the States, and by people at large: — A bill of rights has been the great object contended for — but this was one of those amendments which he had not supposed very essential. — The freedom of the press, and the rights of conscience, those choicest flowers in the prerogative of the people, are not guarded by the British Constitution: — With respect to these, apprehensions had been entertained of their insecurity under the new Constitution; a bill of rights, therefore, to quiet the minds of people upon these points, may be salutary. — He then adverted to the several bills of rights, which were annexed to the Constitutions of individual States; — the great object of these was, to limit and qualify the powers of Government — to guard against the encroachments of the Executive. — In the Federal Government, the Executive is the weakest — the great danger lies not in the Executive, but in the great body of the people — in the disposition which the majority always discovers, to bear down, and depress the minority.

In stating objections which had been made to affixing a bill of rights to the constitution, Mr. MADISON observed, that objections to a continental bill of rights applied equally to their adoption by the States — The objection to a bill of rights, from the powers delegated by the Constitution, being defined and limited, has weight, while the Government confines itself to those specified limits; but instances may occur, in which those limits may be exceeded, by virtue of a construction of that clause empowering Congress to make all necessary laws to carry the Constitution into execution — The article of general warrants may be instanced. — It has been observed, that the Constitution does not repeal the State bills of rights; — to this it may be replied, that some of the States are without any — and that articles contained in those that have them, are very improper, and infringe upon the rights of human nature, in several respects. — It has been said, that bills of rights have been violated — but does it follow from thence that they do not produce salutary effects: This objection may be urged against every regulation whatever. — From these, and other considerations, Mr. Madison inferred the expediency of a declaration of rights, to be incorporated in the Constitution.

Mr. Madison further observed, That the proportion of Representatives had been objected to — and particularly the discretionary power of diminishing the number. — There is an impropriety in the Legislatures' determining their own compensation, with a power to vary its amount. — The rights of conscience; liberty of the press; and trial by jury, should be so secured, as to put it out of the power of the Legislature to infringe them. — Fears respecting the judiciary system, should be entirely done away — and an express declaration made, that all rights not expressly given up, are retained. — He wished, that a declaration upon these points might be attended to — and if the Constitution can be made better in the view of its most sanguine supporters, by making some alterations in it, we shall not act the part of wise men not to do it — He therefore moved for the appointment of a committee to propose amendments, which should be laid before the Legislatures of the several States, agreeably to the 5th article of the Constitution.

1.2.1.2 August 15, 1789

1.2.1.2.a The house resolved itself into a committee of the whole, and resumed the consideration of the report of the committee on the subject of amendments.

Mr. Boudinot in the chair.

The fourth proposition under consideration being as follows:

Article 1. Sect. 9. Between paragraph 2 and 3 insert "no religion shall be established by law, nor shall the equal rights of conscience be infringed."

Mr. Sylvester

Had some doubts of the propriety of the mode of expression used in this paragraph; he apprehended that it was liable to a construction different from what had been made by the committee, he feared it might be thought to have a tendency to abolish religion altogether.

Mr. Vining

Suggested the propriety of transposing the two members of the sentence.

Mr. Gerry

Said it would read better if it was, that no religious doctrine shall be established by law.

Mr. Sherman

Thought the amendment altogether unnecessary, inasmuch as congress had no authority whatever delegated to them by the constitution, to make religious establishments, he would therefore move to have it struck out.

Mr. Carroll

As the rights of conscience are in their nature of peculiar delicacy, and will little bear the gentlest touch of the governmental hand; and as many sects have concurred in opinion that they are not well secured under the present constitution, he said he was much in favor of adopting the words; he thought it would tend more toward conciliating the minds of the people to the government than almost any other amendment he had heard proposed. He would not contend with gentlemen about the phraseology, his object was to secure the substance in such a manner as to satisfy the wishes of the honest part of the community.

Mr. Madison

Said, he apprehended the meaning of the words to be, that congress should not establish a religion, and enforce the legal observation of it by law, nor compel men to worship God in any manner contrary to their conscience; whether the words are necessary or not he did not mean to say, but they had been required by some of the state conventions, who seemed to entertain an opinion that under the clause of the constitution, which gave power to congress to make all laws necessary and proper to carry into execution the constitution, and the laws made under it, enabled them to make laws of such a nature as might infringe the rights of conscience, or establish a national religion, to prevent these effects he presumed the amendment was intended, and he thought it as well expressed as the nature of the language would admit.

Mr. Huntington

Said that he feared with the gentleman first up on this subject, that the words might be taken in such latitude as to be extremely hurtful to the cause of religion: He understood the amendment to mean what had been expressed by the gentleman from Virginia but others might find it convenient to put another construction upon it. The ministers of their congregations to the eastward, were maintained by the contributions of those who belonged to their society; the expense of building meeting-houses was contributed in the same manner, these things were regulated by bye laws: If an action was brought before a federal court on any of these cases, the person who had neglected to perform his engagements could not be compelled to do it; for a support of ministers, or building places of worship might be construed into a religious establishment.

By the charter of Rhode-Island, no religion could be established by law, he could give a history of the effects of such a regulation; indeed the people were now enjoying the blessed fruits of it: He hoped therefore the amendment would be made in such a way as to secure the rights of conscience, and a free exercise of the rights of religion, but not to patronize those who professed no religion at all.

Mr. Madison

Thought, if the word national was inserted before religion, it would satisfy the minds of honorable gentlemen. He believed that the people feared one sect might obtain a preeminence, or two combine together, and establish a religion to which they would compel others to conform; he thought if the word national was introduced, it would point the amendment directly to the object it was intended to prevent.

Mr. Livermore

Was not satisfied with that amendment, but he did not wish them to dwell long on the subject; he thought it would be better if it was altered, and made to read in this manner, that congress shall make no laws touching religion, or infringing the rights of conscience.

Mr. Gerry

Did not like the term national, proposed by the gentleman from Virginia, and he hoped it would not be adopted by the house. It brought to his mind some observations that had taken place in the conventions at the time they were considering the present constitution; it had been insisted upon by those who were called antifederalists, that this form of government consolidated the union; the honorable gentleman's motion shews that he considers it in the same light; those who were called antifederalists at that time complained that they had injustice done them by the title, because they were in favor of a federal government, and the others were in favor of a national one; the federalists were for ratifying the constitution as it stood, and the others not until amendments were made. Their names then ought not to have been distinguished by federalists and antifederalists, but rats and antirats.

Mr. Madison

Withdrew his motion, but observed that the words "no national religion shall be established by law," did not imply that the government was a national one; the question was then taken on Mr. Livermore's motion, and passed in the affirmative, 31 for, 20 against it.

Congressional Register, August 15, 1789, vol. 2, pp. 194–97.

1.2.1.2.b The House went into a committee on the amendments to the Constitution.

Mr. Boudinot in the chair.

The committee took up the fourth amendment. — "Art. I. Sec. 9. Between par. 2 and 3 insert, "no religion shall be established by law, nor shall the equal rights of conscience be infringed."

Mr. Livermore moved to strike out this clause and to substitute one to the following effect — "The Congress shall make no laws touching religion or the rights of conscience." He observed that tho' the sense of both provisions was the same, yet the former might seem to wear an ill face and was subject to misconstruction.

Daily Advertiser, August 17, 1789, p. 2, col. 1. ("The question on this motion was carried.").

1.2.1.2.c The House went into a committee on the amendments to the Constitution.

Mr. Boudinot in the chair.

The committee took up the fourth amendment. —

"Art. I. Sec. 9. Between par. 2 and 3 insert, no religion shall be established by law, nor shall the equal rights of conscience be infringed."

Mr. Livermore moved to strike out this clause and to substitute one to the following effect — "The Congress shall make no laws touching religion or the rights of conscience." He observed tho' the sense of both provisions was the same, yet the former might seem to wear an ill face and was subject to misconstruction.

New-York Daily Gazette, August 18, 1789, p. 798, col. 4. ("The question on this motion was carried.").

1.2.1.2.d In committee of the whole, on amendments to the constitution — the fourth amendment under consideration; viz. Art. I. Sec. 9, between Par. 2 and 3 insert "no religion shall be established by law, nor shall the equal rights of conscience be infringed."

Mr. Sylvester said he doubted the propriety of the mode of expression used in this paragraph; he thought it was liable to a construction different from what was intended by the committee.

Mr. Sherman. It appears to me best that this article should be omitted intirely: Congress has no power to make any religious establishments, it is therefore unnecessary.

Mr. Carroll, Mr. Huntington, Mr. Madison, and Mr. Livermore made some observations: The last proposed that the words should be struck out to substitute these words, "Congress shall make no laws touching religion or the rights of conscience."

Gazette of the U.S., August 19, 1789, p. 147, col. 1. ("The question on this motion was carried.").

1.2.1.3August 20, 1789

On motion of Mr. Ames, the fourth amendment was altered so as to read "congress shall make no law establishing religion, or to prevent the free exercise thereof, or to infringe the rights of conscience." This being adopted.

Congressional Register, August 20, 1789, vol. 2, p. 242.

1.2.2STATE CONVENTIONS

1.2.2.1Connecticut, January 9, 1788

Hon. OLIVER WOLCOTT. . . .

. . . Knowledge and liberty are so prevalent in this country, that I do not believe that the United States would ever be disposed to establish one religious sect, and lay all others under legal disabilities.

Elliot, vol. 2, p. 202.

1.2.2.2New York, July 2, 1788

Mr. TREDWELL. . . .

. . . I could have wished also that sufficient caution had been used to secure to us our religious liberties, and to have prevented the general government from tyrannizing over our consciences by a religious establishment — a tyranny of all others most dreadful, and which will assuredly be exercised whenever it shall be thought necessary for the promotion and support of their political measures.

Elliot, vol. 2, p. 399.

1.2.2.3North Carolina, July 30, 1788

The last clause of the 6th article read.

Mr. HENRY ABBOT, after a short exordium, which was not distinctly heard, proceeded thus: Some are afraid, Mr. Chairman, that, should the Constitution be received, they would be deprived of the privilege of worshipping God according to their consciences, which would be taking from them a benefit they enjoy under the present constitution. They wish to know if their religious and civil liberties be secured under this system, or whether the general government may not make laws infringing their religious liberties. The worthy member from Edenton mentioned sundry political reasons why treaties should be the supreme law of the land. It is feared, by some people, that, by the power of making treaties, they might make a treaty engaging with foreign powers to adopt the Roman Catholic religion in the United States, which would prevent the people from worshipping God according to their own consciences. The worthy member from Halifax has in some measure satisfied my mind on this subject. But others may be dissatisfied. Many wish to know what religion shall be established. I believe a majority of the community are Presbyterians. I am, for my part, against any exclusive establishment; but if there were any, I would prefer the Episcopal. The exclusion of religious tests is by many thought dangerous and impolitic. They suppose that if there be no religious test required, pagans, deists, and Mahometans might obtain offices among us, and that the senators and representatives might all be pagans. Every person employed by the general and state governments is to take an oath to support the former. Some are desirous to know how and by whom they are to swear, since no religious tests are required — whether they are to swear by Jupiter, Juno, Minerva, Proserpine, or Pluto. We ought to be suspicious of our liberties. We have felt the effects of oppressive measures, and know the happy consequences of being jealous of our rights. I would be glad some gentleman would endeavor to obviate these objections, in order to satisfy the religious part of the society. Could I be convinced that the objections were well founded, I would then declare my opinion against the Constitution. [Mr. Abbot added several other observations, but spoke too low to be heard.]

Mr. IREDELL. Mr. Chairman, nothing is more desirable than to remove the scruples of any gentleman on this interesting subject. Those concerning religion are entitled to particular respect. I did not expect any objection to this particular regulation, which, in my opinion, is calculated to prevent evils of the most pernicious consequences to society. Every person in the least conversant in the history of mankind, knows what dreadful mischiefs have been committed by religious persecutions. Under the color of religious tests, the utmost cruelties have been exercised. Those in power have generally considered all wisdom centred in themselves; that they alone had a right to dictate to the rest of mankind; and that all opposition to their tenets was profane and impious. The consequence of this intolerant spirit had been, that each church has in turn set itself up against every other; and persecutions and wars of the most implacable and bloody nature have taken place in every part of the world. America has set an example to mankind to think more modestly and reasonably — that a man may be of different religious sentiments from our own, without being a bad member of society. The principles of toleration, to the honor of this age, are doing away those errors and prejudices which have so long prevailed, even in the most intolerant countries. In the Roman Catholic countries, principles of moderation are adopted which would have been spurned at a century or two ago. I should be sorry to find, when examples of toleration are set even by arbitrary governments, that this country, so impressed with the highest sense of liberty, should adopt principles on this subject that were narrow and illiberal.

I consider the clause under consideration as one of the strongest proofs that could be adduced, that it was the intention of those who formed this system to establish a general religious liberty in America. Were we to judge from the examples of religious tests in other countries, we should be persuaded that they do not answer the purpose for which they are intended. What is the consequence of such in England? In that country no man can be a member in the House of Commons, or hold any office under the crown, without taking the sacrament according to the rites of the Church. This, in the first instance, must degrade and profane a rite which never ought to be taken but from a sincere principle of devotion. To a man of base principles, it is made a mere instrument of civil policy. The intention was, to exclude all persons from offices but the members of the Church of England. Yet it is notorious that dissenters qualify themselves for offices in this manner, though they never conform to the Church on any other occasion; and men of no religion at all have no scruple to make use of this qualification. It never was known that a man who had no principles of religion hesitated to perform any rite when it was convenient for his private interest. No test can bind such a one. I am therefore clearly of opinion that such a discrimination would neither be effectual for its own purposes, nor, if it could, ought it by any means to be made. Upon the principles I have stated, I confess the restriction on the power of Congress, in this particular, has my hearty approbation. They certainly have no authority to interfere in the establishment of any religion whatsoever; and I am astonished that any gentlemen should conceive they have. Is there any power given to Congress in matters of religion? Can they pass a single act to impair our religious liberties? If they could, it would be a just cause of alarm. If they could, sir, no man would have more horror against it than myself. Happily, no sect here is superior to another. As long as this is the case, we shall be free from those persecutions and distractions with which other countries have been torn. If any future Congress should pass an act concerning the religion of the country, it would be an act which they are not authorized to pass, by the Constitution, and which the people would not obey. Every one would ask, “Who authorized the government to pass such an act? It is not warranted by the Constitution, and is barefaced usurpation.” The power to make treaties can never be supposed to include a right to establish a foreign religion among ourselves, though it might authorize a toleration of others.

But it is objected that the people of America may, perhaps, choose representatives who have no religion at all, and that pagans and Mahometans may be admitted into offices. But how is it possible to exclude any set of men, without taking away that principle of religious freedom which we ourselves so warmly contend for? This is the foundation on which persecution has been raised in every part of the world. The people in power were always right, and every body else wrong. If you admit the least difference, the door to persecution is opened. Nor would it answer the purpose, for the worst part of the excluded sects would comply with the test, and the best men only be kept out of our counsels. But it is never to be supposed that the people of America will trust their dearest rights to persons who have no religion at all, or a religion materially different from their own. I would be happy for mankind if religion was permitted to take its own course, and maintain itself by the excellence of its own doctrines. The divine Author of our religion never wished for its support by worldly authority. Has he not said that the gates of hell shall not prevail against it? It made much greater progress for itself, than when supported by the greatest authority upon earth.

It has been asked by that respectable gentleman (Mr. Abbot) what is the meaning of that part, where it is said that the United States shall guaranty to every state in the Union a republican form of government, and why a guaranty of religious freedom was not included. The meaning of the guaranty provided was this: There being thirteen governments confederated upon a republican principle, it was essential to the existence and harmony of the confederacy that each should be a republican government, and that no state should have a right to establish an aristocracy or monarchy. That clause was therefore inserted to prevent any state from establishing any government but a republican one. Every one must be convinced of the mischief that would ensue, if any state had a right to change its government to a monarchy. If a monarchy was established in any one state, it would endeavor to subvert the freedom of the others, and would, probably, by degrees succeed in it. This must strike the mind of every person here, who recollects the history of Greece, when she had confederated governments. The king of Macedon, by his arts and intrigues, got himself admitted a member of the Amphictyonic council, which was the superintending government of the Grecian republics; and in a short time he became master of them all. It is, then, necessary that the members of a confederacy should have similar governments. But consistently with this restriction, the states may make what change in their own governments they think proper. Had Congress undertaken to guaranty religious freedom, or any particular species of it, they would then have had a pretence to interfere in a subject they have nothing to do with. Each state, so far as the clause in question does not interfere, must be left to the operation of its own principles.

There is a degree of jealousy which it is impossible to satisfy. Jealousy in a free government ought to be respected; but it may be carried to too great an extent. It is impracticable to guard against all possible danger of people's choosing their officers indiscreetly. If they have a right to choose, they may make a bad choice.

I met, by accident, with a pamphlet, this morning, in which the author states, as a very serious danger, that the pope of Rome might be elected President. I confess this never struck me before; and if the author had read all the qualifications of a President, perhaps his fears might have been quieted. No man but a native, or who has resided fourteen years in America, can be chosen President. I know not all the qualifications for pope, but I believe he must be taken from the college of cardinals; and probably there are many previous steps necessary before he arrives at this dignity. A native of America must have very singular good fortune, who, after residing fourteen years in his own country, should go to Europe, enter into Romish orders, obtain the promotion of cardinal, afterwards that of pope, and at length be so much in the confidence of his own country as to be elected President. It would be still more extraordinary if he should give up his popedom for our presidency. Sir, it is impossible to treat such idle fears with any degree of gravity. Why is it not objected, that there is no provision in the Constitution against electing one of the kings of Europe President? It would be a clause equally rational and judicious.

I hope that I have in some degree satisfied the doubts of the gentleman. This article is calculated to secure universal religious liberty, by putting all sects on a level — the only way to prevent persecution. I thought nobody would have objected to this clause, which deserves, in my opinion, the highest approbation. This country has already had the honor of setting an example of civil freedom, and I trust it will likewise have the honor of teaching the rest of the world the way to religious freedom also. God grant both may be perpetuated to the end of time!

Mr. ABBOT, after expressing his obligations for the explanation which had been given, observed that no answer had been given to the question he put concerning the form of an oath.

Mr. IREDELL. Mr. Chairman, I beg pardon for having omitted to take notice of that part which the worthy gentleman has mentioned. It was by no means from design, but from its having escaped my memory, as I have not the conveniency of taking notes. I shall now satisfy him in that particular in the best manner in my power.

According to the modern definition of an oath, it is considered a "solemn appeal to the Supreme Being, for the truth of what is said, by a person who believes in the existence of a Supreme Being and in a future state of rewards and punishments, according to that form which will bind his conscience most." It was long held that no oath could be administered but upon the New Testament, except to a Jew, who was allowed to swear upon the Old. According to this notion, none but Jews and Christians could take an oath; and heathens were altogether excluded. At length, by the operation of principles of toleration, these narrow notions were done away. Men at length considered that there were many virtuous men in the world who had not had an opportunity of being instructed either in the Old or New Testament, who yet very sincerely believed in a Supreme Being, and in a future state of rewards and punishments. It is well known that many nations entertain this belief who do not believe either in the Jewish or Christian religion. Indeed, there are few people so grossly ignorant or barbarous as to have no religion at all. And if none but Christians or Jews could be examined upon oath, many innocent persons might suffer for want of the testimony of others. In regard to the form of an oath, that ought to be governed by the religion of the person taking it. I remember to have read an instance which happened in England, I believe in the time of Charles II. A man who was a material witness in a cause, refused to swear upon the book, and was admitted to swear with his uplifted hand. The jury had a difficulty in crediting him; but the chief justice told them, he had, in his opinion, taken as strong an oath as any of the other witnesses, though, had he been to swear himself, he should have kissed the book. A very remarkable instance also happened in England, about forty years ago, of a person who was admitted to take an oath according to the rites of his own country, though he was a heathen. He was an East Indian, who had a great suit in chancery, and his answer upon oath to a bill filed against him was absolutely necessary. Not believing either in the Old or New Testament, he could not be sworn in the accustomed manner, but was sworn according to the form of the Gentoo religion, which he professed, by touching the foot of a priest.

It appeared that, according to the tenets of this religion, its members believed in a Supreme Being, and in a future state of rewards and punishments. It was accordingly held by the judges, upon great consideration, that the oath ought to be received; they considering that it was probable those of that religion were equally bound in conscience by an oath according to their form of swearing, as they themselves were by one of theirs; and that it would be a reproach to the justice of the country, if a man, merely because he was of a different religion from their own, should be denied redress of an injury he had sustained. Ever since this great case, it has been universally considered that, in administering an oath, it is only necessary to inquire if the person who is to take it, believes in a Supreme Being, and in a future state of rewards and punishments. If he does, the oath is to be administered according to that form which it is supposed will bind his conscience most. It is, however, necessary that such a belief should be entertained, because otherwise there would be nothing to bind his conscience that could be relied on; since there are many cases where the terror of punishment in this world for perjury could not be dreaded. I have endeavored to satisfy the committee. We may, I think, very safely leave religion to itself; and as to the form of the oath, I think this may well be trusted to the general government, to be applied on the principles I have mentioned.

Gov. JOHNSTON expressed great astonishment that the people were alarmed on the subject of religion. This, he said, must have arisen from the great pains which had been taken to prejudice men’s minds against the Constitution. He begged leave to add the following few observations to what had been so ably said by the gentleman last up.

I read the Constitution over and over, but could not see one cause of apprehension or jealousy on this subject. When I heard there were apprehensions that the pope of Rome could be the President of the United States, I was greatly astonished. It might as well be said that the king of England or France, or the Grand Turk, could be chosen to that office. It would have been as good an argument. It appears to me that it would have been dangerous, if Congress could intermeddle with the subject of religion. True religion is derived from a much higher source than human laws. When any attempt is made, by any government, to restrain men’s consciences, no good consequence can possibly follow. It is apprehended that Jews, Mahometans, pagans, &c., may be elected to high offices under the government of the United States. Those who are Mahometans, or any others who are not professors of the Christian religion, can never be elected to the office of President, or other high office, but in one of two cases. First, if the people of America lay aside the Christian religion altogether, it may happen. Should this unfortunately take place, the people will choose such men as think as they do themselves. Another case is, if any persons of such descriptions should, notwithstanding their religion, acquire the confidence and esteem of the people of America by their good conduct and practice of virtue, they may be chosen. I leave it to gentlemen's candor to judge what probability there is of the people's choosing men of different sentiments from themselves.

But great apprehensions have been raised as to the influence of the Eastern States. When you attend to circumstances, this will have no weight. I know but two or three states where there is the least chance of establishing any particular religion. The people of Massachusetts and Connecticut are mostly Presbyterians. In every other state, the people are divided into a great number of sects. In Rhode Island, the tenets of the Baptists, I believe, prevail. In New York, they are divided very much: the most numerous are the Episcopalians and the Baptists. In New Jersey, they are as much divided as we are. In Pennsylvania, if any sect prevails more than others, it is that of the Quakers. In Maryland, the Episcopalians are most numerous, though there are other sects. In Virginia, there are many sects; you all know what their religious sentiments are. So in all the Southern States they differ; as also in New Hampshire. I hope, therefore, that gentlemen will see there is no cause of fear that any one religion shall be exclusively established.

Mr. CALDWELL thought that some danger might arise. He imagined it might be objected to in a political as well as in a religious view. In the first place, he said, there was an invitation for Jews and pagans of every kind to come among us. At some future period, said he, this might endanger the character of the United States. Moreover, even those who do not regard religion, acknowledge that the Christian religion is best calculated, of all religions, to make good members of society, on account of its morality. I think, then, added he, that, in a political view, those gentlemen who formed this Constitution should not have given this invitation to Jews and heathens. All those who have any religion are against the emigration of those people from the eastern hemisphere.

Mr. SPENCER was an advocate for securing every unalienable right, and that of worshipping God according to the dictates of conscience in particular. He therefore thought that no one particular religion should be established. Religious tests, said he, have been the foundation of persecutions in all countries. Persons who are conscientious will not take the oath required by religious tests, and will therefore be excluded from offices, though equally capable of discharging them as any member of the society. It is feared, continued he, that persons of bad principles, deists, atheists, &c., may come into this country; and there is nothing to restrain them from being eligible to offices. He asked if it was reasonable to suppose that the people would choose men without regarding their characters. Mr. Spencer then continued thus: Gentlemen urge that the want of a test admits the most vicious characters to offices. I desire to know what test could bind them. If they were of such principles, it would not keep them from enjoying those offices. On the other hand, it would exclude from offices conscientious and truly religious people, though equally capable as others. Conscientious persons would not take such an oath, and would be therefore excluded. This would be a great cause of objection to a religious test. But in this case, as there is not a religious test required, it leaves religion on the solid foundation of its own inherent validity, without any connection with temporal authority; and no kind of oppression can take place. I confess it strikes me so. I am sorry to differ from the worthy gentleman. I cannot object to this part of the Constitution. I wish every other part was as good and proper.

Gov. JOHNSTON approved of the worthy member's candor. He admitted a possibility of Jews, pagans, &c., emigrating to the United States; yet, he said, they could not be in proportion to the emigration of Christians who should come from other countries; that, in all probability, the children even of such people would be Christians; and that this, with the rapid population of the United States, their zeal for religion, and love of liberty, would, he trusted, add to the progress of the Christian religion among us.

Gov. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, had the most enlightened statesman whom America has yet seen, foretold, but a year ago, the crisis which has now called us together, he would have been confronted by the universal testimony of history; for never was it yet known, that, in so short a space, by the peaceable working of events, without a war, or even the menace of the smallest force, a nation has been brought to agitate a question, an error in the issue of which may blast their happiness. It is, therefore, to be feared, lest to this trying exigency the best wisdom should be unequal; and here (if it were allowable to lament any ordinance of nature) might it be deplored that, in proportion to the magnitude of a subject, is the mind intemperate. Religion, the dearest of all interests, has too often sought proselytes by fire rather than by reason; and politics, the next in rank, is too often nourished by passion, at the expense of the understanding. Pardon me, however, for expecting one exception to the tendency of mankind from the dignity of this Convention — a mutual toleration, and a persuasion that no man has a right to impose his opinions on others. . . .

Mr. MADISON. . . .

I confess to you, sir, were uniformity of religion to be introduced by this system, it would, in my opinion, be ineligible; but I have no reason to conclude that uniformity of government will produce that of religion. This subject is, for the honor of America, perfectly free and unshackled. The government has no jurisdiction over it: the least reflection will convince us there is no danger to be feared on this ground.

Elliot, vol. 3, p. 93.

1.2.2.5.cJune 10, 1788

Gov. RANDOLPH. . . .

Freedom of religion is said to be in danger. I will candidly say, I once thought that it was, and felt great repugnance to the Constitution for that reason. I am willing to acknowledge my apprehensions removed; and I will inform you by what process of reasoning I did remove them. The Constitution provides that “the senators and representatives before mentioned, and the members of the several state legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several states, shall be bound, by oath or affirmation, to support this Constitution; but no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States." It has been said that, if the exclusion of the religious test were an exception from the general power of Congress, the power over religion would remain. I inform those who are of this opinion, that no power is given expressly to Congress over religion. The senators and representatives, members of the state legislatures, and executive and judicial officers, are bound, by oath or affirmation, to support this Constitution. This only binds them to support it in the exercise of the powers constitutionally given it. The exclusion of religious tests is an exception from this general provision, with respect to oaths or affirmations. Although officers, &c., are to swear that they will support this Constitution, yet they are not bound to support one mode of worship, or to adhere to one particular sect. It puts all sects on the same footing. A man of abilities and character, of any sect whatever, may be admitted to any office or public trust under the United States. I am a friend to a variety of sects, because they keep one another in order. How many different sects are we composed of throughout the United States! How many different sects will be in Congress! We cannot enumerate the sects that may be in Congress! And there are now so many in the United States, that they will prevent the establishment of any one sect, in prejudice to the rest, and will forever oppose all attempts to infringe religious liberty. If such an attempt be made, will not the alarm be sounded throughout America? If Congress should be as wicked as we are foretold they will be, they would not run the risk of exciting the resentment of all, or most, of the religious sects in America.

Elliot, vol. 3, pp. 204–05.

1.2.2.5.dJune 12, 1788

Mr. HENRY. . . .

. . . His amendments go to that despised thing, called a bill of rights, and all the rights which are dear to human nature — trial by jury, the liberty of religion and the press, &c. Do not gentlemen see that, if we adopt, under the idea of following Mr. Jefferson's opinion, we amuse ourselves with the shadow, while the substance is given away?. . .

. . . Even the advocates for the plan do not all concur in the certainty of its security. Wherefore is religious liberty not secured? One honorable gentleman, who favors adoption, said that he had his fears on the subject. If I can well recollect, he informed us that he was perfectly satisfied, by the powers of reasoning, (with which he is so happily endowed,) that those fears were not well grounded. There is many a religious man who knows nothing of argumentative reasoning; there are many of our most worthy citizens who cannot go through all the labyrinths of syllogistic, argumentative deductions, when they think that the rights of conscience are invaded. This sacred right ought not to depend on constructive, logical reasoning.

When we see men of such talents and learning compelled to use their utmost abilities to convince themselves that there is no danger, is it not sufficient to make us tremble? Is it not sufficient to fill the minds of the ignorant part of men with fear? If gentlemen believe that the apprehensions of men will be quieted, they are mistaken, since our best-informed men are in doubt with respect to the security of our rights. Those who are not so well informed will spurn at the government. When our common citizens, who are not possessed with such extensive knowledge and abilities, are called upon to change their bill of rights (which, in plain, unequivocal terms, secures their most valuable rights and privileges) for construction and implication, will they implicitly acquiesce? Our declaration of rights tells us that “all men are by nature free and independent,” &c. [Here Mr. Henry read the declaration of rights.] Will they exchange these rights for logical reasons? If you had a thousand acres of land dependent on this, would you be satisfied with logical construction? Would you depend upon a title of so disputable a nature? The present opinions of individuals will be buried in entire oblivion when those rights will be thought of. That sacred and lovely thing, religion, ought not to rest on the ingenuity of logical deduction. Holy religion, sir, will be prostituted to the lowest purposes of human policy. What has been more productive of mischief among mankind than religious disputes? Then here, sir, is a foundation for such disputes, when it requires learning and logical deduction to perceive that religious liberty is secure.

The honorable member has introduced the subject of religion. Religion is not guarded; there is no bill of rights declaring that religion should be secure. Is a bill of rights a security for religion? Would the bill of rights, in this state, exempt the people from paying for the support of one particular sect, if such sect were exclusively established by law? If there were a majority of one sect, a bill of rights would be a poor protection for liberty. Happily for the states, they enjoy the upmost [sic] freedom of religion. This freedom arises from that multiplicity of sects which pervades America, and which is the best and only security for religious liberty in any society; for where there is such a variety of sects, there cannot be a majority of any one sect to oppress and persecute the rest. Fortunately for this commonwealth, a majority of the people are decidedly against any exclusive establishment. I believe it to be so in the other states. There is not a shadow of right in the general government to intermeddle with religion. Its least interference with it would be a most flagrant usurpation. I can appeal to my uniform conduct on this subject, that I have warmly supported religious freedom. It is better that this security should be depended upon from the general legislature, than from one particular state. A particular state might concur in one religious project. But the United States abound in such a variety of sects, that it is a strong security against religious persecution; and it is sufficient to authorize a conclusion, that no one sect will ever be able to outnumber or depress the rest.

Elliot, vol. 3, pp. 314, 317–18, 330.

1.2.2.5.eJune 15, 1788

Gov. RANDOLPH. . . .

He has added religion to the objects endangered, in his conception. Is there any power given over it? Let it be pointed out. Will he not be contented with the answer that has been frequently given to that objection? The variety of sects which abounds in the United States is the best security for the freedom of religion. No part of the Constitution, even if strictly construed, will justify a conclusion that the general government can take away or impair the freedom of religion.

The gentleman asks, with triumph, Shall we be deprived of these valuable rights? Had there been an exception, or an express infringement of those rights, he might object; but I conceive every fair reasoner will agree that there is no just cause to suspect that they will be violated.

But he objects that the common law is not established by the Constitution. The wisdom of the Convention is displayed by its omission, because the common law ought not to be immutably fixed. Is it established in our own Constitution, or the bill of rights, which has been resounded through the house? It is established only by an act of the legislature, and can therefore be changed as circumstances may require it. Let the honorable gentleman consider what would be the destructive consequences of its establishment in the Constitution. Even in England, where the firmest opposition has been made to encroachments upon it, it has been frequently changed. What would have been our dilemma if it had been established? Virginia has declared that children shall have equal portions of the real estate of their intestate parents, and it is consistent with the principles of a republican government.

1.2.4.1An American Citizen, No. 1, September 26, 1787

It is impossible for an honest and feeling mind, of any nation or country whatever, to be insensible to the present circumstances of America. Were I an East Indian, or a Turk, I should consider this singular situation of a part of my fellow creatures, as most curious and interesting. Intimately connected with the country, as a citizen of the union, I confess it entirely engrosses my mind and feelings.

To take a proper view of the ground on which we stand, it may be necessary to recollect the manner in which the United States were originally settled and established. — Want of charity in the religious systems of Europe and of justice in their political governments were the principal moving causes, which drove the emigrants of various countries to the American continent. The Congregationalists, Quakers, Presbyterians, and other British dissenters, the Catholics of England and Ireland, the Hugonots of France, the German Lutherans, Calvinists, and Moravians, with several other societies, established themselves in the different colonies, thereby laying the ground of that catholicism in ecclesiastical affairs, which has been observable since the late revolution: Religious liberty naturally promotes corresponding dispositions in matters of government. The Constitution of England, as it stood on paper, was one of the freest at that time existing in the world, and the American colonies considered themselves as entitled to the fullest enjoyment of it. . . .

In America our President will not only be without these influencing advantages, but they will be in the possession of the people at large, to strengthen their hands in the event of a contest with him. All religious funds, honors and powers, are in the gift of numberless, unconnected, disunited, and contending corporations, wherein the principle of perfect equality universally prevails. In short, danger from ecclesiastical tyranny, that long standing and still remaining curse of the people — that sacrilegious engine of royal power in some countries, can be feared by no man in the United States. . . .

After congratulating their brethren on the great increase of their churches the year past — they proceed, "we also congratulate you on the kind interposition of Divine Providence visible in that happy unanimity which obtained among the members of the late Foederal Convention, to agree upon, and report to the States in this union, a form of Foederal Government, which promises, on its adoption, to rescue our dear country from that national dishonor, injustice, anarchy, confusion and bloodshed, which have already resulted from the weakness and inefficiency of the present form, and which we have the greatest reason to fear is but the beginning of sorrows, unless the people lay hold on this favourable opportunity offered to establish an EFFICIENT government; which, we hope may, under God, secure our invaluable rights, both civil and religious, and which it will be in the power of the great body of the people, if hereafter found necessary, to controul and amend."

No religious test is ever to be required of any officer or servant of the United States. The people may employ any wise and good citizen in the execution of the various duties of the government. In Italy, Spain and Portugal, no protestant can hold a public trust. In England, every presbyterian, and other person not of their established church, is incapable of holding an office. No such impious deprivation of the rights of men can take place under the new foederal constitution. The convention has the honor of proposing the first public act, by which any nation has ever divested itself of a power, every exercise of which is a trespass on the Majesty of Heaven.

The new plan, it is true, does propose to secure the people of the benefit of personal liberty by the habeas corpus; and trial by jury for all crimes, except in case of impeachment: but there is no declaration, that all men have a natural and unalienable right to worship Almighty God, according to the dictates of their own consciences and understanding; and that no man ought, or of right can be compelled to attend any religious worship, or erect or support any place of worship, or maintain any ministry, contrary to, or against his own free will and consent; and that no authority can or ought to be vested in, or assumed by any power whatever, that shall in any case interfere with, or in any manner controul, the right of conscience in the free exercise of religious worship:. . . .

1.2.4.6Timoleon, November 1, 1787

After some judicious reflections on this subject, which tended to shew the necessity of the most plain and unequivocal language in the all important business of constituting government, which necessarily conveying great powers, is always liable (from the natural tendency of power to corrupt the human heart and deprave the head) to great abuse; by perverse and subtle arguments calculated to extend dominion over all things and all men. One of the club supposed the following case: — A gentleman, in the line of his profession is appointed a judge of the supreme court under the new Constitution, and the rulers, finding that the rights of conscience and the freedom of the press were exercised in such a manner, by preaching and printing as to be troublesome to the new government — which event would probably happen, if the rulers finding themselves possessed of great power, should so use it as to oppress and injure the community. — In this state of things the judge is called upon, in the line of his profession, to give his opinion — whether the new Constitution admitted of a legislative act to suppress the rights of conscience, and violate the liberty of the press? The answer of the learned judge is conceived in didactic mode, and expressed in learned phrase; thus, — In the 8th section of the first article of the new Constitution, the Congress have power given to lay and collect taxes for the general welfare of the United States. By this power, the right of taxing is co-extensive with the general welfare, and the general welfare is as unlimitted as actions and things are that may disturb or benefit that general welfare. A right being given to tax for the general welfare, necessarily includes the right of judging what is for the general welfare, and a right of judging what is for the general welfare, as necessarily includes a power of protecting, defending, and promoting it by all such laws and means as are fitted to that end; for, qui dat finem dat media ad finem necessaria, who gives the end gives the means necessary to obtain the end. The Constitution must be so construed as not to involve an absurdity, which would clearly follow from allowing the end and denying the means. A right of taxing for the general welfare being the highest and most important mode of providing for it, cannot be supposed to exclude inferior modes of effecting the same purpose, because the rule of law is, that, omne majus continct in se minus.

From hence it clearly results, that, if preachers and printers are troublesome to the new government; and that in the opinion of its rulers, it shall be for the general welfare to restrain or suppress both the one and the other, it may be done consistently with the new Constitution. And that this was the opinion of the community when they consented to it, is evident from this consideration; that although the all comprehending power of the new legislature is fixed, by its acts being made the supreme law of the land, any thing in the Constitutions or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding: Yet no express declaration in favor of the rights of conscience or liberty of the press is to be found in the new Constitution, as we see was carefully done in the Constitutions of the states composing this union — Shewing clearly, that what was then thought necessary to be specially reserved from the pleasure of power, is now designed to be yielded to its will.

A grave old gentleman of the club, who had sat with his head reclined on his hand, listening in pensive mood to the argument of the judge, said, “I verily believe, that neither the logic or the law of that opinion will be hereafter doubted by the professors of power, who, through the history of human nature, have been for enlarging the sphere of their authority. And thus the dearest rights of men and the best security of civil liberty may be sacrificed by the sophism of a lawyer, who, Carneades like, can to day shew that to be necessary, before the people, which tomorrow he can likewise shew to be unnecessary and useless — For which reason the sagacious Cato advised, that such a man should immediately be sent from the city, as a person dangerous to the morals of the people and to society." The old gentleman continued, "I now plainly see the necessity of express declarations and reservations in favor of the great, unalienable rights of mankind, to prevent the oppressive and wicked extention of power to the ruin of human liberty. For the opinion above stated, absolutely refutes the sophistry of "that being retained which is not given," where the words conveying power admit of the most extensive construction that language can reach to, or the mind conceive, as is the case in this new Constitution. By which we have already seen how logically it may be proved, that both religion and the press can be made to bend before the views of power. . . ."

1.2.4.7An Old Whig, No. 5, November 1, 1787

MR. PRINTER, In order that people may be sufficiently impressed, with the necessity of establishing a BILL OF RIGHTS in the forming of a new constitution, it is very proper to take a short view of some of those liberties, which it is of the greatest importance for Freemen to retain to themselves, when they surrender up a part of their natural rights for the good of society.

The first of these, which it is of the utmost importance for the people to retain to themselves, which indeed they have not even the right to surrender, and which at the same time it is of no kind of advantages to government to strip them of, is the LIBERTY OF CONSCIENCE. I know that a ready answer is at hand, to any objections upon this head. We shall be told that in this enlightened age, the rights of conscience are perfectly secure: There is no necessity of guarding them; for no man has the remotest thoughts of invading them. If this be the case, I beg leave to reply that now is the very time to secure them. — Wise and prudent men always take care to guard against danger beforehand, and to make themselves safe whilst it is yet in their power to do it without inconvenience or risk. — who shall answer for the ebbings and flowings of opinion, or be able to say what will be the fashionable frenzy of the next generation? It would have been treated as a very ridiculous supposition, a year ago, that the charge of witchcraft would cost a person her life in the city of Philadelphia; yet the fate of the unhappy old woman called Corbmaker, who was beaten — repeatedly wounded with knives — mangled and at last killed in our streets, in obedience to the commandment which requires "that we shall not suffer a witch to live," without a possibility of punishing or even of detecting the authors of this inhuman folly, should be an example to warn us how little we ought to trust to the unrestrained discretion of human nature.

Uniformity of opinion in science, morality, politics or religion, is undoubtedly a very great happiness to mankind; and there have not been wanting zealous champions in every age, to promote the means of securing so invaluable a blessing. If in America we have not lighted up fires to consume Heretics in religion, if we have not persecuted unbelievers to promote the unity of the faith, in matters which pertain to our final salvation in a future world, I think we have all of us been witness to something very like the same spirit, in matters which are supposed to regard our political salvation in this world. In Boston it seems at this very moment, that no man is permitted to publish a doubt of the infalibility [sic] of the late convention, without giving up his name to the people, that he may be delivered over to speedy destruction; and it is but a short time since the case was little better in this city. Now this is a portion of the very same spirit, which has so often kindled the fires of the inquisition: and the same Zealot who would hunt a man down for a difference of opinion upon a political question which is the subject of public enquiry, if he should happen to be fired with zeal for a particular species of religion, would be equally intolerant. The fact is, that human nature is still the same that ever it was: the fashion indeed changes; but the seeds of superstition, bigotry and enthusiasm, are too deeply implanted in our minds, ever to be eradicated; and fifty years hence, the French may renew the persecution of the Huguenots, whilst the Spaniards in their turn may become indifferent to their forms of religion. They are idiots who trust their future security to the whim of the present hour. One extreme is always apt to produce the contrary, and these countries, which are now the most lax in their religious notions, may in a few years become the most rigid, just as the people of this country from not being able to bear any continental government at all, are now flying into the opposite extreme of surrendering up all the powers of the different states, to one continental government.

The more I reflect upon the history of mankind, the more I am disposed to think that it is our duty to secure the essential rights of the people, by every precaution; for not an avenue has been left unguarded, through which oppression could possibly enter in any government; without some enemy of the public peace and happiness improving the opportunity to break in upon the liberties of the people; and none have been more frequently successful in the attempt, than those who have covered their ambitious designs under the garb of a fiery zeal for religious orthodoxy. What has happened in other countries and in other ages, may very possibly happen again in our own country, and for aught we know, before the present generation quits the stage of life. We ought therefore in a bill of rights to secure, in the first place, by the most express stipulations, the sacred rights of conscience. Has this been done in the constitution, which is now proposed for the consideration of the people of the country? — Not a word on this subject has been mentioned in any part of it; but we are left in this important article, as well as many others, entirely to the mercy of our future rulers.

But supposing our future rulers to be wicked enough to attempt to invade the rights of conscience; I may be asked how will they be able to effect so horrible a design? I will tell you my friends — The unlimited power of taxation will give them the command of all the treasures of the continent; a standing army will be wholly at their devotion, and the authority which is given them over the militia, by virtue of which they may, if they please, change all the officers of the militia on the continent in one day, and put in new officers whom they can better trust; by which they can subject all the militia to strict military laws, and punish the disobedient with death, or otherwise, as they shall think right; by which they can march the militia back and forward from one end of the continent to the other, at their discretion; these powers, if they should ever fall into bad hands, may be abused to the worst of purposes. Let us instance one thing arising from this right of organizing and governing the militia. Suppose a man alledges that he is conscientiously scrupulous of bearing Arms. — By the bill of rights of Pennsylvania he is bound only to pay an equivalent for this personal service. — What is there in the new proposed constitution to prevent his being dragged like a Prussian soldier to the camp and there compelled to bear arms? — This will depend wholly upon the wisdom and discretion of the future legislature of the continent in the framing their militia laws; and I have lived long enough to hear the practice of commuting personal service for a paltry fine in time of war and foreign invasion most severely reprobated by some persons who ought to have judged more rightly on the subject — Such flagrant oppressions as these I dare say will not happen at the beginning of the new government; probably not till the powers of government shall be firmly fixed; but it is a duty we owe to ourselves and our posterity if possible to prevent their ever happening. I hope and trust that there are few persons at present hardy enough to entertain thoughts of creating any religious establishment for this country; although I have lately read a piece in the newspaper, which speaks of religious as well as civil and military offices, as being hereafter to be disposed of by the new government; but if a majority of the continental legislature should at any time think fit to establish a form of religion, for the good people of this continent, with all the pains and penalties which in other countries are annexed to the establishment of a national church, what is there in the proposed constitution to hinder their doing so? Nothing; for we have no bill of rights, and every thing therefore is in their power and at their discretion. And at whose discretion? We know not any more than we know the fates of those generations which are yet unborn.

It is needless to repeat the necessity of securing other personal rights in the forming a new government. The same argument which proves the necessity of securing one of them shews also the necessity of securing others. Without a bill of rights we are totally insecure in all of them; and no man can promise himself with any degree of certainty that his posterity will enjoy the inestimable blessings of liberty of conscience, of freedom of speech and of writing and publishing their thoughts on public matters, of trial by jury, of holding themselves, their houses and papers free from seizure and search upon general suspicion or general warrants; or in short, that they will be secured in the enjoyment of life, liberty and property without depending on the will and pleasure of their rulers.

1.2.4.8A Landholder, No. 7, December 17, 1787

But while I assert the right of religious liberty; I would not deny that the civil power has a right, in some cases, to interfere in matters of religion. It has a right to prohibit and punish gross immoralities and impieties; because the open practice of these is of evil example and public detriment. For this reason, I heartily approve of our laws against drunkenness, profane swearing, blasphemy, and professed atheism. But in this state, we have never thought it expedient to adopt a test-law; and yet I sincerely believe we have as great a proportion of religion and morality, as they have in England, where every person who holds a public office, must be either a saint by law, or a hypocrite by practice. A test-law is the parent of hypocrisy, and the offspring of error and the spirit of persecution. Legislatures have no right to set up an inquisition, and examine into the private opinions of men. Test-laws are useless and ineffectual, unjust and tyrannical; therefore the Convention have done wisely in excluding this engine of persecution, and providing that no religious test shall ever be required.

1.2.5LETTERS AND DIARIES

1.2.5.1James Madison to Thomas Jefferson, October 4, 1787

. . . 3. Religion. The inefficacy of this restraint on individuals is well known. The conduct of every popular Assembly, acting on oath, the strongest of religious ties, shews that individuals join without remorse in acts agst. which their consciences would revolt, if proposed to them separately in their closets. When Indeed [sic] Religion is kindled into enthusiasm, its force like that of other passions is increased by the sympathy of a multitude. But enthusiasm is only a temporary state of Religion, and whilst it lasts will hardly be seen with pleasure at the helm. Even in its coolest state, it has been much oftener a motive to oppression than a restraint from it. If then there must be different interests and parties in Society; and a majority when united by a common interest or passion can not be restrained from oppressing the minority, what remedy can be found in a republican Government, where the majority must ultimately decide, but that of giving such an extent to its sphere, that no common interest or passion will be likely to unite a majority of the whole number in an unjust pursuit. In a large Society, the people are broken into so many interests and parties, that a common sentiment is less likely to be felt, and the requisite concert less likely to be formed, by a majority of the whole. The same security seems requisite for the civil as for the religious rights of individuals. If the same sect form a majority and have the power, other sects will be sure to be depressed. Divide et impera, the reprobated axiom of tyranny, is under certain qualifications, the only policy, by which a republic can be administered on just principles. It must be observed however that this doctrine can only hold within a sphere of a mean extent. As in too small a sphere oppressive combinations may be too easily formed agst. the weaker party; so in too extensive a one, a defensive concert may be rendered too difficult against the oppression of those entrusted with the administration. The great desideratum in Government is, so to modify the sovereignty as that it may be sufficiently neutral between different parts of the Society to controul one part from invading the rights of another, and at the same time sufficiently controulled itself, from setting up an interest adverse to that of the entire Society. In absolute monarchies, the Prince may be tolerably neutral towards different classes of his subjects; but may sacrifice the happiness of all to his personal ambition or avarice. In small republics, the sovereign will is controuled from such a sacrifice of the entire Society, but is not sufficiently neutral towards the parts composing it. In the extended Republic of the United States, The General Government would hold a pretty even balance between the parties of particular States, and be at the same time sufficiently restrained by its dependence on the community, from betraying its general interests.

Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 13, pp. 448–49.

1.2.5.2Thomas Jefferson to James Madison, December 20, 1787

. . . There are other good things of less moment. I will now add what I do not like. First the omission of a bill of rights providing clearly and without the aid of sophisms for freedom of religion, freedom of the press, protection against standing armies, restriction against monopolies, the eternal and unremitting force of the habeas corpus laws, and trials by jury in all matters of fact triable by the laws of the land and not by the law of Nations.

Boyd, vol. 12, p. 440.

1.2.5.3Thomas Jefferson to William Stephens Smith, February 2, 1788

. . . But I own it astonishes me to find such a change wrought in the opinions of our countrymen since I left them, as that threefourths of them should be contented to live under a system which leaves to their governors the power of taking from them the trial by jury in civil cases, freedom of religion, freedom of the press, freedom of commerce, the habeas corpus laws, and of yoking them with a standing army. This is a degeneracy in the principles of liberty to which I had given four centuries instead of four years.

Boyd, vol. 12, p. 558.

1.2.5.4Thomas Jefferson to Alexander Donald, February 7, 1788

. . . By a declaration of rights I mean one which shall stipulate freedom of religion, freedom of the press, freedom of commerce against monopolies, trial by juries in all cases, no suspensions of the habeas corpus, no standing armies. These are fetters against doing evil which no honest government should decline.

Boyd, vol. 12, p. 571.

1.2.5.5Tench Coxe to George Thatcher, March 12, 1789

If due attention be paid to removing the jealousies & fears of the honest part of the Opposition we may gain strength & respectability without impairing one essential power of the constitution. Some declaration concerning the liberty of the press, of conscience &ca. ought perhaps to be frankly made parts of the constitution.

Veit, pp. 217–18.

1.2.5.6Thomas Jefferson to Francis Hopkinson, March 13, 1789

. . . What I disapproved from the first moment also was the want of a bill of rights to guard liberty against the legislative as well as executive branches of the government, that is to say to secure freedom in religion, freedom of the press, freedom from monopolies, freedom from unlawful imprisonment, freedom from a permanent military, and a trial by jury in all cases determinable by the laws of the land.

Boyd, vol. 14, p. 650.

1.2.5.7Jeremy Belknap to Paine Wingate, May 29, 1789

. . . You will see in the speech wh. our new Lieut. Governor [Samuel Adams] made at his investiture that he has not thrown off the old idea of "independence" as an attribute of each individual State in the "confederated Republic" — & you will know in what light to regard his "devout & fervent wish" that the "people may enjoy well grounded confidence that their personal & domestic rights are secure." This is the same Language or nearly the same which he used in the Convention when he moved for an addition to the proposed Amendments — by inserting a clause to provide for the Liberty of the press — the right to keep arms — Protection from seizure of person & property & the Rights of Conscience. By which motion he gave an alarm to both sides of the house & had nearly overset the whole business which the Friends of the Constitution had been labouring for several Weeks to obtain. . . .

1.2.5.8George Clymer to Richard Peters, June 8, 1789

Madison this morning is to make an essay towards amendments — but whether he means merely a tub to the whale, or declarations about the press liberty of conscience &c. or will suffer himself to be so far frightened with the antifederalism of his own state as to attempt to lop off essentials I do not know — I hope however we shall be strong enough to postpone. . . .

Afternoon — Madison's has proved a tub on a number of Ad. but Gerry is not content with them alone, and proposes to treat us with all the amendments of all the antifederalists in America.

1.2.5.9William R. Davie to James Madison, June 10, 1789

You are well acquainted with the political situation of this State [North Carolina], . . . that wild scepticism which has prevailed in it since the publication of the Constitution. It has been the uniform cant of the enemies of the Government, that Congress would exert all their influence to prevent the calling of a Convention, and would never propose an amendment themselves, or consent to an alteration that would in any manner diminish their powers. The people whose fears had been already alarmed, have received this opinion as fact, and become confirmed in their opposition; your notification however of the 4th. of May has dispersed almost universal pleasure, we hold it up as a refutation of the gloomy profecies of the leaders of the opposition, and the honest part of our antifederalists have publickly expressed great satisfaction on this event. . . .

That farago of Amendments borrowed from Virginia is by no means to be considered as the sense of this Country; they were proposed amidst the violence and confusion of party heat, at a critical moment in our convention, and adopted by the opposition without one moment's consideration. I have collected with some attention the objections of the honest and serious — they are but few & perhaps necessary — They require some explanations rather than alteration of power of Congress over elections — an abridgment of the Jurisdiction of the federal Court in a few instances, and some fixed regulations respecting appeals — They also insist on the trial by jury being expressly secured to them in all cases — and a constitutional guarantee for the free exercise of their religious rights and priveledges. . . .

Veit, pp. 245–46.

1.2.5.10Fisher Ames to Thomas Dwight, June 11, 1789

Mr. Madison has introduced his long expected Amendments. They are the fruit of much labour and research. He has hunted up all the grievances and complaints of newspapers — all the articles of Conventions — and the small talk of their debates. It contains a Bill of Rights — the right of enjoying property — of changing the govt. at pleasure — freedom of the press — of conscience — of juries — exemption from general Warrants gradual increase of representatives till the whole number at the rate of one to every 30,000 shall amount to and allowing two to every State, at least this is the substance. There is too much of it — O. I had forgot the right of the people to bear Arms.

Risum teneatis amici —

Upon the whole, it may do good towards quieting men who attend to sounds only, and may get the mover some popularity — which he wishes.

1.2.5.11Fisher Ames to George R. Minot, June 12, 1789

. . . The civil departments will employ us next, and the judiciary the Senate. They will finish their stint, as the boys say, before the House has done. Their number is less, and they have matured the business in committee. Yet Mr. Madison has inserted, in his amendments, the increase of representatives, each State having two at least. The rights of conscience, of bearing arms, of changing the government, are declared to be inherent in the people. Freedom of the press, too. There is a prodigious great dose for a medicine. But it will stimulate the stomach as little as hasty-pudding. It is rather food than physic. An immense mass of sweet and other herbs and roots for a diet drink.

1.2.5.12Tench Coxe to James Madison, June 18, 1789

I observe you have brought forward the amendments you proposed to the federal Constitution. I have given them a very careful perusal, and have attended particularly to their reception by the public. The most decided friends of the constitution admit (generally) that they will meliorate the government by removing some points of litigation and jealousy, and by heightening and strengthening the barriers between necessary power and indispensible liberty. . . . Those who are honest are well pleased at the footing on which the press, liberty of conscience, original right & power, trial by jury &ca. are rested. . . .

1.2.5.13Henry Gibbs to Roger Sherman, July 16, 1789

. . . All Ambiguity of Expression certainly ought to be remov'd; Liberty of Conscience in religious matters, right of trial by Jury, Liberty of the Press &c. may perhaps be more explicitly secur'd to the Subject & a general reservation made to the States respectively of all the powers not expressly delegated to the general Government. . . .

1.2.5.14Pierce Butler to James Iredell, August 11, 1789

. . . If you wait for substantial amendments, you will wait longer than I wish you to do, speaking interestedly. A few milk-and-water amendments have been proposed by Mr. M[adison]., such as liberty of conscience, a free press, and one or two general things already well secured. I suppose it was done to keep his promise with his constituents, to move for alterations; but, if I am not greatly mistaken, he is not hearty in the cause of amendments.

1.2.5.15Richard Henry Lee to Samuel Adams, October 27, 1789

. . . Because Independent States are in the same relation to each other as Individuals are with respect to uncreated government. So that if reservations were necessary in one case, they are equally necessary in the other. But the futility of this distinction appears from the conduct of the Convention itself, for they have made several reservations — every one of which proves the Rule in Conventional ideas to be, that what was not reserved was given — for example, they have reserved from their Legislature a power to prevent the importation of Slaves for 20 years, and also from Creating Titles. But they have no reservation in favor of the Press, Rights of Conscience, Trial by Jury in Civil Cases or Common Law securities.

As if these were of less importance to the happiness of Mankind than the making of Lords, or the importations of Slaves!. . .

The Prophanation of this Day doth generally arise from,

1. Covetousness:
Or,

2. Licentiousness.

First, From a covetous Desire of Gain, as per Stat. 1 Jac. 1. cap. 11. Shoemaker putting Boots or Shoes to Sale, forfeits 3 s. 4 d. and the Goods: Then by the Statute 3 Car. 1. cap. 1. Drovers, or their Servants, coming to their Inns on that Day, forfeit 20 s. for every Offence.

The Prosecution must be within ten Days after the Offence.

The Proof by one Witness upon Oath before one Justice; and if the Offender is not able to pay the Forfeiture, he must be put in the Stocks for two Hours.

Prosecution must be within a Month, &c.

Proof by one Witness before one Justice, or Confession of the Party.

Forfeiture is for the Poor of the Parish where the Offence is committed, and to be levied by Distress on a Warrant, &c. and in Default thereof, the Offender is to be put in the Stocks for three Hours.

Any Process served on this Day, except for Breach of the Peace, Felony, or Treason, is void; and the Person serving the same, must answer Damages as if he had done it without a Warrant. 29 Car. 2. cap. 7.

But this Statute doth not extend to dressing of Meat in Inns, Cooks Shops, or Victualling Houses.

All the Laws for frequenting of Divine Service on this Day, are still in Force, notwithstanding the Statute of 1 W. & M. cap. 18. unless Persons go to some Congregations tolerated by that Act.

Nelson Justice of Peace, pp. 609–10.

1.3.1.2Bacon, 1740

(A) OF HERESY: AND HEREIN,

1. WHAT IT IS.

HERESY (a) among Protestants is said to be a false Opinion repugnant to some Point of Doctrine clearly revealed in Scripture, and either absolutely essential to the Christian Faith, or at least of most high Importance.[1]

It seems (b) difficult precisely to determine what Errors shall amount to Heresy, and what not; but the Statute 1 Eliz. cap. 1. which erected the High Commission Court, having restrained it to such as are either determined by Scripture, or by one of the four first General Councils, or by some other Council, by express Words of Scripture, or by Parliament, with the Assent of the Convocation; these Rules are at present generally thought the best Directions concerning this Matter.[2]

2 BY WHOM IT IS COGNIZABLE.

According to the Common and Imperial Law, and generally by other Laws in Kingdoms and States where the Canon Law obtained, the Ecclesiastical Judge was the Judge of Heresies, and hereby they obtained a large

Jurisdiction touching them.[3]

Hence it is, that by the Common Law with us, the Convocation of the Clergy, or Provincial Synod, might and frequently did proceed to the Sentencing of Hereticks, and when convicted, left them to the Secular Power, whereupon the Writ of Haeretico comburendo might issue.[4]

Also it is agreed, that every Bishop may convict Persons of Heresy within his own Diocese, and proceed by Church Censures against those who shall be convicted; but it is said, that no Spiritual Judge, who is not a Bishop, hath this Power; and it has been (c) questioned, whether a Conviction before the Ordinary were a sufficient Foundation whereon to ground the Writ de Haeretico comburendo, as it is agreed that a Conviction before the Convocation was.[5]

But it seems agreed, that regularly the Temporal Courts have no Conuzance of Heresy, either to determine what it is, or to punish the Heretick as such, but only as a Disturber of the Publick Peace; and that therefore, if a Man be proceeded against as an Heretick in the Spiritual Court, pro salute animae, and think himself aggrieved, his proper Remedy is to bring his Appeal to a higher Ecclesiastical Court, and not to move for a Prohibition from a Temporal one.[6]

Yet a Temporal Judge may incidentally take Knowledge, whether a Tenet be heretical or not; as where one was committed by Force of 2 H. 4. cap. 5. for saying, that he was not bound by the Law of God to pay Tithes to the Curate; another for saying, that tho' he was excommunicate before Men, yet he was not so before God; the Temporal Courts on an Habeas Corpus in the first Case, and an Action of false Imprisonment in the other, adjudged neither of the Points to be Heresy within that Statute, for the King's Courts will examine all Things which are ordained by Statute.[7]

Also in a Quare Impedit, if the Bishop plead that refused the Clerk for Heresy, it seems that he must set forth the particular Point, that it may appear to be heretical to the Court wherein the Action is brought, which having Conuzance of the original Cause, must by Consequence have a Power to all incidental Matters necessary for the Determination of it, and without knowing the very Point alledged against the Clerk, will not be able to give Directions concerning it to the Jury, who (if the Party be dead) are to try the Truth of the Allegation.[8]

3. HOW PUNISHED.

By the Common Law, one convicted of Heresy, and refusing to abjure it, or falling into it again after he had abjured it, might be burnt by Force of the Writ de haeritico comburendo, which issued out of Chancery upon a Certificate of such Conviction; but he forfeited neither Lands nor Goods, because the Proceedings against him were only pro salute animae.[9]

But at this Day the said Writ de haeretico comburendo is abolished by 29 Car. 2. cap. 9. and all the old Statutes, that gave a Power to arrest or imprison Persons for Heresy, or introduced any Forfeiture on that Account, are repealed; yet by the Common Law, an obstinate Heretick being excommunicate is still liable to be imprisoned by Force of the Writ de exommunicato capiendo, till he make Satisfaction to the Church.[10]

Also by the 9 & 10 W. 3. cap. 32. it is enacted, 'That if any Person having been educated in, or having made Profession of the Christian Religion within this Realm, shall be convicted in any of the Courts of Westminster, or at the Assises, of denying any of the Persons in the Holy Trinity to be God, or Maintaining that there are more Gods than one, or of Denying the Truth of the Christian Religion, or the Divine Authority of the Holy Scriptures, he shall for the first Offence be adjudged uncapable of any Office, and for the second shall be disabled to sue any Action, or to be a Guardian, Executor or Administrator, or to take by any Legacy or Deed of Gift, or to bear any Office Civil or Military, or Benefice Ecclesiastical for ever, and shall also suffer Imprisonment for three Years, without Bail or Mainprize, from the Time of such Conviction.

(B) OF WITCHCRAFT, AND HOW PUNISHED.

Witchcraft, or Sortilegium, was by the ancient Laws of England of [(a)] Ecclesiastical Conuzance, and upon Conviction thereof without Abjuration, or Relapse after Abjuration, was punishable with Death by Writ de haeretico comburendo.[11]

Also by an Act of Parliament 1 Jac. 1. cap. 12. it was made Felony, without Benefit of Clergy, to Use any Invocation or Conjuration of any evil Spirit, or to consult or covenant with any evil Spirit, or to exercise any Witchcraft, Inchantment, Charm, or Sorcery, whereby any Person shall be killed, destroyed, consumed or lamed in his Body, &c.

But by the 9 Georg. 2. cap. 5. the abovementioned Statute is repealed; and it is thereby enacted, 'That no Prosecution, Suit, or Proceeding, shall be commenced or carried on against any Person or Persons for Witchcraft, Sorcery, Inchantment or Conjuration, or for charging another with any such Offence in any Court whatsoever in Great Britain.'

But for the more effectual preventing and punishing of any Pretences to such Arts or Powers as are before mentioned, whereby ignorant Persons are frequently deluded and defrauded, it is enacted by the said Statute, 9 Geor. [sic] 2. 'That if any Person shall pretend to Exercise or Use any Kind of Witchcraft, Sorcery, Inchantment or Conjuration, or undertake to tell Fortunes, or pretend from his or her Skill, or Knowledge, in any occult or crafty Science, to discover where or in what Manner any Goods or Chattels, supposed to have been stolen or lost, may be found; every Person so offending, being thereof lawfully convicted on Indictment or Information in that Part of Great Britain called England, or on an Indictment or Libel in that Part of Great Britain called Scotland, shall for every such Offence suffer Imprisonment by the Space of one whole Year, without Bail or Mainprize; and once in every Quarter of the said Year, in some Market-Town of the proper County, upon the Market-Day, there stand openly on the Pillory by the Space of one Hour, and also shall (if the Court, by which such Judgment shall be given, shall think fit) be obliged to give Sureties for his or her good Behaviour, in such Sum, and for such Time, as the said Court shall judge proper, according to the Circumstances of the Offence; and in such Case shall be further imprisoned until such Sureties be given.'

(C) OF OFFENCES AGAINST RELIGION AS PUNISHABLE BY THE COMMON LAW. THE COMMON LAW.

Although Offences against Religion are, strictly speaking, of Ecclesiastical Conusance, yet where a Person, in Maintenance of his Errors, sets up Conventicles, or raises Factions, which may tend to the Disturbance of the publick Peace, or where the Errors are of such a Nature as subvert all Religion or Morality, which are the Foundation of Government, they are punishable by the Temporal Judges with Fine and Imprisonment, and also such corporal infamous Punishment, as to the Court in Discretion shall seem meet, according to the Heinousness of the Crime, ne quid detrimenti res Publica capiat.[12]

Such as all Blasphemies against God, as denying his Being or Providence, and all contumelious Reproaches of Jesus Christ.[13]

Also all prophane Scoffing at the Holy Scriptures, or exposing any Part thereof to Contempt or Ridicule.[14]

Impostors in Religion, as falsely pretending to extraordinary Commissions from God, and terrifying or abusing the People with false Denunciations of Judgments, &c.[15]

All open Leudness grossly scandalous, such as was that of those Persons who exposed themselves naked to the People in a Balcony in Covent-Garden, with most abominable Circumstances.[16]

Seditious Words in Derogation of the Established Religion are (a) indictable, as tending to a Breach of the Peace; as these, your Religion is a new Religion, and Preaching is but Pratling, and Prayer once a Day is more edifying.[17]

(D) OF OFFENCES BY STATUTE AGAINST RELIGION:

And herein,

1. OF THE OFFENCE OF PROPHANING THE LORD'S DAY.

BY the 1 Car. 1. cap. 1. it is enacted, 'That there shall be no Assembly of People out of their own Parishes on the Lord's Day for any Sport whatsoever, nor any Bull-baiting, or Bear-baiting, Interludes, common Plays, or other unlawful Exercises and Pastimes used by any Persons in their own Parishes, on Pain that every Offender shall forfeit 3 s. 4 d. to the Use of the Poor, &c.

By the 29 Car. 2. cap. 7. it is enacted, 'That all Persons shall every Lord's Day apply themselves to the Observation of the same, by exercising themselves in Duties of Piety and true Religion publickly and privately, and that no Tradesman, Artificer, Workman, Labourer, or other Person whatsoever, shall do or exercise any worldly Labour, Business, or Work of their ordinary Callings, upon the Lord's Day, or any Part thereof; (Works of Necessity and Charity only excepted) and that every Person being of the Age of fourteen Years, or upwards, offending in the Premisses, shall for every such Offence forfeit the Sum of 5 s. and that no Person shall publickly cry, shew forth, or expose to Sale any Wares, Merchandizes, Fruit, Herbs, Goods or Chattels whatsoever, upon the Lord's Day, or any Part thereof, upon Pain that every Person so offending shall forfeit the same Goods so cryed, or shewed forth, or exposed to Sale.'

And it is further enacted, par. 2. 'That no Drover, Horse-Courser, Waggoner, Butcher, Higler, their or any of their Servants, shall come into his or their Inn or Lodging upon the Lord's Day, or any Part thereof, upon Pain that each and every such Offender shall forfeit 20 s. for every such Offence; and that no Person or Persons shall Use, Employ, or Travel upon the Lord's Day with any Boat, Wherry, Lighter or Barge, except it be upon extraordinary Occasion, to be allowed by some Justice of Peace of the County, or Head Officer, or some Justice of the Peace of the City, Borough, or Town Corporate where the Fact shall be committed, upon Pain that every Person so offending shall forfeit and lose the Sum of five Shillings for every such Offence; and that if any Person offending in any of the Premisses shall be thereof convicted before any Justice of Peace of the County, or the chief Officer or Officers, or any Justice of the Peace of or within any City, Borough, or Town Corporate, where the said Offence shall be committed, upon his or their View, or Confession of the Party, or Proof of any one or more Witnesses by Oath, (which the said Justices, chief Officer, or Officers, is by this Act authorised to administer,) the said Justice or chief Officer or Officers shall give Warrant under his or their Hand and Seal to the Constable or Churchwardens of the Parish or Parishes, where such Offence shall be committed, to seise the said Goods cried, shewed forth, or put to Sale as aforesaid, and to sell the same, and to levy the said other Forfeitures or Penalties by way of Distress and Sale of the Goods of every such Offender distreined, rendering to the said Offenders the Overplus of the Monies raised thereby; and in Default of such Distress, or in case of Insufficiency or Inability of the said Offender to pay the said Forfeitures or Penalties, that then the Party offending to be set publickly in the Stocks by the Space of two Hours: And all and singular the Forfeitures or Penalties aforesaid shall be employed and converted to the Use of the Poor of the Parish where the said Offences shall be committed; saving only that it shall and may be lawful to and for any such Justice, Mayor, or Head Officer or Officers, out of the said Forfeitures or Penalties, to reward any Person or Persons, that shall inform of any Offence against this Act, according to their Discretions, so as such Reward exceed not the third Part of the Forfeitures or Penalties.'[18]

'Provided, That this Act shall not extend to the Prohibiting of dressing of Meat in Families, or dressing or selling of Meat in Inns, Cooks Shops, or Victualling Houses, for such as otherwise cannot be provided, nor to the Crying or Selling of Milk before Nine of the Clock in the Morning, or after Four of the Clock in the Afternoon.'

'Provided also, That no Person shall be impeached, prosecuted, or molested for any Offence before mentioned in this Act, unless he or they be prosecuted for the same within ten Days after the Offence committed.'

Also it is enacted by the said Statute, par. 6. 'That no Person upon the Lord's Day shall serve or execute, or cause to be served or executed (a) any Writ, Process, Warrant, Order, Judgment, or Decree, (except in Cases of Treason, Felony, or Breach of the Peace,) but that the Service of every such Writ, Process, Warrant, Order, Judgment, or Decree shall be (b) void to all Intents and Purposes whatsoever, and the Person or Persons so serving or executing the same shall be as liable to the Suit of the Party grieved, and to answer Damages to him for doing thereof, as if he or they had done the same without any Writ, Process, Warrant, Order, Judgment, or Decree at all.’[19]

2. OF THE OFFENCE OF SWEARING.

By the 21 Jac. 1. cap. 10. and 6 & 7 W. 3. cap. 11. every Servant, Day-Labourer, Seaman, or Soldier convicted of profane Cursing or Swearing forfeits one Shilling, and every other Person two Shillings, to the Use of the Poor, to be levied by Distress; and in case the Party is unable to pay, to be set in the Stocks for the Space of an Hour for every single Offence, and for any Number of Offences two Hours; but Persons under the Age of Sixteen, unable to pay, to be whipt. The Justice neglecting his Duty in executing the Act forfeits five Pounds. The Prosecution to be within ten Days next after the Offence committed.

And by the 13 Car. 2. cap. 9. all Persons in the King’s Pay at Sea for profane Oaths, &c. shall be punished by Fine and Imprisonment, as the Court Martial shall think fit.

3. OF THE OFFENCE OF DRUNKENNESS.

By the Statutes 4 Jac. 1. cap. 5. and 21 Jac. 1. cap. 7. all Persons whatsoever convicted of Drunkenness by the View of a Justice, Oath of one Witness, or Party’s Confession, shall forfeit five Shillings to the Use of the Poor, to be levied by Distress and Sale of Goods; and for Want of a Distress, Party to be set in the Stocks six Hours.

By the 13 Car. 2. cap. 9. Seamen are to be punished by Fine, &c. as the Court Martial shall think fit.

4. OF THE OFFENCE OF REVILING THE SACRAMENT.

By the 1 E. 6. cap. 1. Reviling the Sacrament is an Offence for which the Party shall be imprisoned, fined, and ransomed; and this Statute, which was repealed 1 Mar. cap. 2. is again revived by 1 Eliz. cap. 1. and is now in Force.

5. OF OFFENCES AGAINST THE COMMON PRAYER.

By the 2 & 3 E. 6. cap. 1. and 6 E. 6. cap. 1. (which were repealed by 1 M. cap. — and revived by 1 Eliz. cap. 2.) the Common Prayer Book was first established, under severe Penalties; but the same Penalties being repealed and enlarged by 1 Eliz. cap. 2. and 13 & 14 Car. 2. cap. 4. which enacts the Use of the same Common Prayer, with some Alterations, those Statutes of Ed. 6. seem at this Day to be of little Use.

By the 1 Eliz. cap. 2. par. 4. ‘If any Parson, Vicar, or other whatsoever Minister, that ought to say the said Common Prayer, &c. shall refuse to use it in such Church, &c. or other Place where he should use to minister the same, or wilfully or obstinately standing in the same, use any other Form, or speak any thing in Derogation of the said Book, or any thing therein contained, he forfeits for the first Offence one Year’s Profit of all his spiritual Promotions, and shall suffer six Months Imprisonment, and for the second Offence shall be deprived.’

In the Construction hereof it hath been resolved,

That under the Words Parson, Vicar, or other whatsoever Minister that ought or should say the said Common Prayer, &c those Clergymen, who have no Cure, are included as much as those who have one, and that they are punishable for using any other Form, &c. inasmuch as by their Ordination they are obliged to officiate in the Offices of the Church, &c. and it is said that they are sufficiently shewn to be in Holy Orders by the Word Clericus in an Indictment.[20]

That this Statute being not only in the Affirmative, but also expresly saving the Jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts, does not restrain them from proceeding against those Offenders in their own Methods as Disturbers of the Unity and Peace of the Church, and consequently that such Persons may be deprived by the said Court, according to the Ecclesiastical Law, for the first Offence.[21]

And it is further enacted by 1 Eliz. cap. 2. par. 9. ‘That if any Person shall in Plays, Songs, or other open Words speak any thing in Derogation, Depraving, or Despising of the said Book, &c. or by open Fact compel, or otherwise procure or maintain any Minister to say any Common Prayer openly, &c. in other Form, or shall by any of the said Means let any Minister to say the said Common Prayer, &c. he shall forfeit one hundred Marks for the first Offence, and four hundred for the second, &c. (which if he pay not (a) within six Weeks after Conviction, he shall suffer six Months Imprisonment for the first Offence, and twelve for the second,) and for the third Offence shall forfeit all his Goods and Chattels, and shall suffer Imprisonment for Life.’[22]

6. OF THE OFFENCE OF TEACHING SCHOOL WITHOUT CONFORMING TO THE CHURCH.

By the 23 Eliz. cap. 1. par. 6 & 7. it is Enacted, ‘That if any Person or Persons, Body Politick or Corporate, shall keep or maintain any Schoolmaster who shall not repair to Church according to the Form of the said Statute, or be allowed by the Bishop or Ordinary of the Diocese, (who shall not take any thing for the said Allowance,) they shall forfeit for every Month ten Pounds; and such Schoolmaster presuming to teach contrary to the said Act, and being thereof convict, shall be disabled to be Teacher of Youth, and shall suffer Imprisonment without Bail or Mainprize for one Year.'

And by the 1 Jac. 1. cap. 4. par. 9. it is Enacted, 'That no Person shall keep any School or be a Schoolmaster out of the Universities or Colleges of this Realm, except it be in some publick or free Grammar School, or in some such Nobleman's or Noblewoman's, or Gentleman's or Gentlewoman's House, as are not Recusants, or where the same Schoolmaster shall be specially licensed thereunto by the Archbishop, Bishop, or Guardian of the Spiritualities of that Diocese, upon Pain that as well the Schoolmaster, as also the Party that shall retain or maintain any such Schoolmaster contrary to the Meaning of the said Statute; shall forfeit each of them, for every Day so wittingly offending, forty Shillings.'

And note; These Statutes are still in Force as to Persons not within the Benefit of the Toleration Act; but as to such Persons they seem to be impliedly repealed by that Act, and 12 Ann. cap. 7. which obliged Schoolmasters to subscribe the Declaration concerning the Liturgy, and to have a Licence from the Bishop, is repealed by 5 Georg. 1. cap. 4.[23]

7. OF THE OFFENCE IN NOT COMING TO CHURCH: AND HEREIN,

1. WHAT FORFEITURES OF MONEY, LANDS, OR GOODS SUCH OFFENDERS INCUR.

By the 1 Eliz. cap. 2. it is Enacted, 'That all Persons inhabiting in any of the (a) King's Dominions, having no reasonable Excuse to be absent, shall endeavour to resort to their Parish Church, &c. or on Let thereof to some usual Place where Common Prayer, &c. shall be used, upon every Sunday and Holiday, and then and there orderly abide (b) during the Service, on Pain of Punishment by the (c) Censures of the Church, and Twelvepence for every Offence.'[24]

By the 23 Eliz. cap. 1. par. 5. it is Enacted, 'That every Person above the Age of sixteen Years, who shall not repair to some Church, Chapel, or usual Place of Common Prayer, but forbear the same contrary to the Tenor of the said Statute of 1 Eliz. and being thereof lawfully (d) convicted, shall forfeit to the King, for every (e) Month which he or she shall (f) so forbear, (g) twenty Pounds.'[25]

By the (h) 28 Eliz. cap. 6. and 3 Jac. cap. 4. it is Enacted, 'That every Offender being convicted of not coming to Church, contrary to the Purport of the Statutes abovementioned, shall pay twenty Pounds for every Month after such Conviction, until he shall conform himself, and come to Church; and that if the Offender shall have made Default of Payment of the twenty Pounds both for every Month contained in the Conviction, and also for every Month subsequent during which he shall not conform himself to the Church, the King shall seise, take, and enjoy all his Goods, and two Parts of his Hereditaments, Leases, and Farms, leaving the third Part only of the same Hereditaments, Leases, and Farms to and for the Maintenance and Relief of the same Offender, his Wife, Children, and Family, notwithstanding any prior Conveyance thereof made by such Offender, with Power of Revocation, or to the Use of himself or his Family: Also by the said Statute of 3 Jac. 1. the King may refuse the Penalty of twenty Pounds a Month, tho' it be tendered according to Law, and thereupon seise two Parts of all the Hereditaments, Leases, and Farms which at the Time of such Seizure shall be, or afterwards shall come to any such Offender, or to any other to his Use, or in Trust for him, or at his Disposition, or whereby or in Consideration whereof he or his Family shall be relieved, maintained, or kept, leaving unto him his chief Mansion-House as Part of his third Part.'[26]

In the Construction of these Statutes it hath been holden,

1. That the King by making his Election given him by 3 Jac. 1. to seise the Offender's Hereditaments, &c. waves the Benefit of the twenty Pounds a Month, and the Power of seising the Offender's Goods.[27]
2. That Bonds, Recognizances, &c. taken in the Offender's own Name, or in the Names of others to his Use, come within the Words all his Goods, &c.[28]
3. That no Copyhold Lands are within either of the Statutes, by reason of the Prejudice that would accrue thereby to the Lord of the Manor.[29]
4. That tho' it may be doubtful on the Statute 28 Eliz. whether Lands conveyed in Trust by some Friend for the Recusant may be seised, yet it is clear that such Lands may be seized by 3 Jac. 1. which expresly provides, that the King upon his waving the Forfeiture of twenty Pounds a Month may seise two Parts of all the Hereditaments, &c. which shall come to any such Offenders, or to others, to their Use or in Trust for them.[30]
5. But that the King cannot seise Lands of which the Offender is seised in Trust for another, altho' the Statute hath made no express Provision for Cestui que Trust.[31]
6. That the Profits of the Lands seised by the King by Force of 29 Eliz. for the Nonpayment of the twenty Pounds a Month, ought not to be applied to the Satisfaction thereof, but that the Lands ought to remain in the King's

Hands by way of Pledge, till the whole Forfeiture be paid some other Way: But this Construction of the Statute seeming over severe, it was provided by 3 Jac. 1. that the Profits of the said Lands should go towards the Satisfaction of the twenty Pounds.[32]

2. IN WHAT MANNER THEY ARE TO BE PROCEEDED AGAINST FOR THOSE FORFEITURES.

As to the Forfeiture of Twelvepence, it is by the 1 Eliz. cap. 2. and 3 Jac. 1. cap. 4. Enacted, 'That the said Forfeiture of Twelvepence for the Absence of a Sunday or Holiday may, on the Confession of the Party, or Oath of one Witness, &c. be levied on the Goods of the Offender, &c. by the Warrant of a Justice of Peace to the Churchwarden of the Parish where the Party dwells, and employed to the Use of the Poor.'

As to the Forfeiture of twenty Pounds for a Month's Absence by the 23 Eliz. cap. 1. 28 Eliz. and 3 Jac. 1. cap. 4. The same may be recovered by Indictment not only in the Court of King's Bench, but also before Justices of Oyer, Assise, Gaol-Delivery, and Quarter-Sessions of the Peace: And by the 3 Jac. 1. cap. 4. par. 7. it is Enacted, That upon an Indictment at the Assises, Gaol-Delivery, or General Sessions of the Peace, Proclamation shall be made, that the Offender render himself to the Sheriff before the next Assises, Gaol-Delivery, or Sessions; and that if he shall not then appear, of Record upon such Default recorded, the same shall be a Conviction in Law, as if a Trial by Verdict on the Indictment had been recorded: And by the said Statute every such Conviction shall be certified into the Exchequer.'[33]

By the 35 Eliz. cap. 1. par. 10. it is Enacted, 'That all and every the said Pains, Duties, Forfeitures, and Payments shall and may be recovered and levied to her Majesty's Use, by Action of Debt, Bill, Plaint, Information, or otherwise, in any of the Courts commonly called the King's Bench, Common Pleas, or Exchequer, in such sort and in all respects, as by the ordinary Course of the Common Laws of this Realm any other Debt due by any such Person in any other Case should or may be recovered, or levied, wherein no Essoin, Protection, or Wager of Law shall be admitted or allowed.'

By the 20 Eliz. cap. 6. and 3 Jac. 'Every such Offender, being once convicted, shall for every Month after such Conviction, without any other Indictment or Conviction, pay into the Exchequer twice in the Year, viz. in every Easter and Michaelmas Term, as much as shall then remain unpaid, after the Rate of Twenty Pounds for every Month after a Conviction; and that for a Default herein, the King may seise all the Goods and two Parts of the Hereditaments of such an Offender, &c.’

3. WHAT OTHER INCONVENIENCIES THEY ARE SUBJECT TO.

By the 1 Jac. 1. cap. 4. par. 8. it is enacted, ‘That no Recusant convict shall practise either the Common or Civil Law, or Physick, or use the Trade of an Apothecary, or be Judge or Minister of any Court, or bear any Office in Camp, Troop, or Company of Soldiers, or in any Ship or Fortress, but shall be utterly disabled for the same, and forfeit for every such Offence 100 l.’

‘And it is further enacted, par. 22. ‘That such Recusants as shall be convicted at the Time of the Death of the Testator, or at the Time of granting of any Administration, shall be disabled to be Executors or Administrators, and that no such Persons shall be Guardians to any Child.’

And by the 23 Eliz. cap. 1. it is enacted, ‘That every Person, forbearing the Church twelve Months, shall on Certificate thereof into the King’s Bench, by the Ordinary, a Justice of Assise and Gaol-Delivery, or a Justice of Peace of the County where such Offender shall dwell or be, be bound with two sufficient Sureties in the Sum of Two Hundred Pounds, at the least, to the good Behaviour, and so continue bound until such Offender shall conform himself, &c.’

4. BY WHAT MEANS THEY MAY BE DISCHARGED.

By the 23 Eliz. par. 10. it is enacted, ‘That every Person guilty of the abovementioned Offences, who shall, before he be thereof indicted, or at his Arraignment or Trial before Judgment, submit and conform himself before the Bishop of the Diocese where he shall be resident, or before the Justices where he shall be indicted, arraigned or tried, (having not before made like Submission at any his Trial, being indicted for his first like Offence) shall, upon his Recognition of such Submission, in open Assises or Sessions of the County where such Person shall be resident, be discharged of all and every the said Offences against the said Statute, &c.’

And by the 29 Eliz. cap. 6. par. 6. ‘That whensoever any such Offender shall make Submission, and become conformable according to the Form limited by the abovementioned Statute of 23 Eliz. cap. — or shall fortune to die, that then no Forfeiture of 20 l. for any Month, or Seisure of the Lands of the same Offender, from and after such Submission and Conformity, or Death, and full Satisfaction of all the Arrearages of twenty Pounds Monthly, before such Seisure due or payable, shall ensue, or be continued against such Offender, so long as the same Person shall continue in coming to Divine Service, according to the Intent of the said Statute.’

By the 1 Jac. 1. cap. 4. it is enacted, ‘That Recusant conforming himself according to the Meaning of the abovementioned Statutes, &c. shall, during such Conformity, be (a) discharged of all Penalties which he might otherwise sustain by reason of his Recusancy.’[34]

If the Heir of a Recusant be a Conformist, he is discharged by 1 Jac. 1. cap. 4. as to all Penalties happening by reason of his Ancestor’s Recusancy, unless two Parts of his Lands were seised by the King in his Ancestor’s Life, in which case they shall continue in the King’s Hands till the whole Debt be levied.

5. HOW FAR A PERSON IS PUNISHABLE FOR SUFFERING SUCH ABSENCE IN OTHERS.

By the 1 Jac. 1. cap. 4. ‘Whoever shall keep in his Service, Fee or Livery, or willingly maintain, &c. in his House any Servant, Sojourner or Stranger, (except a Parent, wanting, without Fraud, other Habitation or Maintenance, and except a Ward, &c.) who shall forbear going to Church, &c. for a Month, shall for every such Month forfeit 10 l.’

8 [SIC]. OF OFFENCES AGAINST THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH BY PROTESTANT DISSENTERS.

By 31 Eliz. cap. 1. ‘Obstinate Nonconformists were compellable to abjure the Realm, and were also subject to other Penalties; and Dissenters were farther restrained by 17 Car. 2. cap. — & 22 Car. 2. cap. 1. but at this Day by 1 W. & M. cap. 18. all Persons dissenting from the Church, (except Papists, and those who shall in Preaching or Writing deny the Doctrine of the Trinity) are exempted from all Penal Laws relating to Religion, except 25 Car. 2. cap. 2. (by which all Officers of Trust are bound to receive the Sacrament according to the Usage of the Church of England, and also to take the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, and the Test;) and also, except 30 Car. 2. cap. 1. (by which the Members of both Houses of Parliament, and all the King’s sworn Servants, are bound to make a Declaration against Transubstantiation, and the Invocation of Saints, and the Sacrifice of the Mass) provided such Dissenters take the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, and make the said Declaration against Transubstantiation, &c. and come to some Congregation for Religious Worship in some Place Registered, either in the Bishop’s Court, or at Sessions, the Doors where of shall neither be locked, barred nor bolted.’

Also by the said Statute 1 W. & M. ‘Dissenting Teachers are tolerated, if they take the said Oaths, &c. at the General or Quarter-Sessions, to be held for the Place where such Persons live, and subscribe the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England, except those few scrupled ones concerning Church Government and Infant Baptism; and by 10 Ann. cap. 2. they may qualify themselves as well during a Prosecution upon any Penal Statute as before, and being qualified in one County may officiate in another, upon producing a Certificate, and taking the said Oaths, &c. if required.'[35]

And by the Statute 1 W. & M. 'Those who scruple the taking of any Oath are within the like Indulgence, provided they subscribe the aforesaid Declaration, and also a Declaration of Fidelity to the King, and against the deposing Doctrine and Papal Supremacy, and also profess their Faith in God the Father, and Jesus Christ his eternal Son, the true God and the Holy Spirit, one God for evermore; and acknowledge the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament to be given by Divine Inspiration.

It has been holden, since this Statute, a Prohibition lies to the Spiritual Court proceeding against Persons for Incontinency who have been married in a licensed Conventicle.[36]

By the 5 Geor. 1. cap. 4. it is enacted, 'That if any Magistrate shall be knowingly present at any publick Meeting for Religious Worship, other than the Church of England, in the peculiar Habit of, or attended with, the Ensigns belonging to his Office, he shall be disabled to hold such Office, and adjudged incapable to bear any publick Office or Employment whatsoever.'

(A) HERETICK AND HERESY.

1. By the 1 Eliz. 1. which elected the High Commission Court, having restrained the same from adjudging any Points to be Heretical, which have not been determined to be such, either by Scripture, or by some one of the four first General Councils, or by some other Council, by express Words of Scripture, or by the Parliament, with the Assent of the Convocation, it has been since generally holden, that these Rules will be good Directions to Ecclesiastical Courts in Relation to Heresy. Hawk. Pl. C. 4. cap. 2. S. 2.

2. At this Day the Diocesan hath Jurisdiction of Heresy, and so it hath been put in Use in all Queen Elizabeth's Reign; but without the Aid of the Act of 2 H. 4. 15. the Diocesan could imprison no Person accused of Heresy but was to proceed against them by the Censure of the Church, for the Bishop of every Diocess might convict any for Heresy before the Stat. 2 H. 4. as appears by the Preamble of it, but could not imprison, &c. and now, seeing that not only the said Act of 2 H. 4 but 25 H. 8. 14. are repealed, the Diocesan cannot imprison any Man accused of Heresy, but must proceed against him as he might have done before those Statutes by the Censures of the Church, as it appears by the said Act of 2 H. 4. 15. likewise the supposed Stat. of 5 Rich. 2. 5. and the Statutes of 2 H. cap. 7. 25 H. 8. 14. 1 & 2 P. and M. 6. are all repealed, so as no Statute made against Hereticks stands now in Force, and at this Day no Person can be indicted or impeached for Heresy before any temporal Judge, or other that has temporal Jurisdiction, as upon perusal of the said Statute appears. 12 Rep. 56. 43 Eliz. Religion, (Religio, à religando) Signifieth Piety, Devotion, and the Worship of God: And there are many Temporal Laws, made for the Support of Religion. The Law hath so tender a Regard for the Interests of the King and of Religion, that an Indictment will lie for doing any Thing which plainly appears immediately to tend to the Prejudice of either of them; and be good, though it do not expresly complain of it as a common Grievance. 1 Hawk. P. C. 198. Offences tending to subvert all Religion and Morality, which are the Foundation of Government, are punishable by the temporal Judges by Fine and Imprisonment, and also such corporal Punishment as the Court in Discretion shall think fit; and seditious Words, in Derogation of the established Religion, are indictable, as tending to a Breach of the Peace. Ibid. 7. So also prophane Scoffing of the Scripture; Impostures in Religion, &c. By Statute, no Person in Authority to execute Spiritual Jurisdiction, has Power to adjudge any Matters of Religion to be Heresy, but such as have been so adjudged by Canonical Scripture, by one or more of the General Councils, or shall be adjudged by the Parliament with the Assent of the Convocation. 1 Eliz cap. 1. The 13 Eliz. establishes the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion, to be subscribed by the Clergy, &c. But Protestant Dissenters are exempted from subscribing the 34, 35 and 36th Articles, by 1 W. & M. cap. 18. Persons educated in the Christian Religion, who by Writing or Speaking, deny any one of the Persons in the Holy Trinity, to be God; or asserting there are more Gods than one; or who shall deny the Christian Religion to be true; or the Old and New Testament to be writ by Divine Authority, are rendered incapable to hold any Office or Imployment; and being convicted of a second Offence, are disabled to prosecute any Action, to be Executor, Guardian, &c. and subject to Imprisonment for three Years: But for the first Offence, the Offender shall be discharged from Penalties, on renouncing his Errors in open Court. 9 & 10 W. 3. cap. 32. If any Person shall come into a Church, Chapel, or Congregation for Religion, and disturb the same, or misuse the Teacher, he shall forfeit 20 l. 1 W. & M.

CHAP. II
Of Heresy.

OFFENCES considered in relation to the Persons against whom they are committed, are either,

1. Such as are more immediately against God; or,
2. Such as are more immediately against Man.

Offences more immediately against God, are either by Common Law or by Statute.

Those at Common Law are either capital or not capital. The capital Offences of this Nature are of three Kinds:

1. Heresy.
2. Witchcraft.
3. Sodomy.

Concerning Heresy I shall consider,[1]

1. What it is;
2. By whom it is cognizable;
3. How it is punishable.

Sect. 1. As to the first Point, it seems, That among Protestants Heresy is taken to be a false Opinion, repugnant to some Point of Doctrine clearly revealed in Scripture, and either absolutely essential to the Christian Faith, or as least of most high Importance.

Sect. 2. But it is impossible to set down all the particular Errors which may properly be called Heretical, concerning which there are and always have been so many intricate Disputes: However, the 1 El. 1. which erected the High-Commission-Court, having restrained the same from adjudging any Points to be Heretical, which have not been determined to be such either by Scripture or by some one of the four first General Councils, or by some other Council, by express Words of Scripture, or by the Parliament with the Assent of the Convocation, it his been since generally holden, that these Rules will be good Directions to Ecclesiastical Courts in Relation to Heresy.[2]

Sect. 3. As to the second Point, viz. By whom Heresy is cognizable, it is certain, That the Convocation may declare what Opinions are Heretical: But it hath been questioned of late, whether they have Power at this Day to convene and convict the Heretick.[3]

Sect.4. However it is agreed, that every Bishop may convict Persons of Heresy within his own Diocese, and proceed by Church-Censures against those who shall be convicted; but it is said, That no Spiritual Judge, who is not a Bishop, hath this Power; and it has been questioned, Whether a Conviction before the Ordinary were a sufficient Foundation whereon to ground the Writ de Haeretico comburendo, as it is agreed that a Conviction before the Convocation was.[4]

Sect. 5. By 24 H. 8. 9. the Archbishop of either Province may cite any Person before him for Heresy, if the immediate Ordinary either consent thereto, or do not his Duty in punishing the same.

Sect. 6. But it is certain, that a Man cannot be proceeded against at the Common Law in a Temporal Court merely for Heresy; yet if in Maintenance of his Errors he set up Conventicles and raise Factions, which may tend to the Disturbance of the public Peace, it seemeth that he may in this Respect be fined and imprisoned, upon an Indictment, &c. at the Common Law.[5]

Sect. 7. Also a Temporal Judge may incidently take Knowledge whether a Tenet be Heretical or not; as where one was committed by Force of 2 H. 4. 5. for saying, That he was not bound by the Law of God to pay Tithes to the Curate; and another for saying, That though he was excommunicate before Men, yet he was not so before God. The Temporal Courts, on an Habeas Corpus in the first Case, and an Action of false Imprisonment in the other, adjudged neither of the Points to be Heresy within that Statute; for the King's Courts will examine all Things which are ordained by Statute.[6]

Sect. 8. Also in a Quare impedit, if the Bishop plead that he refused the Clerk for Heresy, it seems that he must set forth the particular Point, that it may appear to be Heretical, to the Court wherein the Action is brought, which having Conusance of the original Cause, must by Consequence have a Power as to all incidental Matters necessary for the Determination of it; and, without knowing the very Point alledged against the Clerk, will not be able to give Directions concerning it to the Jury, who (if the Party be dead) are to try the Truth of the Allegation.[7]

Sect. 9. But if a Man be proceeded against as an Heretick in the Spiritual Court pro Salute Animae, and think himself aggrieved, his proper Remedy seems to be to bring his Appeal to a higher Ecclesiastical Court, and not to move for a Prohibition from a Temporal one, which, as it seems to be agreed, cannot regularly determine or discuss what shall be called Heresy.[8]

Sect. 10. As to the third Point, viz. How Heresy is punishable, there is no Doubt but that at Common Law one convicted thereof, and refusing to abjure it, or falling into it again after he had abjured it, might be burnt by Force of the Writ de Haeretico comburendo, which was grantable out of Chancery upon a Certificate of such Conviction; but it is said, That be forfeited neither Lands nor Goods, because the Proceedings against him were only pro Salute Animae.[9]

Sect. 11. But at this Day the said Writ de Haeretico comburendo is abolished by 29 Car. 2. 9. And all the old Statutes which give a Power to arrest or imprison Persons for Heresy, or introduced any Forfeiture on the Account, are repealed; yet by the Common Law an obstinate Heretick being excommunicate, is still liable to be imprisoned by Force of the Write de Excommunicato capiendo, till he make Satisfaction to the Church. And by 9 & 10 Will. 3. 32. If any Person having been educated in, or having made Profession of the Christian Religion within this Realm shall be convicted in any of the Courts of Westminster, or at the Assizes, of denying any one of the Persons in the Holy Trinity to be God, or of maintaining that there are more Gods than one, or of denying the Truth of the Christian Religion, or the Divine Authority of the Holy Scriptures, he shall for the first Offence be adjudged uncapable of any Office, and for the second, shall be disabled to sue any Action, or to be a Guardian, Executor or Administrator; or to take by any Legacy or Deed of Gift, or to bear any Office Civil or Military, or Benefice Ecclesiastical, for ever, and shall also suffer Imprisonment for three Years, without Bail or Mainprize, from the Time of such Conviction.[10]

CHAP. III.
Of Witchcraft.

Sect. 1. OF Offenders of this Nature there are said to be three Kinds,[11]
1. Conjurors, who by Force of certain Magick Words endeavour to raise the Devil, and compel him to execute their Commands.
2. Witches, who by way of friendly Conference are said to bargain with an evil Spirit to do what they desire of him.
3. Sorcerers or Charmers, who by the Use of certain superstitious Forms of Words, or by Means of Images, or other odd Representations of Persons or Things, &c. are said to produce strange Effects above the ordinary Course of Nature.

Sect. 2. All these were anciently punished in the same Manner as Hereticks, by the Writ de Haeretico comburendo after a Sentence in the Ecclesiastical Court, and a Relapse. And it is said also, That they might be condemned to the Pillory, &c. upon an Indictment at Common Law.[12]

Sect. 3. In the Time of King Edward the third, one taken with the Head and Face of a dead Man, and a Book of Sorcery, was brought into the King's Bench: But there being no Indictment against him, he was sworn that from thenceforth he would not be a Sorcerer, and then delivered from Prison, and the Head was burnt at his Charge: But this Method seems to be obsolete at this Day.[13]

Sect. 4. By 1 Jac. 1. cap. 12. the only Law now in Force against these Offenders, they are divided into two Degrees; and those in the first Degree, and their Accessories before, shall suffer as Felons without Clergy; and of these there are the four following Species.[14]
1. Such as shall use any Invocation or Conjuration of any evil Spirit: And such seem clearly to be within the Law, tho' no Spirit do actually appear.[15]
2. Such as consult, covenant with, entertain, employ, feed, or reward any evil Spirit to any Intent: And these are agreed to be within the Statute, though nothing farther be done upon such Consultation, &c.[16]

3. Such as take up any dead Person's Body, or any Part thereof, to be used in any Manner of Witchcraft: And these are also clearly within the Statute, though they do not actually so use it.[17]
4. Such as exercise any Witchcraft, Inchantment, Charm or Sorcery, whereby any Person shall be killed, destroyed, consumed, or lamed in his or her Body, or any Part thereof: But none are within this Branch who do not actually effect such Mischief.[18]

Sect. 5. Those in the second Degree shall for the first Offence suffer a Year's Imprisonment, and the Pillory; and for the second, as Felons without Clergy, and these by the manifest Purport of the Words of the Act, which is very obscurely penned, seem to be divided into the two following Species.
1. Such as take upon them by Witchcraft, Inchantment, Charm or Sorcery to tell where Treasure is to be found, or where Things lost or stolen may be found, or to do any Thing to the Intent to provoke any Person to unlawful Love, or to hurt or destroy any Person in his or her Body, though the same be not effected.
2. Such as shall use any Witchcraft, &c. whereby any Cattle or Goods of any Person shall be destroyed, wasted or impaired: But those, who take upon them to do this, are not within the Act unless they actually do it.[19]

CHAP. IV.
Of Sodomy.

Sect. 1. ALL unnatural Carnal Copulations, whether with Man or Beast, seem to come under the Notion of Sodomy, which was Felony by the antient Common Law, and punish'd, according to some Authors, with Burning; according to others, with Burying alive: But at this Day by Force of 25 H. 8. 6. & 5 El. 17. is punished in the same Manner as other Felonies, which are excluded from Clergy.[20]

Sect. 2. In every Indictment for this Offence, there must be the Words Rem habuit veneream, & carnaliter cognovit; and consequently some Kind of Penetration, and also of Emission, must be proved; but any the least Degree is sufficient, and Emission is prima facie an Evidence of Penetration.[21]

CHAP V.
Of Offences against God not Capital at Common Law.

OFFENCES more immediately against God not Capital, are either by the Common Law or Statute.

Those by the Common Law are,

Sect. 1. I. All Blasphemies against God, as denying his Being or Providence, and all contumelious Reproaches of Jesus Christ.[22]

Sect. 2. II. All profane Scoffing at the Holy Scripture, or exposing any Part thereof to Contempt or Ridicule.[23]

Sect. 3. III. Impostures in Religion, as falsely pretending to extraordinary Commissions from God, and terrifying or abusing the People with false Denunciations of Judgments, &c.

Sect. 4. IV. All open Lewdness grosly scandalous, such as was that of those Persons, who exposed themselves naked to the People in a Balcony in Covent-Garden with most abominable Circumstances.

Sect. 5. Offences of this Nature, because they tend to subvert all Religion or Morality, which are the Foundation of Government, are punishable by the Temporal Judges with Fine and Imprisonment, and also such corporal infamous punishment as to the Court in Discretion shall seem meet, according to the Heinousness of the Crime.[24]

Sect. 6. V. Seditious Words in Derogation of the Established Religion are indictable, as tending to a Breach of the Peace; as these, Your Religion is a new Religion, and Preaching is but Prattling, and Prayer Once a Day is more edifying.[25]

CHAP. VI.
Of Offences by Statute against Religion in general.

OFFENCES by Statute not Capital more immediately against God, are either,

1. Such as are against Religion in general; or,
2. Such as are against the Established Church.

Those against Religion in general are of several Kinds; as Sect. 1. I. All Profanation of the Lord's Day; for by 1 Car. 1. 1. There shall be no Assembly of People, out of their own Parishes, on this Day, for any Sport whatsoever; nor any Bull-baiting or Bear-baiting, Interludes, common Plays, or other unlawful Exercises and Pastimes, used by any Persons in their own Parishes, on Pain that every Offender shall forfeit 3 s. and d. to the Use of the Poor, &c.

Sect. 2. By 29 Car. 2. 7. No Persons whatsoever, above fourteen years old, shall exercise any worldly Labour, Business, or Work of their ordinary Calling on the Lord's Day, (except Works of Necessity and Charity, and the Dressing and Selling of Meat in an Inn and Victualling House, for those who cannot otherwise be provided) on Pain of forfeiting 5s. And no Person shall publickly cry, or expose to Sale, any Goods whatsoever on this Day,

(except Milk, which may be sold before Nine in the Morning, and after Four in the Afternoon) on Pain of forfeiting the same.[26]

Sect. 3. Also no Drover, Horse-Courser, Waggoner, Butcher or Higgler, shall travel, or come to their Inn on this Day, on Pain of twenty Shillings. And no Person shall use, employ, or travel with any Boat or Barge, without the Allowance of some Justice of Peace, &c. on Pain of five Shillings. But by 11 and 12 Gul. 21. Forty Watermen may be appointed by the Company of Watermen to ply on the Thames, &c. And by 9 Ann. 23. Hackney Coach-Men are permitted to work within the Bills of Mortality on Sunday.

Sect. 4. II. All profane Swearing and Cursing; for by 21 Jac. 1. 20. and 6 & 7 Gul. 11. Every Servant, Day-Labourer, Seaman or Soldier, convicted of profane Cursing or Swearing, forfeits one Shilling, and every other Person two Shillings, and shall be registred at Sessions; and by 13 Car. 2. cap. 9. Artic. 2. All Persons in the King's Pay at Sea, for profane Oaths, &c. shall be punished by Fine and Imprisonment, as the Court Martial shall think fit.

Sect. 5. III. Drunkenness, for which by 1 Jac. 1. 5. all Persons whatsoever forfeit five Shillings to the Poor; and for which Seamen may by 13 Car. 2. 9. be punished by Fine, &c. as the Court Martial shall think fit.

Sect. 6. IV. Reviling the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper with Contemptuous Words, &c. for which (by 1 Ed. 6. 1. which was repealed by 1 Mar. 2. and revived by 1 El. 1.) the Offender shall be imprisoned, fined, and ransomed.

Sect. 7. I shall not mention the Offences against 2 & 3 Ed. 6. 19. and 5 El. 5. relating to Fasts and Fish-days, because it is expresly [sic] declared, That those Statutes are enacted merely on a political Account, and it is made penal to affirm that any eating of Fish, or forbearing of Flesh mentioned therein, is necessary to Salvation, or that it is Service of God.

CHAP. VII.
Of Offences against the Common Prayer.

OFFENCES against the Established Church are,

1. Such as concern all Persons in general;
2. Such as more immediately relate to these of the Popish Religion;
3. Such as more immediately regard Protestant Dissenters.

Those which concern all Persons in general are,

1. Against the Common Prayer.
2. In accepting or holding an Office without due Conformity to the Church.

3. In teaching School without Conforming to the Church.
4. In not coming to Church.

Sect. 1. And first of Offences against the common Prayer, as to which it is to be observed, That by 2 & 3 Ed. 6. 1. (which were repealed by 1 Mar. 2. and revived by 1 Ed. 2.) the Common Prayer Book was first established under severe Penalties, but the same Penalties being repeated and enlarged by 1 El. 2. and 13 & 14 Car. 2. 4. which enacts the Use of the same Common Prayer with some Alterations; those Statutes of Ed. 6. seem at this Day to be of little Use.

Sect. 2. By 1 El. 2. Par. 4, 5 & 6. If any Parson, Vicar, or other whatsoever Minister, that ought to say the said Com. Prayer, &c. shall refuse to use it in such Church, &c. or other Place where he should use to minister the same, or willfully or obstinately standing in the same, use any Form, or speak any Thing in Derogation of the said Book, or any Thing therein contain'd, he forfeits for the first Offense one Year's Profit of all his Spiritual Promotions, and shall suffer six Months Imprisonment; and for the second Offense shall be deprived, &c.[27]

In the Construction of this Act it has been resolved,

Sect. 3. I. That under the Words, Parson, Vicar, or other whatsoever Minister that ought or should say the said Common Prayer, &c. those Clergymen who have no Cure are included, as much as those who have, one, and that they have are punishable for using any other Form, &c. inasmuch by their Ordination they are obliged to officiate in the Offices of the Church, &c. and it is said, that they are sufficiently shewn to be in Holy Orders by the Word Clericus in the Indictment.[28]

Sect. 4. II. That this Statute being not only in the Affirmative, but also expresly saving the Jurisdiction of Ecclesiastical Courts, does not restrain them from proceeding against these Offenders in their own Methods, as Disturbers of the Unity and Peace of the Church, and Consequently that such Persons may be deprived by the said Court according to the Course of the Spiritual Law, for the first Offence.[29]

Sect. 5. Also it is further enacted, by 1 El. 2. Par. 9. That if any Person shall in Plays, Songs, or other open Words, speak any Thing in Derogation, Depraving or Despising of the said Book, &c. Or by open Fact compel, or otherwise procure or maintain any Minister to say any Common Prayer openly, &c. in other Form: Or shall by any of the said Means let any Minister to say the said Common Prayer, &c. he shall forfeit one hundred Marks for the first Offence, and four hundred for the Second, &c. (which if he pay not within six Weeks after Conviction, he shall suffer six Months Imprisonment for the first Offence, and twelve for the second) and for the third Offence shall forfeit all his Goods and Chattels, and shall suffer Imprisonment for Life.

Sect. 6. It has been made a Question in the Construction of this Clause, Whether if the Party die within six Weeks, the said Forfeiture be not discharged, since by the Act of God the Election of paying it, or suffering Imprisonment in lieu of it, is taken away.[30]

CHAP. VIII.

Of Offences in accepting or holding an Office without due Conformity to the Church.

OFFENCES in accepting or holding an Office, without due Conformity to the Church, are of two Kinds,

1. In not receiving the Sacrament both before and after the Acceptance of an Office.
2. In going to any other Place for Religious Worship, than the Church, during the Continuance in an Office.

Sect. 1. As to the first of these Offences, it is enacted by 13 Car. 2. Stat. 2 Cap. 1. Par. 10, 12. That no Person shall be placed, elected or chosen, to any Office or Place of Mayor, Alderman, Recorder, Bailiff, Town-Clerk, Common-Council-Man, or other Office of Magistracy, Place or Trust, or other Imployment relating to the Government of any City, Corporation, Borough, Cinque-Port, or other Port Town, who shall not have received the Sacrament, according to the Rites of the Church of England, within one Year next before such Election; and that every Person, so placed or elected, shall take the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, at the same Time when the Oath for the due Execution of the said Office, &c. shall be administred; and that the said Oaths shall be administred and tendered by those who administer the Oath of Office, and in Default of such, by two Justices of Peace of the Corporation, &c. (which makes [a] it necessary in a Return to Mandamus, setting forth that the Party did not take the Oaths before the Mayor, &c. to add, that he did not take them before two Justices of Peace, &c. and it is further enacted, That, on Default hereof, every such Election, Placing and Choice shall be void. And [b] it hath been adjudged to be no Excuse, that the Oaths were not tendered.[31]

Sect. 2. Also it is enacted by 25 Car. 2. That all Officers Civil and Military, (except those of Inheritance, appointing sufficient Deputies) and all who have any Fee, &c. by Patent from the King, (except such as shall be granted for valuable Consideration for Life or Years, and not relate to any Office or Place of Trust) and also all who have any Place of Trust, or any Employment in the King's Houshold, shall take the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, and Test, the next Term, (in the King's Bench or Chancery, or Quarter-Sessions) and receive the Sacrament within three Months, and give in a Certificate thereof, proved by two Witness, to the Court wherein they take the said Oaths. And in case of Neglect, shall be disabled to hold the said Offices, &c. and forfeit five hundred Pounds, except Femes Covert, &c. But [c] it hath been adjudged, that the Persons so disabled lose only their Right to the Profits of their Offices from the Time of such Disability, but that they lose nothing vested in them before. Also [d] it hath been adjudged to be no Excuse, for a Person bound by Law to accept a Corporation Office, that he is disabled to receive the Sacrament, by having been excommunicated; and [e] Quaere, if it be any Excuse, that his Conscience will not suffer him to take it, being a Protestant Dissenter, &c.[32]

Sect. 3. Notwithstanding the Words of the first of these Acts are so very strong as to make such Election, &c. void, and those of the second to make such Persons disabled in Law to all Intents and Purpose whatsoever, to have, occupy, or enjoy the said Offices; [f] yet it hath been strongly holden, that the Acts of one under such a Disability, being instated in such an Office, and executing the same without any Objection to his Authority, may be valid as to Strangers; for otherwise not only those who no Way infringe this Law, but even those whose Benefit is intended to be advanced by it, might be Sufferers for another's Fault, to which they are no Way privy; and one Chasm in a Corporation happening thro' the Default of one Head Officer would Perpetually vacate the Acts of all others, whose Authority, in respect of their Admission into their Offices, or otherwise, may depend on his.[33]

Sect. 4. By 25 Car. 2. Parag. 17. it is expresly provided, That the said Act shall not extend to Constables or Churchwardens, or such like inferior Civil Officers or to a Bailiff of a Manor or Lands, or such like private Officers.[34]

But it hath been questioned, whether it extends to the Censor of the College of Physicians.

Sect. 5. As to the second Offence of this Kind, viz. that of going to any other Place for Religious Worship than the Church, during the Continuance of an Office, it was enacted by 10 Ann. 2. That if any Person, having any Office, Civil or Military, or receiving any Pay, Salary, Fee or Wages, by reason of any Grant from the Crown, or having any Command or Place of Trust from the Crown, or admitted into any Service or Employment in the King's Houshold or Family, or bearing any Office of Magistracy, or Place of Trust, or other Employment relating to the Government of any City, Corporation, Borough, or Cinque-Port, and obliged by 13 Car. 2. Stat. 2. Cap. 1. or 25 Car. 2. 21. to receive the Sacrament, according to the Usage of the Church of England, should at any Time after Admission into any such Office, &c. and during the Continuance in the same, knowingly or willingly be present at any Assembly in England, Wales, or Berwick on Tweed, for the Exercise of Religion, in other Manner than according to the Church of England, at which Assembly there shall be ten Persons besides those of the Family, or at any such Meeting where such Liturgy is used, and the King, and such others as shall be lawfully appointed to be prayed for, should not be prayed for in express Words, &c. he should forfeit forty Pound; and be disabled to hold any Office or Employment whatsoever in England, &c. But this Statute, so far as it relates to this Matter, is repealed by 5 Geo. 1. c. 4

CHAP. IX.

Of Offences in teaching School without conforming to the Church.

Sect. 9. As to the Offence of teaching School without conforming to the Church, so for as it concerns all Persons in general, it is enacted by 23 El. 1. Par. 6 & 7. That if any Person or Persons, Body Politick or Corporate, shall keep or maintain any Schoolmaster, who shall not repair to Church according to the Form of the said Statute, or be allowed by the Bishop or Ordinary of the Diocese, (who shall not take any thing for the said Allowance) they shall forfeit for every Month ten Pounds; and such Schoolmaster presuming to teach contrary to the said Act, and being thereof convict, shall be disabled to be a Teacher of Youth, and shall suffer Imprisonment, without Bail or Mainprize, for one Year.

Sect. 2. And it is further enacted by 1 Jac. 1. 4. Par. 9 That no Person shall keep any School, or be a Schoolmaster, out of the Universities or Colleges of this Realm, except it be in some publick or free Grammar-School, or in some such Nobleman's or Noblewoman's, or Gentleman's or Gentlewoman's House, as are not Recusants, or where the same Schoolmaster shall be specially licensed thereunto by the Archbishop, Bishop, or Guardian of the Spiritualities of that Diocese, upon Pain, that as well the Schoolmaster, as also the Party that shall retain or maintain any such Schoolmaster, contrary to the Meaning of the said Statute, shall forfeit each of them, for every Day so wittingly offending, forty Shillings.[35]

Sect. 3. But it having been doubted whether such Persons as are within the Benefit of 1 Gul. & Mar. 18. commonly called The Toleration Act, are not exempted from the Penalties of the above mentioned Statutes, it was further enacted by 12 Ann. 7. That whoever shall keep any publick or private School or Seminary, or teach any Youth as Tutor or Schoolmaster, (unless he instruct them only in Reading, or Writing, Arithmetick, or such mathematical Learning as relates to Navigation, or some mechanical Art, and that in the English Tongue, or unless he shall be a Foreigner of a foreign reformed Church, and teach the Children of such Foreigners only) without having first subscribed that Part of the Declaration in 13 & 14 Car. 2. which relates to Conformity to the Liturgy of the Church of England, and also having obtained a Licence from the Bishop, &c. and shall be thereof convicted in any of the Courts at Westminster, or at the Assizes, or before Justices of Oyer and Terminer, shall be committed to the Common Gaol for three Months, &c. But this Statute, so far as it relates to this Matter, is repealed by 5 Geo. 1. c. 4.

As to Popish Schoolmaster in particular, see Chap. 15. Sect. 3.

CHAP. X.
Of Offences in not coming to Church.

FOR the better Understanding of the Offences of not coming to Church, so far as the same relate to all persons in general, except such as are within the Indulgence of 1 Will. & Mar. 18. which is commonly called The Toleration Act, I shall consider:

1. How far Persons are punishable for their own absence from the Church.
How far they are punishable for suffering such Absence in others.

And first, In Order to shew how far Persons are punishable for their own Absence, I shall Consider the following Particulars:

1. What Forfeiture of Money, Lands or Goods, such Offenders incur.
2. In what Manner they are to be proceeded against for those Forfeitures.
3. What other Inconveniencies they are subject unto.
4. By what Means they may be discharged.

As to the first Point, I shall consider,

1. What Forfeitures of Money; and,
2. What Forfeitures of Lands and Goods such Offenders are liable unto.

And first, The Forfeitures of Money, to which they are liable, are threefold;

1. That of twelve Pence for the Absence of one Sunday, or other Holy Day.
2. That of twenty Pounds for the Absence of every Month contained in a Conviction.
3. That of twenty Pounds for the Absence of every Month after a Conviction.

Sect. 1 And first, the Forfeiture of twelve Pence for the Absence of one Sunday, or other Holy Day, depends upon 1 El. 2. by which it is enacted, That all Persons inhabiting within this Realm, or any other the King's Dominions, shall diligently and faithfully, having no lawful or reasonable Excuse to be absent, endeavour to resort to their Parish Church or Chapel accustomed, or upon reasonable Let thereof, to some usual Place, where Common Prayer and such Service of God shall be used, in such Time of Let, upon every Sunday, and other Days ordained and used to be kept as Holy Days, and then and there to abide orderly and soberly, during the Time of the Common Prayer, Preaching, or other Service of God, there to be used and ministered, upon Pain of Punishment by the Censures of the Church, and also upon Pain that every Person so offending shall forfeit for every such Offence twelve Pence.

In the Exposition of this Statute, the following Opinions have been holden.

Sect. 2. I. That the Indictment needs not shew that the Party had no reasonable Excuse for his Absence, or that he is an Inhabitant within this Realm, &c. But that the Defendant, if he have any Matter of this Kind in his Favour, ought to shew it.[36]

Sect. 3. II. That if the Spiritual Court, proceeding upon this Statute, refuse to allow a reasonable Excuse, they may be prohibited; but that if they proceed wholly on their own Canons, they shall not be at all comptrolled by the Common Law, (unless they act in Derogation from it as by questioning a Matter not triable by them, as the Bounds of a Parish, &c.), for they shall be presumed to be the best Judges of their own Laws.[37]

Sect. 4. III. That he who misbehaves himself in the Church, or misses either Morning or Evening Prayer, or goes away before the whole Service is over, is as much within the Statute as he who is wholly absent; and that he who is absent from his own Parish Church, shall be put to prove where he went to Church.[38]

Sect. 5. IV. That the Offence in not coming to Church consisting wholly in a Non-feasance, and not supposing any Fact done, but barely the Omission of what ought to be done, needs not be alledged in any certain

Place; for, properly speaking, it is not committed any where.[39]

Sect. 6. Secondly, The Forfeiture of twenty Pounds for the Absence of a whole Month contained in a Conviction, depends upon 23 El. 1. Par. 5. by which it is enacted, That every Person, above the Age of sixteen Years, who shall not repair to some Church, Chapel, or usual Place of Common Prayer, but forbear the same, contrary to the Tenor of the said Statute of 1 El. 2. and being thereof lawfully convicted, shall forfeit to the King, for every Month which he or she shall so forbear, twenty Pounds.[40]

In the Exposition hereof it hath been resolved,

Sect. 7. I. That this Statute, by inflicting twenty Pounds for a Month's Absence, dispenses not with the Forfeiture of twelve Pence, given by 1 El. 2. for the Absence of one Sunday, for both may well stand together, and the twelve Pence is immediately forfeited upon the Absence of each particular Day.[41]

Sect. 8. II. That these Words, being thereof lawfully convicted, are no more than the Law would have implied, if they had not been expressed, and therefore operate nothing; from whence it follows, That they neither cause the Party to Forfeit any Thing by a Conviction, unless Judgment be given thereon, nor restrain the Forfeiture to such Offences only, as are committed after a previous Conviction, inasmuch as they mean no more than what the Law provides of Common Right in every Case, viz. That the Party shall forfeit nothing till he be convicted.[42]

Sect. 9. III. That he who is condemned on Demurrer, or Nihil dicit, is sufficiently convicted within the Act; for whoever is adjudged, is convict, though it follow not that every one, who is convict, is adjudged, &c.[43]

Sect. 10. IV. That one, who was sick for Part of the Time contained in an Information upon this Statute, shall not be at all excused by reason of such Sickness, if it be proved that he was a Recusant, both before and after; for it shall be intended that he obstinately forbore during that Time.

Sect. 11. V. That the Time of a Month, intended by the Statute, shall be computed not by the Kalendar, but by the Number of Days, allowing 28 Days to each, according to the common Rule of expounding Statutes, which speak generally of a Month.[44]

Sect. 12. Thirdly, The Forfeiture of twenty Pounds for the Absence of every Month after a Conviction, depends upon 28 (commonly called a 29) El. 6. Par. 4. and 3 Jac. 1. 4. Par. 8. 3. by which it is enacted. That every Offender being convicted of not coming to Church, contrary to the Purport of the Statutes above mentioned, shall pay twenty Pounds for every Month after such Conviction, until he shall conform himself, and come to Church.[45]

Sect. 13. As to the second Branch of this Head, viz. What Forfeiture of Lands and Goods such Offenders are liable to, the same depends also upon 29 El. 6. Par. 4. and 3 Jac. 1. 4. Par. 8, 9. by which it is enacted. That if the Offender shall make Default of Payment of the twenty Pounds, both for every Month contained in the Conviction, and also for every Month subsequent, during which he shall not conform himself to the Church, the King shall take, seize and enjoy all his Goods, and two Parts of his Hereditaments, Leases and Farms, to and for the Maintenance and Relief of the same Offender, his Wife, Children, and Family, notwithstanding any prior Conveyance thereof made by such Offender, with Power of Revocation, or to the Use of himself or his Family. Also by the said Statute of 3 Jac. 1. 4. Par. 11. the King may refuse the Penalty of twenty Pounds a Month, though it be tendered according to Law, and thereupon seize two Parts of all the Hereditaments, Leases and Farms, which at the Time of such Seizure shall be, or afterwards shall come to any such Offender, or to any other to his Use, or in Trust for him, or at his Disposition, or whereby or in Consideration whereof he or his Family shall be relieved, maintained or kept, leaving unto him his chief Mansion-House, as Part of his third Part.[46]

In the Construction of these Statutes the following Points have been resolved,

Sect. 14. I. That the King by making his Election given him by 3 Jac. 1. to seize the Offender's Hereditaments, &c. waves the Benefit of the twenty Pounds a Month, and the Power of seizing the Offender's Goods.[47]

Sect. 15. II. That a Recognizance or Bond taken by such Offenders, either in their own Names or in the Names of others to their Use, are within the Statute 29 El. for the Words thereof to this Purpose are, That the King shall take, seize, and enjoy all the Goods, &c. which in a Act of Parliament will include the whole personal Estate; and though a Chose in Action cannot properly be said to be taken or seized, yet may it properly enough be said to be enjoyed.

Sect. 16. III. That no Copyhold Lands are within 29 El. (and by the same Reason it seemeth that they are not within 3 Jac. 1.) in respect of the Prejudice, which accrue to the Lord by the Loss of his Services, &c.[48]

Sect. 17. IV. That the Profits of the land seized by the King by Force of 29 El. for the Nonpayment of the twenty Pounds a Month, ought not to be applied to the Satisfaction thereof, but that the Lands ought to remain in the King's Hands by Way of Pledge, till the whole Forfeiture be paid some other Way; but this Construction of the Statute seeming over severe, it was provided by 3 Jac. 1. 4. Par 5. That the Profits of the said Lands should go towards the Satisfaction of the twenty Pounds.[49]

Sect. 18. It hath been questioned, Whether an Estate conveyed by another in Trust for a Recusant, be liable to be seized by Force of the said Statute of 29 El. because it expresly avoids such Conveyances only as are made by the Recusant himself to his own Use. &c. And perhaps if it shall plainly appear, That an Estate is settled bona fide in Trust for a Recusant, by some Friend of his, upon some other View, and not meerly with an Intent to evade the Statute, it may be reasonable to exempt such a Conveyance out of the Meaning of it; however it is clear from the express Words of 3 Jac. 1. 4. Par. 11. That the King, upon his waving the Forfeiture of the twenty Pounds a Month, may seize two Parts of all the Hereditaments, &c. which shall come to any such Offenders, or to others to their Use, or in Trust for them: Also it is said, that the King may seize an Estate, which is granted to a Recusant in Trust for another; and it is certain that the Statute has made no express Provision for the Cestui que Trust.[50]

As to the second general Head of this Chapter, viz. In what Manner Offenders of this Nature are to be proceeded against for the Forfeitures above mentioned, I shall consider,

1. How they are to be proceeded against for the said Forfeitures of Money, and
2. In what Manner for the said Forfeiture of Lands and Goods.

As to the Prosecution for the said Forfeitures of Money, I shall shew,

1. How they are to be proceeded against for the said Forfeiture of twelve Pence for the Absence of the every Sunday, &c. and
2. In what Manner for the said forfeiture [sic] of twenty Pounds for the Absence of every Month after a Conviction, and
3. In what Manner for the said Forfeiture of twenty Pounds for the Absence of every Month after a Conviction.

Sect. 19. And first, as to that Recovery of the said Forfeiture of twelve Pence for the Absence of every Sunday, it was enacted by 1 El. 2. That the same should be levied by the Churchwardens of the Parish where such Offence should be done, to the Use of the Poor of the same Parish, of the Goods, Lands, and Tenements of such Offenders, by Way of Distress: But this being defective in not showing by whom, or in what Manner such Offenders should be convicted, or by whom the Warrant for levying the said Forfeiture should be granted, it was farther enacted by 3. Jac. 1. 4. Par. 27 That it should be lawful for any one Justice of the Peace of the Limit, Division or Liberty, wherein the said party shall dwell, upon the Confession of the Party, or the Oath of one Witness, to call the said Party before him, and if be shall not make a sufficient Excuse, and due Proof thereof, to the Satisfaction of the said Justice of Peace, that it shall be lawful for the said Justice of Peace to make a Warrant to the Churchwarden of the said Parish, where the said Party shall dwell, to levy 12 Pence for every such Default, by Distress and Sale of the Offender's Goods, rendering the Overplus to the said Offender; and that in Default of such Distress, it shall be lawful for the said Justice of Peace to commit every such Offender to Prison, until the said Forfeiture shall be paid, which shall be employed to the Use of the Poor of the Parish, wherein the Offender shall be resident or abiding at the Time of the Offence.

Sect. 20. As to the second Point, viz. In what Manner the said offenders are to be proceeded against for the said Forfeiture of twenty Pounds for the Absence of every Month contained in a Conviction, I shall consider,

1. In what Manner the same may be recovered at the Suit of the King, and
2. In what Manner at the Suit of an Informer.

And first, as to the Recovery hereof at the King's Suit, I shall consider,

1. In what Manner it may be recovered at the King's Suit by Way of Indictment.
2. In what Manner by Way of Action of Information.

Sect. 21. And first, as to the Recovery hereof at the Suit of the King by Way of Indictment, it was enacted by 23 El. 1. Par. 9. That the Justices of Oyer, Assize, Gaol-Delivery, and Quarter Sessions of the Peace, might enquire of and determine these Offences, within one Year and a Day: But by 29 El. 6, Par. 2. It was ordained, That all such Convictions should be in the King's Bench, or at the Assizes, or General Gaol-Delivery, and not elsewhere: However by 3 Jac. 1. 4. Par. 7. The Jurisdiction of the Sessions is revived.[51]

Sect. 22. Also it is farther enacted by 29 El. 6. Par. 5. and 3 Jac. 1. 4. Par. 7. That upon an Indictment at the Assizes, Gaol-Delivery or General Sessions of the Peace, Proclamation shall be made that the Offender render himself to the Sheriff before the next Assizes, Gaol-Delivery or Sessions; and that if the shall not then appear of Record, upon such Default recorded, the same shall be a Conviction in Law, as if a Trial by Verdict on the Indictment had been recorded. And by Par. 9. Every such Conviction shall be certified into the Exchequer, &c.[52]

Sect. 23. In the Construction hereof it hath been resolved. I. That such a Conviction shall not be look'd on as a Judgment; for the Words are, It shall be a Conviction in Law, as if a Trial,&c. had been recorded: And consequently that it cannot be reversed by Writ of Error, which cannot be brought on any Record, which is not a Judgment, and therefore that the Party has no other Remedy against an insufficient Conviction, but to remove it into the Exchequer, and quash it there. Also upon the same Ground it has been holden, That a Forfeiture due to the King, by Force of such a Conviction, shall not be taken to be within the Exception of a general Pardon, which excepts all Forfeitures, &c. converted to a Debt by Judgment.[53]

Sect. 24. II. That if the Proclamation do not pursue the Statute, as if it appoint that the Body shall be rendered at next Sessions, &c. whereas by the Statute it ought to order a Render to the Sheriff, and that before the next Sessions, the Conviction is insufficient.[54]

Sect. 25. III. That an actual personal Appearance of the Defendant at the next Sessions, &c. will no Way avail him, unless the same be entered of Record.[55]

Sect. 26. It hath been holden, That a Man cannot be convicted by Force of this Statute upon a Default on a Proclamation, &c. in the King's Bench, because this Court is not mentioned in the Statute: But perhaps this Opinion may justly be questioned, because the Court of King's Bench being the supreme Court of Assize, and Gaol-Delivery, &c. in the County where it sits, it seems that a statute, by giving any Power to the Courts of Assize or Gaol-Delivery, does impliedly give the same to the Court of King's Bench, unless it have some restrictive Words to the contrary.[56]

Sect. 27. If the Defendant do appear, there is no Doubt but that the Proceedings ought to be according to the common Course of Law upon other Indictments in all Respects, except those which are within the Restraint of 3 Jac. 1. 4. Par. 16, 17. by which it is enacted, That no such Indictment, nor any Proclamation, Outlawry or other Proceeding thereupon, shall at any Time hereafter be avoided, discharged or reversed, by reason of any Default in Form or Lack of Form, or other Defect whatsoever, (other than by direct Traverse to the Point of not coming to Church, &c.) but the same Indictment shall stand in Force and be proceeded upon; any such Default of Form, or other Defect whatsoever

notwithstanding, unless the party so indicted shall conform, &c.[57]

Sect. 28. However it hath been resolved,[58]

I. That the Party is only restrained from taking Advantage of Defects in the Record itself, and that he may plead any collateral Matter, as a Pardon, or Autrefoits convict, &c.

Sect. 29. II. That he may even reverse a Judgment after Verdict for any such Defect in the Record itself, as tends to the King's Prejudice, as the Omission of a Capiatur, &c. And that he may reverse an Outlawry for any Common Defect, upon putting in Bail, and traversing the Indictment as to the Point of not coming to Church, which is very agreeable to the Purport of the whole Clause, the latter Part whereof seems manifestly to qualify the Generality of the former.[59]

Sect. 30. Secondly, As to the Recovery of the said Forfeiture by way of Action of Information at the King's Suit, it was enacted by 35 El. 1. Par. 10. That all and every the said Pains, Duties, Forfeitures, and Payments, shall and may be recovered and levied to her Majesty's Use, by Action of Debt, Bill, Plaint, Information or otherwise, in any of the Courts commonly called the King's Bench, Common Pleas, or Exchequer, in such Sort and in all Respects, as by the ordinary Course of the common Laws of this Realm, any other Debt due by any such Person in any other Case should or may be recovered or levied, wherein no Essoin, Protection or Wager of Law shall be admitted or allowed.

Sect. 31. It is said, That the principal End of making this Clause, was to enable the Queen to proceed against the Husband for the Recusancy of his Wife, which she could not do by Virtue of any of the former Statutes, by which she had no other Way of proceeding but by Indictment, and consequently could not charge the Husband for the Forfeiture of the Wife, because she could not make him a Party to the Suit, as she may by Force of this Statute; However, it is said, That on a Conviction of the Wife upon an Indictment, the Lands and Leases, which the Husband has in her Right, may be seized by the Exchequer-Process.[60]

Sect. 32. As to the second Particular, viz. In what Manner an Informer may proceed for the Forfeitures aforesaid, it is enacted by 23 El. 1. Par. 11. That all Forfeitures of any Sums of Money limited by that Act, shall be divided into three equal Parts, whereof one Third shall be to the Queen, to her own Use, one other Third to the Queen, for the Relief of the Poor in the Parish where the Offence shall be committed, to be delivered by the Warrant of the principal Officers in the Receipt of the Exchequer, without further Warrant from her Majesty; and the other Third to such Person as will sue for the same, in any Court of Record, by Action of Debt, Bill, Plaint, or Information, in which Suit no Essoin, &c. shall be allowed: And that every Person which shall forfeit any Sums of Money by Virtue of that Act, and shall not be able, or shall fail to pay the same within three Months after Judgment thereof given, shall be committed to Prison, there to remain until he have paid the same Sums, or conform himself to go to Church, and there do as is aforesaid.[61]

Sect. 33. It has been objected, that this Clause shall not extend to the said Forfeiture of twenty Pounds a Month for not coming to Church, because the same is by the former Part of this Statute given expresly to the Queen, whereas the Forfeitures for saying or hearing Mass, and keeping an unlicensed Schoolmaster, are inflicted by the same Statute indefinitely, and not expresly given to any one; from which it is argued, That this latter Clause of Distribution ought only to be applied to the said indefinite Clauses, and not to take from a Queen any Part of that, which was expresly given her before; yet it has been answered and resolved, That it shall equally extend to all; for the Limitation of the Forfeiture to the Queen is more Surplus, and no more than the Law would have implied, & expressio eorum, quae tacite insunt, nihil operator.[62]

Sect. 34. Also it has been resolved, That an Informer may sue, not only for the third Part which belongs to him, but for the whole Penalty in the Behalf of himself and the King, and that the Judgment shall be that they shall recover &c.[63]

Sect. 35. Also it has been adjudged, that neither the above mentioned Clause of 29 El. 6. Which orders, That all Convictions upon 23 El. shall be certified into the Exchequer, and also that the Offender shall pay to Queen twenty Pounds for every Month contained in the Indictment, &c. nor the said Clause in the 35 El. 1 by which it is enacted, That all the said Pains, &c. shall be recovered to the Queen's Use, do take away the Suit of the Informer, against one not proceeded against by the King, or the third Part of the Penalty given him by 23 Eliz. For the plain Purport of both these Acts is to further the Punishment of Recusants, and therefore, inasmuch as they are in the Affirmative, and consistent with 23 El. they shall not be construed to abrogate any Part of it.[64]

Sect. 36. Moreover it is manifest, that 29 El. 6. Extends only to the King's Suit by Indictment, for the Word Indictment is mentioned almost in every Clause.

Sect. 37. And it also follows from hence, That the second Paragraph of the said Statute of 29 El. which enacts, That Convictions for this Offence shall be only at Assizes, Gaol-Delivery, or the King's Bench, restrains only Convictions upon Indictments, and consequently does not any Way impeach the Jurisdiction of the Common Pleas or Exchequer, as to Informations, &c.[65]

Sect. 38. It seems that better Opinion (upon comparing all the Books together, which differ much from one another both in stating the Cases, and giving the Reasons of the Judgments relating to this Matter,) that a Conviction at the King's Suit, whether strictly regular or erroneous, may be pleaded to a Suit by an Informer, because, while it stands in Force, it makes the Party liable to the Forfeiture of twenty Pounds a Month, and no one ought to be punished twice for the same Offence: But it hath been resolved, that an erroneous, and strongly holden that a regular, Conviction by Proclamation cannot be pleaded to a new Suit by the King, because such a Conviction is of no greater Effect than a Conviction by Verdict, and consequently the King may wave it and begin anew.[66]

Sect. 39. But it seems very doubtful, whether the Conviction of a Feme Covert upon an Indictment can be pleaded to an Information against her and her Husband, because the Husband is not liable to pay the Forfeiture recovered upon an Indictment.

Sect. 40. It seems that the ordinary Method of recovering the said Forfeiture of twenty Pounds for every Month contained in a Conviction, either at the Suit of the King, or of an Informer, may sufficiently appear from what has been already said; but there is an extraordinary Remedy provided by the same Statute of 29 El. 6. to enforce the Party to take Care of the Payment of the Forfeiture of the twenty Pounds for every Month contained in an Indictment, whereon he shall be convicted, by making his Lands and Goods liable to be seized by the King for the Nonpayment thereof into the Exchequer, upon such of the Terms of Easter or Michaelmas, as shall be next after his Conviction; but this extends not to a Conviction by Way of Action, or Information, as more fully appears from the two next Sections.

Sect. 41. As to the third Point, viz. In what Manner the Forfeiture of twenty Pounds for the Absence of every Month after a Conviction is to be recovered, it seems needless to enquire how far it may be recovered by an Action or Information for it at the King's Suit, inasmuch as the said Statutes of 29 El. 6. & 3 Jac. 1. have made a most effectual Provision for the Payment of it, by expresly enacting, That every such Offender, being once convicted, shall for every Month after such Conviction, without any other Indictment or Conviction, pay into the Exchequer twice in the Year, viz, in every Easter and Michaelmas Term, as much at shall then remain unpaid, after the Rate of twenty Pounds for every Month after a Conviction, and that for a Default herein the King may seize all the Goods, and two Parts of the Hereditaments of such an Offender, &c.

Sect. 42. But it seemeth that these Clauses extend not to any Conviction upon an Information, or Action, &c. but only to a Conviction upon an Indictment, for there is no other Suit referred to besides that of Indictment; also it is said, that the said Clauses extend to no Convictions by Verdict or otherwise, unless Judgment be given thereon; because, till then nothing is forfeited. And from the same Ground it seems to follow, That they would not have extended to a Conviction by Default upon Proclamation, if there had been no other Words in the Statute to this Purpose, than those by which it is enacted, That such a Default recorded shall be as sufficient a Conviction in Law of the said Offence, whereof the Party standeth indicted, as if upon the same Indictment a Trial by Verdict thereupon had proceeded and been recorded, which Words of themselves can by no Means make such a Conviction amount to a Judgment after Verdict, without which there can be no Forfeiture upon any other Conviction; and therefore it seemeth that the Forfeiture caused by such a Conviction must depend upon the other Clauses of the said Statutes, and the constant Tenor of our Law Books, which seem to suppose that a Person so convicted shall be liable to the said Forfeitures, as much as one, against whom a Judgment is expresly given.[67]

Sect. 43. As to the second general Branch of this Head, viz. In what Manner Offenders of this Nature are to be prosecuted for the Forfeiture of Lands or Goods, it appeareth from the 13th, 14th, 15th, 17th, 18th, 40th and 41st Sections of this Chapter, that the King hath his Election either to seize all the Goods and two Parts of the Hereditaments and Leases of the Offender, upon his making Default in the Payment of twenty Pounds, both for every Month contained in an Indictment, whereon he shall be convicted, and also for every Month subsequent, or else to refuse the said Penalty of twenty Pounds a Month, and thereupon to seize two Parts of the Hereditaments and Leases of the Offender.

Sect. 44. It also appeareth from what hath been said in the forty-second Section of this Chapter, that the King hath this Advantage of seizing the Lands and Goods of the Offender upon no other Conviction, but such as followeth an Indictment, nor even upon such a Conviction without a Judgment, unless it be caused by a Default upon a Proclamation; therefore I shall add no more to this Head, except these two following Observations:

Sect. 45. I. That the King cannot seize the Lands, till it appears by the Return of an Inquisition to that Purpose to be awarded, of what Lands, &c. the Offender was seized, because the King's Title to Lands ought always to appear of Record.[68]

Sect. 46. II. That the King, according to the better Opinion, may seize the Goods, but not grant them over, without such an Inquisition.[69]

Sect. 47. As to the third general Head of this Chapter, viz. What Disabilities, and other Inconveniences, Offenders of this Kind are liable unto, it is enacted by 3 Jac. 1. 5. Par. 8. That no Recusant convict shall practice either the Common or Civil Law, or Physick, or use the Trade of an Apothecary, or be judge or Minister of any Court, or bear any Office in Camp, Troop, or Company of Soldiers, or in any Ship, or Fortress, but shall be utterly disabled for the same, and forfeit for every such Offence one hundred Pounds.

Sect. 48. Also it is farther enacted by the said Statue of 3 Jac. 1. 5. Par. 22. That such Recusants, as shall be convicted at the Time of the Death of any Testator, or at the Time of the Granting of any Administration, shall be disabled to be Executors or Administrators; and that no such Persons shall be Guardians to any Child, &c.

Sect. 49. And it is enacted by 23 El. 1. That every Person forbearing the Church twelve Months, shall on Certificate thereof into the King's Bench by the Ordinary, a Justice of Assize and Gaol-Delivery, or a Justice of Peace of the County where such Offender shall dwell or be, be bound with two sufficient Sureties in the Sum of two hundred Pounds at the least to the Good Behaviour, and so continue bound until such Offender shall conform himself, &c.

Sect. 50. As to the fourth general Head of this Chapter, viz. By what Means Offenders of this Nature may be discharged from the said Forfeitures, &c. it is enacted by 23 El. 1. Par. 10. That every Person guilty of the abovementioned Offences, who shall before he be thereof indicted, or at his Arraignment or Trial before Judgment, submit and conform himself before the Bishop of the Diocese where he shall be resident, or before the Justices where he shall be indicted, arraigned, or tried, (having not before made like Submission at any his Trial, being indicted for his first like Offence,) shall upon his Recognition of such Submission in open Assizes, or Sessions of the County where such Person shall be resident, be discharged of all and every the said Offences against the said Statute, &c.

Sect. 51. Also it is enacted by 29 El. 6. Par. 6. That whensoever any such Offender shall make Submission, and become conformable, according to the Form limited by the above mentioned Statue of 23 El. 1. or shall fortune to die, that then no Forfeiture of twenty Pounds for any Month, or Seizure of the Lands of the same Offender, from and after such Submission and Conformity, or Death, and full Satisfaction of all the Arrearages of twenty Pounds Monthly, before such Seizure due or payable, shall ensue, or be continued against such Offender, so long as the same Person shall continue in coming to Divine Service, according to the Intent of the said Statute.

Sect. 52. But this Statute being thought not to give sufficient Encouragement to such Persons to conform to the Church, because, by the most favourable Construction that could be made, it still obliged them to pay such Debts as were due to the King by Force of a Judgment, it was enacted by 1 Jac. 1. 4. Par. 2. That a Recusant, conforming himself according to the Meaning of the above mentioned Statutes, &c. shall, during such Conformity, be discharged of all Penalties, which he might otherwise sustain by reason of his Recusancy.[70]

Sect. 53. And it hath been resolved, that such Conformity may, by Force of this Statute, be pleaded, as well to the Suit of an Informer as to that of the King; and that after Judgment it will be a good Ground for an Audita Querela against an Informer, and also may be pleaded against the King before Execution awarded.[71]

Sect. 54. However, there seems to be no Remedy for such a Person to get a Restitution of such of the Profits of his Lands, as have been actually taken by the King.[72]

Sect. 55. It seemed very doubtful, before 1 Jac. 1. 4. how far the Lands of a Heir were chargeable with the Forfeitures incurred by his Ancestor in respect of his Recusancy, but this seems to be for the most part cleared by the 3d, 4th and 5th Paragraphs of that Statute, by which it is enacted, That the Heir, if be he no Recusant, or were such, and conform, shall be freed from all Penalties happening upon him by reason of his Ancestor's Recusancy, unless the two parts of the Lands were seized by the King in the Ancestor's Life, in which Case they shall continue in the King's Hands till the whole Debt shall be levied. But it is farther enacted, that the King shall not extend the other third Part of the Lands for the said Penalty.[73]

Sect. 56. It seems by the manifest Purport of this Statute, that the Heir of a Recusant, being also a Recusant himself, has no Remedy, but by conforming, to free his Fee-Simple Lands from any of the Forfeitures incurred by the Conviction of his Ancestor, whether the Lands were seized in the Ancestor's Life of not: However, it is said, that the Land in Fee-Tail, which he claims from such Ancestor, is no Way chargeable after the Death of the Ancestor, with any Forfeitures upon a Conviction by Proclamation (which has no greater Effect than a Verdict recorded) but only with such, as are due upon a Judgment; which, as it is agreed, charge an Heir in Tail by Force of 33 H. 8. 39. Par. 29. which makes an Heir chargeable with the Debts of his Ancestor by Judgment, Recognizance, Obligation, or other Specialty; but perhaps the Authority of those Opinions may justly be questioned: For tho' a Conviction by Proclamation amount not to a Judgment, yet surely it cannot be inferior to an Obligation: And therefore perhaps the Books cited in the Margin are misreported in this Particular, and the more proper Distinction may be this: That an Heir in Tail is chargeable only with the Forfeitures for those Months, which are contained in the Indictment itself, on which a Judgment is afterwards given, or a Conviction by Proclamation recorded, and not for the Months subsequent to such Conviction, or Proclamation, inasmuch as the first seem to be Debts appearing of Record, the latter not; and the same Distinction seems applicable to such Lands in Tail of an Heir who conforms, as were seized in the Ancestor's Life; but it is clear, that such only of his Lands as were so seized are in any Case liable, whether he claim them in Fee-Simple or Tail.[74]

Of the Offences of suffering others to be absent from Church.

HAVING shewn how far all Persons in general are punishable for their own Absence from the Church, I am now to shew how far they may be punished for the Absence of others; as to which it is enacted by 3 Jac. 1. 4. Par. 32, 33, 34. That whosoever shall retain or keep in his Service, Fee, or Livery, or shall willingly maintain, retain, relieve, keep, or harbour, in his House, any Servant, Sojourner, or Stranger, (except a Father, or Mother wanting without Fraud or Covin, other Habitation, or sufficient Maintenance, and also except a Ward, or person committed to the Custody of another by Authority) who shall not go to some Church or Chapel or usual Place of Common Prayer, to hear Divine Service, but shall forbear the same for the Space of one Month, &c. shall for every Month, that he shall keep such Servant, &c. forfeit ten Pounds.

CHAP. XII.
Of Popish Recusancy.

AND now we are come to Offence against the Established Church, more immediately relating to those of the Popish Religion, for the better understanding whereof I shall consider:

1. The above mentioned Offence of not coming to Church, so far as it particularly concerns those of this Persuasion.
2. The Offence of saying or hearing Mass, or other Popish Service.
3. The Offence of not making a Declaration against Popery.
4. The Offence of promoting or encouraging the Popish Religion.

And first as to the said Offence of not coming to Church, so far as it particularly concerns those of the Popish Religion, who in respect hereof are commonly called Popish Recusants, I shall consider,

1. How far such Recusants are punishable in their own Persons.
2. How far they make others liable to be punished.

As to the first of these Points, viz. How far such Recusants are punishable in their own Persons, it is to be observed, that they are not only liable to all the Forfeitures and Disabilities, and other Inconveniences mentioned in Chap. 10. but also to many particular Disabilities, Restraints and Forfeitures, and other Inconveniences to which no others are liable.

And first they are put under the following Disabilities,

1. That of bringing an Action.
2. That of presenting to a Church.
3. That of bearing any public Office, or Charge.
4. That of claiming any Part of a Husband’s personal Estate.
5. That of claiming an Estate by Courtesy, or by Way of Dower, after a Marriage against Law.

Secondly they are put under the following Restraints,

1. From going above five Miles from Home.
2. From coming to Court.
3. From keeping Arms.
4. From coming within ten Miles of London.

Thirdly, They are liable to the following Forfeitures,

1. That of two Parts of a Jointure or Dower.
2. That of twenty Pounds for not receiving the Sacrament yearly after Conformity.
3. That of one Hundred Pounds for an unlawful Marriage.

4. That of one hundred Pounds for an Omission of lawful Baptism.
5. That of twenty Pounds for an unlawful Burial.

Lastly, They are subject to the following Inconveniences,

1. That their Houses may be searched for Reliques, whether they be Men or Women.
2. If they be Women and married, that they may be committed, &c.

Sect. 1. As to the first of the said Disabilities, viz. That of bringing an Action, it is enacted by 3 Jac. 1. 5. Par. 11, 12. That every Popish Recusant convict shall stand to all Intents and Purposes disabled, as a Person lawfully excommunicated, and as if such Person had been so denounced and excommunicated according to the Laws of this Realm until he or she shall conform, &c. And that every Person, sued by such Person so disabled, may plead the same in disabling of such Plaintiff, as if he or she were excommunicated by Sentence in the Ecclesiastical Court. Except the action of such Recusant do concern some Hereditament or Lease, which is not to be seized into the King's Hands by Force of some Law concerning Recusancy.

In the Exposition hereof it hath been resolved,

Sect. 2. I. That the Plea of such a Conviction, like all other Pleas in Disability, ought to be pleaded before Imparlance, and also to conclude with a Demand if the Plaintiff shall be answered.[75]

Sect. 3. II. That such Plea ought also to shew before what Justices the Conviction was, that the Court may know where to send for a Certificate thereof, if it be denied; and also that the Record itself, or at least a Certificate thereof, ought to be immediately produced, according to the general Rule of the Law, as to all dilatory Pleas grounded upon Records.[76]

Sect. 4. III. That if after such a Plea it be certified that the Plaintiff hath conformed, and thereupon the Defendant be ordered to plead in chief, and then the Plaintiff relapse and be convict again, the Defendant cannot plead the same in Disability a second Time.[77]

Sect. 5. IV. That it must appear either from the Conviction itself, or by proper Averments, that the Plaintiff is convicted of Popish Recusancy, because no Recusants, except Popish ones, are within the said Clause; however that this is sufficiently set forth, by alledging that the Plaintiff being Papalis Recusance, was indicted and convicted secundum formam Statuti, &c.[78]

Sect. 6. And some have gone so far as to hold, That all Popish Recusants convict may be taken up by the Writ * De Excommunicato capiendo, and that they are not to be admitted as competent Witnesses in any Cause; but this seems to be a Construction over severe: For inasmuch as this, like all other Penal Statutes, ought to be construed strictly, and the Words thereof are no more than, That such Persons shall stand disabled, &c. as Persons lawfully excommunicate, &c. and the Purport thereof may be fully satisfied by the Disability to bring any Action, it seems to be too rigorous to carry them farther.[79]

Sect. 7. As to the second of the said Disabilities, viz. That of presenting to a Church, the same being at this Day extended by 12 Ann. 2. to all Persons making Profession of the Popish Religion, I shall refer the Reader, for the Matters relating to this Head, to Chap. 15, wherein is shewn how penal it is, barely to profess the said Religion; and I shall only take Notice in this Place, that by 1 Gul. & Mar. 26. Par. 4. If the Trustee, Mortgagee, or Grantee of any Avoidance, whereof the Trust shall be for any Popish Recusant convict, shall present without giving Notice in Writing of the Avoidance, to the University, &c. within three Months after the Avoidance, he forfeits five hundred Pounds.

Sect. 8. As to the third of the said Disabilities, viz. That of bearing any public Office or Charge, it is enacted by 3 Jac. 1. 5. Par. 9. That no Popish Recusant convict shall exercise any publick Office, or Charge in the Commonwealth, but shall be utterly disabled to exercise the same, by himself or his Deputy.

Sect. 9. It is observable, that this Clause is more strongly penned than that, which immediately precedes it, relating to all Recusants in general, as to the following Particulars:

1. That this extends to all public Offices and Charges in general, whereas the former extends only to those which are particularly enumerated.
2. That this expressly disables a Popish Recusant to exercise such an Office by himself or his Deputy, but the other says nothing at all of the Exercise of an Office by a Deputy.

Sect. 10. As to Fourth of the said Disabilities, viz. That of claiming any Part of the Husband's personal Estate, it is enacted by 3 Jac. 1. 5. Par. 10. That every Woman, being a Popish Recusant convict (her Husband not standing convicted of Popish Recusancy) which shall not conform her self and remain conform'd, but shall forbear to repair to some Church or usual Place of Common Prayer, and there hear Divine Service and Sermon, if any then be, and receive the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, according to the Laws of this Realm, by the Space of one whole Year next before the Death of her said Husband, shall not only be disabled to be Executrix or Administratix of her said Husband, but also to have or demand any Part of her said Husband's Goods or Chattels, by any Law, Custom or Usage whatsoever; and by 3 Jac. 1. 5. Par. 13. Every Woman is put under the like Disability, being a Popish Recusant, who shall be married otherwise than according to the Church of England.

Sect. 11. As to the fifth of the said Disabilities, viz. That of claiming an Estate by the Courtesy, or by Way of Dower, &c. it is enacted by 3 Jac. 1. 5. Par. 13. That every Man who, being a Popish Recusant convict, shall be married otherwise that in some open Church or Chapel, and otherwise than according to the Orders of the Church of England, by a Minister lawfully authorized, shall be disabled to have any Estate, as Tenant by the Courtesy; and that every Woman, being a Popish Recusant convict, who shall be married in other Form than as aforesaid, shall be disabled to claim her Dower or Jointure, or Widow's Estate, &c.

Sect. 12. As to the first of the above mentioned Restraints, viz. That from going above five Miles from Home, &c. it is enacted by 35 El. 2. and 3 Jac. 1. 5. Par. 6, 7. That every Popish Recusant convict shall repair to his Place of Dwelling, &c. and not remove above five Miles from thence, unless he be urged by Process, &c. or have a Licence from the Privy Council, &c. or under the Hands and Seals of four Justices of Peace, with the Assent in Writing of the Lieutenant of the County, or of the Bishop &c. (every Licence of which Kind by Justices of Peace must express both the particular Cause and the Time for which it is given, and ought not to be granted without a previous Oath of some reasonable Cause,) under Pain of forfeiting all his Goods and Hereditaments, (whether Freehold or Copyhold,) for his Life, or of abjuring the Realm, if he be not worth twenty Marks a Year, or forty Pounds in Goods, unless he recant before Conviction, and also continue conformable.[80]

Sect. 13. Note, That the Privy Council may grant such Licence without any Special Cause or Oath, &c. but that the Justices of Peace cannot: And it hath been resolved, That in Pleading a Licence of Justices and Peace, you must expresly shew, that it was made under their Hands and Seals, and also set forth the Cause in particular for which it was granted, and the Time for which it was limited, and that the Party was sworn to the Truth of such Cause, &c.[81]

Sect. 14. It is said, That if the same Person be both a Justice Peace and a

Lieutenant, he cannot both join in a Licence as Justice of Peace, and also give his Assent as Lieutenant, but can only act in one Capacity.[82]

Sect. 15. It seems that the Miles shall be computed according to the English Manner, allowing 5280 Foot, or 1760 Yards to each Mile, and that the same shall be reckoned not by strait Lines, as a Bird or Arrow may fly, but according to the nearest and most usual Way.[83]

Sect. 16. As to the second of the above mentioned Restraints, viz. That which relates to the coming to Court, it is enacted by 3 Jac. 1. 5 Par. 2. That no Popish Recusant convict shall come into the Court or House where the King or his Heir apparent shall be, unless he be commanded so to do by the King, upon Pain of one hundred Pounds, &c. And it is farther enacted by 30 Car. 2. St. 2. Par. 5, 6. That every Popish Recusant convict, who shall come advisedly into, or remain in the Presence of the King and Queen, or shall come into the Court or House where they or any of them reside, shall be disabled to hold or execute any Office or Place of Trust Civil or Military, or to sue in Law or Equity, or to be an Executor, &c. or capable of any Legacy or Deed of Gift, and shall forfeit for every wilfull Offence five hundred Pounds, unless such Person do within the Term next after such his coming or remaining, take the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, and make the Declaration against Transubstantiation and the Invocation of Saints, &c. in the Court of Chancery.

Sect. 17. As to the Third of the above mentioned Restraints, viz. That which relates to the keeping of Arms, it is enacted by 3 Jac. 1. 5 Par. 27, 28, 29. That all such Armour, Gun-powder, and Munition, of whatsoever Kinds, as any Popish Recusant convict shall have in his own House or elsewhere, or in the Possession of any other at his Disposition, shall he taken from him by Warrant of four Justices of Peace at their General or Quarter-Sessions, (except such necessary Weapons as shall be allowed him by the said four Justices, for the Defence of his Person or House) and that the said Armour, &c. so taken, shall be kept at the Cost of such Recusant, in such Place as the said four Justices at their said Sessions shall appoint: And that if any such Recusant having such Armour, &c. or if any other Person who shall have any such Armour, &c. to the Use of such Recusant, shall refuse to discover to the said Justices, or any of them, what Armour he hath, or shall let or hinder the Delivery thereof to any of the said Justices, or to any other Person authorized by their Warrant to take the same, that then every Person so offending shall forfeit his said Armour, &c. and also be imprisoned for three Months without Bail, by Warrant from any Justices of Peace of such County. And it is further enacted, That notwithstanding the taking away such Armour, &c. yet such Recusant shall be charged with the maintaining of the same, and with the providing of a Horse, &c. in such Sort as others of his Majesty's Subjects. Also it is farther enacted by 1 Will. & Mar. 15. That no reputed Papist refusing to make the said Declaration against Popery, mentioned in 30 Car. shall keep Arms; as it is set forth more at large Chap. 14. Sect. 4.

Sect. 18. As to the fourth of the above mentioned Restraints, viz. That which relates to the coming within ten Miles of London, it is enacted by 3 Jac. 1. 5 Par. 4, 5. That no Popish Recusant, &c. shall remain within the Compass of ten Miles of London under Pain of one hundred Pounds, except such Persons as, at the Time of the said Act, did use some Trade, Mystery, or manual Occupation in London, &c. and such at shall have their only Dwelling in London, &c. Also reputed Papists, refusing to make the Declaration mentioned in the precedent Sections, are to be removed from London, &c. by Force of 1 Will. & Mar. 9. which is set forth more at large in Chap. 14. Sect. 3.

Sect. 19. As to the first of the above mentioned Forfeitures, viz. That of two Parts of a Jointure or Dower, it is enacted by 3 Jac. 1. 5. Par. 10. That every married Woman, being a Popish Recusant convict, (her Husband not standing convicted of Popish Recusancy) who shall not conform herself and remain conformed, but shall forbear to repair to some Church or usual Place of Common Prayer, and there to hear Divine Service and Sermon, if any then be, and receive the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, according to the Laws of this Realm, within one Year next before the Death of her said Husband, shall forfeit to the King the Profits of two Parts of her Jointure and Dower of any Hereditaments of her said Husband, &c.

Sect. 20. As to the second of the above mentioned Forfeitures, viz. That of twenty Pounds, &c. for not receiving the Sacrament yearly after Conformity, it is enacted by 3 Jac. 1. 4. Par. 2, 3. That if any Popish Recusant convict, who hath conformed himself to the Church, &c. shall not receive the Sacrament in his own Parish Church, &c. within one Year after his Conformity, he shall forfeit twenty Pounds, and for the second Year forty Pounds, and for every Year after sixty Pounds, &c.

Sect. 21. As to the third of the above mentioned Forfeitures, viz. That of one hundred Pounds for an unlawful Marriage, it is enacted by 3 Jac. 1. 5. Par. 13. That every Popish Recusant convict, who shall be married to a Woman who is no Inheritrix, otherwise than according to the Church of England, shall forfeit one hundred Pounds.

Sect. 22. As to the fourth of the above mentioned forfeitures, viz. That of one hundred Pounds for the Omission of a lawful Baptism, it is enacted by 3 Jac. 1. 5. Par. 14. That every Popish Recusant, who shall not cause his or her Child to be baptized, within one Month after its Birth, by a lawful Minister, &c. shall forfeit one hundred Pounds, &c.

Sect. 23. As to the fifth of the above mentioned Forfeitures, viz. That of twenty Pounds for an unlawful Burial, it is enacted by 3 Jac. 1. 5. Par. 15. That if any Popish Recusant, not being excommunicate, shall be buried in any other Place than in the Church or Churchyard, or not according to the Ecclesiastical Laws of this Realm, the Executors, &c. of such Recusant, knowing the same, or the Party that causeth him to be so buried, shall forfeit twenty Pounds, &c.

Sect. 24. As to the Inconvenience to which all such Offenders are liable, viz. That of having their Houses searched for Reliques, &c. it is enacted by 3 Jac. 1. 5. Par. 26. That any two Justices of Peace, and all Mayors, Bailiffs, and chief Officers of Cities and Towns Corporate, in their respective Jurisdictions, may search the House and Lodgings of every Popish Recusant convict for Popish Books and Reliques; and that if any Altar, Pix, Beads, Pictures, or such like Popish Relique, or any Popish Book, be found in the Custody of such Person, as, in the Opinion of the said Justices, &c. shall be unmeet for him or her to have or use, it shall be defaced and burnt, if it be meet to be burnt, and if it be a Crucifix, or other Relique of any Price, the same shall be defaced at the General Quarter-Sessions in the County where it shall be found, and then restored to the Owner.

Sect. 25. As to the Inconvenience to which such Offenders being Femes-Covert are liable, viz. that of being committed, it is enacted by 7 Jac. 1. 6. Par. 28. That if any married Woman, being a Popish Recusant convict, shall not, within three Months after her Conviction, conform herself, and repair to Church and receive the Sacrament, &c. she may be committed to Prison by one of the Privy Council, or by the Bishop, if she be a Baroness; or if under that Degree by two Justices of Peace, whereof one to be of the Quorum, there to remain till she perform, &c. unless the Husband will pay to the King ten Pounds a Month for her Offence, or else the third Part of all his Lands, &c. at the Choice of the Husband, &c.

Sect. 26. And now I am to consider in the second Place, how far such Recusants make others liable to be punished; as to which it is to be observed, That the Husband of a Popish Recusant convict is not only liable to the Forfeiture of ten Pounds a Month for the Absence of any of his Servants from Church, by Force of 1 Jac. 1. which is set forth more at large in the foregoing Chapter, but is also utterly disabled, by the ninth Paragraph of the said Statute, to exercise any Publick Office or Charge in the Commonwealth by himself or by his Deputy; (except such Husband himself, and his Children, which shall be above the Age of nine Years abiding with him, and his Servants in the Houshold, shall once every Month at least, not having any reasonable Excuse to the contrary, repair to some Church or Chapel usual for Divine Service, and there hear Divine Service; and the said Husband, and such his Children and Servants, as are of meet Age, receive the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, at such Times as are limited by the Laws of this Realm, and do bring up his said Children in the true Religion.)

Sect. 27. Also it is farther exacted by the said Statute of 3 Jac. 1. 5. Par. 26. That the House of one whose Wife is a Popish Recusant convict, may be searched by any two Justices of Peace, &c. for Popish Books, &c.

CHAP. XIII.

Of Offences in saying or hearing Mass or other Popish Service.

Sect. 1. AS to the Offence in saying or hearing Mass, it is enacted by 23 El. 1. Par. 4. That every Person, who shall say or sing Mass, being, therefore lawfully convict, shall forfeit two hundred Marks, and be committed to Prison in the next Gaol, there to remain by the Space of one Year, and from thenceforth till he have paid the said Sum of two hundred Marks; and that every Person, who shall willingly hear Mass, shall forfeit the Sum of one hundred Marks, and suffer a Year's Imprisonment.

Sect. 2. And it is enacted by 11 & 12 Will. 3. 4. Par. 2, 3, 4, 5. That every Person, who shall apprehend any Popish Bishop, Priest, or Jesuit, and prosecute him to Conviction for saying Mass, or exercising any other Part of the Function of a Popish Bishop or Priest, shall receive one hundred Pounds of the Sheriff, and that every such Popish Bishop, &c. (except, being a Foreigner, be he entered in the Secretary's Office, and officiate only in the House of a Foreign Minister,) shall be adjudged to perpetual Imprisonment.

CHAP. XIV.

Of the Offence of not making a Declaration against Popery.

THE Offence of refusing to make a Declaration against some of the principal Doctrines of the Popish Religion puts all Persons under the following Restraints:

1. From sitting in Parliament.
2. From holding a Place at Court.
3. From living within ten Miles of London.
4. From keeping Arms.

Also it puts them under a Disability of presenting to a Church.

Sect. 1. As to the first of the above mentioned Restraints. viz. That which relates to the sitting in Parliament, it is enacted by 30 Car. 2. Stat. 2. Chap. 1. That no Peer shall vote or make his Proxy in the House of Peers, or sit there during any Debate; and that no Member of the House of Commons shall vote or sit there during any Debate after the Speaker is chosen, until such Peer or Member shall take the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, and make a Declaration of his Belief that there is no Transubstantiation in the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper; and that the Invocation or Adoration of the Virgin Mary, or any other Saint, and the Sacrifice of the Mass, as they are now used in the Church of Rome, are Superstitious and Idolatrous, &c. on Pain that every such Offender shall be adjudged a Popish Recusant convict, and disabled to hold or execute any Office, &c. or from thenceforth to sit or vote in either House of Parliament, to sue in Law or Equity, or to be Guardian, Executor or Administrator, or capable of any Legacy or Deed of Gift, and shall forfeit for every wilful Offence five hundred Pounds.

Sect. 2. As to the second of the above mentioned Restraints, viz. That which relates to the holding a Place at Court, it is enacted by the said Statute of 30 Car. 2. Stat. 2. Par. 9, 12, 13. That every Person who shall be a sworn Servant to the King, shall take the said Oaths, and make and subscribe the said Declaration in Chancery, the next Term after he shall be so sworn a Servant, &c. And that if any such Person, neglecting so to do, shall advisedly come into or remain in the Presence of the King or Queen, or shall come into the Court or House where they are or any of them reside, he shall suffer all the Penalties expressed in the forgoing Section, unless such Person so coming into the King's Presence, &c. shall first have Licence so to do, by Warrant under the Hands and Seals of six Privy Counsellors, by Order of the Privy Council, upon some urgent Occasion therein to be expressed, which Licence shall not exceed ten Days, and shall be first filed, &c. in the Petty-Bag Office, for any Body to view without Fee, &c. and no Person be licensed for above thirty Days in one Year.

Sect. 3. As to the third of the above mentioned Restraints, viz. That which relates to the living within ten Miles of London, it is enacted by 1 Will. & Mar. 9. That every Justice of Peace in London and Westminster, and within ten Miles thereof, shall cause to be arrested and brought before him all reputed Papists; (except Foreigners, being Merchants, or menial Servants to some Ambassador or publick Agent, and except all such as used some Trade, Mystery, or some manual Occupation at the time of the said Act, in London, &c. and also except all such Persons as had their Dwelling in London, &c. within six Months before the thirteenth of February 1688, and no Dwelling elsewhere, and certified their Names to the Sessions before the first of August 1689) and that every such Justice shall tender the said Declaration to every such Person, and that every such Person refusing the same, and afterwards remaining in London, &c. or within ten Miles thereof, or being certified to the King's Bench or Quarter-Sessions, at the next Term or Sessions, as having refused to make the said Declaration, and neglecting to make the same in such Court, shall suffer as a Popish Recusant convict, &c.[84]

Sect. 4. As to the fourth of the above mentioned Restraints, viz. That which related to the keeping Arms, it is enacted by 1 Will. & Mar. 15. That any two Justices of the Peace may and ought to tender the said Declaration to any Person whom they shall know or suspect, or have Information of, as being a Papist, or suspected to be such; and that no such Person so required, and not making and subscribing the said Declaration, or not appearing before the said Justices upon Notice to him given, or left at his usual Abode, by one authorized by Warrant under the Hands and Seals of the said Justices, shall keep any Arms or Ammunition, or Horse above the Value of five Pounds, in his own Possession, or in the Possession of any other Person to his Use (other that such necessary Weapons, as shall be allowed him by the Quarter-Sessions for the Defense of his House or Person) and that any two Justices of Peace, by Warrant under their Hands and Seals, may authorize any Person in the Day Time, with the Assistance of the Constable or his Deputy or the Tithingman, to search for all such Arms, &c. and Horses, and seize them to the King's Use; and that the said Justices shall deliver the said Arms and Ammunition at the next Quarter-Sessions in open Court, and that whoever shall conceal, &c. or shall be aiding to the concealing any such Arms or Horses, shall be committed to the common Gaol, by Warrant under the Hands and Seals of any two Justices of Peace, and also forfeit treble the Value; and that those who discover any such Arms or Ammunition, so as the same may be seized, shall have the full Value thereof, to be awarded to them by the Sessions, &c. and that such Refusers of the said Declaration, &c. shall be discharged whenever they shall make the same.[85]

Sect. 5. As to the above mentioned Disability of presenting to a Church, it is enacted by 1 Will. & Mar. 26. That whoever shall refuse to make the said Declaration upon such a Tender thereof as is prescribed by the said Act, shall be disabled to present to any Benefice, &c. But it seems needless to set forth the Clause of the said Statute relating to this Matter at large in this Place, inasmuch, as by 12 Annae 14. All Persons whatsoever making Profession of the Popish Religion are under the like Disability, as will appear from Ch. 15. Sect. 6, 7, &c.

CHAP. XV.

Of Offences in promoting or encouraging the Popish Religion.

OFFENCES in promoting or encouraging the Popish Religion seem to be reducible to the following Heads;

1. Giving or receiving Popish Education.
2. Professing the Popish Religion.
3. Buying or Selling Popish Books.

Sect. 1. The first Offence of this kind, viz. That of giving or receiving Popish Education depends upon several Statutes; and first it is enacted by 1 Jac. 1. 4. Par. 6. 7. That if any Person or Persons under the King's Obedience shall go, or send, or cause to be sent, any Child or any other Person under their or any of their Government, beyond the Seas, out of the King's Obedience, to the Intent to enter into, or reside in, or repair to any College, &c. of any Popish Order, Profession or Calling, to be instructed, persuaded, or strengthned [sic] in the Popish Religion, or in any sort to profess the same, every such Person so sending such Child, &c. shall forfeit 100 l. And every such Person, so passing or being sent, &c. shall in respect of him or herself only, and not in respect of any of his Heirs or Posterity, be disabled to inherit, purchase, take, have or enjoy, any Profits, Hereditaments, Chattels, Debts, Legacies or Sums of Money, &c. whatsoever: And that all Estates, Terms, and other Interests whatsoever to be made, suffered or done, to the Use or Behoof of any such Person, or upon any Trust or Confidence, mediately or immediately to or for the Benefit or Relief of any such Person, shall be utterly void.

Sect. 2. And it is farther enacted by 3 Jac. 1. 5. Par. 16. That if the Children of any Subject within the Realm (the said Children not being Soldiers, Mariners, Merchants, or their Apprentices or Factors) shall be sent or go beyond Sea, to prevent their good Education in England, or for any other Cause, without the Licence of the King or six of his Privy Council (whereof the Principal Secretary to be one) under their Hands and Seals, that then every such Child shall take no Benefit by any Gift, Conveyance, Descent, Devise or otherwise of or to any Hereditament or Chattel, till such Child being of the Age of eighteen Years or above, take the Oath of Obedience before some Justice of Peace of the County, Liberty, or Limit, where the Parent of such Child did and shall inhabit: And that in the mean Time the next of Kin to such Child, who shall be no Popish Recusant, shall have the said Hereditaments, &c. so given, &c. until such Child shall conform, &c. and take the said Oath and receive the Sacrament; and that after such Conformity, &c. he who hath received the profits of the said Hereditaments, &c. shall account for the same, and in reasonable Time make Payment thereof, and restore the Value of the said Goods, &c. And that whoever shall send such Child over Seas, shall forfeit one Hundred Pounds, which by 11 & 12 Will. 3. 4. Par. 6. shall be to the sole Use and Benefit of the Person who shall discover the Offence.

Sect. 3. Also it is enacted by 3 Car. 1. 2. That if any Person under the Obedience of the King shall go, or shall convey or send, or cause to be sent or conveyed, any Person out of the King's Dominions, into any Parts beyond the Seas, out of the King's Obedience, to the Intent to enter into, or be resident or trained up in, any Priory, Abbey, Nunnery, Popish University, College or School, or House of Jesuits, Priests, or to a private Popish Family, and shall be there by any Popish Person instructed, persuaded or strengthened in the Popish Religion in any Sort to profess the same, or shall convey or send, or cause to be conveyed or sent, any Thing towards the Maintenance of any Person so going or sent, and trained and instructed, as is aforesaid, or under the Colour of any Charity towards the Relief of any Priory, &c. or religious House whatsoever; every Person so sending, &c. any such Person or Thing, and every Person passing or sent, being thereof convicted, &c. shall be disabled to prosecute any Suit in Law or Equity, or to be Executor or Administrator to any Person, be capable of any Legacy or Deed of Gift, or to bear any Office within the Realm. And shall forfeit all his Goods and Chattels, and shall forfeit all his Hereditaments, Offices and Estates of Freehold, during his Life.

The second Offence of this Kind, viz. That of professing the Popish Religion, is punished with the following Disabilities,

1. Of taking an Estate in Lands.
2. Of presenting to a Church.

Also it is punished with the following Restraints,

1. From keeping School.
2. From withholding a competent Maintenance from a Protestant Child.

Sect. 4. As to the first of the abovementioned Disabilities, viz. That of taking an Estate in Land, it is enacted by 11 & 12 W. 3. c. 4. That every Person educated in or professing the Popish Religion, who shall not, within six Months after the Age of eighteen Years, take the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, and subscribe the Declaration against Popery mentioned in 30 Car. 2. Stat. 2. Chap. 1. in the Chancery or King's Bench, or Quarter-Sessions of the County where such Person shall reside, shall in respect of himself of herself only, and not in respect of any of his or her Heirs or Posterity, be disabled to inherit or take by Descent, Devise or Limitation, in Possession, Reversion or Remainder, any Lands, Tenements or Hereditaments, in England or Wales, &c. And during the Life of such Person, and until he take the said Oaths, &c. his next of Kin being a Protestant, shall enjoy the same, without being accountable for the Profits, but shall not do wilful Waste under Pain of forfeiting treble Damages to the Party so disabled: And all Papists, or Persons making Profession of the Popish Religion, are disabled to purchase in their own Names, or the Names of others, to their Use or in Trust for them: And all Estates, Terms and other Interest and Profits whatsoever, out of Lands made to their Use, or on any Trust, mediately or immediately, for their Benefit, are void.

Sect. 5. In the Construction hereof it was resolved by the House of Lords in Roper's Case, That the Devise of the Residue of Money arising from the Sale of an Estate appointed to be sold for Payment of Debts, &c. is within the Statute.

Sect. 6. As to the second of the above mentioned Disabilities, viz. That of presenting to a Church, which by 3 Jac. 1. 5. Par. 18, 19, 20, 21, and 1 Will. & Mar. 26, did extend only to Popish Recusants convict, and Persons refusing to make the Declaration against Popery, mentioned in 30 Car. 2. Stat. 2. it is enacted by 12 Ann. St. 2. c. 14 That every Papist, or Person making Profession of the Popish Religion, &c. and every Mortgagee, Trustee, or Person any ways interested by or for such Papist, &c. with or without Writing, shall be disabled to present to any Benefice, School, or Hospital, &c. or to grant any Avoidance of any Benefice, Prebend or Ecclesiastical Living, and that in all Cases the Universities shall present.[86]

Sect. 7. Also by Force of the said Statute, The Ordinary may tender the Declaration against Transubstantiation to any reputed Papist making a Presentation, and upon a Refusal to take the same, the Presentation shall be void: Also the Ordinary may examine every Presentee upon Oath, whether the Person who presented him be the true Patron, or only a Trustee? And the Court wherein a Quare Impedit shall be brought, may in like Manner examine the Parties, and a Bill may be brought in any Court of Equity to discover such secret Trusts, &c. and the Answer of such Persons upon any such Examination or Bill shall be good Evidence against such Patron, in respect of such a Presentation, but not as to any other Purpose.

Sect. 8. I do not know that any Resolution hath been given on either of the above mentioned Statutes of 1 Will. & Mar. or 12 Ann. However the Expositions which were made on 3 Jac. 1. seeming to be for the most part applicable to these latter Statutes also, I shall take Notice of the principal of them; as,

Sect. 9. I. That where a Presentment is pro hac vice vested in the University by reason of the Patron's being a Popish Recusant at the Time when the Church became void, it shall not be divested again by his conforming himself to the Church.[87]

Sect. 10. II. That such a Patron is only disabled to present, and that he continues Patron as to all other Purposes, and therefore that he shall confirm the Leases of the Incumbent, &c.[88]

Sect. 11. III. That such a Person by being disabled to grant an Avoidance, is no way hindered from granting the Advowson itself in Fee, or for Life or Years, bona Fide, and for good Consideration.[89]

Sect. 12. IV. That if an Advowson or Avoidance belonging to such a Person come into the King's Hands, by reason of an Outlawry, or Conviction of Recusancy, &c. the King, and not the University, shall present.[90]

Sect. 13. As to the first of the above mentioned Restraints, viz. that which relates to the keeping School, it is enacted by the said Statute of 11 & 12 Will. 3. 4. Par. 3. That if any Papist, of Person making Profession of the Popish Religion, shall be convict of keeping School, or taking upon themselves the Education or Government, or Boarding of Youth in any Place within this Realm, or the Dominions thereunto belonging, they shall be adjudged to perpetual Imprisonment.

Sect. 14. As to the second of the above mentioned Restraints, viz. that which relates to the Power of a Popish Parent over his Protestant Child, it is enacted by the said Statute of 11 & 12 Will. 3. 4. That if any Popish Parent, in order to compel a Protestant Child to a Change of Religion, shall refuse to allow such Child a sufficient Maintenance, suitable to the Degree and Ability of such Parent, and to the Age and Education of such Child, the Lord Chancellor upon Complaint may make such Order therein, as shall be agreeable to the Intent of the said Act.

Sect. 15. The third Offence of this Kind, viz. that of selling or buying Popish Books, depends upon 3 Jac. 1. 5. Par 25. by which it is enacted, That no Person shall bring from beyond the Seas, nor shall print, buy, or sell any Popish Primer, Ladies Psalters, Manuals, Rosaries, Popish Catechisms, Missals, Breviaries, Portals, Legends and Lives of Saints, containing superstitious Matter, printed or written in any Language whatsoever, nor any other superstitious Books, printed or written in the English Tongue; on pain of forfeiting forty Shillings for every Book, &c. and the Books to be burnt.

CHAP. XVI.

Of Offences against the Established Church by Protestant Dissenters.

Sect. 1. BY 31 El. 1. Obstinate Nonconformists were compellable to abjure the Realm, and were also subject to all the Penalties mentioned in the tenth and eleventh Chapters of this Book; and Dissenters were farther restrained by 17 Car. 2. 2. & 22 Car. 2. 1. but at this Day by 1 Will. & Mar. 18. Par. 2. All Persons dissenting from the Church, (except Papists, and those who shall in Preaching or Writing deny the Doctrine of the Trinity,) are exempted from all Penal Laws relating to Religion, except 25 Car. 2 Chap. 2. (by which all Officers of Trust are bound to receive the Sacrament according to the Usage of the Church of England, and also to take the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, and the Test;) and also except 30 Car. 2. Stat. 2. Chap. 1. (by which the Members of both Houses of Parliament, and all the King's Sworn Servants are bound to make a Declaration against Transubstantiation and the Invocation of Saints, and the Sacrifice of the Mass,) provided such Dissenters take the Oath of Allegiance and Supremacy, and make the said Declaration against Transubstantiation, &c. and come to some Congregation for religious Worship, in some Place registred either in the Bishop's Court or at Sessions, the Doors whereof shall be neither locked, barred, nor bolted.[91]

Sect. 2. Also by Par. 8, 9, 10, 11, 12. Dissenting Teachers are tolerated, if they take the said Oaths, &c. at the General or Quarter-Sessions to be held for the Place where such Persons live, and subscribe the thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England, except those few scrupled ones concerning Church-Government and Infant-Baptism: And by 10 Ann. 2. Par. 7, 8, 9. They may qualify themselves, as well during a Prosecution upon any Penal Statute, as before, and being qualified in one County may officiate in another, upon producing a Certificate, and taking the said Oaths, &c. if required.[92]

Sect. 3. Also by the said Statute of 1 Will. & Mar. Par. 13, 14, 15. Those who scruple the taking of any Oath, are within the like Indulgence, provided they subscribe the aforesaid Declaration, and also a Declaration of Fidelity to the King, and against the deposing Doctrine and Papal Supremacy; and also profess their Faith in God the Father, and Jesus Christ his eternal Son, the true God, and the Holy Spirit, one God for evermore; and acknowledge the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament to be given by Divine Inspiration.

Sect. 4. Since this Statute a Prohibition lies to the Spiritual Court proceeding against Persons for Incontinency, who have been married in a licensed Coventicle.[93]

1.3.1.6.aReligion

Religion (Religio) Is virtue, as founded upon reverence of God, and expectation of future rewards and punishments; a system of Divine faith and worship as opposite to others. Johns. That habit of reverence towards the Divine nature, whereby we are enabled and inclined to serve and worship him after such a manner as we conceive most acceptable to him, is called religion. Wilkins. All blasphemies against God, as denying his being or providence, all profane scoffing at the Holy Scripture, or exposing any part thereof to contempt or ridicule, all impostures in religion, as falsly pretending to extraordinary commissions from God, and terrifying or abusing the people with false denunciations of judgments, &c. All open lewdness grossly scandalous, such as was that of those persons who exposed themselves naked to the people in a balcony in Covent-garden, with most abominable circumstances, offences of this nature, because they tend to subvert all religion or morality, which are the foundation of government, are punishable by the temporal judges with fine and imprisonment, and also such corporal infamous punishment as to the court in discretion shall seem meet, according to the heinousness of the crime. 1 *Hawk. 1.3.1.6.bTithes

Tithes, (Decimae, from the Sax. Teotha, i. e. tenth,) In some of our law books are briefly defined to be an ecclesiastical inheritance, or property in the church, collateral to the estate of the lands thereof: But in others they are more fully defined to be a certain part of the fruit, or lawful increase of the earth, beasts, men's labours, which in most places, and of most things, is the tenth part, which by the law, hath been given to the ministers of the gospel, in recompence of their attending their office. 11 Co. Rep. 13. Dyer 84.

Bishop Barlow, Selden, father Paul, and others have observed, that neither tithes nor ecclesiastical benefices, (which are correlative in their nature) were ever heard of for many ages in the Christian church, or pretended to be due to the Christian priesthood; and, as that bishop affirms, no mention is made of tithes in the grand codex of canons, ending in the year 451, which, next to the bible, is the most authentick book in the world; and that it thereby appears, during all that time, both churches and churchmen were maintained by free gifts and oblations only. Barlow's Remains, p. 169. Selden of Tithes 82. See Watson's Compleat Incumbent, p. 3, 4, &c.

And Mr. Selden has shewn us, that tithes were not Introduced here in England, till towards the end of the eighth Century, i. e. about the year 786, when parishes and ecclesiastical benefices came to be settled, for, as is said, tithes and ecclesiastical benefices being correlative the one could not exist without the other; for whenever any ecclesiastical person had any portion of tithes granted to him out of certain lands, this naturally constituted the benefice; the granting of the tithes of such a manor or parish, being in fact, a grant of the benefice; as a grant of the benefice did imply a grant of the tithes: And thus the relation between patrons and incumbents was analogous to that of lord and tenant by the feudal law. Selden of Tithes 86, &c.

About the year 794, Offa, King of Mercia, (the most potent of all the Saxon Kings of his time in this island,) made a law, whereby he gave unto the church the tithes of all his kingdom, which the historians tell us was done to expiate for the death of Ethelbert, King of the East Angles, who in the year preceding he had caused basely to be murdered. But that tithes were before paid in England by way of offerings, according to the ancient usage and decrees of the church, appears from the canons of Egbert, archbishop of York, about the year 750. And from an epistle of Boniface, archbishop of Mentz, which he wrote to Cuthbert, archbishop of Canterbury about the same time; and from the seventeenth canon of the general council held for the whole kingdom at Chalcuth, in the year 787. But this law of Offa, was that which first gave the church a civil right in them in this land, by way of property and inheritance, and enabled the clergy to gather and recover them as their legal due, by the coercion of the civil power. Yet this establishment of Offa reached no further than the kingdom of Mercia, over which Offa reigned, until Ethelwulph, about sixty years after, enlarged it for the whole realm of England. Prideaux on Tithes 166, 167.

1. Of what tithes are in general due; and where personal tithes are due.
2. Of what predial tithes are due; and of the tithe of agistment, corn, bay, and wood.
3. Of what mixed tithes are due.
4. Of recovering small tithes in a summary way; and of recovering tithes due from quakers.

1. OF WHAT TITHES ARE IN GENERAL DUE; AND WHERE PERSONAL TITHES ARE DUE.

Tithes are due either de jure, or by custom: All tithes, which are due de jure, arise from such fruits of the earth as renew annually; or from the profit that accrues from the labour of a man. Hence it follows, that such tithes can never be part of, but must always be collateral to, the land from which they arise. 11 Rep. 13, 14. Priddle v. Napier.

Nay, tithes due de jure are so collateral to every kind of land, that if a lease is made of the glebe belonging to a rectory, with all the profits and advantages thereof; and there is besides a covenant, that the rent to be paid shall be in full satisfaction of every kind of exaction, and demand, belonging to the rectory; yet, as the glebe is not expresly discharged of tithe, the lessee shall be liable to the payment thereof. 11 Rep. 13, 14. Priddle v. Napier. 1 Roll. Abr. 655. pl. 1. Cro. Eliz. 261, 162. Cro. Car. 362.

No tithe is de jure of the produce of a mine or of a quarry; because this is not a fruit of the earth renewing annually, but is the substance of the earth, and has perhaps been so for a great number of years. F. N. B. 53. Bro. Dism. pl. 18. 2 Inst. 651. 1 Roll. Abr. 637. Cro. Eliz. 277.

But in some places tithes are due by custom of the produce of mines. 2 Vern. 46. Buxton v. Hutchinson.

No tithe is due de jure of lime: The chalk, of which this is made, being part of the soil. 1 Roll. Abr. 637. pl. 5.

Tithe is not due de jure of bricks; which are made from the earth itself. 2 Mod. 77. Stoutfield's case.

Nor is tithe due de jure of turf, or of gravel: Because both these are part of the soil. 1 Mod. 35.

It has been held, that no tithe is due de jure of salt; because this does not renew annually. 1 Roll. Abr. 642. S. pl. 8.

But every one of these, and all things of the like kind, may by custom become tithable. 1 Roll. Abr. 642. S. pl. 7. pl. 8.

No tithes are due de jure of houses; for tithes are only due de jure of such things as renew from year to year. 11 Rep. 16. Graunt's case.

But houses in London are, by decree, which was confirmed by an act of parliament, made liable to the payment of tithes, 2 Inst. 659. 37 H. 8. c. 2.

And before this decree, houses in London were by custom liable to pay tithes; the quantum to be paid being thereby only settled, as to such houses for which there was no customary payment. 2 Inst. 659. Hard. 116. Gilb. Eq. Rep. 193, 194.

There is likewise in most ancient cities, and boroughs, a custom to pay tithes for houses; without which there would be no maintenance in many parishes for clergy. 11 Rep. 16. Graunt's case. Bunb. 102.

It was held by three barons of the Exchequer, Price, Montague, and Page, contrary to the opinion of Bury Chief Baron, that two tithes may be due of the same thing, one de jure, the other by custom. Bunb. 43. Earl of Scarborough v. Hunter.

Tithes are of three kinds, personal, predial, and mixt. Such tithes as arise from the profit of the personal labour of a man, in the exercise of any art, trade or employment, are called personal tithes. 2 Inst. 649.

By the stat. 2 & 3 Ed. 6. c. 13. par. 7. Common day labourers are exempted from the payment of personal tithes.

No personal tithes are due from servants in husbandry; for by their labour the tithes of many other things are increased. 1 Roll. Abr. 646. pl. 1.

The better opinion always was, that a miller, except he occupied a corn mill, was only liable to the payment of personal tithe. 2 Inst. 621. 1 Roll. Abr. 641. pl. 19. Cro. Jac. 523.

But it seems to have been formerly held, that the occupier of a corn mill was liable to pay, as predial tithes, the tenth part of his toil. 2 Roll. Rep. 84. Show. 281. Brownl. 32.

It is however now settled, by a decree of the house of Lords, upon an appeal from a decree of the court of Exchequer, that only personal tithes are due from the occupier of a corn mill. 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 366. Newt v. Chamberlain, 2 Will. Rep. 463.

The occupier of a new erected mill is liable to tithes, altho' such mill is erected upon land discharged of tithes, Cro. Jac. 429.

It is said in one book, that the occupier of an antient mill shall not pay tithes: But that the occupier of a new mill is, by the 9 Ed. 2. st. 1. c. 5. made liable to pay tithes. Mar. 15. pl. 36.

This seems to be a mistake; for that statute only provides, that new erected mills shall be liable to the payment of tithes: But, as nothing therein is said concerning ancient mills, there can be no doubt, that such antient mills, as before the making of this statute were liable to pay tithes, continued afterwards to be liable. 12 Mod. 243. Hart v. Hale. 3 Bulst. 212.

No personal tithe is due of the profit which a man receives without personal labour, or of the profit which one man receives from the labour of another. 1 Roll. Abr. 656. pl. 1. pl. 2. 2 Inst. 621, 649.

If a man lets a ship to a fisherman, no personal tithe is due of the money received for the use of such ship; because this is a profit without personal labour. 1 Roll. Abr. 656. n. pl. 2.

If a man purchases a house for 300 l. and afterwards sells it for 500 l. no personal tithe is due; for the personal labour bears no proportion in this case to the profit. 1 Roll. Abr. 656. n. pl. 3.

If an inn-keeper has such a profit, out of his kitchen, cellar, and stables, as to make 200 l. of what cost him only 100 l. no personal tithe is due of this profit: Because the profit did not arise from personal labour alone, and so far as it did, it perhaps arose more from the personal labour of servants, than from that of the master of the inn. 2 Bulst. 141. Dolley v. Davis.

2. OF WHAT PREDIAL TITHES ARE DUE; AND OF THE TITHE OF AGISTMENT, CORN, HAY, AND WOOD.

Such tithes, as arise immediately from the fruits of the earth, as from corn, hay, hemp, hops; and all kinds of fruits, seeds and herbs, are called predial tithes. 2 Inst. 649.

They are so called, because they arise immediately from the fruits of the farm, or earth. 2 Inst. 647.

By the ecclesiastical law many things are liable to the payment of predial tithes, which by the Common law are not so. 2 Inst. 621. 4 Mod. 344.

The design under this head, is to shew what things are liable by the Common law to pay predial tithes.

In doing this, it will appear, that some things, which are in the general exempted therefrom, become by custom liable to the payment of predial tithes. 1 Rol. Abr. 637. E. pl. 2. 1 Rol. Abr. 642. S. pl. 7. pl. 8.

It will also appear, that divers things, which are in the general liable thereto, are under particular circumstances exempted from the payment of such tithes. 1 Rol. Abr. 645. pl. 11. Cro. Eliz. 475. Freem. 335. 12 Mod. 235.

But wherever any fraud is used, to bring a thing under those circumstances, by reason of which it would, if it had come fairly under them, have been exempted from the payment of predial tithes, it is by such fraud rendered liable thereto, Cro. Eliz. 475. Freem. 335.

As it would be tedious, to enumerate all the things which are liable to predial tithes, only those shall be mentioned, concerning the tithes of which some question has arisen; but, from such as will be mentioned, it may be easily collected of what other things predial tithes are due.

Agistment. Agisting, in the strict sense of the word, means the depasturing of a beast the property of a stranger: But this word is constantly used, in the books, for depasturing the beast of an occupier of land, as well as that of a stranger. 5 Bac. Ab. 53.

An occupier of land is not liable to pay tithe for the pasture of horses, or other beasts, which are used in husbandry in the parish, in which they are depastured: Because the tithe of corn is by their labour increased. 1 Rel. Abr. 646. pl. 2. pl. 3. pl. 6. pl. 7. Cro. Eliz. 446. Ld. Raym. 130.

But if horses or other beasts are used in husbandry out of the parish, in which they are depastured, an agistment tithe is due for them. 7 Mod. 114. *Harrow'*s case. Ld Raym. 130.

It seems to be the better opinion, that no tithe is due for the pasture of a saddle horse, which an occupier of land keeps for himself or servants to ride upon. 1 Rol. Abr. 642. pl. 4. Cro. Jac. 430. Bulst. 171. Bunb. 3.

An occupier of land is liable to an agistment tithe, for all horses which he keeps for sale. Cro. Jac. 430. Hampton v. Wild. 1 Rol. Abr. 647. pl. 14.

No tithe is due for the pasture of milk cattle, which are milked in the parish, in which they are depastured; because tithe is paid of the milk of such cattle. 1 Rol. Abr. 646. pl. 2. Ld. Raym. 130. Cro. Eliz. 446.

Milch cattle, which are reserved for calving, shall pay no tithe for their pasture whilst they are dry: But, if they are afterwards sold, or milked in another parish, an agistment is due for the time they were dry. Hetl. 100. Ld. Raym. 130.

No tithe is due, from an occupier of land; for the pasture of young cattle, reared to be used in husbandry, or for the pail. Cro. Eliz. 476. Sheringh v. Fleetwood.

But, if such young beasts are sold, before they come to such perfection as to be fit for husbandry, or before they give milk, an agistment tithe must be paid for them, Hetl. 86. Woolmerston's case.

An occupier of land is liable to an agistment tithe, for all such cattle as he keeps for sale. Cro. Eliz. 446, 476. Jenk. 28. pl. 6. Cro. Car. 237. Show. P. C. 192.

But if any cattle, which have neither been used in husbandry, nor for the pail, are after being kept some time killed, to be spent in the family of the occupier of the land on which they were depastured, no tithe is due for their pasture. Jenk. 281. pl. 6. Cro. Eliz. 446, 476. Cro. Car. 237.

It is in general true, that an agistment tithe is due, for depasturing any sort of cattle the property of a stranger. Cro. Eliz. 276. Cro. Jac. 276. Bunb. 1. Freem. 329.

No tithe is due for the cattle, either of a stranger or an occupier, which are depastured in grounds, that have in the same year paid tithe of hay. Bunb. 10, 79. Poph. 142. 2 Rol. Rep. 191.

No agistment tithe is due for such beasts, either of a stranger or an occupier, as are depastured on the head lands of ploughed fields: Provided that these are not wider than is sufficient to turn the plough and horses upon. 1 Rol. Abr. 646. pl. 19.

No tithe is due for such cattle as are depastured upon land, that has the same year paid tithes of corn. Bro. Dism. 18. 1 Mod. 216.

If land, which has paid tithe of corn in one year, is left unsown the next year, no agistment is due for such land; because, by this lying fresh, the tithe of the next crop of corn is increased. 1 Rol. Abr. 642. pl. 9.

But if land, which has paid tithe of corn, is suffered to lie fallow longer than by the course of husbandry is usual, an agistment tithe is due for the beasts depastured upon such land. Shep. Abr. 1008.

As the question, whether an agistment tithe is due for sheep, does not seem to be quite settled, it will not be amiss to mention, the principal cases, in which this has been agitated.

It is laid down in one old case, that no tithe is due for the pasture of sheep, because they are animalia fructuosa. 1 Rol. Rep. 63. pl. 7. Mascal [sic] v. Price [Mascall v Price], Mich. 12 Jac. 1.

But in another book of the same author's, where this very case is reported, there is a dubitatur. 1 Rol. Abr. 642. pl. 8.

In a case, not long after, it was held, that an agistment tithe should be paid for sheep, which, after having been depastured in one parish, from Michaelmas day to Lady-day, were removed into another; and by Dodderidge, justice, otherwise the parson of the parish might be defrauded of his tithe; for the sheep are now carried into a second parish, and they may not be brought back and sheered in the first. Poph. 197. Mich. 2 Car. 1.

It was however said, by Whitelock, justice, that De animalibus inutilibus, as horses, oxen, &c. the parson shall have agistment tithe: But that De animalibus utilibus, as cows, sheep, &c. he shall have in specie.

In another case, it is said to have been laid down, that no tithe shall be paid for the pasture of sheep eat in the house. Cro. Car. 207. Facey v. Long, Mich. 7 Car. 1.

But, in another report of the same case, it is said to have been held, that no tithe is due for the pasture of wethers; because they will yield a tithe of wool. 1 Rol. Abr. 647. pl. 13.

In a modern case, in the court of Exchequer, it is said that, it seemed to be admitted, that tithe is due for the agistment of yearling sheep, because it is a new increase. Bunb. 90. Baker v. Sweet, Mich. 8 Geo. 1.

In another case shortly after, in the same court, it appeared, that sheep after paying tithe of wool, had been fed upon turnips not severed, by which they were bettered to the value of five shillings each; and were then sold. It also appeared, that the defendant had, before the next sheering time, bought in as many as were sold; and that of these tithe of wool was paid. It was insisted, that, if an agistment was to be paid for the sheep sold, this would be a double tithing: But the court held, that this was a new increase, and decreed the defendant to account for an agistment tithe. Gibs. Rep. in Eq. 231. Coleman v. Baker, Pasch. 12 Geo. 1.

In this last case no notice was taken of the case of Baker and Sweet: But the case of Dummer and Wingfield, Hil. 1 W. & M. was mentioned. In which it had been decreed, and the decree had been affirmed on a rehearing, that the tithe for depasturing sheep from the time of shearing till they were sold, should be accounted for.

But in a still later case, the court of Exchequer were of a quite different opinion. A bill was brought for the tithe of depasturing sheep four months in the parish after they had been shorn; it appeared also, that at the end of this time they were removed into another parish; and that they were shorn there at the next sheering time. In this case the cases of Coleman and Baker, and Dummer and Wingfield were cited by the plaintiff's counsel. But the court held, that no agistment tithe should be paid, because sheep are animalia fructuosa. Bunb. 313. Poor v. Seymour, Hil. 5 Geo. 2.

Corn. It is laid down in some books, that no tithe is due of the rakings of corn involuntarily scattered. 1 Rol. Abr. 645. pl. 11. Cro. Eliz. 278. Freem. 335. Moor 278.

But, if more of any sort of corn is fraudulently scattered, than, if proper care had been taken, would have been scattered, tithe is due of the rakings of such corn. Cro. Eliz. 475. Freem. 335.

And it has been said by Holt, Chief Justice, that tithe is due of the rakings of all corn, except such as is bound up in sheaves. 12 Mod. 235.

No tithes are due of the stubbles left in corn fields, after mowing or reaping the corn. 2 Inst. 621. 1 Rol. Abr. 640. pl. 14.

Hay. Tithe of hay is to be paid, although beasts of the plough or pail, or sheep are to be foddered with such hay. Cro. Jac. 47. Webb v. Warner. 1 Rol. Abr. 650. pl. 12. 12 Mod. 497.

But no tithe is due of hay grown upon the headlands of ploughed grounds, provided that such headlands are not wider then [sic] is sufficient to turn the plough and horses upon. 1 Rol. Abr. 646. pl. 19.

It is laid down in one old case, that if a man cuts down grass, and, while it is in the swathes, carries it away and gives it to his plough cattle, not having sufficient sustenance for them otherwise, no tithe is due thereof. 1 Rol. Abr. 645. Crawley v. Wells, Mich. 9 Car. 1.

And in a modern case, the court of Exchequer seemed to be of opinion, that no tithe is due of vetches or clover, cut green, and given to cattle in husbandry. Bunb. 279. Hayes v. Dowse, Hil. 3 Geo. 2.

But in another case, some years before this last case, it was held, that the right to tithe of hay accrues upon mowing the grass, and that the subsequent application of this, while it is in grass, or when it is made into hay, shall not, although beasts of the plough or pail are fed with it, take away this right. 12 Mod. 498.

And the doctrine of this last case coincides with that of an old case; in which it was held, that tares cut green, and given to beasts of the plough, may by special custom be exempted from the payment of tithes; from whence it follows, that such tares are not exempted de jure. 12 Mod. 498. Selby v. Bank, Pasch. 13 W. 3.

It is laid down in some books, that no tithe is due of aftermowth hay; because tithe can only be due once in the same year from the same land. F. N. B. 53. Bro. Dism. pl. 16. 2 Inst. 652. 11 Rep. 16. Cro. Jac. 42. Ld Raym. 243.

But it is held in other books, that tithe is due of aftermowth hay. 1 Rol. Abr. 64. pl. 11. Cro. Eliz. 660. Cro. Jac. 116. Cro. Car. 403. 12 Mod. 498. Bunb. 10.

And the principle, upon which the doctrine that no tithe is due of aftermowth hay is founded, is denied in some modern cases.

In some of these it is laid down, that tithes shall be paid of divers crops grown upon the same land in the same year. Bunb. 19. Benson v. Watkins, Hil. 3 Geo. 1. Bunb. 314. Swinfen v. Digby, Hil. 5 Geo. 2.

In others it is held, wherever there is in the same year a new increase from the same thing, tithe is due. Bunb. 9. Baker v. Sweet, Mich. 8 Geo. 1. Gilb. Rep. in Eq. 231. Coleman v. Baker, Pasch. 12 Geo. 1.

Wood. Title of wood is not due of common right, because wood does not renew annually: But it was, in very antient times, paid in many places by custom. 2 Inst. 642. 12 Mod. 111. Salk. 656. Comb. 404. Bunb. 61.

A constitution was made, in the seventeenth year of the reign of Edward the Third, by John Stratford, archbishop of Canterbury, that tithes shall be paid, within this province, of silva caedua. 2 Inst. 642. Palm. 37, 38.

In the same year, the commons petitioned the King, that no man be impleaded in court Christian for tithes of wood or underwood, unless in such places where such tithes have been used to be paid. Inst. 642.

The answer was, let it be done of this, as it hath heretofore been used to be done. Ibid.

In the next year, the commons complained to the King of this constitution, for taking tithes of all manner of wood, as an unprecedented thing, and petitioned that the people might remain in the same state, as they had been under his royal progenitors; and that a prohibition might be granted to all, who should be impleaded in court Christian for tithe of wood. Ibid.

The answer was, the King willeth that law and reason be done. Ibid.

In another petition presented in the twenty-first year of the same reign, the commons complained, that the clergy, by virtue of the constitution made by the archbishop of Canterbury, demanded and took tithe both of gross wood and underwood, whether this last was sold or not. Ibid.

To this the King answered, that the archbishop of Canterbury and other bishops have answered, that no tithe is demanded, by virtue of the constitution, but of underwood. Ibid.

After some other petitions had been presented by the commons, without effect, the great men of the realm in the forty-fifth year of the reign of this prince, joined with them in one. 2 Inst. 652.

In consequence of this, a statute was made in these words: ‘At the complaint of the Great men and Commons, shewing by their petition, that when they sell their gross wood, of the age of 20 or 40 years, and of a greater age, to merchants, to their own profit, and to the aid of the King in his wars, the parsons and vicars of Holy church do implead and trouble the said merchants, in court christian, for the tithe of the said wood, under the denomination of silva caedua, by the reason of which they cannot sell their wood for the real value, to the great damage of themselves and the realm; it is ordained and established, that a prohibition in this case shall be granted, and upon the same an attachment, as it hath hitherto been.’ 45 Ed. 3. c. 3.

From these petitions and answers, from this statute, and from books of the best authority, it appears plainly that no tithe of gross wood was due de jure at the Common law; and that the demand thereof as such by virtue of the constitution made by the archbishop, was an encroachment. 2 Inst. 642. 45 Ed. 3. c. 3. Plowd. 470. Bro. Paroch. pl. 1. Cro. Jac. 100.

After the making of this statute, prohibitions were constantly granted to suits instituted in spiritual courts for tithes of gross wood. But two questions often arose, What is gross wood? And of what age gross wood must be before it is exempted from the payment of tithe? 2 Inst. 643, 644, 645.

For the putting an end to these, it hath been long settled, that by gross wood is not meant small wood, nor large wood, but such wood as is generally, or by the custom of a particular part of the country, used as timber; and that all such wood, if of the age of 20 years, is exempt from the payment of tithe. 2 Inst. 642, 643. Cro. Eliz. 1. 12 Mod. 524. Bunb. 127.

Oaks, ashes, and elms, being universally used as timber, it has been always held, that such trees, if of the age of 20 years, are gross wood. 2 Inst. 642.

It hath been held upon great deliberation, notwithstanding what is laid down to the contrary in Plowd. 470. that a horn-beam tree, if of the age of 20 years, is gross wood; because this is used in building and repairing. 2 Inst. 643.

It has for the same reason been held, that an aspen tree, of the age of 20 years, is gross wood. Ibid.

Tithes are not in the general due of beach, birch, hazel, willow, fallow, alder, maple or white-thorn trees, or of any fruit trees, of whatsoever age they are: Because these are not timber. Plowd. 470. Cro. Eliz. 1 Cro. Jac. 190. 1 Roll. Abr. 640. pl. 5. pl. 6. Brownl. 94.

But, if the wood of any of these trees is used in a particular part of the country, where timber is scarce, in building and repairing, no tithe is due of such wood, if of the age of 20 years, in that part of the country. Hob. 219. Brownl. 94.

It is laid down in several old books, that, if a timber tree, after it is of the age of 20 years, decays so as to be unfit to be used in building, no tithe is due of the wood of this tree; because it was once privileged. 11 Rep. 48. Cro. Eliz. 477. Cro. Jac. 100. 1 Roll. Abr. 640. pl. 2.

But the contrary is laid down in some other books.

In two of these it is laid down, that, if the wood of a coppice has been usually felled for firing, such wood shall pay tithe, altho’ it stand till it be 40 years of age. Sid. 300. 1 Lev. 189.

And in another it is laid down, that, if the wood of a timber-tree is sold for firing, it is, altho' the tree was of the age of 20 years, liable to pay tithe. Bunb. 99. Greenaway v. The Earl of Kent.

The reporter of this last case mentions four others, in which the same had been held; and says, that it was in one of them laid down, that the wood of timber-trees is only exempted from the payment of tithe, on the account of its being used in building. Buckle v. Vanacre.

The doctrine, however, of the old books is confirmed by a very late case in the court of Chancery.

A bill being brought for tithe of the loppings of timber-trees, which had been sold for firing, it was insisted that this wood, which would otherwise have been exempted from the payment of tithes, was liable thereto, because it was sold to be used for firing; and the cases just now cited were relied upon: But the bill was dismissed; and by Hardwicke Chancellor, in the case in 1 Lev. 189. and Sid. 300. the wood in question was coppice wood, which had been usually felled for firing; and such wood, of whatever age it is, is always titheable. The case of Greenaway and the earl of Kent, is quite a singular one, and is not law; for in the case of Bibye and Huxley, Hil. 11 Geo. 1. it was agreed, that no tithe is due of the wood of a timber tree, which has been once privileged from the payment of tithe, altho' such wood is sold to be used for firing. MS. Rep. Walton v. Tryon, Mich. 25 Geo. 2.

It is laid down in divers books that if a timber-tree of the age of 20 years is lopped, no tithe shall be paid of the loppings altho' they are not of 20 years growth, for that the tree, which is privileged, shall privilege the loppings. Bro. Dism. pl. 14. 11 Rep. 4. Cro. Eliz. 4. Godb. 175. 1 Roll. Abr. 640. pl. 3.

But the doctrine laid down in one old book, is, that such loppings of a timber-tree, as are of the age of 20 years, shall be exempted from the payment of tithe; and it is added as a reason, that branches of that age may be useful in building. Plowd. 470. Soby v. Molins.

The former, however, is the better opinion.

In the case just now cited, it appeared, that the loppings of the trees, for the tithe of which the bill was brought, were not of 20 years growth: But it also appeared, that the trees were of the age of 20 years, before they had ever been lopped. It was held by Hardwicke, Chancellor; that no tithe was due of these loppings; for that, if a tree is once privileged from paying tithe, the privilege extends to all future loppings, of whatsoever age they are. MS. Rep. Walton v. Tryon.

It has been said, that, altho' a tree has been once lopped before it was of the age of 20 years, the future loppings of such tree, provided these are of twenty years growth, are not titheable. 1 Roll. Abr. 640. pl. 1.

But in the case already cited, it was laid down by Hardwicke Chancellor, that wherever a tree has been lopped before it was of the age of 20 years, all future lopping, altho' ever so old, are liable, to pay tithe. MS. Rep. Walton. v. Tryon.

It has been laid down, that if a tree, which was once privileged from paying tithe, is felled, the germins that spring from the root of such tree, are also privileged. 11 Rep. 48. Liford's case.

But, in the case already cited, it was said by Hardwicke Chancellor, that all germins, which spring from the roots of trees that have been felled, are titheable. MS. Rep. Walton v. Tryon.

The wood of a coppice, which has usually been felled for firing, is liable to pay tithe, altho' the same is of the age of 40 years. 1 Lev. 189. Sid. 300.

And in the case so often cited, it was said by Hardwicke Chancellor, if, when the wood of coppice is felled, some trees growing therein, which are of the age of 20 years, and have never been lopped, are lopped, and these loppings are promiscuously bound up in faggots with the coppice wood, tithe must be paid of the whole: because it would be very difficult, to separate the tithable wood from that which is not so; and the owner ought to suffer for his folly in mixing them. MS. Rep. Walton v. Tryon.

3. OF WHAT MIXED TITHES ARE DUE.

Such tithes as arise from beasts or fowls, which are fed with the fruits of the earth, are called mixed tithes. 2 Inst. 649. 1 Roll. Abr. 635.

Many things are by the ecclesiastical law liable to pay such tithes, which by the Common law they are not. 2 Inst. 621. 4 Mod. 344.

The design under this head is to shew, of what mixed tithes are due by the common law.

In doing this it will appear, that some things, which are in the general exempted therefrom, become by custom liable to the payment of mixed tithes. 1 Roll. Abr. 635. c. pl. 3. 636. pl. 7. Cro. Car. 339. 1 Ventr. 5.

It will also appear, that divers things, which are in the general liable thereto, are under particular circumstances exempted from the payment of mixed tithes. 1 Roll. Abr. 645. pl. 14. pl. 16.

But, wherever any fraud is used, to bring a thing under these circumstances, by reason of which, if it had come fairly under them, it would have been exempted from the payment of a mixed tithe, it is by such fraud rendered liable thereto. 1 Roll. Abr. 645. pl. 15, 646. pl. 17.

As it would be tedious, to enumerate all the things, which are liable to pay mixed tithes, only those shall be mentioned concerning the tithe of which some question has arisen: But, from such as will be mentioned, it may be easily collected, of what other things mixed tithes are due.

Tithes are in the general due of the young of all beasts, except such as are ferae naturae.

But none are due of young hounds, apes, or the like, because such beasts are kept only for pleasure. Bro. Dism. pl. 20.

No tithe is due of the young of deer; for these are ferae naturae. 2 Inst. 651.

And for the same reason none is due, but by custom, of young conies. 1 Roll. Abr. 635. C. pl. 3. Cro. Car. 339. 1 Ventr. 5.

The young of all birds and fowls, except such as are ferae naturae, are in the general liable to pay tithes; unless the eggs of such birds or fowls have before paid tithes. 1 Roll. Abr. 642. pl. 6. 2 Will. Rep. 463.

But no tithes are due either of the eggs or young of any birds or fowls, which are kept only for pleasure. Bro. Dism. pl. 20.

No tithes are due of the eggs or young of partridges or pheasants, because these are ferae naturae. Moor 599. 2 Will. Rep. 463.

If a man keeps pheasants in an inclosed wood, whose wings are clipped, and from their eggs hatches and brings up young ones, no tithe is due of these young pheasants, altho’ none was paid for their eggs: Because the old ones are not reclaimed, and would go out of the inclosure, if their wings were not clipped. 1 Roll. Abr. 636. pl. 5.

It was heretofore held, that neither the eggs nor young of turkies are tithable; turkies being ferae naturae. Moor 599. Hughes v. Price.

But it has been held in a modern case, that, as turkies are now as tame as hens or other poultry, tithe is due of their eggs or young. 2 Will. Rep. 463: Carleton v. Brightwell.

No tithe is due of such young pigeons as are spent in the house of the person who breeds them. 1 Roll. Abr. 644. Z. pl. 4. pl. 6. 1 Ventr. 5. 12 Mod. 77. 12 Mod. 47.

But if any young pigeons are sold, tithe is due of them. 1 Roll. Abr. 644. Z. pl. 5. pl. 6.

If a man pays tithe of young lambs at Marks-tide, and at Midsummer assizes shears the other nine parts of the lambs, tithe is due of the wool: For altho' there is but two months between the time of paying tithe lambs, which were not shorn, and the shearing of the residue, there is in this case a new increase. 1 Roll. Abr. 642. R. pl. 7. Bunb. 90.

If a man shears his sheep about their necks at Michaelmas time, to preserve their fleeces from the brambles, no tithe is due of this wool: for it appears, that this, which is done before their wool is much grown, can never be for the sake of the wool. 1 Roll. Abr. 645. pl. 16.

If a man, after their wool is well grown, shear his sheep about their necks, to preserve them from vermin, No [sic] tithe is due of the wool. 1 Roll. Abr. 645. pl. 14.

If a man, a little before shearing time, cuts dirty locks of wool from his sheep to preserve them from vermin, no tithe is due of such wool. 1 Roll. Abr. 646. pl. 17.

But in either of these cases, if more wool, than ought to have been cut off is fraudulently cut off, tithe must be paid of the wool. 1 Roll. Abr. 645. pl. 15. 646. pl. 17.

It is laid down in one case, that no tithe is due of the wool of sheep killed to be spent in the house, or of the wool of those which die of themselves. Litt. Rep. 31. Civil v. Scot, Pasch. 3 Car.

But in another case, a few years after, it is laid down, that tithe is due of the wool of such sheep as are killed to be spent in the house. 1 Roll. Abr. 646. pl. 18. Dent. v. Salvin, Pasch. 14 Car.

Fish taken in a pond, or in any inclosed river, are liable to pay tithe. 1 Roll. Abr. 636. pl. 4. pl. 6. pl. 7.

But no tithe is due, except by custom, of fish taken in the sea, or in any open river, altho' they are taken by a person who has a several fishery; because such fish are ferae naturae. Noy 108. 1 Roll. Abr. 636. pl. 4. pl. 6. pl. 7. Cro. Car. 332. 1 Lev. 179. Sid. 278.

Honey and bees-wax are both tithable. Fitzh. N. B. 51. 1 Roll. Abr. 635. C. pl. 1. Cro. Car. 559.

But, where the tithe of their honey and wax has been paid, no tithe is due of the bees. Cro. Car. 404. Anon'.

No tithe is due of the milk spent in the house of a farmer; provided such house stands in that parish in which the cows are milked. L. Raym. 129. Scoles v. Lowther.

4. OF RECOVERING SMALL TITHES IN A SUMMARY WAY; AND OF RECOVERING TITHES DUE FROM QUAKERS.

By the 7 & 8 W. 3. cap. 6. s. 1. It is, for the more easy recovery of small tithes, where the same do not amount to above the yearly value of forty shillings, from any one person, enacted, ‘That if any person shall subtract or withdraw, or fail in the payment of such small tithes, by the space of twenty days after demand thereof, that then it shall be lawful for the parson to whom the same shall be due, to make his complaint in writing to any two justices of the peace, within the county or place where the same shall grow due; neither of which justices is to be patron of the church whence the said tithes arise, or any ways interested in such tithes.’

But by par. 6. it is provided, ‘That no complaint shall be heard as aforesaid, unless it shall be made within two years after the same tithes become due.’

And by par. 10. it is provided, ‘That no person, who shall begin any suit, for the recovery of such small tithes, in the court of exchequer, or in any ecclesiastical court, shall have any benefit of this act for the same matter.’

By par. 2. it is enacted, ‘That the said justices shall summon, in writing under their hands and seals, by reasonble warning, every person against whom any complaint shall be made as aforesaid, and after his appearance, or upon default of appearance, the said writing being proved before them upon oath, the said justices shall proceed to hear and determine the said complaint, and shall in writing under their hands and seals adjudge the case, and give such reasonable allowance for such tithes as they shall judge to be just, and also such costs and charges, not exceeding ten shillings, as upon the merits of the cause shall appear just.’

And by par. 4. the justices are impowered to administer an oath to any witness produced.

But by par. 8. It is enacted, ‘That if any person complained against shall insist upon any prescription, composition, modus decimandi, or other title, whereby he ought to be freed from the payment of tithes; and shall deliver the same in writing to the said justices; and shall give to the party complaining sufficient security, to pay all such costs as shall be given against him, upon a trial at law, in case the said title shall not be allowed; that then the said justices shall forbear to give judgment.’

By par. 3. A distress is given, ‘In case of refusal or neglect, by the space of 10 days after notice given, to pay such sum as upon such complaint shall be adjudged as aforesaid.’

By par. 12. It is enacted, ‘That the said justices shall have power to give costs, not exceeding ten shillings, to the party prosecuted, if they find the complaint false and vexatious.’

By par. 5. It is provided, That this act shall not extend ‘to tithes within the city of London, or in any other place, where the same are settled by any act of parliament.’

By par. 7. An appeal is given to the sessions, and it is enacted, ‘That if the justices there present, or the majority of them, shall confirm the judgment of the two justices, they shall decree the same by order of sessions, and proceed to give such costs as to them shall seem just and reasonable.’

By the same par. it is enacted, ‘That no proceedings, or judgments, had by virtue of this act, shall be removed, or superseded, by any writ of certiorari, or other writ whatsoever, unless the title of such tithes shall be in question.’

By the 7 & 8 W. 3. c. 34. par. 4. It is enacted, ‘That where any quaker shall refuse to pay, or compound, for his great or small tithes, it shall be lawful for the two next justices of the peace of the same county, other than such justice of the peace as is patron of the church, or chapel, to which the said tithes belong, or any ways interested in the said tithes, upon the complaint of the person who ought to have and receive the same, by warrant under their hands and seals to convene before them such quaker, and to examine upon oath, which oath the said justices are impowered to administer, or in such manner as by this act is provided, the truth and justice of the said complaint, and to ascertain what is due from such quaker to the party complaining, and by order under their hands and seals to direct the payment thereof, so as the sum ordered, as aforesaid, do not exceed ten pounds; and upon refusal by such quaker to pay according to such order, it shall be lawful for any one of the said justices, by warrant under his hand and seal, to levy the money, thereby ordered to be paid, by distress and sale of the goods of such offender.’

By the same par. it is enacted, ‘That any person finding himself aggrieved, by any judgment given by such two justices of the peace, may appeal to the next general quarter-sessions, and the justices of the peace there present, or the major part of them, shall proceed finally to hear and determine the matter; and if the justices then present, or the major part of them, shall find cause to continue the said judgment, they shall then decree the same by order of sessions, and shall proceed to give such costs against the appellant, as to them shall seem just and reasonable.’

And by the same par. it is enacted, ‘That no proceedings, or judgment, had by virtue of this act, shall be removed or superseded by any writ of certiorari, or other writ out of his majesty's courts of Westminster, or any other court whatsoever, unless the title to such tithes shall be in question.'

By the 1 Geo. 1. st. 2. cap. 6. par. 2. The like remedy is given for the recovery of all tithes and all other ecclesiastical dues from quakers, as by the 7 & 8 W. 3. cap. 34. is given for tithes to the value of ten pounds.

And it is thereby further enacted, 'That any two or more justices of the peace of the same county or place, other than such justice as is patron of the church, or chapel, to which the said tithes or dues belong, or any ways interested in the said tithes, upon complaint of any parson, vicar, curate, farmer or proprietor of such tithes, or other person, who ought to have, receive or collect, any such tithes or dues, are hereby required to summon, in writing under their hands and seals, by reasonable warning, such quaker or quakers, against whom such complaint shall be made; and after his or their appearance, or upon default of appearance, the said warning or summons being proved before them upon oath, to proceed to hear and determine the said complaint, and to make such order therein as in the said act is limited or directed; and also to order such costs and charges, not exceeding ten shillings, as upon the merits of the cause shall appear just; which order shall and may be so executed, and on such appeal may be reversed or affirmed, by the general quarter-sessions of the county or place, with such costs and remedy for the same, and shall not be removed into any other court, unless the title to such tithes shall be in question, in like manner as in and by the same act is limited and provided.'

Chapter the Fourth.

OF OFFENCES AGAINST GOD AND RELIGION.

IN the present chapter we are to enter upon the detail of the several species of crimes and misdemesnors, with the punishment annexed to each by the laws of England. It was observed, in the beginning of this book [a], that crimes and misdemesnors are a breach and violation of the public rights and duties, owing to the whole community, considered as a community, in it's social aggregate capacity. And in the very entrance of these commentaries[b] it was shewn, that human laws can have no concern with any but social and relative duties; being intended only to regulate the conduct of man, considered under various relations, as a member of civil society. All crimes ought therefore to be estimated merely according to the mischiefs which they produce in civil society[c]: and, of consequence, private vices, or the breach of mere absolute duties, which man is bound to perform considered only as an individual, are not, cannot be, the object of any municipal law; any farther than as by their evil example, or other pernicious effects, they may prejudice the community, and thereby become a species of public crimes. Thus the vice of drunkenness, if committed privately and alone, is beyond the knowlege and of course beyond the reach of human tribunals: but if committed publicly, in the face of the world, it's evil example makes it liable to temporal censures. The vice of lying, which consists (abstractedly taken) in a criminal violation of truth, and therefore in any shape is derogatory from sound morality, is not however taken notice of by our law, unless it carries with it some public inconvenience, as spreading false news; or some social injury, as slander and malicious prosecution, for which a private recompence is given. And yet drunkenness and lying are in foro conscientiae as thoroughly criminal when they are not, as when they are, attended with public inconvenience. The only difference is, that both public and private vices are subject to the vengeance of eternal justice; and public vices are besides liable to the temporal punishments of human tribunals.

On the other hand, there are some misdemesnors, which are punished by the municipal law, that are in themselves nothing criminal, but are made so by the positive constitutions of the state for public convenience. Such as poaching, exportation of wool, and the like. These are naturally no offences at all; but their whole criminality consists in their disobedience to the supreme power, which has an undoubted right for the well-being and peace of the community to make some things unlawful, which were in themselves indifferent. Upon the whole therefore, though part of the offences to he enumerated in the following sheets are offences against the revealed law of God, others against the law of nature, and some are offences against neither; yet in a treatise of municipal law we must consider them all as deriving their particular guilt, here punishable, from the law of man.

Having premised this caution, I shall next proceed to distribute the several offences, which are either directly or by consequence injurious to civil society, and therefore punishable by the laws of England, under the following general heads: first, those which are more immediately injurious to God and his holy religion; secondly, such as violate and transgress the law of nations; thirdly, such as more especially affect the sovereign executive power of the state, or the king and his government; fourthly, such as more directly infringe the rights of the public or common wealth; and, lastly, such as derogate from those rights and duties, which are owing to particular individuals, and in the preservation and vindication of which the community is deeply interested.

First then, of such crimes and misdemesnors, as more immediately offend Almighty God, by openly transgressing the precepts of religion either natural or revealed; and mediately, by their bad example and consequence, the law of society also; which constitutes that guilt in the action, which human tribunals are to censure.

I. Of this species the first is that of apostacy, or a total renunciation of christianity, by embracing either a false religion, or no religion at all. This offence can only take place in such as have once professed the true religion. The perversion of a christian to judaism, paganism, or other false religion, was punished by the emperors Constantius and Julian with confiscation of goods[d]; to which the emperors Theodosius and Valennian added capital punishment, in case the apostate endeavoured to pervert others to the same iniquity[e]. A punishment too severe for any temporal laws to inflict: and yet the zeal of our ancestors imported it into this country; for we find by Bracton[f], that in his time apostates were to be burnt to death. Doubtless the preservation of christianity, as a national religion, is, abstracted from it's own intrinsic truth, of the utmost consequence to the civil state: which a single instance will sufficiently demonstrate. The belief of a future state of rewards and punishments, the entertaining just ideas of the moral attributes of the supreme being, and a firm persuasion that he superintends and will finally compensate every action in human life (all which are clearly revealed in the doctrines, and forcibly inculcated by the precepts, of our saviour Christ) these are the grand foundation of all judicial oaths; which call God to witness the truth of those facts, which perhaps may be only known to him and the party attesting: all moral evidence therefore, all confidence in human veracity, must be weakened by irreligion, and overthrown by infidelity. Wherefore all affronts to christianity, or endeavours to depreciate it's efficacy, are highly deserving of human punishment. But yet the loss of life is a heavier penalty than the offence, taken in a civil light, deserves: and, taken in a spiritual light, our laws have no jurisdiction over it. This punishment therefore has long ago become obsolete; and the offence of apostacy was for a long time the object only of the ecclesiastical courts, which corrected the offender pro salute animae. But about the close of the last century, the civil liberties to which we were then restored being used as a cloke of maliciousness, and the most horrid doctrines subversive of all religion being publicly avowed both in discourse and writings, it was found necessary again for the civil power to interpose, by not admitting those miscreants[g] to the privileges of society, who maintained such principles as destroyed all moral obligation. To this end it was enacted by statute 9 & 10 W. III. c.32. that if any person educated in, or having made profession of, the christian religion, shall by writing, printing, teaching, or advised speaking, deny the christian religion to be true, or the holy scriptures to be of divine authority, he shall upon the first offence be rendered incapable to hold any office or place of trust; and, for the second, be rendered incapable of bringing any action, being guardian, executor, legatee, or purchaser of lands, and shall suffer three years imprisonment without bail. To give room however for repentance; if, within four months after the first conviction, the delinquent will in open court publicly renounce his error, he is discharged for that once from all disabilities.

II. A SECOND offence is that of heresy; which consists not in a total denial of christianity, but of some of it's essential doctrines, publicly and obstinately avowed; being defined, "sententia rerum divinarum humano sensu excogitata, palam docta, et pertinaciter desensa[h]." And here it must also be acknowleged that particular modes of belief or unbelief, not tending to overturn christianity itself, or to sap the foundations of morality, are by no means the object of coercion by the civil magistrate. What doctrines shall therefore be adjudged heresy, was left by our old constitution to the determination of the ecclesiastical judge; who had herein a most arbitrary latitude allowed him. For the general definition of an heretic given by Lyndewode[i], extends to the smallest deviations from the doctrines of holy church: "haereticus est qui dubitat de fide catholica, et qui negligit servare ea, quae Romana ecclesia statuit, seu servare decreverat." Or, as the statute 2 Hen. IV. c. 15. expresses it in English, "teachers of "erroneoús opinions, contrary to the faith and blessed determinations of the holy church." Very contrary this to the usage of the first general councils, which defined all heretical doctrines with the utmost precision and exactness. And what ought to have alleviated the punishment, the uncertainty of the crime, seems to have enhanced it in those days of blind zeal and pious cruelty. It is true, that the sanctimonious hypocrisy of the canonists went at first no farther than enjoining penance, excommunication, and ecclesiastical deprivation, for heresy; though afterwards they proceeded boldly to imprisonment by the ordinary, and confiscation of goods in pios usus. But in the mean time they had prevailed upon the weakness of bigotted princes to make the civil power subservient to their purposes, by making heresy not only a temporal, but even a capital offence: the Romish ecclesiastics determining, without appeal, whatever they pleased to be heresy, and shifting off to the secular arm the odium and drudgery of executions; with which they themselves were too tender and delicate to intermeddle. Nay they pretended to intercede and pray, on behalf of the convicted heretic, ut citra mortis periculum sententia circa eum moderetur[k]: well knowing at the same time that they were delivering the unhappy victim to certain death. Hence the capital punishments inflicted on the antient Donatists and Manichaeans by the emperors Theodosius and Justinian[l]: hence also the constitution of the emperor Frederic mentioned by Lyndewode[m], adjudging all persons without distinction to be burnt with fire, who were convicted of heresy by the ecclesiastical judge. The same emperor, in another constitution[n], ordained that if any temporal lord, when admonished by the church, should neglect to clear his territories of heretics within a year, it should be lawful for good catholics to seise and occupy the lands, and utterly to exterminate the heretical possessors. And upon this foundation was built that arbitrary power, so long claimed and so fatally exerted by the pope, of disposing even of the kingdoms of refractory princes to more dutiful sons of the church. The immediate event of this constitution was something singular, and may serve to illustrate at once the gratitude of the holy see, and the just punishment of the royal bigot: for upon the authority of this very constitution, the pope afterwards expelled this very emperor Frederic from his kingdom of Sicily, and gave it to Charles of Anjou[o].

Christianity being thus deformed by the daemon of persecution upon the continent, we cannot expect that our own island should be entirely free from the same scourge. And therefore we find among our antient precedents[p] a writ de haeretico comburendo, which is thought by some to be as antient as the common law itself. However it appears from thence, that the conviction of heresy by the common law was not in any petty ecclesiastical court, but before the archbishop himself in a provincial synod; and that the delinquent was delivered over to the king to do as he should please with him: so that the crown had a control over the spiritual power, and might pardon the convict by issuing no process against him; the writ de haeretico comburendo being not a writ of course, but issuing only by the special direction of the king in council[q].

But in the reign of Henry the fourth, when the eyes of the christian world began to open, and the seeds of the protestant religion (though under the opprobrious name of lollardy[r]) took root in this kingdom; the clergy, taking advantage from the king's dubious title to demand an increase of their own power, obtained an act of parliament[s], which sharpened the edge of persecution to it's utmost keenness. For, by that statute, the diocesan alone, without the intervention of a synod, might convict of heretical tenets; and unless the convict abjured his opinions, or if after abjuration he relapsed, the sheriff was bound ex officio, if required by the bishop, to commit the unhappy victim to the flames, without waiting for the consent of the crown. By the statute 2 Hen. V. c. 7. lollardy was also made a temporal offence, and indictable in the king's courts; which did not thereby gain an exclusive, but only a concurrent jurisdiction with the bishop's consistory.

Afterwards, when the final reformation of religion began to advance, the power of the ecclesiastics was somewhat moderated: for though what heresy is, was not then precisely defined, yet we are told in some points what it is not: the statute 25 Hen. VIII. c. 14. declaring, that offences against the see of Rome are not heresy; and the ordinary being thereby restrained from proceeding in any case upon mere suspicion; that is, unless the party be accused by two credible witnesses, or an indictment of heresy be first previously found in the king's courts of common law. And yet the spirit of persecution was not then abated, but only diverted into a lay chanel. For in six years afterwards, by statute 31 Hen. VIII. c. 14, the bloody law of the six articles was made, which established the six most contested points of popery, transubstantiation, communion in one kind, the celibacy of the clergy, monastic vows, the sacrifice of the mass, and auricular confession; which points were "determined and resolved by the most godly study, pain, and travail of his majesty: for which his most humble and obedient subjects, the lords spiritual and temporal and the commons, in parliament assembled, did not only render and give unto his highness their most high and hearty thanks," but did also enact and declare all oppugners of the first to be heretics, and to be burnt with fire; and of the five last to be felons, and to suffer death. The same statute established a new and mixed jurisdiction of clergy and laity for the trial and conviction of heretics; the reigning prince being then equally intent on destroying the supremacy of the bishops of Rome, and establishing all other their corruptions of the christian religion.

I SHALL not perplex this detail with the various repeals and revivals of these sanguinary laws in the two succeeding reigns; but shall proceed directly to the reign of queen Elizabeth; when the reformation was finally established with temper and decency, unsullied with party rancour, or personal caprice and resentment. By statute 1 Eliz. c. 1. all former statutes relating to heresy are repealed, which leaves the jurisdiction of heresy as it stood at common law; viz. as to the infliction of common censures, in the ecclesiastical courts; and, in case of burning the heretic, in the provincial synod only[t]. Sir Matthew Hale is indeed of a different opinion, and holds that such power resided in the diocesan also; though he agrees, that in either case the writ de haeretico comburendo was not demandable of common right, but grantable or otherwise merely at the king's discretion[u]. But the principal point now gained, was, that by this statute a boundary is for the first time set to what shall be accounted heresy; nothing for the future being to be so determined, but only such tenets, which have been heretofore so declared, 1. By the words of the canonical scriptures; 2. By the first four general councils, or such others as have only used the words of the holy scriptures; or, 3. Which shall hereafter be so declared by the parliament, with the assent of the clergy in convocation. Thus was heresy reduced to a greater certainty than before; though it might not have been the worse to have defined it in terms still more precise and particular: as a man continued still liable to be burnt, for what perhaps he did not understand to be heresy, till the ecclesiastical judge so interpreted the words of the canonical scriptures.

FOR the writ de haeretico comburendo remained still in force; and we have instances of it's being put in execution upon two anabaptists in the seventeenth of Elizabeth, and two Arians in the ninth of James the first. But it was totally abolished, and heresy again subjected only to ecclesiastical correction, pro salute animae, by virtue of the statute 29 Car. II. c. 9. For in one and the same reign, our lands were delivered from the slavery of military tenures; our bodies from arbitrary imprisonment by the habeas corpus act; and our minds from the tyranny of superstitious bigotry, by demolishing this last badge of persecution in the English law.

IN what I have now said I would not be understood to derogate from the just rights of the national church, or to favour a loose latitude of propagating any crude undigested sentiments in religious matters. Of propagating, I say; for the bare entertaining them, without an endeavour to diffuse them, seems hardly cognizable by any human authority. I only mean to illustrate the excellence of our present establishment, by looking back to former times. Every thing is now as it should be: unless perhaps that heresy ought to be more strictly defined, and no prosecution permitted, even in the ecclesiastical courts, till the tenets in question are by proper authority previously declared to be heretical. Under these restrictions, it seems necessary for the support of the national religion, that the officers of the church should have power to censure heretics, but not to exterminate or destroy them. It has also been thought proper for the civil magistrate again to interpose, with regard to one species of heresy, very prevalent in modern times: for by statute 9 & 10 W. III. c. 32. if any person educated in the christian religion, or professing the same, shall by writing, printing, teaching, or advised speaking, deny any one of the persons in the holy trinity to be God, or maintain that there are more Gods than one, he shall undergo the same penalties and incapacities, which were just now mentioned to be inflicted on apostacy by the same statute. And thus much for the crime of heresy.

III. ANOTHER species of offences against religion are those which affect the established church. And these are either positive, or negative. Positive, as by reviling it's ordinances: or negative, by non-conformity to it's worship. Of both of these in their order.

1. AND, first, of the offence of reviling the ordinances of the church. This is a crime of a much grosser nature than the other of mere non-conformity: since it carries with it the utmost indecency, arrogance, and ingratitude: indecency, by setting up private judgment in opposition to public; arrogance, by treating with contempt and rudeness what has at least a better chance to be right, than the singular notions of any particular man; and ingratitude, by denying that indulgence and liberty of conscience to the members of the national church, which the retainers to every petty conventicle enjoy. However it is provided by statutes 1 Edw. VI. c. 1. and 1 Eliz. c. 1. that whoever reviles the sacrament of the lord's supper shall be punished by fine and imprisonment: and by the statute 1 Eliz. c. 2. if any minister shall speak any thing in derogation of the book of common prayer, he shall be imprisoned six months, and forfeit a year's value of his benefice; and for the second offence he shall be deprived. And if any person whatsoever shall in plays, songs, or other open words, speak any thing in derogation, depraving, or despising of the said book, he shall forfeit for the first offence an hundred marks; for the second four hundred; and for the third shall forfeit all his goods and chattels, and suffer imprisonment for life. These penalties were framed in the infancy of our present establishment; when the disciples of Rome and of Geneva united in inveighing with the utmost bitterness against the English liturgy: and the terror of these laws (for they seldom, if ever, were fully executed) proved a principal means, under providence, of preserving the purity as well as decency of our national worship. Nor can their continuance to this time be thought too severe and intolerant; when we consider, that they are levelled at an offence, to which men cannot now be prompted by any laudable motive; not even by a mistaken zeal for reformation : since from political reasons, sufficiently hinted at in a former volume[v], it would now be extremely unadvisable to make any alterations in the service of the church; unless it could be shewn that some manifest impiety or shocking absurdity would follow from continuing it in it's present form. And therefore the virulent declamations of peevish or opinionated men on topics so often refuted, and of which the preface to the liturgy is itself a perpetual refutation, can be calculated for no other purpose, than merely to disturb the consciences, and poison the minds of the people.

2. NONCONFORMITY to the worship of the church is the other, or negative branch of this offence. And for this there is much more to be pleaded than for the former; being a matter of private conscience, to the scruples of which our present laws have shewn a very just and christian indulgence. For undoubtedly all persecution and oppression of weak consciences, on the score of religious persuasions, are highly unjustifiable upon every principle of natural reason, civil liberty, or found religion. But care must be taken not to carry this indulgence into such extremes, as may endanger the national church: there is always a difference to be made between toleration and establishment.

NONCONFORMISTS are of two sorts: first, such as absent themselves from the divine worship in the established church, through total irreligion, and attend the service of no other persuasion. These by the statutes of 1 Eliz. c. 2. 23 Eliz. c. 1. and 3 Jac. I. c. 4. forfeit one shilling to the poor every lord's day they so absent themselves, and 20 l. to the king if they continue such default for a month together. And if they keep any inmate, thus irreligiously disposed, in their houses, they forfeit 10 l. per month.

THE second species of non-conformists are those who offend through a mistaken or perverse zeal. Such were esteemed by our laws, enacted since the time of the reformation, to be papists and protestant dissenters: both of which were supposed to be equally schismatics in departing from the national church; with this difference, that the papists divide from us upon material, though erroneous, reasons; but many of the dissenters upon matters of indifference, or, in other words, upon no reason at all. However the laws against the former are much more severe than against the latter; the principles of the papists being deservedly looked upon to be subversive of the civil government, but not those of the protestant dissenters. As to the papists, their tenets are undoubtedly calculated for the introduction of all slavery, both civil and religious: but it may with justice be questioned, whether the spirit, the doctrines, and the practice of the sectaries are better calculated to make men good subjects. One thing is obvious to observe, that these have once within the compass of the last century, effected the ruin of our church and monarchy; which the papists have attempted indeed, but have never yet been able to execute. Yet certainly our ancestors were mistaken in their plans of compulsion and intolerance. The sin of schism, as such, is by no means the object of temporal coercion and punishment. If through weakness of intellect, through misdirected piety, through perverseness and acerbity of temper, or (which is often the case) through a prospect of secular advantage in herding with a party, men quarrel with the ecclesiastical establishment, the civil magistrate has nothing to do with it; unless their tenets and practice are such as threaten ruin or disturbance to the state. He is bound indeed to protect the established church, by admitting none but it's genuine members to offices of trust and emolument: for, if every sect was to be indulged in a free communion of civil employments, the idea of a national establishment would at once be destroyed, and the episcopal church would be no longer the church of England. But, this point being once secured, all persecution for diversity of opinions, however ridiculous or absurd they may be, is contrary to every principle of sound policy and civil freedom. The names and subordination of the clergy, the posture of devotion, the materials and colour of the minister's garment, the joining in a known or an unknown form of prayer, and other matters of the same kind, must be left to the option of every man's private judgment.

With regard therefore to protestant dissenters, although the experience of their turbulent disposition in former times occasioned several disabilities and restrictions (which I shall not undertake to justify) to be laid upon them by abundance of statutes[w], yet at length the legislature, with a spirit of true magnanimity, extended that indulgence to these sectaries, which they themselves, when in power, had held to be countenancing schism, and denied to the church of England. The penalties are all of them suspended by the statute 1 W. & M. st. 2. c. 18. commonly called the toleration act; which exempts all dissenters (except papists, and such as deny the trinity) from all penal laws relating to religion, provided they take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and subscribe the declaration against popery, and repair to some congregation registered in the bishop's court or at the sessions, the doors whereof must be always open: and dissenting teachers are also to subscribe the thirty nine articles, except those relating to church government and infant baptism. Thus are all persons, who will approve themselves no papists or oppugners of the trinity, left at full liberty to act as their conscience shall direct them, in the matter of religious worship. But by statute 5 Geo. I. c. 4. no mayor, or principal magistrate, must appear at any dissenting meeting with the ensigns of his office[x], on pain of disability to hold that or any other office: the legislature judging it a matter of propriety, that a mode of worship, set up in opposition to the national, when allowed to be exercised in peace, should be exercised also with decency, gratitude, and humility.

As to papists, what has been said of the protestant dissenters would hold equally strong for a general toleration of them; provided their separation was founded only upon difference of opinion in religion, and their principles did not also extend to a subversion of the civil government. If once they could be brought to renounce the supremacy of the pope, they might quietly enjoy their seven sacraments, their purgatory, and auricular confession; their worship of reliques and images; nay even their transubstantiation. But while they acknowlege a foreign power, superior to the sovereignty of the kingdom, they cannot complain if the laws of that kingdom will not treat them upon the footing of good subjects.

Let us therefore now take a view of the laws in force against the papists; who may be divided into three classes, persons professing popery, popish recusants convict, and popish priests. 1. Persons professing the popish religion, besides the former penalties for not frequenting their parish church, are by several statutes, too numerous to be here recited[y], disabled from taking any lands either by descent or purchase, after eighteen years of age, until they renounce their errors; they must at the age of twenty one register their estates before acquired, and all future conveyances and wills relating to them; they are incapable of presenting to any advowson, or granting to any other person any avoidance of the same, in prejudice of the two universities; they may not keep or teach any school under pain of perpetual imprisonment; they are liable also in some instances to pay double taxes; and, if they willingly say or hear mass, they forfeit the one two hundred, the other one hundred marks, and each shall suffer a year's imprisonment. Thus much for persons, who, from the misfortune of family prejudices or otherwise, have conceived an unhappy attachment to the Romish church from their infancy, and publicly profess it's errors. But if any evil industry is used to rivet these errors upon them, if any person sends another abroad to be educated in the popish religion, or to reside in any religious house abroad for that purpose, or contributes any thing to their maintenance when there; both the sender, the sent, and the contributor, are disabled to sue in law or equity, to be executor or administrator to any person, to take any legacy or deed of gift, and to bear any office in the realm, and shall forfeit all their goods and chattels, and likewise all their real estate for life. And where these errors are also aggravated by apostacy, or perversion, where a person is reconciled to the see of Rome or procures others to be reconciled, the offence amounts to high treason. 2. Popish recusants, convicted in a court of law of not attending the service of the church of England, are subject to the following disabilities, penalties, and forfeitures, over and above those beforementioned. They can hold no office or employment; they must not keep arms in their houses, but the same may be seised by the justices of the peace; they may not come within ten miles of London, on pain of 100 l; they can bring no action at law, or suit in equity; they are not permitted to travel above five miles from home, unless by licence, upon pain of forfeiting all their goods; and they may not come to court, under pain of 100 l. No marriage or burial of such recusant, or baptism of his child, shall be had otherwise than by the ministers of the church of England, under other severe penalties. A married woman, when recusant, shall forfeit two thirds of her dower or jointure, may not be executrix or administratrix to her husband, nor have any part of his goods; and during the coverture may be kept in prison, unless her husband redeems her at the rate of 10 l. a month, or the third part of all his lands. And, lastly, as a feme-covert recusant may be imprisoned, so all others must, within three months after conviction, either submit and renounce their errors, or, if required so to do by four justices, must abjure and renounce the realm: and if they do not depart, or if they return without the king's licence, they shall be guilty of felony, and suffer death as felons. There is also an inferior species of recusancy, (refusing to make the declaration against popery enjoined by statute 30 Car. II. st. 2. when tendered by the proper magistrate) which, if the party resides within ten miles of London, makes him an absolute recusant convict; or, if at a greater distance, suspends him from having any seat in parliament, keeping arms in his house, or any horse above the value of five pounds. This is the state, by the laws now in being, of a lay papist. But, 3. The remaining species or degree, viz. popish priests, are in a still more dangerous condition. By statute 11 & 12 W. III. c. 4. popish priests or bishops, celebrating mass or exercising any parts of their functions in England, except in the houses of embassadors, are liable to perpetual imprisonment. And by the statute 27 Eliz. c. 2. any popish priest, born in the dominions of the crown of England, who shall come over hither from beyond sea, or shall be in England three days without conforming and taking the oaths, is guilty of high treason: and all persons harbouring him are guilty of felony without the benefit of clergy.

THIS is a short summary of the laws against the papists, under their three several classes, of persons professing the popish religion, popish recusants convict, and popish priests. Of which the president Montesquieu observes[z], that they are so rigorous, though not professedly of the sanguinary kind, that they do all the hurt that can possibly be done in cold blood. But in answer to this it may be observed, (what foreigners who only judge from our statute book are not fully apprized of) that these laws are seldom exerted to their utmost rigor: and indeed, if they were, it would be very difficult to excuse them. For they are rather to be accounted for from their history, and the urgency of the times which produced them, than to be approved (upon a cool review) as a standing system of law. The restless machinations of the jesuits during the reign of Elizabeth, the turbulence and uneasiness of the papists under the new religious establishment, and the boldness of their hopes and wishes for the succession of the queen of Scots, obliged the parliament to counteract so dangerous a spirit by laws of a great, and perhaps necessary, severity. The powder-treason, in the succeeding reign, struck a panic into James I, which operated in different ways: it occasioned the enacting of new laws against the papists; but deterred him from putting them in execution. The intrigues of queen Henrietta in the reign of Charles I, the prospect of a popish successor in that of Charles II, the assassination-plot in the reign of king William, and the avowed claim of a popish pretender to the crown, will account for the extension of these penalties at those several periods of our history. But if a time should ever arrive, and perhaps it is not very distant, when all fears of a pretender shall have vanished, and the power and influence of the pope shall become feeble, ridiculous, and despicable, not only in England but in every kingdom of Europe; it probably would not then be amiss to review and soften these rigorous edicts; at least till the civil principles of the roman-catholics called again upon the legislature to renew them: for it ought not to be left in the breast of every merciless bigot, to drag down the vengeance of these occasional laws upon inoffensive, though mistaken, subjects; in opposition to the lenient inclinations of the civil magistrate, and to the destruction of every principle of toleration and religious liberty.

In order the better to secure the established church against perils from non-conformists of all denominations, infidels, turks, jews, heretics, papists, and sectaries, there are however two bulwarks erected; called the corporation and test acts: by the former of which[a] no person can be legally elected to any office relating to the government of any city or corporation, unless, within a twelvemonth before, he has received the sacrament of the lord's supper according to the rites of the church of England: and he is also enjoined to take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy at the same time that he takes the oath of office: or, in default of either of these requisites, such election shall be void. The other, called the test act[b], directs all officers civil and military to take the oaths and make the declaration against transubstantiation, in the court of king's bench or chancery, the next term, or at the next quarter sessions, or (by subsequent statutes) within six months, after their admission; and also within the same time to receive the sacrament of the lord's supper, according to the usage of the church of England, in some public church immediately after divine service and sermon, and to deliver into court a certificate thereof signed by the minister and churchwarden, and also to prove the same by two credible witnesses; upon forfeiture of 500 l, and disability to hold the said office. And of much the same nature with these is the statute 7 Jac. I. c. 2. which permits no persons to be naturalized or restored in blood, but such as undergo a like test: which test having been removed in 1753, in favour of the Jews, was the next session of parliament restored again with some precipitation.

Thus much for offences, which strike at our national religion, or the doctrine and discipline of the church of England in particular. I proceed now to consider some gross impieties and general immoralities, which are taken notice of and punished by our municipal law; frequently in concurrence with the ecclesiastical, to which the censure of many of them does also of right appertain; though with a view somewhat different: the spiritual court punishing all sinful enormities for the sake of reforming the private sinner, pro salute animae; while the temporal courts resent the public affront to religion and morality, on which all government must depend for support, and correct more for the sake of example than private amendment.

IV. The fourth species of offences therefore, more immediately against God and religion, is that of blasphemy against the Almighty, by denying his being or providence; or by contumelious reproaches of our Saviour Christ. Whither also may be referred all profane scoffing at the holy scripture, or exposing it to contempt and ridicule. These are offences punishable at common law by fine and imprisonment, or other infamous corporal punishment[c]: for christianity is part of the laws of England[d].

V. Somewhat allied to this, though in an inferior degree, is the offence of profane and common swearing and cursing. By the last statute against which, 19 Geo. II. c. 21. which repeals all former ones, every labourer, sailor, or soldier shall forfeit 1 s. for every profane oath or curse, every other person under the degree of a gentleman 2 s. and every gentleman or person of superior rank 5 s. to the poor of the parish; and, on a second conviction, double; and, for every subsequent conviction, treble the sum first forfeited; with all charges of conviction: and in default of payment shall be sent to the house of correction for ten days. Any justice of the peace may convict upon his own hearing, or the testimony of one witness; and any constable or peace officer, upon his own hearing, may secure any offender and carry him before a justice, and there convict him. If the justice omits his duty, he forfeits 5 l, and the constable 40 s. And the act is to be read in all parish churches, and public chapels, the sunday after every quarter day, on pain of 5 l. to be levied by warrant from any justice. Besides this punishment for taking God's name in vain in common discourse, it is enacted by statute 3 Jac. I. c. 21. that if in any stage play, interlude, or shew, the name of the holy trinity, or any of the persons therein, be jestingly or profanely used, the offender shall forfeit 10 l, one moiety to the king, and the other to the informer.

VI. A sixth species of offences against God and religion, of which our antient books are full, is a crime of which one knows not well what account to give. I mean the offence of witchcraft, conjuration, inchantment, or sorcery. To deny the possibility, nay, actual existence, of witchcraft and sorcery, is at once flatly to contradict the revealed word of God, in various passages both of the old and new testament: and the thing itself is a truth to which every nation in the world hath in it's turn borne testimony, by either examples seemingly well attested, or prohibitory laws, which at least suppose the possibility of a commerce with evil spirits. The civil law punishes with death not only the sorcerers themselves, but also those who consult them[e]; imitating in the former the express law of God[f], "thou shalt not suffer a witch to live." And our own laws, both before and since the conquest, have been equally penal; ranking this crime in the same class with heresy, and condemning both to the flames[g]. The president Montesquieu[h] ranks them also both together, but with a very different view: laying it down as an important maxim, that we ought to be very circumspect in the prosecution of magic and heresy; because the most unexceptionable conduct, the purest morals, and the constant practice of every duty in life, are not a sufficient security against the suspicion of crimes like these. And indeed the ridiculous stories that are generally told, and the many impostures and delusions that have been discovered in all ages, are enough to demolish all faith in such a dubious crime; if the contrary evidence were not also extremely strong. Wherefore it seems to be the most eligible way to conclude, with an ingenious writer of our own[i], that in general there has been such a thing as witchcraft; though one cannot give credit to any particular modern instance of it.

OUR forefathers were stronger believers, when they enacted by statute 33 Hen. VIII. c. 8. all witchcraft and sorcery to be felony without benefit of clergy; and again by statute 1 Jac. I. c. 12. that all persons invoking any evil spirit, or consulting, covenanting with, entertaining, employing, feeding, or rewarding any evil spirit; or taking up dead bodies from their graves to be used in any witchcraft, sorcery, charm, or inchantment; or killing or otherwise hurting any person by such infernal arts; should be guilty of felony without benefit of clergy, and suffer death. And, if any person should attempt by sorcery to discover hidden treasure, or to restore stolen goods, or to provoke unlawful love, or to hurt any man or beast, though the same were not effected, he or she should suffer imprisonment and pillory for the first offence, and death for the second. These acts continued in force till lately, to the terror of all antient females in the kingdom: and many poor wretches were sacrificed thereby to the prejudice of their neighbours, and their own illusions; not a few having, by some means or other, confessed the fact at the gallows. But all executions for this dubious crime are now at an end; our legislature having at length followed the wise example of Louis XIV in France, who thought proper by an edict to restrain the tribunals of justice from receiving informations of witchcraft[k]. And accordingly it is with us enacted by statute 9 Geo. II. c. 5. that no prosecution shall for the future be carried on against any person for conjuration, witchcraft, sorcery, or inchantment. But the misdemesnor of persons pretending to use witchcraft, tell fortunes, or discover stolen goods by skill in the occult sciences, is still deservedly punished with a year's imprisonment, and standing four times in the pillory.

VII. A SEVENTH species of offenders in this class are all religious impostors: such as falsely pretend an extraordinary commission from heaven; or terrify and abuse the people with false denunciations of judgments. These, as tending to subvert all religion, by bringing it into ridicule and contempt, are punishable by the temporal courts with fine, imprisonment, and infamous corporal punishment[l].

VIII. SIMONY, or the corrupt presentation of any one to an ecclesiastical benefice for gift or reward, is also to be considered as an offence against religion; as well by reason of the sacredness of the charge which is thus profanely bought and sold, as because it is always attended with perjury in the person presented[m]. The statute 31 Eliz. c. 6. (which, so far as it relates to the forfeiture of the right of presentation, was considered in a former book[n]) enacts, that if any patron, for money or any other corrupt consideration or promise, directly or indirectly given, shall present, admit, institute, induct, install, or collate any person to an ecclesiastical benefice or dignity, both the giver and taker shall forfeit two years value of the benefice or dignity; one moiety to the king, and the other to any one who will sue for the same. If persons also corruptly resign or exchange their benefices, both the giver and taker shall in like manner forfeit double the value of the money or other corrupt consideration. And persons who shall corruptly ordain or licence any minister, or procure him to be ordained or licenced, (which is the true idea of simony) shall incur a like forfeiture of forty pounds; and the minister himself of ten pounds, besides an incapacity to hold any ecclesiastical preferment for seven years afterwards. Corrupt elections and resignations in colleges, hospitals, and other eleemosynary corporations, are also punished by the same statute with forfeiture of the double value, vacating the place or office, and a devolution of the right of election for that turn to the crown.

IX. PROFANATION of the lord's day, or sabbath-breaking, is a ninth offence against God and religion, punished by the municipal laws of England. For, besides the notorious indecency and scandal, of permitting any secular business to be publicly transacted on that day, in a country professing christianity, and the corruption of morals which usually follows it's profanation, the keeping one day in seven holy, as a time of relaxation and refreshment as well as for public worship, is of admirable service to a state, considered merely as a civil institution. It humanizes by the help of conversation and society the manners of the lower classes; which would otherwise degenerate into a sordid ferocity and savage selfishness of spirit: it enables the industrious workman to pursue his occupation in the ensuing week with health and chearfulness: it imprints on the minds of the people that sense of their duty to God, so necessary to make them good citizens; but which yet would be worn out and defaced by an unremitted continuance of labour, without any stated times of recalling them to the worship of their maker. And therefore the laws of king Athelstan[o] forbad all merchandizing on the lord's day, under very severe penalties. And by the statute 27 Hen. VI. c.5. no fair or market shall be held on the principal festivals, good friday, or any sunday (except the four sundays in harvest) on pain of forfeiting the goods exposed to sale. And, since, by the statute 1 Car. I. c. 1. no persons shall assemble, out of their own parishes, for any sport whatsoever upon this day; nor, in their parishes, shall use any bull or bear baiting, interludes, plays, or other unlawful exercises, or pastimes; on pain that every offender shall pay 3 s. 4 d. to the poor. This statute does not prohibit, but rather impliedly allows, any innocent recreation or amusement, within their respective parishes, even on the lord's day, after divine service is over. But by statute 29 Car. II. c. 7. no person is allowed to work on the lord's day, or use any boat or barge, or expose any goods to sale; except meat in public houses, milk at certain hours, and works of necessity or charity, on forfeiture of 5 s. Nor shall any drover, carrier, or the like, travel upon that day, under pain of twenty shillings.

X. Drunkenness is also punished by statute 4 Jac. I. c. 5. with the forfeiture of 5 s; or the sitting six hours in the stocks: by which time the statute presumes the offender will have regained his senses, and not be liable to do mischief to his neighbours. And there are many wholsome statutes, by way of prevention, chiefly passed in the same reign of king James I, which regulate the licencing of alehouses, and punish persons found tippling therein; or the masters of such houses permitting them.

XI. The last offence which I shall mention, more immediately against religion and morality, and cognizable by the temporal courts, is that of open and notorious lewdness: either by frequenting houses of ill fame, which is an indictable offence[p]; or by some grossly scandalous and public indecency, for which the punishment is by fine and imprisonment[q]. In the year 1650, when the ruling powers found it for their interest to put on the semblance of a very extraordinary strictness and purity of morals, not only incest and wilful adultery were made capital crimes; but also the repeated act of keeping a brothel, or committing fornication, were (upon a second conviction) made felony without benefit of clergy[r]. But at the restoration, when men from an abhorrence of the hypocrisy of the late times fell into a contrary extreme, of licentiousness, it was not thought proper to renew a law of such unfashionable rigour. And these offences have been ever since left to the feeble coercion of the spiritual court, according to the rules of the canon law; a law which has treated the offence of incontinence, nay even adultery itself, with a great degree of tenderness and lenity; owing perhaps to the celibacy of it's first compilers. The temporal courts therefore take no cognizance of the crime of adultery, otherwise than as a private injury[s].

But, before we quit this subject, we must take notice of the temporal punishment for having bastard children, considered in a criminal light; for with regard to the maintenance of such illegitimate offspring, which is a civil concern, we have formerly spoken at large[t]. By the statute 18 Eliz. c. 3. two justices may take order for the punishment of the mother and reputed father; but what that punishment shall be, is not therein ascertained: though the contemporary exposition was, that a corporal punishment was intended[u]. By statute 7 Jac. I. c. 4. a specific punishment (viz. commitment to the house of correction) is inflicted on the woman only. But in both cases, it seems that the penalty can only be inflicted, if the bastard becomes chargeable to the parish: for otherwise the very maintenance of the child is considered as a degree of punishment. By the last mentioned statute the justices may commit the mother to the house of correction, there to be punished and set on work for one year; and, in case of a second offence, till she find sureties never to offend again.

> ORDERED, That it be referred to a committee of three, to prepare and report a proper arrangement of, and introduction to the articles of amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as agreed to by the House; and that Mr. Benson, Mr. Sherman, and Mr. Sedgwick be of the said committee.

2.2 Discussion of Drafts and Proposals

2.2.1.1June 8, 17892

2.2.1.1.a Mr. Jackson

The gentleman endeavours to secure the liberty of the press; pray how is this in danger. There is no power given to congress to regulate this subject as they can commerce, or peace, or war. Has any transactions taken place to make us suppose such an amendment necessary? An honorable gentleman, a member of this house, has been attacked in the public newspapers, on account of sentiments delivered on this floor. Have congress taken any notice of it? Have they ordered the writer before them, even for a breach of privilege, altho' the constitution provides that a member shall not be questioned in any place for any speech or debate in the house? No, these things are suffered to public view, and held up to the inspection of the world. These are principles which will always prevail; I am not afraid, nor are other members I believe, our conduct should meet the severest scrutiny. Where then is the necessity of taking measures to secure what neither is nor can be in danger?

Congressional Register, June 8, 1789, vol. 1, pp. 437–38.

2.2.1.1.b The press, Mr. Jackson observed, is unboundedly free — a recent instance of which the House had witnessed in an attack upon one of its members — A bill of rights is a mere ignis fatuus, amusing by appearances, and leading often to dangerous conclusions. —

2.2.2STATE CONVENTIONS

2.2.2.1North Carolina, July 30, 1788

Mr. SPAIGHT. …

… The gentleman advises such amendments as would satisfy him, and proposes a mode of amending before ratifying. If we do not adopt first, we are no more a part of the Union than any foreign power. It will be also throwing away the influence of our state to propose amendments as the condition of our ratification. If we adopt first, our representatives will have a proportionable weight in bringing about amendments, which will not be the case if we do not adopt. It is adopted by ten states already. The question, then, is, not whether the Constitution be good, but whether we will or will not confederate with the other states. The gentleman supposes that the liberty of the press is not secured. The Constitution does not take it away. It says nothing of it, and can do nothing to injure it. But it is secured by the constitution of every state in the Union in the most ample manner.

He objects to giving the government exclusive legislation in a district not exceeding ten miles square, although the previous consent and cession of the state within which it may be, is required. Is it to be supposed that the representatives of the people will make regulations therein dangerous to liberty? Is there the least color or pretext for saying that the militia will be carried and kept there for life? Where is there any power to do this? The power of calling forth the militia is given for the common defence; and can we suppose that our own representatives, chosen for so short a period, will dare to pervert a power, given for the general protection, to an absolute oppression? But the gentleman has gone farther, and says, that any man who will complain of their oppressions, or write against their usurpation, may be deemed a traitor, and tried as such in the ten miles square, without a jury. What an astonishing misrepresentation! Why did not the gentleman look at the Constitution, and see their powers? Treason is there defined. It says, expressly, that treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort. Complaining, therefore, or writing, cannot be treason. [Here Mr. Lenoir rose, and said he meant misprision of treason.] The same reasons hold against that too. The liberty of the press being secured, creates an additional security.

Elliot, vol. 4, pp. 208–09.

2.2.2.2South Carolina, January 18, 1788

Hon. JAMES LINCOLN. …

He would be glad to know why, in this Constitution, there is a total silence with regard to the liberty of the press. Was it forgotten? Impossible! Then it must have been purposely omitted; and with what design, good or bad, he left the world to judge. The liberty of the press was the tyrant's scourge — it was the true friend and firmest supporter of civil liberty; therefore why pass it by in silence? He perceived that not till almost the very end of the Constitution was there any provision made for the nature or form of government we were to live under: he contended it should have been the very first article; it should have been, as it were, the groundwork or foundation on which it should have been built. But how is it? At the very end of the Constitution, there is a clause which says,—"The Congress of the United States shall guaranty to each state a republican form of government." But pray, who are the United States? — A President and four or five senators? Pray, sir, what security have we for a republican form of government, when it depends on the mere will and pleasure of a few men, who, with an army, navy, and rich treasury at their back, may change and alter it as they please? It may be said they will be sworn. Sir, the king of Great Britain, at his coronation, swore to govern his subjects with justice and mercy. We were then his subjects, and continued so for a long time after. He would be glad to know how he observed his oath. If, then, the king of Great Britain forswore himself, what security have we that a future President and four or five senators — men like himself — will think more solemnly of so sacred an obligation than he did?

Why was not this Constitution ushered in with the bill of rights? Are the people to have no rights? Perhaps this same President and Senate would, by and by, declare them. He much feared they would. He concluded by returning his hearty thanks to the gentleman who had so nobly opposed this Constitution: it was supporting the cause of the people; and if ever any one deserved the title of man of the people, he, on this occasion, most certainly did.

Gen. CHARLES COTESWORTH PINCKNEY answered Mr. Lincoln on his objections. … With regard to the liberty of the press, the discussion of that matter was not forgotten by the members of the Convention. It was fully debated, and the impropriety of saying any thing about it in the Constitution clearly evinced. The general government has no powers but what are expressly granted to it; it therefore has no power to take away the liberty of the press. That invaluable blessing, which deserves all the encomiums the gentleman has justly bestowed upon it, is secured by all our state constitutions; and to have mentioned it in our general Constitution would perhaps furnish an argument, hereafter, that the general government had a right to exercise powers not expressly delegated to it. For the same reason, we had no bill of rights inserted in our Constitution; for, as we might perhaps have omitted the enumeration of some of our rights, it might hereafter be said we had delegated to the general government a power to take away such of our rights as we had not enumerated; but by delegating express powers, we certainly reserve to ourselves every power and right not mentioned in the Constitution.

Elliot, vol. 4, pp. 314–16.

2.2.2.3Pennsylvania, December 1, 1787

Mr. WILSON. …

… In answer to the gentlemen from Fayette, (Mr. Smilie,) on the subject of the press, I beg leave to make an observation. It is very true, sir, that this Constitution says nothing with regard to that subject, nor was it necessary; because it will be found that there is given to the general government no power whatsoever concerning it; and no law, in pursuance of the Constitution, can possibly be enacted to destroy that liberty.

I heard the honorable gentleman make this general assertion, that the Congress was certainly vested with power to make such a law; but I would be glad to know by what part of this Constitution such a power is given?

Until that is done, I shall not enter into a minute investigation of the matter, but shall at present satisfy myself with giving an answer to a question that has been put. It has been asked, If a law should be made to punish libels, and the judges should proceed under that law, what chance would the printer have of an acquittal? And it has been said he would drop into a den of devouring monsters!

I presume it was not in the view of the honorable gentleman to say there is no such thing as a libel, or that the writers of such ought not to be punished. The idea of the liberty of the press is not carried so far as this in any country. What is meant by the liberty of the press is, that there should be no antecedent restraint upon it; but that every author is responsible when he attacks the security or welfare of the government, or the safety, character, and property of the individual.

With regard to attacks upon the public, the mode of proceeding is by a prosecution. Now, if a libel is written, it must be within some one of the United States, or the district of Congress. With regard to that district, I hope it will take care to preserve this as well as the other rights of freemen; for, whatever district Congress may choose, the cession of it cannot be completed without the consent of its inhabitants. Now, sir, if this libel is to be tried, it must be tried where the offence was committed; for, under this Consititution, as declared in the 2d section of the 3d article, the trial must be held in the state; therefore, on this occasion, it must be tried where it was published, if the indictment is for publishing; and it must be tried likewise by a jury of that state. Now, I would ask, is the person prosecuted in a worse situation under the general government, even if it had the power to make laws on this subject, than he is at present under the state government? It is true, there is no particular regulation made, to have the jury come from the body of the county in which the offence was committed; but there are some states in which this mode of collecting juries is contrary to their established custom, and gentlemen ought to consider that this Constitution was not meant merely for Pennsylvania. In some states, the juries are not taken from a single county. In Virginia, the sheriff, I believe, is not confined even to the inhabitants of the state, but is at liberty to take any man he pleases, and put him on the jury. In Maryland, I think, a set of jurors serve for the whole western shore, and another for the eastern shore.

Elliot, vol. 2, pp. 449–50.

Mr. HENRY. …

A bill of rights may be summed up in a few words. What do they tell us? —That our rights are reserved. Why not say so? Is it because it will consume too much paper? Gentlemen's reasoning against a bill of rights does not satisfy me. Without saying which has the right side, it remains doubtful. A bill of rights is a favorite thing with the Virginians and the people of the other states likewise. It may be their prejudice, but the government ought to suit their geniuses; otherwise, its operation will be unhappy. A bill of rights, even if its necessity be doubtful, will exclude the possibility of dispute; and, with great submission, I think the best way is to have no dispute. In the present Constitution, they are restrained from issuing general warrants to search suspected places, or seize persons not named, without evidence of the commission of a fact, &c. There was certainly some celestial influence governing those who deliberated on that Constitution; for they have, with the most cautious and enlightened circumspection, guarded those indefeasible rights which ought ever to be held sacred! The officers of Congress may come upon you now, fortified with all the terrors of paramount federal authority. Excisemen may come in multitudes; for the limitation of their numbers no man knows. They may, unless the general government be restrained by a bill of rights, or some similar restriction, go into your cellars and rooms, and search, ransack, and measure, every thing you eat, drink, and wear. They ought to be restrained within proper bounds. With respect to the freedom of the press, I need say nothing; for it is hoped that the gentlemen who shall compose Congress will take care to infringe as little as possible the rights of human nature. This will result from their integrity. They should, from prudence, abstain from violating the rights of their constituents. They are not, however, expressly restrained. But whether they will intermeddle with that palladium of our liberties or not, I leave you to determine.

Gov. RANDOLPH. …

Then, sir, the freedom of the press is said to be insecure. God forbid that I should give my voice against the freedom of the press. But I ask, (and with confidence that it cannot be answered,) Where is the page where it is restrained? If there had been any regulation about it, leaving it insecure, then there might have been reason for clamors. But this is not the case. If it be, I again ask for the particular clause which gives liberty to destroy the freedom of the press.

2.2.2.4.cJune 24, 1788

Mr. DAWSON. …

That sacred palladium of liberty, the freedom of the press, (the influence of which is so great that it is the opinion of the ablest writers that no country can remain long in slavery where it is unrestrained,) has not been expressed; nor are the liberties of the people ascertained and protected by any declaration of rights; that inestimable privilege, (the most important which freemen can enjoy,) the trial by jury in all civil cases, has not been guarded by the system;—and while they have been inattentive to these all-important considerations, they have made provision for the introduction of standing armies in time of peace. These, sir, ever have been used as the grand machines to suppress the liberties of the people, and will ever awaken the jealousy of republicans, so long as liberty is dear, and tyranny odious, to mankind.

Elliot, vol. 3, pp. 610–11.

2.2.3PHILADELPHIA CONVENTION

2.2.3.1Proposal by Pinckney, May 29, 1787

"ART. VI. … The legislature of the United States shall pass no law on the subject of religion; nor touching or abridging the liberty of the press; [n]or shall the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus ever be suspended, except in case of rebellion or invasion.

Elliot, vol. 5, pp. 130–31.

2.2.3.2Proposal by Pinckney, August 20, 1787

In Convention.—Mr. PINCKNEY submitted to the House, in order to be referred to the committee of detail, the following propositions:—

"The liberty of the press shall be inviolably preserved.

Elliot, vol. 5, p. 445.

2.2.3.3Proposal by Pinckney & Gerry, September 14, 1787

Mr. PINCKNEY and Mr. GERRY moved to insert a declaration, "that the liberty of the press should be inviolably observed."

Mr. SHERMAN. It is unnecessary. The power of the Congress does not extend to the press.

On the question, it passed in the negative.

Elliot, vol. 5, p. 545.

2.2.4NEWSPAPERS AND PAMPHLETS

2.2.4.1A Citizen of New-York: An Address to the People of the State of New York, April 15, 1787

We are told, among other strange things, that the liberty of the press is left insecure by the proposed Constitution, and yet that Constitution says neither more nor less about it, than the Constitution of the State of New York does. We are told that it deprives us of trial by jury, whereas the fact is, that it expressly secures it in certain cases, and takes it away in none — it is absurd to construe the silence of this, or of our own Constitution, relative to a great number of our rights, into a total extinction of them — silence and blank paper neither grant nor take away anything. Complaints are also made that the proposed Constitution is not accompanied by a bill of rights; and yet they who would make these complaints, know and are content that no bill of rights accompanied the Constitution of this State. In days and countries, where Monarchs and their subjects were frequently disputing about prerogative and privileges, the latter often found it necessary, as it were to run out the line between them, and oblige the former to admit by solemn acts, called bills of rights, that certain enumerated rights belonged to the people, and were not comprehended in the royal prerogative. But thank God we have no such disputes — we have no Monarchs to contend with, or demand admission from — the proposed Government is to be the government of the people — all its officers are to be their officers, and to exercise no rights but such as the people commit to them. The Constitution only serves to point out that part of the people's business, which they think proper by it to refer to the management of the persons therein designated — those persons are to receive that business to manage, not for themselves, and as their own, but as agents and overseers for the people to whom they are constantly responsible, and by whom only they are to be appointed.

Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 17, pp. 112–13.

2.2.4.2 George Mason, Objections to the Constitution, October 4, 1787

Under their own construction of the general Clause at the End of the enumerated powers, the Congress may grant Monopolies in Trade and Commerce, constitute new Crimes, inflict unusual and severe Punishments, and extend their power as far as they shall think proper; so that the State Legislatures have no Security for the Powers now presumed to remain to them; or the People for their Rights.

There is no declaration of any kind for preserving the Liberty of the Press, the Tryal by Jury in civil Causes; nor against the Danger of standing Armys in time of Peace.

Storing, vol. 2, p. 13.

2.2.4.3 James Wilson, Speech at a Meeting in Philadelphia, October 6, 1787

… This distinction being recognized, will furnish an answer to those who think the omission of a bill of rights, a defect in the proposed constitution:

for it would have been superfluous and absurd, to have stipulated with a foederal body of our own creation, that we should enjoy those privileges, of which we are not divested either by the intention or the act that has brought that body into existence. For instance, the liberty of the press, which has been a copious subject of declamation and opposition: what controul can proceed from the foederal government, to shackle or destroy that sacred palladium of national freedom? If, indeed, a power similar to that which has been granted for the regulation of commerce, had been granted to regulate literary publications, it would have been as necessary to stipulate that the liberty of the press should be preserved inviolate, as that the impost should be general in its operation.

Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 13, pp. 339–40.

2.2.4.4The Federal Farmer, No. 4, October 12, 1787

I confess I do not see in what cases the congress can, with any pretence of right, make a law to suppress the freedom of the press; though I am not clear, that congress is restrained from laying any duties whatever on printing, and from laying duties particularly heavy on certain pieces printed, and perhaps congress may require large bonds for the payment of these duties. Should the printer say, the freedom of the press was secured by the constitution of the state in which he lived, congress might, and perhaps, with great propriety, answer, that the federal constitution is the only compact existing between them and the people; in this compact the people have named no others, and therefore congress, in exercising the powers assigned them, and in making laws to carry them into execution, are restrained by nothing beside the federal constitution, any more than a state legislature is restrained by a compact between the magistrates and people of a county, city, or town of which the people, in forming the state constitution, have taken no notice.

It is not my object to enumerate rights of inconsiderable importance; but there are others, no doubt, which ought to be established as a fundamental part of the national system.

Storing, vol. 2, p. 250.

2.2.4.5An Old Whig, No. 1, October 12, 1787

… Should the freedom of the press be restrained on the subject of politics, there is no doubt it will soon after be restrained on all other subjects, religious as well as civil. …

2.2.4.6Centinel, No. 2, October 24, 1787

FRIENDS, COUNTRYMEN, and FELLOW-CITIZENS, As long as the liberty of the press continues unviolated, and the people have the right of expressing and publishing their sentiments upon every public measure, it is next to impossible to enslave a free nation. The state of society must be very corrupt and base indeed, when the people in possession of such a monitor as the press, can be induced to exchange the heavenborn blessings of liberty for the galling chains of despotism. — Men of an aspiring and tyrannical disposition, sensible of this truth, have ever been inimical to the press, and have considered the shackling of it, as the first step towards the accomplishment of their hateful dominaton, and the entire suppression of all liberty of public discussion, as necessary to its support. — For even a standing army, that grand engine of oppression, if it were as numerous as the abilities of any nation could maintain, would not be equal to the purposes of despotism over an enlightenend [sic] people.

The abolition of that grand palladium of freedom, the liberty of the press, in the proposed plan of government, and the conduct of its authors, and patrons, is a striking exemplification of these observations. The reason assigned for the omission of a bill of rights, securing the liberty of the press, and other invaluable personal rights, is an insult on the understanding of the people.

Mr. Wilson asks, "What controul can proceed from the federal government to shackle or destroy that sacred palladium of national freedom, the liberty of the press?" What! — Cannot Congress, when possessed of the immense authority proposed to be devolved, restrain the printers, and put them under regulation. — Recollect that the omnipotence of the federal legislature over the State establishments is recognized by a special article, viz. — “that this Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any thing in the Constitutions or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.” — After such a declaration, what security does the Constitutions of the several States afford for the liberty of the press and other invaluable personal rights, not provided for by the new plan? — Does not this sweeping clause subject every thing to the controul of Congress?

2.2.4.7Timoleon, November 1, 1787

After some judicious reflections on this subject, which tended to shew the necessity of the most plain and unequivocal language in the all important business of constituting government, which necessarily conveying great powers, is always liable (from the natural tendency of power to corrupt the human heart and deprave the head) to great abuse; by perverse and subtle arguments calculated to extend dominion over all things and all men. One of the club supposed the following case: — A gentleman, in the line of his profession is appointed a judge of the supreme court under the new Constitution, and the rulers, finding that the rights of conscience and the freedom of the press were exercised in such a manner, by preaching and printing as to be troublesome to the new government—which event would probably happen, if the rulers finding themselves possessed of great power, should so use it as to oppress and injure the community.—In this state of things the judge is called upon, in the line of his profession, to give his opinion—whether the new Constitution admitted of a legislative act to suppress the rights of conscience, and violate the liberty of the press? The answer of the learned judge is conceived in didactic mode, and expressed in learned phrase; thus,—In the 8th section of the first article of the new Constitution, the Congress have power given to lay and collect taxes for the general welfare of the United States. By this power, the right of taxing is co-extensive with the general welfare, and the general welfare is as unlimitted as actions and things are that may disturb or benefit that general welfare. A right being given to tax for the general welfare, necessarily includes the right of judging what is for the general welfare, and a right of judging what is for the general welfare, as necessarily includes a power of protecting, defending, and promoting it by all such laws and means as are fitted to that end; for, qui dat finem dat media ad finem necessaria, who gives the end gives the means necessary to obtain the end. The Constitution must be so construed as not to involve an absurdity, which would clearly follow from allowing the end and denying the means. A right of taxing for the general welfare being the highest and most important mode of providing for it, cannot be supposed to exclude inferior modes of effecting the same purpose, because the rule of law is, that, omne majus continct in se minus.

From hence it clearly results, that, if preachers and printers are troublesome to the new government; and that in the opinion of its rulers, it shall be for the general welfare to restrain or suppress both the one and the other, it may be done consistently with the new Constitution. And that this was the opinion of the community when they consented to it, is evident from this consideration; that although the all comprehending power of the new legislature is fixed, by its acts being made the supreme law of the land, any thing in the Constitutions or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding: Yet no express declaration in favor of the rights of conscience or liberty of the press is to be found in the new Constitution, as we see was carefully done in the Constitutions of the states composing this union — Shewing clearly, that what was then thought necessary to be specially reserved from the pleasure of power, is now designed to be yielded to its will.

A grave old gentleman of the club, who had sat with his head reclined on his hand, listening in pensive mood to the argument of the judge, said, “I verily believe, that neither the logic or the law of that opinion will be hereafter doubted by the professors of power, who, through the history of human nature, have been for enlarging the sphere of their authority. And thus the dearest rights of men and the best security of civil liberty may be sacrificed by the sophism of a lawyer, who, Carneades like, can to day shew that to be necessary, before the people, which tomorrow he can likewise shew to be unnecessary and useless — For which reason the sagacious Cato advised, that such a man should immediately be sent from the city, as a person dangerous to the morals of the people and to society." The old gentleman continued, "I now plainly see the necessity of express declarations and reservations in favor of the great, unalienable rights of mankind, to prevent the oppressive and wicked extention of power to the ruin of human liberty. For the opinion above stated, absolutely refutes the sophistry of 'that being retained which is not given,' where the words conveying power admit of the most extensive construction that language can reach to, or the mind conceive, as is the case in this new Constitution. By which we have already seen how logically it may be proved, that both religion and the press can be made to bend before the views of power. …

2.2.4.8An Old Whig, No. 5, November 1, 1787

It is needless to repeat the necessity of securing other personal rights in the forming a new government. The same argument which proves the necessity of securing one of them shews also the necessity of securing others. Without a bill of rights we are totally insecure in all of them; and no man can promise himself with any degree of certainty that his posterity will enjoy the inestimable blessings of liberty of conscience, of freedom of speech and of writing and publishing their thoughts on public matters, of trial by jury, of holding themselves, their houses and papers free from seizure and search upon general suspicion or general warrants; or in short that they will be secured in the enjoyment of life, liberty and property without depending on the will and pleasure of their rulers.

2.2.4.9Cincinnatus, No. 1, November 1, 1787

You instance, Sir, the liberty of the press; which you would persuade us, is in no danger, though not secured, because there is no express power granted to regulate literary publications. But you surely know, Sir, that where general powers are expressly granted, the particular ones comprehended within them, must also be granted. For instance, the proposed Congress are empowered — to define and punish offences against the law of the nations — mark well, Sir, if you please — to define and punish. Will you, will any one say, can any one even think that does not comprehend a power to define and declare all publications from the press against the conduct of government, in making treaties, or in any other foreign transactions, an offence against the law of nations? If there should ever be an influential president, or arbitrary senate, who do not choose that their transactions with foreign powers should be discussed or examined in the public prints, they will easily find pretexts to prevail upon the other branch to concur with them, in restraining what it may please them to call — the licentiousness of the press. And this may be, even without the concurrence of the representative of the people; because the president and senate are empowered to make treaties, and these treaties are declared the supreme law of the land.

What use they will make of this power, is not now the question. Certain it is, that such power is given, and that power is not restrained by any declaration — that the liberty of the press, which even you term, the sacred palladium of national freedom, shall be forever free and inviolable. I have proved that the power of restraining the press, is necessarily involved in the unlimited power of defining offences, or of making treaties, which are to be the supreme law of the land. You acknowledge, that it is not expressly excepted, and consequently it is at the mercy of the powers to be created by this constitution.

New York Journal, Storing, vol. 6, pp. 8–9.

2.2.4.10Cincinnatus, No. 2, November 8, 1787

I have proved, sir, that not only some power is given in the constitution to restrain, and even to subject the press, but that it is a power totally unlimited; and may certainly annihilate the freedom of the press, and convert it from being the palladium of liberty to become an engine of imposition and tyranny. It is an easy step from restraining the press to making it place the worst actions of government in so favorable a light, that we may groan under tyranny and oppression without knowing from whence it comes.

But you comfort us, by saying, — “there is no reason to suspect so popular a privilege will be neglected.” The wolf, in the fable, said as much to the sheep, when he was persuading them to trust him as their protector, and to dismiss their guardian dogs. Do you indeed suppose, Mr. Wilson, that if the people give up their privileges to these new rulers they will render them back again to the people? Indeed, sir, you should not trifle upon a question so serious — You would not have us to suspect any ill. If we throw away suspicion — to be sure, the thing will go smoothly enough, and we shall deserve to continue a free, respectable, and happy people. Suspicion shackles rulers and prevents good government. All great and honest politicians, like yourself, have reprobated it. Lord Mansfield is a great authority against it, and has often treated it as the worst of libels. But such men as Milton, Sidney, Locke, Montesquieu, and Trenchard, have thought it essential to the preservation of liberty against the artful and persevering encroachments of those with whom power is trusted. You will pardon me, sir, if I pay some respect to these opinions, and wish that the freedom of the press may be previously secured as a constitutional and unalienable right, and not left to the precarious care of popular privileges which may or may not influence our new rulers. You are fond of, and happy at, quaint expressions of this kind in your observation — that a formal declaration would have done harm, by implying, that some degree of power was given when we undertook to define its extent. This thought has really a brilliancy in it of the first water. But permit me, sir, to ask, why any saving clause was admitted into this constitution, when you tell us, every thing is reserved that is not expressly given? Why is it said in sec. 9th, “The migration or importation of such persons as any of the states now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by Congress, prior to the year, 1808.” There is no power expressly given to the Congress to prohibit migrations and importations. By your doctrine then they could have none, and it was, according to your own position, nugatory to declare they should not do it. Which are we to believe, sir, — you or the constitution? The text, or the comment. If the former, we must be persuaded, that in the contemplation of the framers of the constitution implied powers were given, otherwise the exception would have been an absurdity. If we listen to you we must affirm it to be a distinctive characteristic of the constitution, that — “what is not expressly given is reserved.” Such are the inconsistencies into which men over ingenuous, like yourself, are betrayed in advocating a bad cause. Perhaps four months more consideration of the subject, would have rendered you more guarded.

2.2.4.11A Countryman, No. 2, November 22, 1787

Of a very different nature, tho' only one degree better than the other reasoning, is all that sublimity of nonsense and alarm, that has been thundered against it in every shape of metaphoric terror, on the subject of a bill of rights, the liberty of the press, rights of conscience, rights of taxation and election, trials in the vicinity, freedom of speech, trial by jury, and a standing army. These last are undoubtedly important points, much too important to depend on mere paper protection. For, guard such privileges by the strongest expressions, still if you leave the legislative and executive power in the hands of those who are or may be disposed to deprive you of them — you are but slaves. Make an absolute monarch — give him the supreme authority, and guard as much as you will by bills of rights, your liberty of the press, and trial by jury; — he will find means either to take them from you, or to render them useless.

On examining the new proposed constitution, there can not be a question, but that there is authority enough lodged in the proposed federal Congress, if abused, to do the greatest injury. And it is perfectly idle to object to it, that there is no bill of rights, or to propose to add to it a provision that a trial by jury shall in no case be omitted, or to patch it up by adding a stipulation in favor of the press, or to guard it by removing the paltry objection to the right of Congress to regulate the time and manner of elections.

New Haven Gazette, Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 14, pp. 172–74.

2.2.4.12Landholder, No. 6, December 10, 1787

There is no declaration of any kind to preserve the liberty of the press, &c. Nor is liberty of conscience, or of matrimony, or of burial of the dead; it is enough that congress have no power to prohibit either, and can have no temptation. This objection is answered in that the states have all the power originally, and congress have only what the states grant them.

Connecticut Courant, Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 14, p. 401.

2.2.4.13The Federal Farmer, No. 6, December 25, 1787

The following, I think, will be allowed to be unalienable or fundamental rights in the United States:—

No man, demeaning himself peaceably, shall be molested on account of his religion or mode of worship — The people have a right to hold and enjoy their property according to known standing laws, and which cannot be taken from them without their consent, or the consent of their representatives; and whenever taken in the pressing urgencies of government, they are to receive a reasonable compensation for it — Individual security consists in having free recourse to the laws — The people are subject to no laws or taxes not assented to by their representatives constitutionally assembled — They are at all times intitled to the benefits of the writ of habeas corpus, the trial by jury in criminal and civil causes — They have a right, when charged, to a speedy trial in the vicinage; to be heard by themselves or counsel, not to be compelled to furnish evidence against themselves, to have witnesses face to face, and to confront their adversaries before the judge — No man is held to answer a crime charged upon him till it be substantially described to him; and he is subject to no unreasonable searches or seizures of his person, papers or effects — The people have a right to assemble in an orderly manner, and petition the government for a redress of wrongs — The freedom of the press ought not to be restrained — No emoluments, except for actual service — No hereditary honors, or orders of nobility, ought to be allowed — The military ought to be subordinate to the civil authority, and no soldier be quartered on the citizens without their consent — The militia ought always to be armed and disciplined, and the usual defence of the country — The supreme power is in the people, and power delegated ought to return to them at stated periods, and frequently — The legislative, executive, and judicial powers, ought always to be kept distinct — others perhaps might be added.

2.2.4.14The Federal Farmer, No. 16, January 20, 1788

All parties apparently agree, that the freedom of the press is a fundamental right, and ought not to be restrained by any taxes, duties, or in any manner whatever. Why should not the people, in adopting a federal constitution, declare this, even if there are only doubts about it. But, say the advocates, all powers not given are reserved: — true; but the great question is, are not powers given, in the exercise of which this right may be destroyed? The people’s or the printers claim to a free press, is founded on the fundamental laws, that is, compacts, and state constitutions, made by the people. The people, who can annihilate or alter those constitutions, can annihilate or limit this right. This may be done by giving general powers, as well as by using particular words. No right claimed under a state constitution, will avail against a law of the union, made in pursuance of the federal constitution: therefore the question is, what laws will congress have a right to make by the constitution of the union, and particularly touching the press? By art. 1. sect. 8. congress will have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excise. By this congress will clearly have power to lay and collect all kind of taxes whatever — taxes on houses, lands, polls, industry, merchandize, &c. — taxes on deeds, bonds, and all written instruments — on writs, pleas, and all judicial proceedings, on licences, naval officers papers, &c. on newspapers, advertisements, &c. and to require bonds of the naval officers, clerks, printers, &c. to account for the taxes that may become due on papers that go through their hands. Printing, like all other business, must cease when taxed beyond its profits; and it appears to me, that a power to tax the press at discretion, is a power to destroy or restrain the freedom of it. There may be other powers given, in the exercise of which this freedom may be effected; and certainly it is of too much importance to be left thus liable to be taxed, and constantly to constructions and inferences. A free press is the channel of communication as to mercantile and public affairs; by means of it the people in large countries ascertain each others sentiments; are enabled to unite, and become formidable to those rulers who adopt improper measures. Newspapers may sometimes be the vehicles of abuse, and of many things not true; but these are but small inconveniences, in my mind, among many advantages. A celebrated writer, I have several times quoted, speaking in high terms of the English liberties, says, “lastly the key stone was put to the arch, by the final establishment of the freedom of the press.”

Storing, vol. 2, pp. 329–30.

2.2.4.15Aristides’ Remarks on the Proposed Plan, January 31, 1788

By their scheme, however, thus deeply concerted, the house of representatives is to be chosen by the people once in two years; and if they have acted so as to warrant any reasonable apprehension of their designs, it will be easy, at any time, to prevent their election. The truth is, that very few of them either wish to be elected, or would consent to serve, either in that house, or in the senate. I have exercised my imagination to devise in what manner they, or any other men, supposing them to bear full sway in both houses, could erect this imaginary fabric of power. I request any person to point out any law, or system of laws, that could be possibly contrived for that purpose, obtain the final assent of each branch, and be carried into effect, contrary to the interests and wishes of a free, intelligent, prying people, accustomed to the most unbounded freedom of inquiry. To begin by an attempt to restrain the press, instead of promoting their designs, would be the most effectual thing to prevent them.

Whilst mankind shall believe freedom to be better than slavery; whilst our lands shall be generally distributed, and not held by a few insolent barons, on the debasing terms of vassallage; whilst we shall teach our children to read and write; whilst the liberty of the press, that grand palladium, which tyrants are compelled to respect, shall remain; whilst a spark of public love shall animate even a small part of the people; whilst even self-love shall be the general ruling principle; so long will it be impossible for an aristocracy to arise from the proposed plan. — Should Heaven, in its wrath, inflict blindness on the people of America; should they reject this fair offer of permanent safety and happiness; — to predict, what species of government shall at last spring from disorder, is beyond the short reach of political foresight.

Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 15, pp. 522–23, 548.

2.2.4.16A Columbian Patriot, February 1788

2. There is no security in the profered system, either for the rights of conscience, or the liberty of the Press: Despotism usually while it is gaining ground, will suffer men to think, say, or write what they please; but when once established, if it is thought necessary to subserve the purposes of arbitrary power, the most unjust restrictions may take place in the first instance, and an imprimator [sic] on the Press in the next, may silence the complaints, and forbid the most decent remonstrances of an injured and oppressed people.

Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 16, p. 279.

2.2.4.17Hugh Williamson, February 25–27, 1788

We have been told that the Liberty of the Press is not secured by the New Constitution. Be pleased to examine the plan, and you will find that the Liberty of the Press and the laws of Mahomet are equally affected by it. The New Government is to have the power of protecting literary property; the very power which you have by a special act delegated to the present Congress. There was a time in England, when neither book, pamphlet, nor paper could be published without a license from Government. That restraint was finally removed in the year 1694 and by such removal, their press became perfectly free, for it is not under the restraint of any license. Certainly the new Government can have no power to impose restraints. The citizens of the United States have no more occasion for a second Declaration of Rights, than they have for a section in favor of the press. Their rights, in the several States, have long since been explained and secured by particular declarations, which make a part of their several Constitutions. It is granted, and perfectly understood, that under the Government of the Assemblies of the States, and under the Government of the Congress, every right is reserved to the individual, which he has not expressly delegated to this, or that Legislature. …

2.2.4.18A Plebeian, Spring 1788

"We are told, (says he [John Jay]) among other strange things, that the liberty of the press is left insecure by the proposed constitution, and yet that constitution says neither more nor less about it, than the constitution of the state of New-York does. We are told it deprives us of trial by jury, whereas the fact is, that it expressly secures it in certain cases, and takes it away in none, &c. it is absurd to construe the silence of this, or of our own constitution relative to a great number of our rights into a total extinction of them; silence and a blank paper neither grant nor take away anything."

It may be a strange thing to this author to hear the people of America anxious for the preservation of their rights, but those who understand the true principles of liberty, are no strangers to their importance. The man who supposes the constitution, in any part of it, is like a blank piece of paper, has very erroneous ideas of it. He may be assured every clause has a meaning, and many of them such extensive meaning, as would take a volume to unfold. The suggestion, that the liberty of the press is secure, because it is not in express words spoken of in the constitution, and that the trial by jury is not taken away, because it is not said in so many words and letters it is so, is puerile and unworthy of a man who pretends to reason. We contend, that by the indefinite powers granted to the general government, the liberty of the press may be restricted by duties, &c. and therefore the constitution ought to have stipulated for its freedom. The trial by jury, in all civil cases is left at the discretion of the general government, except in the supreme court on the appellate jurisdiction, and in this I affirm it is taken away, not by express words, but by fair and legitimate construction and inference; for the supreme court have expressly given them an appellate jurisdiction, in every case to which their powers extend (with two or three exceptions) both as to law and fact. The court are the judges; every man in the country, who has served as a juror, knows, that there is a distinction between the court and the jury, and that the lawyers in their pleading, make the distinction. If the court, upon appeals, are to determine both the law and the fact, there is no room for a jury, and the right of trial in this mode is taken away.

The author manifests equal levity in referring to the constitution of this state, to shew that it was useless to stipulate for the liberty of the press, or to insert a bill of rights in the constitution. With regard to the first, it is perhaps an imperfection in our constitution that the liberty of the press is not expressly reserved; but still there was not equal necessity of making this reservation in our State as in the general Constitution, for the common and statute law of England, and the laws of the colony are established, in which this privilege is fully defined and secured. It is true, a bill of rights is not prefixed to our constitution, as it is in that of some of the states; but still this author knows, that many essential rights are reserved in the body of it; and I will promise, that every opposer of this system will be satisfied, if the stipulations that they contend for are agreed to, whether they are prefixed, affixed, or inserted in the body of the constitution, and that they will not contend which way this is done, if it be but done.

VIIIth Objection.

“Under their own construction of the general clause at the end of the enumerated powers, the Congress may grant monopolies in trade and commerce, constitute new crimes, inflict unusual and severe punishments, and extend their power as far as they shall think proper; so that the State Legislatures have no security for the powers now presumed to remain to them: or the people for their rights. There is no declaration of any kind for preserving the liberty of the press, the trial by jury in civil causes, nor against the danger of standing armies in time of peace."

Answer.

The Liberty of the Press is always a grand topic for declamation, but the future Congress will have no other authority over this than to secure to authors for a limited time an exclusive privilege of publishing their works. This authority has been long exercised in England, where the press is as free as among ourselves or in any country in the world, and surely such an encouragement to genius is no, restraint on the liberty of the press, since men are allowed to publish what they please of their own; and so far as this may be deemed a restraint upon others it is certainly a reasonable one, and can be attended with no danger of copies not being sufficiently multiplied, because the interest of the proprietor will always induce him to publish a quantity fully equal to the demand — besides that such encouragement may give birth to many excellent writings which would otherwise have never appeared. If the Congress should exercise any other power over the press than this, they will do it without any warrant from this Constitution, and must answer for it as for any other act of tyranny.

2.2.4.20Benjamin Franklin, An Account of the Supremest Court of Judicature in Pennsylvania, viz., the Court of the Press, September 12, 1789

POWER OF THIS COURT.

It may receive and promulgate accusations of all kinds, against all persons and characters among the citizens of the State, and even against all inferior courts; and may judge, sentence, and condemn to infamy, not only private individuals, but public bodies, &c., with or without inquiry or hearing, at the court's discretion.

in whose favour and for whose emolument this court is established.

In favour of about one citizen in five hundred, who, by education or practice in scribbling, has acquired a tolerable style as to grammar and construction, so as to bear printing; or who is possessed of a press and a few types. This five hundredth part of the citizens have the privilege of accusing and abusing the other four hundred and ninety-nine parts at their pleasure; or they may hire out their pens and press to others for that purpose.

PRACTICE OF THE COURT.

It is not governed by any of the rules of common courts of law. The accused is allowed no grand jury to judge of the truth of the accusation before it is publicly made, nor is the Name of the Accuser made known to him nor has he an Opportunity of confronting the Witnesses against him; for they are kept in the dark, as in the Spanish Court of Inquisition. Nor is there any petty Jury of his Peers, sworn to try the Truth of the Charges. The Proceedings are also sometimes so rapid, that an honest, good Citizen may find himself suddenly and unexpectedly accus'd, and in the same Morning judg'd and condemn'd, and sentence pronounc'd against him, that he is a Rogue and a Villain. Yet, if an officer of this court receives the slightest check for misconduct in this his office, he claims immediately the rights of a free citizen by the constitution, and demands to know his accuser, to confront the witnesses, and to have a fair trial of his peers.

THE FOUNDATION OF ITS AUTHORITY.

It is said to be founded on an Article of the Constitution of the State, which established the Liberty of the Press; a Liberty which every Pennsylvanian would fight and die for; tho' few of us, I believe, have distinct Ideas of its Nature and Extent. It seems indeed somewhat like the Liberty of the Press that Felons have, by the Common Law of England, before Conviction, that is, to be Press'd to death or hanged. If by the Liberty of the Press were understood merely the Liberty of discussing the Propriety of Public Measures and political opinions, let us have as much of it as you please: But if it means the Liberty of affronting, calumniating, and defaming one another, I, for my part, own myself willing to part with my Share of it when our Legislators shall please so to alter the Law, and shall cheerfully consent to exchange my Liberty of Abusing others for the Privilege of not being abus'd myself.

BY WHOM THIS COURT IS COMMISSIONED OR CONSTITUTED.

It is not by any Commission from the Supreme Executive Council, who might previously judge of the Abilities, Integrity, Knowledge, &c. of the Persons to be appointed to this great Trust, of deciding upon the Characters and good Fame of the Citizens; for this Court is above that Council, and may accuse, judge, and condemn it, at pleasure. Nor is it hereditary, as in the Court of Dernier Resort, in the Peerage of England. But any Man who can procure Pen, Ink, and Paper, with a Press, and a huge pair of BLACKING BALLS, may commissionate himself; and his court is immediately established in the plenary Possession and exercise of its rights. For, if you make the least complaint of the judge's conduct, he daubs his blacking balls in your face wherever he meets you; and, besides tearing your private character to flitters, marks you out for the odium of the public, as an enemy to the liberty of the press.

OF THE NATURAL SUPPORT OF THESE COURTS.

Their support is founded in the depravity of such minds, as have not been mended by religion, nor improved by good education;

"There is a Lust in Man no Charm can tame,
Of loudly publishing his Neighbour's Shame."
Hence;
"On Eagle's Wings immortal Scandals fly, While virtuous Actions are but born and die."

DRYDEN

Whoever feels pain in hearing a good character of his neighbour, will feel a pleasure in the reverse. And of those who, despairing to rise into distinction by their virtues, are happy if others can be depressed to a level with themselves, there are a number sufficient in every great town to maintain one of these courts by their subscriptions. A shrewd observer once said, that, in walking the streets in a slippery morning, one might see where the good-natured people lived by the ashes thrown on the ice before their doors; probably he would have formed a different conjecture of the temper of those whom he might find engaged in such a subscription.

OF THE CHECKS PROPER TO BE ESTABLISHED AGAINST THE ABUSE OF POWER IN THESE COURTS.

Hitherto there are none. But since so much has been written and published on the federal Constitution, and the necessity of checks in all other parts of good government has been so clearly and learnedly explained, I find myself so far enlightened as to suspect some check may be proper in this part also; but I have been at a loss to imagine any that may not be construed an infringement of the sacred liberty of the press. At length, however, I think I have found one that, instead of diminishing general liberty, shall augment it; which is, by restoring to the people a species of liberty, of which they have been deprived by our laws, I mean the liberty of cudgel. In the rude state of society prior to the existence of laws, if one man gave another ill language, the affronted person would return it by a box on the ear, and, if repeated, by a good drubbing; and this without offending against any law. But now the right of making such returns is denied, and they are punished as breaches of the peace; while the right of abusing seems to remain in full force, the laws made against it being rendered ineffectual by the liberty of the press.

My proposal then is, to leave the liberty of the press untouched, to be exercised in its full extent, force, and vigor; but to permit the liberty of the cudgel to go with it pari passu. Thus, my fellow-citizens, if an impudent writer attacks your reputation, dearer to you perhaps than your life, and puts his name to the charge, you may go to him as openly and break his head. If he conceals himself behind the printer, and you can nevertheless discover who he is, you may in like manner waylay him in the night, attack him behind, and give him a good drubbing. Thus far goes my project as to private resentment and retribution. But if the public should ever happen to be affronted, as it ought to be, with the conduct of such writers, I would not advise proceeding immediately to these extremities; but that we should in moderation content ourselves with tarring and feathering, and tossing them in a blanket.

If, however, it should be thought that this proposal of mine may disturb the public peace, I would then humbly recommend to our legislators to take up the consideration of both liberties, that of the press, and that of the cudgel, and by an explicit law mark their extent and limits; and, at the same time that they secure the person of a citizen from assaults, they would likewise provide for the security of his reputation.

2.2.5.1Thomas Jefferson to Edward Carrington, January 16, 1787

The tumults in America, I expected would have produced in Europe an unfavorable opinion of our political state. But it has not. On the contrary, the small effect of those tumults seems to have given more confidence in the firmness of our governments. The interposition of the people themselves on the side of government has had a great effect on the opinion here. I am persuaded myself that the good sense of the people will always be found to be the best army. They may be led astray for a moment, but will soon correct themselves. The people are the only censors of their governors: and even their errors will tend to keep these to the true principles of their institution. To punish these errors too severely would be to suppress the only safeguard of the public liberty. The way to prevent these irregular interpositions of the people is to give them full information of their affairs thro' the channel of the public papers, and to contrive that those papers should penetrate the whole mass of the people. The basis of our governments being the opinion of the people, the very first object should be to keep that right; and were it left to me to decide whether we should have a government without newspapers, or newspapers without a government, I should not hesitate a moment to prefer the latter. But I should mean that every man should receive these papers and be capable of reading them. I am convinced that those societies (as the Indians) which live without government enjoy in their general mass an infinitely greater degree of happiness than those who live under European governments. Among the former, public opinion is in the place of law, and restrains morals as powerfully as laws ever did any where. Among the latter, under pretence of governing they have divided their nations into two classes, wolves and sheep. I do not exaggerate. This is a true picture of Europe. Cherish therefore the spirit of our people, and keep alive their attention. Do not be too severe upon their errors, but reclaim them by enlightening them. If once they become inattentive to the public affairs, you and I, and Congress, and Assemblies, judges and governors shall all become wolves. It seems to be the law of our general nature, in spite of individual exceptions; and experience declares that man is the only animal which devours his own kind, for I can apply no milder term to the governments of Europe, and to the general prey of the rich on the poor.

Boyd, vol. 11, pp. 48–49.

2.2.5.2Richard Henry Lee to Samuel Adams, October 27, 1787

… Because Independent States are in the same relation to each other as Individuals are with respect to uncreated government. So that if reservations were necessary in one case, they are equally necessary in the other. But the futility of this distinction appears from the conduct of the Convention itself, for they have made several reservations—every one of which proves the Rule in Conventional ideas to be, that what was not reserved was given — For example, they have reserved from their Legislature a power to prevent the importation of Slaves for 20 years, and also from Creating Titles. But they have no reservation in favor of the Press, Rights of Conscience, Trial by Jury in Civil Cases, or Common Law securities.

As if these were of less importance to the happiness of Mankind than the making of Lords, or the importations of Slaves!…

Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 13, pp. 484–85.

2.2.5.3Thomas Jefferson to James Madison, December 20, 1787

… There are other good things of less moment. I will now add what I do not like. First the omission of a bill of rights providing clearly and without the aid of sophisms for freedom of religion, freedom of the press, protection against standing armies, restriction against monopolies, the eternal and unremitting force of the habeas corpus laws, and trials by jury in all matters of fact triable by the laws of the land and not by the law of Nations.

Boyd, vol. 12, p. 440.

2.2.5.4Thomas Jefferson to William Stephens Smith, February 2, 1788

… But I own it astonishes me to find such a change wrought in the opinions of our countrymen since I left them, as that threefourths of them should be contented to live under a system which leaves to their governors the power of taking from them the trial by jury in civil cases, freedom of religion, freedom of the press, freedom of commerce, the habeas corpus laws, and of yoking them with a standing army. This is a degeneracy in the principles of liberty to which I had given four centuries instead of four years.

Boyd, vol. 12, p. 558.

2.2.5.5Thomas Jefferson to Alexander Donald, February 7, 1788

… By a declaration of rights I mean one which shall stipulate freedom of religion, freedom of the press, freedom of commerce against monopolies, trial by juries in all cases, no suspensions of the habeas corpus, no standing armies. These are fetters against doing evil which no honest government should decline.

Boyd, vol. 12, p. 571.

2.2.5.6Thomas Jefferson to C. W. F. Dumas, February 12, 1788

… Besides other objections of less moment, she will insist on annexing a bill of rights to the new constitution, i.e. a bill wherein the government shall declare that… 2. Printing presses free.

Boyd, vol. 12, p. 583.

2.2.5.7Thomas Jefferson to Francis Hopkinson, March 13, 1789

… What I disapproved from the first moment also was the want of a bill of rights to guard liberty against the legislative as well as executive branches of the government, that is to say to secure freedom in religion, freedom of the press, freedom from monopolies, freedom from unlawful imprisonment, freedom from a permanent military, and a trial by jury in all cases determinable by the laws of the land.

Boyd, vol. 14, p. 650.

2.2.5.8Edmund Randolph to James Madison, March 27, 1789

… The liberty of the press is indeed a blessing, which ought not to be surrendered but with blood; and yet it is not an illfounded expectation in those, who deserve well of their country, that they should be assailed by an enemy in disguise, and have their characters deeply wounded, before they can prepare for defence. I apply not this to any particular person.

Veit, pp. 223–24.

2.2.5.9 Jeremy Belknap to Paine Wingate, May 29, 1789

… You will see in the speech wh. our new Lieut. Governor [Samuel Adams] made at his investiture that he has not thrown off the old idea of "independence" as an attribute of each individual State in the "confederated Republic" — & you will know in what light to regard his "devout & fervent wish" that the "people may enjoy well grounded confidence that their personal & domestic rights are secure." This is the same Language or nearly the same which he used in the Convention when he moved for an addition to the proposed Amendments — by inserting a clause to provide for the Liberty of the press — the right to keep arms — Protection from seizure of person & property & the Rights of Conscience. By which motion he gave an alarm to both sides of the house & had nearly overset the whole business which the Friends of the Constitution had been labouring for several Weeks to obtain. …

2.2.5.10 George Clymer to Richard Peters, June 8, 1789

Madison this morning is to make an essay towards amendments — but whether he means merely a tub to the whale, or declarations about the press liberty of conscience &c. or will suffer himself to be so far frightened with the antifederalism of his own state as to attempt to lop off essentials I do not know — I hope however we shall be strong enough to postpone. …

Afternoon — Madison's has proved a tub on a number of Ad. but Gerry is not content with them alone, and proposes to treat us with all the amendments of all the antifederalists in America.

2.2.5.11Fisher Ames to Thomas Dwight, June 11, 1789

Mr. Madison has introduced his long expected Amendments. They are the fruit of much labour and research. He has hunted up all the grievances and complaints of newspapers — all the articles of Conventions — and the small talk of their debates. It contains a Bill of Rights — the right of enjoying property — of changing the govt. at pleasure — freedom of the press — of conscience — of juries — exemption from general Warrants gradual increase of representatives till the whole number at the rate of one to every 30,000 shall amount to and allowing two to every State, at least this is the substance. There is too much of it — O. I had forgot the right of the people to bear Arms.

Risum teneatis amici —

Upon the whole, it may do good towards quieting men who attend to sounds only, and may get the mover some popularity — which he wishes.

Veit, p. 247.

2.2.5.12Fisher Ames to George R. Minot, June 12, 1789

… The civil departments will employ us next, and the judiciary the Senate. They will finish their stint, as the boys say, before the House has done. Their number is less, and they have matured the business in committee. Yet Mr. Madison has inserted, in his amendments, the increase of representatives, each State having two at least. The rights of conscience, of bearing arms, of changing the government, are declared to be inherent in the people. Freedom of the press, too. There is a prodigious great dose for a medicine. But it will stimulate the stomach as little as hasty-pudding. It is rather food than physic. An immense mass of sweet and other herbs and roots for a diet drink.

Veit, pp. 247–48.

2.2.5.13Abraham Baldwin to Joel Barlow, June 14, 1789

A few days since, Madison brought before us propositions of amendment agreeable to his promise to his constituents. Such as he supposed would tranquillize the minds of honest opposers without injuring the system. viz.

"That what is not given is reserved, that liberty of the press & trial by jury shall remain inviolable. that the representation shall never be less than one for every 30,000 &c. ordered to lie on the table.["] We are too busy at present in cutting away at the whole cloth, to stop to do any body's patching. There is no such thing as antifederalism heard of. R[hode] I[sland] and N[orth] C[arolina] had local reasons for their conduct, and will come right before long.

Veit, p. 250.

2.2.5.14Henry Gibbs to Roger Sherman, July 17, 1789

… All Ambiguity of Expression certainly ought to be remov'd; Liberty of Conscience in religious matters, right of trial by Jury, Liberty of the Press &c. may perhaps be more explicitly secur'd to the Subject & a general reservation made to the States respectively of all the powers not expressly delegated to the general Government.

2.2.5.15Pierce Butler to James Iredell, August 11, 1789

… If you wait for substantial amendments, you will wait longer than I wish you to do, speaking interestedly. A few milk-and-water amendments have been proposed by Mr. M[adison]., such as liberty of conscience, a free press, and one or two general things already well secured. I suppose it was done to keep his promise with his constituents, to move for alterations; but, if I am not greatly mistaken, he is not hearty in the cause of amendments.

Veit, p. 274.

2.2.5.16Thomas Jefferson to James Madison, August 28, 1789

[T]he following alterations & additions would have pleased me. Art 4. "The people shall not be deprived or abridged of their right to speak to write or otherwise to publish any thing but false facts affecting injuriously the life, liberty, property, or reputation of others or affecting the peace of the confederacy with foreign nations.

Hobson & Rutland, vol. 12, p. 363.

2.2.5.17Theodorick Bland Randolph to St. George Tucker, September 9, 1789

… The house of Representatives have been for some time past engaged on the subject of amendments to the constitution, though in my opinion they have not made one single material one. The senate are at present engaged on the subject; Mr. Richd. H. Lee told me that he proposed to strike out the standing army in time of peace but could not carry it. He also said that it has been proposed, and warmly favoured that, liberty of Speach [sic] and of the press may be stricken out, as they only tend to promote licenciousness. If this takes place god knows what will follow.

2.3Discussion of Rights

2.3.1TREATISES

2.3.1.1Bacon, 1740

Libel.

A Libel is (a) defined a malicious Defamation, expressed either in Printing or Writing, or by Signs, Pictures, &c. tending either to blacken the Memory of one who is dead, or the Reputation of one who is alive, and thereby exposing him to publick Hatred, Contempt and Ridicule.[1]

But for the better Understanding the Nature of this Offence, I shall consider,

(A) What shall be said a Libel: And herein,

1. How far it is necessary that it should be in Writing.
2. What Degree of Defamation will amount to a Libel.

3. What Certainty in the Matter and Application will make it a Libel.
4. Whether any Proceedings in a Court of Justice will amount to a Libel.
5. Whether any Thing of this Kind can be justified.

(B) Who shall be said a Libeller: And herein,

1. Who shall be said the Author or Composer of a Libel.
2. Who the Publisher.

(C) The Offenders how punished.

(A) WHAT SHALL BE SAID A LIBEL: AND HEREIN,

1. HOW FAR IT IS NECESSARY THAT IT SHOULD BE IN WRITING.

THIS Species of Defamation is usually termed written Scandal, and thereby receives an Aggravation, in that it is presumed to have been entered upon with Coolness and Deliberation, and to continue longer, and propagate wider and farther than any other Scandal.[2]

But it is clearly agreed, that not only written or printed Scandal come within the Notion of a Libel, but also may be applied to any Defamation whatsoever, expressed either by Signs or Pictures; as by fixing up a Gallows at a Man's Door, or elsewhere, or by Painting him in a shameful or ignominious Manner, as by exposing a Man and his Wife by a Skimmington or Riding, tho' a special Custom is alledged for such Practice.[3]

And since the chief Cause, for which the Law so severely punishes all Offences of this Nature, is a direct Tendency of them to a Breach of publick Peace, by provoking the Parties injured, and their Friends and Families, to Acts of Revenge, which it would be impossible to restrain by the severest Laws, were there no Redress from publick Justice for Injuries of this Kind, which, of all others, are most sensibly felt; and since the plain Meaning of such Scandal, as is expressed by Signs or Pictures, is as obvious to common Sense, and as easily understood by every common Capacity, and altogether as provoking as that which is expressed by Writing or Printing, why should it not be equally Criminal?[4]

2. WHAT DEGREE OF DEFAMATION WILL AMOUNT TO A LIBEL.

As every Person desires to appear agreeable in Life, and must be highly provoked by such ridiculous Representations of him, as tend to lessen him in the Esteem of the World, and take away his Reputation, which, to some Men, is more dear than Life itself : Hence it hath been held, that not only Charges of a flagrant Nature, and which reflect a Moral Turpitude on the Party, are libellous, but also such as set him in a scurrilous ignominious Light; for these equally create ill Blood, and provoke the Parties to Acts of Revenge and Breaches of the Peace.[5]

Hence it hath been held, that Words, tho' not scandalous in themselves, yet if published in Writing, and tending in any Degree to the Discredit of a Man, are libellous, whether such Words defame private Persons only, or Persons employed in a publick Capacity; in which latter Case they are said to receive an Aggravation, as they tend to scandalize the Government, by reflecting on those who are intrusted with the Administration of publick Affairs, which doth not only endanger the publick Peace, as all other Libels do, by stirring up the Parties immediately concerned in it to Acts of Revenge, but also have a direct Tendency to breed in the People a Dislike of their Governors, and incline them to Faction and Sedition.[6]

As where a Person delivered a Ticket up to the Minister after Sermon, wherein he desired him to take Notice, that Offences passed now without Controul from the Civil Magistrate, and to quicken the Civil Magistrate to do his Duty, &c. and this was held to be a Libel, tho' no Magistrates in particular were mentioned, and tho' it was not averred that the Magistrates suffered those Vices knowingly.[7]

A. Gunsmith published an Advertisement in a common NewsPaper, that he had invented a short Kind of Gun that shot as far as others of a longer Size, and that he was made Gunsmith to the Prince of Wales; and B. another Gunsmith, counter-advertised, That whereas, &c. reciting the former Paragraph, he desired all Gentlemen to be cautious, for that the said A. durst not engage with any Artist in Town, nor ever did make such an Experiment, except out of a Leather Gun, as any Gentleman might be satisfied at the Cross Guns in Long-Acre, the said B.'s House. And the Court held, that tho' B. or any other of the Trade, might counter-advertise what was published of A. yet that that should have been done without any general Reflections on him in the Way of his Business; that the Advice to all Gentlemen to be cautious, was a Reflection on his Honesty, as if he would deceive the World by a fictitious Advertisement, and the Allegation, that he would not engage with an Artist, was setting him below the rest of his Trade, and calling him a Bungler in general Terms, and not relative to the precedent Matter, and that the Words except out of a Leather Gun, was charging him with a Lye, the Word Gun being vulgarly used for a Lye, and Gunner for a Lyar; and that therefore these Words were libellous, and gave Judgment accordingly; and herein the Court held, that Words, tho' not scandalous in themselves, yet being published in Writing, and tending any way to the Party's Discredit, were actionable, and that all Words were to be construed secundum Subjectam Materiam, and to be understood by the Court in the same Sense that others do.[8]

But tho' every Species and Degree of Calumny and Detraction of this Kind are deemed odious in the Eye of the Law, and punishable either by Civil Action or Criminal Prosecution, in most Cases, at the Election of the Party injured; yet the Court of King's Bench, whose Jurisdiction herein is founded upon the Necessity of preventing Quarrels and ill Blood, and which deals with this Offence as of dangerous Consequence to, and destructive of the Peace of the Nation, always exercises a discretionary Power in granting an Information for an Offence of this Nature, and will, in many Cases, leave the Party to his ordinary Remedy; as where the Application is made (a) after a great Length of Time; so (b) where the Matter complained of as a Libel happens to be true; so (c) where the Granting the Information would be a Discouragement to learned Inquiries; or (d) where the Matter complained of was intended for Reformation, not Defamation.[9]

So where a Man advertised in a publick Newspaper, that his Wife had eloped from him, and cautioned all Persons from trusting her, and an Information for a Libel being moved for, it was denied, because it was the only Way the Husband could take to secure himself.[10]

So where it was advertised in one of the Daily Papers, that Lady Mordington kept an Assembly in Moorfields, and it being counter-advertised, by my Lord's Order, that the Person calling herself Lady Mordington was an Impostrix, and that there was no such Person except his Wife, who always lived with him; the Court refused to grant an Information; for tho' she be called an Impostrix, yet that relates to her as assuming the Title of Lady Mordington, and which she is alledged not to have any Right to; and therefore in this Respect may well be called an Impostrix.[11]

A Writing was directed to General Wills, and the four principal Officers of the Guards, to be presented to his Majesty for Redress; the Paper contained the Defendant's Case, that he furnished the Guard at Whitehall with Fire and Candle, for which the Government owed him 350 l. that he obtained a Warrant for his Money, and Captain Carr (the Prosecutor) told him, that if he would assign the Warrant, he would procure him the Money; the Warrant was assigned, and the Money paid to Carr, who refused paying it to the Defendant; and the Question was, if an Information should be granted; and the Court held it no Libel, but a Representation of an Injury, drawn up in a proper Way for Redress, without any Intention to asperse the Prosecutor; and tho' there be a Suggestion of a Fraud, yet that is no more than what is in every Bill in Chancery, which was never held libellous, if relative to the Subject Matter.[12]

Here it may be proper to insert the remarkable Case of Parson Prick, who in a Sermon recited a Story out of Fox's Martyrology, that one Greenwood, being a perjured Person, and a great Persecutor, had great Plagues inflicted on him, and was killed by the Hand of God; whereas in Truth he was never so plagued, and was himself present at that Sermon; and he thereupon brought his Action upon the Case, for calling him a perjured Person; and the Defendant pleaded Not guilty; and this Matter being disclosed upon the Evidence, Wray Chief Justice delivered the Law to the Jury, that it being delivered but as a Story, and not with any Malice or Intention to slander any Person, he was not guilty of the Words maliciously, and so was found not guilty.[13]

3. WHAT CERTAINTY IN THE MATTER AND APPLICATION WILL MAKE IT A LIBEL.

It seems to be now agreed, that not only Scandal expressed in an open and direct Manner, but also such as is expressed in Allegory and Irony amounts to a Libel, and that the Judges are to understand it in the same Manner as others do, without any strained Endeavours to find out Loopholes, or to palliate the Offence, which in some Measure would be to encourage Scandal; as where a Writing in a taunting Manner, reckoning up several Acts of publick Charity done by one, says, You will not play the Jew, nor the Hypocrite, and so goes on, in a Strain of Ridicule, to insinuate, that what he did was owing to his Vainglory; or where a Writing, pretending to recommend to one the Characters of several great Men for his Imitation, instead of taking Notice of what they are generally esteemed famous for, pitched on such Qualities as their Enemies charge them with the Want of; as by proposing such a one to be imitated for his Courage, who is known to be a great Statesman, but no Soldier, and another to be imitated for his Learning, who is known to be a great General, but no Scholar, &c. which Kind of Writing is as well understood to mean only to upbraid the Parties with the Want of these Qualities, as if it had directly and expresly done so.[14]

And from the same Foundation it hath also been resolved, that a defamatory Writing expressing only one or two Letters of a Name, in such a Manner that from what goes before, and follows after, it must needs be understood to signify such a Person in the plain, obvious, and natural Construction of the Whole, and would be perfect Nonsense if strained to any other Meaning, is as properly a Libel as if it had expressed the whole Name at large; for it brings the utmost Contempt upon the Law, to suffer its Justice to be eluded by such trifling Evasions; and it is a ridiculous Absurdity to say, that a Writing, which is understood by every the meanest Capacity, cannot possibly be understood by a Judge and Jury.[15]

But it is said, that no Writing whatsoever is to be esteemed a Libel, unless it reflect upon some particular Person; and that a Writing full of obscene Ribaldry, without any kind of Reflection on any one, is not punishable at all by any Prosecution at Common Law, but the Author may be bound to his good Behaviour, as a scandalous Person of evil Fame.[16]

But a Scandal published of three or four, or any one or two of them, is punishable, at the Complaint of one or more, or all of them.[17]

The Defendant was charged in an Information with writing a Libel against the Protestant Religion and Bishops, Inuendo the Bishops of England; he was found guilty; and in Arrest of Judgment it was offered, that the Bishops libelled were not English Bishops, nor could the Inuendo support such Construction; but the Court took upon them to understand the Libel in that Sense, and overruled the Exception.[18]

An Information was prayed for publishing a Paper containing an Account of a Murder on a Jewish Woman and her Child, by certain Jews lately arrived from Portugal, and living near Broadstreet, because the Child was begotten by a Christian; and the Affidavit set forth, that several Persons mentioned therein, who were recently arrived from Portugal, and lived in Broadstreet, were attacked by Multitudes in several Parts of the City, barbarously treated, and threatened with Death, in case they were found abroad any more; and it was objected, that no Information could be granted in this Case, because it did not appear who in particular the Persons reflected on were; and for this was cited The King versus Orme, Trin. 11 W 3. where an Indictment was exhibited for a Libel called The Ladies Invention, and alledged to be to the Scandal of several Ladies unknown, and after Verdict for the King Judgment was arrested, because it did not appear who the Persons reflected on were; sed per Cur. admitting that an Information for a Libel may be improper, yet the Publication of this Paper is deservedly punishable in an Information for a Misdemeanor, and that of the highest Kind; such Sort of Advertisements necessarily tending to raise Tumults and Disorders among the People, and inflame them with a universal Spirit of Barbarity against a whole Body of Men, as if guilty of Crimes scarce practicable, and wholly incredible; and in this Case was cited the Case of The King and Franklin, where tho' only the Words Ministers were used in the Libel, yet by suitable Averments in the Information, and Proof made of them to the Jury, they found those Ministers to be Ministers of State to his present Majesty, and the Defendant guilty.[19]

4. WHETHER ANY PROCEEDINGS IN A COURT OF JUSTICE WILL AMOUNT TO A LIBEL.

It seems to be clearly agreed, that no Proceeding in a regular Course of Justice will make the Complaint amount to a Libel; for it would be a great Discouragement to Suitors to subject them to publick Prosecutions, in respect of their Applications to a Court of Justice; and the chief Intention of the Law in prohibiting Persons to revenge themselves by Libels, or any other private Manner, is to restrain them from endeavouring to make themselves their own Judges, and to oblige them to refer the Decision of their Grievances to those whom the Law has appointed to determine them.[20]

Therefore it hath been resolved, that no false or scandalous Matter contained in (a) a Petition to a Committee of Parliament, or in (b) Articles of the Peace exhibited to Justices of Peace, are libellous.[21]

Also it is held, that no Presentment of a Grand Jury can be a Libel, not only because Persons who are supposed to be returned without their own seeking, and are sworn to act impartially, shall be presumed to have proper Evidence for what they do, but also because it would be of the utmost ill Consequence any way to discourage them from making their Inquiries with that Freedom and Readiness which the publick Good requires.[22]

Also it is holden by some, that no Want of Jurisdiction in the Court to which such a Complaint shall be exhibited will make it a Libel; because the Mistake of the Court is not imputable to the Party, but his Counsel; but herein it is said by Hawkins, that if it shall manifestly appear from the whole Circumstances of the Case, that a Prosecution is intirely false, malicious, and groundless, and commenced not with a Design to go thro' with it, but only to expose the Defendant's Character, under the Shew of a legal Proceeding, there can be no Reason why such a Mockery of publick Justice should not rather aggravate the Offence than make it cease to be one, and make such Scandal a good Ground of an Indictment at the Suit of the King, as it makes the Malice of their Proceeding a good Foundation of an Action on the Case at the Suit of the Party, whether the Court had a Jurisdiction of the Cause or not,[23]

5. WHETHER ANY THING OF THIS KIND CAN BE JUSTIFIED.

It seems to be clearly agreed, that in an Indictment or Criminal Prosecution for a Libel the Party cannot justify that the Contents thereof are true, or that the Person upon whom it is made had a bad Reputation; since the greater Appearance there is of Truth in any malicious Invective, so much the more provoking it is; for, as my Lord Coke observes, in a settled State of Government the Party grieved ought to complain for every Injury done him, in the ordinary Course of Law, and not by any Means to revenge himself by the odious Course of Libelling, or otherwise.[24]

Also it seems now settled, that no Scandal in Writing is any more justifiable in a Civil Action brought by the Party to vindicate the Injury done him, than in an Indictment or Information at the Suit of the Crown; for tho' in Actions for Words the Law, thro' Compassion, admits the Truth of the Charge to be pleaded as a Justification, yet this Tenderness of the Law is not to be extended to written Scandal, in which the Author acts with more Coolness, and Deliberation gives the Scandal a more durable Stamp, and propagates it wider and further; whereas in Words Men often in a Heat and Passion say Things which they are afterwards ashamed of, and tho' they seem to act with Deliberation, yet the Scandal sooner dies away, and is forgotten; and therefore from the greater Degree of Mischief and Malice attending the one than the other, the Law allows the Party to justify in an Action for Words; tho' not for written Scandal; from whence it follows, that the only Favour Truth affords in such a Case is, that it may be shewn in Mitigation of Damages in an Action, and of the Fine upon an Indictment or an Information.[25]

(b) WHO SHALL BE SAID A LIBELLER: AND HEREIN,

1. WHO SHALL BE SAID THE AUTHOR OR COMPOSER OF A LIBEL.

IT has been already observed, that a Libel may be expressed not only by Printing or Writing, but also by Signs or Pictures; but it seems that some of those Ways are essentially necessary; and it is laid down in Lamb's Case, that every Person convicted of a Libel must be the Contriver, Procurer or Publisher thereof.[26]

It hath been strongly urged, that he who writes a Libel, dictated by another, is not guilty of the Composing and Making thereof, because it appears that another is the Author or Contriver; but herein the Court held, that the Writing being the essential Part of a Libel, the Reducing it into Writing, in the first Instance, was a Making, and differed from a Transcribing; and, according to the Report of this Case, in 5 Mod. it was held, that if (a) one dictates, and another writes, both are guilty of making it, for he shews his Approbation of what he writes. So if one repeats, another writes a Libel, and a third approves what is written, they are all Makers of it, as all who concur and assent to the doing of an unlawful Act are guilty; and murdering a Man's Reputation by a Libel, may be compared to murdering a Man's Person, in which all who are present and encourage the Act are guilty, tho' the Wound was given by one only.[27]

Also it hath been held, that Transcribing and Collecting libellous Matter is highly Criminal, tho' it be not found that the Party composed or published it; for his having it in Readiness for that Purpose when Occasion served, or its falling into such Hands after his Death as may publish it, might be injurious to the Government.[28]

It is said by Holt Chief Justice, that when a Libel appears under a Man's Handwriting, and no other Author is known, he is taken in the Manner, and it turns the Proof upon him; and if he cannot produce the Composer, it is hard to find that he is not the very Man.[29]

And it is said to have been resolved by the Court, that in Libels Making is the Genus, Composing or Contriving is one Species, Writing a second Species, and Procuring to be written a third Species; and finding a Man guilty of Writing only, is finding him guilty of one Species of making.[30]

But yet in some Cases the Writing of a Libel may be a lawful or innocent Act, as by the Clerk that draws the Indictment, or by a Student who takes Notes of it, because it is not done ad Infamiam of the Party; but abstractly considered, the Writing a Copy of a Libel is Writing a Libel, because such Copy contains all Things necessary to the Constitution of a Libel, viz. the scandalous Matter, and the Writing; and it has the same pernicious Consequence, for it perpetuates the Memory of the Thing, and some Time or other comes to be published.[31]

2. WHO THE PUBLISHER.

It seems to be agreed, that not only he who publishes a Libel himself, but also he who procures another to do it, is guilty of the Publication; and it is held not to be material, whether he who disperses a Libel knew any Thing of the Contents or Effects of it or not, for that nothing would be more easy than to publish the most virulent Papers with the greatest Security, if the Concealing the Purport of them from an illeterate [sic] Publisher would make him safe in dispersing them.[32]

And on this Foundation it hath been constantly ruled of late, that the buying of a Book or Paper, containing libellous Matter, in a Bookseller's

Shop, is sufficient Evidence to charge the Master with the Publication, altho' it does not appear that he knew of any such Books being there, or what the Contents thereof was; and it will not be presumed that it was brought and sold there by a Stranger, but the Master must, if he suggests any Thing of this Kind in his Excuse, prove it.[33]

The Reading of a Libel in the Presence of another, without knowing it before to be a Libel, or the Laughing at a Libel read by another, or the Saying that such a Libel is made of J. S. whether spoken with or without Malice, amounts not to a Publication of it.[34]

Also it is held, that he who repeats Part of a Libel in Merriment, without any Malice or Purpose of Defamation, is no way punishable; but of this Hawkins makes a Doubt, for that Jests of this Kind are not to be endured, and the Injury to the Reputation of the Party grieved is no way lessened by the Merriment of him who makes so light of it.[35]

But it seems to be agreed, if he who hath either read a Libel himself, or hath heard it read by another, do afterwards maliciously read or repeat any Part of it in the Presence of others, or lend or shew it to another, he is guilty of an unlawful Publication of it.[36]

It is said by my Lord Coke in the Case de Libellis Famosis, to have been resolved, that if one finds a Libel, (and would keep himself out of Danger) if it be composed against a private Man, the Finder may either burn it, or presently (a) deliver it to a Magistrate; but if it concern a Magistrate, or other publick Person, the Finder ought presently to deliver it to a Magistrate, to the Intent that by Examination and Industry the Author may be found out and punished.[37]

It seems to be a Matter of Doubt, whether the Sending an abusive Letter, filled with provoking Language, to another, will bear an Action as for a Libel, because here is no Publication; but it seems to be clearly agreed, that the Sending such Letter, without other Publication, is an Offence of a publick Nature, and punishable as such, in as much as it tends to create ill Blood, and causes a Disturbance of the publick Peace; and if the bare Making of a Libel be an Offence, whether it be published or not, as it seemeth to be holden, surely the Sending of it to the Party reflected on must be a much greater Crime.[38]

And on this Foundation the Court of King's Bench granted an Information against a Person for sending an abusive Letter to Mr. Bernardiston, therein calling him Rascal and Fool; altho' he swore that he wrote this to the Party himself, and never made it publick, being only a Piece of private Resentment; but the Court held, that this Method provoked Persons to Duelling, that the Writing and Sending was a good Publication, and that the Intent of the Party shall not be explained by himself.[39]

If one deliver a Paper full of Reflections on any Person, in Nature of a Petition to a Committee of Parliament, to any other Persons except the Members of Parliament, he may be punished as the Publisher of a Libel, in respect of such Dispersing thereof among those who have nothing to do with it.[40]

But it hath been held, that the bare Printing of a Petition to a Committee of Parliament, (which would be a Libel against the Party complained of, if it were made for any other Purpose than as a Complaint in a Course of Justice,) and Delivering Copies thereof to the Members of the Committee, shall not be looked upon as the Publication of a Libel, in as much as it is justified by the Order and Course of Proceedings in Parliament, whereof the King's Courts will take Judicial Notice.[41]

(C) THE OFFENDERS HOW PUNISHED.

THERE can be no Doubt but that a Person who writes or publishes a Libel is subject to the Action of the Party injured, in which Damages shall be recovered; and that being convicted on an Indictment or Information, shall pay such Fine, and also suffer such Corporal Punishment, as to the Court, in Discretion, shall seem proper, according to the Heinousness of the Crime and the Circumstances of the Offender.[42]

Libel.

(A) WHAT IS A LIBEL.

1. J. S. was libelled against, for Incontinency, and A. B. C. and D. maliciously repeated a great Part of it in the Presence of several. They were censur'd for this in the StarChamber, tho' there was no Proof that C. and D. made the Libel, or that they assented or were Privies to the making of it. But saying that the Libel is made of [such a] one, tho' he speaks it with Malice, without repeating any Part of it, is not punishable; nor to * repeat Part of it in Merriment, without Malice, or any purpose of Defamation; and the Court held, that a Libeller was punishable, tho' the Matter of the Libel is true. Mo. 627. Mich. 43 & 44 Eliz. in the StarChamber. Want's Case.[1]

2. Every Infamous Libel either is in writing, or without writing. That in writing is, when an Epigram, Rhithme &c. is composed or published to the Contumely of another, by which his Fame or Dignity may be prejudiced. This may be by Words or Ballads. 1. As where it is maliciously sung in the Presence of others. 2. By giving it over to another to scandalize the Party. Without writing, may be by Pictures, as painting him in an Ignominious Manner. 2. By Signs, as fixing a Gallows &c. at his Door or elsewhere. 5 Rep. 125. b. Pasch. 3 Jac. The Case De Libellis Famosis.

3. A. being very old, and having a good Estate, which he intended to settle on B. who was his Heir General, J. S. who had married a Niece of A. wrote a Letter to A. that B. was not the Son of one of the Name of A. and was a Haunter of Taverns, and that divers Women followed him from London to his House and desired to hear of A's Death, and that all his Estate would not pay his Debts &c. And sign'd it, and sent it sealed and directed to A. This was held to be a Libel, and J. S. was fin'd 200 l. and B. left at Liberty to bring his Action at Law. 2 Brownl. 151. Pasch. 10 Jac. C. B. Peacock v. Sir Geo. Reynell.[2]

4. A. wrote an infamous, scandalous &c. Letter to B. and subscribed his Name, and sealed and directed it, To his Loving Friend Mr. B and added, Speed this. And after dispersed great Numbers of Copies. Resolved by Ld. C. Egerton, and the 2 Ch. J. and per tot. Cur. that the said Letter, which in Law is a Libel, shall be punished (tho' it was solely writ to the Plaintiff himself without any Publication) in the StarChamber; For it is a great Offence to the King, and tends to breaking the Peace, and therefore necessary to be punished by Indictment, or in the StarChamber; But the dispersing Copies, or publishing the Effect of it aggravates the Offence; for which the Party may have an Action on the Case. 12 Rep. 35. Edwards v. Wootton.—— In this Case Ld. Cook said, that a Person libelling himself, is punishable by the Civil Law, and it seemed to him, that he should be so in the StarChamber. Ibid.[3]

5. A. made Addresses to M. whom he afterwards married; one J. S. during the Courtship, wrote a Letter to M. advising her not to marry A. For that he is a Debauchee, and has the Pox, and is not worth a Groat, but has declared, that if he marries her, he will allow 50 l. a Year to a Whore. This Letter was not subscribed, but conveyed to M. but it appeared upon

Evidence, that all this was by J. S. But notwithstanding, it was held a Matter indictable. Sid. 270. Trin. 17 Car. 2. B. R. The King v. Summer and Hilliard.[4]

6. The Printing a Charge of Extortion in his Office, against the Vicar-General of the Bishop of L. and delivering it to several Members of the Committee of Parliament for Examination of Grievances is justifiable; but if he had delivered it to others it had been otherwise; and the Printing them, which is a Publishing of them to the Printers and Composers, is not so great a Publication, as to have so many Copies transcribed by several Clerks. Lev. 240. Trin. 20 Car. 2. B. R. Lake v. King.[5]

7. C. forged an Order of Chancery, in which were several defamatory Expressions against the Plaintiff, and at the End draws a Pillory, and subscribes it for Sir J. H. and his forsworn Witnesses by him suborned; this is but one complicated Act, and an Action will lie. Skin. 123. Sir John Austin v. Col. Culpepper.[6]

8. A. being chose Churchwarden, was tendered an Oath Ex Officio, viz. to present every Parishioner &c. some of which Articles concerned A. himself, and was Excommunicated for Refusal; and thereupon had a Prohibition, of which he caused 2000 to be printed in English, and dispersed them all over the Kingdom, intituling them, A true translated Copy of a Writ of Prohibition, granted by the Ld. Ch. J. and other, the Justices of the Court of C. B. in Easter-Term 1676, against the Bishop of C. who had proceeded against, and Excommunicated, one T. W. a Churchwarden for refusing to take the Oath usually tendered to Persons in such Office, by which Writ the Illegality of such Oaths is declared, and the said Bishop commanded to take off his Excommunication. The Court declared this to be a most seditious Libel, and gave Order to enquire after the Printer, that he might be prosecuted. 2 Mod. 118, 119. Mich. 28 Car. 2. C. B. Waterfield v. the Bishop of Chichester.

9. In a Special Action on the Case the Plaintiff declares, that he is an Hackney Coachman, and the Defendant, with Intent to disgrace him, did ride Skimmington, and describes how, thereby surmising, that his Wife had beat him, and by Reason thereof Persons, who formerly used him, refused to come into his Coach, ad Damnum. Upon Not Guilty, it was found for the Plaintiff, and upon Motion in Arrest of Judgment, Judgment was Quod Querens Nil capiat per Billam. Raym. 401. Trin. 32 Car. 2. B. R. Mason v. Jennings.[7]

10. A Libel consists not in Words and scandalous Matter only; for that is not of itself sufficient, tho' spoken with never so much Malice; but it is the putting in writing, or procuring to be put in Writing; for if the Words are not written, he is not guilty of the Libel. 12 Mod. 219. Mich. 10 W. 3. the King v. Beere.[8]

11. The taking the Copy of a Libel is a Libel, because it comprehends all that is necessary to the making of a Libel; it hath the same scandalous Matter in it, and the same mischievous Consequences attending it at first; For it is by this Means perpetuated, and it may come into the Hands of other Men, and be published after the Death of the Copyer; and if Men might take Copies with Impunity, by the same Reason, printing of them would be no Offence; and then farewel to all Government. 12 Mod. 220. the King v. Beere.[9]

12. In Action on the Case upon a Libel it is sufficient if the Matter is reflecting; as To paint a Man playing at Cudgels with his Wife; per Holt Ch. J. 11 Mod. 99. Mich. 5 Annae. Anon.

13. A Defamatory Writing, expressing only one or two Letters of a Name, in such a Manner, that from what goes before, and follows after, it must needs be understood to signify such a particular Person in the plain, obvious and natural Construction of the Whole, and would be perfect Nonsence if strained to any other meaning, is as properly a Libel, as if it had expressed the whole Name at large; for it brings the utmost Contempt unto the Law, to suffer its Justice to be eluded by such trifling Evasions : And it is a ridiculous Absurdity to say, that a Writing, which is understood by every the meanest Capacity, cannot possibly be understood by a Judge and Jury. 2 Hawk. Pl. C. 194. cap. 73. S. 5.

14. It seems clear, That no writing whatsoever is to be esteemed a Libel, unless it reflect upon some particular Person; and it seems, that a Writing full of obscene Ribaldry, without any kind of Reflection upon any one, is not punishable at all by any Prosecution at Common Law, as I have heard it agreed in the Court of King's Bench; yet it seems, that the Author may be bound to his Good Behaviour, as a scandalous Person of evil Fame. 2 Hawk. Pl. C. 195. cap. 73. S. 9.

(B) WHO SHALL BE SAID TO BE MAKER, CONTRIVER, OR PUBLISHER. OR BE PUNISHED AS SUCH.

1. HE who disperses Libels, tho' he does not know the Effect of them nor ever heard them read, is punishable. Mo. 627. Mich. 43 & 44 Eliz. in the StarChamber. In Want's Case.

2. Jurors at a Wardmote Inquest presented J. S. for Incontinency, for which J. S. complained of them in the StarChamber. But the Court would not examine the Cause against them; because the Precedent would be dangerous, to draw into the StarChamber Jurors for their Inquests. Mo. 627. Want's Case.

3. Resolved in a Case of Libels. 1. The Procurer, and also the Writer are both Contrivers. 2. The Procurer of another to publish the Libel, and the Publisher himself, are both of them Publishers. 3. The Reading a Libel, not knowing it to be a Libel, is not publishing. 4. He that writes the Copy of the Libel by the Commandment of his Master or his Father, is not a Publisher. 5. He that Laughs when he hears another read a Libel, is not a Publisher if he does no more. 6. He that lends a Libel to be copied, *o*r he that * repeats the Libel, or any Part of it, or shews the Contents of it, or any Part of it, knowing it to be a Libel, is a Publisher. So if one writes the Copy by Commandment of his Master or Father, and then carries it to another, he is a Publisher. Mo. 813. Mich. 8 Jac. Lamb's Case.[10]

4. If a Libel be made in Writing, and afterwards burnt, and one remembers the Contents, and dictates to another who writes it, the Writer is the Maker of a Libel. He that takes a Copy of a Libel in Writing, tho' he be not the Author, is guilty of making a Libel; per Holt Ch. J. Cumb. 359. Hill. 8 W. 3. B. R. the King v. Pain.[11]

5. If a Libel be publickly known, having a written Copy of it is Evidence of a Publication; but otherwise where it is not known to be published. per Holt Ch. J. Hill. 10 W. 3. B. R. 2 Salk. 418. the King v. Bear.

(C) PUNISHED HOW. AND WHAT OUGHT TO BE DONE WITH LIBELS WHEN MET WITH.[12]

1. A.R. was indicted in the King's Bench, for the making of a Libel in Writing in the French Tongue against R. of S. calling him therein, Roy de Raveners &c. Whereupon he, being arraigned, pleaded thereupon Not Guilty, and was found Guilty, as by the Records appeareth. So as a Libeller, or a Publisher of a Libel, committeth a publick Offence, and may be indicted therefore at the Common Law. 3 Inst. 174. cites Mich. 10 E. 3.

2. J. N. an Attorney of the King's Bench, wrote a Letter to J. F. one of the King's Council, that neither Sir W. S. Chief Justice, nor his Fellows the King's Justices, nor their Clerks, any great Thing would do by the Commandment of our Lord the King, nor of Queen Philip in that Place, more than of any other of the Realm; which said John, being called, confessed the said Letter by him to be written with his own proper Hand; Judicium Curiæ, et quia prædictus Johannes cognovit dictam literam per se scriptam Roberto de Ferrers, qui est de Concilio Regis, quæ litera continet in se nullam veritatem, Prætextu cujus Dominus Rex erga Curiam & Justiciarios suos hoc in casu habere posset Indignationem, quod esset in scandalum Justic. & Curiæ; Ideo dictus Johannes committitur Maresc. & postea invenit 6 Manucaptores pro bono gestu. 3 Inst. 174. cap. 76. cites Mich. 18 E. 3.[13]

3. If one finds a Libel against a private Man, he may either burn it, or deliver it to a Magistrate immediately; But if it concerns a Magistrate, or other Publick Person, he ought immediately to deliver it to a Magistrate, that the Author may be found out. 5 Rep. 125. b. cites it as resolved Mich. 43 & 44 Eliz. in the StarChamber, in Halliwood's Case.[14]

4. One was prosecuted in the StarChamber for composing and publishing an Infamous Libel in Meter, scandalizing a deceased and present Archbishop of Canterbury. It was resolved, 1. That every Libel, (called Famosus Libellus, or Intamatoria Scriptura) made against a private Person deserves a severe Punishment; Because it provokes all the Family of that Person to Revenge &c. If it be against a Magistrate, it concerns not only the Peace, but scandalizes the Government. 2. It is punishable, notwithstanding the Person scandalized be dead at the Time. 3. A Libeller called (Famosus Defamator) shall be punished, either by Indictment at Common Law or by Bill if be deny it, or Ore tenus upon Confession, in the StarChamber, and that according to the Greatness of his Offence, it may be by Fine and Imprisonment, and if the Case be exorbitant, by Pillory and Loss of Ears. 4. It is not material, whether it be true or not, or of what Fame the Party libelled is. 5 Rep. 125. Pasch. 3 Jac. The Case De Libellis Famosis.

5. One was indicted for exhibiting an Infamous Libel directed to the King against Coke the Ch. J. of B. R. and the Court for a Judgment given in the said Court in Magdalen Colledge Case, affirming the said Judgment to be Treason, and calling the Chief Justice Traytor, perjured Judge, and scandalizing all the Professors of the Law: And this Libel, he fixed upon the great Gate entring Westminster-Hall, and divers other Places. And being arraigned, he put in a scandalous Plea, affirming he would not plead otherwise. It was adjudged, that he should be committed to the Marshal, stand upon the Pillory with Paper mentioning the Offence, and be imprisoned till he submit himself to every Court, be bound to his Good Behaviour with Sureties during Life, and pay 1000 l. Fine to the King. Cro. C. 175. Mich. 5 Car. B. R. Jeff's Case.

6. An Information was exhibited against A. B. for causing to be framed, printed, and published, a scandalous Libel intitled &c. thereby scandalizing of one C. D. Upon Not Guilty pleaded it appeared upon the Evidence, that two of these Libels printed were found at the Lodgings of the Defendant upon Warrants from the Principal Secretary of State to search there, he being suspected to be the Contriver of it. The Opinion of the Court was, That this was no Crime within the Information, though he gave no Account how they came there; and the having of a Libel, and not delivering of it to a Magistrate, was only punishable in the StarChamber, unless the Party maliciously * published it. Vent. 31. Pasch. 21 Car. 2. B. R. Anon.[15]

(D) WHAT IS THE DISTINCT POWER OF THE COURT, AND OF THE JURY, AS TO LIBELS.

1. IN an Information for a Libel, it was urged, that the only Thing to be examined by the Court is, whether the Paper published contain any Libellous Matter; For then the Application must be left to the Jury. But per Cur. This Rule is not to be taken so extensively; For where the Application is merely indifferent, we will not grant an Information, but there must be a seeming and apparent Application to be made. Gibb. 57. Pasch, 2 Geo. 2. B. R. the King v. Butcheler.

(E) PLEADINGS &C.

1. An Indictment was for composing, writing, making, and collecting several Libels in uno quorum continetur inter alia juxta Tenorem & ad Effectum sequentem, and then sets forth the Words. Upon Not Guilty, the Jury found the Defendant Guilty as to the Writing and Collecting prout in Indictamento supponitur, & quoad omnia alia praeter Scriptionem & Collectionem Not Guilty. Exception was taken, that (Inter alia) shew'd there was somewhat else, which perhaps might, if it appeared, qualify the Rest. But per Cur. non allocator; For then he could not be found Guilty; and if any thing qualifies that which is set forth, it must be given in Evidence. 2. It was agreed, that ad Effectum sequentem of itself had been naught; For the Court must judge of the Words themselves, and not of the Construction which the Prosecutor puts upon them; But the Words (ad Effectum) were corrected by the Words (Juxta * Tenorem) which imports the very Words themselves. 3. It was held, that the finding him Guilty of the bare Writing and Collecting is Criminal; not but that Collecting had better been out of the Case; And it being objected, that Defendant being found Guilty of Collecting and Writing, and not of making and composing, the Verdict is Repugnant, or an Acquittal, Non allocator; For Making is the Genus, and Composing and Contriving is one Species, and Writing a second Species, and procuring to be written a third Species; so that not finding him guilty of all, but Writing only, is finding him not guilty of any Species of making but writing. 2 Salk. 417. Hill. 10 W. 3. B. R. The King v. Bear.[16]

2. A Man may justify in an Action on the Case for a Libel; but otherwise in an Indictment; per Holt Ch. J. 11 Mod. 99. Mich. 5 Annae. Anon.

3. Upon a Motion for an Attachment against the Defendant for publishing a Libel on the Court of B. R. and a Rule made upon him to shew Cause why it should not be granted, it was moved to discharge that Rule upon an Affidavit that his Fault was not wilful, but meerly thro' ignorance; that he had the Libel from one C. a Printer in C. that it was in Latin, which he did not understand, and that he did not know who was the Author, otherwise than by a Letter which he received from the Printer, and which was now annexed to his Affidavit; by which Letter it appeared, that one Dr. Middleton was the Author; so that having shewed how he came by this Libel, and having told all that he knew of the Author, for that Reason it was insisted in his Behalf, that the Rule should be discharged, and that the Printer should be prosecuted; but the Rule was continued on the Defendant until he made out his Allegation against the Printer, who was therefore joined in the Rule, that both of them might be before the Court. In the next Term Dr. Middleton appeared and confessed in Court, that he was the Author of the Book; and thereupon the Rule was discharged against the Defendant and the Printer, and the Doctor was committed till further Consideration of the Matter; and afterwards he was fined 50 l. and bound to his Good Behaviour for a Year, and so was Dr. Colebatch the same Term, for the like Offence. 8 Mod. 123. Pasch. 9 Geo. the King v. Wiatt.

4. Information for a Libel was in the Disjunctive, viz. Scripsit seu scribi causavit, and held not good. 8 Mod. 328. Mich. 11 Geo. the King v. Brereton.

(F) PUBLICATION. WHAT.

1. WRiting the Copy of a Libel is not a Publication thereof, but only an Evidence of a Publication; per Holt Ch. J. 12 Mod. 220. cites Mo. 813 and 9

Rep. 59. b. Dr. Lamb's Case; and says the writing the original Libel it self is the same; and if a Publication of it has been proved, it is Evidence that the Publication was by him that had it in his Custody.

2.3.1.3Jacob, 1750

Libel, signifies a scandalous Report of a Person spread abroad or otherwise unlawfully published, and thereupon is called in our law an infamous Libel. And a Libel may be either in Writing, or without it: In Writing, is when any Thing is written and published to the Disgrace of another; and without Writing, is where a Person is painted out in a scandalous Manner, with Asses Ears, a Fool's Coat, &c. or where any ignominious Sign is fixed at a Person's Door, such as a Gallows, &c. 3 Inst. 174. A Libel in general may be defined to be a malicious Aspersion of another, signified in Printing or Writing; and which tends to the Blackening the Memory of one that is dead, or the Reputation of one that is living, in Order to expose him to publick Contempt, Hatred, or Ridicule: And a Libel may be extended to any Defamation whatsoever. 5 Rep. 121. Printing or Writing, tho' the Scandal is not directly charged, but on the contrary in an oblique or ironical Manner, has been held to be a Libel. A Defamatory Writing, that expresses only one or two Letters of a Man's Name, if from what precedes and follows it, by the Natural Construction of the whole it must be understood to signify and point at such a particular Person, is as properly a Libel as if the whole Name of the Person were mentioned at large. 1 Hawk. P. C. 194. Libels are Criminal for this Reason, that where any Libel is made against a private Man, it may be a Means to excite the libelled Person, or his Friends, to Revenge, and consequently to break the Peace; and where the Libel is against a Magistrate, it is not only a Breach of the Peace, but also a Scandal to the Government. 5 Rep. 125. It is said, that tho' a private Person or Magistrate be dead at the Time of making the Libel, yet the Offence may be punished, as it tends to the Breach of the Peace. Hob. 214. With Regard to this, it is no Justification of a Libel, that it's Contents are true, or that the Person libelled had a bad Reputation, for the greater Appearance there is of Truth in a Libel, the more provoking it is. Moor 627. It is held, that in a Prosecution on an Indictment or Information, it is not material whether the Matter of Libel be true or false; but in an Action upon the Case a Defendant may justify that the Matter is true. Hob. 253. If a Printer prints a Libel against a private Person, he may be indicted and punished for it: Where Persons write, print, or sell any Pamphlets or other Treatises reflecting on the Publick, or any private Person, such libellous Treatise may be seised, and the Persons concerned therein punished, Writers of false News are likewise indictable and punishable. State Tri. Vol. 2. A general Reflection on the Government is a Libel; Yet it has been adjudged, that no Writing is esteemed a Libel, unless it reflect upon some particular Person; for where a Writing inveighs against Mankind in general, or against a particular Order of Men, it is no Libel, as it does not descend to Particulars. 11 W. 3. B. R. 1 Hawk. 195. Where one accidentally finds a Libel, he ought to burn it, or deliver it to a Magistrate: In Case such Libel be found in a Person's House, he cannot be punished for Framing, Printing and Publishing the same; but 'tis said he may be indicted for having it, and not delivering it to some Magistrate. 1 Ventr. 31. The sending a scandalous Letter to the Party himself, without shewing or publishing it to others, is no Libel; tho' if it be sent to a third Person, or otherwise dispersed, this is a Publication of the Libel. 12 Rep. 34. 1 Lev. 139. In the Case a Person speaks Words that are scandalous of another, and doth not put them in Writing, he is not guilty of a Libel; for that a Libel chiefly consists in reducing the infamous Matter into Writing. 3 Salk. 226. 'Tis observed, that in the making of Libels, if one person dictates, and another writes a Libel, both are culpable; since the Writing after another shews the Transcriber's Approbation of what is contained in the Libel: And if one dictate, another write, and a third approve of what is written, they are all deemed Makers or Composers of the Libel; by Reason all Persons who join in or concur to an unlawful Act, are in Law esteemed guilty. 5 Mod. 167. A Person makes a Transcript of a Libel, but does not give it to any other, the Copying of it is no Publication; yet the bare Copying of a Libel, without Authority, hath been held to be Writing a Libel, and the Writer thereof looked upon as a Contriver; also where a Person has a written Copy of a known Libel in his Custody, it shall be taken as an Evidence of the Publication; however, in Case the Libel be not publickly known, there it is otherwise. 2 Salk. 417. And it is said, that the Copying of a Libel is the same Thing as Writing or Composing the Libel it self, because it has the same pernicious Consequence; and if the Law were not so, Persons might write Copies of Libels, and print them with Impunity. Likewise when any Libel appears under a Person's Hand, and no Author is known, the proof turns upon him, and if he cannot produce the Composer, it will be difficult for him to be freed from being deemed the Man. Ibid. 419. The Writing or Publishing a Libel is an Offence against the King's Peace, and therefore is punishable by Indictment: The Composer, Procurer, and Publisher of a Libel, are liable to a Fine, Imprisonment, Pillory, or the like Corporal Punishment, at the Discretion of the Court where the Trial is had, and according to the Heinousness of the Offence. Moor 627. 3 Inst. 174. A Person for libeling the Lord Chancellor Bacon by affirming that his Lordship had done Injustice, &c. was fined 1000 l. and sentenced to ride on a Horse with his Face to the Tail, from the Fleet Prison to Westminster, with his Fault writ on his Head, to acknowledge his Offence in all the King's Courts, and that one of his Ears should be cut off at Westminster, and the other in Cheapside; and further to be imprisoned during Life. Poph. 135. There are two ways of describing a Libel in Informations and Law Proceedings; the one by the Sense, in these Words, viz. The Tenor of which follows: And the other by an exact Description of the particular Words; and if there be any Variance in respect to the Words charged, it will be fatal. 2 Salk. 660.

Libel, (libellus) Literally signifieth a little book, but by use it is the original declaration of any action in the Civil law, 2 H. 5. 3. and 2 Ed. 6. 13. It signifies also a criminous report of any man cast abroad, or othewise unlawfully published, and then called famosus libellus: And this either in scriptis, aut sine scriptis: In scriptis is, when an epigram or other writing is composed or published to another's disgrace, which may be done verbis aut cantilenis: As where this is mallciously [sic] repeated or sung in the presence of others; or else traditione, when the libel, or any copy of it is delivered over to scandalize the party. Famosus libellus sine scriptis may be twofold; 1. Picturis, as to paint the party in a shameful and ignominious manner. Or, 2. Signis, as to fix a gallows or other ignominious signs at the door of the party, or elsewhere. 5 Co. Rep. De famosis Libellis.

A libel is defined a malicious defamation, expressed either in printing or writing, or by signs, pictures, &c. tending either to blacken the memory of one who is dead, or the reputation of one who is alive, and thereby exposing him to publick hatred, contempt and ridicule. 1 Hawk. P. C. 193. 5 Mod. 165.

This species of defamation is usually termed written scandal, and thereby receives an aggravation, in that it is presumed to have been entered upon with coolness and deliberation, and to continue longer, and propagate wider and farther than any other scandal. 5 Co. 125.

But it is clearly agreed, that not only written or printed scandal comes within the notion of a libel, but also may be applied to any defamation whatsoever, expressed either by signs or pictures; as by fixing up a gallows at a man's door, or elsewhere, or by painting him in a shameful or Ignominious manner, as by exposing a man and his wife by a skimmington or riding, though a special custom is alleged for such practice. 5 Co. 125. Skin. 123. Raym. 401. 3 Keb. 378.

And since the chief cause, for which the law severely punishes all offences of this nature, is a direct tendency of them to a breach of the publick peace, by provoking the parties injured, and their friends and families, to acts of revenge, which it would be impossible to restrain by the severest laws, were there no redress from publick justice for injuries of this kind, which, of all others, are more sensibly felt; and since the plain meaning of such scandal, as is expressed by signs or pictures, is as obvious to common sense, and as easily understood by every common capacity, and altogether as provoking as that which is expressed by writing or printing, why should it not be equally criminal? 1 Hawk. P. C. 193.

1. What degree of defamation will amount to a libel; and what certainty is requisite in the matter and application of a libel.
2. Whether proceedings in a court of justice are libelous; and whether any thing of this kind can be justified.
3. Who shall be deemed the author or composer of a libel; who the publisher; and how the offenders shall be punished.

1. WHAT DEGREE OF DEFAMATION WILL AMOUNT TO A LIBEL; AND WHAT CERTAINTY IS REQUISITE IN THE MATTER AND APPLICATION OF A LIBEL.

As every person desires to appear agreeable in life, and must be highly provoked by such ridiculous representations of him, as tend to lessen him in the esteem of the world, and take away his reputation, which to some men is more dear than life itself: Hence it hath been held, that not only charges of a flagrant nature, and which reflect a moral turpitude on the party, are libellous, but also such as set him in a scurrilous ignominious light; for these equally create ill blood, and provoke the parties to acts of revenge and breaches of the peace. 5 Co. 125. 1 Keb. 293. Moor 627. 1 Rol. Abr. 37.

Hence it hath been held, that words, though not scandalous in themselves, yet if published in writing, and tending in a degree to the discredit of a man, are libellous, whether such words defame private persons only, or persons employed in a publick capacity; in which latter case they are said to receive an aggravation, as they tend to scandalize the government, for reflecting on those who are intrusted with the administration of public affairs, which doth not only endanger the publick peace, as all other libels do, by stirring up the parties immediately concerned in it to acts of revenge, but also have a direct tendency to breed in the people a dislike of their governors, and incline them to faction and sedition. Hard. 470. Skin. 123. 5 Co. 125. 2 Rol. Rep. 86. 1 Hawk. P. C. 94.

As where a person delivered a ticket up to the minister after sermon, wherein he desired him to take notice, that offences passed now without controul from the civil magistrate, and to quicken the civil magistate to do his duty, &c. and this was held to be a libel, though no magistrates in particular were mentioned, and though it was not averred that the magistrates suffered these vices knowingly. 1 Sid. 219. 1 Keb. 773. The King v. Pym.

A. gunsmith, published an advertisement in a common newspaper, that he had invented a short kind of gun that shot as far as others of a longer size, and that he was made gunsmith to the Prince of Wales; and B. another gunsmith, counter-advertised, that whereas, &c. reciting the former paragraph, he desired all gentlemen to be cautious, for that the said A. durst not engage with any artist in town, nor ever did make such an experiment, except out of a leather gun, as any gentleman might be satisfied at the Cross Guns in Long Acre, the said B.'s house. And the court held, that tho' B. or any other of the trade, might counter-advertise what was published by A. yet that that should have been done without any general reflections on him in the way of his business; that the advice to all gentlemen to be cautious, was a reflection on his honesty, as if he would deceive the world by a fictitious advertisement, and the allegation, that he would not engage with an artist, was setting him below the rest of his trade, and calling him a bungler in general terms, and not relative to the precedent matter, and that the words except out of a leather gun, was charging him with a lie, the word gun being vulgarly used for a lie, and gunner for a liar; and that therefore these words were libellous, and gave judgment accordingly; and herein the court held, that words, tho' not scandalous in themselves, yet being published in writing, and tending any way to the party's discredit, were actionable, and that all words were to be construed secundum subjectam materiam, and to be understood by the court in the same sense that others do. 3 Bac. Abr. 491. Pasch. 4 Geo. 2. in B. R. Harman v. Delany.

But though every species and degree of calumny and detraction of this kind are deemed odious in the eye of the law, and punishable either by civil action or criminal prosecution in most cases, at the election of the party injured; yet the court of King's Bench, whose jurisdiction herein is founded upon the necessity of preventing quarrels and ill blood, and which deals with this offence as of dangerous consequence to, and destructive to the peace of the nation, always exercises a discretionary power in granting an information for an offence of this nature, and will, in many cases, leave the party to his ordinary remedy; as where the application is made after a great length of time; so where the matter complained of as a libel happens to be true; so where the granting the information would be a discouragement to learned inquiries; or where the matter complained of was intended for reformation, not defamation. 3 Bac. Abr. 492.

So where a man advertises in a publick newspaper, that his wife had eloped from him, and cautioned all persons from trusting her; and an information for a libel being moved for, it was denied, because it was the only way the husband could take to secure himself. 3 Bac. Abr. 492. The King v. Enes, 5 Geo. 2. in B. R.

So where it was advertised in one of the daily papers, that Lady Mordington kept an assembly in Moorfields, and it being counter-advertised by my Lord's order, that the person calling herself Lady Mordington was an impostrix, and that there was no such person except his wife, who always lived with him; the court refused to grant an information; for though she be called an impostrix, yet that relates to her as assuming the title of Lady Mordington, and which she is alleged not to have any right to; and therefore in this respect may well be called an impostrix. 3 Bac. Abr. 492. The King v. Jenneaur, Pasch. 8 Geo. 2. in B. R.

A writing was directed to general Wills, and the four principal officers of the guards, to be presented to his Majesty for redress; the paper contained the defendant's case, that he furnished the guard at Whitehall with fire and candle, for which the government owed him 350 l. that he obtained a warrant for his money, and Captain Carr (the prosecutor) told him, that if he would assign the warrant, he would procure him the money; the warrant was assigned, and the money paid to Carr, who refused paying it to the defendant; and the question was, if an information should be granted; and the court held it no libel, but a representation of an injury, drawn up in a proper way for redress, without any intention to asperse the prosecutor; and tho' there be a suggestion of a fraud, yet this is no more than what is in every bill in Chancery, which was never held libellous, if relative to the subject-matter. 3 Bac. Abr. 492. The King v. Bayley, Hill. 8 Geo. 2. in B. R.

Here it may be proper to insert the remarkable case of parson Prick, who in a sermon recited a story out of Fox's Martyrology, that one Greenwood, being a perjured person, and a great persecutor, had great plagues inflicted on him, and was killed by the hand of God; whereas in truth he was never so plagued, and was himself present at that sermon; and he thereupon brought his action upon the case, for calling him a perjured person; and the defendant pleaded Not guilty; and this matter being disclosed upon the evidence, Wray Ch. Just. delivered the law to the jury, that it being delivered but as a story, and not with any malice or intention to slander any person, he was not guilty of the words maliciously, and so was found Not guilty. Cro. Jac. 90, 91.

As to the certainty requisite in the matter and application of a libel, it seems to be now agreed, that not only scandal expressed in an open and direct manner, but also such as is expressed in allegory and irony amounts to a libel, and that the judges are to understand it in the same manner as others do, without any strained endeavours to find out loopholes, or to palliate the offence, which in some measure would be to encourage scandal; as where a writing in a taunting manner, reckoning up several acts of publick charity done by one, says, You will not play the Jew, nor the hypocrite, and so goes on, in a strain of ridicule, to insinuate that what he did was owing to his vainglory; or where a writing, pretending to recommend to one the characters of several great men for his imitation, instead of taking notice of what they are generally esteemed famous for, pitched on such qualities as their enemies charge them with the want of; as by proposing such a one to be imitated for his courage, who is known to be a great statesman, but no soldier; and another to be imitated for his learning, who is known to be a great general, but no scholar, &c. which kind of writing is as well understood to mean only to upbraid the parties with the want of these qualities, as if it had directly and expressly done so. 5 Co. 125. That a libel may be as well by descriptions and circumlocutions as in express terms. Poph. 252. Hob. 215. 1 Hawk. P. C. 193-4.

And from the same foundation it hath also been resolved, that a defamatory writing expressing only one or two letters of a name, in such a manner that from what goes before, and follows after, it must needs be understood to signify such person in the plain, obvious, and natural construction of the whole, and would be perfect nonsense if strained to any other meaning, is as properly a libel as if it had expressed the whole name at large; for it brings the utmost contempt upon the law, to suffer its justice to be eluded by such trifling evasions; and it is a ridiculous absurdity to say, that a writing, which is understood by every the meanest capacity, cannot possibly be understood by a judge and jury. 1 Hawk. P. C. 194. Hurt's case.

But it is said, that no writing whatsoever is to be esteemed a libel, unless it reflect upon some particular person; and that a writing full of obscene ribaldry, without any kind of reflection on any one, is not punishable at all by any prosecution at Common law; but the author may be bound to his good behaviour, as a scandalous person of evil same. 1 Hawk. P. C. 195.

But a scandal published of three or four, or any one or two of them, is punishable at the complaint of one or more, or all of them. Poph. 252, 254.

The defendant was charged in an information with writing a libel against the Protestant religion and bishops, innuendo the bishops of England; he was found guilty; and in an arrest of judgment it was offered, that the bishops libelled were not English bishops, nor could the innuendo support such a construction; but the court took upon them to understand the libel in that sense, and overruled the exception. 3 Mod. 68. The King v. Baxter.

An information was prayed for publishing a paper containing an account of a murder on a Jewish woman and her child, by certain Jews lately arrived from Portugal, and living near Broadstreet, because the child was begotten by a Christian; and the affidavit set forth, that several persons mentioned therein, who were recently arrived from Portugal, and lived near Broadstreet, were attacked by multitudes in several parts of the city, barbarously treated, and threatened with death, in case they were found abroad any more; and it was objected, that no information could be granted in this case, because it did not appear who in particular the persons reflected on were; and for this was cited The King v. Orme, Trin. 11 W. 3. Where an indictment was exhibited for a libel called The Ladies Invention, and alleged to the scandal of several ladies unknown; and after verdict for the King, judgment was arrested, because it did not appear who the persons reflected on were; sed per curiam, Admitting that an information for a libel may be improper, yet the publication of this paper is deservedly punishable in an information for a misdemeanor, and that of the highest kind; such sort of advertisements necessarily tending to raise tumults and disorders among the people, and inflame them with an universal spirit of barbarity against a whole body of men, as if guilty of crimes scarce practicable, and wholly incredible; and in this case was cited the case of The King and Franklin, where, tho’ only the word ministers was used in the libel, yet by suitable averments in the information, and proof made of them to the jury, they found those ministers to be ministers of state to his present Majesty, and the defendant guilty. 3 Bac. Abr. 494. King v. Osborne. Trin. 5 Geo. 2. in B. R.

2. WHETHER PROCEEDINGS IN A COURT OF JUSTICE ARE LIBELOUS; AND WHETHER ANY THING OF THIS KIND CAN BE JUSTIFIED.

It seems to be clearly agreed, that no proceeding in a regular course of justice will make the complaint amount to a libel; for it would be a great discouragement to suitors to subject them to publick prosecutions, in respect of their applications to a court of justice; and the chief intention of the law in prohibiting persons to revenge themselves by libels, or any other private manner, is to restrain them from endeavouring to make themselves their own judges, and oblige them to refer the decision of their grievances to those whom the law has appointed to determine them. Dyer 285. 2 Inst. 228. Yelv. 117. 2 Buls. 269. Godb. 340. Palm. 145, 188. 1 Vent. 23. 1 Hawk. P. C. 194.

Therefore it hath been resolved, that no false or scandalous matter contained in a petition to a committee of parliament, or in articles of the peace exhibited to justices of peace, are libellous. 1 Lev. 240. 1 Sid. 414. 2 Keb. 832. 4 Co. 14. 1 Hawk. P. C. 194.

Also it is held, that no presentment of a grand jury can be a libel, not only because persons who are supposed to be returned without their own seeking, and are sworn to act impartially, shall be presumed to have proper evidence for what they do, but also because it would be of the utmost ill consequence any way to discourage them from making inquiries with that freedom and readiness which the publick good requires. Moor 627. 1 Hawk. P. C. 195.

And it is holden by some, that no want of jurisdiction in the court to which such a complaint shall be exhibited will make it a libel; because the mistake of the court is not imputable to the party, but his counsel; but herein it is said by Mr. Hawkins, that if it shall manifestly appear from the whole circumstances of the case, that a prosecution is intirely false, malicious and groundless, and commenced not with a design to go thro’ with it, but only to expose the defendant’s character, under the shew of a legal proceeding, there can be no reason why such a mockery of publick justice should not rather aggravate the offence than make it cease to be one, and make such scandal a good ground of an indictment at the suit of the King, as it makes the malice of their proceeding a good foundation of an action on the case at the suit of the party, whether the court had a jurisdiction of the cause or not. 2 Keb. 832. 4 Co. 14. 1 Hawk. P. C. 194.

It seems to be clearly agreed, that in an indictment or criminal prosecution for a libel, the party cannot justify that the contents thereof are true, or that the person upon whom it is made had a bad reputation; since the greater appearance there is of truth in any malicious invective, so much the more provoking it is; for, as my Lord Coke observes, in a settled state of government the party grieved ought to complain for every injury done him, in the ordinary course of law, and not by any means to revenge himself by the odious course of libelling, or otherwise. 5 Co. 125. Hob. 253. Moor 627. 1 Hawk. P. C. 194.

Also it seems now settled, that no scandal in writing is any more justifiable in a civil action brought by the party to vindicate the injury done, than in an indictment or information at the suit of the Crown; for tho' in actions for words, the law, thro' compassion, admits the truth of the charge to be pleaded as a justification, yet this tenderness of the law is not to be extended to written scandal, in which the author acts with more coolness, and deliberation gives the scandal a more durable stamp, and propagates it wider and further; whereas in words men often in a heat and passion say things which they are afterwards ashamed of, and tho' they seem to act with deliberation, yet the scandal sooner dies away, and is forgotten; and therefore from the greater degree of mischief and malice attending the one than the other, the law allows the party to justify in an action for words, tho' not for written scandal; from whence it follows, that the only favour truth affords in such a case is, that it may be shewn in mitigation of damages in an action, and of the fine upon an indictment or an information, 3 Bac. Abr. 495. The King v. Roberts, Mich. 8 Geo. 2. in B. R. agreed per cur. in a case for publishing a libel on Mr. Branley, recorder of Warwick.

3. WHO SHALL BE DEEMED THE AUTHOR OR COMPOSER OF A LIBEL; WHO THE PUBLISHER; AND HOW THE OFFENDERS SHALL BE PUNISHED.

It has been already observed, that a libel may be expressed not only by printing or writing, but also by signs or pictures; but it seems that some of those ways are essentially necessary; and it is laid down in Lamb's case, that every person convicted of a libel must be the contriver, procurer or publisher thereof. 9 Co. 59. Moor 813. Lamb's case.

It hath been strongly urged, that he who writes a libel dictated by another, is not guilty of the composing and making thereof, because it appears that another is the author or contriver; but herein the court held, that the writing being the essential part of a libel, the reducing it into writing in the first instance was a making, and differed from a transcribing; and, according to the report of this case, in 5 Mod. it was held, that if one dictates, and another writes, both are guilty of making it, for he shews his approbation of what he writes. So if one repeats, another writes a libel, and a third approves what is written, they are all makers of it, as all who concur and assent to the doing of an unlawful act are guilty; and murdering a man's reputation by a libel, may be compared to murdering a man's person, in which all who are present and encourage the act are guilty, tho' the wound was given by one only. Carth. 405. 5 Mod. 163. 10. 167. The King v. Paine.

Also it hath been held, that transcribing and collecting libellous matter is highly criminal, though it be not found that the party composed or published it; for his having it in readiness for that purpose when occasion served, or its falling into such hands after his death; may publish it, might be injurious to the government. Carth. 407. 2 Salk. 417. The King v. Bear.

It is said by Holt Ch. J. that when a libel appears under a man's handwriting, and no other author is known, he is taken in the manner, and it turns the proof upon him; and if he cannot produce the composer, it is hard to find that he is not the very man. 2 Salk. 419.

And it is said to have been resolved by the court, that in libels making is the genus, composing or contriving is one species, writing a second species, and procuring to be written a third species: And finding a man guilty of writing only, is finding him guilty of one species of making. 2 Salk. 419.

But where in some cases the writing of a libel may be a lawful or innocent act, as by the clerk that draws the indictment, or by a student who takes notes of it, because it is not done ad infamiam of the party; but abstractedly considered, the writing the copy of a libel is writing a libel, because such copy contains all things necessary to the construction of a libel, viz. the scandalous matter, and the writing; and it has the same pernicious consequence, for it perpetuates the memory of the thing, and some time or other comes to be published. 2 Salk. 418.

It seems to be agreed, that not only he who publishes a libel himself, but also he who procures another to do it, is guilty of the publication; and it is held not to be material, whether he who disperses a libel knew any thing of the contents or effects of it or not; for that nothing would be more easy than to publish the most virulent papers with the greatest security, if the concealing the purport of them from an illiterate publisher would make him safe in dispersing them. 9 Co. 59. Moor. 627. 1 Hawk. P. C. 195.

And on this foundation it hath been constantly ruled of late, that the buying of a book or paper containing libellous matter in a bookseller's shop, is sufficient evidence to charge the master with the publication, altho' it does not appear that he knew of any such books being there, or what the contents thereof was; and it will not be presumed that it was brought and sold there by a stranger, but the master must, if he suggests any thing of this kind in his excuse, prove it. The King v. Nutt, Hil. 2 Geo. 2 so ruled on evidence at Guildhall, per Raymond Chief Justice.

The reading of a libel in the presence of another, without knowing it before to be a libel, or the laughing at a libel read by another, or the saying that such a libel is made of J. S. whether spoken with or without malice, amounts not to a publication of it. 9 Co. 59. Moor 813. 1 Hawk. P. C. 196.

Also it is held, that he who repeats part of a libel in merriment, without any malice or purpose of defamation, is no way punishable; but of this Hawkins makes a doubt, for that jests of this kind are not to be endured, and the injury to the reputation of the party grieved is no way lessened by the merriment of him who makes so light of it. Moor 627. 1 Hawk. P. C. 196.

But it seems to be agreed, if he who hath either read a libel himself, or hath heard it read by another, do afterwards maliciously read or repeat any part of it in the presence of others, or lend or shew it to another, he is guilty of an unlawful publication of it. Moor 813. 9 Co. 59. 1 Hawk. P. C. 195.

It is said by my Lord Coke in the case of De libellis famosis, to have been resolved, that if one finds a libel, (and would keep himself out of danger) if it be composed against a private man, the finder may either burn it, or presently deliver it to a magistrate; but if it concern a magistrate, or other publick person, the finder ought presently to deliver it to a magistrate, to the intent that by examination and industry the author may be found out and punished. 5 Co. 125.

It seems to be a matter of doubt, whether the sending an abusive letter, filled with provoking language to another, will bear an action as for a libel, because here is no publication; but it seems to be clearly agreed, that the sending such letter, without other publication, is an offence of a publick nature, and punishable as such, inasmuch as it tends to create ill blood, and causes a disturbance of the publick peace; and if the bare making of a libel be an offence, whether it be published or not, as it seemeth to be holden, surely the sending of it to the party reflected on must be a much greater offence. 4 Inst. 180. 3 Inst. 174. Hob. 62, 215. 12 Co. 34. Poph. 136. Raym. 201. 1 Lev. 139. 1 Keb. 931. 1 M. 58. Skin. 123-4.

And on this foundation the court of King's Bench granted an information against a person for sending an abusive letter to Mr. Bernardiston, therein calling him rascal and fool; although he swore that he wrote this to the party himself, and never made it publick, being only a piece of private resentment; but the court held, that this method provoked persons to duelling, that the writing and sending was a good publication, and that the intent of the party shall not be explained by himself. 3 Bac. Abr. 497. The King v. Pillborough. Mich. 5 Geo. 2. in B. R.

If one deliver a paper full of reflections on any person in nature of a petition to a committee of parliament, to any other persons except the members of parliament, he may be punished as the publisher of a libel, in respect of such dispersing thereof among those who have nothing to do with it. 1 Sand. 133. 1 Lev. 240. 1 Sid. 414. 1 Keb. 832.

But it hath been held, that the bare printing of a petition to a committee of parliament (which would be a libel against the party complained of, if it were made for any other purpose than as a complaint in a course of justice,) and delivering copies thereof to the members of the committee, shall not be looked upon as the publication of a libel, inasmuch as it is justified by the order and course of proceedings in parliament, whereof the King's courts will take judical notice. 1 Hawk. P. C. 196, and the authorities supra.

There can be no doubt but that a person who writes or publishes a libel is subject to the action of the party injured, in which damages shall be recovered; and that being convicted on an indictment or information, shall pay such fine, and also suffer such corporal punishment as to the court in discretion shall seem proper, according to the heinousness of the crime, and the circumstances of the offenders. Cro. Car. 175.

5. The security of his reputation or good name from the arts of detraction and slander, are rights to which every man is intitled, by reason and natural justice; since without these it is impossible to have the perfect enjoyment of any other advantage or right. But these three last articles (being of much less importance than those which have gone before, and those which are yet to come) it will suffice to have barely mentioned among the rights of person; referring the more minute discussion of their several branches, to those parts of our commentaries which treat of the infringement of these rights, under the head of personal wrongs.

2.3.2CASE LAW

2.3.2.1Respublica v. Oswald, 1788

On the 12th of July, Lewis moved for a rule to shew cause why an attachment should not issue against Eleazer Oswald, the printer and publisher of the Independent Gazetteer.

The case was this: Oswald having inserted in his newspapers several anonymous pieces against the character of Andrew Browne, the master of a female academy, in the city of Philadephia, Browne applied to him to give up the authors of those pieces; but being refused that satisfaction, he brought an action for the libel against Oswald, returnable into the Supreme Court, on the 2d day of July; and therein demanded bail for £1,000. Previously to the return day of the writ, the question of bail being brought by citation before Mr. Justice Bryan, at his chambers, the Judge, on a full hearing of the cause of action, in the presence of both the parties, ordered the Defendant to be discharged on common bail; and the Plaintiff appealed from this order to the court. Afterwards, on the 1st of July, Oswald published under his own signature, an address to the public, which contained a narrative of these proceedings, and the following passages, which, I conceive, to have been the material grounds of the present motion.

"When violent attacks are made upon a person under pretext of justice, and legal steps are taken on the occasion, not perhaps to redress the supposed injury, but to feed and gratify partisaning and temporising resentments, it is not unwarrantable in such person to represent the real statement of his case, and appeal to the world for their sentiments and countenance.

“Upon these considerations, principally, I am now emboldened to trespass on the public patience, and must solicit the indulgence of my friends and customers, while I present to their notice, an account of the steps lately exercised with me; from which it will appear that my situation as a printer, and the rights of the press and of freemen, are fundamentally struck at; and an earnest endeavour is on the carpet to involve me in difficulties to please the malicious dispositions of old and permanent enemies.”

“But until the news had arrived last Thursday, that the ninth state had acceded to the new federal government, I was not called upon; and Mr. Page in the afternoon of that day visited me in due form of law with a writ. Had Mr. Browne pursued me in this line, “without loss of time,” agreeably to his lawyer’s letter, I should not have supposed it extraordinary — but to arrest me the moment the federal intelligence came to hand, indicated that the commencement of this suit was not so much the child of his own fancy, as it has been probably dictated to and urged on him by others, whose sentiments upon the new constitution have not in every respect coincided with mine. In fact, it was my idea, in the first progress of the business, that Mr. Browne was merely the hand-maid of some of my enemies among the federalists; and in this class I must rank, his great patron Doctor Rush (whose brother is a judge of the Supreme Court). I think Mr. Brown’s conduct has since confirmed the idea beyond a doubt.”

“Enemies I have had in the legal profession, and it may perhaps add to the hopes of malignity, that this action is instituted in the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. However, if former prejudices should be found to operate against me on the bench, it is with a jury of my country, properly elected and empannelled, a jury of freemen and independent citizens, I must rest the suit. I have escaped the jaws of persecution through this channel on certain memorable occasions, and hope I shall never be a sufferer, let the blast of faction blow with all its furies!”

“The doctrine of libels being a doctrine incompatible with law and liberty, and at once destructive of the privileges of a free country in the communication of our thoughts, has not hitherto gained any footing in Pennsylvania: and the vile measures formerly taken to lay me by the heels on this subject only brought down obloquy upon the conductors themselves. I may well suppose the same love of liberty yet pervades my fellow citizens, and that they will not allow the freedom of the press to be violated upon any refined pretence, which oppressive ingenuity or courtly study can invent."

"Upon trial of the cause, the public will decide for themselves, whether Mr. Browne's motives have been laudable and dignified; whether his conduct in declining an acquittal of his character in the paper, and suing me in the manner he did, was decent and consistent; and, in a word, whether he is not actuated by some of my inveterate foes and opponents, to lend his name in their service for the purpose of harrassing and injuring me."

A transcript from the records was read to shew that the action between Browne and Oswald was depending in the court; James Martin proved that the paper containing Oswald's address was bought at his printing office, fresh and damp from the press; and a deposition, made by Browne, was read to prove the preceding facts relative to the cause of action, the hearing before Mr. Justice Bryan, and the appeal from his order.

Lewis then adverted to the various pieces, which were charged as libellous in the depending action; and argued, that, though the liberty of the press was invaluable in its nature, and ought not to be infringed: yet, that its value did not consist in a boundless licentiousness of slander and defamation. He contended, that the profession of Browne, to whom the education of more than a hundred children was sometimes entrusted, exposed him, in a peculiar manner, to be injured by wanton aspersions of his character; and he inferred the necessity of the action, which had been instituted, from this consideration, that if Browne were really the monster which the papers in question described him to be, he ought to be hunted from society; but, that if he had been falsely accused, if he had been maliciously traduced, it was a duty that he owed to himself and to the public to vindicate his reputation, and to call upon the justice of the laws, to punish so gross a violation of truth and decency. For this purpose, he continued, a writ had been issued, and bail was required. The defendant, if not before, was certainly, on the hearing at the Judge's chambers, apprized of the cause of action: The order of Mr. Justice Bryan on that occasion, and the appeal to the court, were circumstances perfectly within his knowledge; and yet, while the whole merits of the cause were thus in suspense, he thought proper to address the public in language evidently calculated to excite the popular resentment against Browne; to create doubts and suspicions of the integrity and impartiality of the Judges, who must preside upon the trial; and to promote an unmerited compassion in his own favour. He has described himself as the object of former persecutions upon similar principles; he has asserted that, in this instance, an individual is made the instrument of a party to destroy him; and he artfully calls upon his fellow citizens to interest themselves to preserve the freedom of the press, which he considers as attacked in his person. Nay, in order to cast an odium upon the new government of the United States, he insinuates, that his arrest was purposely protracted ‘till the ratification of nine states had given stability to that system: a falsehood, as unwarrantable as it is insidious; for, it will be proved that this delay took place at his own request, communicated by Col. Proctor.

Col. Proctor, being examined on this point, said, that he, at first, desired the action might not be brought, in hopes of accomplishing a compromise between the parties; that, afterwards, he requested Mr. Lewis to defer issuing the writ ‘till as near the term as it was possible: but that all this interference was of his own accord, and not at the instance of the defendant. He acknowledged, however, that he had informed Oswald, that the commencement of the action would be postponed as long as possible, after having obtained a promise to that effect from Mr. Lewis.

Lewis said he was very much mistaken, indeed, if Col. Proctor had not mentioned the request as coming from the defendant; and Col. Proctor answered, “if ever I told you so, he certainly sent me; but I cannot remember that ever he asked me to do a thing of the kind.”

Lewis then added, that the address to the public manifestly tended to interrupt the course of justice; it was an attempt to prejudice the minds of the people in a cause then depending, and, by that means, to defeat the plaintiff’s claim to justice, and to stigmatize the Judges, whose duty it was to administer the laws. There could be no doubt, therefore, that it amounted to a contempt of the court; and it only remained, in support of his motion, to shew that an attachment was the legal mode of proceeding against the offender. For this he cited 4 Black. Com. 280. 2 Atk. 469.

By the Court: — Take a rule to shew cause on Monday next, at 9 o’clock in the morning.

The defendant appearing on Monday the 14th, agreeably to the rule to shew cause, obtained on Saturday, prayed that the rule might be enlarged, as he had not had a reasonable time to prepare for the argument. But Lewis opposed the enlargement of the rule, observing that the defendant would be heard in extenuation, or excuse, of the contempt, after the attachment had issued.

By M'K<sc>ean</sc>, C. J. — I know not of any instance where a delay of a term has been allowed in the case of an attachment: one reason for such a summary proceeding is to prevent delay. Let cause be now shewn.

Sergeant, in shewing cause against the attachment, contended, that the doctrine, in 4 Black. Com. 280. was laid down much too wide; that in 2 Atk. 469. the Chancellor expressly assigns this reason, for his determining without a jury, that he was a judge of fact; and in 1 Burr. 510. 513. an information is granted on this principle, that courts of common law will not decide upon facts without the intervention of a jury.

M'K<sc>ean</sc>, C. J. — This was not the reason that influenced the court in their decision.

But, whatever the law might be in England, Sergeant insisted, that it could not avail in Pennsylvania. Even in England, indeed, though it is said to be a contempt to report the decisions of the courts, unless under the imprimatur of the judges; yet, we find Burrow, and all the subsequent reporters, proceeding without that sanction. But the constitution of Pennsylvania authorizes many things to be done which in England are prohibited. Here the press is laid open to the inspection of every citizen, who wishes to examine the proceedings of the government; of which the judicial authority is certainly to be considered as a branch. Const. Penn. Sect. 35.

M'K<sc>ean</sc>, C. J. — Could not this be done in England? Certainly it could: for, in short, there is nothing in the constitution of this state, respecting the liberty of the press, that has not been authorized by the constitution of that kingdom for near a century past.

Sergeant. The 9th section of the Bill of Rights, however, puts this supposed offence into such a form, as must entitle the defendant to a trial by jury; and precludes every attempt to compel him to give evidence against himself. It declares, "that, in all prosecutions for criminal offences, a man has a right to be heard by himself and his council, to demand the cause and nature of his accusation, to be confronted with the witnesses, to call for evidence in his favour, and a speedy public trial, by an impartial jury of the country, without the unanimous consent of which jury he cannot be found guilty; nor can he be compelled to give evidence against himself; nor can any man be justly deprived of his liberty except by the laws of the land, or the judgment of his peers." — Now, the present proceeding against the defendant is for a criminal offence; and, yet, if the attachment issues, the essential parts of this section must be defeated: for, in that case, the defendant cannot be tried by a jury; and, according to the practice upon attachments, he will be compelled to answer interrogatories; in doing which, he must either be guilty of perjury, or give evidence against himself. The proceeding by attachment is, indeed, a novelty in this country, except for the purpose of enforcing the attendance of witnesses. Those contempts which are committed in the face of a court stand upon a very different ground. Even the court of Admiralty (which is not a court of record) possesses a power to punish them; and the reason arises from the necessity that every jurisdiction should be competent to protect itself from immediate violence and interruption. But contempts which are alledged to have been committed out of doors, are not within this reason; they come properly within the class of criminal offences; and, as such, by the 9th Sect. of the bill of rights, they can only be tried by a jury.

M'K<sc>ean</sc>, C. J. Do you then apprehend that the 9th Sect. of the bill of rights introduced something new on the subject of trials? I have always understood it to be the law, independent of this section, that the twelve jurors must be unanimous in their verdict, and yet this section makes this express provision.

Sergeant said, that he had discussed the subject as well as the little opportunity afforded him would admit. He pressed the court to give further time for the argument, or, at once, to direct a trial. This he contended was, at least, discretionary; and, considering the Defendant's protestation of innocence,[*] his readiness to give ample security for his future appearance, the magnitude of the question as arising from the constitution, and its immense consequences to the public, he thought a delay, that was essential to deliberation and justice, ought not to be refused.

Heatly and Lewis, in support of the motion, contended, that under the circumstances of the case, Oswald's publication, whether true or false, amounted to a contempt of the court, as it respected a cause then depending in judgment, and reflected upon one of the Judges in his official capacity; that the argument of the adverse counsel went so far as to assert, that there could be no such offence as a contempt even in England, since the very words inserted in the constitution of Pennsylvania, were used in the Magna Charta of that kingdom; that, in truth, neither the bill of rights nor the constitution extended to the case of contempts, for they mean only to secure to every citizen the right of expressing his sentiments with a manly freedom, but not to authorize wanton attacks upon private reputation, or to deprive the court of a power essential to its own existence, and to the due administration of justice; that the court were as competent to judge of the fact and the law, upon the inspection of the publication in question, as the Chancellor was in the authority cited from Atkins; and that although the prosecutor could, perhaps, proceed either by indictment or information, yet that the abuses of the Star Chamber had rendered the process by information odious, and an attachment, which was sanctified by immemorial usage, was the most expeditious, and, therefore, the most proper remedy for the evil complained of.

THE CHIEF JUSTICE delivered the opinion of the Court to the following effect, Judge Bryan having shortly before taken his seat.

M'KEAN, C. J. — This is a motion for an attachment against Eleazer Oswald, the printer and publisher of the Independent Gazetteer, of the 1st of July last, No. 796. As a ground for granting the attachment, it is proved, that an action for a libel had been instituted in this court, in which Andrew Browne is the plaintiff, and Eleazer Oswald the defendant; that a question with respect to bail in that action, had been agitated before one of the Judges, from whose order, discharging the defendant on common bail, the plaintiff had appealed to the court; and that Mr. Oswald's address to the public, which is the immediate subject of complaint, relates to the action thus depending before us.

The counsel in support of their motion, have argued, that this address was intended to prejudice the public mind upon the merits of the cause, by propagating an opinion that Browne was the instrument of a party to persecute and destroy the defendant; that he acted under the particular influence of Dr. Rush, whose brother is a judge of this court; and, in short, that from the ancient prejudices of all the judges, the defendant did not stand a chance of a fair trial.

Assertions and imputations of this kind are certainly calculated to defeat and discredit the administration of justice. Let us, therefore, enquire, first, whether they ought to be considered as a contempt of the court; and, secondly, whether, if so, the offender is punishable by attachment.

And here, I must be allowed to observe, that libelling is a great crime, whatever sentiments may be entertained by those who live by it. With respect to the heart of the libeller, it is more dark and base than that of the assassin, or than his who commits a midnight arson. It is true, that I may never discover the wretch who has burned my house, or set fire to my barn;

but these losses are easily repaired, and bring with them no portion of ignominy or reproach. But the attacks of the libeller admit not of this consolation: the injuries which are done to character and reputation seldom can be cured, and the most innocent man may in a moment be deprived of his good name, upon which, perhaps, he depends for all the prosperity, and all the happiness of his life. To what tribunal can he then resort? how shall he be tried, and by whom shall he be acquitted? It is in vain to object, that those who know him will disregard the slander, since the wide circulation of public prints must render it impracticable to apply the antedote as far as the poison has been extended. Nor can it be fairly said, that the same opportunity is given to vindicate, which has been employed to defame him; for, many will read the charge, who may never see the answer; and while the object of accusation is publicly pointed at, the malicious and malignant author, rests in the dishonorable security of an anonymous signature. Where much has been said, something will be believed; and it is one of the many artifices of the libeller, to give to his charges an aspect of general support, by changing and multiplying the style and name of his performances. But shall such things be transacted with impunity in a free country, and among an enlightened people? Let every honest man make this appeal to his heart and understanding, and the answer must be — no!

What then is the meaning of the Bill of rights, and the Constitution of Pennsylvania, when they declare, "That the freedom of the press shall not be restrained,"[*] and "that the printing presses shall be free to every person who undertakes to examine the proceedings of the legislature, or any part of the government?"[†] However ingenuity may torture the expressions, there can be little doubt of the just sense of these sections: they give to every citizen a right of investigating the conduct of those who are entrusted with the public business; and they effectually preclude any attempt to fetter the press by the institution of a licenser. The same principles were settled in England, so far back as the reign of William the Third, and since that time, we all know, there has been the freest animadversion upon the conduct of the ministers of that nation. But is there any thing in the language of the constitution (much less in its spirit and intention) which authorizes one man to impute crimes to another, for which the law has provided the mode of trial, and the degree of punishment? Can it be presumed that the slanderous words, which, when spoken to a few individuals, would expose the speaker to punishment, become sacred, by the authority of the constitution, when delivered to the public through the more permanent and diffusive medium of the press? Or, will it be said, that the constitutional right to examine the proceedings of government, extends to warrant an anticipation of the acts of the legislature, or the judgments of the court? and not only to authorize a candid commentary upon what has been done, but to permit every endeavour to biass [sic] and intimidate with respect to matters still in suspense? The futility of any attempt to establish a construction of this sort, must be obvious to every intelligent mind. The true liberty of the press is amply secured by permitting every man to publish his opinions; but it is due to the peace and dignity of society to enquire into the motives of such publications, and to distinguish between those which are meant for use and reformation, and with an eye solely to the public good, and those which are intended merely to delude and defame. To the latter description, it is impossible that any good government should afford protection and impunity.

If, then, the liberty of the press is regulated by any just principle, there can be little doubt, that he, who attempts to raise a prejudice against his antagonist, in the minds of those that must ultimately determine the dispute between them; who, for that purpose, represents himself as a persecuted man, and asserts that his judges are influenced by passion and prejudice, — wilfully seeks to corrupt the source, and to dishonor the administration of justice.

Such is evidently the object and tendency of Mr. Oswald's address to the public. Nor can that artifice prevail, which insinuates that the decision of this court will be the effect of personal resentment; for, if it could, every man might evade the punishment due to his offences, by first pouring a torrent of abuse upon his judges, and then asserting that they act from passion, because their treatment has been such as would naturally excite resentment in the human disposition. But it must be remembered, that judges discharge their functions under the solemn obligations of an oath: and, if their virtue entitles them to their station, they can neither be corrupted by favour to swerve from, nor influenced by fear to desert, their duty. That judge, indeed, who courts popularity by unworthy means, while he weakens his pretensions, diminishes, likewise, the chance of attaining his object; and he will eventually find that he has sacrificed the substantial blessing of a good conscience, in an idle and visionary pursuit.

Upon the whole, we consider the publication in question, as having the tendency which has been ascribed to it, that of prejudicing the public (a part of whom must hereafter be summoned as jurors) with respect to the merits of a cause depending in this court, and of corrupting the administration of justice: We are, therefore, unanimously of opinion, on the first point, that it amounts to a contempt.

It only remains then to consider, whether the offence is punishable in the way that the present motion has proposed.

It is certain that the proceeding by attachment is as old as the law itself, and no act of the legislature, or section of the constitution, has interposed to alter or suspend it. Besides the sections which have been already read from the constitution, there is another section which declares, that "trials by jury shall be as heretofore;" and surely it cannot be contended, that the offence, with which the defendant is now charged, was heretofore tried by that tribunal. If a man commits an outrage in the face of the court, what is there to be tried? — what further evidence can be necessary to convict him of the offence, than the actual view of the Judges? A man has been compelled to enter into security for his good behaviour, for giving the lie in the presence of the Judges in Westminster-Hall.

On the present occasion, is not the proof, from the inspection of the paper, as full and satisfactory as any that can be offered? And whether the publication amounts to a contempt, or not, is a point of law, which, after all, it is the province of the judges, and not of the jury, to determine. Being a contempt, if it is not punished immediately, how shall the mischief be corrected? Leave it to the customary forms of trial by jury, and the cause may be continued long in suspense, while the party perseveres in this misconduct. The injurious consequences might then be justly imputed to the court, for refusing to exercise their legal power in preventing them.

For these reasons we have no doubt of the competency of our gu- jurisdiction [sic]; and we think, that justice and propriety call upon us to proceed by attachment.

Bryan, Justice, observed, that he did not mean to give an opinion as to the mode of proceeding; but added, that he had always entertained a doubt with respect to the legality of the process by attachment, in such cases, under the constitution of Pennsylvania.

M'KEAN, C. J. Will the defendant enter into a recognizance to answer interrogatories, or will he answer gratis?

Oswald. I will not answer interrogatories. Let the attachment issue.

M'KEAN, C. J. His counsel had better advise him to consider of it.

Sergeant said that the defendant had not had time, even to peruse what had been sworn against him; for only Sunday had intervened since the obtaining the rule to shew cause, and that was an improper day for applying to the records of the court.

M'Kean, C. J. In criminal matters Sunday has always been deemed a legal day. There has been as ample time for consideration as could well be allowed; the term will end tomorrow. Will he answer, or not?

Sergeant prayed the court would grant 'till tomorrow morning to form a determination on the subject, and offered bail for the defendant's appearance at that time.

M'Kean, C. J. Be it so. Let the bail be taken, himself in £200 and one surety in the like sum, for his appearance tomorrow morning.

The Defendant appearing on the 15th of July, in discharge of his recognizance; the Chief Justice again asked, whether he would answer interrogatories or not?

Bankson, for the defendant, requested, that the interrogatories might be reduced to writing before he was called upon to determine.

M'Kean, C. J. Is that your advice to him? He must now say whether he will answer them or not; they will be filed according to the usage of the court, and all just exceptions to them will be allowed.

Bankson. He instructs me to declare that he will not answer interrogatories; and he then began to urge, that there was no contempt committed, but was told by the Chief Justice, that, as that point had been determined by an unanimous opinion of the four judges yesterday, it was not now open for argument.

Lewis said, that as a misrepresentation had been industriously spread abroad respecting the conduct of the court, he thought it proper, at this time, concisely to state the real nature of the present proceedings. It has been asserted that the court were about to compel Mr. Oswald to convict himself of the offence with which he is charged: but the fact is this, that it is incumbent upon the person who suggests the contempt to prove it by disinterested witnesses; and then, indeed, the defendant is allowed by his own oath to purge and acquit himself, in spite of all the testimony which can possibly be produced against him. It appears clearly, therefore, that Mr. Oswald's being called upon to answer interrogatories, is not meant to establish his guilt (for that has been already done) but to enable him to avoid the punishment which is the consequence of it. The court employ no compulsion in this respect. He may either answer, or not, as he pleases: if he does answer, his single oath, in his own favour, will countervail the oaths of a thousand witnesses; and if he does not answer, his silence corroborates the evidence which has been offered of the contempt, and the judgment of the court must necessarily follow.

M'Kean, C. J. Your statement is certainly right, and the misrepresentation, which is attempted, must either be the effect of wickedness, or ignorance.

Lewis now prayed, that the rule might be made absolute; but remarked, that, according to the authorities, the court might either do that; or, as the defendant was present, they might proceed at once to pass sentence upon him.

M'Kean, C. J. There can be no occasion, when the party is present, to make the rule for the attachment absolute: the court will proceed to give judgment.

Bryan, Justice. I was not here when the complaint was made to the court, when the evidence in support of the motion was produced, or the arguments against it were delivered: I consider myself therefore totally incapacitated for taking any part in this business.

Lewis. We can immediately furnish the court with the proofs.

Bryan, Justice. Can you furnish me, likewise, with Mr. Sergeant's arguments?

Lewis said, that he had not penetration enough to discover any argument in what had been said for the defendant; and having again read all the evidence which had been produced, he recapitulated what he had before said in support of the motion.

Page, the undersheriff, was then called upon to prove, that the writ in the action of Browne vs. Oswald had been in his possession, at least twelve days before it was served; and that the delay in sering [sic] it arose at first, from the defendant's being at Baltimore; and, afterwards, from his not being at home when the witness had repeatedly called upon him.

Bryan, Justice. I still say, that not having heard what has been offered in extenuation of the offence, I am incompetent to join in any opinion respecting the punishment. I cannot surely be suspected of partiality to libellers: I have had my share of their malevolence. But, it is true, I have not suffered much; for these trifles do not wrankle in my mind.

The Chief Justice pronounced the judgment of the court in the following words:

M'Kean, C. J. — Eleazer Oswald: Having yesterday considered the charge against you, we were unanimously of opinion, that it amounted to a contempt of the court. Some doubts were suggested, whether, even a contempt of the court, was punishable by attachment: but, not only my brethren and myself, but, likewise, all the judges of England, think, that without this power no court could possibly exist; — nay, that no contempt could, indeed, be committed against us, we should be so truly contemptible. The law upon the subject is of immemorial antiquity; and there is not any period when it can be said to have ceased, or discontinued. On this point, therefore, we entertain no doubt.

But some difficulty has arisen with respect to our sentence; for, on the one hand, we have been informed of your circumstances, and on the other, we have seen your conduct: your circumstances are small, but your offence is great and persisted in. Since, however, the question seems to resolve itself into this, whether you shall bend to the law, or the law shall bend to you, it is our duty to determine that the former shall be the case.

Upon the whole, therefore, the Court pronounce this sentence: — That you pay a fine of 10£. to the Commonwealth; that you be imprisoned for the space of one month, that is, from the 15th day of July to the 15th day of August next; and, afterwards, till the fine and costs are paid. — Sheriff he is in your custody.

But if it shall manifestly appear, that a Prosecution is intirely false, malicious and groundless, and commenced, not with a Design to go through with it, but only to expose the Defendant's Character, under the shew of a legal Proceeding, Serjeant Hawkins says, he cannot see any Reason why such a Mockery of Publick Justice should not rather aggravate the Offence, than make it cease to be one, and make such Scandal a good Ground of an Indictment at the Suit of the King, as it makes the Malice of their Proceeding a good Foundation of an Action on the Case at the Suit of the Party, whether the Conrt [sic] had a Jurisdiction of the Cause or not. Hawk. Pl. C. 194, 195. cap. 73. Dr. Drake, which was an Information for writing a Libel, setting forth, that it contained several scandalous Matters secundum Tenorem sequentem, and in reciting a Sentence of the Libel it was (nor) instead of (not). Upon Not Guilty pleaded, this appeared in Evidence, and a special Verdict was found. The Court held, that this was not a Tenor by Reason of the Variance of (Nor) for (Not) which are different both in Grammar and Sense. —— And there it was held by Holt Ch. J. That in pleading, there are 2 Ways of describing a Libel or other Writing, viz by the Words, or by the Sense. By the Words, as if you declare of a Libel Cujus Tenor sequitur &c. or Qui sequitur in his Anglicanis Verbis sequentibus, there you describe it by its particular Words, of which each is such a Mark, that if you vary, you fail in making good their Description. 2. You may describe it by its Sense and Meaning; thus it is a good Information to shew, That the Defendant made a Writing, and therein said so and so, translating it into Latin; in which Case exactness of Words is not so material; because it is described by the Sense and Substance of it. —— S. We have warned them from time to time of attempts by their legislature to extend an unwarrantable jurisdiction over us. We have reminded them of the circumstances of our emigration and settlement here. We have appealed to their native justice and magnanimity, and we have conjured them by the ties of our common kindred to disavow these usurpations, which, would inevitably interrupt our connections and correspondence. They too have

3.1.4.6Richard Henry Lee to Edmund Randolph, Proposed Amendments, October 16, 1787

… That the right of the people to assemble peaceably for the purpose of petitioning the legislature shall not be prevented… .

Virginia Gazette, December 22, 1787.

3.2DISCUSSION OF DRAFTS AND PROPOSALS

3.2.1THE FIRST CONGRESS

3.2.1.1June 8, 17892

3.2.1.2August 15, 1789

3.2.1.2.a The next clause of the 4th proposition was taken into consideration, and was as follows: “The freedom of speech and of the press, and the right of the people peaceably to assemble and consult for their common good, and to apply to the government for redress of grievances shall not be infringed.”

*Mr. S*EDGWICK

Submitted to those gentlemen who had contemplated the subject, what effect such an amendment as this would have; he feared it would tend to make them appear trifling in the eyes of their constituents; what, said he, shall we secure the freedom of speech, and think it necessary at the same time to allow the right of assembling? If people freely converse together, they must assemble for that purpose; it is a self-evident, unalienable right which the people possess; it is certainly a thing that never would be called in question; it is derogatory to the dignity of the House to descend to such minutiae—he therefore moved to strike out “assemble and.”

Mr. Benson.

The committee who framed this report, proceeded on the principle that these rights belonged to the people; they conceived them to be inherent, and all that they meant to provide against, was their being infringed by the government.

Mr. Sedgwick

Replied, that if the committee were governed by that general principle, they might have gone into a very lengthy enumeration of rights; they might have declared that a man should have a right to wear his hat if he pleased, that he might get up when he pleased, and go to bed when he thought proper; but he would ask the gentleman whether he thought it necessary to enter these trifles in a declaration of rights, under a government where none of them were intended to be infringed.

Mr. Tucker

Hoped the words would not be struck out, for he considered them of importance; beside, they were recommended by the states of Virginia and North-Carolina, though he noticed that the most material part proposed by those states was omitted, which was, a declaration that the people should have a right to instruct their representatives; he would move to have those words inserted as soon as the motion for striking out was decided.

Mr. Gerry

Was also against the words being struck out, because he conceived it to be an essential right; it was inserted in the constitutions of several states, and though it had been abused in the year 1786 in Massachusetts, yet that abuse ought not to operate as an argument against the use of it; the people ought to be secure in the peaceable enjoyment of this privilege, and that can only be done by making a declaration to that effect in the constitution.

Mr. Page.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, (mr. Sedgwick) who has made this motion, objects to the clause; because the right is of so trivial a nature; he supposes it no more essential than whether a man has a right to wear his hat or not, but let me observe to him that such rights have been opposed, and a man has been obliged to pull off his hat when he appeared before the face of authority; people have also been prevented from assembling together on their lawful occasions, therefore it is well to guard against such stretches of authority, by inserting the privilege in the declaration of rights; if the people could be deprived of the power of assembling under any pretext whatsoever, they might be deprived of every other privilege contained in the clause.

Mr. Vining

Said, if the thing was harmless, and it would tend to gratify the states that had proposed amendments, he should agree to it.

Mr. Hartley

Observed that it had been asserted in the convention of Pennsylvania, by the friends of the constitution, that all the rights and powers that were not given to the government, were retained by the states and the people thereof; this was also his own opinion, but as four or five states had required to be secured in those rights by an express declaration in the constitution, he was disposed to gratify them; he thought every thing that was not incompatible with the general good ought to be granted, if it would tend to obtain the confidence of the people in the government, and upon the whole, he thought these words were as necessary to be inserted in the declaration of rights as most in the clause.

Mr. Gerry

Said that his colleague contended for nothing, if he supposed that the people had a right to consult for the common good, because they could not consult unless they met for that purpose.

Mr. Sedgwick

Replied that if they were understood or implied in the word consult, they were utterly unnecessary, and upon that ground he moved to have them struck out.

The question was now put upon mr. Sedgwick’s motion, and lost by a considerable majority.

Mr. Tucker then moved to insert these words, “to instruct their representatives.”

Mr. Hartley

Wished the motion had not been made, for gentlemen acquainted with the circumstances of this country, and the history of the country from which we separated, differed exceedingly on this point; the members of the house of representatives, said he, are chosen for two years, the members of the senate for six.

According to the principles laid down in the constitution, it is presumable that the persons elected know the interests and the circumstances of their constituents, and being checked in their determinations by a division of the legislative power into two branches, there is little danger of error, at least it ought to be supposed that they have the confidence of the people during the period for which they are elected; and if, by misconduct, they forfeit it, their constituents have the power of leaving them out at the expiration of that time; thus they are answerable for the part they have taken in measures that may be contrary to the general wish.

Representation is the principle of our government; the people ought to have confidence in the honor and integrity of those they send forward to transact their business; their right to instruct them is a problematical subject. We have seen it attended with bad consequences, both in England and in America. When the passions of the people were excited, instructions have been resorted to and obtained, to answer party purposes; and although the public opinion is generally respectable, yet at such moments it has been known to be often wrong; and happy is that government composed of men of firmness and wisdom to discover and resist the popular error.

If, in a small community, where the interests, habits, and manners are neither so numerous or deversified [sic], instructions bind not:—What shall we say of instructions to this body; can it be supposed that the inhabitants of a single district in a state, are better informed with respect to the general interests of the union than a select body assembled from every part? Can it be supposed that a part will be more desirous of promoting the good of the whole than the whole will of the part? I apprehend, sir, that congress will be judges of proper measures, and that instructions will never be resorted to but for party purposes, when they will generally contain the prejudices and acrimony of the party rather than the dictates of honest reason and sound policy.

In England this question has been considerably agitated, the representatives of some towns in parliament, have acknowledged, and submitted to the binding force of instructions, while the majority have thrown off the shackles with disdain. I would not have this precedent influence our decision; but let the doctrine be tried upon its own merits, and stand or fall as it shall be found to deserve.

It appears to my mind, that the principle of representation is distinct from an agency, which may require written instructions. The great end of meeting is to consult for the common good; but can the common good be discerned without the object is reflected and shewn in every light. A local or partial view does not necessarily enable any man to comprehend it clearly; this can only result from an inspection into the aggregate. Instructions viewed in this light, will be found to embarrass the best and wisest men. And were all the members to take their seats in order to obey instructions, and those instructions were as various as it is probable they would be, what possibility would there exist of so many accommodating each to the other, as to produce any act whatever? Perhaps a majority of the whole might not be instructed to agree to any one point; and is it thus the people of the United States propose to form a more perfect union, provide for the common defence, and promote the general welfare?

Sir, I have known within my own time so many inconveniences and real evils arise from adopting the popular opinions on the moment, that although I respect them as much as any man, I hope this government will particularly guard against them, at least that they will not bind themselves by a constitutional act, and by oath to submit to their influence, if they do, the great object which this government has been established to attain, will inevitably elude our grasp on the uncertain and veering winds of popular commotion.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania tells you, that in England this principle is doubted; how far this is consonant with the nature of the government I will not pretend to say, but I am not astonished to find that the administrators of a monarchical government are unassailable by the weak voice of the people, but under a democracy whose great end is, to form a code of laws congenial with the public sentiment, the popular opinion ought to be collected and attended to. Our present object is, I presume, to secure to our constituents and to posterity these inestimable rights. Our government is derived from the people, of consequence the people have a right to consult for the common good; but to what end will this be done, if they have not the power of instructing their representatives? Instruction and representation in a republic, appear to me to be inseparably connected; but was I the subject of a monarch, I should doubt whether the public good did not depend more upon the prince's will than the will of the people. I should dread a popular assembly consulting for the public good, because under its influence, commotions and tumults might arise that would shake the foundation of the monarch's throne, and make the empire tremble in expectation. The people of England have submitted the crown to the Hanover family, and have rejected the Stuarts, if instructions upon such a revolution were considered as binding, it is difficult to know what would have been the effects, it might be well therefore to have the doctrine exploded from that kingdom; but it will not be advanced as a substantial reason in favor of our treading in the same steps.

The honorable gentleman has said, that when once the people have chosen a representative, they must rely on his integrity and judgment during the period for which he is elected. I think, sir, that to doubt the authority of the people to instruct their representatives, will give them just cause to be alarmed for their fate: I look upon it as a dangerous doctrine, subversive of the great end for which the United States have confederated. Every friend of mankind, every well-wisher of his country will be desirous of obtaining the sense of the people on every occasion of magnitude; but how can this be so well expressed as in instructions to their representatives; I hope, therefore, that gentlemen will not oppose the insertion of it in this part of the report.

Mr. Clymer.

I hope the amendment will not be adopted, but if our constituents chuse to instruct us, that they may be left at liberty to do so; do gentlemen foresee the extent of these words? If they have a constitutional right to instruct us, it infers that we are bound by those instructions, and as we ought not to decide constitutional questions by implication, I presume we shall be called upon to go further, and expressly declare the members of the legislature bound by the instruction of their constituents; this is a most dangerous principle, utterly destructive of all ideas of an independent and deliberative body, which are essential requisites in the legislatures of free governments, they prevent men of abilities and experience from rendering those services to the community that are in their power, destroying the object contemplated by establishing an efficient general government, and rendering congress a mere passive machine.

MR. SHERMAN.

It appears to me, that the words are calculated to mislead the people by conveying an idea, that they have a right to control the debates of the legislature; this cannot be admitted to be just, because it would destroy the object of their meeting. I think, when the people have chosen a representative, it is his duty to meet others from the different parts of the union, and consult, and agree with them to such acts as are for the general benefit of the whole community; if they were to be guided by instructions, there would be no use in deliberations, all that a man would have to do, would be to produce his instructions and lay them on the table, and let them speak for him, from hence I think it may be fairly inferred, that the right of the people to consult for their common good can go no further than to petition the legislature or apply for a redress of grievances. It is the duty of a good representative to enquire what measures are most likely to promote the general welfare, and after he has discovered them to give them his support; should his instructions therefore coincide with his ideas on any measure, they would be unnecessary; if they were contrary to the conviction of his own mind, he must be bound by every principle of justice to disregard them.

Mr. JACKSON

Was in favor of the right of the people, to assemble and consult for the common good, it had been used in this country as one of the best checks on the British legislature in their unjustifiable attempts to tax the colonies without their consent. America had no representatives in the British parliament, therefore they could instruct none, yet they exercised the power of consultation to a good effect. He begged gentlemen to consider the dangerous tendency of establishing such a doctrine, it would necessarily drive the house into a number of factions, there might be different instructions from every state, and the representation from each state would be a faction to support its own measures.

If we establish this as a right, we shall be bound by those instructions; now, I am willing to leave both the people and the representatives to their own discretion on this subject, let the people consult and give their opinion, let the representative judge of it, and if it is just, let him govern himself by it as a good member ought to do, but if it is otherwise, let him have it in his power to reject their advice.

What may be the consequence of binding a man to vote in all cases according to the will of others? He is to decide upon a constitutional point, and on this question his conscience is bound by the obligation of a solemn oath; you now involve him in a serious dilemma, if he votes according to his conscience, he decides against his instructions, but in deciding against his instructions he commits a breach of the constitution, by infringing the prerogative of the people, secured to them by this declaration. In short, it will give rise to such a variety of absurdities and inconsistencies as no prudent legislature would wish to involve themselves in.

By the checks provided in the constitution, we have good grounds to believe that the very framers of it conceived that the government would be liable to maladministration, and I presume that the gentlemen of this house do not mean to arrogate themselves more perfection than human nature has as yet been found to be capable of; if they do not, they will admit an additional check against abuses which this, like every other government, is subject to. Instructions from the people will furnish this in a considerable degree.

It has been said that the amendment proposed by the honorable gentleman from South-Carolina, (mr. Tucker) determines this point, “that the people can bind their representatives to follow their instructions;” I do not conceive that this necessarily follows: I think the representative, notwithstanding the insertion of these words, would be at liberty to act as he pleased; if he declined to pursue such measures as he was directed to attain, the people would have a right to refuse him their suffrages at a future election.

Now, though I do not believe the amendment would bind the representatives to obey the instructions, yet I think the people have a right both to instruct and bind them. Do gentlemen conceive that on any occasion instructions would be so general as to proceed from all our constituents? If they do it is the sovereign will, for gentlemen will not contend that the sovereign will, presides in the legislature; the friends and patrons of this constitution have always declared that the sovereignty resides in the people, and that they do not part with it on any occasion; to say the sovereignty vests in the people, and that they have not a right to instruct and control their representatives, is absurd to the last degree; they must either give up their principle, or grant that the people have a right to exercise their sovereignty to control the whole government, as well as this branch of it; but the amendment does not carry the principle to such an extent, it only declares the right of the people to send instructions; the representative will, if he thinks proper, communicate his instructions to the house, but how far they shall operate on his conduct, he will judge for himself.

The honorable gentleman from Georgia (mr. Jackson) supposes that instructions will tend to generate factions in this house, but he did not see how it could have that effect, any more than the freedom of debate had. If the representative entertains the same opinion with his constituents, he will decide with them in favor of the measure; if other gentlemen, who are not instructed on the point, are convinced by argument that the measure is proper, they will also vote with them, consequently the influence of debate and of instruction is the same.

The gentleman says further, that the people have the right of instructing their representatives; if so, why not declare it? Does he mean that it shall lay dormant and never be exercised? If so, it will be a right of no utility. But much good may result from a declaration in the constitution that they possess this privilege; the people will be encouraged to come forward with their instructions, which will form a fund of useful information for the legislature; we cannot, I apprehend, be too well informed of the true state, condition, and sentiment of our constituents, and perhaps this is the best mode in our power of obtaining information. I hope we shall never shut our ears against that information which is to be derived from the petitions and instructions of our constituents. I hope we shall never presume to think that all the wisdom of this country is concentred within the walls of this house. Men, unambitious of distinctions from their fellow citizens, remain within their own domestic walk, unheard of and unseen, possessing all the advantages resulting from a watchful observance of public men and public measures, whose voice, if we would descend to listen to it, would give us knowledge superior to what could be acquired amidst the cares and bustles of a public life; let us then adopt the amendment, and encourage the diffident to enrich our stock of knowledge with the treasure of their remarks and observations.

Mr. Madison.

I think the committee acted prudently in omitting to insert these words in the report they have brought forward; if unfortunately the attempt of proposing amendments should prove abortive, it will not arise from the want of a disposition in the friends of the constitution to do what is right with respect to securing the rights and privileges of the people of America; but from the difficulties arising from discussing and proposing abstract propositions, of which the judgment may not be convinced. I venture to say that if we confine ourselves to an enumeration of simple acknowledged principles, the ratification will meet with but little difficulty. Amendments of a doubtful nature will have a tendency to prejudice the whole system; the proposition now suggested, partakes highly of this nature; it is doubted by many gentlemen here; it has been objected to in intelligent publications throughout the union; it is doubted by many members of the state legislatures: In one sense this declaration is true, in many others it is certainly not true; in the sense in which it is true, we have asserted the right sufficiently in what we have done; if we mean nothing more than this, that the people have a right to express and communicate their sentiments and wishes, we have provided for it already. The right of freedom of speech is secured; the liberty of the press is expressly declared to be beyond the reach of this government; the people may therefore publicly address their representatives; may privately advise them, or declare their sentiments by petition to the whole body; in all these ways they may communicate their will. If gentlemen mean to go further, and to say that the people have a right to instruct their representatives in such a sense as that the delegates were obliged to conform to those instructions, the declaration is not true. Suppose they instruct a representative by his vote to violate the constitution, is he at liberty to obey such instructions? Suppose he is instructed to patronize certain measures, and from circumstances known to him, but not to his constituents, he is convinced that they will endanger the public good, is he obliged to sacrifice his own judgment to them? Is he absolutely bound to perform what he is instructed to do? Suppose he refuses, will his vote be the less valid, or the community be disengaged from that obedience which is due from the laws of the union? If his vote must inevitably have the same effect, what sort of a right is this in the constitution to instruct a representative who has a right to disregard the order, if he pleases? In this sense the right does not exist, in the other sense it does exist, and is provided largely for.

The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, asks if the sovereignty is not with the people at large; does he infer that the people can, in detached bodies, contravene an act established by the whole people? My idea of the sovereignty of the people is, that the people can change the constitution if they please, but while the constitution exists, they must conform themselves to its dictates: But I do not believe the inhabitants of any district can speak the voice of the people, so far from it, their ideas may contradict the sense of the whole people; hence the consequence that instructions are binding on the representative is of a doubtful, if not of a dangerous nature. I do not conceive, therefore, that it is necessary to agree to the proposition now made; so far as any real good is to arise from it, so far that real good is provided for; so far as it is of a doubtful nature, so far it obliges us to run the risk of losing the whole system.

Mr. Smith (of S.C.)

I am opposed to this motion, because I conceive it will operate as a partial inconvenience to the more distant states; if every member is to be bound by instructions how to vote, what are gentlemen from the extremeties of the continent to do?

Members from the neighbouring states can obtain their instructions earlier than those from the southern ones, and I presume that particular instructions will be necessary for particular measures, of consequence we vote perhaps against instructions on their way to us, or we must decline voting at all; but what is the necessity of having a numerous representation; one member from a state can receive the instructions, and by his vote answer all the purposes of many, provided his vote is allowed to count for the proportion the state ought to send; in this way the business might be done at a less expence than having one or two hundred members in the house, which had been strongly contended for yesterday.

Mr. Stone.

I think the clause would change the government entirely, instead of being a government founded upon representation, it would be a democracy of singular properties.

I differ from the gentleman from Virginia (mr. Madison) if he thinks this clause would not bind the representative; in my opinion it would bind him effectually, and I venture to assert, without diffidence, that any law passed by the legislature, would be of no force, if a majority of the members of this house were instructed to the contrary, provided the amendment become part of the constitution. What would follow from this? Instead of looking in the code of laws passed by congress, your judiciary would have to collect and examine the instructions from the various parts of the union. It follows very clearly from hence, that the government would be altered from a representative one to a democracy, wherein all laws are made immediately by the voice of the people.

This is a power not to be found in any part of the earth except among the Swiss Cantons; there the body of the people vote upon the laws, and give instructions to their delegates. But here we have a different form of government, the people at large are not authorised under it to vote upon the law, nor did I ever hear that any man required it. Why then are we called upon to propose amendments subversive of the principles of the constitution which were never desired.

Several members now called for the question, and the chairman being about to put the same.

Mr. Gerry.

Gentlemen seem in a great hurry to get this business through, I think, mr. chairman, it requires a further discussion; for my part I had rather do less business and do it well, than precipitate measures before they are fully understood.

The honorable gentleman from Virginia (mr. Madison) stated, that if the proposed amendments are defeated, it will be by the delay attending the discussion of doubtful propositions; and he declares this to partake of that quality. It is natural, sir, for us to be fond of our own work, we do not like to see it disfigured by other hands. That honorable gentleman brought forward a string of propositions; among them was the clause now proposed to be amended, he is no doubt ready for the question and determined not to admit what we think an improvement. The gentlemen who were on the committee, and brought in the report, have considered the subject, and are also ripe for a decision. But other gentlemen may crave a like indulgence, is not the report before us for deliberation and discussion and to obtain the sense of the house upon it, and will not gentlemen allow us a day or two for these purposes, after they have forced us to proceed upon them at this time? I appeal to their candor and good sense on the occasion, and am sure not to be refused; and I must inform them now, that they may not be surprized hereafter, that I wish all the amendments, proposed by the respective states to be considered. Gentlemen say it is necessary to finish the subject, in order to reconcile a number of our fellow citizens to the government. If this is their principle, they ought to consider the wishes and intentions which the conventions have expressed for them; if they do this, they will find that they expect and wish for the declaration proposed by the honorable gentleman over the way (mr. Tucker) and of consequence they ought to agree to it, and why it, with others recommended in the same way, were not reported, I cannot pretend to say; the committee know this best themselves.

The honorable gentleman near me (mr. Stone) says, that the laws passed contrary to instruction will be nugatory. And other gentlemen ask, if their constituents instruct them to violate the constitution, whether they must do it? Sir, does not the constitution declare that all laws passed by congress are paramount to the laws and constitutions of the several states; if our decrees are of such force as to set aside the state laws and constitutions, certainly they may be repugnant to any instructions whatever without being injured thereby. But can we conceive that our constituents would be so absurd to instruct us to violate our oath, and act directly contrary to the principles of a government ordained by themselves. We must look upon them to be absolutely abandoned and false to their own interests to suppose them capable of giving such instructions.

If this amendment is introduced into the constitution, I do not think we shall be much troubled with instructions; a knowledge of the right will operate to check a spirit that would render instruction necessary.

The honorable gentleman from Virginia asked, will not the affirmative of a member who votes repugnant to his instructions, bind the community as much as the votes of those who conform? There is no doubt, sir, but it will; but does this tend to shew that the constituent has no right to instruct? Surely not. I admit, sir, that instructions contrary to the constitution, ought not to bind, though the sovereignty resides in the people. The honorable gentleman acknowledges that the sovereignty vests there, if so, it may exercise its will in any case not inconsistent with a previous contract. The same honorable gentlemen asks if we are to give the power to the people in detached bodies to contravene the government while it exists? Certainly not, nor does the proposed proposition extend to that point, it is only intended to open for them a convenient mode in which they may convey their sense to their agents. The gentleman therefore takes for granted what is inadmissible, that congress will always be doing illegal things, and make it necessary for the sovereign to declare its pleasure.

He says the people have a right to alter the constitution, but they have no right to oppose the government. If, while the government exists, they have no right to control it, it appears they have divested themselves of the sovereignty over the constitution. Therefore, our language, with our principles, must change, and we ought to say that the sovereignty existed in the people previous to the establishment of this government. This will be ground for alarm indeed if it is true, but I trust, sir, too much to the good sense of my fellow citizens ever to believe, that the doctrine will generally obtain in this country of freedom.

Mr. Vining.

If, mr. chairman, there appears on one side too great an urgency to dispatch this business, there appears on the other an unnecessary delay and procrastination equally improper and unpardonable. I think this business has been already well considered by the house, and every gentleman in it; however, I am not for an unseemly expedition.

The gentleman last up, has insinuated a reflection upon the committee for not reporting all the amendments proposed by some of the state conventions. I can assign him a reason for this, the committee conceived some of them superfluous or dangerous, and found many of them so contradictory that it was impossible to make any thing of them, and this is a circumstance the gentleman cannot pretend ignorance of.

It is not inconsistent in that honorable member to complain of hurry, when he comes day after day reiterating the same train of arguments, and demanding the attention of this body by rising six or seven times on a question. I wish, sir, this subject discussed coolly and dispassionately, but I hope we shall have no more reiterations or tedious discussions; let gentlemen try to expedite public business, and their arguments will be conducted in a laconic and consistent manner. As to the business of instruction, I look upon it inconsistent with the general good. Suppose our constituents were to instruct us to make paper money, no gentleman pretends to say it would be unconstitutional, yet every honest mind must shudder at the thought. How can we then assert that instructions ought to bind us in all cases not contrary to the constitution?

Mr. Livermore

Was not very anxious whether the words were inserted or not, but he had a great deal of doubt about the meaning of this whole amendment, it provides that the people may meet and consult for the common good; does this mean a part of the people in a township or district, or does it mean the representatives in the state legislatures? If it means the latter, there is no occasion for a provision that the legislature may instruct the members of this body.

In some states the representatives were chosen by districts, in this case, perhaps, the instructions may be considered as coming from the districts, but in other states, each representative was chosen by the whole people; in New-Hampshire it was the case there, the instructions of any particular place would have but little weight, but a legislative instruction would have considerable influence upon each representative. If, therefore, the words mean that the legislature may instruct, he presumed it would have considerable effect, though he did not believe it binding. Indeed he was inclined to pay a deference to any information, he might receive from any number of gentlemen, even by a private letter, but as for full binding force, no instructions contained that quality. They could not, nor ought not to have it, because different parties pursue different measures, and it might be expedient, nay absolutely necessary, to sacrifice them in mutual concessions.

The doctrine of instructions would hold better in England than here, because the boroughs and corporations might have an interest to pursue, totally immaterial to the rest of the kingdom, in this case it would be prudent to instruct their members in parliament.

Mr. Gerry

Wished the constitution amended without his having any hand in it, but if he must interfere he would do his duty. The honorable gentleman from Delaware, had given him an example of moderation and laconic and consistent debate that he meant to follow, and would just observe to the worthy gentleman last up, that several states had proposed the amendment, and among the rest New-Hampshire.

There was one remark which escaped him, when he was up before, the gentleman from Maryland (mr. Stone) had said that the amendment would change the nature of the government and make it a democracy; now he had always heard that it was a democracy, but perhaps he was mislead, and the honorable gentleman was right in distinguishing it by some other appellation, perhaps an aristocracy was a term better adapted to it.

Mr. Sedgwick

Opposed the idea of the gentleman from New-Hampshire, that the state legislatures had the power of instructing the members of this house; he looked upon it as a subordination of the rights of the people to admit such an authority. We stand not here, said he, the representatives of the state legislatures as under the former congress, but as the representatives of the great body of the people. The sovereignty, the independence, and the rights of the states, are intended to be guarded by the senate; if we are to be viewed in any other light, the greatest security the people have for their rights and privileges is destroyed.

But with respect to instructions, it is well worthy of consideration how they are to be procured, it is not the opinion of an individual that is to control my conduct; I consider myself a representative of the whole union. An individual may give me information, but his sentiments may be in opposition to the sense of the majority of the people: If instructions are to be of any efficacy they must speak the sense of the majority of the people, at least of a state. In a state so large as Massachusetts it will behoove gentlemen to consider how the sense of the majority of the freemen is to be obtained and communicated. Let us take care to avoid the insertion of crude and undigested propositions, more likely to produce acrimony, than that spirit of harmony which we ought to cultivate.

Mr. Livermore

Said that he did not understand the honorable gentleman, or was not understood by him; he did not presume peremptorily to say what degree of influence the legislative instructions would have on a representative, he knew it was not the thing in contemplation here; and what he had said respected only the influence it would have on his private judgments.

Mr. Ames

Said there would be a very great inconvenience attending the establishment of the doctrine contended for by his colleague, those states who had selected their members by districts would have no right to give them instructions, consequently the members ought to withdraw, in which case the house might be reduced below a majority, and not be able, according to the constitution, to do any business at all.

According to the doctrine of the gentleman from New-Hampshire, one part of the government would be annihilated, for of what avail is it that the people have the appointment of a representative, if he is to pay obedience to the dictates of another body.

Several members now rose and called for the question.

Mr. Page

Was sorry to see gentlemen so impatient, the more so as he saw there was very little attention paid to any thing that was said, but he would express his sentiments if he was only heard by the chair;—he discovered clearly, notwithstanding what had been observed by the most ingenious supporters of the opposition, that there was an absolute necessity for adopting the amendment, it was strictly compatible with the spirit and the nature of the government, all power vests in the people of the United States, it is therefore a government of the people, a democracy; if it was consistent with the peace and tranquility of the inhabitants, every freeman would have a right to come and give his vote upon the law, but inasmuch as this cannot be done, by reason of the extent of territory, and some other causes, the people have agreed that their representatives shall exercise a part of their authority; to pretend to refuse them the power of instructing their agents, appears to me to deny them a right. One gentleman asks how the instructions are to be collected. many [sic] parts of this country have been in the practice of instructing their representatives; they found no difficulty in communicating their sense: Another gentleman asks if they were to instruct us to make paper money, what we would do? I would tell them, said he, it was unconstitutional, alter that, and we will consider on the point; unless laws are made satisfactory to the people, they will lose their support, they will be abused or done away; this tends to destroy the efficiency of the government.

It is the sense of several of the conventions that this amendment should take place; I think it my duty to support it, and fear it will spread an alarm among our constituents if we decline to do it.

Mr. Wadsworth.

Instructions have frequently been given to the representatives throughout the United States, but the people did not claim as a right that they should have any obligation upon the representative; it is not right that they should: In troublesome times designing men have drawn the people to instruct the representatives to their harm; the representatives have, on such occasions, refused to comply with their instructions. I have known, myself, that they have been disobeyed, and yet the representative was not brought to account for it, on the contrary, he was carressed and reelected, while those who have obeyed them, contrary to their private sentiments, have ever after been despised for it: Now, if the people considered it an inherent right in them to instruct their representatives, they would have undoubtedly punished the violation of them. I have no idea of instructions, unless they are obeyed; a discretionary power is incompatible with them.

The honorable gentleman who was up last says, if he was instructed to make paper money, he would tell his constituents it was unconstitutional; I believe that is not the case, for this body would have a right to make paper money, but if my constituents were to instruct me to vote for such a measure, I would disobey them let the consequence be what it would.

Mr. Sumter.

The honorable gentlemen who are opposed to the motion of my colleague, do not treat it fairly; they suppose that it is meant to bind the representative to conform to his instructions, the mover of this question, I presume to say, has no such thing in idea; that they shall notice them and obey them as far as is consistent and proper, may be very just; perhaps they ought to produce them to the house, and let them have as much influence as they deserve; but nothing further, I believe, is contended for.

I rose on this occasion, not so much to make any observations upon the point immediately under consideration, as to beg the committee to consider the consequences that may result from an undue precipitancy and hurry; nothing can distress me more than to be obliged to notice what I conceive to be somewhat improper in the conduct of so respectable a body. Gentlemen will reflect how difficult it is to remove error when once the passions are engaged in the discussion, temper and coolness are necessary to complete what must be the work of time; it cannot be denied but what the present constitution is imperfect, we must therefore take time to improve it. If gentlemen are pressed for want of time, and are disposed to adjourn the sessions of congress at a very early period, we had better drop the subject of amendments, and leave it until we have more leisure to consider and do the business effectually; for my part I would rather sit till this day twelve month, than have this all-important subject inconsiderately passed over; the people have already complained that the adoption of the constitution was done in too hasty a manner, what will they say of us if we press the amendments with so much haste.

Mr. Burke.

It has been asserted, mr. chairman, that the people of America do not require this right; I beg leave to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, whether the constitution of that state does not recognize that right, and the gentlemen from Maryland, whether their declaration of rights does not expressly secure it to the inhabitants of that state? These circumstances, added to what has been proposed by the state conventions as amendments to this constitution, pretty plainly declares the sense of the people to be in favor of securing to themselves and their posterity, a right of this nature.

Mr. Seney

Said that the declaration of rights prefixed to the constitution of Maryland, secured to every man a right of petitioning the legislature for a redress of grievances, in a peaceable and orderly manner.

Mr. Burke.

I am not positive with respect to the particular expression in the declaration of the rights of the people of Maryland, but the constitutions of Massachusetts, Pennsylvania and North-Carolina, all of them recognize, in express terms, the right of the people to give instruction to their representatives.—I do not mean to insist particularly upon this amendment, but I am very well satisfied that those that are reported and likely to be adopted by this house, are very far from giving satisfaction to our constituents; they are not those solid and substantial amendments which the people expect; they are little better than whip-syllabub, frothy and full of wind, formed only to please the palate, or they are like a tub thrown out to a whale, to secure the freight of the ship and its peaceable voyage; in my judgment they will not be gratified by the mode we have pursued in bringing them forward; there was a committee of eleven appointed, and out of them I think there were five who were members of the convention that formed the constitution, such gentlemen having already given their opinion with respect to the perfection of the work, may be thought improper agents to bring forward amendments; upon the whole, I think it will be found that we have done nothing but lose our time, and that it will be better to drop the subject now, and to proceed to the organization of the government.

Mr. Sinnickson

Enquired of mr. chairman, what was the question before the committee, for really debate had become so desultory, as to induce him to think it was lost sight of altogether.

Mr. Lawrance

Was averse to entering on the business at first, but since they had proceeded so far, he hoped they would finish it; he said, if gentlemen would confine themselves to the question, when they were speaking, that the business might be done in a more agreeable manner; he said he was against the amendmentproposed bythegentleman [sic] from S. Carolina (mr. Tucker,) because every member on this floor ought to consider himself the representative of the whole union, and not of the particular district which had chosen him, as their decisions were to bind every individual of the confederated states, it was wrong to be guided by the voice of a single district, whose interests might happen to clash with that of the general good, and unless instructions were to be considered as binding, they were altogether superfluous.

Was unwilling to take up any more of the time of the committee, but on the other hand, he was not willing to be silent after the charges that had been brought against the committee, and the gentleman who introduced the amendments, by the honorable members on each side of him, (mr. Sumter and mr. Burke.) Those gentlemen say we are precipitating the business, and insinuate that we are not acting with candor; I appeal to the gentlemen who have heard the voice of their country, to those who have attended the debates of the state conventions, whether the amendments now proposed are not those most strenuously required by the opponents to the constitution? It was wished that some security should be given for those great and essential rights which they had been taught to believe were in danger. I concurred, in the convention of Virginia, with those gentlemen, so far as to agree to a declaration of those rights which corresponded with my own judgment, and the other alterations which I had the honor to bring forward before the present congress. I appeal to the gentlemen on this floor who are desirous of amending the constitution, whether these proposed are not compatible with what are required by our constituents; have not the people been told that the rights of conscience, the freedom of speech, the liberty of the press, and trial by jury, were in jeopardy; that they ought not to adopt the constitution until those important rights were secured to them.

But while I approve of these amendments, I should oppose the consideration at this time, of such as are likely to change the principles of the government, or that are of a doubtful nature; because I apprehend there is little prospect of obtaining the consent of two-thirds of both houses of congress, and threefourths of the state legislatures, to ratify propositions of this kind; therefore, as a friend to what is attainable, I would limit it to the plain, simple, and important security that has been required. If I was inclined to make no alteration in the constitution I would bring forward such amendments as were of a dubious cast, in order to have the whole rejected.

Mr. Burke

Never entertained an idea of charging gentlemen with the want of candor; but he would appeal to any man of sense and candor, whether the amendments contained in the report were any thing like the amendments required by the states of New-York, Virginia, New-Hampshire and Carolina, and having these amendments in his hand, he turned to them to shew the difference, concluding that all the important amendments were omitted in the report.

Mr. Smith (of S.C.)

Understood his colleague, who has just sat down, to have asserted that the amendment under consideration was contained in the constitution of the state of South-Carolina, this was not the fact.

Mr. Burke

Said he mentioned the state of North-Carolina, and there it was inserted in express terms.

The question was now called for from several parts of the house, but a desultory conversation took place before the conversation was put; at length the call becoming very general, it was stated from the chair, and determined in the negative, 10 rising in favor of it, and 41 against it.

Congressional Register, August 15, 1789, vol. 2, pp. 197–217.

3.2.1.2.b Fifth amendment—“The freedom of speech, and of the press, and of the right of the people peaceably to assemble and consult for their common good, and to apply to the government for redress of grievances, shall not be infringed.”

Mr. Tucker moved to insert between the words “common good,” “and to” in this paragraph, these words “to instruct their representatives.”

On this motion a long debate ensued.—

Mr. Hartley said it was a problematical subject—The practice on this principle might be attended with danger. There were periods when from various causes the popular mind was in a state of fermentation and incapable of acting wisely—This had frequently been experienced in the mother country, and once in a sister State.—In such cases it was a happiness to obtain representatives who might be free to exert their abilities against the popular errors and passions. The power of instructing might be liable to great abuses; it would generally be exercised in times of public disturbance, and would express rather the prejudices of faction, than the voice of policy; thus it would convey improper influences into the government.—He said he had seen so many unhappy examples of the influence of the popular humours in public bodies, that he hoped they would be provided against in this government.

Mr. Page was in favor of the motion.

Mr. Clymer remarked that the principle of the motion was a dangerous one. It would take away all the freedom and independence of the representatives, it would destroy the very spirit of representation itself, by rendering Congress a passive machine instead of a deliberative body.

Mr. Sherman insisted that instructions were not a proper rule for the representative, since they were not adequate to the purposes for which he was delegated. He was to consult the common good of the whole, and was the servant of the people at large. If they should coincide with his ideas of the common good, they would be unnecessary; if they contradicted them, he would be bound by every principle of justice to disregard them.

Mr. Jackson also opposed the motion.

Mr. Gerry advocated the proposition—he said the power of instructing was essential in order to check an administration which should be guilty of abuses. Such things would probably happen. He hoped gentlemen would not arrogate to themselves more perfection, than any other government had been found to possess, or more at all times than the body of the people.—It had he said been always contended by the friends of this government that the sovereignty resided in the people. That principle seemed inconsistent with what gentlemen now asserted; if the people were the sovereign, he could not conceive why they had not the right to instruct and direct their agents at their pleasure.

Mr. Madison observed that the existence of this right of instructing was at least a doubtful right. He wished that the amendments which were to go to the people should consist of an enumeration of simple and acknowledged principles. Such rights only ought to be expressly secured as were certain and fixed. The insertion of propositions that were of a doubtful nature, would have a tendency to prejudice the whole system of amendments, and render their adoption difficult. The right suggested was doubtful, and would be so considered by many of the states. In some degree the declaration of this right might be true; in other respects false. If by instructions were meant a given advice, or expressing the wishes of the people, the proposition was true; but still was unnecessary, since that right was provided for already. The amendments already passed had declared that the press should be free, and that the people should have the freedom of speech and petitioning: therefore the people might speak to their representatives, might address them through the medium of the press, or by petition to the whole body. They might freely express their wills by these several modes. But if it was meant that they had any obligatory force, the principle was certainly false. Suppose the representatives were instructed to do any act incompatible with the constitution, would he be bound to obey those instructions? Suppose he was directed to do what he knew was contrary to the public good, would be bound [sic] to sacrifice his own opinion? Would not the vote of a representative contrary to his instructions be as binding on the people as a different one? If these things then be true, where is the right of the constituent? or where is the advantage to result from. It must either supercede all the other obligations, the most sacred, or it could be of no benefit to the people. The gentleman says, the people are the sovereign—True. But who are the people? Is every small district, the people? and do the inhabitants of this district express the voice of the people, when they may not be a thousandth part, and although their instructions may contradict the sense of the whole people besides? Have the people in detached assemblies a right to violate the constitution or controul the actions of the whole sovereign power? This would be setting up a hundred sovereignties in the place of one.

Mr. Smith (S.C.) was opposed to the motion—He said the doctrine of Instructions in practice would operate partially. The States who were near the seat of government would have an advantage over those more distant.—Particular instructions might be necessary for a particular measure; such could not be obtained by the members of the distant states. He said there was no need of a large representation, if in all important matters they were to be guided by express instructions—One member from each state would serve every purpose. It was inconsistent with the principle of the amendment which had been adopted the preceding day.

Mr. Stone differed with Mr. Madison, that the members would not be bound by instructions—He said when this principle was inserted in the constitution, it would render instructions sacred and obligatory in all cases; but he looked on this as one of the greatest of evils. He believed this would change the nature of the constitution—Instead of being a representative government, it would be a singular kind of democracy, and whenever a question arose what was the law, it would not properly be decided by recurring to the codes and institutions of Congress, but by collecting and examining the various instructions of different parts of the Union.

Several of the members spoke, and the debate was continued in a desultory manner—and at last the motion was negatived by a great majority —The question on the amendment was then put, and carried in the affirmative.

Committee rose.—

Mr. Ames moved that all questions on the subject of the amendments, should be decided in committee by two thirds of the members. This was laid on the table.

The house was then adjourned.

New-York Daily Gazette, August 18, 1789, p. 798, col. 3, and p. 799, col. 1.

3.2.1.2.d In committee of the whole, on amendments to the constitution— … .

… Fifth amendment. The freedom of speech, and of the press, and of the rights of the people peaceably to assemble and consult for their common good, and to apply to government for the redress of grievances shall not be infringed.

Mr. SEDGWICK moved to strike out the words "assemble and." This is a self evident unalienable right of the people, said he, and it does appear to me below the dignity of this house, to insert such things in the constitution. The right will be as fully recognized if the words are struck out, as if they were retained: For if the people may converse, they must meet for the purpose.

This motion was opposed by Mr. Gerry, Mr. Page, Mr. Vining and Mr. Hartly; [sic] and the question being taken it was negatived.

Mr. TUCKER moved to insert these words, to instruct their representatives. This produced a long debate.

Mr. Hartley. I could wish, Mr. chairman, that these words had not been proposed. Representatives ought to possess the confidence of their constituents; they ought to rely on their honour and integrity. The practice of instructing representatives may be attended with danger; we have seen it attended with bad consequences; it is commonly resorted to for party purposes, and when the passions are up. It is a right, which even in England is considered a problematical [sic]. The right of instructing is liable to great abuses; it will generally be exercised in times of popular commotion; and these instructions will rather express the prejudices of party, than the dictates of reason and policy. I have known, Sir, so many evils arise from adopting the popular opinion of the moment, that I hope this government will be guarded against such an influence; and wish the words may not be inserted.

Mr. PAGE was in favour of the motion—He said, that the right may well be doubted in a monarchy; but in a government instituted for the sole purpose of guarding the rights of the people, it appears to me to be proper.

Mr. Clymer: I hope, Sir, the clause will not be adopted, for if it is, we must go further, and say, that the representatives are bound by the instructions, which is a most dangerous principle, and is destructive of all ideas of an independent and deliberative body.

Mr. Sherman said, these words had a tendency to mislead the people, by conveying an idea that they had a right to controul the debates of the federal legislature. Instructions cannot be considered as a proper rule for a representative to form his conduct by; they cannot be adequate to the purpose for which he is delegated. He is to consult the good of the whole: Should instructions therefore coincide with his ideas of the common good, they would be unnecessary: If they were contrary, he would be bound by every principle of justice to disregard them.

Mr. Jackson opposed the motion: He said this was a dangerous article, as its natural tendency is to divide the house into factions: He then adverted to the absurdities and inconsistencies which would be involved in adopting the measure.

Mr. Gerry supported the motion: He observed, that to suppose we cannot be instructed, is to suppose that we are perfect: The power of instruction is in my opinion essential to check an administration which should be guilty of abuses: No one will deny that these may not happen: To deny the people this right is to arrogate to ourselves more wisdom than the whole body of the people possess.—I contend, Sir, that our constituents have not only a right to instruct, but to bind this legislature—It has been contended by the friends to the constitution, that the people are sovereign: if so it involves an absurdity to suppose that they cannot, not only instruct, but controul the house: Debates may create factions, as well as instructions: We cannot be too well informed; this is the best method of obtaining information, and I hope we shall never shut our ears against that information which is to be derived from the voice of the people.

Mr. Madison observed, that the existence of this right is at least doubtful.—I wish that the amendments may consist of an enumeration of simple and acknowledged principles: The insertion of propositions that are of a doubtful nature, will have a tendency to prejudice the whole system of amendments: The right now suggested is doubtful, and will be so considered by many of the States: In some respects the declaration of this right may be true, in others it is false: If we mean nothing more by it than this, that the people have a right to give advice or express their sentiments and wishes it is true; but still unnecessary, as such a right is already recognized: The press shall be free, and the people shall have the same freedom of speech and petitioning: but if it is meant that the representatives are to be bound by these instructions, the principle is false: Suppose a representative is instructed to do what is contrary to the public good? Would he be bound to sacrifice his own opinion? Or will not the vote of a representative contrary to his instruction be as binding on the people as a different one? If these things are true, where is the right of the constituent to instruct? or where is the advantage to result from it? It must either supercede all other obligations, the most sacred; or it can be of no benefit to the people. The gentleman says, the people are the sovereign; but who are the people? Is every small district the people? And can the inhabitants of this district express the voice of the people, when they may not be a thousandth part, and all their instructions may contradict the sense of the whole people besides? Have the people in detached assemblies a right to violate the constitution or controul the whole sovereign power? This would be setting up an hundred sovereignties in the place of one.

Mr. Smith (S.C.) was opposed to the motion: The doctrine of instructions would, in practice, operate partially: The States near the seat of government will have an obvious advantage over those remote from it: There is no necessity for so large a representation as had been determined on, if the members are to be guided in all their deliberations by positive instructions; one member from a State will serve every purpose; but then the nature of the assembly will be changed from a legislative to a diplomatic body: It would in fact be turning all our representatives into ambassadors.

Mr. Stone observed that to adopt this motion would change the nature of the constitution; instead of being a representative government, it would be a singular kind of democracy; in which, whenever a question arises, what is the law? It will not be determined by recurring to the codes and institutions of Congress, but by collecting the various instructions from different parts of the Union.

Mr. Gerry observed that several of the States had proposed this amendment, which rendered it proper to be attended to: In answer to Mr. Madison’s query he said, he meant that instructions should be consistent with the laws and the constitution.

Mr. Livermore said that though no particular districts could instruct, yet the Legislatures of the States most undoubtedly possessed this right.

This assertion of Mr. Livermore was controverted by several gentlemen—by Mr. Sedgwick, Mr. Smith, Mr. Ames, and Mr. Wadsworth: The last, speaking on the subject of instructions in general, said, I never knew merely political instructions to be observed; and I never knew a representative brought to an account for it: But I have known representatives follow instructions, contrary to their private sentiments, and they have even been despised for it. Others have disregarded their instructions, and have been reelected, and caressed. Now if the people consider it as an inherent right in them to instruct their representatives, they would undoubtedly have punished the violation of such instructions; but this I believe has never been the case. I consider the measure as having a mischievous tendency.

The debate was continued much longer, but in a desultory way, as the speakers appeared to take it for granted, that they might touch upon collateral circumstances. The question on the motion being at length taken, it was negatived by a large majority; and then the committee agreed to the amendment in its original form.

… The new plan, it is true, does propose to secure the people of the benefit of personal liberty by the habeas corpus; and trial by jury for all crimes, except in case of impeachment: but there is no declaration, … that the right

The following, I think, will be allowed to be unalienable or fundamental rights in the United States:—

No man demeaning himself peaceably, shall be molested on account of his religion or mode of worship—The people have a right to hold and enjoy their property according to known standing laws, and which cannot be taken from them without their consent, or the consent of their representatives; and whenever taken in the pressing urgencies of government, they are to receive a reasonable compensation for it—Individual security consists in having free recourse to the laws—The people are subject to no laws or taxes not assented to by their representatives constitutionally assembled—They are at all times intitled to the benefits of the writ of habeas corpus, the trial by jury in criminal and civil causes—They have the right, when charged, to a speedy trial in the vicinage; to be heard by themselves or counsel, not to be compelled to furnish evidence against themselves, to have witnesses face to face, and to confront their adversaries before the judge—No man is held to answer a crime charged upon him till it be substantially described to him; and he is subject to no unreasonable searches or seizures of his person, papers or effects—The people have a right to assemble in an orderly manner, and petition the government for a redress of wrongs—The freedom of the press ought not to be restrained—No emoluments, except for actual service—No hereditary honors, or orders of nobility, ought to be allowed—The military ought to be subordinate to the civil authority, and no soldier be quartered on the citizens without their consent—The militia ought always to be armed and disciplined, and the usual defence of the country—The supreme power is in the people, and power delegated ought to return to them at stated periods, and frequently—The legislative, executive, and judicial powers, ought always to be kept distinct—others perhaps might be added.

And the whole of the purse, and of the sword, is put into the hands of the President, and a Congress so unequal, and which also may consist, of men of no principle or property. For no religion or property is required, as any qualification, to fill any and every seat in the Legislative, Judicial and Executive departments, in the whole nation. That a Pagan, a Mahometan, a Bankrupt, may fill the highest seat, and any and every seat; nothing but age and residence, are required, as qualifications, for the most important trusts. And there is nothing to hinder their keeping a standing army, at all times, peace or war. Nor is there any provision made for the people or States, to petition or remonstrate, let their grievances be what they will… .

3.3.1.1William Blackstone, 1765

4. If there should happen any uncommon injury, or infringement of the rights beforementioned, which the ordinary course of law is too defective to reach, there still remains a fourth subordinate right appertaining to every individual, namely, the right of petitioning the king, or either house of parliament, for the redress of grievances. In Russia we are told that the czar Peter established a law, that no subject might petition the throne, till he had first petitioned two different ministers of state. In case he obtained justice from neither, he might then present a third petition to the prince; but upon pain of death, if found to be in the wrong. The consequence of which was, that no one dared to offer such third petition; and grievances seldom falling under the notice of the sovereign, he had little opportunity to redress them. The restrictions, for some there are, which are laid upon petitioning in England, are of a nature extremely different; and while they promote the spirit of peace, they are no check upon that of liberty. Care only must be taken, lest, under the pretence of petitioning, the subject be guilty of any riot or tumult; as happened in the opening of the memorable parliament in 1640: and, to prevent this, it is provided by the statute 13 Car. II. st. 1. c. 5. that no petition to the king, or either house of parliament, for any alterations in church or state, shall be signed by above twenty persons, unless the matter thereof be approved by three justices of the peace or the major part of the grand jury, in the country; and in London by the lord mayor, aldermen, and common council; nor shall any petition be presented by more than two persons at a time. But under these regulations, it is declared by the statute 1 W. & M. st. 2 c. 2. that the subject hath a right to petition; and that all committments and prosecutions for such petitioning are illegal.

6. Riots, routs, and unlawful assemblies must have three persons at least to constitute them. An unlawful assembly is when three, or more, do assemble themselves together to do an unlawful act, as to pull down inclosures, to destroy a warren or the game therein; and part without doing it, or making any motion towards it.[f] A rout is where three or more meet to do an unlawful act upon a common quarrel, as forcibly breaking down fences upon a right claimed of common, or of way; and make some advances towards it.[g] A riot is where three or more actually do an unlawful act of violence, either with or without a common cause or quarrel[h]: as if they beat a man; or hunt and kill game in another's park, chase, warren, or liberty; or do any other unlawful act with force and violence; or even do a lawful act, as removing a nusance, in a violent and tumultuous manner. The punishment of unlawful assemblies, if to the number of twelve, we have just now seen may be capital, according to the circumstances that attend it; but, from the number of three to eleven, is by fine and imprisonment only. The same is the case in riots and routs by the common law; to which the pillory in very enormous cases has been sometimes superadded[i]. And by the statute 13 Hen. IV. c. 7. any two justices, together with the sheriff or undersheriff of the county, may come with the posse comitatus, if need be, and suppress any such riot, assembly, or rout, arrest the rioters, and record upon the spot the nature and circumstances of the whole transaction; which record alone shall be sufficient conviction of the offenders. In the interpretation of which statute it hath been holden, that all persons, noblemen and others, except women, clergymen, persons decrepit, and infants under fifteen, are bound to attend the justices in suppressing a riot, upon pain of fine and imprisonment; and that any battery, wounding, or killing the rioters, that may happen in suppressing the riot, is justifiable[j]. So that our ancient law, previous to the modern riot act, seems pretty well to have guarded against any breach of the public peace; especially as any riotous assembly on a public or general account, as to redress grievances or pull down all inclosures, and also resisting the king's forces if sent to keep the peace, may amount to overt acts of high treason, by levying war against the king.

7. Nearly related to this head of riots is the offence of tumultuous petitioning; which was carried on to an enormous height in the times preceding the grand rebellion. Wherefore by statute 13 Car. II. st. 1. c. 5. it is enacted, that not more than twenty names shall be signed to any petition to the king or either house of parliament, for any alteration of matters established by law in church or state; unless the contents thereof be previously approved, in the country, by three justices, or the majority of the grand jury at the assises or quarter sessions; and, in London, by the lord mayor, aldermen, and common council[k]: and that no petition shall be delivered by a company of more than ten persons: on pain in either case of incurring a penalty not exceeding 100 l, and three months imprisonment.

Riot, rout, and unlawful assembly.

I. What is a riot, rout, or unlawful assembly.
II. How the same may be restrained by a private person.
III. How by a constable, or other peace officer.
IV. How by one justice.
V. How by two justices.
VI. How by process out of chancery.

1. What is a riot, rout, or unlawful assembly.

WHEN three persons or more shall assemble themselves together, with an intent mutually to assist one another, against any who shall oppose them, in the execution of some enterprize of a private nature, with force or violence, against the peace, or to the manifest terror of the people, whether the act intended were of itself lawful or unlawful; If they only meet to such a purpose or intent, although they shall after depart of their own accord, without doing any thing, this is an unlawful assembly.

If after their first meeting they shall move forward towards the execution of any such act, whether they put their intended purpose in execution or not; this, according to the general opinion, is a rout:

And if they execute such a thing in deed, then it is a riot. (A) 1 Haw. 155. Dalt. c. 136.

Three persons or more] And therefore if the jury do acquit all but two, and find them guilty, the verdict is void, unless they be indicted together with other rioters unknown, because it finds them guilty of an offence, whereof it is impossible that they should be guilty; for there can be no riot, where there are not more persons than two. 2 Haw. 441.

And infants under the age of discretion are not persons within this description, punishable as rioters. 1 Haw. 159.

Note; In 1 Haw. 156, 157, 158, the words more than three persons are three times over inserted instead of three persons or more; which is only remarked as an instance, that in a variety of matter, it is impossible for the mind of man to be always equally attentive.

Assemble themselves together] It seems agreed, that if a number of persons being met together at a fair, or market, or church ale, or on any other lawful and innocent occasion, happen on a sudden quarrel to fall together by the ears, they are not guilty of a riot, but of a sudden affray only, of which none are guilty but those who actually engage in it; because the design of their meeting was innocent and lawful, and the subsequent breach of the peace happened unexpectedly, without any previous intention concerning it: Yet it is said, that if persons innocently assembled together, do afterward upon a dispute happening to arise among them, form themselves into parties, with promise of mutual assistance, and then make an affray, they are guilty of a riot; because upon their confederating together with an intention to break the peace, they may as properly be said to be assembled together for that purpose from the time of such confederacy, as if their first coming together had been on such a design. 1 Haw. 156.

In the execution of some enterprize if a private nature] It seems agreed, that the injury or grievance complained of, and intended to be revenged or remedied by such an assembly, must relate to some private quarrel only; as the inclosing of lands, in which the inhabitants of a town claim a right of common, or gaining the possession of tenements the title whereof is in dispute, or such like matters relating to the interest or disputes of particular persons, and no way concerning the publick; for wherever the intention of such an assembly is to redress publick grievances, as to pull down all inclosures in general, or reform religion, and the like, it is high treason. 1 Haw. 157.

Against the peace, or to the terror of the people] It seems to be clearly agreed, that in every riot there must be some such circumstances, either of actual force or violence, or at, least of an apparent tendency thereto, as are naturally apt to strike a terror into the people; as the shew of armour, threatening speeches, or turbulent gestures; for every such offence must be laid to be done to the terror of the people: And from hence it clearly follows, that assemblies at wakes, or other festival times, or meeting for exercise of common sports of diversions, as bull baiting, wresting, and such like, are not riotous. 1 Haw. 157.

And from the same ground also it seems to follow, that it is possible for three persons or more to assemble together with an intention to execute a wrongful act, and also actually to perform their intended enterprize, without being rioters; as if a man assemble a meet company, to carry away a piece of timber of other thing, whereto he pretends a right, that cannot be carried without a great number, if the number be not more than are needful for such purpose, although another man hath better right to the thing so carried away, and that this act be wrong and unlawful; yet it is of itself no riot, except there be withal threatening words used, or other disturbance of the peace. Dalt. c. 137. 1 Haw. 157.

Much more may any person, in a peaceable manner, assemble a meet company to do any lawful thing, or to remove or cast down any common nusance: Thus every private man, to whose house or land any nusance shall be erected, made, or done, may in peaceable manner assemble a meet company, with necessary tools, and may remove, pull, or cast down such nusance, and that, before any prejudice received thereby; and for that purpose, if need be, may also enter into the other man’s ground. Thus a man erected a wear cross a common river, where people have a common passage with their boats, and divers did assemble, with spades, crows of iron, and other things necessary to remove the said wear, and make a trench in his land, that did erect the wear, to turn the water, so as they might the better take up the said wear, and they did remove the same nusance; this was holden neither any forcible entry, nor yet any riot Dalt. c. 137.

But in the cases aforesaid, if in removing any such nusance, the persons so assembled shall use any threatning words (as to say, they will do it though they die for it, or such like words) or shall use any other behaviour, in apparent disturbance of the peace, then it seemeth to be a riot; and therefore where there is cause to remove any such nusance, or to do any like act, it is safest not to assemble any multitude of people, but only to send one or two persons, or if a greater number, yet no more than are needful, and only with meet tools, to remove, pull, or cast down the same, and that such persons tend their business only, without disturbance of the peace, or threatening speeches. Dalt. c. 137.

Whether the act intended were of itself lawful or unlawful] It hath been generally holden, that it is no way material, whether the act intended to be done by such an assembly, be of itself lawful or unlawful; from whence it follows, that if three or more persons assist a man to make a forcible entry into lands, to which one of them has a good right of entry, or if the like number in a violent and tumultuous manner join together in removing a nusance, or other thing which may lawfully be done in a peaceful manner, they are as properly rioters, as if the act intended to be done by them were never so unlawful. 1 H. 158.

II. How the same may be restrained by a private person.

By the common law, any private person may lawfully endeavour to suppress a riot, by flaying those whom he shall see engaged therein, from executing their purpose, and also by stopping others whom he shall see coming to join them. 1 Haw. 159.

III. How by a constable or other peace officer.

By the common law, the sheriff, constable, and other peace officers, may and ought to do all that in them lies, towards the suppressing of a riot, and may command all other persons to assist therein. 1 Haw. 159.

IV. How by one justice.

By the 34 Ed. 3. c. 1. The justices of the peace shall have power to restrain rioters, and to arrest and chastise them according to their offence; and cause them to be imprisoned and duly punished, according to the law and custom of the realm, and according to that which to them shall seem best to do, by their discretions and good advisement.

And this statute hath been liberally construed for the advancement of justice; for it hath been resolved, that if a justice find persons riotously assembled, he alone, without staying for his companions, hath not only power to arrest the offenders, and bind them to their good behaviour, or imprison them if they do not offer bail; but that he may also authorize others to arrest them, by a bare verbal command, without other warrant; and that by force thereof, the persons so commanded may pursue and arrest the offenders in his absence, as well as presence. Also it is said, that after a riot is over, any one justice may send his warrant, to arrest any person who was concerned in it, and also that he may send him to goal, till he shall find sureties for his good behaviour. 1 Haw. 160.

But it seems to be agreed, that no one justice hath any power by force of this statute, either to record a riot upon his own view, or to take an inquisition thereof after it is over: Also if one justice, proceeding upon this statute, shall arrest an innocent person as a rioter, it seemeth that he is liable to an action of trespass, and that the party arrested may justify the rescuing himself, because no single justice is by this statute made a judge of the said offence. But if a riot shall be committed by persons armed in an unusual manner, contrary to the statute of Northampton, 2 Ed. 3. c. 3. and any one justice acting ex officio, in pursuance of the statute, seize the armour, and imprison the offender, and make a record of the whole matter, such a record cannot be traversed, because it is made by one acting in a judicial capacity. And for the same reason, if a justice proceeding on the statute of the 15 R. 2. against forcible entries and detainers, shall upon his own view record a riot, which shall be committed in the making of any such forcible entry or detainer, a riot so recorded cannot be traversed. Also if a justice acting as a judge by any statute whatsoever impowering him so to do, make a record upon his view of a riot committed in his presence, such record shall not be traversed; for the law gives such uncontroulable credit to all matters of record, made by any judge of record as such, that it will never admit of an averment against the truth thereof. 1 Haw. 160.

But if the rioters are above the number of twelve, the offence is greatly inhanced, and the power of one justice very much inlarged, by the act commonly called the riot act, 1 G. st. 2. c. 5. which is required to be read at every quarter sessions and leet: By which it is enacted, That every justice, sheriff, under sheriff, and mayor, shall on notice or knowledge of any unlawful, riotous, and tumultuous assembly of persons to the number of twelve or more, together with such help as he shall command, resort to the place. s. 2, 3.

Whereupon he shall, amongst the rioters, or as near to them as he can safely come, with a loud voice command, or cause to be commanded, silence to be, while proclamation is making; and after that, shall openly and with a loud voice make or cause to be made proclamation in these words, or like in effect:

Our sovereign lord the king chargeth and commandeth all persons being assembled, immediately to disperse themselves, and peaceably to depart to their habitations, or to their lawful business, upon the pains contained in the act made in the first year of king George for preventing tumults and riotous assemblies: God save the king. f. 2.

And if any person shall with force and arms willfully oppose, hinder, or hurt any person that shall begin or go to make the proclamation, whereby the same shall not be made, he shall be guilty of felony without benefit of clergy. s. 5.

And if any twelve or more of them shall continue together by the space of one hour after such proclamation made, or after such hindrance (having knowledge thereof), they shall be guilty of felony without benefit of clergy. s. 1, 5.

And every justice, sheriff, under sheriff, mayor, high and petty constable, and other peace officer, and every other person of age and ability commanded by them to assist, shall apprehend the offenders, and carry them before a justice, to be proceeded against according to law. And if any rioters be killed or hurt by any of the said persons in dispersing or apprehending them, by reason of their resistance, such persons shall be indemnified. s. 3.

Also, if any rioters (although under the number of twelve, and whether any proclamation be made or not) shall unlawfully and with force demolish or pull down any church or chapel, or any building for religious worship certified and registred according to the act of toleration, or any dwelling-house, barn, stable, or other outhouse, they shall be guilty of felony without benefit of clergy. s. 4. And any one justice may proceed against them, as against other felons.

And the hundred, city, or town, shall answer the damages thereof, as in cases of robbery. s. 6.

Prosecutions on this act, to be within twelve months after the offence. s. 8.

V. How by two justices.

1. If any riot, assembly, or rout of people, against the law, be made; the justices, three, or two of them at the least, and the sheriff, or under sheriff, shall come with the power of the county, if need be. 13 H. 4. c. 7. s. 1.

And the king's liege people being sufficient to travel shall be assistant to them, upon reasonable warning, to ride with them in aid to resist such riots, routs, and assemblies; on pain of imprisonment, and to make fine and ransom to the king. 2 H. 5. c. 8. s. 2.

If any riot, assembly, or rout of people, against the law, be made] it is said, that the justices are not only impowered hereby to raise the power of the county to assist them, in suppressing a riot which shall happen within their own view, or hearing, but also that they may safely do it upon a credible information given them of a notorious riot happening at a distance, whether there were any such riot in truth or not; for it may be dangerous for them to stay till they can get certain information of the fact: But they seem to be punishable for alarming the county in this manner, without some such probable ground of their proceeding, as would induce a reasonable man to think it necessary and convenient. 1 Haw. 161.

Assembly] It seems clear from hence, that if the justices in going towards the place where they have heard that there is a riot, shall meet persons coming from thence riotously arrayed, they may arrest them for being assembled together in such an unlawful manner, and also make a record thereof; for the statute extends to all other unlawful assemblies whatsoever as well to riots. 1 Haw. 161.

The king's liege people] Except women, clergymen, persons decrepit, and infants under the age of fifteen. 1 Haw. 161.

To resist such riots] And also arrest the rioters, and conduct them to prison. 1 Haw. 161.

2. And shall arrest them. 13 H. 4. c. 7. s. 1.

And if they shall escape, they may take them on a fresh pursuit; but they cannot at another time award any process against them on the record, but ought to send the record into the king's bench, that process may issue thereon from thence: Yet there seems to be no doubt, but that they may arrest them for their trespass on the aforesaid statute of the 34 Ed. 3. in order to compel them to find sureties for their good behaviour. 1 Haw. 162.

3. And the same justices and sheriff, or under sheriff, shall have power to record (B) that which they shall find so done in their presence against the law: by which record the offenders shall be convict in the some manner and form as is contained in the statute of forcible entries. (C) 13 H. 4. c. 7. s. 1.

Shall have power to record] And this they may do, whether the offenders be in custody at the same time, or have escaped. 1 Haw. 161.

Shall be convict] And it seemeth to be certain, that the record of a riot, expressly mentioned to have happened within the view of the justices by whom it is recorded, is a conviction of so great authority, that it can no way be traversed, however little ground of truth there might be to affirm, that any riot at all was committed, or however innocent the parties may be of the fact recorded against them. 1 Haw. 162.

However it seemeth clear, that if in such a record of a riot it be contained, that the party was guilty therein of a felony, or main, or rescous, the party shall be concluded thereby as to the riot only, and not as to any of the other matters; because the justices have by this statute a judicial authority over no other offences, except riots, routs, and unlawful assemblies. 1 Haw. 162.

And inasmuch as such a record is a final conviction of the parties, as to all such matters as are properly contained in it, it ought to be certain both as to the time and place of the offence, and the number of persons concerned therein, and the several kinds of weapons made use of by them, and all other circumstances of the fact; for since the parties are concluded from denying the truth of such a record, and have no other remedy to defend themselves against it, but only by advantage of the insufficiency of what is contained in it, they may justly demand the benefit of excepting to it, if it do not expressly shew, both that they are guilty within the meaning of the statute, and also how far they are guilty, and that the justices have pursued the power given them by the said statutes: and from the same ground it seems also to follow, that such a record may be excepted against, if it do not appear to have been made by the sheriff or under sheriff in concurrence with the justices. 1 Haw. 162.

And this record ought to remain with one of the justices, and shall not be left amongst the records of the sessions, it being made out of sessions, and not appointed to be certified thither. Dalt. c. 82.

In the same manner and form as is contained in the statute of forcible entries] That is, the statute of the 15 R. 2. c. 2. And hereupon it is said, that the offenders being under the arrest of the justices, and also convicted by a record of their offence, ought immediately to be committed to gaol by the same justices, till they shall make fine and ransom to the king; which can be assessed by no other justices of the peace, except those by whom the record of the offence was made. 1 Haw. 162.

And this fine, Mr. Dalton says, the justices shall cause to be estreated into the exchequer, that so it may be levied to the king's use; and then they are to deliver the offenders again. Dalt. c. 82.

But Mr. Hawkins says, that it hath been questioned whether the justices can safely dismiss the offenders upon their paying such a fine as shall be imposed upon them, without some judgment for their imprisonment as well as fine; because it is enacted by the 2 H. 5. c. 8. that such rioters attainted of great and heinous riots, shall have one whole year's imprisonment at the least, without being let out of prison by bail or mainprize; and that the rioters attainted of petty riots, shall have imprisonment as best shall seem to the king or to his council. 1 Haw. 164.

4. And if the offenders be departed before the coming of the said justices and sheriff or under sheriff, the same justices, three, or two of them, shall diligently enquire (D) within a month after such riot, assembly, or rout of people so made, and thereof shall hear and determine according to the law of the land. 13 H. 4. c. 7. s. 1.

The same justices] It is generally said, that any justices of the county may take such an inquiry, whether they dwell near the place where the riot happened, or at a distance, or whether they went to view the riot or not; for the statute ought to be construed as largely as the words will bear, in favour of the justices power in the suppressing of such riots; and therefore those words in the statute that the same justices shall inquire, ought to be thus expounded, that the same justices who were before impowered to raise the posse, shall inquire, and that is, any justices in the county. 1 Haw. 163.

Shall diligently inquire] That is, by a jury: In order to which, it is enacted by the 19 H. 7. c. 13. that the sheriff, on their precept directed to him, shall, on pain of 20 l. return 24 persons, whereof every of them shall have lands and tenements within the shire, to the yearly value of 20 s. of charter land or freehold, or 26 s. 8 d. of copyhold, or of both, over and above all charges: And he shall return upon every juror in issues, at the first day 20 s. and at the second 40 s.

Note; Charter land had its name from a particular form in the charter or deed, which ever since the reign of H. 8. hath been disused. 1 Inst. 6.

Within a month] That is, if they do not make inquiry within a month, they are punishable for the neglect; yet they may inquire after the month: for the lapse of a month doth not determine their authority, but only subjects them to a penalty. 2 Salk. 593.

Shall hear and determine according to the law of the land] And therefore they may award process under their own teste, against those who shall be indicted before them of any of the offences abovementioned, according to the form of this statute; and also may award the like process for the trial of a traverse of such an inquisition; and do all other things in relation thereunto, which are of course incident to all courts of record. 1 Haw. 163.

And the riot being so found by inquisition, the justices must make a record thereof in writing of such their inquiry or presentment found before them; which record also is to remain with one of the justices. Dalt. c. 82.

5. And if the truth cannot be found in the manner as is aforesaid, then within a month then next following, the justices, three, or two of them, and the sheriff or under sheriff, shall certify before the king and his council, all the deed and circumstances thereof, which certificate shall be of the like force as the presentment of 12 men; upon which certificate the offenders shall be put to answer, and shall be punished according to the discretion of the king and his council. 13 H. 4. c. 7. s. 2.

And if they do traverse the matter so certified, the certificate and traverse shall be sent into the king's bench to be tried. id. s. 3.

And if the offence be not found, by reason of any maintenance or embracery of the jurors, then the same justices and sheriff or under sheriff shall in the same certificate certify the names of the maintainers and embracers, with their misdemeanors. 19 H. 7. c. 13.

Shall certify] And it seemeth certain, that such certificate, being in nature of an indictment at the common law, ought to comprehend the certainty of time, place, and persons, and other material circumstances, both of the riot and maintenance. 1 Haw. 165.

Before the king and his council] It seems clear, by the council being here distinguished both from the chancery and king's bench, that the certificate ought to be made to the privy council board, and not to either of those courts, which in some statutes relating to judicial proceedings are taken for the king's council. 1 Haw. 165.

6. And the said justices and other officers shall execute their offices aforesaid at the king's costs, in going and continuing in doing their said offices, by payment thereof to be made by the sheriff, by indentures betwixt the said sheriff and justices, and other officers aforesaid, whereof the sheriff upon his account in the exchequer shall have due allowance. 2 H. 5. c. 8.

In order to the defraying of which, the said statute directs the fines of the offenders to be enlarged, and thereout the sheriff may pay the charges of the said justices; and of the jury, that is, for their diet; and the sheriff's fees, and the like. Dalt. c. 82.

7. And the justices dwelling highest in the country, where such riot, assembly, or rout shall be, together with the sheriff or under sheriff, shall do execution of the said statute of the 13 H. 4. every one upon pain of 100 1. to the king. s. 4.

The justices dwelling highest] Although these only are liable to this penalty, yet if any others on notice shall neglect to supply their default, they are fineable at discretion. 1 Haw. 166.

But if any justices, who do not dwell nearest to the place, do actually execute the statute, they excuse all the rest. 1 Haw. 165.

Dwelling nighest in the county] Therefore if they dwell nighest, but in another country, they are not in danger of this penalty. 1 Haw. 166.

Shall do execution of the said statute] That is, in the whole, and not in part only; as by recording a riot, and not committing the parties. 1 Haw. 166.

VI. How by process out of chancery.

By the 2. H. 5. c. 8. If default be found in the two justices, sheriff, or under sheriff, then at the instance of the party grieved, a commission shall be issued under the great seal, to inquire as well of the truth of the case for the complainant, as of such default.

And by the 2 H. 5. c. 9. and 8 H. 6. c. 14. Rioters shall be taken by writ and proclamation out of chancery, on suggestion of two justices and the sheriff, of the common fame of such riot.

4.2DISCUSSION OF DRAFTS AND PROPOSALS

4.2.1THE FIRST CONGRESS

4.2.1.1June 8, 17892

4.2.1.2August 17, 1789

4.2.1.2.a The house went into a committee of the whole, on the subject of amendments. The 3rd clause of the 4th proposition in the report was taken into consideration, being as follows; “A well regulated militia, composed of the body of the people, being the best security of a free state; the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed, but no person, religiously scrupulous, shall be compelled to bear arms.”

Mr. Gerry.

This declaration of rights, I take it, is intended to secure the people against the maladministration of the government; if we could suppose that in all cases the rights of the people would be attended to, the occasion for guards of this kind would be removed. Now I am apprehensive, sir, that this clause would give an opportunity to the people in power to destroy the constitution itself. They can declare who are those religiously scrupulous, and prevent them from bearing arms.

What, sir, is the use of a militia? It is to prevent the establishment of a standing army, the bane of liberty. Now it must be evident, that under this provision, together with their other powers, Congress could take such measures with respect to a militia, as make a standing army necessary. Whenever government mean to invade the rights and liberties of the people, they always attempt to destroy the militia, in order to raise an army upon their ruins. This was actually done by Great Britain at the commencement of the late revolution. They used every means in their power to prevent the establishment of an effective militia to the eastward. The assembly of Massachusetts, seeing the rapid progress that administration were making, to divest them of their inherent privileges, endeavored to counteract them by the organization of the militia, but they were always defeated by the influence of the crown.

Wished to know what question there was before the committee, in order to ascertain the point upon which the gentleman was speaking?

Mr. Gerry Replied that he meant to make a motion, as he disapproved of the words as they stood. He then proceeded, No attempts that they made, were successful, until they engaged in the struggle which emancipated them at once from their thraldom. Now, if we give a discretionary power to exclude those from militia duty who have religious scruples, we may as well make no provision on this head; for this reason he wished the words to be altered so as to be confined to persons belonging to a religious sect, scrupulous of bearing arms.

Mr. JACKSON

Did not expect that all the people of the United States would turn Quakers or Moravians, consequently one part would have to defend the other, in case of invasion; now this, in his opinion, was unjust, unless the constitution secured an equivalent, for this reason he moved to amend the clause, by inserting at the end of it "upon paying an equivalent to be established by law."

Mr. SMITH, (of S.C.)

Enquired what were the words used by the conventions respecting this amendment; if the gentleman would conform to what was proposed by Virginia and Carolina, he would second him: He thought they were to be excused provided they found a substitute.

Mr. JACKSON

Was willing to accommodate; he thought the expression was, "No one, religiously scrupulous of bearing arms, shall be compelled to render military service in person, upon paying an equivalent."

Mr. SHERMAN

Conceived it difficult to modify the clause and make it better. It is well-known that those who are religiously scrupulous of bearing arms, are equally scrupulous of getting substitutes or paying an equivalent; many of them would rather die than do either one or the other—but he did not see an absolute necessity for a clause of this kind. We do not live under an arbitrary government, said he, and the states respectively will have the government of the militia, unless when called into actual service; beside, it would not do to alter it so as to exclude the whole of any sect, because there are men amongst the quakers who will turn out, notwithstanding the religious principles of the society, and defend the cause of their country. Certainly it will be improper to prevent the exercise of such favorable dispositions, at least whilst it is the practice of nations to determine their contests by the slaughter of their citizens and subjects.

Mr. VINING

Hoped the clause would be suffered to remain as it stood, because he saw no use in it if it was amended so as to compel a man to find a substitute, which, with respect to the government, was the same as if the person himself turned out to fight.

Mr. Stone

Enquired what the words “Religiously scrupulous” had reference to, was it of bearing arms? If it was, it ought so be expressed.

Mr. Benson,

Moved to have the words “But no person religiously scrupulous shall be compelled to bear arms” struck out. He would always leave it to the benevolence of the legislature—for, modify it, said he, as you please, it will be impossible to express it in such a manner as to clear it from ambiguity. No man can claim this indulgence of right. It may be a religious persuasion, but it is no natural right, and therefore ought to be left to the discretion of the government. If this stands part of the constitution, it will be a question before the judiciary, on every regulation you make with respect to the organization of the militia, whether it comports with this declaration or not? It is extremely injudicious to intermix matters of doubt with fundamentals.

I have no reason to believe but the legislature will always possess humanity enough to indulge this class of citizens in a matter they are so desirous of, but they ought to be left to their discretion.

The motion for striking out the whole clause being seconded, was put, and decided in the negative, 22 members voting for it, and 24 against it.

Mr. Gerry

Objected to the first part of the clause, an account of the uncertainty with which it is expressed: A well-regulated militia being the best security of a free state, admitted an idea that a standing army was a secondary one. It ought to read “a well regulated militia, trained to arms,” in which case it would become the duty of the government to provide this security and furnish a greater certainty of its being done.

Mr. Gerry’s motion not being seconded, the question was put on the clause as reported, which being adopted,

Mr. Burke

Proposed to add to the clause just agreed to, an amendment to the following effect: “A standing army of regular troops in time of peace, is dangerous to public liberty, and such shall not be raised or kept up in time of peace but from necessity, and for the security of the people, nor then without the consent of two-thirds of the members present of both houses, and in all cases the military shall be subordinate to the civil authority." This being seconded,

Mr. Vining

Asked whether, this was be considered as an addition to the last clause, or an amendment by itself? If the former, he would remind the gentleman the clause was decided; if the latter, it was improper to introduce new matter, as the house had referred the report specially to the committee of the whole.

Mr. Burke

Feared that what with being trammelled in rules, and the apparent disposition of the committee, he should not be able to get them to consider any amendment; he submitted to such proceeding because he could not help himself.

Mr. Hatley [sic; Hartley]

Thought the amendment in order, and was ready to give his opinion of it. He hoped the people of America would always be satisfied with having a majority to govern. He never wished to see two-thirds or three-forths required, because it might put it in the power of a small minority to govern the whole union.

The question on mr. Burke's motion was put, and lost by a majority of 13.

Congressional Register, August 17, 1789, vol. 2, pp. 219–23.

4.2.1.2.b The House resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the subject of amendments to the constitution.

Sixth Amendment:—"A well regulated militia, composed of the body of the people, being the best security of a free state, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed, but no person religiously scrupulous shall be compelled to bear arms."

Mr. Benson moved that the words "but no person religiously scrupulous shall be compelled to bear arms," be struck out. He wished that this humane provision should be left to the wisdom and benevolence of the government. It was improper to make it a fundamental in the constitution.

The motion was negatived, and the amendment agreed to.

Mr. Burke moved to add a clause to the last paragraph to this effect: That a standing army of regular troops in time of peace is dangerous to public liberty, and should not be supported in time of peace, except by the consent of two thirds of each house of the legislature."

This amendment was negatived.

Daily Advertiser, August 18, 1789, p. 2, col. 4.

4.2.1.2.c The house resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the subject of amendments to the constitution.

The motion was negatived, and the amendment agreed to.

Mr. Burke moved to add a clause to the last paragraph to this effect: That a standing army of regular troops in time of peace is dangerous to public liberty, and should not be supported in time of peace, except by the consent of two thirds of both houses.

This amendment was negatived.

Gazette of the U.S., August 22, 1789, p. 249, col. 3.

4.2.1.3.a Mr. Scott

Objected to the clause in the sixth amendment, “No person religiously scrupulous, shall be compelled to bear arms.” He observed that if this becomes part of the constitution, such persons can neither be called upon for their services, nor can an equivalent be demanded; it is also attended with still further difficulties, for a militia can never be depended upon. This would lead to the violation of another article in the Constitution, which secures to the people the right of keeping arms, and in this case recourse must be had to a standing army. I conceive it said he to be a legislative right altogether. There are many sects I know, who are religiously scrupulous in this respect; I do not mean to deprive them of any indulgence the law affords; my design is to guard against those who are of no religion. It has been urged that religion is on the decline; if so the argument is more strong in my favor, for when the time comes that religion shall be discarded, the generality of persons will have recourse to these pretexts, to get excused from bearing arms.

Mr. Boudinot

Thought the provision in the clause, or something similar to it, was necessary. Can any dependence said he, be placed in men who are conscientious in this respect; or what justice can there be in compelling them to bear arms, when, according to their religious principles, they would rather die than use them. He adverted to several instances of oppression in this point, that occurred during the war. In forming a militia, an effectual defence ought to be calculated, and no characters of this religious description ought to be compelled to take up arms. I hope that in establishing this government, we may show the world that proper care is taken that the government may not interfere with the religious sentiments of any person. Now, by striking out the clause, people may be led to believe that there is an intention in the general government to compel all its citizens to bear arms.

Some further desultory conversation arose and it was agreed to insert the words “in person” to the end of the clause; after which, it was adopted, as was the 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th clauses of the 4th proposition; then the 5th, 6th, and 7th propositions was agreed to, and the house adjourned.

Congressional Register, August 20, 1789, vol. 2, pp. 242–43.

4.2.1.3.b Mr. Scot objected to the clause in the sixth amendment, “No person religiously scrupulous shall be compelled to bear arms.” He said, if this becomes part of the constitution, we can neither call upon such persons for services nor an equivalent; it is attended with still further difficulties, for you can never depend on your militia. This will lead to the violation of another article in the constitution, which secures to the people the right of keeping arms, as in this case you must have recourse to a standing army. I conceive it is a matter of legislative right altogether. I know there are many sects religiously scrupulous in this respect: I am not for abridging them of any indulgence by law; my design is to guard against those who are of no religion. It is a said that religion is on the decline; if this is the case, it is an argument in my favour; for when the time comes that there is no religion, persons will more generally have recourse to these pretexts to get excused.

Mr. Boudinot said that the provision in the clause or something like it appeared to be necessary. What dependence can be placed in men who are conscientious in the respect? Or what justice can there be in compelling them to bear arm [sic], when, it they are honest men they would rather die than use them. He then averted to several instances of oppression in the case which occurred during the war. In forming a militia we ought to calculate for an effectual defence, and not compel characters of this description to bear arms. I wish that in establishing the government we may be careful to let every person know that we will not interfere with any person’s particular religious profession. If we strike out this clause, we shall lead such persons to conclude that we mean to compel them to bear arms.

Mr. Vining and Mr. Jackson spake upon the question. The words in person were added after the word “arms,” and the amendment was adopted.

4.2.2STATE CONVENTIONS

4.2.2.1Massachusetts, January 24, 1788

The Hon. Mr. SEDGWICK. … Is it possible, he asked, that an army could be raised for the purpose of enslaving themselves and their brethren? or, if raised, whether they could subdue a nation of freemen, who know how to prize liberty, and who have arms in their hands?

Elliot, vol. 2, pp. 96–97.

4.2.2.2North Carolina, July 30, 1788

[Congress] can disarm the militia. If they were armed, they would be a resource against the great oppressions. The laws of a great empire are difficult to be executed. If the laws of the Union were oppressive, they could not carry them into effect, if the people were possessed of proper means of defence.

Elliot, vol. 4, p. 203.

4.2.2.3Pennsylvania, December 6, 1787

JOHN SMILIE: (113) I object to the power of Congress over the militia and to keep a standing army.

(123) In a free government there never will be need of standing armies; for it depends on the confidence of the people. If it does not so depend, it is not free.

(124) The Convention, in framing this government, knew it was not a free one; otherwise they would not have asked the power of the purse and the sword.

(125) The last resource of a free people is taken away; for Congress are to have the command of the militia.

(126) The laws of Pennsylvania have hitherto been executed without the aid of the militia.

(127) The governor of each state will be only the drill sergeant of Congress.

(128) The militia officers will be obliged by oath to support the general government against that of their own state.

(129) Congress may give us a select militia which will, in fact, be a standing army—or Congress, afraid of a general militia, may say there shall be no militia at all.

(130) When a selected militia is formed; the people in general may be disarmed.

(131) Will the states give up to Congress their last resource—the command of the militia?

(132) Will the militia laws be as mild under the general government as under the state governments? Militia men may be punished with whipping or death. They may [be] dragged from one state to any other.

(133) "Congress guarantees to each State a Republican Form of Government." Is this a security for a free government?

(134) Can even the shadow of state governments be continued if Congress please to take it away?

(134) [sic] The Senate and President may dismiss the Representatives, when once a standing army is established with funds; and there this government will terminate.

WILLIAM FINDLEY: (135) The objections of the member from Fayette [John Smilie] are founded, important, and of extensive practical influence. Tax and militia laws are of universal operation.

(136) The militia will be taken from home; and when the militia of one state has quelled insurrections and destroyed the liberties, the militia of the last state may, at another time, be employed in retaliation on the first.

(137) No provision in behalf of those who are conscientiously scrupulous of bearing arms.

4.2.2.4Virginia, June 14, 1788

Mr. CLAY wished to be informed why the Congress were to have power to provide for calling forth the militia, to put the laws of the Union into execution.

Mr. MADISON supposed the reasons of this power to be so obvious that they would occur to most gentlemen. If resistance should be made to the execution of the laws, he said, it ought to be overcome. This could be done only in two ways—either by regular forces or by the people. By one or the other it must unquestionably be done. If insurrections should arise, or invasions should take place, the people ought unquestionably to be employed, to suppress and repel them, rather than a standing army. The best way to do these things was to put the militia on a good and sure footing, and enable the government to make use of their services when necessary.

Mr. GEORGE MASON. Mr. Chairman, unless there be some restrictions on the power of calling forth the militia, to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions, we may very easily see that it will produce dreadful oppressions. It is extremely unsafe, without some alterations. It would be to use the militia to a very bad purpose, if any disturbance happened in New Hampshire, to call them from Georgia. This would harass the people so much that they would agree to abolish the use of the militia, and establish a standing army. I conceive the general government ought to have power over the militia, but it ought to have some bounds. If gentlemen say that the militia of a neighboring state is not sufficient, the government ought to have power to call forth those of other states, the most convenient and contiguous. But in this case, the consent of the state legislatures ought to be had. On real emergencies, this consent will never be denied, each state being concerned in the safety of the rest. This power may be restricted without any danger. I wish such an amendment as this—that the militia of any state should not be marched beyond the limits of the adjoining state; and if it be necessary to draw them from one end of the continent to the other, I wish such a check, as the consent of the state legislature, to be provided. Gentlemen may say that this would impede the government, and that the state legislatures would counteract it by refusing their consent. This argument may be applied to all objections whatsoever. How is this compared to the British constitution? Though the king may declare war, the Parliament has the means of carrying it on. It is not so here. Congress can do both. Were it not for that check in the British government, the monarch would be a despot. When a war is necessary for the benefit of the nation, the means of carrying it on are never denied. If any unjust requisition be made on Parliament, it will be, as it ought to be, refused. The same principle ought to be observed in our government. In times of real danger, the states will have the same enthusiasm in aiding the general government, and granting its demands, which is seen in England, when the king is engaged in a war apparently for the interest of the nation. This power is necessary; but we ought to guard against danger. If ever they attempt to harass and abuse the militia, they may abolish them, and raise a standing army in their stead. There are various ways of destroying the militia. A standing army may be perpetually established in their stead. I abominate and detest the idea of a government, where there is a standing army. The militia may be here destroyed by that method which has been practised in other parts of the world before; that is, by rendering them useless—by disarming them. Under various pretenses, Congress may neglect to provide for arming and disciplining the militia; and the state governments cannot do it, for Congress has an exclusive right to arm them, &c. Here is a line of division drawn between them—the state and general governments. The power over the militia is divided between them. The national government has an exclusive right to provide for arming, organizing, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States. The state governments have the power of appointing the officers, and of training the militia, according to the discipline prescibed by Congress, if they should think proper to prescribe any. Should the national government wish to render the militia useless, they may neglect them, and let them perish, in order to have a pretence of establishing a standing army.

No man has a greater regard for the military gentlemen than I have. I admire their intrepidity, perseverance, and valor. But when once a standing army is established in any country, the people lose their liberty. When, against a regular and disciplined army, yeomanry are the only defence,—yeomanry, unskillful and unarmed,—what chance is there for preserving freedom? Give me leave to recur to the page of history, to warn you of your present danger. Recollect the history of most nations of the world. What havoc, desolation, and destruction, have been perpetrated by standing armies! An instance within the memory of some of this house will show us how our militia may be destroyed. Forty years ago, when the resolution of enslaving America was formed in Great Britain, the British Parliament was advised by an artful man, who was governor of Pennsylvania, to disarm the people; that it was the best and most effectual way to enslave them; but that they should not do it openly, but weaken them, and let them sink gradually, by totally disusing and neglecting the militia. [Here Mr. Mason quoted sundry passages to this effect.] This was a most iniquitous project. Why should we not provide against the danger of having our militia, our real and natural strength, destroyed? The general government ought, at the same time, to have some such power. But we need not give them power to abolish our militia. If they neglect to arm them, and prescribe proper discipline, they will be of no use. I am not acquainted with the military profession. I beg to be excused for any errors I may commit with respect to it. But I stand on the general principles of freedom, whereon I dare to meet anyone. I wish that, in case the general government should neglect to arm and discipline the militia, there should be an express declaration that the state governments might arm and discipline them. With this single exception, I would agree to this part, as I am conscious the government ought to have the power.

They may effect the destruction of the militia, by rendering the service odious to the people themselves, by harassing them from one end of the continent to the other, and by keeping them under martial law.

The English Parliament never pass a mutiny bill but for one year. This is necessary; for otherwise the soldiers would be on the same footing with the officers, and the army would be dissolved. One mutiny bill has been here in force since the revolution. I humbly conceive there is extreme danger of establishing cruel martial regulations. If, at any time, our rulers should have unjust and iniquitous designs against our liberties, and should wish to establish a standing army, the first attempt would be to render the service and use of militia odious to the people themselves—subjecting them to unnecessary severity of discipline in time of peace, confining them under martial law, and disgusting them so much as to make them cry out, “Give us a standing army!” I would wish to have some check to exclude this danger; as, that the militia should never be subject to martial law but in time of war. I consider and fear the natural propensity of rulers to oppress the people. I wish only to prevent them from doing evil. By these amendments I would give necessary powers, but no unnecessary power[.] If the clause stands as it is now, it will take from the state legislatures what divine Providence has given to every individual—the means of self-defence. Unless it be moderated in some degree, it will ruin us, and introduce a standing army.

Mr. MADISON. Mr. Chairman, I most cordially agree, with the honorable member last up, that a standing army is one of the greatest mischiefs that can possibly happen. It is a great recommendation for this system, that it provides against this evil more than any other system known to us, and, particularly, more than the old system of confederation. The most effectual way to guard against a standing army, is to render it unnecessary. The most effectual way to render it unnecessary, is to give the general government full power to call forth the militia, and exert the whole natural strength of the Union, when necessary. Thus you will furnish the people with sure and certain protection, without recurring to this evil; and the certainty of this protection from the whole will be a strong inducement to individual exertion. Does the organization of the government warrant a belief that this power will be abused? Can we believe that a government of a federal nature, consisting of many coëqual sovereignties, and particularly having one branch chosen from the people, would drag the militia unnecessarily to an immense distance? This, sir, would be unworthy the most arbitrary despot. They have no temptation whatever to abuse this power; such abuse could only answer the purpose of exciting the universal indignation of the people, drawing on themselves the general hatred and detestation of their country.

I cannot help thinking that the honorable gentleman has not considered, in all its consequences, the amendment he has proposed. Would this be an equal protection, sir, or would it not be a most partial provision? Some states have three or four states in contact. Were this state invaded, as it is bounded by several states, the militia of three or four states would, by this proposition, be obliged to come to our aid; and those from some of the states would come a far greater distance than those of others. There are other states, which, if invaded, could be assisted by the militia of one state only, there being several states which border but on one state. Georgia and New Hampshire would be infinitely less safe than the other states. Were we to adopt this amendment, we should set up those states as butts for invasions, invite foreign enemies to attack them, and expose them to peculiar hardships and dangers. Were the militia confined to any limited distance from their respective places of abode, it would produce equal, nay, more inconveniences. The principles of equality and reciprocal aid would be destroyed in either case.

I cannot conceive that this Constitution, by giving the general government the power of arming the militia, takes it away from the state governments. The power is concurrent, and not exclusive. Have we not found, from experience, that, while the power of arming and governing the militia has been solely vested in state legislatures, they were neglected and rendered unfit for immediate service? Every state neglected too much this most essential object. But the general government can do it more effectually. Have we not also found that the militia of one state were almost always insufficient to succor its harassed neighbor? Did all the states furnish their quotas of militia with sufficient promptitude? The assistance of one state will be of little avail to repel invasion. But the general head of the whole Union can do it with effect, if it be vested with power to use the aggregate strength of the Union. If the regualtion of the militia were to be committed to the executive authority alone, there might be reason for providing restrictions. But, sir, it is the legislative authority that has this power. They must make a law for the purpose.

The honorable member is under another mistake. He wishes martial law to be exercised only in time of war, under an idea that Congress can establish it in time of peace. The states are to have the authority of training the militia according to the congressional discipline; and of governing them at all times when not in the service of the Union. Congress is to govern such part of them as may be employed in the actual service of the United States; and such part only can be subject to martial law. The gentlemen in opposition have drawn a most tremendous picture of the Constitution in this respect. Without considering that the power was absolutely indispensable, they have alarmed us with the possible abuse of it, but have shown no inducement or motive to tempt them to such abuse. Would the legislature of the state drag the militia of the eastern shore to the western frontiers, or those of the western frontiers to the eastern shore, if the local militia were sufficient to effect the intended purpose? There is something so preposterous, and so full of mischief, in the idea of dragging the militia unnecessarily from one end of the continent to the other, that I think there can be no ground of apprehension. If you limit their power over the militia, you give them a pretext for substituting a standing army. If you put it in the power of the state governments to refuse the militia, by requiring their consent, you destroy the general government, and sacrifice particular states. The same principles and motives which produce disobedience to requisitions, will produce refusal in this case.

The restrictions which the honorable gentleman mentioned to be in the British constitution are all provisions against the power of the executive magistrate; but the House of Commons may, if they be so disposed, sacrifice the interest of their constituents in all those cases. They may prolong the duration of mutiny bills, and grant supplies to the king to carry on an impolitic war. But they have no motives to do so; for they have strong motives to do their duty. We have more ample security than the people of Great Britain. The powers of the government are more limited and guarded, and our representatives are more responsible than the members of the British House of Commons.

Mr. CLAY apprehended that, by this power, our militia might be sent to the Mississippi. He observed that the sheriff might raise the posse comitatus to execute the laws. He feared it would lead to the establishment of a military government, as the militia were to be called forth to put the laws into execution. He asked why this mode was preferred to the old, established custom of executing the laws.

Mr. MADISON answered, that the power existed in all countries; that the militia might be called forth, for that purpose, under the laws of this state and every other state in the Union; that public force must be used when resistance to the laws required it, otherwise society itself must be destroyed; that the mode referred to by the gentleman might not be sufficient on every occasion, as the sheriff must be necessarily restricted to the posse of his own county. If the posse of one county were insufficient to overcome the resistance to the execution of the laws, this power must be resorted to. He did not, by any means, admit that the old mode was superseded by the introduction of the new one. And it was obvious to him, that, when the civil power was sufficient, this mode would never be put in practice.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Chairman, in my judgment the friends of the opposition have to act cautiously. We must make a firm stand before we decide. I was heard to say, a few days ago, that the sword and purse were the two great instruments of government; and I professed great repugnance at parting with the purse, without any control, to the proposed system of government. And now, when we proceed in this formidable compact, and come to the national defence, the sword, I am persuaded we ought to be still more cautious and circumspect; for I feel still more reluctance to surrender this most valuable of rights.

The honorable member who has risen to explain several parts of the system was pleased to say, that the best way of avoiding the danger of a standing army, was, to have the militia in such a way as to render it unnecessary; and that, as the new government would have power over the militia, we should have no standing army—it being unnecessary. This argument destroys itself. It demands a power and denies the probability of its exercise. There are suspicions of power on one hand, and absolute and unlimited confidence on the other. I hope to be one of those who have a large share of suspicion. I leave it to this house, if there be not too small a portion on the other side, by giving up too much to that government. You can easily see which is the worst of two extremes. Too much suspicion may be corrected. If you give too little power to-day, you may give more tomorrow. But the reverse of the proposition will not hold. If you give too much power to-day, you cannot retake it tomorrow: for tomorrow will never come for that purpose. If you have the fate of other nations, you will never see it. It is easier to supply deficiencies of power than to take back excess of power. This no man can deny.

But, says the honorable member, Congress will keep the militia armed; or, in other words, they will do their duty. Pardon me if I am too jealous and suspicious to confide in this remote possibility. My honorable friend went on a supposition that the American rulers, like all others, will depart from their duty without bars and checks. No government can be safe without checks. Then he told us they had no temptation to violate their duty, and that it would be their interest to perform it. Does he think you are to trust men who cannot have separate interests from the people? It is a novelty in the political world (as great a novelty as the system itself) to find rulers without private interests, and views of personal emoluments, and ambition. His supposition, that they will not depart from their duty, as having no interest to do so, is no satisfactory answer to my mind. This is no check. The government may be most intolerable and destructive, if this be our only security.

My honorable friend attacked the honorable gentleman with universal principles—that, in all nations and ages, rulers have been actuated by motives of individual interest and private emoluments, and that in America it would be so also. I hope, before we part with this great bulwark, this noble palladium of safety, we shall have such checks interposed as will render us secure. The militia, sir, is our ultimate safety. We can have no security without it. But then, he says that the power of arming and organizing the militia is concurrent, and to be equally exercised by the general and state governments. I am sure, and I trust in the candor of that gentleman, that he will recede from that opinion, when his recollection will be called to the particular clause which relates it to.

As my worthy friend said, there is a positive partition of power between the two governments. To Congress is given the power of "arming, organizing, and disciplining the militia, and governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States." To the state legislatures is given the power of "appointing the officers, and training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress." I observed before, that, if the power be concurrent as to arming them, it is concurrent in other respects. If the states have the right of arming them, &c., concurrently, Congress has a concurrent power of appointing the officers, and training the militia. If Congress have that power, it is absurd. To admit this mutual concurrence of powers will carry you into endless absurdity—that Congress has nothing exclusive on the one hand, nor the states on the other. The rational explanation is, that Congress shall have exclusive power of arming them, &c., and that the state governments shall have exclusive power of appointing the officers, &c. Let me put it in another light.

May we not discipline and arm them, as well as Congress, if the power be concurrent? so that our militia shall have two sets of arms, double sets of regimentals, &c.; and thus, at a very great cost, we shall be doubly armed. The great object is, that every man be armed. But can the people afford to pay for double sets of arms &c.? Every one who is able may have a gun. But we have learned, by experience, that necessary as it is to have arms, and though our Assembly has, by a succession of laws for many years, endeavored to have the militia completely armed, it is still far from being the case. When this power is given up to Congress without limitation or bounds, how will your militia be armed? You trust to chance; for sure I am that nation which shall trust its liberties in other hands cannot long exist. If gentlemen are serious when they suppose a concurrent power, where can be the impolicy to amend it? Or, in other words, to say that Congress shall not arm or discipline them, till the states shall have refused or neglected to do it? This is my object. I only wish to bring it to what they themselves say is implied. Implication is to be the foundation of our civil liberties, and when you speak of arming the militia by a concurrence of power, you use implication. But implication will not save you, when a strong army of veterans comes upon you. You would be laughed at by the whole world for trusting your safety implicitly to implication.

The argument of my honorable friend was, that rulers might tyrannize. The answer he received was, that they will not. In saying that they would not, he admitted they might. In this great, this essential part of the Constitution, if you are safe, it is not from the Constitution, but from the virtues of the men in government. If gentlemen are willing to trust themselves and posterity to so slender and improbable a chance, they have greater strength of nerves than I have.

The honorable gentleman, in endeavoring to answer the question why the militia were to be called forth to execute the laws, said that the civil power would probably do it. He is driven to say, that the civil power may do it instead of the militia. Sir, the military power ought not to interpose till the civil power refuse. If this be the spirit of your new Constitution, that the laws are to be enforced by military coercion, we may easily divine the happy consequences which will result from it. The civil power is not to be employed at all. If it be, show me it. I read it attentively, and could see nothing to warrant a belief that the civil power can be called for. I shall be glad to see the power that authorizes Congress to do so. The sheriff will be aided by military force. The most wanton excesses may be committed under color of this; for every man in office, in the states, is to take an oath to support it in all its operations. The honorable gentleman said, in answer to the objection that the militia might be marched from New Hampshire to Georgia, that the members of the government would not attempt to excite the indignation of the people. Here, again, we have the general unsatisfactory answer, that they will be virtuous, and that there is no danger.

Will gentlemen be satisfied with an answer which admits of dangers and abuses if they be wicked? Let us put it out of their power to do mischief. I am convinced there is no safety in the paper on the table as it stands now. I am sorry to have an occasion to pass a eulogium on the British government, as gentlemen may object to it. But how natural it is, when comparing deformities to beauty, to be struck with the superiority of the British government to that system! In England, self-love—self-interest—powerfully stimulates the executive magistrate to advance the posterity of the nation. In the most distant part, he feels the loss of his subjects. He will see the great advantage of his prosperity inseparable from the felicity of his people. Man is a fallen creature, a fallible being, and cannot be depended on without self-love. Your President will not have the same motives of self-love to impel him to favor your interests. His political character is but transient, and he will promote, as much as possible, his own private interests. He will conclude, the constant observation has been that he will abuse his power, and that it is expected. The king of England has a more permanent interest. His stock, his family, is to continue in possession of the same emolument. The more flourishing his nation, the more formidable and powerful is he. The sword and purse are not united, in that government, in the same hands, as in this system. Does not infinite security result from a separation?

But it is said that our Congress are more responsible than the British Parliament. It appears to me that there is no real, but there may be some specious responsibility. If Congress, in the execution of their unbounded powers, shall have done wrong, how will you come at them to punish them, if they are at the distance of five hundred miles? At such a great distance, they will evade responsibility altogether. If you have given up your militia, and Congress shall refuse to arm them, you have lost every thing. Your existence will be precarious, because you depend on others, whose interests are not affected by your infelicity. If Congress are to arm us exclusively, the man of New Hampshire may vote for or against it, as well as the Virginian. The great distance and difference between the two places render it impossible that the people of that country can know or pursue what will promote our convenience. I therefore contend that, if Congress do not arm the militia, we ought to provide for it ourselves.[3]

4.2.3.1June 8, 1787

In Committee of the Whole.—On a reconsideration of the clause giving the national legislature a negative on such laws of the states as might be contrary to the Articles of Union, or treaties with foreign nations,—

Mr. PINCKNEY moved, "that the national legislature should have authority to negative all laws which they should judge to be improper." He urged that such a universality of the power was indispensibly necessary to render it effectual; that the states must be kept in due subordination to the nation; that, if the states were left to act of themselves in any case, it would be impossible to defend the national prerogatives, however extensive they might be, on paper. …

Mr. MADISON seconded the motion. He could not but regard an indefinite power to negative legislative acts of the states as absolutely necessary to a perfect system. … Was such a remedy eligible? Was it practicable? Could the national resources, if exerted to the upmost, enforce a national decree against Massachusetts, abetted, perhaps, by several of her neighbors? It would not be possible. A small proportion of the community, in a compact situation, acting on the defensive, and at one of its extremities, might at any time bid defiance to the national authority. Any government for the United States, formed on the supposed practicability of using force against the unconstitutional proceedings of the states, would prove as visionary and fallacious as the government of Congress. The negative would render the use of force unnecessary. The states could of themselves pass no operative act, any more than one branch of a legislature, where there are two branches, can proceed without the other. But, in order to give the negative this efficacy, it must extend to all cases. …

Mr. WILLIAMSON was against giving a power that might restrain the states from regulating their internal police.

Mr. GERRY could not see the extent of such a power, and was against every power that was not necessary. He thought a remonstrance against unreasonable acts of the states would restrain them. If it should not, force might be resorted to. He had no objection to authorize a negative to paper money, and similar measures. When the Confederation was depending before Congress, Massachusetts was then for inserting the power of emitting paper money among the exclusive powers of Congress. He observed, that the proposed negative would extend to the regulations of the militia—a matter on which the existence of the state might depend. The national legislature, with such a power, may enslave the states. Such an idea as this will never be acceded to. It has never been suggested or conceived among the people.

4.2.4NEWSPAPERS AND PAMPHLETS

4.2.4.1The Federal Farmer, No. 3, October 10, 1787

… By the constitution it is proposed that congress shall have power "to raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years; to provide and maintain a navy; to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions: to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia: reserving to the states the right to appoint the officers, and to train the militia according to the discipline prescribed by congress; congress will have unlimited power to raise armies, and to engage officers and men for any number of years; but a legislative act applying money for their support can have operation for no longer term than two years, and if a subsequent congress do not within two years renew the appropriation, or further appropriate monies for the use of the army, the army will be left to take care of itself. When an army shall once be raised for a number of years, it is not probable that it will find much difficulty in getting congress to pass laws for applying monies to its support. I see so many men in America fond of a standing army, and especially among those who probably will have a large share in administering the federal system; it is very evident to me, that we shall have a large standing army as soon as the monies to support them can be possibly found. An army is a very agreeable place of employment for the young gentlemen of many families. A power to raise armies must be lodged some where; still this will not justify the lodging this power in a bare majority of so few men without any checks; or in the government in which the great body of the people, in the nature of things, will be only nominally represented. In the state governments the great body of the people, the yeomanry, etc. of the country, are represented: It is true they will chuse the members of congress, and may now and then chuse a man of their own way of thinking; but it is impossible for forty, or thirty thousand people in this country, one time in ten to find a man who can possess similar feelings, views, and interests with themselves: Powers to lay and collect taxes and to raise armies are of the greatest moment; for carrying them into effect, laws need not be frequently made, and the yeomanry, etc of the country ought substantially to have a check upon the passing of these laws; this check ought to be placed in the legislatures, or at least, in the few men the common people of the country, will, probably, have in congress, in the true sense of the word, "from among themselves." It is true, the yeomanry of the country possess the lands, the weight of property, possess arms, and are too strong a body of men to be openly offended—and, therefore, it is urged, they will take care of themselves, that men who shall govern will not dare pay any disrespect to their opinions. It is easily perceived, that if they have not their proper negative upon passing laws in congress, or on the passage of laws relative to taxes and armies, they may in twenty or thirty years be by means imperceptible them, totally deprived of that boasted weight and strength: This may be done in a great measure by congress, if disposed to do it, by modelling the militia. Should one fifth, or one eighth part of the men capable of bearing arms, be made a select militia, as has been proposed, and those the young and ardent part of the community, possessed of but little or no property, and all the others put upon a plan that will render them of no importance, the former will answer all the purposes of an army, while the latter will be defenceless. The state must train the militia in such form and according to such systems and rules as congress shall prescribe: and the only actual influence the respective states will have respecting the militia will be in appointing the officers. I see no provision made for calling out the posse commitatus [sic] for executing the laws of the union, but provision is made for congress to call forth the militia for the execution of them—and the militia in general, or any select part of it, may be called out under military officers, instead of the sheriff to enforce an execution of federal laws, in the first instance and thereby introduce an entire military execution of the laws. I know that powers to raise taxes, to regulate the military strength of the community on some uniform plan, to provide for its defence and internal order, and for duly executing the laws, must be lodged somewhere; but still we ought not so to lodge them, as evidently to give one order of men in the community, undue advantages over others; or commit the many to the mercy, prudence, and moderation of the few. And so far as it may be necessary to lodge any of the peculiar powers in the general government, a more safe exercise of them ought to be secured, by requiring the consent of two-thirds or threefourths of congress thereto—until the federal representation can be increased, so that the democratic members in congress may stand some tolerable chance of a reasonable negative, in behalf of the numerous, important, and democratic part of the community.

4.2.4.2The Federal Farmer, No. 6, December 25, 1787

The following, I think, will be allowed to be unalienable or fundamental rights in the United States:—

No man, demeaning himself peaceably, shall be molested on account of his religion or mode or worship—The people have a right to hold and enjoy their property according to known standing laws, and which cannot be taken from them without their consent, or the consent of their representatives; and whenever taken in the pressing urgencies of government, they are to receive a reasonable compensation for it—Individual security consists in having free recourse to the laws—The people are subject to no laws or taxes not assented to by their representatives constitutionally assembled—They are at all times intitled to the benefits of the writ of habeas corpus, the trial by jury in criminal and civil causes—They have a right, when charged, to a speedy trial in the vicinage; to be heard by themselves or counsel, not to be compelled to furnish evidence against themselves, to have witnesses face to face, and to confront their adversaries before the judge—No man is held to answer a crime charged upon him till it be substantially described to him; and he is subject to no unreasonable searches or seizures of his person, papers or effects—The people have a right to assemble in an orderly manner, and petition the government for a redress of wrongs—The freedom of the press ought not to be restrained—No emoluments, except for actual service—No hereditary honors, or orders of nobility, ought to be allowed—The military ought to be subordinate to the civil authority, and no soldier be quartered on the citizens without their consent—The militia ought always to be armed and disciplined, and the usual defence of the country—The supreme power is in the people, and power delegated ought to return to them at stated periods, and frequently—The legislative, executive, and judicial powers, ought always to be kept distinct—others perhaps might be added.

4.2.4.3The Federalist, No. 29, January 9, 1788

The power of regulating the militia and of commanding its services in times of insurrection and invasion are natural incidents to the duties of superintending the common defence, and of watching over the internal peace of the confederacy.

It requires no skill in the science of war to discern that uniformity in the organization and discipline of the militia would be attended with the most beneficial effects, whenever they were called into service for the public defence. It would enable them to discharge the duties of the camp and of the field with mutual intelligence and concert; an advantage of peculiar moment in the operations of an army: And it would fit them much sooner to acquire the degree of proficiency in military functions, which would be essential to their usefulness. This desirable uniformity can only be accomplished by confiding the regulation of the militia to the direction of the national authority.

Of the different grounds which have been taken in opposition to the plan of the Convention, there is none that was so little to have been expected, or so untenable in itself, as the one which from this particular provision has been attacked. If a well regulated militia be the most natural defence of a free country, it ought certainly to be under the regulation and at the disposal of that body which is constituted the guardian of the national security. If standing armies are dangerous to liberty, an efficacious power over the militia, in the body to whose care the protection of the State is committed, ought as far as possible to take away the inducement and the pretext to such unfriendly institutions. If the foederal government can command the aid of the militia in those emergencies which call for the military arm in support of the civil magistrate, it can the better dispense with the employment of a different kind of force. If it cannot avail itself of the former, it will be obliged to recur to the latter. To render an army unnecessary will be a more certain method of preventing its existence than a thousand prohibitions upon paper.

… Where in the name of common sense are our fears to end if we may not trust our sons, our brothers, our neighbours, our fellow-citizens? What shadow of danger can there be from men who are daily mingling with the rest of their countrymen; and who participate with them in the same feelings, sentiments, habits and interests? What reasonable cause of apprehension can be inferred from a power in the Union to prescribe regulations for the militia and to command its services when necessary; while the particular States are to have the sole and exclusive appointment of the officers? If it were possible seriously to indulge a jealousy of the militia upon any conceivable establishment under the Foederal Government, the circumstance of the officers being in the appointment of the States ought at once to extinguish it. There can be no doubt that this circumstance will always secure to them a preponderating influence over the militia.

As civil rulers, not having their duty to the people duly before them, may attempt to tyrannize, and as the military forces which must be occasionally raised to defend our country, might pervert their power to the injury of their fellow citizens, the people are confirmed by the next article in their right to keep and bear their private arms.

But per Cur. CHAP. LXIII.
Of Affrays.

In treating of Affrays, I shall consider,

1. What shall be said to be an Affray.

2. How far it may be suppressed by a private Person.
3. How far by a Constable.
4. How far by a Justice of Peace.
5. In what Manner the several Kinds of Affrays may be punished.

Sect. 1. As to the first Point, it is said, That the Word Affray is derived from the French Word Effraier, to terrify, and that in a legal Sense it is taken for a publick Offence, to the Terror of the People, from whence it seems clearly to follow, That there may be an Assault which will not amount to an Affray; as where it happens in a private Place, out of the hearing or seeing of any, except the Parties concerned; in which Case it cannot be said to be to the Terror of the People; and for this Cause such a private Assault seems not to be inquirable in a Court-Leet, as all Affrays certainly are, as being common Nusances.[1]

Sect. 2. Also it is said, that no quarrelsome or threatening Words whatsoever shall amount to an Affray; and that no one can justify laying his Hands on those who shall barely quarrel with angry Words, without coming to Blows; yet it seemeth, That the Constable may, at the Request of the Party threatened, carry the Person, who threatens to beat him, before a Justice of Peace, in Order to find Sureties.[2]

Sect. 3. Also it is certain, That it is a very high Offence to challenge another, either by Word or Letter, to fight a Duel, or to be the Messenger of such a Challenge, or even barely to endeavour to provoke another to send a Challenge, or to fight; as by dispersing Letters to that Purpose, full of Reflections, and insinuating a Desire to fight, &c.[3]

Sect. 4. But granting that no bare Words, in the Judgment of Law, carry in them so much Terror as to amount to an Affray; yet it seems certain, That in some Cases there may be an Affray where there is no actual Violence; as where a Man arms himself with dangerous and unusual Weapons, in such a Manner as will naturally cause a Terror to the People, which is said to have been always an Offence at Common Law, and is strictly prohibited by many Statutes: For by 2 Ed. 3. 3. it is enacted, That no Man, great nor small, of what Condition soever he be, except the King's Servants, in his Presence, and his Ministers in executing of the King's Precepts, or of their Office, and such as be in their Company assisting them, and also upon a Cry made for Arms to keep the Peace, and the same in such Places where such Acts happen, be so hardy to come before the King's Justices, or other of the King's Ministers doing their Office, with Force and Arms, nor bring no Force in Affray of Peace, nor to go nor ride armed by Night nor by Day, in Fairs, Markets, nor in the Presence of the Justices or other Ministers, nor in no part elsewhere, upon Pain to forfeit their Armour to the King, and their Bodies to Prison, at the King's Pleasure. And that the King's Justices in their Presence, Sheriffs, and other Ministers in their Bailiwicks, Lords of Franchises, and their Bailiffs in the same, and Mayors and Bailiffs of Cities and Boroughs, within the same Cities and Boroughs, and Borough-holders, Constables and Wardens of the Peace within their Wards, shall have Power to execute this Act: And that the Justices assigned, at their coming down into the Country, shall have Power to enquire how such Officers and Lords have exercised their Offices in this Case, and to punish them whom they find, that have not done that which pertained to their Office; and this Statute is farther enforced by 7 Rich. 2. 13. and 20 Rich. 2. 1.[4]

And in the Exposition of it, the following Points have been holden:

Sect. 5. I. That any Justice of Peace, or other Person, who is impowered to execute this Statute, may proceed thereon, either ex Officio, or by Force of a Writ out of Chancery formed upon the Statute, and that if he find any Person in Arms contrary to the Form of the Statute, he may seize the Arms, and commit the Offender to Prison; and that he ought also to make a Record of his whole Proceeding, and certify the same into the Chancery, where he proceeds by Force of the said Writ, or into the Exchequer, where he proceeds ex Officio.[5]

Sect. 6. II. That where a Justice of Peace, &c. proceeds upon the said Writ, he may not only imprison those whom he shall find offending against the Statute in his own View, but also those who shall be found by an Inquest taken before him, to have offended in such Manner in his Absence; and I do not see why he may not do the same where he proceeds ex Officio; for feeing the said Writ hath no other Foundation but the said Statute, and is the most authentick Explication thereof, it seemeth that the Rules therein prescribed, should be the best Direction for all Proceedings upon that Statute.[6]

Sect. 7. III. That the UnderSheriff may execute the said Writ, being directed to the Sheriff, if it name him only by the Name of his Office, and not by his proper Name, and do not expresly command him to act in his proper Person.[7]

Sect. 8. IV. That a Man cannot excuse the wearing such Armour in Publick, by alledging that such a one threatened him, and that he wears it for the Safety of his Person from his Assault; but it hath been resolved, That no one shall incur the Penalty of the said Statute for assembling his

Neighbours and Friends in his own House, against those who threaten to do him any violence therein, because a Man's House is as his Castle.[8]

Sect. 9. V. That no Wearing of Arms is within the Meaning of this Statute, unless it be accompanied with such Circumstances as are apt to terrify the People; from whence it seems clearly to follow, That Persons of Quality are in no Danger of offending against this Statute by wearing common Weapons, or having their usual Number of Attendants with them, for their Ornament or Defence, in such Places, and upon such Occasions, in which it is the common Fashion to make use of them, without causing the least Suspicion of an Intention to commit any Act of Violence or Disturbance of the Peace. And from the same Ground it also follows, That Persons armed with privy Coats of Mail, to the Intent to defend themselves against their Adversaries, are not within the Meaning of this Statute, because they do nothing in terrorem populi.[9]

Sect. 10. VI. That no Person is within the Intention of the said Statute, who arms himself to suppress dangerous Rioters, Rebels, or Enemies, and endeavours to suppress or resist such Disturbers of the Peace or Quiet of the Realm; for Persons who so arm themselves, seem to be exempted out of the general Words of the said Statute, by that Part of the Exception in the Beginning thereof, which seems to allow all Persons to arm themselves upon a Cry made for Arms to keep the Peace, in such Places where such Acts happen.[10]

Sect. 11. As to the second Point, viz. How far an Affray may be suppressed by a private Person, it seems agreed, That any one who sees others fighting, may lawfully part them, and also stay them till the Heat be over, and then deliver them to the Constable, who may carry them before a Justice of Peace, in order to their finding Sureties for the Peace: Also it is said, That any private Person may stop those whom he shall see coming to join either Party; and from hence it seems clearly to follow, That if a Man receive a Hurt from either Party in thus endeavouring to preserve the Peace, he shall have his Remedy by an Action against him; also upon the same Ground it seems equally reasonable, That if he unavoidably happen to hurt either Party, in thus doing what the Law both allows and commends, he may well justify it, inasmuch as he is no way in Fault; and the Damage done to the other, was occasioned by a laudable Intention to do him a Kindness.[11]

Sect. 12. However it seems clear, That if either Party be dangerously wounded in such an Affray, and a Stander-by, endeavouring to arrest the other, be not able to take him without hurting, or even wounding him, yet he is no way liable to be punished for the same, inasmuch as he is bound, under Pain of Fine and Imprisonment, to arrest such an Offender, and either detain him till it appear whether the Party will live or die, or carry him before a Justice of Peace, by whom he either is to be bailed or committed, &c.[12]

Sect. 13. As to the third Point, viz. How far an Affray may be suppressed by a Constable; it seems agreed, That a Constable is not only impower'd, as all private persons are, to part an Affray which happens in his Presence, but is also bound at his Peril to use his best Endeavours to this Purpose, and not only to do his utmost himself, but also to demand the Assistance of others, which if they refuse to give him, they are punishable with Fine and Imprisonment.[13]

Sect. 14. And it said, That if a Constable see Persons either actually engaged in an Affray, as by Striking, or offering to strike or drawing their Weapons, &c. or upon the very Point of entering upon an Affray, as where one shall threaten to kill, wound, or beat another, he may either carry the Offender before a Justice of the Peace, to the end that such Justice may compel him to find Sureties for the Peace, &c. or he may imprison him of his own Authority for a reasonable Time, till the Heat shall be over, and also afterwards detain him till he find such Surety by Obligation: But it seems, That he has no Power to imprison such an Offender in any other Manner, or for any other Purpose; for he cannot justify the committing an Affrayed to Gaol till he shall be punished for his Offence: And it is said, That he ought not to lay Hands on those, who barely contend with hot Words, without any Threats of personal Hurt, and that all which he can do in such a Case, is to command them under Pain of Imprisonment to avoid Fighting.[14]

Sect. 15. But he is so far intrusted with a Power over all actual Affrays, that though he himself is a Sufferer by them, and therefore liable to be objected against, as likely to be partial in his own Cause, yet he may suppress them; and therefore, if an Assault be made upon him, he may not only defend himself, but also imprison the Offender, in the same Manner as if he were no way a Party.[15]

Sect. 16. And if an Affray be in a House, the Constable may break open the Doors to preserve the Peace, and if Affrayers fly to a House and he follow with fresh Suit, he may break open the Doors to take them.[16]

Sect. 17. But it is said, That a Constable hath no Power to arrest Man for an Affray done out of his own View, without a Warrant from a Justice of Peace, unless a Felony were done or likely to be done; for it is the proper Business of a Constable to preserve the Peace, not to punish the Breach of it; nor does it follow from his having Power to compel those to find Sureties who break the Peace in his Presence, that he has the same Power over those who break it in his Absence, inasmuch as in such Case it is most proper to be done by those who may examine the whole Circumstances of the Matter upon Oath, which a Constable cannot do; yet is it said, That he may carry those before a Justice of Peace, who were arrested by such as were present at an Affray, and delivered by them into his Hands.[17]

Sect. 18. As to the fourth Point, viz. In what Manner an Affray may be suppressed by a Justice of Peace; there is no doubt, but that he may and must do all such Things to that Purpose, which a private Man or Constable are either enabled, or required by the Law to do: But it is said, That he cannot without a Warrant authorize the Arrest of any Person for an Affray out of his View; yet it seems clear, that in such Case he may make his Warrant to bring the Offender before him, in order to compel him to find Sureties for the Peace.[18]

Sect. 19. Also it seems, That a Justice of Peace has a greater Power over one who has dangerously wounded another in an Affray, than either a private Person or a Constable, for there does not seem to be any good Authority, that these have any Power at all to take Sureties of such an Offender; but it seems certain, That a Justice of the Peace has a discretionary Power either to commit him, or to bail him, till the Year and Day be past; but it said, that he ought to be very cautious how he takes Bail, if the Wound be dangerous; for that if the Party die, and the Offender appear not, he is in Danger of being severely fined, if he shall appear upon the whole Circumstances of the Case to have been too favourable.[19]

Sect. 20. As to the fifth Point, viz. In what Manner the several Kinds of Affrays are to be punished; it sufficiently appears from the foregoing Part of this Chapter, how such Affrays as are accompanied with Force and Arms, are to be dealt with upon the Statute of Northampton; and therefore I shall only examine in this Place, what Penalties other Affrays are liable unto; as to which it is to be observed, That all Affrays in general are punished by Fine and Imprisonment, the Measure of which is to be regulated by the Discretion of the Judges according to the Circumstances of the Case, which very much vary the Nature of this Crime, and in some Cases make it so inconsiderable as scarce to deserve to be taken Notice of;

and in others make it an Offence of a very heinous Nature, as in the following Instances:[20]

1. In Respect of the dangerous Tendency thereof.
2. In Respect of the Persons against whom it is committed.
3. In Respect of the Place wherein it happens.

Sect. 21. And first, an Affray may receive an Aggravation from the dangerous Tendency thereof, as where Persons coolly and deliberately engage in a Duel, which cannot but be attended with the apparent Danger of Murder, and is not only an open Defiance of the Law, but carries with it a direct Contempt of the Justice of the Nation, as putting Men under a Necessity of righting themselves; upon which Considerations, Persons convicted of barely sending a Challenge, have been adjudged to pay a Fine of one hundred Pounds, and to be imprisoned for one Month without Bail, and also to make a publick Acknowledgment of their Offence, and to be bound to their good Behaviour.[21]

Sect. 22. Secondly, An Affray may receive another Aggravation from the Persons against whom it is committed; as where the Officers of Justice are violently disturbed in the due Execution of their Office, as by the Rescous of a Person legally arrested, or the bare Attempt to make such a Rescous; for all the ministers of the Law are under its more immediate Protection.

Sect. 23. Thirdly, An Affray may receive a farther Aggravation from the Place wherein it is committed, and upon this Respect all Affrays in the King’s Court are so severely punished, as hath been shewn already in Chapter 21, and upon the same Account also, all Affrays in a Church or Churchyard, have been always esteemed very heinous Offences, as being great Indignities to the Divine Majesty, to whose Worship and Service such Places are immediately dedicated. And upon this Consideration, all irreverent Behaviour in these Places hath been esteemed so criminal by the Makers of our Laws, that they have not only severely punished such Disturbances in them which are punishable where-ever they happen, as all actual Affrays, &c. but also such, which if they happen elsewhere, are not punishable at all; as bare quarrelsome Words, and even such which would be commendable if done in another Place; as Arrests by Virtue of legal Process: But for the better Understanding hereof, I shall consider the several Statutes made for this Purpose.[22]

Sect. 24. And first, it is enacted by 5 and 6 Ed. 6. 4. That if any Person whatsoever, shall by Words only quarrel, chide, or brawl, in any Church or Churchyard, that then it shall be lawful unto the Ordinary of the Place where the same Offence shall be done, and proved by two lawful Witnesses, to suspend every Person so offending; that is to say, if he be a Layman, ab ingressu Ecclesiæ, and if he be a Clerk, from the Ministration of his Office, for so long Time as the some ordinary shall by his Discretion think meet and convenient, according to the Fault.

Sect. 25. And it is further enacted by the said Statute, That if any Person shall smite or lay any violent Hands upon any other, either in any Church or Churchyard; that then, ipso Facto, every Person so offending shall be deemed excommunicate, and be excluded from the Fellowship and Company of Christ's Congregation.

Sect. 26. And it is also further enacted by the said Statute, That if any Person shall maliciously strike any Person with any Weapon in any Church or Churchyard, or shall draw any Weapon in any Church or Churchyard, to the Intent to strike another with the same Weapon; that then every Person so offending, and thereof being convicted by Verdict of twelve Men, or by his own Confession, or by two lawful Witnesses, before the Justices of Assize, Justices of Oyer and Terminer, or Justices of Peace in their Sessions, by Force of this Act, shall be adjudged by the same Justices before whom such Person shall be convicted, to have one of his Ears cut off, &c. and besides that every such Person to be, and stand ipso Facto excommunicated, as aforesaid.

And in the Exposition hereof it hath been holden:

Sect. 27. I. That notwithstanding the Words of the Statute be expressed, That he who smites another in the Church, &c. shall, ipso Facto, be deemed excommunicate; yet there ought either to be a precedent Conviction at Law, which must be transmitted to the Ordinary, or else the Excommunication must be declared in the Spiritual Court upon a proper Proof of the Offence there; for it is implied in every Penal Law, that no one shall incur the Penalty thereof, till he be found guilty upon a lawful Trial; also it must be intended in the Construction of this Statute, that the Excommunication ought to appear Judicially, for otherwise there could be no Absolution.[23]

Sect. 28. II. That he who strikes another in a Church, &c. can no way excuse himself, by shewing that the other assaulted him.[24]

Sect. 29. III. That Churchwardens, or perhaps private Persons, who whip Boys for playing in the Church, or pull off the Hats of those who obstinately refuse to take them off themselves, or gently lay their Hands on those who disturb the Performance of any Part of divine Service, and turn them out of the Church, are not within the Meaning of the Statute.[25]

Sect. 30. Also it is enacted by 1 Ma. Sess. 2. cap. 3. That if any Person or Persons, of their own Power and Authority, shall willingly and of Purpose by open and overt Word, Fact, Act, or Deed, maliciously or contemptuously molest, let, disturb, vex or trouble, or by any other unlawful Ways and Means, disquiet, or misuse, any Preacher who shall be licensed, allowed, or authorized to preach by the Queen's Highness, or by any Archbishop, or Bishop of this Realm, or by any other lawful Ordinary, or by any of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, or otherwise lawfully authorized or charged, by Reason of his or their Care, Benefice, or other Spiritual Promotion or Charge, in any of his, or their open Sermon, &c. or if any Person or Persons shall maliciously, willingly, or of purpose, molest, let, disturb, vex, disquiet, or otherwise trouble any Parson, Vicar, Parish-Priest, or Curate, or any lawful Priest, preparing, saying, doing, singing, ministring or celebrating the Mass, or other such divine Service, Sacraments, or Sacramentals, as was most commonly frequented and used in the last Year of the Reign of the late Sovereign Lord King Henry the Eighth, or that at any Time hereafter should be allowed, set forth, or authorized by the Queen's Majesty; or if any Person or Persons shall unlawfully, contemptuously, or maliciously, of their own Power or Authority, pull down, deface, spoil, or otherwise break any Altar or Altars, or any Crucifix, or Cross, in any Church, Chapel, or Churchyard; every such Offender and Offenders, his or their Aiders, Procurers or Abettors, may be apprehended by any Constable, or Churchwarden of the Place where such Offence shall be committed, or by any other Officer or Person then being present at the Time of the said Offence; and being so apprehended shall be brought before some Justice of Peace by whom they shall be committed forthwith, and within six Days the Matter shall be examined by the same, together with same other Justices; and on Proof by two Witnesses, or Confession, the Offender shall be committed for three Months, and also till the next Quarter Sessions, where, if they repent, they shall be discharged upon giving Sureties for their good Behaviour for a Year, and if they do not repent they shall be committed till they do.

Sect. 31. It hath been resolved, That the Disturbance of a Minister in saying the present Common Prayer is within this Statute; for the express Mention of such Divine Service, as should afterwards be authorized by Queen Mary, doth implicitly include such also as should be authorized by her Successors; for since the King never dies, a Prerogative given generally to one, goes of Course to others.[26]

Sect. 32. Also it is enacted by 1 Will. and Mar. 18. Par. 19. That if any Person shall willingly and of Purpose, maliciously or contemptuously come into any Cathedral or Parish Church, Chapel, or other Congregation permitted by the said Act, and disquiet or disturb the same, or misuse any Preacher or Teacher, such Persons, upon Proof before any Justice of Peace, by two or more sufficient Witnesses, shall find two Sureties to be bound by Recognizance in the penal Sum of fifty Pounds, and on Default of such Sureties shall be committed to Prison, there to remain till the next General or Quarter Sessions, and upon Conviction of the said Offence at the said General or Quarter Sessions, shall suffer the Pain and Penalty of twenty Pounds.

5. The fifth and last auxiliary right of the subject, that I shall at present mention, is that of having arms for their defence, suitable to their condition and degree, and such as are allowed by law. Which is also declared by the same statute 1 W. & M. st. 2 c. 2 and is indeed a public allowance, under due restrictions, of the natural right of resistance and self-preservation, when the sanctions of society and laws are found insufficient to restrain the violence of oppression.

4.3.2.1Sir John Knight's Case, 1686

An information was exhibited against him by the Attorney General, upon the statute of 2 Edw. 3, c. 3, which prohibits "all persons from coming with force and arms before the King's Justices, &c., and from going or riding armed in affray of peace, on pain to forfeit his armour, and suffer imprisonment at the King's pleasure." This statute is confirmed by that of 20 Rich. 2, c. 1, with an addition of a further punishment, which is to make a fine to the King.

The information sets forth, that the defendant did walk about the streets armed with guns, and that he went into the church of St. Michael, in Bristol, in the time of divine service, with a gun, to terrify the King's subjects, contra formam statuti.

This case was tried at the Bar, and the defendant was acquitted.

The Chief Justice said, that the meaning of the statute of 2 Edw. 3, c. 3, was to punish people who go armed to terrify the King's subjects. It is likewise a great offence at the common law, as if the King were not able or willing to protect his subjects; and therefore this Act is but an affirmance of that law; and it having appointed a penalty, this Court can inflict no other punishment than what is therein directed.

> ORDERED, That it be referred to a committee of three, to prepare and report a proper arrangement of, and introduction to the articles of amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as agreed to by the House; and that Mr. Benson, Mr. Sherman, and Mr. Sedgwick be of the said committee.

1 J. But on a Hab. Corp. it was held no Offence for a Sheriff or his Ministers in Execution of their Office to carry such a Hand-Gun, and that it was lawful, and that a Dagg was a Hand Gun within this Statute Cro. 2 The Defendant, not having 100 l. a Year, did shoot in a Gun in Feb. and in March following was carried before a J. of P. and by him convicted of this Offence. It was moved, to quash this Conviction, because it was before a single Justice, who had not Power by the Statute to proceed in a Summary Way, unless the Party is brought before him Instanter, upon View of the Offence committed, which was not done in this Case, and therefore was ordered to shew cause why it should not be quash'd; 4 Mod. 147, 148. 3 An Indictment will lie on this Statute before the Sessions, tho' this hath been formerly doubted; because, tho' the Justices have Power by the general Words of their Commission of punish Offences against the Peace, yet shooting is not such an Offence; For 'tis only a Defect of the Qualification of the person who shoots in a Gun. Dalton's Just. cap. 47. pag. 143.

4 1 Saund. 263. S. C. says, that it was quash'd for the Exception, that the Conviction was said to be Coram T. B. & G. B. Ar. duobus Justice. Domini Regis ad Pacem in Cont. praedicto conservand. But that the Word * (Assign) was omitted. For it ought to have been Conservand. Assignatis. And so it does not appear, whether the said Justices were assigned to keep the Peace or not. ——— The Reporter adds a Nota, that the Conviction was before two Justices of P. but the Statute gives Authority to one Justice alone, being the next Justice of the County where the Offence is committed, to commit the Offender for the Forfeiture, but that here it does not appear whether either of the said 2 Justices was the next Justice or not, which was another Exception intended to be moved, but the Conviction being quash'd for the Exception aforesaid, this Exception was not moved, and that he was of Counsel with Defendant. ——— * Vent. 39. Vent. 33. Anon, but S. C. reports, that as to the Words (upon due Examination and Proof before a Justice of P.) it was resolved, that that was not intended by a Jury but by Witnesses, and that no Writ of Error lies upon such Conviction. And that an Exception was taken, because it was Coram J. S. Justice of the Peace, without adding nec' non ad diversas Felonias Transgressiones, &c. audiend. assignat, and that the Court agreed it ought so to be in Returns upon Certioraries to remove Indictments taken at Session, but otherwise of Convictions of this Nature; For it is known to the Court, that the Statute gives them Authority in this Case. 6 This Statute is repealed by 6 & 7 W. 3. cap. 13.

7 Show. 339. S. C. but reports the Word of the Judgment to have been forisfaceret, instead of forisfaciat.

8 Show. 339. S. C. and says, that the Judgment was reversed.—But according to 4 Mod. 51. S. C. the Reasons of the Reversal were given by Holt Ch. J. because the Conviction was before Justices of the Peace, whereas, upon this Act of 2 and 3 E. 6. 14. the Peace is in no wise concerned; Because the Offence thereby created is for want of due Qualification of the Person to shoot, which is not an Offence against the Peace. And this cannot be an Indictment upon the Statute of 33 H. 8. because they do not set forth the length of the Gun, which by that Law ought to be a Yard long; and therefore the general Conclusion, Contra formam Statuti, will not help it; and for these Reasons the Indictment was quash'd. But it was agreed, that the Party might be indicted for this Offence before the Justices of Oyer and Terminer, but not before Justices of Peace for want of Jurisdiction.

5.2DISCUSSION OF DRAFTS AND PROPOSALS

5.2.1.1June 8, 1789[2]

5.2.1.2August 17, 1789

5.2.1.2.a The house went into a committee of the whole on the subject of amendments.

The 4th clause of the 4th proposition was taken as follows: “No soldier shall in time of peace, be quartered in any house, without the consent of the owner, nor in time of war but in a manner to be prescribed by law.”

Mr. Sumter

Hoped soldiers would never be quartered on the inhabitants, either in time of peace or war, without the consent of the owner: It was a burthen, and very oppressive, even in cases where the owner gave his consent; but where this was wanting, it would be a hardship indeed! Their property would lie at the mercy of men irritated by a refusal, and well disposed to destroy the peace of the family.

He moved to strike out all the words from the clause but “No soldier shall be quartered in any house without the consent of the owner.”

Mr. Sherman

Observed that it was absolutely necessary that marching troops should have quarters, whether in time of peace or war, and that it ought not to be put in the power of an individual to obstruct the public service; if quarters were not be obtained in public barracks, they must be procured elsewhere. In England, where they paid considerable attention to private rights, they billeted the troops upon the keepers of public houses also, with the consent of the magistracy. Mr. Sumter’s motion being put, was lost by a majority of sixteen.

Mr. Gerry

Moved to insert between “but” and “in a manner” the words “by a civil magistrate,” observing that there was no part of the Union but what they could have access to such authority.

Mr. Hartley

Said those things ought to be entrusted to the legislature; that cases might arise where the public safety would be endangered by putting it in the power of one person to keep a division of troops standing in the inclemency of the weather for many hours, therefore he was against inserting the words.

Mr. Gerry said either his amendment was essential, or the whole clause was unnecessary.

On putting the question 13 rose in favor of the motion, 35 against it, and then the clause was carried on as reported.

Congressional Register, August 17, 1789, vol. 2, pp. 219, 223–24.

5.2.1.2.b Seventh amendment—"No soldier shall in time of peace be quartered in any house without the consent of the owner, nor in time of war, but in a manner to be prescribed by law."

Mr. Sumter moved to strike out the words "in time of peace" and also all the last words of the paragraph from the word "owner." This was negatived.

Mr. Gerry then moved to insert between the words "but" and "in a manner," the words "by a civil magistrate"—Negatived.

The amendment was agreed to.

Daily Advertiser, August 18, 1789, p. 2, col. 4.

5.2.1.2.c Seventh amendment—"No soldier shall in time of peace be quartered in any house without the consent of the owner, nor in time of war, but in a manner to be prescribed by law."

Mr. Sumter moved to strike out the words "in time of peace" and also all the last words of the paragraph from the word "owner." This was negatived.

Mr. Gerry then moved to insert between the words "but" and "in a manner," the words "by a civil magistrate." Negatived.

The amendment was agreed to.

New-York Daily Gazette, August 19, 1789, p. 802, cols. 3–4.

5.2.1.2.d 7th Amendment. "No soldier shall in time of peace be quartered in any house without the consent of the owner, nor in time of war, but in a manner to be prescribed by law."

Mr. Sumter moved to strike out the words "in time of peace" and also the last words of the paragraph from the word "owner."

Mr. Sherman said he thought this was going too far; occasion might arise in which it would be extremely injurious to put it in the power of any man to obstruct the public service: He adverted to the British regulations in this case, of quartering soldiers in public houses. This motion was negatived.

Mr. Gerry said, that he conceived the article might be so altered as to relieve the minds of the citizens of the United States. It is said, government will take care of the rights of the people; but these amendments are designed to prevent the arbitrary exercise of power. He then moved to insert between the words “but” and “in a manner,” the words by a civil magistrate. Negatived.

The amendment was agreed to.

Gazette of the U.S., August 22, 1789, p. 249, col. 3.

5.2.2STATE CONVENTIONS

5.2.2.1Maryland, April 1788

I am opposed to the new Government;—

3. Because Congress will have a right to quarter soldiers in our private houses, not only in time of war, but also in time of peace. Bill of Rights 28.

Samuel Chase, Storing, vol. 5, pp. 85–86.

5.2.2.2Virginia, June 16, 1788

Mr. HENRY. . . .

. . . One of our first complaints, under the former government, was the quartering of troops upon us. This was one of the principal reasons for dissolving the connection with Great Britain. Here we may have troops in time of peace. They may be billeted in any manner—to tyrannize, oppress, and crush us.

Mr. MADISON. . . .

He says that one ground of complaint, at the beginning of the revolution, was, that a standing army was quartered upon us. This was not the whole complaint. We complained because it was done without the local authority of this country—without the consent of the people of America.

Elliot, vol. 3, p. 411–13.

5.2.4.1The Federal Farmer, No. 6, December 25, 1787

The following, I think, will be allowed to be unalienable or fundamental rights in the United States:—

No man, demeaning himself peaceably, shall be molested on account of his religion or mode or [sic] worship—The people have a right to hold and enjoy their property according to known standing laws, and which cannot be taken from them without their consent, or the consent of their representatives; and whenever taken in the pressing urgencies of government, they are to receive a reasonable compensation for it—Individual security consists in having free recourse to the laws—The people are subject to no laws or taxes not assented to by their representatives constitutionally assembled—They are at all times intitled to the benefits of the writ of habeas corpus, the trial by jury in criminal and civil causes—They have a right, when charged, to a speedy trial in the vicinage; to be heard by themselves or counsel, not to be compelled to furnish evidence against themselves, to have witnesses face to face, and to confront their adversaries before the judge—No man is held to answer a crime charged upon him till it be substantially described to him; and he is subject to no unreasonable searches or seizures of his person, papers or effects—The people have a right to assemble in an orderly manner, and petition the government for a redress of wrongs—The freedom of the press ought not to be restrained—No emoluments, except for actual service—No hereditary honors, or orders of nobility, ought to be allowed—The military ought to be subordinate to the civil authority, and no soldier be quartered on the citizens without their consent—The militia ought always to be armed and disciplined, and the usual defence of the country—The supreme power is in the people, and power delegated ought to return to them at stated periods, and frequently—The legislative, executive, and judicial powers, ought always to be kept distinct—others perhaps might be added.

5.2.4.2The Federal Farmer, No. 16, January 20, 1788

The constitution will give congress general powers to raise and support armies. General powers carry with them incidental ones, and the means necessary to the end. In the exercise of these powers, is there any provision in the constitution to prevent the quartering of soldiers on the inhabitants?

you will answer, there is not. This may sometimes be deemed a necessary measure in the support of armies; on what principle can the people claim the right to be exempt from this burden? They will urge, perhaps, the practice of the country, and the provisions made in some of the state constitutions—they will be answered, that their claim thus to be exempt is not founded in nature, but only in custom and opinion, or at best, in stipulations in some of the state constitutions, which are local, and inferior in their operation, and can have no controul over the general government—that they had adopted a federal constitution—had noticed several rights, but had been totally silent about this exemption—that they had given general powers relative to the subject, which, in their operation, regularly destroyed the claim. Though it is not to be presumed, that we are in immediate danger from this quarter, yet it is fit and proper to establish, beyond dispute, those rights which are particularly valuable to individuals, and essential to the permanency and duration of free government. An excellent writer observes, that the English, always in possession of their freedom, are frequently unmindful of the value of it: we, at this period, do not seem to be so well off, having, in some instances abused ours; many of us are quite disposed to barter it away for what we call energy, coercion, and some other terms we use as vaguely as that of liberty—There is often as great a rage for change and novelty in politics, as in amusements and fashions.

5.3.1.1Jacob, 1750

Soldiers. The Military State of England includes the Soldiery by Land and Sea; and it is against our ancient Law to keep up any Army of Soldiers in the Time of Peace. In Time of War particular Orders are made for the Order and Discipline of Officers and Soldiers, which are to be consulted upon all Emergencies; and therefore we are not to expect many standing and perpetual Laws on that Account. Wood's Inst. 45. The chief Statutes relating to the Army, and their Contents, are as follow, viz.. . . By 31 Car. 2. c. 1. no Soldiers shall be quartered on any Persons without their Consent; and Inhabitants of Places may refuse to quarter any Soldier, notwithstanding any Order whatsoever. . . . Officers receiving Subsistence Money, are to give Notice to Innkeepers, and pay their Accounts; and Accounts shall be made up between the Paymaster General and Colonels of Regiments, &c. Constables shall quarter Soldiers in Inns, Alehouses, Victualling-houses, and those selling Brandy, &c. by Retail, (Distillers excepted) and Officers taking Money for excusing Quarterage, shall be cashiered: Justices of Peace are to issue Warrants to Constables to provide Carriages for Baggage, where Soldiers are on the March, and Officers shall pay 1 s. per Mile for Waggons, and 9 d. for Carts; and forcing Horses, &c. from the Owners, is liable to a Forfeiture of 5 l. . . . No Justice of Peace having a military Office, shall be concerned in Quartering of Soldiers in the Company, &c. under his Command: And Victuallers refusing Soldiers Quartered, or Constables receiving Reward to excuse them, are to forfeit not above 5 l. nor under 4 s. 3 Geo. 2. c. 2. By subsequent Acts, no Justice, Constable, &c. may direct more Billets for Quartering Soldiers than there are effective Men: And if any Soldier be Quartered on a private House, without the Owner's Consent, he may have his Remedy at Law; and Officers or Constables that quarter Wives, Children, or Maid Servants of any Officer or Soldier, in such Manner: the Officer shall be cashiered, and Constable forfeit 20 s. Likewise where Persons are grieved in Billeting Soldiers, by Constables, they may complain to the Justices of Peace, who shall order so many to be removed as they see Cause. 13 Geo. 2. c. 10. It is also enacted, when Orders are issued to Quarter Soldiers in Westminster, the High Constable there shall deliver his Precepts to the Petty Constables, &c. to Billet them properly in their Districts, who must give, on Oath to the Justices in Sessions, Lists of the Houses obliged to receive the Officers and Soldiers; also the Number quartered on each House, &c. and if the Lists are defective, shall forfeit 5 l. Officers or Soldiers, if they destroy Game on their Marches, or Poultry or Fish, being convicted before a Justice, are to forfeit 5 l. an Officer, and 20 s. a Soldier. Ibid.

5.3.1.2Bacon, 1759

Of the quartering of Soldiers.

By the 30 G. 2. c. 6. par. 22. After reciting, that whereas by the Petition of Right, in the third Year of King Charles the First, it is enacted and declared, that the People of this Land are not by the Laws to be burthened with the sojourning of Soldiers against their Wills; and by a Clause in an Act of Parliament, made in the one and thirtieth Year of the Reign of King Charles the Second, it is declared and enacted, that no Officer, Civil or Military, nor other Person whatsoever, should from thenceforth presume to place, quarter or billet, any Soldier or Soldiers upon any Subject or Inhabitant of this Realm, of any Degree, Qualify or Profession whatsoever, without his Consent; and that it shall and may be lawful for any Subject, Sojourner or Inhabitant, to refuse to quarter any Soldier or Soldiers, notwithstanding any Demand or Warrant, or Billeting whatsoever; But forasmuch as at this Time, and during the Continuance of this Act, there is and may be Occasion for the marching and quartering of Regiments, Troops and Companies, in several Parts of this Kingdom, it is enacted, "that for and during the Continuance of this Act, and no longer, it shall and may be lawful to and for the Constables, Tythingmen, Headboroughs, and other chief Officers and Magistrates of Cities, Towns and Villages, and other Places, within England, Wales, and the Town of Berwick upon Tweed; and in their Default or Absence, for any one Justice of the Peace inhabiting in or near any such City, Town, Village or Place, and for no others; and such Constables, and other chief Magistrates as aforesaid, are hereby required to quarter and billet the Officers and Soldiers, in his Majesty's Service, in Inns, Livery-Stables, Alehouses, Victualling Houses, and the Houses of Sellers of Wine by Retale, to be drank in their own Houses or Places thereunto belonging, and all Houses of Persons selling Brandy, Strong Waters, Cyder or Metheglin, by Retale, to be drank in Houses, other than and except the House or Houses of any Distillers, who keep Houses or Places of distilling Brandy or Strong Waters, and the House of any Shopkeeper, whose principal Dealings shall be more in other Goods and Merchandizes, than in Brandy or Strong Waters, so as such Distillers or Shopkeepers do not permit or suffer tippling in his or their Houses, and in no other, and in no private House whatsoever; nor shall any more Billets at any Time be ordered, than there are effective Soldiers present to be quartered."[1]

By the same Par. it is enacted, "That if any Constable, Tythingman, or such like Officer, or Magistrate, as aforesaid, shall presume to quarter or billet any Officer or Soldier in any private House, without the Consent of the Owner or Occupier, in such Case, such Owner or Occupier shall have his or their Remedy at Law, against such Magistrate or Officer, for the Damage that such Owner or Occupier shall thereby sustain."[2]

In an Action of Trespass against a Constable for quartering a Dragoon upon the Plaintiff, it was found by a special Verdict, that the Plaintiff kept a House at Epsom, and let Lodgings to such as came there for the Benefit of the Air and Waters, that he dressed Meat for his Lodgers at four Pence per Joint, sold them Small Beer at two Pence per Mugg, and also found them Stable Room, Hay, and other Things for Horses, at such and such Rates. Judgment was in this Case for the Plaintiff; and by Holt, Ch. J. this Case is so plain that there is no Occasion for giving Reasons.[3]

By the 30 G. 2. c. 6. par. 22. it is enacted, "That if any military Officer shall take upon him to quarter Soldiers otherwise than is limited and allowed by this Act, or shall use or offer any Menace or Compulsion to or upon any Mayors, Constables, or civil Officers, before mentioned, tending to deter and discourage any of them from performing any Part of their Duty hereby required, or appointed, such military Officer shall, for every such Offence, being thereof convicted, before any two or more of the next Justices of the Peace of the County, by the Oath of two credible Witnesses, be deemed and taken to be ipso facto cashiered, and shall be utterly disabled to have or hold any military Employment within this Kingdom, or in his Majesty's Service; provided the said Conviction be affirmed at the next Quarter-Sessions of the Peace of the said County, and a Certificate thereof be transmitted to the Judge Advocate, who is hereby required to certify the same to the next Court-martial."[4]

By par. 46. it is enacted, "That if any Officer, military or civil, by this Act authorized to quarter Soldiers in any Houses hereby appointed for that Purpose, shall at any Time, during the Continuance of this Act, quarter the Wives, Children, or Men or Maid Servants, of any Officer or Soldier in any such Houses, against the Consent of the Owners, the Party offending, if an Officer of the Army, shall upon Complaint and Proof thereof made to the Commander in chief of the Army, or Judge Advocate, be ipso facto cashiered; and if a Constable, Tythingman, or other civil Officer, he shall forfeit to the Party aggrieved twenty Shillings, upon Complaint and Proof made thereof to the next Justice of Peace, to be levied by Warrant of such Justice, by Distress and Sale of his Goods."[5]

By par. 22. it is enacted, "That in case any Person shall find himself aggrieved, in that such Constable, Tythingman or Headborough, chief Officer or Magistrate, such chief Officer or Magistrate not being a Justice of the Peace, has quartered or billeted in his House a greater Number of Soldiers than he ought to bear in Proportion to his Neighbours, and shall complain thereof to one or more Justice or Justices of the Peace of the Division, City or Liberty, where such Soldiers are quartered; or in case such chief Officer or Magistrate shall be a Justice of the Peace, then on Complaint made to two or more Justices of the Peace of such Division, City or Liberty, such Justices respectively shall have, and have hereby, Power to relieve such Person, by ordering such and so many of the Soldiers to be removed, and quartered upon such other Person or Persons, as they shall see Cause; and such other Person or Persons shall be obliged to receive such Soldiers accordingly."[6]

By par. 23. it is enacted, "That no Justice or Justices of the Peace, having or executing any military Office or Commission in that Part of Great Britain called England, shall or may, during the Continuance of this Act, directly or indirectly be concerned in the quartering, billeting or appointing any Quarters for, any Soldier or Soldiers in the Regiment, Troop or Company, under the immediate Command or Commands of such Justice or Justices, according to the Disposition made for quartering of any Soldier or Soldiers by Virtue of this Act; but that all Warrants, Acts, Matters or Things, executed or appointed by such Justice or Justices of the Peace, for or concerning the same, shall be void, any Thing in this Act to the contrary notwithstanding."[7]

By par. 26. it is enacted, "That if any Officer shall take, or cause to be taken, or knowingly suffer to be taken, any Money of any Person for excusing the quartering of Officers or Soldiers, or any of them, in any House allowed by this Act, every such Officer shall be cashiered, and be incapable of serving in any military Employment whatsoever."[8]

By par. 28. After reciting, that some Doubts have arisen, whether commanding Officers of any Regiment, Troop or Company, may exchange any Men or Horses quartered in any Town or Place, with another Man or Horse quartered in the same Town or Place, for the Benefit of the Service, it is enacted, "that such exchange as above mentioned may be made by such commanding Officers respectively, provided the Number of Men and Horses do not exceed the Number at that Time billeted on such House or Houses; and the Constables, Tythingmen, Headboroughs, and other chief Officers and Magistrates of the Cities, Towns and Villages, or other Places, where any Regiment, Troop or Company, shall be quartered, are hereby required to billet such Men and Horses hereby exchanged accordingly."[9]

By par. 66, it is enacted, "That if any High Constable, Constable, Bedel, or other Officer or Person whatsoever, who, by Virtue or Colour of this Act, shall quarter or billet, or be employed in quartering or billetting, any Officers or Soldiers, shall neglect or refuse, for the Space of two Hours, to quarter or billet such Officers or Soldiers, when thereunto required, in such Manner as is by this Act directed, provided sufficient Notice be given before the Arrival of such Troops; or shall receive, demand, contract, or agree for any Sum or Sums of Money, or any Reward whatsoever, for or on Account of excusing, or in order to excuse, any Person or Persons whatsoever from quartering or receiving into his, her or their, House or Houses, any such Officer or Soldier, and shall be thereof convicted, before any one or more Justice or Justices of Peace of the County, City or Liberty, within which such Offence shall be committed, either by his own Confession, or by the Oath of one or more credible Witness or Witnesses, which Oath the said Justice or Justices is and are hereby impowered to administer, every such High Constable, Constable, Bedel, or other Officer or Person so offending, shall forfeit, for every such Offence, the Sum of five Pounds, or any Sum of Money not exceeding five Pounds, nor less than forty Shillings, as the said Justice or Justices, before whom the Matter shall be heard, shall in his or their Discretion think fit, to be levied by Distress and Sale of the Goods of the Person offending, by Warrant under the Hand and Seal, or Hands and Seals, of such Justice or Justices, before whom such Offender shall be convicted, or one or more of them, to be directed to any other Constable within the County, City or Liberty, or to any of the Overseers of the Poor of the Parish, where the Offender shall dwell; the said Sum of five Pounds, or the said Sum not exceeding five Pounds, nor less than forty Shillings, when levied, to be paid to the Overseer of the Poor of the Parish wherein the Offence shall be committed, or to some one of them, for the Use of the Poor of the said Parish."[10]

By par. 67. it is enacted, "That it shall and may be lawful to and for any one or more Justice or Justices of the Peace, within their respective Counties, Cities or Liberties, by Warrant or Order under his or their Hand and Seal, or Hands and Seals, at any Time or Times, during the Continuance of this Act, to require and Command any High Constable, Constable, Bedel, or other Officer, who shall quarter or billet any Soldiers in pursuance of this Act, to give an Account in Writing, unto the said Justice or Justices requiring the same, of the Number of Officers or Soldiers who shall be quartered or billeted by them, and also the Names of the Housekeepers or Persons upon whom every such Officer or Soldier shall be quartered or billeted, together with an Account of the Street or Place where every such Housekeeper dwells, and the Signs, if any, belonging to their Houses; to the End it may appear, to the said Justice or Justices, where such Officers and Soldiers are quartered and billeted, and that he or they may be thereby the better enabled to prevent, or punish, all Abuses in the quartering or billeting of them."[11]

By par. 24. it is enacted, "That the Officers and Soldiers, so quartered and billeted as aforesaid, shall be received and furnished with Diet and Small Beer by the Owners of the Inns, Livery Stables, Alehouses, Victualling-houses, and other Houses in which they are allowed to be quartered and billeted by this Act, paying and allowing for the same the several Rates, herein after mentioned to be payable, out of the Subsistence Money for Diet and Small Beer."[12]

But by par. 25. it is provided, "That in case any Innholder, or other Person, on whom any Non-commission Officers, or Soldiers, shall be quartered by Virtue of this Act, except on a March, or employed in recruiting, and likewise except the Recruits by them raised, for the Space of seven Days at most, for such Non-commission Officers and Soldiers who are recruiting, and Recruits by them raised, shall be desirous to furnish such Non-commission Officers or Soldiers with Candles, Vinegar and Salt, and with either Small Beer or Cyder, not exceeding five Pints for each Man per Diem, gratis, and allow to such Non-commission Officers or Soldiers the Use of Fire, and the necessary Utensils for dressing and eating their Meat, and shall give Notice of such his Desire to the commanding Officer, and shall furnish and allow the same accordingly; then and in such Case, the Non-commission Officers and Soldiers so quartered shall provide their own Victuals."[13]

By par. 66, it is enacted, "That if any Victualler, or any other Person, liable by this Act to have any Officer or Soldier quartered or billeted on him or her, shall refuse to receive or victual any such Officer or Soldier, so quartered or billeted upon him or her as aforesaid; or shall refuse to furnish or allow, according to the Directions of this Act, the several Things herein before respectively directed to be furnished or allowed to Non-commission Officers or Soldiers, so quartered or billeted on him or her as aforesaid; or shall neglect or refuse to furnish good and sufficient Hay and Straw for each Horse, so quartered or billeted on him or her as aforesaid, at the Rate herein before mentioned, and shall be thereof convicted, before one or more Justice or Justices of the Peace of the County, City or Liberty, within which such Offence shall be committed, either by his own Confession, or by the Oath of one or more credible Witness or Witnesses, which Oath the said Justice or Justices is and are hereby impowered to administer, every Person so offending shall forfeit, for every such Offence, the Sum of five Pounds, or any Sum of Money not exceeding five Pounds, nor less than forty Shillings, as the said Justice or Justices, before whom the Matter shall be heard, shall in his or their Discretion think fit, to be levied by Distress and Sale of the Goods of the Person offending, by Warrant under the Hand and Seal, or under the Hands and Seals, of such Justice or Justices, before whom such Offender shall be convicted, or one or more of them, to be directed to any Constable within the County, City or Liberty, or to any of the Overseers of the Poor of the Parish, where the Offender shall dwell; the said Sum of five Pounds, or the said Sum not exceeding five Pounds, nor less than forty Shillings, when levied, to be paid to the Overseers of the Poor of the Parish, wherein the Offence shall be committed, or to some one of them, for the Use of the Poor of the said Parish."[14]

In an Action of Trespass against two Justices of the Peace, who had issued a Warrant for levying the Penalty upon the Plaintiff, for not receiving a Soldier billeted upon him; the Case appeared from the Evidence to be thus. A Shopkeeper, who also dealt in Spirituous Liquors, in order to intitle himself to a Licence for selling Spirituous Liquors by Retale, had a Licence as a Victualler. For the Sake of obtaining this last Licence some Beer was laid in by him, of which an Account was taken by the Excise Officer, as is done of the Stock of a Victualler; but he never sold any of this, nor acted in any Manner as a Victualler, nor suffered Spirituous Liquors to be drank in his House.[15]

In this Case there was a Nonsuit for want of producing the Warrant of the two Justices; but Foster, J. who tried the Cause, said he should upon the Merits have been of Opinion, that the Plaintiff was not liable to have Soldiers quartered upon him.

By par. 33. that the Quarters of Officers and Soldiers in Great Britain, and in Jersey, Guernsey, Alderney, and Sark, and the Islands thereunto belonging, may hereafter be duly paid and satisfied, and his Majesty's Duties of Excise be better answered, it is enacted, "That every Officer, to whom it belongs to receive, or that does actually receive, the Pay or Subsistence Money, either for a whole Regiment, or particular Troops or Companies, or otherwise, shall immediately, upon each Receipt of every particular Sum, which shall from Time to Time be paid, returned, or come to his or their Hands, on Account of Pay or Subsistence, give publick Notice thereof to all Persons keeping Inns, or other Places, where Officers or Soldiers are quartered by Virtue of this Act; and shall appoint the said Innkeepers, and others, to repair to his or their Quarters at such Times as they shall appoint, for the Distribution and Payment of the said Pay or Subsistence Money to the Officers or Soldiers, which shall be within four Days at the furthest after the Receipt of the same as aforesaid: And the said Innkeepers and others shall then and there acquaint such Officer or Officers with the Accounts or Debts, if any shall be, between them and the Officers and Soldiers so quartered in their respective Houses; which Accounts the said Officer or Officers are hereby required to accept of, and immediately pay the same, before any Part of the said Pay or Subsistence Money be distributed either to the Officers or Soldiers: Provided the said Accounts exceed not, for one Commission Officer of Horse, being under the Degree of a Captain, for such Officer's Diet and Small Beer per Diem two Shillings; nor for one Commission Officer of Dragoons, being under the Degree of a Captain, for such Officer's Diet and Small Beer per Diem one Shilling; nor for one Commission Officer of Foot, being under the Degree of a Captain, for such Officer's Diet and Small Beer per Diem one Shilling; and if such Officer shall have a Horse or Horses, for each such Horse or Horses for their Hay and Straw per Diem, six Pence; nor for one Light Horseman's Diet and Small Beer per Diem six Pence, and Hay and Straw for his Horse per Diem six Pence; nor for one Dragoon's Diet and Small Beer per Diem six Pence, and Hay and Straw for his Horse per Diem six Pence; nor for one Foot Soldier's Diet and Small Beer per Diem four Pence: And if the Officer or Officers, as aforesaid, shall not give Notice, as aforesaid, and shall not immediately, upon producing such Account stated, satisfy, content and pay, the same, upon Complaint and Oath made thereof by any two Witnesses, at the next Quarter-Sessions for the County or City where such Quarters were, which Oath the Justices of the Peace at such Sessions are hereby authorized and required to administer, the Paymaster or Paymasters of his Majesty's Guards and Garrisons are hereby required and authorized, upon Certificate of the said Justices, before whom such Oath was made, of the Sums due upon such Accounts, and the Persons to whom the same is owing, to pay and satisfy the said Sums out of the Arrears due to the said Officer or Officers, upon Penalty that such Paymaster or Paymasters shall forfeit their respective Place or Places of Paymaster or Paymasters, and be discharged from holding the same for the future; and in case there shall be no Arrears due to the said Officer or Officers, then the said Paymaster or Paymasters are hereby authorized and required to deduct the Sums he or they shall pay, pursuant to the Certificate of the said Justices, out of the next Pay or Subsistence Money of the Regiment to which such Officer or Officers shall belong; and such Officer or Officers shall, for every such Offence, or for neglecting to give Notice of the Receipt of such Pay or Subsistence Money as aforesaid, be deemed or taken, and are hereby declared ipso facto cashiered. And where it shall happen, that the Subsistence Money due to any Officer or Soldier shall, by Occasion of any Accident, not be paid to such Officer or Soldier, or such Officer or Soldier shall neglect to pay the same, so that Quarters cannot be or are not paid, as this Act directs; and where any Horse, Foot or Dragoons, shall be upon their March, so that no Subsistence can then be remitted to them, to make Payment as this Act directs, or they shall neglect to pay the same; in every such Case it is hereby further enacted, that every such Officer shall, before his or their Departure out of their Quarters, where such Regiment, Troop or Company, shall remain for any Time whatsoever, make up the Accounts, as this Act directs, with every Person with whom such Regiment, Troop or Company, have quartered, and sign a Certificate thereof, and give the said Certificate by him so signed to the Party to whom such Money is due, with the Name of such Regiment, Troop or Company, to which he or they shall belong; to the End the said Certificate may be forthwith transmitted to the Paymaster of his Majesty's Guards and Garrisons, who is hereby required immediately to make Payment thereof to the Person or Persons to whom such Monies shall be due, to the End the same may be applied to such Regiment, Troop or Company, respectively, under Pain as is in this Act before directed for Nonpayment of Quarters."[16]

By par. 30. it is enacted, "That it shall and may be lawful to quarter Officers and Soldiers in Scotland, in such and the like Places and Houses as they might have been quartered in, by the Laws in Force in Scotland, at the Time of the Union; and that the Possessors of such Houses shall only be liable to furnish the said Officers and Soldiers quartered there, as by the said Laws in Force at the Time of the Union was provided; and that no Officer shall be obliged to pay for his Lodging, where he shall be regularly billeted, except in the Suburbs of Edinburgh."[17]

By the 8 G. 2. c. 30. par. 1. After reciting, that by the ancient common Law of this Land all Elections ought to be free; and that by an Act passed in the third Year of the Reign of King Edward the First, of famous Memory, it is commanded, upon great Forfeiture, that no Man by Force of Arms, nor by Malice or Menacing, shall disturb any to make free Election; and that the Freedom of Elections, of Members to serve in Parliament, is of the utmost Consequence to the Preservation of the Rights and Liberties of this Kingdom; and that it hath been the Usage and Practice to cause any Regiment, Troop or Company, or any Number of Soldiers, which hath been quartered in any City, Borough, Town or Place, where any Election of Members to serve in Parliament hath been appointed to be made, to remove and continue out of the same during the Time of such Election, except in such particular Cases as are herein after specified, to the End that the said Usage and Practice may be settled and established for the future, it is enacted, "That when and as often as any Election of any Peer or Peers to represent the Peers of Scotland in Parliament, or of any Member or Members to serve in Parliament, shall be appointed to be made, the Secretary at War for the Time being, or in case there shall be no Secretary at War, then such Person who shall officiate in the Place of the Secretary at War, shall and is hereby required, at some convenient Time before the Day appointed for such Election, to issue and send forth proper Orders, in Writing, for the Removal of every such Regiment, Troop or Company, or other Number of Soldiers, as shall be quartered or billeted in any such City, Borough, Town or Place, where such Election shall be appointed to be made, out of every such City, Borough, Town or Place, one Day at the least before the Day appointed for such Election, to the Distance of two or more Miles from such City, Borough, Town or Place, and not to make any nearer Approach to such City, Borough, Town or Place, as aforesaid, until one Day at the least after the Poll, to be taken at such Election, shall be ended and the Poll Books closed."[18]

By par. 2. it is enacted, "That in case the Secretary at War for the Time being, or such Person who shall officiate in the Place of the Secretary at War, shall neglect or omit to issue or send forth such Orders as aforesaid, according to the true Intent and Meaning of this Act, and shall be thereof lawfully convicted, upon any Indictment to be presented at the next Assizes, or Sessions of Oyer and Terminer, to be held for the County where such Offence shall be committed, or on an Information to be exhibited in the Court of King's Bench, within six Months after such Offence committed, such Secretary at War, or Person who shall officiate in the Place of the Secretary of [sic] War, shall for such Offence be discharged from their said respective Offices, and shall from thenceforth be utterly disabled, and made incapable to hold any Office or Employment, civil or military, in his Majesty's Service."[19]

But by par. 5. it is provided, "That the Secretary at War, or such Person who shall officiate in the Place of the Secretary at War, shall not be liable to any Forfeiture or Incapacity for not sending such Order, as aforesaid, upon any Election to be made of a Member to serve in Parliament, on a Vacancy of any Seat there, unless Notice, of the making out any new Writ for such Election, shall be given to him by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, or other Officer making out any new Writ for such Election, which Notice he is hereby directed and required to give with all convenient Speed after the making out the said Writ."[20]

By par. 3. it is provided, "That nothing in this Act contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to the City and Liberty of Westminster, or the Borough of Southwark, for or in Respect of the Guards of his Majesty, his Heirs or Successors, nor to any City, Borough, Town or Place, where his Majesty, his Heirs or Successors, or any of his Royal Family, shall happen to be or reside at the Time of any such Election as aforesaid, for or in Respect of such Number of Troops or Soldiers only, as shall be attendant as Guards to his Majesty, his Heirs or Successors, or to such other Person of the Royal Family as is aforesaid; nor to any Castle, Fort or fortified Place, where any Garrison is usually kept, for or in Respect of such Number of Troops or Soldiers only, whereof such Garrison is composed."[21]

By par. 4. it is provided, "That nothing in this Act shall extend, or be construed to extend, to any Officer or Soldier, who shall have a Right to Vote at any such Election as aforesaid, but that every such Officer and Soldier may freely, and without Interruption, attend and give his Vote at such Election, any Thing herein before contained to the contrary notwithstanding."[22]

… That the citizens shall not be exposed to unreasonable searches, seizure of their persons, houses, papers or property; and it is necessary for the good of society, that the administration of government be conducted with all possible maturity of judgment, for which reason it hath been the practice of civilized nations and so determined by every state in the Union … .

6.2DISCUSSION OF DRAFTS AND PROPOSALS

6.2.1THE FIRST CONGRESS

6.2.1.1June 8, 1789[2]

6.2.1.2August 17, 1789

6.2.1.2.a The committee went on to the consideration of the 7th clause of the 4th proposition, being as follows; "the right of the people to be secured in their persons, houses, papers and effects, shall not be violated by warrants issuing without probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and not particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized."

Mr. Gerry

Said he presumed there was a mistake in the wording of this clause, it ought to be "the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects, against unreasonable seizures and searches," and therefore moved that amendment.

This was adopted by the committee.

Mr. Benson

Objected to the words "by warrants issuing," this declaratory provision was good as far as it went, but he thought it was not sufficient, he therefore proposed to alter it so as to read "and no warrant shall issue."

The question was put on this motion, and lost by a considerable majority.

Mr. Livermore objected to the words "and not" between "affirmative and particularly." He moved to strike them out, in order to make it an affirmative proposition.

But the motion passed in the negative.

The clause as amended being now agreed to, … .

Congressional Register, August 17, 1789, vol. 2, p. 226.

6.2.1.2.b Tenth Amendment—"The rights of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects, shall not be violated by warrants issuing without probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and not particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized."

Mr. Benson moved to insert after the words "and effects," these words "against unreasonable searches and seizures." This was carried.

The question was then put on the amendment and carried.

Daily Advertiser, August 18, 1789, p. 2, col. 4.

6.2.1.2.c Tenth amendment—"The rights of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects, shall not be violated by warrants issuing without probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and not describing the places to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized."

Mr. Benson moved to insert after the words "and effects," these words, "against unreasonable searches and seizures." This was carried.

The question was then put on the amendment and carried.

New-York Daily Gazette, August 19, 1789, p. 802, col. 4.

6.2.1.2.d 10th Amendment. "The rights of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects, shall not be violated without probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and not particularly describing the places to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized."

Mr. Benson moved to insert after the words "and effects," these words against unreasonable seizures, and searches.

This was carried.

Mr. Gerry objected to the words, "by warrants issuing"—He said the provision was good, as far as it went; but he thought it was not sufficient: He moved that it be altered to and no warrant shall issue. This was negatived.

The question was then put on the amendment and carried.

Gazette of the U.S., August 22, 1789, p. 249, col. 3.

6.2.2.1Maryland, April 26, 1788

> This amendment was considered indispensable by many of the committee, for congress having the power of laying excises, the horror of a free people, by which our dwelling-houses, those castles considered so sacred by the English law will be laid open to the insolence and oppression of office, there could be no constitutional check provided, that would prove so effectual a safeguard to our citizens. General warrants too, the great engine by which power may destroy those individuals who resist usurpation, are also hereby forbid to those magistrates who are to administer the general government.[3]

Maryland Gazette, May 1, 1788.

6.2.2.2Massachusetts, January 30, 1788

>
> The framers of our state constitution took particular care to prevent the General Court from authorizing the judicial authority to issue a warrant against a man for a crime, unless his being guilty of the crime was supported by oath or affirmation, prior to the warrant being granted; why it should be esteemed so much more safe to intrust Congress with the power of enacting laws, which it was deemed so unsafe to intrust our state legislature with, I am unable to conceive.

Elliot, vol. 2, pp. 111–12.

6.2.2.3Virginia, June 24, 1788

> A bill of rights may be summed up in a few words. What do they tell us? —That our rights are reserved. Why not say so? Is it because it will consume too much paper? Gentlemen’s reasoning against a bill of rights does not satisfy me. Without saying which has the right side, it remains doubtful. A bill of rights is a favorite thing with the Virginians and the people of the other states likewise. It may be their prejudice, but the government ought to suit their geniuses; otherwise, its operation will be unhappy. A bill of rights, even if its necessity be doubtful, will exclude the possibility of dispute; and, with great submission, I think the best way is to have no dispute. In the present Constitution, they are restrained from issuing general warrants to search suspected places, or seize persons not named, without evidence of the commission of a fact, &c. There was certainly some celestial influence governing those who deliberated on that Constitution; for they have, with the most cautious and enlightened circumspection, guarded those indefeasible rights which ought ever to be held sacred! The officers of Congress may come upon you now, fortified with all the terrors of paramount federal authority. Excisemen may come in multitudes; for the limitation of their numbers no man knows. They may, unless the general government be restrained by a bill of rights, or some similar restriction, go into your cellars and rooms, and search, ransack, and measure, every thing you eat, drink, and wear. They ought to be restrained within proper bounds … .

I feel myself distressed, because the necessity of securing our personal rights seems not to have pervaded the minds of men; for many other valuable things are omitted:—for instance general warrants, by which an officer may search suspected places, without evidence of the commission of a fact, or seize any person without evidence of his crime, ought to be prohibited. As these are admitted, any man may be seized, any property may be taken, in the most arbitrary manner, without any evidence or reason. Every thing the most sacred may be searched and ransacked by the strong hand of power. We have infinitely more reason to dread general warrants here than they have in England, because there, if a person be confined, liberty may be quickly obtained by the writ of habeas corpus. But here a man living many hundred miles from the judges may get in prison before he can get that writ.

Elliot, vol. 3, pp. 448–49, 588.

6.2.4NEWSPAPERS AND PAMPHLETS

6.2.4.1Centinel, No. 1, October 5, 1787

… Permit one of yourselves to put you in mind of certain liberties and privileges secured to you by the constitution of this commonwealth, and to beg your serious attention to his uninterested opinion upon the plan of federal government submitted to your consideration, before you surrender these great and valuable privileges up forever. Your present frame of government, secures you to a right to hold yourselves, houses, papers and possessions free from search and seizure, and therefore warrants granted without oaths or affirmations first made, affording sufficient foundation for them, whereby any officer or messenger may be commanded or required to search your house or seize your persons or property, not particularly described in such warrant, shall not be granted … . The constitution of Pennsylvania is yet in existence, as yet you have the right to freedom of speech, and of publishing your sentiments. How long those rights will appertain to you, you yourselves are called upon to say, whether your houses shall continue to be your castles; whether your papers, your persons, and your property, are to be held sacred and free from general warrants, you are now to determine.

[Philadelphia] Independent Gazetteer, Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 13, pp. 328–29.

6.2.4.2The Federal Farmer, No. 4, October 12, 1787

… There are other essential rights, which we have justly understood to be the rights of freemen; as freedom from hasty and unreasonable search warrants, warrants not founded on oath, and not issued with due caution, for searching and seizing men’s papers, property, and persons.

Storing, vol. 2, p. 249.

The new plan, it is true, does propose to secure the people of the benefit of personal liberty by the habeas corpus; and trial by jury for all crimes, except in case of impeachment: but there is no declaration, … that the people have a right to hold themselves, their houses, papers and possessions free from search or seizure; and that therefore warrants without oaths or affirmations first made, affording a sufficient foundation for them, and whereby any officer or messenger may be commanded or required to search suspected places, or to seize any person or his property, not particularly described, are contrary to that right and ought not to be granted; …

[Philadelphia] Freeman's Journal, Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 13, pp. 466–67.

6.2.4.4Brutus, No. 2, November 1, 1787

For the security of liberty it has been declared, "that excessive bail should not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel or unusual punishments inflicted—That all warrants, without oath or affirmation, to search suspected places, or seize any person, his papers or property, are grievous and oppressive."

These provisions are as necessary under the general government as under that of the individual states; for the power of the former is as complete to the purpose of requiring bail, imposing fines, inflicting punishments, granting search warrants, and seizing persons, papers, or property, in certain cases, as the other.

6.2.4.5An Old Whig, No. 5, November 1, 1787

It is needless to repeat the necessity of securing other personal rights in the forming a new government. The same argument which proves the necessity of securing one of them shews also the necessity of securing others. Without a bill of rights we are totally insecure in all of them; and no man can promise himself with any degree of certainty that his posterity will enjoy the inestimable blessings of liberty of conscience, of freedom of speech and of writing and publishing their thoughts on public matters, of trial by jury, of holding themselves, their houses and papers free from seizure and search upon general suspicion or general warrants; or in short that they will be secured in the enjoyment of life, liberty and property without depending on the will and pleasure of their rulers.

6.2.4.6A Son of Liberty, November 8, 1787

… Having observed in your paper of the 25th ult. that a writer under the signature of A Slave, has pointed out a number of advantages or blessings, which, he says, will result from an adoption of the new government, proposed by the Convention:—I have taken the liberty to request, that you will give the following a place in your next paper, it being an enumeration of a few of the curses which will be entailed on the people of America, by this preposterous and newfangled system, if they are ever so infatuated as to receive it.

4th. Men of all ranks and conditions, subject to have their houses searched by officers, acting under the sanction of general warrants, their private papers seized, and themselves dragged to prison, under various pretences, whenever the fear of their lordly masters shall suggest, that they are plotting mischief against their arbitrary conduct.

5th. Excise laws established, by which our bed chambers will be subjected to be searched by brutal tools of power, under pretence, that they contain contraband or smuggled merchandize, and the most delicate part of our families, liable to every species of rude or indecent treatment, without the least prospect, or shadow of redress, from those by whom they are commissioned.

New York Journal, Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 13, p. 481–82.

6.2.4.7The Federal Farmer, No. 6, December 25, 1787

The following, I think, will be allowed to be unalienable or fundamental rights in the United States:—

No man, demeaning himself peaceably, shall be molested on account of his religion or mode of worship—The people have a right to hold and enjoy their property according to known standing laws, and which cannot be taken from them without their consent, or the consent of their representatives; and whenever taken in the pressing urgencies of government, they are to receive a reasonable compensation for it—Individual security consists in having free recourse to the laws—The people are subject to no laws or taxes not assented to by their representatives constitutionally assembled—They are at all times intitled to the benefits of the writ of habeas corpus, the trial by jury in criminal and civil causes—They have a right, when charged, to a speedy trial in the vicinage; to be heard by themselves or counsel, not to be compelled to furnish evidence against themselves, to have witnesses face to face, and to confront their adversaries before the judge—No man is held to answer a crime charged upon him till it be substantially described to him; and he is subject to no unreasonable searches or seizures of his person, papers or effects—The people have a right to assemble in an orderly manner, and petition the government for a redress of wrongs—The freedom of the press ought not to be restrained—No emoluments, except for actual service—No hereditary honors, or orders of nobility, ought to be allowed—The military ought to be subordinate to the civil authority, and no soldier be quartered on the citizens without their consent—The militia ought always to be armed and disciplined, and the usual defence of the country—The supreme power is in the people, and power delegated ought to return to them at stated periods, and frequently—The legislative, executive, and judicial powers, ought always to be kept distinct—others perhaps might be added.

Storing, vol. 2, p. 262.

6.2.4.8A Columbian Patriot, February 1788

14. There is no provision by a bill of rights to guard against the dangerous encroachments of power in too many instances to be named: but I cannot pass over in silence the insecurity with which we are left with regard to warrants unsupported by evidence—the daring experiment of granting writs of assistance in a former arbitrary administration is not yet forgotten in the Massachusetts; nor can we be so ungrateful to the memory of the patriots who counteracted their operation, as so soon after their manly exertions to save us from such a detestable instrument of arbitrary power, to subject ourselves to the insolence of any petty revenue officer to enter our houses, search, insult, and seize at pleasure. We are told by a gentleman of too much virtue and real probity to suspect he has a design to deceive—"that the whole constitution is a declaration of rights"—but mankind must think for themselves, and to many judicious and discerning characters, the whole constitution with very few exceptions appears a perversion of the rights of particular states, and of private citizens.

Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 16, p. 281.

6.2.4.9A Farmer and Planter, April 1, 1788

… The excise-officers have power to enter your houses at all times, by night or day, and if you refuse them entrance, they can, under pretence of searching for exciseable goods, that the duty has not been paid on, break open your doors, chests, trunks, desks, boxes, and rummage your houses from bottom to top; nay, they often search the cloaths, petticoats and pockets of ladies or gentlemen, (particularly when they are coming from on board an East-India ship) and if they find any the least article that you cannot prove the duty to be paid on, seize it and carry it away with them; who are the very scurf and refuse of mankind, who value not their oaths, and will break them for a shilling. This is their true character in England, and I speak from experience, for I have had the opportunity of putting their virtue to the test; and saw two of them break their oath for one guinea, and a third for one shilling's worth of punch. What do you think of a law to let loose such a set of vile officers among you! Do you expect the Congress excise-officers will be any better, if God, in his anger, should think it proper to punish us for our ignorance, and sins of ingratitude to him, after carrying us through the late war, and giving us liberty, and now so tamely to give it up by adopting this aristocratical government?

Maryland Journal, Storing, vol. 5, pp. 75–76.

6.2.5LETTERS AND DIARIES

6.2.5.1Jeremy Belknap to Paine Wingate, May 29, 1789

… You will see in the speech wh. our new Lieut. Governor [Samuel Adams] made at his investiture that he has not thrown off the old idea of "independence" as an attribute of each individual State in the "confederated Republic"—& you will know in what light to regard his "devout & fervent wish" that the "people may enjoy well grounded confidence that their personal & domestic rights are secure." This is the same Language or nearly the same which he used in the Convention when he moved for an addition to the proposed Amendments—by inserting a clause to provide for the Liberty of the press—the right to keep arms—Protection from seizure of person & property & the Rights of Conscience.

By which motion he gave an alarm to both sides of the house & had nearly overset the whole business which the Friends of the Constitution had been labouring for several Weeks to obtain … .

6.2.5.2Fisher Ames to Thomas Dwight, June 11, 1789

Mr. Madison has introduced his long expected Amendments. They are the fruit of much labour and research. He has hunted up all the grievances and complaints of newspapers—all the articles of Conventions—and the small talk of their debates. It contains a Bill of Rights—the right of enjoying property—of changing the govt. at pleasure—freedom of the press—of conscience—of juries—exemption from general Warrants gradual increase of representatives till the whole number at the rate of one to every 30,000 shall amount to—and allowing two to every State, at least this is the substance. There is too much of it—O. I had forgot the right of the people to bear Arms.

Risum teneatis amici—

Upon the whole, it may do good towards quieting men who attend to sounds only, and may get the mover some popularity—which he wishes.

6.3DISCUSSION OF RIGHTS

6.3.1TREATISES

6.3.1.1Bond, 1707

Of Arrest and Imprisonment.

ARrest and Imprisonment are much the same, and signifie no more than the restraining of a Subject of his Liberty against his Will. If a Constable, &c. have the Warrant from a Justice to bring any person before him, he ought first to require the Party to go before the Justice, and if he refuse, Arrest him; for such requiring is no Arrest of Imprisonment, Dalt. cap. 129.

If a Bailiff, &c. say to a Man, I arrest you, this is a good Arrest, and if the Party go away it is a Rescue, 8 Car. B. R. Sir James Wink's Case; but after this he must arrest him if he may, for the Words of the Writ are Capias, Attachias, &c. which implies as much.

All sorts of persons may be arrested under the degree of a Peer of the Realm, and that by Warrant of the Justice of Peace, Dalt. Cap. 129.

A Feme Covert may be committed for a Force or Riot, by a Justices Warrant, otherwise of Infants in such Case, yet for not finding Sureties for the Peace being demanded may be committed, Dalt. cap. 129.

For breach of a Statute Law, an Infant shall not be imprisoned unless expressed in the Stat. Plow. 264. a.

This Liberty of every Subject is specially favoured by the Common Law, insomuch that if an Officer (whose Actions are favourably interpreted) shall unduly imprison any person by an usurped Jurisdiction, it is grievously punishable, Magna Chart. cap. 29. 5 Ed. 3. cap. 9. and the Petition of Right, 3 Car. 1.

None can be arrested but by Process upon an Indictment, Upon an Original Writ at Common Law, or by Matter of Record, and the Process must be out of a Court of Record.

Therefore Commissions to arrest Men were held to be agaist Law, Dalt. cap. 129.

No Man can be committed to Prison, unless it be by a Judge of Record.

For Misdemeanours against the Queen's Peace as Treason, &c. an Offender may be arrested by any Person by a Warrant in Law, so that there be just cause or lawful suspicion.

A Man who knoweth of a Robbery may arrest a person by him suspected, and carry him to the Constable, if he be to be found, or else imprison him in the Stocks; or if there be none, carry him to the next Constable, or else to the next Justice to be examined, &c. Dalt. ibid.

If a Robbery, &c. be known to be committed, any one may arrest a Person of ill Fame, and if he resist may justifie beating of him.

Where a Person suspected of an intended Felony may be therefore arrested, Finch 127.

Hue and Cry after J. S. or any other Person suspected of Felony is sufficient Case to arrest him though no Felony be committed, Bro. False Impris. 22. Dalt. cap. 129.

If a Felony is done, to be in Company of the Offenders is cause to arrest a Person; so is the living idlely and as as Vagrant, Bro. False Impris. 22. Dalt. 129.

If Hue and Cry be levied after a stoln Horse, &c. and J. S. be taken driving him, he may be imprisoned for it though a Man of good Fame. If a Man be dangerously hurt in an Affray, any Man may arrest the Offender, Dalt. ibid.

Park-keepers and their Servants may lawfully arrest such as hunt in their Parks, or case them to depart, Lib. Int. Tit. False Impris. 12.

If a person keep or use a Gun contrary to the Statute, any man may arrest him and bring him to a Justice.

Watchmen may arrest Nightwalkers, and if they suspect them, justifie the detaining them till the morning, See the Statute of Winchester, 13 E. 1. c. 4.

Justice of Peace and Sheriffs, &c. ought not to commit or imprison any Person but in the County Gaol, 5 H. 4. 23 H. 8. cap. 2. A Constable regularly ought to imprison in the Stocks.

A Constable by a Warrant from a Justice arrests a person which escapes into another County, he may arrest him there upon fresh pursuit and bring him before the Justice, Cromp. 122, 123. Dalt. c. 129.

A person taken in Execution escapes into another County, yet the Sheriff, &c. upon fresh pursuit may take him there, and he shall be still in Execution, Co. Rep. lib. 3. 52. b.

The Constable carries a man arrested for Felony unto the Gaol, and the Gaoler refuseth him, he may be brought back to the Town where he was taken, and they shall be charged to keep him till the next Goal-delivery. Or the Constable may keep him in his own House, Bro. False Impris. 25.

When a Statute appoints Imprisonment, but limits no time how long, &c. or when to be committed, the Party must be sent to Gaol presently, and continue there so long as the Court shall award, 3 Co. 119. Plowd. 17. Crompt. 171.

No persons at Common Law could have Irons put upon them, but see now the Statute of Westminster 2. cap. 11. quod Carceri mancipentur in ferris. And 7 Jac. 4. all Rogues, &c. sent to the House of Correction, may be punish’d by putting Fetters or Gives upon them.

If an Offender arrested by the Constable refuse to bear the Charge of conveying him to the Goal, the Justice may by his Warrant cause the Constable to levy the same upon the Prisoners Goods, if he hath sufficient; if not, upon the Inhabitants of the Town where he was apprehended. 3 Jac.

6.3.1.2.aArrest

Arrest, (Arrestum) Cometh of the French Word Arrester, to stop, or stay. It is a Restraint of a Man's Person, obliging him to be obedient to the Law: And it is defined to be the Execution of the Command of some Court of Record, or Officer of Justice. An Arrest is the Beginning of Imprisonment, where a Man is first taken, and restrained of his Liberty, by Power or Colour of a lawful Warrant: Also it signifies the Decree of a Court, by which a Person is arrested. 2 Shep. Abr. 299. None shall be arrested for Debt, Trespass, &c. or other Cause of Action, but by Virtue of a Precept or Commandment out of some Court: But for Treason, Felony, or Breach of the Peace, any Man may arrest without Warrant or Precept. Terms de Ley 54. Persons present at the Committing of a Felony, must use their Endeavours to apprehend the Offender, under Penalty of Fine and Imprisonment. 3 Inst. 117. 4 Inst. 177. The King cannot command any one by Word of Mouth to be arrested; but he must do it by Writ, or Order of his Courts, according to Law: Nor may the King arrest any Man for Suspicion of Treason, or Felony, as his Subjects may; because if he doth wrong, the Party cannot have Action against him. 2 Inst. 186. After Presentment or Indictment found in Felony, &c. the first Process is a Capias, to arrest and imprison the Offender: And if the Offender cannot be taken, an Exigent is awarded in order to Outlawry. H. P. C. 209. When a Person is apprehended for Debt, &c. he is said to be arrested: And Writs express Arrest by two Several Words Capias and Attachias, to take and catch hold of a Man; for an Officer must actually lay hold of a Person, besides saying he arrests him, or it will be no lawful Arrest. 1 Lill. Abr. 96. If a Bailiff be kept off from making an Arrest, he shall have an Action of Assault: And where the Person arrested makes Resistance, or assaults the Bailiff, he may justify Beating of him. If a Bailiff touches a Man, which is an Arrest, and he makes his Escape, it is a Rescous, and Attachment may be had against him. 1 Salk. 79. If a Bailiff lays hold of one by the Hand (whom he had a Warrant to arrest) as he holds it out at the Window, this is such a Taking of him, that the Bailiff may justify the Breaking open of the House to carry him away. 1 Vent. 306. When a Person has committed Treason or Felony, &c. Doors may be broke open to arrest the Offender; but not in Civil Cases, except it be in Pursuit of one arrested; or where a House is recovered by Real Action, to deliver Possession to the Person recovering. Plowd. 5 Rep. 91. Action of Trespass, &c. lies for breaking up a House to make Arrest in a Civil Action. Mod. Cas. 105. But if it appears, a Bailiff found an outer Door, &c. open, 'tis said he may open the inner Door to make an Arrest. Comber. 327. An Arrest in the Night, as well as the Day, is lawful. 9 Rep. 66. And every one is bound by the Common Law to assist not only the Sheriff in the Execution of Writs, and making Arrests, &c. but also his Bailiff that hath his Warrant to do it. 2 Inst. 193. A Bailiff upon an Arrest ought to shew at whose Suit, out of what Court the Writ issues, and for what Cause, &c. but this is when the Party arrested, submits himself to the Arrest: A Bailiff sworn and known, need not shew his Warrant, though the Party demands it; nor is any other special Bailiff bound to shew his Warrant, unless it be demanded. 9 Rep. 68, 69. An Arrest without shewing the Warrant, and without telling at whose Suit, until the other demanded it, was held legal; and that this need not to be done until the Party obeyed and demanded the same. *Cro. And every Warrant to issue upon any Writ to arrest any Person, shall have the same Day and Year set down thereon as on the Writ, under the like Penalty of 10 l. Stat. 6 Geo. 1. c. 21. If an Action is entered in one of the Compters of London, a City Serjeant may arrest the Party without the Sheriff's Warrant. 1 Lill. Abr. 94. And by the Custom of London, a Debtor may be arrested before the Money is due, to make him find Sureties; but not by the Common Law. 1 Nels. Abr. 258. By Stat. 29 Car. 2. c. 7. No Writ, Process, Warrant, &c. (except in Cases of Treason, Felony, or for Breach of the Peace) shall be served on a Sunday; on Pain that the Person serving them shall be liable to the Suit of the Party grieved, and answer Damages, as if the same had been done without Writ: An Action of False Imprisonment lies for Arrest on a Sunday, and the Arrest is void. 1 Salk. 78. A Defendant was arrested on a Sunday by a Writ out of the Marshalsea; and the Court of B. R. being moved to discharge him, it was denied; and he was directed to bring Action of False Imprisonment. 5 Mod. Rep. 95. The Defendant being taken upon a Sunday, without any Warrant, and locked up all that Day, on Monday Morning a Writ was got against him, by which he was arrested; it was ruled, that he might have an Action of False Imprisonment, and that an Attachment should go against those who took him on the Sunday. Mod. Cas. 96. Attachments have been often granted against Bailiffs for making Arrests on Sunday: But Affidavit is usally [sic] made, that the Party might be taken upon another Day. 1 Mod. 56. A Person may be retaken on a Sunday, where arrested the Day before, &c. Mod. Cas. 231. And a Man may be taken on a Sunday on an Escape Warrant; when he goes at Large out of the Rules of the King's Bench or Fleet Prison, &c. Stat. 5 Ann. c. 9. Also Bail [sic] may take the Principal on a Sunday, and confine him till Monday, and then render him; tho' a Plaintiff may not arrest the Defendant on a Sunday. 1 Nels. 258. If a wrong Person is arrested; or one for Felony, where no Felony is done, &c. it will be False Imprisonment, liable to Damages. Attornies, &c. for Vexation, maliciously causing any Person to be arrested, where there is no Cause of Suit, &c. shall suffer six Months Imprisonment, and before discharged pay treble Damages, and forfeit 10 l. Stat. 8 Eliz. c. 2. A Bailiff having a Writ to arrest A. B. comes up to another Person, and asks him if his Name be A. B. and he answers that it is, whereupon the Bailiff arrests him, it will be a False Arrest, for which Action lies. Lane 49. And if a Warrant be to take A. the Son of B. and the Bailiff makes an Arrest on the Son of D. who indeed is the right Person intended, but not the Party within his Warrant, it will be false Imprisonment. Ibid. The Bailiff's Fee for an Arrest, by an ancient Statute, is but Four Pence, and the Sheriff's Twenty Pence: And Bailiff, cannot legally take any Thing but what is allowed by this Statute, and other subsequent Acts. For taking Fees not warranted by Law, they shall render treble Damages to the Party grieved, and incur a Forfeiture of 40*l. Stat*. 23 Hen. 6. cap. 10. No Bailiff, or other Officer, shall carry any Person under Arrest, to any Tavern, Alehouse, &c. without his Consent; so as to charge him with any Beer, Ale, Wine, &c. but what he shall freely call for: Nor shall demand or receive more from him for the Arrest or Waiting, than by Law ought to be, until an Appearance procured, Bail found, &c. Nor take or exact any more for keeping such Person out of Prison, than what he shall of his own voluntary Accord truly give; nor take more for Lodging than what is reasonable, or shall be adjudged so by the next Justice of Peace. Stat. 22 & 23 Car. 2. cap. 2. And by a late Act, Bailiffs, &c. are not to carry any Person arrested to a Tavern, Alehouse, &c. or the private House of such Officers, without the free and voluntary Consent of the Party; nor carry such Person to Prison within twenty-four Hours from the Time of the Arrest: or take any Reward for keeping him out of Gaol, &c. Stat. 2 Geo. 2. cap. 22. But if a Person arrested refuse to be carried to some convenient

House of his own Nomination, &c. to be kept in safe Custody during the twenty-four Hours before carried to Prison, then the Sheriff's Officer, &c. may immediately convey him to Gaol, to prevent an Escape. 3 Geo. 2. c. 27. If a Debt be under 10*l*. on Process out of a superior Court, or 40 s. in itial in an inferior Court, the Defendant shall not be arrested, but be served personally with a Copy of the Process; and if he do not appear at the Return thereof, the Plaintiff may enter an Appearance for him, and proceed, &c. Stat. 12 Geo. 1. c. 29. The Fee for making and serving the Copy of Process, taken by Attornies, Bailiffs, &c. shall be 5 s. out of the Superior Courts, and 1 s. the inferior Courts: And no special Writ shall be sued out, unless the Cause of Action be 10 l. or above, on Pain of 10 l. and the Proceedings thereon to be void, by Stat. 5 Geo. 2. c. 27. CHAP. XII

Of Arrests by private Persons.

HAVING thus endeavoured to shew the Nature of the Courts which have Jurisdiction over criminal Offences. I am now to shew in what Manner Offenders are to be proceeded against by such Courts; and in Order hereto I shall consider,

1. How they are to be apprehended.
2. In what Manner and in what Cases they are to be bailed.
3. In what Cases and in what Manner they are to be committed to Prison.
4. How far they and their Assistants are punishable for an Hindrance in bringing them to publick Justice.

As to the first of these Points I shall consider,

1. In what Manner such Offenders are to be apprehended by private Persons.
2. In what Manner by publick Officers.
3. In what Cases it is lawful to break open Doors in order to apprehend them.

As to Arrests of such Offenders by private Persons, I shall examine,

1. Where Arrests of this Kind are commanded and injoined by Law.
2. Where they are permitted by Law.

3. Where they are rewarded.

Sect. 1. As to the first Point it seems clear, That [a] all Persons whatsoever who are present when a Felony is committed, or a dangerous Wound given, are bound to apprehend the Offender; on Pain of being fined and imprisoned for their Neglect, [b] unless they were under Age at the Time.[1]

Sect. 2. And for this [c] Cause, by the Common Law if any Homicide be committed, or dangerous Wound given, whether with or without Malice, or even by [d] Misadventure of Self-Defence, in any Town or in the [e] Lanes or Fields thereof, in the Day-time, and the Offender escape, the Town shall be amerced, and if out of a Town, the [f] Hundred shall be amerced.[2]

Sect. 3. And since the Statute of Winchester, cap. 5. which ordains that [g] walled Towns shall be kept shut from Sunsetting to Sunrising, if the Fact happen in any such Town by Night or by Day, and the Offender escape, the Town shall be amerced.[3]

Sect. 4. And as all [a] private Persons are bound to apprehend all those, who shall be guilty of any of the Crimes abovementioned in their View; so also are they with the utmost Diligence to pursue, and endeavour to take all those who shall be guilty thereof out of their View, upon a Hue and Cry levied against them.[4]

Sect. 5. [b] Hue and Cry is the Pursuit of an Offender from Town to Town till he be taken, which all who are present when a Felony is committed, or a dangerous Wound given, are, by the Common Law as well as by Statute, bound to raise against the Offenders who escape; on Pain of Fine and Imprisonment: Also it [c] seems certain, That a Man may lawfully raise it against one who sets upon him in the Highway to rob him: Also it is enacted by the Statute of [d] Winchester, cap. 4. That Hue and Cry shall be levied upon any Stranger who shall not obey the Arrest of the Watch in the Night-Time; and [e] 21 E. 1. which was made against Trespassers in Forests, Chases, Parks and Warrens, seems to allow the Levying thereof upon any such Offenders. But if a Man take upon him to [f] levy a Hue and Cry without sufficient Cause, he shall be punished as a Disturber of the Peace.[5]

Sect. 6. In Order rightly to raise a Hue and Cry, you ought to go to the Constable of the next Town, and declare the Fact, and [g] describe the Offender, and the Way he is gone; whereupon the Constable ought immediately, whether it be Night or Day, to raise his own Town, and make a Search for the Offender: And upon the not finding him, to send the like Notice, with the utmost Expedition, by Horsemen as well as Footmen, to the Constables of all the neighbouring Towns who ought in like Manner to search for the Offender, and also to give Notice to their neighbouring Constables and they to the next, till the Offender be found.[6]

Sect. 7. Also every [h] private Person is bound to assist an Officer demanding his Help for the Taking of a Felon, or the Suppressing an Affray, or apprehending the Affrayers, &c.[7]

Arrests of Offenders by private Persons permitted by Law, are either,

1. By their own Authority: Or,
2. By a Warrant from a Justice of Peace.

Arrest of this Kind by their own Authority, are either,

1. In Respect of Treason or Felony: Or,
2. In Respect of inferior Offences.

Arrests of this Kind in Respect of Treason or Felony, are either,

1. For the Suspicion of such Crimes already done, or supposed to have been done; Or,
2. To prevent their being done.

As to such Arrests for such Suspicion, I shall endeavour to shew,

1. What are sufficient Causes of Suspicion.
2. By whom the Person arrested must be suspected.
3. Whether any such Cause will justify an Arrest, where no Treason or Felony at all hath been committed, &c.
4. In what Manner an Arrest for such Suspicion is to be justified in Pleading.

Sect. 8. As to the first Particular, viz. What are sufficient Causes of Suspicion, I shall take Notice of some of the Principal of them, which are generally agreed to justify the Arrest of an innocent Person for Felony, as,

Sect. 9. I. The common [a] Fame of the Country, But it [b] seems, That it ought to appear upon Evidence, in an Action brought for such an Arrest, that such Fame had some probable Ground.[8]

Sect. 10. II. The [c] living a vagrant, idle and disorderly Life, without having any visible Means to support it.[9]

Sect. 11. III. The being in [d] Company with one known to be an Offender, at the Time of the Offence; or [e] generally at other Times keeping Company with Persons of scandalous Reputations.[10]

Sect. 12. IV. The being found in such Circumstances as induce a strong Presumption of Guilt; as [f] coming out of a House wherein Murder has been committed, with a bloody Knife in one's Hand; or being found in [g] Possession of any Part of Goods stolen, without being able to give a probable Account of coming honestly by them.[11]

Sect. 13. V. The Behaving one's self in such Manner as betrays a Consciousness of Guilt; as [h] where a Man being charged with a Treason or Felony, says nothing to it, but seems tacitly by his Silence to own himself guilty; or where a Man accused of any such Crime, upon hearing that a Warrant is taken out against him, doth abscond.[12]

Sect. 14. VI. The being [i] pursued by an Hue and Cry.[13]

Sect. 15. As to the second Particular, viz. By whom the Person must be suspected, upon such an Arrest for Suspicion, it seems to be [k] agreed, That the Law hath so tender a Regard to the Liberty and Reputation of every Person, That no Causes of Suspicion whatsoever, let the Number and Probability of them be ever so great, will justify the Arrest of an innocent Man, by one who is not himself induced by them to suspect him to be guilty, whether he make such Arrest of his own Head, or in Obedience to the Commands of a private Person, or even of a [l] Constable.[14]

Sect. 16. As to the third Particular, viz. Whether any such Cause of Suspicion will justify an Arrest where no Treason or Felony at all hath been committed, or dangerous Wound given: It is holden in some [m] Books, That none of the above mentioned Causes will in any Case justify the Arresting a Man for the Suspicion of a Crime, where in Truth no such Crime hath been committed either by him or any other Person whatsoever. But howsoever this Rule may in general be true, it seems very hardly maintainable in the Case of an Arrest of an innocent Person upon a Hue and Cry levied against him, in such a Place where his Character is unknown, and with such other Circumstances, that the People of the County have no Reason to presume it groundless; for in such Cases, it would be a great Inconvenience to discourage Persons from following a Hue and Cry, with that Vigour and Diligence, which the Law expects, and the Publick Good requires, by making them liable to an Action if it should in the Event prove to have been levied without sufficient Cause, which they cannot take Time to examine without delaying their Pursuit: And since the Person injur'd by such an ill-grounded Hue and Cry, has a good Action against him that raised it, there seems to be no Necessity, that he should also have a Remedy against another. And this Opinion seems to be the more plausible, for that among the [n] Books [o] cited to maintain the contrary, [p] that which alone doth directly affirm it, seems to go upon an Argument manifestly inconclusive; for it says, That an Hue and Cry is not a sufficient Authority to arrest a Man unless a Felony be done, because the Words of the Statute of Westminster

1. cap. 9. are, That all Men shall be ready upon Hue and Cry to arrest Felons; but where no Felony is done, there can be no Felon, &c. to which it may be replied, That this Argument, if it prove any Thing, proves that none but Felons can be arrested on a Hue and Cry, which seems to be manifestly false; for it is agreed by all the Books, That is a Felony be actually committed, an innocent Person on whom a Hue and Cry for it is levied, may lawfully be arrested: Also there seems to be no Doubt, but that he who barely attempts to rob a Man, or who dangerously wounds him, may safely be pursued and taken by a Hue and Cry, and yet there is no Pretence to all such a Person a Felon.[15]

Sect. 17. And if it be granted lawful to arrest a Man on an Hue and Cry where no Felony hath been committed; from the like Grounds it seems also to follow, That it is lawful to arrest a Man on the Warrant of a Justice of Peace, where no Felony hath been committed; but this Point shall be more fully considered in the next Chapter.

Sect. 18. As to the fourth Particular, viz. In what Manner an Arrest for such Suspicion is to be justified in Pleading; it seems to be certain, That whoever would justify the Arrest of an innocent Person, by Reason of any such Suspicion, must not only shew that he suspected the Party [a] himself, but must also set forth the [b] Cause which induced him to have such a Suspicion, that it may appear to the Court to have been a sufficient Ground for his Proceeding: Also it seems [c] certain, That regularly he ought expresly to shew, that the very same Crime for which he made the Arrest, was actually committed. But [d] if a Man have several Causes of such Suspicion, he is not bound to insist upon some one of them only, but may alledge them all; for that the Replication De son tort Demesne, answers the whole. As [e] where a Man arrests another, who is actually guilty of the Crime for which he is arrested, it seems, That he needs not in justifying it, set forth any special Cause of his Suspicion, but may say in general, that the Party feloniously did such a Fact, for which he arrested him, &c. [16]

Sect. 19. As to the arresting of Offenders by private Persons of their own Authority, permitted by Law for the Prevention of Treason or Felony only intended to be done; it [f] seems, that any one may lawfully lay only on another, whom he shall see upon the point of committing a Treason or Felony, or doing any Act which would manifestly endanger the Life of another, and may detain him so long till it may reasonably be presumed, that he hath changed his Purpose; and upon this Ground it [g] seemeth to be the better Opinion, That not only a Constable, but any private Person, who shall see another expose an Infant in the Street, and refuse to take it away, may lawfully apprehend and detain him, till he shall consent to take Care of it.[17]

Sect. 20. As to the Arrest of Offenders by private Person of their own Authority, permitted by Law, for inferior Offences; it [h] seems clear, That regularly no private Person can of this own Authority arrest another for a bare Breach of the Peace after it is over; for if an Officer cannot justify such an Arrest, without a Warrant from a Magistrate, surely à fortiori a private Person cannot: Yet it is holden by [i] some, that any private Person may lawfully arrest a suspicious Nightwalker, and detain him till he make it appear, that he is a Person of good Reputation. Also it hath been [k] adjudged, That any one may lawfully apprehend a common notorious Cheat, going about the Country with false Dice, and being actually caught playing with them, in order to have him before a Justice of Peace; for the publick Good requires the utmost Discouragement of all such Persons, and the Restraining of private Persons from arresting them without a Warrant from a Magistrate, would often give them an Opportunity of escaping: And from the Reason of this Case it seems to follow, That the Arrest of any other Offenders by private Persons, for Offences in like Manner scandalous and prejudicial to the Publick, may be justified.[18]

Sect. 21. As to Arrests of such Offenders by private Persons, having a Warrant form a Justice of Peace permitted by Law, there is no Doubt but that where the Law authorizes Justices of Peace to direct their Warrants to such Persons, it doth implicitly authorize the Execution of them by them.[19]

As to the third general Point of this Chapter, viz. In what Cases the Arrests of Offenders by private Persons are rewarded by Law, I shall give a short Account of the Statutes concerning this Matter, in Relation,

1. To Robbers in Highways.
2. To Counterfeiters and Clippers of the Coin.
3. To Shoplifters and other Offenders of like Nature.
4. To Burglars and felonious Breakers of Houses.

Sect. 22. And first, As to Robbers in Highways, it is enacted by 4 & 5 W. & M. 8. That whoever shall apprehend and take one or more Thief or Robber in any Highway or Road in England or Wales, and prosecute him or them till be or they be convicted of any Robbery, committed in or upon any Highway, Passage, Field or open Place, shall receive from the Sheriff of the County where such Robbery and Conviction shall be, without paying any Fee for the same, for every such Offender so convicted 40 l. within one Month after such Conviction and Demand thereof made, by tendring [sic] a Certificate to the said Sheriff under the Hand or Hands of the Judge or Justices before whom such Felon or Felons shall be convicted; and in Case any Dispute shall arise, between the Persons so apprehending any the said Thieves and Robbers touching their Right to the said Reward, That then the said Judge or Justices so respectively certifying, shall by their said Certificate direct and appoint the said Reward to be paid in such Shares and Proportions as to them shall seem just and reasonable. And if any such Sheriff shall die or be removed before the Expiration of one Month after such Conviction and Demand made, That then the next Sheriff shall pay the same within one Month after Demand and Certificate brought as aforesaid: And the Sheriff making Default in paying the said Sum, shall forfeit double as much.

Sect. 23. And it is farther enacted, That if any Person shall be killed by any such Robber in endeavoring to apprehend, or making Pursuit after him, the Executors or Administrators, &c. of such Person, shall receive 40 l. from the Sheriff, &c. upon Certificate delivered under the Hands and Seals of the Judge or Justices of Assize for the County where the Fact was done, or the two next Justices of the Peace, of such Person being so killed, which Certificate the said Judge or Justices, upon sufficient Proof before them made, are immediately required to give without Fee or Reward.

Sect. 24. And it is farther enacted, That every Person who shall so take, apprehend, prosecute, or convict such Robber as aforesaid, shall have as a farther Reward, the Horse, Furniture, and Arms, Money and other Goods of such Robber, that shall be taken with him; any their Majesties Right or Title, Bodies politick or Corporate, or the Right or Title thereunto of the Lord of any Manor or Franchise, or of him or them lending or letting the same to Hire to any such Robber notwithstanding: Provided that this shall not be extended to take away the Right of any Person to such Horses, Funiture and Arms, Money or other Goods, from whom the same were before feloniously taken.

Sect. 25. Secondly, As to Counterfeiters and Clippers of the Coin, it is enacted by 6 & 7 Gul. 3. 17. That whoever shall apprehend any Person who shall counterfeit any of the current Coin of this Realm, or for Lucre clip, wash, file, or otherwise diminish the same, or shall cause to be brought into the Kingdom any clipt, false, or counterfeit Coin, and prosecute such Person to Conviction, shall have from the Sheriff of the County where such Conviction shall be, forty Pounds upon the Judge's Certificate, &c.

Sect. 26. Thirdly, As to Shoplifters, &c. it is enacted by 10 & 11 W. 3. 23. That whosoever shall take and prosecute to Conviction, any Person who by Night or Day shall in any Shop, Warehouse, Coach-house or Stable, privately and feloniously steal any Goods, Wares, or Merchandizes, of the Value of 5 s. (though such Shop, &c. were not broken, and tho' no Person were in such Shop, &c.) or shall assist, hire, or command any Person to commit such Offence, shall have a Certificate thereof Gratis from the Judge or Justices, expressing the Parish or Place where such Felony was committed; and if any Dispute shall happen about the Right to such Certificate, the Judge or Justices shall direct and appoint the said Certificate into so many Shares, to be divided among the Persons therein concerned, as to the said Judge, &c. shall seem reasonable, which Certificate (before any Benefit has been made of it) may be once assigned over, and no more, and the original Proprietor or Assignee shall by Virtue thereof be discharged from all Parish and Ward Offices, within the Parish or Ward wherein the Felony was committed; and the said Certificate shall be enrolled by the Clerk of the Peace of the County, for the Fee of one Shilling: And in Case any Person happen to be slain by any such Felons by endeavouring to apprehend them, his Executors, &c. shall have the like Reward, &c.

Sect. 27. Fourthly, As to Burglars and felonious Breakers of Houses, it is enacted by 5 Annae 31. That every Person who shall take any one guilty of Burglary, or the felonious breaking and entring any House in the Day-time, and prosecute them to Conviction, shall receive above the Reward given by the abovementioned Statute of 10 & 11 W. 3. the Sum of 40 l. within one Month after such Conviction; concerning which the same Rules in Effect are prescribed, as provided by the abovementioned Statue of 4 & 5 W. & M. 8. concerning the Reward of 40 l. to be paid to those who shall apprehend a Highwayman.

CHAP. XIII.

Of Arrests by publick Officers.

ARRESTS of Offenders by publick Officers, are either by Virtue of Process from some Court of Record, or without such Process. Arrests of this Kind by Virtue of such Process, shall be considered hereafter in their proper Place.

Arrests by publick Officers without such Process, are either

1. By Watchmen.

2. By Constables.
3. By Bailiffs of Towns, or
4. By Justices of Peace.

Sect. 1. But before I consider the Nature of each of these in particular, I shall take it for granted, That where-ever any such Arrest may be justified by a private Person, in every such Case a fortiori it may be justified by any such Officer. As to Arrests by Watchmen, I shall first premise in what Manner Watch is to be kept in every Town, and then shall shew the Power of the Watchmen.

Sect. 2. And first, As to the keeping Watch in every Town, it is enacted by the Statute of Winchester, Ch. 4. That from thenceforth all Towns be kept as it had been used in Times passed, That is to wit, from the Day of Ascension unto the Day of St. Michael, in every City six Men shall keep at every Gate, in every Borough twelve Men, in every Town six or four, according to the Number of Inhabitants of the Town, and shall watch the Town continually all Night, from the Sunsetting to the Sunrising.

Sect. 3. And it is farther enacted by 5 H. 4. 3. That the Watch to be made upon the Sea-Coasts through the Realm, shall be made by the Number of the People in the Places, and in Manner and Form, as they were wont to be made in Times past, and that in the same Case the Statute of Winchester be observed and kept; and that in the Commissions of the Peace this Article be put in, That the Justices of Peace have Power thereof to make Inquiry in their Sessions from Time to Time, and to punish them which be found in Default after the Tenor of the said Statute.

Sect. 4. It hath been resolved, That a Stranger who is not an Inhabitant of a Town, [a] cannot be compelled by Virtue of the said Statute of Winchester to keep Watch in it; but it seems to be agreed, That every Inhabitant is bound to keep it in his Turn, or to [b] find another sufficient Person to keep it for him; from whence it follows, That he is indictable for a Refusal: But it is [c] not agreed, That he may be committed by the Constable till he consent to do his Duty.[20]

Sect. 5. As to the Power of Watchmen, it is farther enacted by the said Statute of Winchester, Ch. 4. That if any Stranger do pass by the Watch, he shall be arrested until Morning. And if no Suspicion be found, be shall go quit; and if they find Cause of Suspicion, they shall forthwith deliver him to the Sheriff, and the Sheriff may receive him without Damage, and shall keep him safely until he be acquitted in due Manner. And if they will not obey the Arrest, they shall levy Hue and Cry upon them, and such as keep the Town shall follow with Hue and Cry with all the Town and the Towns near, and so Hue and Cry shall be made from Town to Town, until that they be taken, and delivered to the Sheriff as before is said: And for the Arrestments of such Strangers none shall be punished.[21]

Sect. 6. It is holden, That this Statute was made in Affirmance of the Common Law, and that every private Person may by the Common Law arrest any suspicious Nightwalker, and detain him till he give a good Account of himself, as hath been more fully shewn in the precedent Chapter, Section 20.[22]

Secondly, As to such Arrests by Constables, I shall endeavour to shew,

1. How far they may be justified by their own Authority.
2. How far by Virtue of a Warrant from a Justice of Peace.

Sect. 7. And first, As to the justifying of such Arrests by the Constable's own Authority; it seems difficult to find any Case, wherein a Constable is impowered to arrest a Man for a Felony committed or attempted, in which a private Person might not as well be justified in doing it: But the chief Difference between the Power and Duty of a Constable and a private Person, in Respect of such Arrests, seems to be this, That the [a] former has the greater Authority to demand the Assistance of others, and is liable to the severer Fine for any Neglect of this Kind, and has no sure Way to discharge himself of the Arrest of any Person apprehended by him for Felony, [b] without bringing him before a Justice of Peace in order to be examined, as shall be more fully shewn in the 16th Chapter; whereas a private Person having made such an Arrest, needs only to deliver his Prisoner into the Hands of the Constable.[23]

Sect. 8. But it is said, That a Constable hath Authority not only to arrest those whom he shall see actually engaged in an Affray, but also to detain them till they find Sureties of the Peace, as hath been more fully shewn in the [c] first Book; whereas a private Person seems to have no other Power in a bare Affray, not attended with the Danger of Life, but only to stay the [d] Affrayers till the Heat be over, and then deliver them to the Constable, and also to stop those whom he shall see coming to join either Party: But it is difficult to find any Instance wherein a Constable hath any greater Power than a private Person over a Breach of the Peace out of his View; and it seems clear, That he cannot justify an Arrest for any such Offence, without a Warrant from a Justice of Peace, &c.[24]

unlawfully made by a Constable without a Warrant, cannot be made good by a Warrant taken out afterwards; also it hath been [f] holden, That if a Constable, after he hath arrested the Party by Force of any such Warrant, suffer him to go at large, upon his Promise to come again at such a Time and find Sureties, he cannot afterwards arrest him by Force of the same Warrant: However, if the Party return and put himself again under the Custody of the Constable, it seems, that it may be probably argued, That the Constable may lawfully detain him, and bring him before the Justice in Pursuance of the Warrant; for if a Person taken by Virtue of a civil Process, and voluntarily suffered by the Sheriff to escape, may afterwards upon his Return to the Prison be kept by the Sheriff by Virtue of the same Process, unless the Plaintiff rather chuse to take Advantage of the Escape against the Sheriff; surely a fortiori upon an Arrest for a Crime, in which Case it is to be presumed, That the Publick Good requires that the Party be brought to Justice, it shall likewise be lawful to detain a Person returning to the Officer after such an Escape: However as the Law seems [g] not to be settled in Relation to such an Escape after an Arrest by Virtue of a civil Process; so neither doth it seem to be clear in Relation to an Escape after an Arrest by Force of such a Warrant from a Justice of Peace.[25]

Sect. 10. But it seems clear, That a Constable cannot justify any Arrest by [h] Force of a Warrant from a Justice of Peace, which expresly appears in the Face of it, to be for an Offence whereof a Justice of Peace hath no Jurisdiction, or to bring the [i] Party before him at a Place out of the County for which he is a Justice. But it seems, That he both may and ought to execute a general Warrant to bring a Person before a Justice of Peace, to answer such Matters as shall be objected against him on the Part of the King; for that the Officer ought to presume, That the Justice hath a Jurisdiction of the Matter, which he takes [k] Conusance of, unless the contrary appear; and it may often endanger the Escape of the Party to make known the Crime he is accused of. But it seems to be very questionable, Whether a Constable can justify the Execution of a general Warrant to search for Felons or stolen Goods, because such Warrant seems to be illegal in the very Face of it; for that it would be extremely hard to leave it to the Discretion of a common Officer to arrest what Persons, and search what Houses he thinks fit: And if a Justice cannot legally grant a blank Warrant for the Arrest of a single Person, leaving it to the Party to fill it up, surely he cannot grant such a general Warrant, which might have the Effect of an Hundred blank Warrants.[26]

Sect. 11. Yet perhaps it is the better Opinion at this Day, That any Constable, or even private Person, to whom a Warrant shall be directed from a Justice of Peace to arrest a particular Person for Felony, or any other Misdemeanor within his Jurisdiction, may lawfully execute it, whether the Person mentioned in it be in Truth guilty or innocent, and whether he were before indicted of the same Offence or not, and whether any Felony were in Truth committed or not, for however the Justice himself may be punishable for granting such a Warrant without sufficient Grounds, it is reasonable that he alone be answerable for it, and not the Officer, who is not to examine or dispute the Reasonableness of his Proceeding; and therefore it seems that the old Books, (cited in the foregoing Chapter, Sect. 15, 16.) which say generally, That no one can justify an Arrest upon a Suspicion of Felony, unless he himself suspect the Party, and unless the Felony were in Truth committed, ought to be intended only of Arrests made by a Person of his own Head, or in Obedience to the Command of a Constable, or other such like ministerial Officer, and not of such as are made in Pursuance of the Warrant of a Justice of Peace; for inasmuch as it seems to have been the constant and allowed Practice of late, to make out Warrants on the Suspicion of Felony, before any Indictment hath been found against the Person suspected, and the same seems to be countenanced by 1 & 2 Ph. & Mar. 13. and 2 & 3 Ph. & Mar. 10. which direct in what Manner Persons brought before Justices of Peace upon Suspicion, shall be examined in order to their being committed or bailed; and since the ancient [a] Opinion, That a Justice of Peace cannot make out a Warrant against a Man for Felony, who has not been indicted before, hath been [b] contradicted by constant Experience; and since in the very same [c] Report in which this Rule is laid down. That a Justice of Peace cannot make a Warrant against a Person who has not been indicted; it seems nevertheless to be agreed, That such a Warrant is a good Justification for the Officer; and since none of the [d] Books cited by Sir Edward Coke to maintain the contrary Opinion, mention the Case of an Arrest by Force of a Warrant from a Justice of Peace, but generally relate only to Arrests by private Persons of their own Authority, or by the Command of a Constable; and since too, the [e] Case, which is fullest to the Purpose, wherein it is resolved, That an Arrest of a Person by the Command of a Bishop for saying, That he was not bound to pay Tithes, could not be justified by Force of the [f] Statute, which authorized Bishops to arrest Persons for Heresy, for which this Reason is given among others, That the Bishop himself could not justify such an Arrest, and consequently could not authorize another to make it; it may be answered, That the Resolution in that Case doth not wholly depend upon this Reason, but rather perhaps upon these, that the Bishop's Command was by Parol only, and not by Writing, and that the Statute gave him no Jurisdiction over Points not Heretical; and that the Power of Imprisoning Persons for mere Matters of Opinion ought to be strictly construed: And farther, since the Person injured by an Arrest on a Justice's Warrant, hath a good Action against the Justice who granted it, if he did it maliciously of his own Head, in order to oppress or defame the Party without any probable Ground of Suspicion, and therefore there is no Necessity of giving a farther Remedy against the Officer who obeys the Warrant: And farther, since it is in general a great Discouragement to Officers, to subject them to Actions for endeavoring to serve the Publick, by paying Obedience to the Precepts of those whose Officers they are; it would certainly be very difficult at this Day to maintain an Action against them for any Arrest of this Kind, unless the Warrant appear to be for a Matter whereof the Justice has no Jurisdiction. It seems indeed to be holden in Broucher's Case in Croke's second Report, That where an Officer arrests a Man by Force of a Warrant from a Magistrate, pro certis Causis, without shewing any Cause in particular, he cannot justify himself in an Action brought against him for such Arrest, without setting forth the particular Cause in his Plea; and yet in this very Report it seems to be allowed, That such a general Warrant is good; and if so, it seems strange, That the Officer should not be justified by setting forth the Truth of his Case; since if there were no good Cause to justify the Granting of the Warrant, the Magistrate ought to answer for it, not the Officer.[27]

Sect. 12. Thirdly, As to such Arrests by Bailiffs of Towns, it is enacted by the abovementioned Statute of Winchester, Ch. 4. That in great Towns being walled, The Gates shall be closed from the Sunsetting until the Sunrising, and that no Man do lodge in the Suburbs, nor in any Place out of the Town, from nine of the Clock until Day, without his Host will answer for him: And the Bailiffs of Towns every Week, or at the least every fifteenth Day, shall make Inquiry of all Persons being lodged in the Suburbs, or in foreign Place of the Towns; and if they do find any that have lodged or received any Strangers or suspicious Persons against the Peace, the Bailiffs shall do Right therein. And surely it cannot be doubted, but that by Force hereof such Bailiffs may lawfully arrest and detain any such Stranger, being found under probable Circumstances of Suspicion, till he shall give a good Account of himself.

Sect. 13. Fourthly, As to such Arrests by Justices of Peace, I shall first take it for granted, That where-ever an Arrest of this Kind by a private Person, or inferior Officer acting of their own Authority, is either permitted or injoined by the Law, in every such Case, a fortiori, such an Arrest by a Justice of Peace in Person, is also permitted or injoined.[28]

Arrests by the Command of Justices of Peace, as such, are either,

1. By Parol.
2. By Warrant.

Sect. 14. And first, As to such Arrest by Parol, it seems, That any such Justice may lawfully, by Word of Mouth, authorize any one to arrest another, who shall be guilty of any actual Breach of the Peace in his Presence, of shall be engaged in a Riot in his Absence, as hath been more fully shewn in the first Book, Ch. 65. Sect. 16.[29]

As to such Arrests by the Warrant of a Justice of Peace, I shall endeavour to shew,

1. In what cases a Warrant for such an Arrest may lawfully be made by such a Justice.
2. In want Form it ought to be made.
3. How it is to be executed.

As to the first Point, I shall consider,

1. For what Offences such a Warrant may be granted.
2. Upon what Evidence.

Sect. 15. And first, as to the Offences for which such a Warrant may be granted, there seems to be no Doubt, but that it may be lawfully granted by Justice of Peace for Treason, Felony or Praemunire, or any other Offence against the Peace, as hath been more fully shewn in the Chapter concerning Justices of Peace: Also it seems clear, That where-ever a Statute gives to any one Justice of Peace a Jurisdiction over any Offence, or a Power to require any Person to do a certain Thing ordained by such Statute, it impliedly gives a power to every such Justice to make out a Warrant to bring before him any Person accused of such Offence, or compellable to do the Thing ordained by such Statute; for it cannot but be intended, that a Statute giving a Persons Jurisdiction over an Offence, doth mean also to give him the Power incident to all Courts, of compelling the Party to come before him. And it would be to little Purpose to authorize a Man to require another to do a Thing, if it were to be understood that the Person authorized had no Power to compel the Party to come before him.[30]

Sect. 16. But it seems, That anciently no one Justice of Peace could legally make out a Warrant for an Offence against a penal Statute, or other Misdemeanor, cognizable only by a Sessions of two or more Justices; for that one single Justice of Peace hath no Jurisdiction of such Offence, and regularly those only who have Jurisdiction over a Cause can award Process concerning it. Yet the long, constant, universal and uncontrolled Practice of Justices of Peace seems to have altered the Law in this Particular, and to have given them an Authority in Relation to such Arrests, not now to be disputed.[31]

Sect. 17. But I do not find any good Authority, That a Justice can justify sending a general Warrant to search all suspected Houses in general for stolen Goods, as hath been more fully shewn, Sect. 10.[32]

Sect. 18. Secondly, As to the Evidence on which such a Warrant is to be granted, it seems probable, That the Practice of Justices of Peace in Relation to this Matter also, is now become a Law, and that any Justice of Peace may justify the Granting of a Warrant for the Arrest of any Person upon strong Grounds of Suspicion for a Felony or other Misdemeanor, before any Indictment hath been found against him. Yet inasmuch as Justices of Peace claim this Power rather by Connivance, than any express Warrant of Law, and since the undue Execution of it may prove so highly prejudicial to the Reputation as well as the Liberty of the Party, a Justice of Peace cannot well be too tender in his Proceedings of this Kind, and seems to be punishable not only at the Suit of the King, but also of the Party grieved; if he grant any such Warrant groundlesly and maliciously, without such a probable Cause, as might induce a candid and impartial Man to suspect the Party to be guilty.[33]

Sect. 19. And since both Coke and Hale seem to disapprove of such Warrants granted upon Suspicion, and the old Books seem generally to disallow all Arrests for the Suspicion of Felony made by any other Person whatsoever, except the very Person who hath the Suspicion; it is certainly a safe Way of Proceeding of him, who hath the Suspicion, to make the Arrest in his proper Person, and to get a Warrant from a Justice of Peace to the Constable to keep the Peace.[34]

Sect. 20. And perhaps there may be this Difference between the Warrant of a Justice of Peace, for such Causes which he has not Authority to hear and determine as Judge without the Concurrence of others, and such Warrant for an Offence which he may so determine, without the Concurrence of any other: That in the former Case, inasmuch as he rather proceeds ministerially than judicially, if he act corruptly, he is liable to an Action at the Suit of the Party, as well as to an Information at the Suit of the King: But in the latter Case he is punishable only at the Suit of the King, for that regularly no Man is liable to an Action for what he doth as Judge.[35]

As to the second Point, viz. In what Form such a Warrant is to be made, I shall lay down the following Rules:

Sect. 21. I. That [a] it ought to be under the Hand and Seal of the Justice who makes it out.[36]

Sect. 22. II. That it [b] ought to set forth the Year and Day wherein it is made, That in an Action brought upon an Arrest made by Virtue of it, it may appear to have been prior to such Arrest.[37]

Sect. 23. III. That it is [c] safe, but perhaps not necessary, in the Body of the Warrant to shew the Place where it was made; yet it seems necessary to set forth the County in the Margin at least, if it be not set forth in the Body.[38]

Sect. 24. IV. That it may be made either in the Name of the King, or of the Justice himself, as appears from the Precedents above referred to.

Sect. 25. V. [d] That if it be for the Peace of Good Behaviour, it is adviseable to set forth the special Cause upon which it is granted; but if it be for Treason or Felony, or other Offence of an enormous Nature, it is said, That it is not necessary to set it forth; and it seems to be rather discretionary, than necessary to set it forth in any Case.[39]

Sect. 26. VI. [e] That such a Warrant may be either general, to bring the Party before any Justice of Peace of the County, or special, to bring him before the Justice only who granted it.[40]

Sect. 27. VII. [f] That it may be directed to the Sheriff, Bailiff, Constable, or to any indifferent Person by Name, who is no Officer; for that the Justice may authorize any one to be his Officer, whom he pleases to make such, yet it is most adviseable to direct it to the Constable of the Precinct wherein it is to be executed; [g] for that no other Constable, and a fortiori no private Person, is compellable to serve it.[41]

As to the third Point, viz. In what Manner such Warrant is to be executed, I shall lay down the following Rules:

Sect. 28. I. That a Bailiff, or a Constable, if they be sworn and commonly known to be Officers, and act within their own Precincts, need not shew their Warrant to the Party, notwithstanding he demand the Sight of it; but that these and all other Persons whatsoever making an Arrest, ought to acquaint the Party with the Substance of their Warrants, even Officers, if they be not sworn and commonly known, and even these, if they act out of their own Precincts must shew their Warrants, if demanded.[42]

Sect. 29. II. That the Sheriff having such Warrant directed to him, may authorize others to execute it; but that every other Person to whom it is directed, must personally execute it; yet it seems, That any one may lawfully assist him.[43]

Sect. 30. III. That if a Warrant be generally directed to all Constables, no one can execute it out of his own Precinct; but if it be directed to a particular Constable by Name, he may execute it where within the Jurisdiction of the Justice.[44]

CHAP. XIV.

Where Doors may be broken open in Order to make an Arrest.

Sect. 1. AND now I am to consider in what Cases it is lawful to break open Doors, in Order to apprehend Offenders; and to this Purpose I shall premise, That the Law doth never allow of such [a] Extremities but in Case of Necessity; and therefore, That no one can justify the Breaking open another's Doors to make an Arrest, unless he first signify to those in the House the Cause of his Coming and request them to give him Admittance.[45]

Sect. 2. But where a Person authorized to arrest another who is sheltered in a House, is denied quietly to enter into it, in Order to take him; it seems generally to be agreed, That he may justify Breaking open the Doors in the following Instances.

Sect. 3. I. Upon a [b] Capias grounded on an Indictment for any Crime whatsoever, or upon a [c] Capias from the [d] King's Bench or Chancery, to compel a Man to find Sureties for the Peace or Good Behaviour, or even upon a Warrant from a Justice of Peace for such Purpose.[46]

Sect. 4. II. Upon a [e] Capias utlagatum, or Capias pro fine, in any Action whatsoever.[47]

Sect. 5. III. Upon the [f] Warrant of a Justice of Peace, for the Levying of a Forfeiture in Execution of a Judgment or Conviction for it grounded on any Statute which gives the Whole, or put Part of such Forfeiture to the King, and authorizes the Justice of Peace to give such Judgment or Conviction for it.[48]

Sect. 6. IV. Where a [g] forcible Entry or Detainer is either found by Inquisition before Justices of Peace, or appears upon their View.[49]

Sect. 7. V. [h] Where one known to have committed a Treason or Felony, or to [i] have given another a dangerous Wound, is pursued either with or without a Warrant, by a Constable or private Person: But where one lies under a probable Suspicion only, and is not indicted, it seems the better [a] Opinion at this Day, That no one can justify the Breaking open Doors in Order to apprehend him.[50]

Sect. 8. VI. Where an [b] Affray is made in a House in the View or Hearing of a Constable; or where those who have made an Affray in his Presence fly to a House, and are immediately pursued by him, and he is not suffered to enter; in Order to suppress the Affray in the first Case, or to apprehend the Affrayers in either Case.[51]

Sect. 9. VII. Wherever a [c] Person is lawfully arrested for any Cause and afterwards escapes, and shelters him in a House.[52]

Sect. 10. Also it is enacted by 3 & 4 Jac. 1. Par. 35. That upon any lawful Writ, Warrant or Process awarded to any Sheriff or other Officer, for the Taking of any Popish Recusant, standing excommunicated for such Recusancy, it shall be lawful, if need be, to break open any House.

Sect. 11. But it hath been resolved, That where Justices of Peace are, by Virtue of a Statute, authorized to require Persons to come before them, to take certain Oaths prescribed by such Statute, the Officer cannot lawfully break open the Doors of the Persons who shall be named in any Warrant made in Pursuance of such Statute, in order to be brought before the Justices to take such Oath, because such Warrant is not grounded on a precedent Offence; neither doth it appear, That the Party either is or will be guilty of any: But it seems clear, That if an Officer enter into any House to serve any such Warrant, and the Doors of the House be locked upon him, being in such House, he or his Friends may justify Breaking them open, in Order to regain his Liberty; for that even in the Execution of civil Process, the Law allows of the Breaking open Doors in the like Circumstances.[53]

6.3.1.4.a Search Warrant

SEARCH WARRANT.

ALthough it is not unusual for justices to grant general warrants, to search all suspected places for stolen goods, and there is a precedent in Dalton requiring the constable to search all such suspected places as he and the party complaining shall think convenient; yet such practice is generally condemned by the best authorities.

Thus lord Hale, in his pleas of the crown, says a general warrant to search for felons or stolen goods, is not good. H. Pl. 93.

Mr. Hawkins says, I do not find any good authority that a justice can justify sending a general warrant, to search all suspected houses in general for stolen goods; because such warrant seems to be illegal in the very face of it; for it would be extremely hard, to leave it to the discretion of a common officer, to arrest what persons, and search what houses he thinks fit; and if a justice cannot legally grant a blank warrant for the arrest of a single person leaving it to the party to fill up, surely he cannot grant such a general warrant, which might have the effect of an hundred blank warrants. 2 Haw. 82, 84.

Again, lord Hale, in his history of the pleas of the crown, expresseth himself thus; I do take it, that a general warrant to search in all suspected places, is not good; but only to search in such particular places, where the party assigns before the justice this suspicion, and the probable cause thereof; for these warrants are judicial acts, and must be granted upon examination of the fact. 2 H. H. 150.

And therefore, he says, he takes it that the those warrants dormant, which are many times made before any felony committed, are not justifiable, for it makes the party to be in effect the judge; and therefore searches made by pretence of such general warrants, give no more power to the officer or party, than what they may do by law without them. 2 H. H. 150.

Likewise, upon a bare surmise, a justice cannot make a warrant to break any man’s house, to search for a felon, or for stolen goods; for the justices being created by act of parliament, have no such authority granted to them by any act of parliament; and it would be full of inconvenience, that it should be in the power of any justice of the peace, being a judge of record, upon a bare suggestion to break the house of any person, of what state, quality, or degree soever, either in the day or night, upon such surmises. 4 Inst. 177.

But in case of a complaint, and oath made, of goods stolen, and that the party suspects the goods are in such a house, and shews the cause of his suspicion; the justice may grant a warrant to search in those suspected places mentioned in his warrant, and to attach the goods, and the party in whose custody they are found, and bring them before him, or some other justice, to give an account how he came by them, and further to abide such order as to law shall appertain. 2 H. H. 113, 150.

But in that case, lord Hale says, it is convenient that such warrant do require the search to be made in the day time; and though I will not affirm (says he) that they are unlawful without such restriction, yet they are very inconvenient without it; for many times, under pretence of searches made in the night, robberies and burglaries have been committed, and at best it creates great disturbances. 2 H. H. 150.

But in case not of probable suspicion only, but of positive proofs, it is right to execute the warrant in the night time, lest the offenders and goods also be gone before morning. Barl. Search War.

Furthermore, such warrant ought to be directed to the constable, or other publick officer, and not to any private person; though it is fit the party complaining should be present and assistant, because he knows his goods. 2 H. H. 150.

So much for granting a search warrant; Next touching the execution of it.

Whether the stolen goods are in a suspected house or not, the officer and his assistants in the day time may enter, the doors being open, to make search, and it is justifiable by the warrant. 2 H. H. 151.

If the door be shut, and upon demand it be refused to be opened by them within, if the stolen goods be in the house, the officer may break open the door. 2 H. H. 151.

If the goods be not in the house, yet it seems the officer is excused that breaks open the door to search, because he searched by warrant, and could not know whether the goods were there, till search made; but it seems the party that made the suggestion is punishable in such case; for as to him the breaking of the door is in eventu lawful or unlawful, to wit, lawful if the goods are there, unlawful if not there. 2 H. H. 151.

On the return of the warrant executed, the justice hath these things to do:

As touching the goods brought before him, if it appears they were not stolen, they are to be restored to the possessor; if it appear they were stolen, they are not to be delivered to the proprietor, but deposited in the hand of the sheriff or constable, to the end the party robbed may proceed indicting and convicting the offender, to have restitution 2 H. H. 151.

As touching the party that had the custody of the goods; if they were not stolen, then he is to be discharged; if stolen, but not by him, but by another that sold or delivered them to him, if it appear that he was ignorant that they were stolen, he may be discharged as an offender, and bound over to give evidence as a witness against him that sold them; if it appear he was knowing they were stolen, he must be committed or bound over to answer the felony 2 H. H. 152.

[6.3.1.4.b Warrant]

WARRANT.

FOR a warrant to search for stolen goods, see Search Warrant.

If a justice see a felony or other breach of the peace committed in his presence, he may in his own person apprehend the felon; and so he may by word command any person to apprehend him, and such command is a good warrant without writing: but if the same be done in his absence, then he must issue his warrant in writing. 2 H. H. 86.

Concerning which we will shew,

I. For what causes it may be granted.
II. What is to be done previous to the granting of it.
III. How far it is grantable on suspicion.
IV. The form of it.

I. FOR WHAT CAUSES IT MAY BE GRANTED.

There seems to be no doubt, but that a warrant may be lawfully granted by any justice, for treason, felony, or præmunire, or any other offence against the peace: Also it seems clear, that where-ever a statute gives to any one justice a jurisdiction over any offence, or a power to require any person to do a certain thing ordained by such statute, it impliedly gives a power to every such justice to make out a warrant to bring before him any person accused of such offence, or compellable to do the thing ordained by such statute; for it cannot but be intended, that a statute giving a person jurisdiction over an offence, doth mean also to give him the power incident to all courts, of compelling the party to come before him. 2 Haw. 84.

But in cases where the king is no party, or where no corporal punishment is appointed, as in cases for servants wages, and the like, it seemeth that a summons is the more proper process; and for default of appearance the justice may proceed; and so indeed oftentimes it is directed by special statutes.

II. WHAT IS TO BE DONE PREVIOUS TO THE GRANTING OF IT.

It is convenient, though not always necessary, that the party who demands the warrant be first examined on oath, touching the whole matter whereupon the warrant is demanded, and that examination put into writing. 1 H. H. 582. 2 H. H. 111.

Or at least it is safe to bind him over to give evidence; lest afterwards when the offender shall be apprehended, or shall surrender himself, the party that procured the warrant be gone. Dalt. c. 169.

III. HOW FAR IT IS GRANTABLE ON SUSPICION.

Lord Hale proves at large, contrary to the opinion of lord Coke (4 Inst. 177.) that a justice hath power to issue a warrant to apprehend a person suspected of felony, before he is indicted; and that though the original suspicion be not in himself, but in the party that prays his warrant. 2 H. H. 107—110.

For the justices are judges of the reasonableness of the suspicion, and when they have examined the party accusing touching the reasons of his suspicion, if they find the causes of suspicion to be reasonable, it is now become the justices suspicion as well as theirs. 2 H. H. 80.

And in another place speaking of this opinion of lord Coke, he delivers himself seemingly with a kind of warmth not usual to him: I think, says he, the law is not so, and the constant practice in all cases hath obtained against it, and it would be pernicious to the kingdom if it should be as lord Coke delivers it; for malefactors would escape unexamined and undiscovered, for a man may have a probable and strong presumption of the guilt of a person, whom yet he cannot positively swear to be guilty. 1 H. H. 579.

Mr. Hawkins likewise seems to be of the same opinion against lord Coke, but delivereth himself with his wonted caution and candour: It seems probable, he says, that the practice of justices of the peace in relation to this matter, is now become a law, and that a justice may justify the granting of a warrant for the arrest of any person, upon strong grounds of suspicion, for a felony or other misdemeanor, before any indictment hath been found against him; yet inasmuch as justices claim this power rather by connivance, than any express warrant of law, and since the undue execution of it may prove so highly prejudicial to the reputation as well as the liberty of the party, a justice cannot well be too tender in his proceedings of this kind, and seems to be punishable not only at the suit of the king, but also of the party grieved, if he grant any such warrant groundlesly [sic] and maliciously, without such a probable cause as might induce a candid and impartial man to suspect the party to the guilty. 2 Haw. 85.

But a general warrant, upon a complaint of robbery, to apprehend all persons suspected, and to bring them before a justice, hath been ruled void; and false imprisonment lies against him that issues such a warrant. 1 H. H. 580. 2 H. H. 112.

IV. THE FORM OF IT.

1. Mr. Dalton says, the warrant is the better, if it bear date of the place where it was made. Dalt. c. 169.

And lord Hale says, the place, though it must be alledged in pleading, need not be expressed in the warrant. 2 H. H. 111.

And Mr. Hawkins says, It is safe, but perhaps not necessary, in the body of the warrant to shew the place where it was made; yet it seems necessary to set forth the county, in the margin at least, if it be not set forth in the body. 2 Haw. 85.

2. It may be directed to the sheriff, bailiff, constable, or to any indifferent person by name who is no officer; for the justice may authorize any one to be his officer, whom he pleases to make such; yet it is most adviseable to direct it to the constable of the precinct wherein it is to be executed, for that no other constable, and à fortiori no private person, is compellable to serve it. 2 Haw. 85. Dalt. c. 169. 2 H. H. 110.

But in the case of an act of parliament, it is said, that if the act directeth that a justice shall grant a warrant, and doth not say to whom it shall be directed, by consequence of law it must be directed to the constable, and it cannot be directed to the sheriff, unless such power is given in the act. Ld. Raym. 1192. 2 Salk. 381.

3. The warrant may be stiled in divers manners: As 1. In the name of the king; and yet the teste must be under the name of the justice that grants it out. Or, 2. It may be stiled and made only in the name of the justice. Or, 3. It may be made without any such stile, and only under the teste of the justice, or only subscribed by him. As followeth:

In the King's majesty's name.

Westmorland. GEORGE the third, by the grace of God, of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, king, defender of the faith, and so forth; To our sheriff of the county of ——— to the high constables of the hundred of ——— in the same county, and to the petty constables of the town of ——— in the same county, and to all and singular our bailiffs and ministers in the same county, as well within liberties, as without, greeting:

Forasmuch as A. I. of ——— hath come before J. P. esquire, one of our justices assigned to keep our peace within the said county, and hath, &c.

(Concluding it in the justice's name, as thus:) Witness the said J. P. at ——— the ——— day of ———.

Note, That wheresoever the warrant is made in the king's name, there it ought to be directed to all ministers, as well within liberties, as without, for that the king is made a party: And so it may be done in all other warrants, especially for felony, or for the peace or the good behaviour, because it is the service of the king. Dalt. c. 174.

Or thus, in the name of the justice himself.

Westmorland. J. P. esquire, one of the justices of our lord the king, assigned to keep the peace within the said county; To the sheriff of the said country, to the bailiff or constables of the hundred of ——— within the said county, to the petty constables of the town of ——— within the said hundred and county, and to all other the ministers and officers of our said lord the king within the said county, and to every of them, greeting:

Forasmuch as, &c. Given under my hand and seal the ——— day of, &c. Dalt. c. 174.

4. Regularly, the warrant, especially if it be for the peace or good behaviour, or the like, where sureties are to be found or required, ought to contain the special cause and matter, whereupon it is granted, to the intent that the party upon whom it is to be served, may provide his sureties ready, and take them with him to the justice to be bound for him; but if the warrant be for treason, murder, or felony, or other capital offence, or for great conspiracies, rebellious assemblies, or the like, it hath been said, that it needeth not to contain and special cause, but the warrant of the justice may be to bring the party before him, to make answer to such things or matters generally, as shall be objected against him on the king's behalf. Dalt. c. 169. 2 Haw. 85. 2 H. H. 111.

But Mr. Lambard says, every warrant made by a justice of the peace ought to comprehend the special matter upon which it proceedeth; even as all the king's writs do bear their proper cause in their mouth with them: And as for the form that is commonly used, to answer to such things as shall be objected, and such like, they were not fetched out of the old learned precedents, but lately brought in by such as either knew not, or cared not, what they writ. Lamb. 87.

5. The warrant ought regularly to mention the name of the party to be attached, and must not be left in general, or with blanks to be filled up by the party afterwards. 2 H. 114. Dalt. c. 169.

6. The warrant may issue to bring the party before the justice who granted the warrant specially, and then the officer is bound to bring him before the same justice; but if the warrant be to bring him before any justice, then it is in the election of the officer to bring him before what justice of the county he thinks fit, and not in the election of the prisoner. 1 H. H. 582. 2 H. H. 112.

7. It ought to set forth the year and day wherein it is made, that in an action brought upon an arrest by virtue of it, it may appear to have been prior to such arrest; and also, in case where a statute directeth the prosecution to be within such a time, that it may appear, that the prosecution is commenced within such time limited: Likewise, where a penalty is given to the poor of the parish where the offence shall be committed, or the like, it ought to specify the place where the offence was committed. 2 Haw. 85.

8. Finally, it ought to be under the hand and seal of the justice who makes it out. 2 Haw. 85.

The execution of a warrant belongs to title Arrest.

6.3.1.5Cunningham, 1765

Arrest, (Arrestum) Is derived from the French word arrester, to stop or stay, and signifies a restraint of a man's person, depriving him of his own will and liberty, and binding him to become obedient to the will of the law: And it may be called the beginning of imprisonment. Cowell.

Arrest is either civil or criminal.

1. Arrest in civil cases.
2. Arrest in criminal cases.

1. ARREST IN CIVIL CASES.

An arrest in a civil cause is the apprehending or restraining one's person by process in execution of the command of some court, or officer of justice. Wood's Inst. 575.

Magna Charta, c. 29. None shall be taken, imprisoned, or disseised of his freehold, but by judgment of his peers, or according to the law of the land.

Stat. 3 Ed. 1. c. 35. Whereas great men and their bailiffs used to attach others passing thro' their jurisdiction with their goods, compelling them to answer upon contracts, covenants and trespasses, done out of their jurisdiction; this practice is hereby prohibited, on pain of the offenders forfeiting double damages to the party grieved, and being amerced by the King.

Stat. 50 Ed. 3. c. 5. Clerks attending divine service in churches, churchyards, and other sacred places, shall not be arrested by authority royal, or the command of other temporal lords, upon pain of grievous forfeiture, so that collusion or feigned cause be not found in the said clerks.

Stat. 1 Ric. 2. c. 15. If any minister of the King or other, do arrest any person of holy church, in churches or churchyards, or in other places, while they are attending divine service, he shall be imprisoned and ransomed at the King's will, and make satisfaction to the party so arrested, provided that the said people of holy church shall not hold them within the churches or sanctuaries, by fraud or collusion in any manner.

Stat. 23 Hen. 6. c. 10. No sheriff, undersheriff, or bailiff, shall take any reward for arresting, or for the omitting to arrest any man; and upon every arrest, the sheriff shall have for his fee but twenty pence, the bailiff who makes the arrest four pence, and the gaoler to whom he is committed four pence.

No sheriff or his officer shall take any obligation, by colour of his office, of a prisoner in his custody, but only to himself, by the name of his office, and upon condition written, that the prisoner shall appear at the day contained in the writ or warrant in the court or place required, and if he take any other obligation, he shall forfeit his office: nor shall he take more than four pence for making such obligation, precept, or warrant: And if the said sheriffs return cepi corpus, or reddidit se, they shall be chargeable to have the bodies of the said persons at the days of the returns of the said writs, &c. as before the making this act. Ibid.

Stat. 23 H. 8. c. 15. If any person commence or sue in any court of record, or other court, any action, bill or plaint of trespass, upon the statute of 5 Ric. 2. c. 7. or any action, bill, or plaint of debt or covenant, upon specialty, or upon any contract, or upon any action of the case, or upon any statute, for any personal wrong, and the plaintiff after appearance of the defendant be nonsuited, or verdict pass against him, then the defendant shall recover his costs; for which he shall have such process, as the plaintiff might have in case he had recovered.

Persons suing in forma pauperis, shall not be compelled to pay costs by virtue of this act, but shall be punished at the discretion of the justices or judge, before whom the action is brought. ib.

Stat. 8 Eliz. c. 2. If any one shall, maliciously and without just cause, procure any person to be molested and troubled by attachments and arrests, by process of latitat, alias and pluries capias, sued out of the King’s Bench, and the defendant shall be arrested or appear, and put in bail, then if the plaintiff do not within three days after such bail had and taken, declare against the defendant, or after his declaration, discontinue or become nonsuit, the court shall award to the defendant so arrested, vexed or troubled, his costs, damages and charges thereby sustained.

If any person shall be attach’d or arrested by process, out of the marshalsea or of any court in the city of London, or in any city, borough, town corporate, or other place, having the privilege of holding a plea in personal actions, and do not in all courts, having their continuance de die in diem, declare within three days after the appearance of the defendant, or bail put in, and where such courts are otherwise kept, declare at the next court after the appearance, &c. and prosecute his suit with effect, &c. the defendant shall have his costs, damages and charges. ib.

And if any person shall maliciously, or for vexation and trouble, cause any one to be arrested or attached in a fictitious name, or without the consent of the person at whose suit the defendant is arrested, such offender convicted by presentment, indictment, or two witnesses, shall suffer six months imprisonment, without bail or mainprize, and pay to the party so arrested or attached, treble the cost, charges and expences he shall be put to, and shall forfeit to the person in whose name the suit was brought, if there be any such, the sum of ten pounds. ib.

Stat. 4 Jac. 1. c. 3. Persons to whom costs or damages are given, by this act may recover the same by action, &c. in any court of record, against the offender, his executors and administrators, in which action, no essoin, protection, &c. shall be allowed.

Stat. 43 Eliz. c. 6. If any sheriff or other person, having authority, or taking upon him to break writs, do make a warrant, as upon any writ, process, or suit, or for the arrest or attaching of any person to appear in courts at Westminster or elsewhere, not having before an original writ or process warranting the same; upon conviction thereof before a judge of assise, or the judges of the court out of which the process issued, such offender may by the said judges, be committed to the county gaol where he was examined, until he pay ten pounds to the party grieved, with costs, and twenty pounds to the King.

Stat. 4 Jac. 1. c. 3. In any action whatever, where the plaintiff or defendant should have costs, if judgment had been given for him, and such plaintiff or defendant after appearance become nonsuit, or judgment pass against him, there the defendant shall recover his full costs, to be levied as is directed by 23 Hen. 8. cap. 15.

Stat. 13 Car. 2. c. 2. sect. 2. Persons arrested by any process out of the King's Bench or Common Pleas, in which the certainty or true cause of action is not expressed, and in which the defendant is bailable, by 23 Hen. 6. cap. 10. shall not be compelled to give bond, with sureties for their appearance, in any penal sum exceeding forty pounds.

Sect. 3. And such bail-bonds, after appearance entred by attorney, shall be discharged, and no amerciaments shall be set or estreated upon the sheriff or other officer, concerning such appearance; and unless the plaintiff in a personal action or ejectione firmæ, declare before the end of the term next following the appearance, a nonsuit may be entered, and the defendant shall have judgment to recover costs, according as is provided by the 23 Hen. 8. c. 15.

Sect. 4. Provided this act do not extend to any writ of capias utlagat. attachment, upon rescous, or for contempt, or attachment at the suit of any privileged person, altho' there be no particular certainty of the cause of action expressed in the writ, but such security shall be taken by the sheriff, &c. in these cases as heretofore.

Stat. 22 & 23 Car. 2. c. 20. No under sheriff, bailiff, serjeant, or other officer, having a person in his custody, by virtue of any process, shall cause him to be carried to any tavern, or other publick house, without his consent, so as to charge such prisoner with any sum of money, for wine, ale, victuals, &c. but what he shall voluntarily call for; nor shall demand or receive more for such arrest or waiting than by law he ought, until such prisoner have procured an appearance, found bail, agreed with his adversary, or be sent to gaol; nor shall take any other reward for keeping such prisoner out of the gaol, than what he shall voluntarily give; nor shall exact more for a night's lodging or other expences, than is reasonable, or shall be so adjudged by the next justice of the peace; nor shall cause such person to pay for any provisions or other things, but what he shall particularly and freely call for.

Every under sheriff, gaoler, &c. to whom a prisoner shall be committed, shall suffer him to send for beer and food where he pleases, and to use such bedding, linen, and other things, as he thinks fit, without detaining or paying for the same; nor shall take more than the usual fees for his commitment or discharge; or more than shall be allowed by three justices of peace of the county or place, quor. un. for chamber rent, or by the two lord chief justices and lord chief baron in London, Middlesex, and Surry. ib.

The rates of fees signed by the chief justices and chief baron, or two of them, &c. shall be hung up in every prison, and registred by every clerk of the peace; and no other or greater fees shall be taken, than shall be so established. ib.

Prisoners for debt, and felons, shall not be kept in the same room, on pain that every sheriff and gaoler offending in this particular, shall lose their respective offices. ib.

Stat. 29 Car. 2. c. 7. No person on the Lord's day, shall serve or execute any writ, process, warrant, order, judgment, or decree, except in cases of treason, felony, or breach of the peace; but such service shall be void, and the person serving or executing the same, shall be liable to answer such damages, as if he had done the same without any writ, process, warrant, order, judgment, or decree.

Stat. 6 Geo. 1. c. 21. sect. 53, No high sheriff, under sheriff, their deputies or agents, shall make out any warrant, before they have in their custody the writs upon which such warrants ought to issue, on forfeiture of 10 l.

Sect. 54. Every warrant to be made out upon any writ out of the King's Bench, Common Pleas, or Exchequer, before judgment, to arrest any person, shall have the same day and year set down thereon as shall be set down on the writ itself, under forfeiture of 10 l. to be paid by the person who shall fill up or deliver out such warrant.

Stat. 12 Geo. 1. cap. 29. sect. 1. No person shall be held to special bail upon any process issuing out of any superior court, where the cause of action shall not amount to 10 l. nor out of any inferior court, where the cause of action shall not amount to 40 s. and in all cases where the cause of action shall not amount to 10 l. in a superior court, or to 40 s. in any inferior court (and the plaintiff shall proceed by way of process against the person) he shall not arrest the body of the defendant, but shall serve him personally, within the jurisdiction of the court, with a copy of the process; and if such defendant shall not appear at the return of the process, or within four days after, it shall be lawful for the plaintiff, upon affidavit being made and filed, of the personal service of such process (which affidavit shall be filed gratis) to enter a common appearance, or file common bail for the defendant, and to proceed thereon, as if such defendant had enter'd his appearance, or filed common bail.

Sect. 2. In all cases where the plaintiff's cause of action shall amount to 10 l. or 40 s. as aforesaid, affidavit shall be made and filed of the cause of action (which affidavit may be made before any judge or commissioner of the court, out of which such process shall issue, or else before the officer who shall issue such process, or his deputy) and for such affidavit 1 s. over and above the stamp-duties, shall be paid, and no more; and the sum specified in such affidavit, shall be indorsed on the back of such writ or process, for which sum so indorsed the sheriff, &c. shall take bail, and for no more: but if any writ or process shall issue for 10 l. or upwards, and no affidavit or indorsement shall be made, as aforesaid, the plaintiff shall not proceed to arrest the body of the defendant, but shall do in like manner, as is by this act directed in cases where the cause of action does not amount to 10 l. or 40 s. as aforesaid.

Continued by 5 Geo. 2. cap. 27. from the end of that session for seven years, and made perpetual by 21 Geo. 2. cap. 3.

Stat. 21 Geo. 2. cap. 22. sect. 1. No sheriff, bailiff or other officer shall convey any person by him arrested by virtue of any process or warrant, to any tavern, alehouse or other publick victualling or drinking-house, or to the house of such officer, or of any tenant or relation of his, without the free consent of the person so arrested; nor charge him for wine, beer, victuals or other things, save what he shall call for of his own accord; nor shall take any greater sum than is by law allowed for such arrest, detaining or waiting, till the person arrested shall have given an appearance or bail, or agreed with the person at whose suit he shall be arrested, or till he shall be sent to gaol; nor shall take any reward for keeping the person arrested out of prison; nor shall carry any such person to prison within 24 hours from the time of arrest; nor shall take any greater sum for his lodging or diet, or other expences, than shall be allowed by some orders for ascertaining such expences within their respective counties.

Sect. 2. Every sheriff, and other persons, entrusted with the execution of process, shall deliver a printed copy of the said clause to every bailiff or officer by them employed to execute warrants, and when such officer shall give security upon his entring into office, shall require him to make it part of the condition, that he will deliver a copy of the said clause to every person whom he shall arrest by virtue of any warrant, and carry to any house, and permit him or any friend of his to read it, before any liquor or meat be called for; and in case any officer shall carry to any house any person in his custody, and permit any liquor or victuals to be called for, before such clause be read to or by the prisoner, such neglect, besides the breach of such security, shall be accounted a misdemeanor in the execution of the process.

Sect. 3. Every sheriff, gaoler, &c. shall permit every person so arrested to send for beer or other food from what place they please, and also to have such bedding and other things as they shall think fit, without purloining or detaining the same, or requiring them to pay for the use thereof, or putting any difficulty upon them relating thereto.

Stat. 3 Geo. 2. c. 27. sect. 6. If any person shall be arrested by virtue of any process or warrant, and shall refuse to be carried to some safe dwelling-house of his own appointment, so as such dwelling-house be in a city or market-town, if such person shall be there arrested; or if out of a city or market-town, then within three miles from the place where the arrest shall be made, and so as such house be not the house of the person arrested, provided it be within the same county and liberty, it shall be lawful for the officer to carry the person so refusing to gaol by virtue of such process.

Stat. 5 Geo. 2. cap. 27. sect. 1. In all cases where the cause of action shall not amount to 10 l. in any superior court, or to 40 s. in any inferior court, the defendants (a copy of process having been served) shall appear at the return thereof, or within eight days after, and the affidavit of service of such process may be made before any judge or commissioner of the court, out of which such process shall issue, or before the proper officer for entring common appearances, or his deputy; and is to be filed gratis.

Sect. 2. No attorney, or other person, shall have more than 5 s. for making and serving a copy of such process issuing out of any superior court, or more than 1 s. for making and serving a copy of such process, issuing out of any inferior court.

Sect. 3. In particular franchises the proper officer shall execute such process.

Sect. 4. Upon every copy of such process, to be served upon any defendant, shall be written an English notice to such defendant, of the intent of such service, to the effect following, viz.

A. B. you are served with this process, to the intent that you may by your attorney appear in his Majesty's court of ——— at the return thereof, being the ——— day of ——— (as the case shall be) in order to your defence in this action.

for which notice no fee shall be demanded.

Sect. 5. Where the cause of action shall not amount to 10 l. in any superior court, or to 40 s. in any inferior court, no special writ, nor process specially expressing the cause of action, shall be issued; and every attorney or officer of such courts suing forth or issuing any such process, shall forfeit 10 l. to the person agrieved. Made perpetual by 21 Geo. 2. cap. 3.

Seamen in the King's service privileged from arrests for debts under 20 l. 1 Geo. 2. c. 14. sect. 15. 14 Geo. 2. c. 38. sect. 3.

Peers of the realm, and members of parliament may not be arrested, unless it be in criminal cases; but the process against them is to be summons, distress infinite, &c. 12 Will. 3. c. 3.

The execution of writs, which comes to the sheriff, or his under sheriff, ought to be executed by bailiffs of hundreds, tho' now the use is to put in special bailiffs with them. A special bailiff is an officer of the sheriff, to execute some particular writ, &c. and for that time only. This arrest is the arrest of the sheriff, and if he suffers a prisoner to escape, an action lies against the sheriff. And if the prisoner is rescued, the return of the rescous shall be, that it was done to the sheriff himself. The statute of the 27 Eliz. cap. 12. does not extend to special bailiffs, so that in effect, the design of that statute is evaded, and too loose a restraint laid upon those who are usually a great grievance to the people; however the sheriff shall answer for the misdemeanors of his bailiffs, if they offend in their office, tho' he may have his remedy over against them. Wood's Inst. 127, 128.

A bailiff sworn, and commonly known, need not, (tho' they demand it) shew his warrant, but a special bailiff is bound to shew it upon demand. ib.

An arrest without shewing the warrant, and without telling at whose suit, until the other demanded it, was held legal; and that this need not be done until the party obeyed and demanded the same. Cro. Jac. 485.

Where the husband is arrested for the debt or trespass of the wife, he must appear or give bail both for himself and his wife, as the case requires; but if a writ be against husband and wife, and the wife only is arrested, upon the entring a common appearance, she shall be discharged. Inst. Leg. 171.

It is not sufficient for a bailiff to say, I arrest you at the suit of, &c. but he must lay hold of the defendant, or touch him, otherwise, 'tis no arrest. 1 Salk. 79.

If an action be entred in either of the counters in London, a serjeant may arrest the party without the sheriff's warrant. Trin. 22 Car. B. R. For the entry of the action there, is a warrant in law for the arrest, and the serjeants are attendants at the compters, and may take notice of such entries, it being the custom of the city, used time out of mind. Pract. Reg. 72.

By Glynn Ch. J. Mich. 1658. if one be arrested by the sheriff of the county, within a liberty, without a non omittas, yet the arrest is good; for the sheriff is sheriff of the whole county, but the bailiff of the liberty may have his action against the sheriff, for entring of his liberty. But upon a quo minus, a sheriff may enter any liberty, and execute it impune. Pract. Reg. 72.

Generally, the bailiff cannot justify the breaking open a house to arrest a man, but where the officer took the defendant by the hand as he held it out of a window, it was deemed a good arrest, and that the bailiff might afterwards justify breaking open the house for his prisoner. 1 Vent. 306.

An arrest may be by night or day. 9 Rep. 66.

If the person arrested make resistance, or assault the officer, he may justify the beating of him, and if the party be killed, 'tis justifiable. D. and Stud. dial. 2. chap. 41. But if the officer be killed in doing his duty, 'tis murder, malice being implied in this case, and that notwithstanding the process be erroneous. 9 Rep. 67, 68.

Corporations and companies must be made to appear by distringas, and cannot be arrested. Finch 353. 3 Salk. 46.

Persons attending upon any courts of record, on business there, are to be free from arrests. 3 Inst. 141.

A clerk of the court ought not to be arrested for any thing which is not criminal, because he is supposed to be always present in court to answer the plaintiff. 1 Lill. 94.

The King cannot command any one by word of mouth to be arrested; but he must do it by writ, or order of his courts, according to law: nor may the King arrest any man for suspicion of treason, or felony, as his subjects may; because if he doth wrong, the party cannot have action against him. 2 Inst. 186.

Every one is bound by the Common law to assist not only the sheriff in the execution of writs, and making arrests, &c. but also his bailiff that hath his warrant to do it. 2 Inst. 193.

A bailiff upon an arrest ought to shew at whose suit, out of what court the writ issues, and for what cause, &c. but this is when the party arrested, submits himself to the arrest. 9 Rep. 68, 69.

Genner, a bailiff, having a warrant against Sparks, went to him in his yard, and being at some distance, told him he had a warrant, and said he arrested him. Sparks having a fork in his hand, keeps off the bailiff from touching him, and retreats into his house, and this was moved as a contempt; et per cur. The bailiff cannot have an attachment, for here was no arrest, nor rescous, bare words will not make an arrest; but, if the bailiff touched him, that had been an arrest, and the retreat a rescous, and the bailiff might have pursued, and broke open the house, or might have had an attachment or a rescous against him; but as this case is, the bailiff has no remedy, but an action for the assault, for the holding up of the fork at him, when he was within reach, is good evidence of that. 1 Salk. 79.

In these cases a person may be apprehended and restrained of his liberty, not only by process out of some court, or warrant from a magistrate, but frequently by a constable, watchman or private person, without any warrant or precept; and a private person may be fined and imprisoned for not apprehending notorious offenders.

All persons whatsoever, who are present when a felony is committed, or a dangerous wound given, are bound to apprehend the offender, on pain of being fined and imprisoned for their neglect, unless they were under age at the time. 2 Hawk. 74.

And for this cause, by the Common law, if any homicide be committed, or dangerous wound given, whether with, or without malice, or even by misadventure or self-defence, in any town, or in the lanes or fields thereof, in the day time, and the offender escape, the town shall be amerced, and if out of a town, the hundred shall be amerced, 3 Inst. 53.

And since the statute of Winchester, c. 5. which ordains that walled towns shall be kept shut from sunsetting to sunrising; if the fact happen in any such town by night, or by day, and the offender escape; the town shall be amerced. 3 Inst. 53.

And, as private persons are bound to apprehend all those who shall be guilty of any of the crimes above mentioned in their view, so also are they, with the utmost diligence, to pursue and endeavour to take all those who shall be guilty thereof, out of their view, upon a hue and cry levied against them. 3 Inst. 117.

By the vagrant act 17 Geo. 2. every private person may apprehend beggars and vagrants.

And every private person is bound to assist an officer, requiring him to apprehend a felon.

As to what are sufficient causes of suspicion of treason or felony, to justify a private person in apprehending the suspected person, it is held, 1. That the common fame of the country is sufficient to justify the arrest, but then it ought to appear upon evidence, in an action brought for such an arrest, that such fame had some probable ground. 2 Hawk. 76.

2. The living a vagrant, idle and disorderly life, without having any visible means to support it. ibid.

3. The being in company with one known to be an offender at the time of the offence, or generally, at other times, keeping company with persons of scandalous reputations. ib.

4. The being found in such circumstances as induce a strong presumption of guilt, as coming out of a house wherein murder has been committed, with a bloody knife in one's hand, or being found in possession of any part of goods stolen, without being able to give a probable account of coming honestly by them. ib.

5. The behaving one's self in such a manner as betrays a consciousness of guilt; as where a man being charged with treason or felony, says nothing to it, but seems tacitly, by his silence, to own himself guilty; or where a man accused of any such crime, upon hearing that a warrant is taken out against him, doth abscond. ib.

Tho' it is held, that no causes of suspicion whatever, let the number or probability of them be never so great, will justify the arrest of an innocent man; by one who does not, himself, believe him guilty, whether he make such arrest of his own head, or in obedience to the commands of a constable. ib.

And it is holden by some, that none of the above mentioned causes will justify the arresting a man for the suspicion of crimes, unless a crime was actually committed; but out of this rule, the apprehending a person upon hue and cry, or such as attempt to commit a robbery, or felony, may very well be excepted; for any one may lay hold of a person, whom he sees upon the point of committing treason, or felony, or doing an act which would manifestly endanger the life of another, and detain him, till it may be reasonably presumed, he has changed his purpose. 2 Hawk. 77.

As to arrests for inferior offences, no private person can arrest another for a bare breach of the peace after it is over; but it is held, that a private man may arrest a nightwalker, or a common cheat going about with false dice, and actually caught playing with them, in order to have him before a justice of peace; and the arrest of any other offenders, by private persons, for offences in like manner scandalous, and prejudicial to the publick, seems justifiable. 2 Hawk. 77.

As to arrests by constables, by their own authority, it seems difficult to find any case wherein a constable is impowered to arrest a man for a felony committed or attempted, in which a private person might not as well be justified in doing it: But the chief difference between the power and duty of a constable, and a private person in respect of such arrests, seems to be this; that the former has the greater authority, to demand the assistance of others, and is liable to the severer fine for any neglect of this kind, and has no sure way to discharge himself of the arrest, of any person apprehended by him, for felony, without bringing him before a justice of peace; in order to be examined; whereas a private person, having made such an arrest, needs only to deliver his prisoner into the hands of the constable. 2 Hawk. 80.

As to the justifying such arrests by constables, by virtue of a warrant from a justice of peace, it seems clear, that such an arrest, unlawfully made by a constable without a warrant, cannot be made good by a warrant taken out afterwards; also it hath been holden, that if a constable, after he hath arrested the party by force of any such warrant, suffer him to go at large upon his promise to come again at such a time, and find sureties, he cannot afterwards arrest him by force of the same warrant; however, if the party return and put himself again under the custody of the constable, the constable may lawfully detain him, and bring him before the justice, in pursuance of the warrant. 2 Hawk. 80. Dyer 244. b.

A constable cannot justify any arrest by force of a warrant from a justice of peace, which expresly appears on the face of it, to be for an offence whereof a justice of peace hath no jurisdiction, or to bring the party before him at a place out of the county for which he is a justice; but it seems that he both may, and ought to execute a general warrant, to bring a person before a justice of peace, to answer such matters as shall be objected against him, on the part of the King, for that the officer ought to presume, that the justice hath a jurisdiction, which he takes conusance of, unless the contrary appear, and it may often endanger the escape of the party, to make known the crime he is accused of: But it seems to be very questionable, whether a constable can justify the execution of a general warrant, to search for felons or stolen goods, because such warrant seems to be illegal on the very face of it; for, that it would be extreamly [sic] hard, to leave it to the discretion of a common officer, to arrest what persons, and search what houses he thinks fit; and if a justice cannot legally grant a blank warrant for the arrest of a single person, leaving it to the party to fill it up; surely he cannot grant such a general warrant, which might have the effect of a hundred blank warrants. 2 Hawk. 82.

Yet, perhaps, ’tis the better opinion at this day, that any constable, or even private person, to whom a warrant shall be directed from a justice of peace, to arrest a particular person for felony, or any other misdemeanor within his jurisdiction, may lawfully execute it, whether the person mention’d in it be, in truth, guilty or innocent, and whether he were before indicted of the same offence or not, and whether any felony were, in truth, committed or not? for, however the justice himself may be punishable for granting such a warrant, without sufficient grounds, it is reasonable that he alone be answerable for it, and not the officer, who is not to examine or dispute the reasonableness of his proceeding. ib.

As to arrests by the command of a justice of peace: a justice of peace may, by word of mouth, authorise any one to arrest another, who shall be guilty of an actual breach of the peace in his presence, or shall be engaged in a riot in his absence. 2 Hawk. 83. Dalt. c. 117.

And a justice of peace may lawfully grant a warrant for apprehending, or arresting persons charg'd with treason, felony, premunire [sic], or any other offence against the peace; and generally, wherever a statute gives one or more justices of peace a jurisdiction over any offence, any one justice of peace may, by his warrant, cause such offenders to be arrested and brought before him. 2 Hawk. 84.

A justice of peace may justify the granting a warrant for the arrest of any person upon strong grounds of suspicion of felony, or misdemeanor, but he seems to be punishable, as well at the suit of the King, as of the party grieved, if he grant any such warrant groundlesly, or maliciously, without such a probable cause as might induce a candid and impartial man to suspect the party to be guilty. 2 Hawk. 84.

Every warrant ought to be under the hand and seal of the justice of peace, and specify the day it was made out: if it be for the peace or good behaviour, it is advisable to set forth the special cause upon which it is granted, but if it be for treason or felony, or other offences of an enormous nature, it is said, that it is not necessary to set it forth, and it seems to be rather discretionary than necessary to set it forth in any case. 2 Hawk. 85.

It may be directed to the sheriff, bailiff, constable, or to any indifferent person by name, who is no officer, for, tho' the justice may authorise any one to be his officer, whom he pleases to make such; yet it is most advisable to direct to the constable of the precinct wherein it is to be executed; for that no other constable, and a fortiori no private person, is compellable to serve it. 2 Hawk. 85.

A bailiff or constable, if they be sworn, and commonly known to be officers, and act within their own precincts, need not shew their warrant to the party, notwithstanding he demand the fight of it; but that these and all other persons whatsoever making an arrest, ought to acquaint the party with the substance of their warrant; and all private persons to whom such warrants shall be directed, and even officers, if they be not sworn and commonly known; and even these, if they act out of their own precincts, must shew their warrants if demanded. 2 Hawk. 86.

The sheriff having such warrant directed to him, may authorise others to execute it; but every other person, to whom it is directed, must personally execute it, yet, it seems, that any one may lawfully assist him. 2 Hawk. 86.

If a warrant be generally directed to all constables, no one can execute it out of his own precinct; but if it be directed to a particular constable by name, he may execute it any where within the jurisdiction of the justice. 2 Hawk. 86.

Where one is authorised to arrest a person who shelters himself in a house; if entrance be denied, the officer may justify the breaking open the doors in the following instances.

1*st*. Upon a capias, grounded on an indictment for any crime whatsoever, or upon a capias from the King's Bench or Chancery, to compel a man to find sureties for the peace or good behaviour, or even upon a warrant from a justice of peace for such purpose. ib.

2*dly*. Upon a capias utlagatum, or capias pro fine, in any action whatsoever. ib.

3*dly*. Upon the warrant of a justice of peace, for the levying of a forfeiture in execution of a judgment, or conviction for it, grounded on any statute which gives the whole, or but part of such forfeiture to the King, and authorises the justice of peace to give such judgment or conviction for it. ib.

4*thly*. Where a forcible entry or detainer is either found by inquisition before justices of peace, or appears upon their view. ib.

5*thly*. Where one known to have committed a treason or felony, or to have given another a dangerous wound, is pursued either with, or without warrant by a constable, or private person; but where one lies under a probable suspicion only, and is not indicted, it seems the better opinion at this day, that no one can justify the breaking open doors in order to apprehend him. ib.

6*thly*. Where an affray is made in a house, in the view or hearing of a constable, or where those who have made an affray in his presence, fly to a house, and are immediately pursued by him, and he is not suffered to enter, in order to suppress the affray in the first case, or to apprehend the affrayer in either case.

7*thly*. Wherever a person is lawfully arrested for any cause, and afterwards escapes and shelters himself in a house. ib.

Also it is enacted by the 3 & 4 Jac. 1. par. 35. that upon any lawful writ, warrant or process awarded to any sheriff or other officer, for the taking of any popish recusant, standing excommunicated for such recusancy, it shall be lawful, if need be, to break any house. 2 Hawk. 87.

But it hath been resolved, that where justices of peace are by virtue of a statute, authorised to require persons to come before them to take certain oaths prescribed by such statute, the officer cannot lawfully break open the doors. 2 Hawk. 87.

6.3.1.6Blackstone, 1768, 1769

An arrest must be by corporal seising or touching the defendant's body; after which the bailiff may justify breaking open the house in which he is, to take him: otherwise he has no such power; but must watch his opportunity to arrest him. For every man's house is looked upon by the law to be his castle of defence and asylum, wherein he should suffer no violence. Which principle is carried so far in the civil law, that for the most part not so much as a common citation or summons, much less an arrest, can be executed upon a man within his own walls. Peers of the realm, members of parliament, and corporations, are privileged from arrests … .

First then, of an arrest: which is the apprehending or restraining of one's person, in order to be forthcoming to answer an alleged or suspected crime. To this arrest all persons whatsoever are, without distinction, equally liable to all criminal cases: but no man is to be arrested, unless charged with such a crime, as will at least justify holding him to bail, when taken. And, in general, an arrest may be made in four ways: 1. By warrant: 2. By an officer without warrant: 3. By a private person also without warrant: 4. By an hue and cry.

1. A warrant may be granted in extraordinary cases by the privy council, or secretaries of state[a]; but ordinarily by justices of the peace. This they may do in any cases where they have a jurisdiction over the offence; in order to compel the person accused to appear before them[b]: for it would be absurd to give them power to examine an offender, unless they had also a power to compel him to attend, and submit to such examination. And this extends undoubtedly to all treasons, felonies, and breaches of the peace; and also to all such offences as they have power to punish by statute. Sir Edward Coke indeed[c] hath laid it down, that a justice of the peace cannot issue a warrant to apprehend a felon upon bare suspicion; no, not even till an indictment be actually found; and the contrary practice is by others[d] held to be grounded rather upon connivance, than the express rule of law; though now by long custom established. A doctrine, which would in most cases give a loose to felons to escape without punishment; and therefore sir Matthew Hale hath combated it with invincible authority, and strength of reason: maintaining, 1. That a justice of peace hath power to issue a warrant to apprehend a person accused of a felony, though not yet indicted[e]; and 2. That he may also issue a warrant to apprehend a person suspected of a felony, though the original suspicion be not in himself, but in the party that prays his warrant; because he is a competent judge of the probability offered to him of such suspicion. But in both cases it is fitting to examine upon oath the party requiring a warrant, as well as to ascertain that there is a felony or other crime actually committed, without which no warrant should be granted; as also to prove the cause and probability of suspecting the party, against whom the warrant is prayed[f]. This warrant ought to be under the hand and seal of justice, should set forth the time and place of making, and the cause for which it is made, and should be directed to the constable, or other peace officer, requiring him to bring the party either generally before any justice of the peace for the county, or only before the justice who granted it; the warrant in the latter case being called a special warrant[g]. A general warrant to apprehend all persons suspected, without naming or particularly describing any person in special, is illegal and void for it's [sic] uncertainty[h]; for it is the duty of the magistrate, and ought not to be left to the officer, to judge of the ground of suspicion. And a warrant to apprehend all persons guilty of a crime therein specified, is no legal warrant: for the point, upon which it's [sic] authority rests, is a fact to be decided on a subsequent trial; namely whether the person apprehended thereupon be really guilty or not. It is therefore in fact no warrant at all: for it will not justify the officer who acts under it[i]; whereas a lawful warrant will at all events indemnify the officer, who executes the same ministerially. When a warrant is received by the officer, he is bound to execute it, so far as the jurisdiction of the magistrate and himself extends. A warrant from the chief, or other, justice of the court of king's bench extends all over the kingdom: and is teste'd, or dated, England; but not Oxfordshire, Berks, or other particular county. But the warrant of a justice of the peace in one county, as Yorkshire, must be backed, that is, signed by a justice of the peace in another, as Middlesex, before it can be executed there. Formerly, regularly speaking, there ought to have been a fresh warrant in every fresh county; but the practice of backing warrants had long prevailed without law, and was at last authorized by statutes 23 Geo. II. c. 26. and 24 Geo. II. c. 55.

2. Arrests by officers, without warrant, may be executed, 1. By a justice of the peace; who may himself apprehend, or cause to be apprehended, by word only, any person committing a felony or breach of the peace in his presence[k]. 2. The sheriff, and 3. The coroner, may apprehend any felon within the county without warrant. 4. The constable, of whose office we formerly spoke[l], hath great original and inherent authority with regard to arrests. He may, without warrant, arrest anyone for a breach of the peace, and carry him before a justice of the peace. And, in case of a felony actually committed, or a dangerous wounding whereby felony is likely to ensue, he may upon probable suspicion arrest the felon; and for that purpose is authorized (as upon a justice's warrant) to break open doors, and even to kill the felon if he cannot otherwise be taken; and, if he or his assistants be killed in attempting such arrest, it is murder in all concerned[m]. 5. Watchmen, either those appointed by the statute of Winchester, 13 Edw. I. c. 4. to keep watch and ward in all towns from sunsetting to sunrising, or such as are mere assistants to the constable, may virtute officii arrest all offenders, and particularly nightwalkers, and commit them to custody till the morning[n].

3. Any private person (and a fortiori a peace officer) that is present when any felony is committed, is bound by the law to arrest the felon; on pain of fine and imprisonment, if he escapes through the negligence of the standers by[o]. And they may justify breaking open doors upon following such felon: and if they kill him, provided he cannot be otherwise taken, it is justifiable; though if they are killed in endeavouring to make such an arrest, it is murder[p]. Upon probable suspicion also a private person may arrest the felon, or other person so suspected[q], but he cannot justify breaking open doors to do it; and if either party kill the other in the attempt, it is manslaughter, and no more[r]. It is no more, because there is no malicious design to kill: but it amounts to so much, because it would be of most pernicious consequence, if, under pretence of suspecting felony, any private person might break open a house, or kill another; and also because such arrest upon suspicion is barely permitted by the law, and not enjoined, as in the case of those who are present when a felony is committed.

4. There is yet another species of arrest, wherein both officers and private men are concerned, and that is upon an hue and cry raised upon a felony committed. An hue (from huer, to shout) and cry, hutesium et clamor, is the old common law process of pursuing, with horn and with voice, all felons, and such as have dangerously wounded another[s]. It is also mentioned by statute Westm. I. 3 Edw. I. c. 9. and 4 Edw. I. de officio coronatoris. But the principal statue [sic], relative to this matter, is that of Winchester, 13 Edw. I. c. 1 & 4. which directs, that from thenceforth every country shall be so well kept, that, immediately upon robberies and felonies committed, fresh suit shall be made from town to town, and from county to county; and that hue and cry shall be raised upon the felons, and they that keep the town shall follow with hue and cry, with all the town and the towns near; and so hue and cry shall be made from town to town, until they be taken and delivered to the sheriff . …

6.3.2 CASE LAW

6.3.2.1SEMAYNE'S CASE, 1604

Semayne's Case.

Mich. 2. Jac. 1.

In the King's Bench.

[S. C. Cro. Eliz. 908. 1 Sm. L. C. (11th ed. 1905), 104. See Harvey v. Harvey, 1884, 26 Ch. D. 651; Hodder v. Williams [1895], 2 Q. B. 666.]

Resolved:—1. The house of every one is his castle, and if thieves come to a man's house to rob or murder, and the owner or his servants kill any of the thieves in defence of himself and his house, it is no felony and he shall lose nothing.

2. Where any house is recovered by any real action, or by eject. firmae, the sheriff may break the house and deliver the seisin or possession.

3. In all cases where the King is party, the sheriff may break the house, either to arrest or do other execution of the King's process, if he cannot otherwise enter. But he ought first to signify the cause of his coming, and make request to open the doors.

4. Where the door is open the sheriff may enter, and do execution at the suit of a subject, and so also in such case may the lord, and distrain for his rent or service.
It is not lawful for the sheriff, on request made and denial, at the suit of a common person, to break the defendant's house, scil. to execute any process at the suit of a subject.
5. The house of any one is only a privilege for himself, and does not extend to protect any person who flies to his house, or the goods of any other which are brought there, to prevent a lawful execution and to escape the process of the law: in such cases after request and denial, the sheriff may break the house.
6. If the sheriff might break open the door to execute civil process, yet it must be after request made.
7. The allegation praemisorum non ignarus is not sufficient, where notice is material. S. C. [Moor, 668. Yelv. 28. Cro. Eliz. 908]. Vide the entry, Co. Ent. 12. pl. 11.

In an action on the case by Peter Semayne, plaintiff, and Richard Gresham, defendant, the case was such; the defendant and one George Berisford were joint-tenants of a house in Blackfriars in London for years. George Berisford acknowledged a recognizance in the nature of a statute-staple to the plaintiff, and being possessed of divers goods in the said house died, by which the defendant was possessed of the house by survivorship, in which the goods continued and remained; the plaintiff sued process of extent on the statute to the sheriffs of London; the sheriffs returned the conusor dead, on which the plaintiff had another writ to extend all the lands which he had at the time of the statute acknowledged, or at any time after, and all his goods which he had at the day of his death; which writ the plaintiff delivered to the sheriffs of London, and told them that divers goods, which were the said George Berisford's at the time of his death, were in the said house; and thereupon the sheriffs, by virtue of the said writ, charged a jury to make inquiry according to the said writ, and the sheriffs and jury accesserunt ad domum praedictam ostio domus praedict' aperto existen' et bonis praedictis in praedicta domo tunc existen', and they offered to enter the said house, to extend the [91 b] goods according to the said writ; and the defendant praemissorum non ignarus, intending to disturb the execution, ostio praed' domus tunc aperto existen', claudebat contra vicecom' & jurator' praed'; whereby they could not come, and extend the said goods, nor the sheriff seize them, by which he lost the benefit and profit of his writ, &c. And in this case these points were resolved.

1. That the house of every one is to him as his (a) castle and fortress, as well for his defence against injury and violence, as for his repose; and although the life of man is a thing precious and favoured in law; so that although a man kills another in his defence, or kills (b) one per infortun', without any intent, yet it is felony, and in such case he shall forfeit his goods and chattels,(A) for the great regard which the law has to a man's life; but if thieves come to a man's (c) house to rob him, or murder, and the owner of his servants kill any of the thieves in defence of himself and his house, it is not felony, and he shall lose nothing (B), and therewith agree 3 E. 3. Coron. 303, & 305. & 26 Ass. pl. 23. So it is held in 21 H. 7. 39. every one may assemble his friends and neighbours (d) to defend his house against violence: but he cannot assemble them to go with him to the market, (e) or elsewhere for his safeguard against violence: and the reason of all this is, because domus sua cuique est tutissimum refugium.[1]

2. It was resolved, when any house is recovered by any real action, or by eject' firmae, the sheriff may break the house and deliver the seisin or possession to the demandant or pl. for the words of the writ are, habere facias seisinam, or possessionem, &c. and after judgment it is not the house in right and judgment of law of the tenant or defendant.

3. In all cases when the King (f) is party, the sheriff (if the doors be not open) may break the party's house, either to arrest him, or to do other execution of the K.'s process, if otherwise he cannot enter. But before he breaks it, he ought to signify the cause of his coming, and to make request to open doors (C); and that appears well by the stat. of Westm. 1. c. 17. (which is but an affirmance of the common law) as hereafter appears, for the law without a default in the owner abhors the destruction or breaking of any house (which is for the habitation and safety of man) by which great damage and inconvenience might ensue to the party, when no default is in him; for perhaps he did not know of the process, of which, if he had notice, it is to be presumed that he would obey it, and that appears by the book in 18 E. 2. (a) Execut. 252. where it is said, that the K.'s officer who comes to do execution, &c. may open the doors which are shut, and break them, if he cannot have the keys; which proves, that he ought first to demand them, 7 E. 3. (b) 16. J. beats R. so as he is in danger of death, J. flies, and thereupon hue and cry is made, J. retreats into the house of T. they who pursue him (D), if the house be kept and defended with force (which proves that first request ought [92 a] to be made) may lawfully break the house of T. for it is at the

K.’s suit. 27 Ass. p. 66. the K.’s bailiff may distrain for issues (c) in a sanctuary. 27 (28) Ass. p. 35. by force of a capias on an indictment of trespass the sheriff may (d) break his house to arrest him; but in such case, if he breaks the house when he may enter without breaking it (that is, on request made, or if he may open the door without breaking), he is a trespasser, 41 Ass. 15. on issue joined on a traverse of an office in Chancery, venire facias was awarded returnable in the King’s Bench, without mentioning non (a) omittas propt’ aliquam libertat’; yet forasmuch as the K. is party, the writ of itself is non omittas propl’ aliquam libertat’, 9 E. 4. 9. (E) for felony (b) or suspicion of felony, the K.’s officer may break (F) the house to apprehend the felon, and that for two reasons: 1. For the commonwealth, for it is for the commonwealth to apprehend felons. 2. In every felony the King has interest, and where the King has interest the writ is non omittas propter aliquam libertatem; and so the liberty or privilege of a house doth not hold against the King.[2]

4. In all cases when the door is (c) open the sheriff may enter the house, and do execut. at the suit of any subject, either of the body, or of the goods (G); and so may the lord in such case enter the house (d) and distrain for his rent or service, 38 H. 6. 26. a. 8 E. 2. Distr. 21 & 33 E. 3. Avow. 256. the lord may distrain in the house, although lands are also held in which he may distrain. Vule 29 (e) Ass. 49. But the great question in this case was, if by force of a capias or fieri facias at the suit of the party the sheriff after request made to open the door, and denial made, might break the defendant’s house to do execut. if the door be not opened. And it was objected, that the sheriff might well do it for divers causes: 1. Because it is by process of law; and it was said, that it would be granted on the other side, that a house is not a liberty, for if a fieri fac. or a capias be awarded to the sher. at the suit of a common person, and he makes a mandate to the bailiff of a liberty who has return of writs, who nullum dedit respons. in that case another writ shall issue with non omittas propter aliquam libertat’ (H); yet it will be said on the other side that he shall not break the defendant’s house, as he shall do of another liberty; for whereas in the county of Suffolk there are two liberties, one of St. Edmund Bury, and the other of St. Etheldred of Ely, suppose a capias comes at the suit of A., to the Sheriff of Suffolk to arrest the body of B. the sheriff makes a mandate to the bailiff of the liberty of St. Etheldred, who makes no answer, in that case the plaintiff shall have a writ of non omittas, and by force thereof he may arrest the defend. within the liberty of Bury, although no default was in him: 2. Admitting it to be a liberty, the defendant himself shall never take advantage of a liberty: as [92 b] if the bailiff of a liberty be def. in any action, and process of cap' or fieri fac' comes to the sher. against him, the sheriff shall execute the process against him; for a liberty is always for the benefit of a stranger to the action. 3. For necessity the sheriff shall break the defendant's house after such denial as is aforesaid, for at the common law a man should not have any execut. for debt, but only of the defendant's goods. Suppose then the def. would keep all his goods in his house, and so the def. himself by his own act would prevent not only the pl. of his just and true debt, but there would also be a great imputation to the law, that there should be so great a defect in it, that in such case the pl. by such shift without any default in him should be barred of his execut. And the book in 18 E. 2. (a) Execut. 252. was cited to prove it where it is said, that it is not lawful for any one to disturb the King's officer, who comes to execute the K.'s process; for if a man might stand out in such manner, a man would never have execution, but there it appears (as has been said) that there ought to be request made before the sheriff breaks the house. 4. It was said, that the sheriffs were officers of great authority, in whom the law reposed great trust and confidence, and are to be of sufficiency to answer for all wrongs which should be done; and they had custodiam comitat', and therefore it should not be presumed that they would abuse the house of any one by colour of doing their office in execution of the King's writs against the duty of their office, and their oath also: but it was resolved, that it is not lawful for the sher. (on request made and denial) at the suit of a (b) common person, to break the defendant's house, sc. to execute any process at the suit of any subject; for thence would follow great inconvenience that men as well in the night (c) as in the day should have their houses (which are their castles) broke, by colour, whereof great damage and mischief might ensue; for by colour thereof, on any feigned suit, the house of any man at any time might be broke when the defendant might be arrested elsewhere, and so men would not be in safety or quiet in their own houses? And although the sheriff be an officer of great authority and trust, yet it appears by experience, that the King's writs are served by bailiffs, persons of little or no value: and it is not to be presumed, that all the substance a man has in his house, nor that a man would lose his liberty, which is so inestimable, if he has sufficient to satisfy his debt. And all the said books, which prove, that when the process concerns the King, that the sheriff may break the house, imply that at the suit of the party, the house may not be broken: otherwise the addition (at the suit of the King) would be frivolous. And with this resolution agrees the book in (d) 13 E. 4. 9. and the express difference there taken between the case of felony, which (as has been said) concerns the commonwealth, and the suit [93 a] of any subject, which is for the particular interest of the party, as there it is said in (e) 18 El. 4. 4. a. by Littleton and all his companions it is resolved, that the sheriff cannot break the defendant's house by force of a fieri facias, but he is a trespasser by the breaking, and yet the execution which he then doth in the house is good. And it was said, that the said book of (a) 18 E. 2. was but a short note, and not any case judicially adjudged, and it doth not appear at whose suit the case is intended, but it is an observation or collection (as it seems) of the reporter. And if it be intended of a quo (b) minus or other action in which the King is party, or is to have benefit, the book is good law.[3]

5. It was resolved, that the house of any one is not a castle or privilege but for himself, and shall not extend to protect any (c) person who flies to his house, or the goods of any other which are brought and conveyed into his house, to prevent a lawful execution, and to escape the ordinary process of law; for the privilege of his house extends only to him and his family, and to his own proper goods, or to those which are lawfully and without fraud and covin there; and therefore in such cases after denial on request made, the sheriff may break the house (I); and that is proved by the stat. of West. 1. c. (d) 17. by which it is declared, that the sheriff may break a house or castle to make replevin, when the goods of another which he has distrained are by him conveyed to his house or castle, to prevent the owner to have a replevin of his goods: which Act is but an affirmance of the common law in such points. But it appears there, that before the sheriff in such case breaks the house, he ought to demand the goods to be delivered to him for the words of the statute are, After that the cattle shall be solemnly demanded by the sheriff's, &c.[4]

6. It was resolved, admitting that the sheriff after denial made might have broke the house, as the plaintiff's counsel pretend he might, then it follows that he has not done his (e) duty, for it doth not appear, that he made any request to open the door of the house. Also the defendant, as this case is, has done that which he might well do by the law, scil. to shut the door of his own house.[5]

Lastly, the general allegation, (f) praemisorum non ignarus, was not sufficient in this case where the notice of the premises is so material; but in this case it ought to have been certainly, and directly alledged; for without notice of the process of law, and of the coming of the sheriff with the jury to execute it, the shutting of the door of his own house was lawful. And judgment was given against the plaintiff.[6]

6.3.2.2The King v. Dr. Purnell, 1748

The defendant was vice chancellor of Oxford; and the Attorney-General had ex officio exhibited against him an information, for not taking the deposition of Blacow the evidence [sic], and for neglect of his duty both as vice chancellor and justice of the peace, in not punishing Whitmore and Dawes, who had spoken treasonable words in the streets of Oxford. The defendant appeared to the first information, upon which a noli prosequi was entered, and a second filed, to which also the defendant appeared and pleaded; and a trial at Bar was appointed November 21, but it was countermanded, and a new day, viz. February 6th was afterwards appointed. And now the last day of the term, the attorney, without any affidavit, moved for a rule directed to the proper officers of the university to permit their books, records and archives to be inspected, in order to furnish evidence against the vice chancellor. This was moved as a motion of course for a preemptory rule, on a suggestion that the King, being visitor of the university, had a right to inspect their books whenever he thought proper. Notice of the motion was however given the night before at nine o’clock, and it was opposed by Henley and Evans. And the Court, being of opinion it was not a preemptory motion, only granted a rule to shew cause.

In the next term, Mr. Wilbraham, standing counsel for the university, shewed cause. That the rule was made on no affidavit: that it was drawn in very general terms, (to inspect books, records, and archives).—Records, if any, may be seen elsewhere. Archives cannot be inspected but by a figure, continens pro contenta. But this is a case of too much concern, to stand upon form. The principal case is, whether on a prosecution of a public officer for a supposed misdemeanor, the Court ought to grant inspection of the public books of a corporation. The rule is on Dr. Purnell himself. Nemo tenetur seipsum accusare. The law will not tempt a man to make shipwreck of his conscience, in order to disculpate himself. In Chancery, a man may demur, if on the face of the bill it appears, that the matter to be discovered will affect the defendant in a criminal way. It will be said, the Court usually grants rules to inspect public books. True, but then it is usually when franchises are contested, and the like; when inspection of those books are the only evidence, and the corporation are considered only as trustees, just as lords of manors are, of the public evidences belonging to the manor. But in no case has the Court ever interposed in a criminal prosecution to grant such a rule, and force such inspection. Many indeed have been granted to inspect poor's rates; but those are public evidences which every body has a right to do. Was there never any prosecution carried on with the same spirit as this? Why then are no examples produced? By the same reason every person indicted might be obliged to shew, whether he had any evidence against himself. In Bradshaw qui tam v. Philips, a.d. 1735, in an action for bribery, motion was, to inspect the books of a corporation, to prove the defendant a freeman. Hardwick, C.J., denied the rule, because the plaintiff was a stranger. This case is much stronger. It is a precedent of the first impression. There seems to be a general want of evidence; but it is to be hoped, there is no other view than for evidence in this particular case. A hundred cases may be shewn where such rules have been granted in quo warranto's, &c. but none in criminal cases. [The Attorney "mentioned K. and Burkins, 7 Geo. 1, which was an indictment at a borough sessions, removed into B. R. by certiorari. Court said, the defendant might have a rule on the clerk of the peace, to have a copy of the names on the back of the indictment."] This is by no means a case. The indictment is a public record; he might have had it without a rule … .

Mr. Henley on the same side.—This is a rule of the greatest importance to the most respectable body in the nation. It gives authority to the lowest agent of the Crown to rummage the MSS. of the university. One rule, in applications of this kind, is, that the person applying has an interest in the books and papers, so that in justice he is at all times entitled to have recourse to them. Another, that the person in possession is a trustee for the person applying (as a lord of a manor &c.), and then the trust must be the subject in dispute; the suit must be about land in the manor, and averred by affidavit so to be. So corporations are the trustees and repository of the common franchise has been disputed, as on a mandamus or quo warranto. The present rule is on an information against an individual of the university, and therefore desires to inspect the records of the university. By the parity of reason, on an indictment against a citizen of London, they might inspect the records of the city. But it is suggested, that the King is visitor, and therefore entitled to a rule. I question the fact. The Court will require to be well satisfied of that. But if so, 'tis a strong reason against granting the rule, for then the Crown may enforce its demand in a visitatorial way. Suppose the Crown has a general interest in the books of a corporation; that will not entitle them to an inspection, except the books are the subject of the dispute. Crew qui tam and Blackburn, H. 8 G. 2, an action for interfering in elections of members of Parliament, being a clerk of the post-office: the Court would not grant a rule to inspect the post-office books (though public books), because the cause did not concern them. Benson and Cole, M. 22 G. 2; motion to inspect Custom-House books, to prove the plaintiff in an insurance cause had no interest: urged that they were public books: refused, because they were not the subject of dispute. These were civil actions; the present otherwise. The avowed design of this motion being to furnish evidence, some precedent will be necessary; especially as a very bad use may be made of such a rule, when the university is much out of favour with some people.

Mr. Ford, on the same side.—The College of Physicians v. Dr. West, H. 2 G. 1; action for practising sans license; motion to inspect the public books of the college; denied, because the defendant is a stranger to the college. Cox and Copping, 5 Mod. 395; dispute about the glebe: Court would not grant rule to inspect the churchwardens' books; because it was a private dispute. There is no reason to grant this inspection, because the vice-chancellor is a justice. Is it because he is a vice-chancellor? Why? Not on account of his supposed visitatorial power; for in Dr. Walker's case, the Court quashed a rule because they would not take upon themselves to act the part of visitors. The Court will not assist visitors, but only in support of their visitatorial authority. The visitatorial authority is not now in question; the vice-chancellor is prosecuted for a supposed offence at common law. If a witness has a question put him that may affect himself, the Court will not oblige him to answer it. Qu. and Mead, 2 Lord Raym. 927; defendant was an attorney, and with others incorporated by Act of Parliament as surveyors of highways, &c. Action against him, for not talking the oaths to qualify. Motion to inspect the corporation books; but denied, because they would not force a man to produce evidence against himself. K. and Lee, M. 17 G. 2; information against defendant as overseer, for making rate without churchwardens. Rule obtained by surprise, to inspect papers: not obeyed. Motion against Lee for attachment. Lee C.J., cited Bradshaw and Philips; Court refused to grant attachment, enlarged the rule, and it was dropped. The K. and Burkins only shews the tenderness which the Court always shews for persons under prosecution, and was to let him know his accusers. If the present defendant has evidence in his custody, and refuses to obey the rule, an attachment must issue; which would be as strange, as to grant one against a man, for not confessing his crime.

Mr. Evans on the same side.—Had this been an information for exercising the office of vice-chancellor, motion might have been regular. In ecclesiastical jurisdictions, they used to compel a man to furnish evidence against him: but by Stat. Car. 2. oaths ex officio are taken away. On indictment for coining, the attorney might as well move, to have a prisoner discover all his correspondence. 'Tis true, the crimes are less, and the punishment less; but the barrier of liberty is the same. If this rule be granted, the Court of K. B. would be no longer a Court of Justice, but an aid to an inquisition of State. This Court sits to hear, not to furnish evidence.

Mr. Morton, on the same would not repeat.

Ryder, Attorney General, in support of the rule. This prosecution is out of favour to the university; to keep up a spirit of religion and loyalty there. Hard, that the university should interest themselves, to vindicate a member of their body that is under prosecution. If the prosecution be just, or unjust, it cannot hurt the university. Motion relates only to the public records, not the MSS. letters, &c. therefore cannot be so prejudicial as is represented. The intent is to see the statutes of the university, to which the motion shall be confined. The information is for not taking depositions against an enormous crime, as vice-chancellor. The Court grants motions of course to inspect public books. It is as reasonable that public records should be produced for public justice, as private papers for private justice. It is not desired that the vice-chancellor but the public officer should produce them: should he prove to be the public officer, that is no reason against the motion; for it does not respect him as defendant, but as public officer. The public is interested in the university statutes. We do not apply on behalf of the King as visitor, but as guardian of the public peace. In K. and Blackburn, there was a rule of this kind made in a penal prosecution; a rule on a public officer, keeping a public record, for an inspection in a criminal prosecution. Informations in nature of quo warranto are public and criminal suits. There, rules of this sort are frequent. The case of Bradshaw and Philips was not of a public nature. K. and Blackburn; post-office books are not public, but the King's private books. Benson and Cole; same answer. As to the case of College of Physicians, that was the case of plaintiffs, and the Court will not compel the plaintiff to produce evidence against himself. In The Qu. and Mead, the books were of a private nature, and it appeared that the defendant was the person who kept the books. In The K. and Lee, it was plain, that the defendant was himself the person against whom the rule is to be made. Not so here; the vice-chancellor is not the person on whom the rule is to be made.

[Hereupon Mr. Henley suggested, that the vice-chancellor had the custody of the original statutes.]

Sir John Strange for the Crown.—Affidavits are not usual in such cases. In the case of The Skinners' Company, the clerk refused to grant inspection, and an attachment was granted; but it was argued, whether the papers required were proper to be seen, and the Court held that they were. So here, if any thing improper be demanded, the inspection may be refused. Strange, that the university should conceal their statutes; since they are of so public a nature, that all the youth there entered, take oaths to observe them, and yet they are secreted from them. The Crown is the founder and lawgiver of the university, and such has a right to inspect those laws.

[Lee, C.J.—I apprehend this case is argued to differ from all others (as qui tam actions, &c.) because in those the party applying is a stranger; but that in the present case the King is no stranger, because he is founder. But how does that appear? Another question; is there any instance of an information against an officer of a corporation for breach of by-laws, and a rule granted to inspect those by-laws?]

Murray, Solicitor-General for the Crown.—Four necessary requisites for inspections of this kind. First, that they be public books. Second, that the party applying has an interest in them. Third, that they be material in a suit in this Court. Fourth, that the person in possession be forced to discover nothing to charge himself criminally.—First, these are of a public nature, given by the King, and open to all members of university. The very youngest have a copy given them at their matriculation. Second, the King has an interest; he gave them, and has an interest in seeing them obeyed; and may enforce that obedience two ways; as visitor, and as King, where an offence at common law is mixed with the breach of them. Third, there is a suit in this Court, and the statutes may be material; and, if it is suggested that they will be so, the Court will grant the rule. Fourth, the objection is, that in criminal suits no one is bound to furnish evidence against himself. Agreed, but a distinction may be made. When a man is magistrate, and as such has books in his custody; his having the office shall not secrete those books, which another vice-chancellor must have produced. Besides, the statutes are not in the vice-chancellor's custody only, but also in the hands of the custos archivorum.

Sir R. Lloyd, on the same side.—The university is not accused; the university may therefore very safely produce their books. The King is as much related to the Corporation of the University of Oxford, as to that of the City of York, and no more a stranger to one than the other. It is hoped, that the King is no stranger to either university. If a man were to be indicted for burning the records of a corporation; no doubt but such rule would then be granted, and why not now? Per Lee, C.J.—This is quite a new case. There is no precedent to warrant it, I therefore chuse to consider of it.

Afterwards, Lee C.J., delivered the opinion of the Court. This rule has been much narrowed, since it was first moved by Mr. Attorney. But still we are all of opinion, that we cannot, consistently with the rules of this Court, make such a rule. We ground ourselves on what has been done in similar cases, though none so strong as this. No case has been cited to support this application, but The K. and Burkin, which is not apposite. The clerk of the peace ought ex officio to have given a copy of the indictment, and the Court would have granted a rule on him to do it. The cases which we apprehend to be close to this are 1st. Qu. and Mead, 2 Ann. Ld. Raym. 927. The reasons for denying the motion were, because, 1. The books were of a private nature. 2. Granting such rule would be to make a man produce evidence against himself, in a criminal prosecution. The second case is The K. and Cornelius and Others, Justices of Ipswich, T. 17 & 18 Geo. 2, an information for exacting money from persons for licensing ale houses: a motion to inspect the corporation-books; cause was shewn against it by Sir J. Strange and Sir R. Lloyd. The Court on consideration were of opinion, that the rule could not be granted; as it was in a criminal proceeding, and it tended to make the defendants furnish evidence against themselves. These cases are very similar, only the present is rather stronger; because the information here is for a breach of and crime against the laws of the land, and this is an application to search books, which relate to the defendant's behaviour, as a nature of quo warranto; because these; [sic] concern franchises, whereof the corporation books are the proper and only evidence, and they concern the Crown and the defendants equally. We know no instance, wherein this Court has granted a rule to inspect books in a criminal prosecution nakedly considered.

The rule was discharged per totam Curiam.

"N.B. As the university statute-book really contains nothing which could affect the merits of this case in any degree; and as (if it had) printed copies of it are very numerous and easy to be met with; and the custos archivorum, in whose keeping the original is, might have been compelled to have attended with it at the trial: this extraordinary motion seemed only to have been intended, as an excuse for dropping a prosecution, which could not be maintained: and it was accordingly dropped immediately after, having cost the defendant to the amount of several hundred pounds."

6.3.2.3.aCharles Paxton's Plea for Writ of Assistance, 1755

6.3.2.4Huckle v. Money, 1763

Lord Chief Justice.—In all motions for new trials, it is as absolutely necessary for the Court to enter into the nature of the cause, the evidence, facts, and circumstances of the case, as for a jury; the law has not laid down what shall be the measure in damages in actions of tort; the measure is vague and uncertain, depending upon a vast variety of causes, facts, and cicumstances; torts or injuries which may be done by one man to another are infinite; in cases of criminal conversation, battery, imprisonment, slander, malicious prosecutions, &c. the state, degree, quality, trade or profession of the party injured, as well as of the person who did the injury, must be, and generally are, considered by a jury in giving damages. The few cases to be found in the books of new trials for torts, shews that Courts of Justice have most commonly set their faces against them; and the Courts interfering in these cases would be laying aside juries. Before the time of granting new trials, there is no instance that the judges ever intermeddled with the damages.

I shall now state the nature of this case, as it appeared upon the evidence at the trial: a warrant was granted by Lord Halifax, Secretary of State, directed to four messengers, to apprehend and seize the printers and publishers of a paper called the North Briton, Number 45, without any information or charge laid before the Secretary of State, previous to the granting thereof, and without naming any person whatsoever in the warrant; Carrington, the first of the messengers to whom the warrant was directed, from some private intelligence he had got that Leech was the printer of the North Briton, Number 45, directed the defendant to execute the warrant upon the plaintiff, (one of Leech's journeymen,) and took him into custody for about six hours, and during that time treated him well; the personal injury done to him was very small, so that if the jury had been confined by their oath to consider the mere personal injury only, perhaps 20l damages would have been thought damages sufficient; but the small injury done to the plaintiff, or the inconsiderableness of his station and rank in life did not appear to the jury in that striking light in which the great point of law touching the liberty of the subject appeared to them at the trial; they saw a magistrate over all the King's subjects, exercising arbitrary power, violating Magna Charta, and attempting to destroy the liberty of the kingdom, by insisting upon the legality of this general warrant before them; they heard the King's Counsel, and saw the solicitor of the Treasury endeavouring to support and maintain the legality of the warrant in a tyrannical and severe manner. These are the ideas which struck the jury on the trial; and I think they have done right in giving exemplary damages. To enter a man's house by virtue of a nameless warrant, in order to procure evidence, is worse than the Spanish Inquisition; a law under which no Englishman would wish to live an hour; it was a most daring public attack made upon the liberty of the subject. I thought that the 29th chapter of Magna Charta, Nullus liber homo capiatur vel imprisonetur, &c. nec super eum ibimus, &c. nisi per legale judicium parium suorum vel per legem terrae, &c. which is pointed against arbitrary power, was violated. I cannot say what damages I should have given if I had been upon the jury; but I directed and told them they were not bound to any certain damages against the Solicitor-General's argument. Upon the whole, I am of opinion the damages are not excessive; and that it is very dangerous for the Judges to intermeddle in damages for torts; it must be a glaring case indeed of outrageous damages in a tort, and which all mankind at first blush must think so, to induce a Court to grant a new trial for excessive damages.

Bathurst J.—I am of my Lord's opinion, and particularly in the matter of damages, wherein he directed the jury that they were not bound to certain damages. This is a motion to set aside 15 verdicts in effect; for all the other persons who have brought actions against these messengers have had verdicts for 200l in each cause by consent, after two of the actions were fully heard and tried. Clive J. absent.

Per Curiam.—New trial refused.

6.3.2.5Wilkes v. Wood, 1763

… His Lordship then went upon the warrant, which he declared was a point of the greatest consequence he had ever met with in his whole practice. The defendants claimed a right, under precedents, to force persons houses, break open escrutores, seize their papers, &c. upon a general warrant, where no inventory is made of the things thus taken away, and where no offenders names are specified in the warrant, and therefore a discretionary power given to messengers to search wherever their suspicions may chance to fall. If such a power is truly invested in a Secretary of State, and he can delegate this power, it certainly may affect the person and property of every man in this kingdom, and is totally subversive of the liberty of the subject.

And as for the precedents, will that be esteemed law in a Secretary of State which is not law in any other magistrate of this kingdom? If they should be found to be legal, they are certainly of the most dangerous consequences; if not legal, must aggravate damages. Notwithstanding what Mr. Solicitor-General has said, I have formerly delivered it as my opinion on another occasion, and I still continue of the same mind, that a jury have it in their power to give damages for more than the injury received. Damages are designed not only as a satisfaction to the injured person, but likewise as a punishment to the guilty, to deter from any such proceeding for the future, and as a proof of the detestation of the jury to the action itself.

As to the proof of what papers were taken away, the plaintiff could have no account of them; and those who were able to have given an account (which might have been an extenuation of their guilt) have produced none. It lays upon the jury to allow what weight they think proper to that part of the evidence. It is my opinion the office precedents, which had been produced since the revolution, are no justification of a practice in itself illegal, and contrary to the fundamental principles of the constitution; though its having been the constant practice of the office, might fairly be pleaded in mitigation of damages.

He then told the jury they had a very material affair to determine upon, and recommended it to them to be particularly cautious in bringing in their verdict. Observed, that if the jury found Mr. Wilkes the author or publisher of No. 45, it will be filed, and stand upon record in the Court of Common Pleas, and of course be produced as proof, upon the criminal cause depending, in barr of any future more ample discussion of that matter on both sides; that on the other side they should be equally careful to do justice, according to the evidence; he therefore left it to their consideration.

The jury, after withdrawing for near half an hour, returned, and found a general verdict upon both issues for the plaintiff, with a thousand pounds damages.

After the verdict was recorded, the Solicitor-General offered to prefer a bill of exceptions, which the Lord Chief Justice refused to accept, saying it was out of time.

The Court sat at nine o'clock in the morning, and the verdict was brought in at twenty minutes past eleven o'clock at night.

6.3.2.6Rex v. Wilkes, 1763

Lord Chief Justice Pratt, after stating the warrant of commitment, said, there are two objections taken to the legality of this warrant, and a third matter insisted on for the defendant, is privilege of Parliament.

The first objection is, that it does not appear to the Court that Mr. Wilkes was charged by any evidence before the Secretaries of State, that he was the author or publisher of the North Briton, Number XLV. In answer to this, we are all of the opinion, that it is not necessary to state in the warrant that Mr. Wilkes was charged by any evidence before the Secretaries of State, and that this objection has no weight. Whether a justice of peace can, ex officio, without any evidence or information, issue a warrant for apprehending for a crime, is a different question: if a crime be done in his sight, he may commit the criminal upon the spot; but where he is not present, he ought not to commit upon discretion. Suppose a magistrate hath notice, or a particular knowledge that a person has been guilty of an offence, yet I do not think it is a sufficient ground for him to commit the criminal; but in that case he is rather a witness than a magistrate, and ought to make oath of the fact before some other magistrate, who should thereupon act the official part, by granting a warrant to apprehend the offender, it being more fit that the accuser should appear as a witness than act as a magistrate. But that is not the question upon this warrant; the question here is, whether it is an essential part of the warrant that the information, evidence, or grounds of the charge before the Secretaries of State, should be set forth in the warrant? And we think it is not. Thomas Rudyard's case, 2 Vent. 22, cannot be applied to this case, for in the case of a conviction it is otherwise. It was said that a charge by witness was the ground of a warrant; but we think it not requisite to set out more than the offence, and the particular species of it. It may be objected, if this be good every man's liberty will be in the power of a justice of peace. But Hale, Coke, and Hawkins take no notice that a charge is necessary to be set out in the warrant. In the case of The Seven Bishops their counsel did not take this objection, which no doubt but they would have done if they had thought there had been any weight in it. I do not rely upon the determination of the Judges who then presided in the King's Bench. I have been attended with many precedents of warrants returned into the King's Bench; they are almost universally like this; and in Sir William Wyndham's case, 1 Stra. 2, 3, this very point before us is determined. And Hawkins, in his 2 Pl. Coron. 120, sect. 17, says, "It is safe to set forth that the party is charged upon oath; but this is not necessary; for it hath been resolved that a commitment for treason, or for suspicion of it, without setting forth any particular accusation, or ground of suspicion, is good;" and cites Sir William Wyndham's case, Trin. 2 Geo. Dalt. cap. 125. Cromp. 233 b.

The second objection is, that the libel ought to be set forth in the warrant in haec verba, or at least so much thereof as the Secretaries of State deemed infamous, seditious, &c. that the Court may judge whether any such paper ever existed, or if it does exist, whether it be an infamous and seditious libel or not. But we are all of a contrary opinion: a warrant of commitment for felony must contain the species of felony briefly, "as for felony for the death of J. S., or for burglary in breaking the house of J. S. &c.; and the reason is, because it may appear to the Judges upon the return of an habeas corpus, whether it be felony or not." The magistrate forms his judgment upon the writing, whether it be an infamous and seditious libel or not, at his peril, and perhaps the paper itself may not contain the whole of the libel; inuendoes may be necessary to make the whole out; there is no other word in the law but libel whereby to express the true idea of an infamous writing; we understand the nature of a libel as well as a species of felony; it is said the libel ought to be stated, because the Court cannot judge whether it is a libel or not without it; but that is a matter for the Judge and jury to determine at the trial. If the paper was here, I should be afraid to read it. We might perhaps be able to determine that it was a libel, but we could not judge that it was not a libel, because of inuendoes, &c. It may be said, that without seeing the libel we are not able to fix the quantum of the bail; but in answer to this, the nature of the offence is known by us; it is said to be an infamous and seditious libel, &c.: it is such a misdemeanor as we should require good bail for, (moderation to be observed,) and such as the party may be able to procure.

The third matter insisted upon for Mr. Wilkes is, that he is a member of Parliament, (which has been admitted by the King's Serjeants,) and entitled to privilege to be free from arrests in all cases except treason, felony, and actual breach of the peace, and therefore ought to be discharged from imprisonment without bail; and we are all of opinion that he is entitled to that privilege, and must be discharged without bail. In the case of The Seven Bishops the Court took notice of the privilege of Parliament, and thought the bishops would have been entitled to it if they had not judged them to have been guilty of a breach of the peace; for three of them, Wright, Holloway, and Allybone, deemed a seditious libel to be an actual breach of the peace, and therefore they were ousted of their privilege most unjustly. If Mr. Wilkes had been described as a member of Parliament in the return, we must have taken notice of the law of privilege of Parliament, otherwise the members would be without remedy where they are wrongfully arrested against the law of Parliament; we are bound to take notice of their privileges, as being part of the law of the land. 4 Inst. 25 says, the privilege of Parliament holds unless it be in three cases, viz. treason, felony, and the peace; these are the words of Coke. In the trial of The Seven Bishops the word peace, in this case of privilege, is explained to mean where surety of the peace is required. Privilege of Parliament holds in informations for the King, unless in the cases before excepted; the case of an information against Lord Tankerville for bribery, 4 Annae, was within the privilege of Parliament. See the resolution of the Lords and Commons, anno 1675. We are all of opinion that a libel is not a breach of the peace: it tends to the breach of the peace, and that is the utmost. 1 Lev. 139. But that which only tends to the breach of the peace cannot be a breach of it. Suppose a libel be a breach of the peace, yet I think it cannot exclude privilege, because I cannot find that a libeller is bound to find surety of the peace, in any book whatever, nor ever was, in any case, except one, viz. the case of The Seven Bishops, where three Judges said, that surety of the peace was required in the case of a libel: Judge Powell, the only honest man of the four Judges, dissented, and I am bold to be of his opinion, and to say that case is not law; but it shews the miserable condition of the State at that time. Upon the whole, it is absurd to require surety of the peace or bail in the case of a libeller, and therefore Mr. Wilkes must be discharged from his imprisonment: whereupon there was a loud huzza in Westminster-Hall. He was discharged accordingly.

6.3.2.7Entick v. Carrington, 1765

Lord Chief Justice.—I shall not give any opinion at present, because this case, which is of the utmost consequence to the public, is to be argued again; I shall only just mention a matter which has slipped the sagacity of the counsel on both sides, that it may be taken notice of upon the next argument. Suppose a warrant which is against law be granted, such as no justice of peace, or other magistrate high or low whomsoever, has power to issue, whether that magistrate or justice who grants such warrant, or the officer who executes it, are within the stat. 24 Geo. 2, c. 44? To put one case (among an hundred that might happen); suppose a justice of peace issues a warrant to search a house for stolen goods, and directs it to four of his servants, who search and find no stolen goods, but seize all the books and papers of the owners of the house, whether in such a case would the justice of peace, his officers or servants, be within the Stat. 24 Geo. 2? I desire that every point of this case may be argued to the bottom; for I shall think myself bound, when I come to give judgment, to give my opinion upon every point in the case.

… [Counsel made their arguments.]

Curia.—The defendants make two defences; first, that they are within the stat. 24 Geo. 2, c. 44; 2dly, that such warrants have frequently been granted by Secretaries of State ever since the Revolution, and have never been controverted, and that they are legal; upon both which defences the defendants rely.

A Secretary of State, who is a Privy Counsellor, if he be a conservator of the peace, whatever power he has to commit is by the common law: if he be considered only as a Privy Counsellor, he is the only one at the board who has exercised this authority of late years; if as a conservator, he never binds to the peace; no other conservator ever did that we can find: he has no power to administer an oath, or take bail; but yet it must be admitted that he is in the full exercise of this power to commit, for treason and seditious libels against the Government, whatever was the original source of that power; as appears from the cases of The Queen and Derby, The King and Earbury, and Kendale and Roe's case.

We must know what a Secretary of State is, before we can tell whether he is within the stat. 24 Geo. 2, c. 44. He is the keeper of the King's signet wherewith the King's private letters are signed. 2 Inst. 556. Coke upon Articuli Super Chartas, 28 Ed. 1. Lord Coke's silence is a strong presumption that no such power as he now exercises was in him at that time; formerly he was not a Privy Counsellor, or considered as a magistrate; he began to be significant about the time of the Revolution, and he grew great when the princes of Europe sent ambassadors hither; it seems inconsistent that a Secretary of State should have power to commit, and no power to administer an oath, or take bail; who can commit and not have power to examine? the House of Commons indeed commit without oath, but that is nothing to the present case; there is no account in our law-books of Secretaries of State except in the few cases mentioned; he is not to be found among the old conservators; in Lambert, Crompton, Fitzherbert, &c. nor is a Privy Counsellor to be found among our old books till Kendall and Roe's case, and 1 Leon. 70, 71, 29 Eliz. is the first case that takes notice of a commitment by a Secretary of State; but in 2 Leon. 175 the Judges knew no such committing magistrate as the Secretary of State. It appears by the Petition of Right, that the King and Council claimed a power to commit; if the Secretary of State had claimed any such power, then certainly the Petition of Right would have taken notice of it; but from its silence on that head we may fairly conclude he neither claimed nor had any such power; the Stat. 16 Car. 1, for regulating the Privy Council, and taking away the Court of StarChamber, binds the King not to commit, and in such case gives a habeas corpus; it is strange that House of Commons should take no notice of the Secretary of State, if he then had claimed power to commit. This power of a Secretary of State to commit was derivative from the commitment per mandatum Regis: Ephemeris Parliamentaria. Coke says in his speech to the House, “If I do my duty to the King, I must commit without shewing the cause;” 1 Leon. 70, 71, shews that a commitment by a single Privy Counsellor was not warranted. By the Licensing Statute of 13 & 14 Car. 2, cap. 33, sec. 15, licence is given to a messenger under a warrant of the Secretary of State to search for books unlicensed, and if they find any against the religion of the Church of England, to bring them before the Secretary of State; the warrant in that case expressed that it was by the King’s command. See Stamford’s comments on the mandate of the King, and Lambert, cap. Bailment. All the Judges temp. Eliz. held that in a warrant or commitment by one Privy Counsellor he must shew it was by the mandate of the King in Council. See And. 297, the opinion of all the Judges; they remonstrated to the King that no subject ought to be committed by a Privy Counsellor against the law of the realm. Before the 3 Car. 1 all the Privy Counsellors exercised this power to commit; from that aera they disused this power, but then they prescribed still to commit per mandatum Regis. Journal of the House of Commons 195. 16 Car. 1. Coke, Selden, &c. argued that the King’s power to commit, meant that he had such power by his Courts of Justice. In the case of The Seven Bishops all the Court and King’s Council admit, that supposing the warrant had been signed out of the Council, that it would have been bad, but the Court presumed it to be signed at the board; Pollexfen in his argument says, we do not deny but the Council board have power to commit, but not out of Council; this is a very strong authority; the whole body of the law seem not to know that Privy Counsellors out of Council had any power to commit, if there had been any such power they could not have been ignorant of it; and this power was only in cases of high treason, they never claimed it in any other case. It was argued that if a Secretary of State hath power to commit in high treason, he hath it in cases of lesser crimes: but this we deny, for if it appears that he hath power to commit in one case only, how can we then without authority say he has that power in other cases? He is not a conservator of the peace; Justice Rokeby only says he is in the nature of a conservator of the peace: we are now bound by the cases of The Queen and Derby, and The King and Earbury.

The Secretary of State is no conservator nor a justice of the peace, quasi secretary, within the words or equity of Stat. 24 Geo. 2, admitting him (for arguments sake) to be a conservator, the preamble of the statute shews why it was made, and for what purpose; the only grantor of a warrant therein mentioned, is a justice of the peace; justice of peace and conservator are not convertible terms; the cases of construction upon old statutes, in regard to the warden of the Fleet, the Bishop of Norwich, &c. are not to be applied to cases upon modern statutes. The best way to construe modern statutes is to follow the words thereof; let us compare a justice of peace and a conservator; the justice is liable to actions, as the statute takes notice, it is applicable to him who acts by warrant directed to constables; a conservator is not intrusted with the execution of the laws, which by this Act is meant statutes, which gives justices jurisdiction; a conservator is not liable to actions; he never acts: he is almost forgotten; there never was an action against a conservator of the peace as such; he is antiquated, and could never be thought of when this Act was made; and ad ea quae frequenter accidunt jura adaptantur. There is no act of a constable or tithingman as conservator taken notice of in the statute; will the Secretary of State be ranked with the highest or lowest of these conservators? the Statute of Jac. 1, for officers acting by authority to plead the general issue, and give the special matter in evidence, when considered with this Statute of 24 Geo. 2, the latter seems to be a second part of the Act of Jac. 1, and we are all clearly of the opinion that neither the Secretary of State, nor the messengers, are within the Stat. 24 Geo. 2, but if the messengers had been within it, as they did not take a constable with them according to the warrant, that alone would have been fatal to them, nor did they pursue the warrant in the execution thereof, when they carried the plaintiff and his books, &c. before Lovel Stanhope, and not before Lord Halifax; that was wrong, because a Secretary of State cannot delegate his power, but ought to act in this part of his office personally.

The defendants having failed in their defence under the Statute 24 Geo. 2; we shall now consider the special justification, whether it can be supported in law, and this depends upon the jurisdiction of the Secretary of State; for if he has no jurisdiction to grant a warrant to break open doors, locks, boxes, and to seize a man and all his books, &c. in the first instance upon an information of his being guilty of publishing a libel, the warrant will not justify the defendants: it was resolved by B. R. in the case of Shergold v. Holloway, that a justice's warrant expressly to arrest the party will not justify the officer, there being no jurisdiction. 2 Stran. 1002. The warrant in our case was an execution in the first instance, without any previous summons, examination, hearing the plaintiff, or proof that he was the author of the supposed libels; a power claimed by no other magistrate whatever (Scroggs C. J. always excepted); it was left to the discretion of these defendants to execute the warrant in the absence or presence of the plaintiff, when he might have no witness present to see what they did; for they were to seize all papers, bank bills, or any other valuable papers they might take away if they were so disposed; there might be nobody to detect them. If this be lawful, both Houses of Parliament are involved in it, for they have both ruled, that privilege doth not extend to this case. In the case of Wilkes, a member of the Commons House, all his books and papers were seized and taken away; we were told by one of these messengers that he was obliged by his oath to sweep away all papers whatsoever; if this was law it would be found in our books, but no such law ever existed in this country; our law holds the property of every man so sacred, that no man can set his foot upon his neighbours close without his leave; if he does he is a trespasser, though he does no damage at all; if he will tread upon his neighbor's ground, he must justify it by law. The defendants have no right to avail themselves of the usage of these warrants since the Revolution, and if that would have justified them they have not averred it in their plea, so it could not be put, nor was in issue at the trial; we can safely say there is no law in this country to justify the defendants in what they have done; if there was, it would destroy all the comforts of society; for papers are often the dearest property a man can have. This case was compared to that of stolen goods; Lord Coke denied the lawfulness of granting warrants to search for stolen goods, 4 Inst. 176, 177, though now it prevails to be law; but in that case the justice and the informer must proceed with great caution; there must be an oath that the party has had his goods stolen, and his strong reason to believe they are concealed in such a place; but if the goods are not found there, he is a trespasser; the officer in that case is a witness; there are none in this case, no inventory taken; if it had been legal many guards of property would have attended it. We shall now consider the usage of these warrants since the Revolution; if it began then, it is too modern to be law; the common law did not begin with the Revolution; the ancient constitution which had been almost overthrown and destroyed, was then repaired and revived; the Revolution added a new buttress to the ancient venerable edifice: the K.B. lately said that no objection had ever been taken to general warrants, they have passed sub silentio: this is the first instance of an attempt to prove a modern practice of a private office to make and execute warrants to enter a man's house, search for and take away all his books and papers in the first instance, to be law, which is not found in our books. It must have been the guilt or poverty of those upon whom such warrants have been executed, that deterred or hindered them from contending against the power of a Secretary of State and the Solicitor of the Treasury, or such warrants could never have passed for lawful till this time. We are inclined to think the present warrant took its first rise from the Licensing Act, 13 & 14 Car. 2, c. 33, and are all of the opinion that it cannot be justified by law, notwithstanding the resolution of the Judges in the time of Cha. 2, and Jac. 2, that such search warrants are lawful. State Trials, vol. 3, 58, the trial of Carr for a libel. There is no authority but of the Judges of that time that a house may be searched for a libel, but the twelve Judges cannot make law; and if a man is punishable for having a libel in his private custody, as many cases say he is, half the kingdom would be guilty in the case of a favourable libel, if libels may be searched for and seized by whomsoever and wheresoever the Secretary of State thinks fit. It is said it is better for the Government and the public to seize the libel before it is published; if the Legislature be of that opinion they will make it lawful. Sir Samuel Astry was committed to the Tower, for asserting there was a law of State distinct from the common law. The law never forces evidence from the party in whose power it is; when an adversary has got your deeds, there is no lawful way of getting them again but by an action. 2 Stran. 1210, The King and Cornelius. The King and Dr. Purnell, Hil. 22 Geo. B.R. Our law is wise and merciful, and supposes every man accused is innocent before he is tried by his peers; upon the whole, we are all of the opinion that this warrant is wholly illegal and void. One word more for ourselves; we are no advocates for libels, all Governments must set their faces against them, and whenever they come before us and a jury we shall set our faces against them; and if juries do not prevent them they may prove fatal to liberty, destroy Government and introduce anarchy; but tyranny is better than anarchy, and the worst government better than none at all.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

95 Eng. Rep. 807 (K.B. 1765).

6.3.2.8Money v. Leach, 1765

[Lord Mansfield] … . The last point is, “whether this general warrant be good.”—

One part of it may be laid out for the case: for, as to what relates to the seizing of his papers, that part of it was never executed; and therefore it is out of the case.

It is not material to determine, “whether the warrant be good or bad;” except in the event of the case being within 7 J. 1, but not within 24 G. 2.

At present—As to the validity of the warrant, upon the single objection of the incertainty of the person, being neither named nor described—The common law, in many cases, gives authority to arrest without warrant; more especially, where taken in the very act: and there are many cases where particular Acts of Parliament have given authority to apprehend, under general warrants; as in the case of writs of assistance, or warrants to take up loose, idle and disorderly people. But here it is not contended, that the common law gave the officer authority to apprehend; nor that there is any act of Parliament which warrants this case.

Therefore it must stand upon principles of common law.

It is not fit, that the receiving or judging of the information should be left to the discretion of the officer. The magistrate ought to judge; and should give certain directions to the officer. This is so, upon reason and convenience.

Then as to authorities—Hale and all others hold such an uncertain warrant void: and there is no case or book to the contrary.

It is said, "that the usage has been so; and that many such have been issued, since the revolution, down to this time."

But a usage, to grow into law, ought to be a general usage, communiter usitata et approbata; and which, after a long continuance, it would be mischievous to overturn.

This is only the usage of a particular office, and contrary to the usage of all other justices and conservators of the peace.

There is the less reason for regarding this usage; because the form of the warrant probably took its rise from a positive statute; and the former precedents were inadvertently followed, after that law was expired.

Mr. Justice Wilmot declared, that he had no doubt, nor ever had, upon these warrants: he thought them illegal and void.

Neither had the two other Judges, Mr. Justice Yates, and Mr. Justice Aston, any doubt (upon this first argument) of the illegality of them: for, no degree of antiquity can give sanction to a usage bad in itself. And they esteemed this usage to be so. They were clear and unanimous in opinion that "this warrant was illegal and bad."

97 Eng. Rep. 1075, 1088 (K.B. 1765).

6.3.2.9Frisbie v. Butler, 1787

Error from the judgment of a justice of the peace. On the application of Butler, to George Catlin, a justice of the peace, the following warrant was issued, viz. "Whereas Josiah Butler hath made complaint, under oath, that he lost, on or about the 11th day of March, in Torrington, about twenty pounds of good pork, out of the cellar of Daniel Winchel, of the value of ten shillings, lawful money; it being taken by some evil-minded person: And said Butler suspects one Benjamin Frisbie, of Harwinton, to be the person that hath taken said pork, and prays for a writ, or search warrant, to search for his lost meat, etc.—To John Birge, an indifferent person, lawfully to serve this writ, there being no proper officer, without cost and charge, greeting: By authority of the state of Connecticut, you are commanded forthwith to search all suspected places and persons that the complainant thinks proper, to find his lost pork, and to cause the same, and the person with whom it shall be found, or suspected to have taken the same, and have him to appear before some proper authority, to be examined according to law."

By virtue of this warrant, Frisbie was arrested, brought before the justice who issued it, and upon the plea, not guilty, judgment was rendered, that "he was guilty of stealing said pork; and that he pay eighteen shillings as treble damages, to the complainant, and a fine of six shillings to the town treasurer."

The errors assigned, were,

1. That the warrant issued upon a verbal complaint only being exhibited.
2. That the warrant for searching and arresting was illegal, the facts alleged being of civil nature, and not such as would justify such a process.
3. The warrant is a general search warrant, commanding all persons and places throughout the world to be searched, at the discretion of the complainant;—therefore, illegal and void.
4. The judgment was for the gross sum of eighteen shillings as treble damages, for the loss of said pork, without ascertaining the real value.
5. That the process is not founded on any statute of this state; and the common law does not empower a justice to adjudge treble damages to the complainant, as was done in this case.
6. That said justice adjudged that said Frisbie should pay a fine to the treasurer of the town of Harwinton, without complaint or prosecution by any public officer, or any other person, on the part of the public.

Without argument, the judgment of the justice was reversed,

By the whole Court. The complaint on which the arraignment and conviction was had, contained no direct charge of the theft, but only an averment that the defendant was suspected to be guilty; nor, indeed, does it appear to have been theft that he was even suspected of, but only a taking away of the plantiff's property, which might amount to no more than a trespass;—and his being found guilty of the matters alleged against him in the complaint, could be no ground for sentencing and punishing him as for theft.

With regard to the warrant—Although it is the duty of a justice of the peace granting a search warrant (in doing which he acts judicially) to limit the search to such particular place or places, as he, from the circumstances, shall judge there is reason to suspect; and the arrest of such person or persons as the goods shall be found with: And the warrant in the present case, being general, to search all places, and arrest all persons, the complainant should suspect, is clearly illegal; yet, how far this vitiates the proceedings upon the arraignment, may be a question, which is not necessary now to determine; as also the sufficiency of several of the other matters assigned in error.

i A practice had obtained in the secretaries office ever since the restoration, grounded on some clauses in the acts for regulating the press, of issuing general warrants to take up (without naming any person in particular) the authors, printers and publishers of such obscene or seditious libels, as were particularly specified in the warrant. When those acts expired in 1694, the same practice was inadvertently continued, in every reign and under every administration, except the four last years of queen Anne, down to the year 1763: when such a warrant being issued to apprehend the authors, printers and publishers of a certain seditious libel, it's validity was disputed; and the warrant was adjudged by the whole court of king's bench to be void, in the case of Money v. Leach. Trin. 5 Geo. III. B. R. After which the issuing of such general warrants was declared illegal by a vote of the house of commons. (Com. Journ. 22 Apr. 1766.).

(C) The distinction taken in this case (vid. post. 92 b.) between those cases in which the King, and those in which a common person is party, is fully recognized in Burdett v. Abbott, 14 East, 157. and per Lord Ellenborough, C.J. "It stands perfectly clear that an execution at the suit of an individual cannot be carried into effect by breaking open the outer door," and per Bailey, J.: "In every breach of the peace the public are considered as interested, and the execution of process against the offender is the assertion of a public right, and in all such cases I apprehend that the officer has a right to break open the outer door, provided there is a request of admission first made, and a denial of the parties who are within," ibid. In that case it was held that process of contempt warranted the breaking of the outer door for the purpose of executing it, request being first made to open the door: (vid. the cases there cited). In the execution of criminal process against any man in the case of a misdemeanour, it is necessary to demand admittance before the breaking of the outer door of the house can be legally justified. Launock v. Brown, 2 Barn. and Ald. 592. The Court did not give their opinion in that case, whether in the case of felony it would be necessary to make a previous demand of admittance before breaking open the outer door; the language of Bailey, J., is general: "Even in the execution of criminal process you must demand admittance before you can justify breaking open the outer door:" and Lord Hale, 2 H. P. C. 117. lays it down expressly that in case of felony such previous demand is necessary; and Foster, J., in his Discourse on Homicide, p. 3. 20. says, that in every case where doors may be broken open in order to arrest, whether in cases criminal or civil, there must be such notification, demand, and refusal, before the parties concerned proceed to that extremity. The rule that the outer door cannot be broken open in executing civil process, in the case of arrest, applies to arrests only in the first instance; for if a man being legally arrested, escapeth from the officer, and taketh shelter though in his own house, the officer may upon fresh suit break open doors in order to retake him, having first given due notice of his business and demanded admission, and been refused. Genner v. Sparks, 1 Salk. 79. And this privilege is confined to a man's dwelling-house, or outhouse adjoining thereto, for the sheriff on a fieri facias may break open the door of a barn standing at a distance from the dwelling-house, without requesting the owner to open the door, in the same manner as he may enter a close. Penton v. Brown, 2 Keb. 698. And the officer need not demand entrance at the inner doors before they are broken open. Hutchinson v. Birch, 4 Taunt. 619. S. C. 1 Marsh. 339. So also where he enters in search of the defendant, it is at his own risk if the defendant is not there; therefore in trespass against him for breaking and entering the plaintiff's house: a plea averring that he suspected and believed that the defendant was there without avering that the defendant actually was in the house, is bad. Johnson v. Leigh, 6 Taunt. 247. S. C. 1 Marsh. 565. But when the principal resides in the house of a stranger the bail above may justify the breaking and entering the house (the outer door being open) in order to seek for him, for the purpose of rendering him, without averring that the principal was in the house at the time, for there is no difference between a house of which a man is solely possessed and a house in which he resides by the consent of another; Sheere v. Brooks, 2 H. Black. 120. In all these cases the outer door was open; in order to justify the breaking the outer door; after denial on request made to take a person or goods in the house of a stranger, it must be understood either that the person upon a pursuit taketh refuge in the house of another, Foster, 320, or the goods must be there, of fraud and covin to prevent the execution. Vid. text supra.

GRAND JURY CLAUSE

7.1TEXTS

7.1.1DRAFTS IN FIRST CONGRESS

7.1.1.1Proposal by Madison in House, June 8, 1789

7.1.1.1.a Seventhly. That in article 3d, section 2 [of the Constitution], the third clause be struck out, and in its place be inserted the clauses following, to wit:

7.1.2.3New York, July 26, 1788

That (except in the Government of the Land and Naval Forces, and of the Militia when in actual Service, and in cases of Impeachment) a Presentment or Indictment by a Grand Jury ought to be observed as a necessary preliminary to the trial of all Crimes cognizable by the Judiciary of the United States, and such Trial should be speedy, public, and by an impartial Jury of the County where the Crime was committed; and that no person can be found Guilty without the unanimous consent of such Jury. But in cases of Crimes not committed within any County of the United States, and in Cases of Crimes committed within any County in which a general Insurrection may prevail, or which may be in the possession of a foreign Enemy, the enquiry and trial may be in such County as ∧ the Congress shall by Law direct; which County in the two Cases last mentioned should be as near as conveniently may be to that County in which the Crime may have been committed. And that in all Criminal Prosecutions, the Accused ought to be informed of the cause and nature of his Accusation, to be confronted with his accusers and the Witnesses against him, to have the means of producing his Witnesses, and the assistance of Council for his defence, and should not be compelled to give Evidence against himself.

That the trial by Jury in the extent that it obtains by the Common Law of England is one of the greatest securities to the rights of a free People, and ought to remain inviolate.

7.2.1THE FIRST CONGRESS

7.2.1.1June 8, 17896

7.2.1.2August 18, 1789

7.2.1.2.a The house now resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the subject of amendments, and took into consideration the 2d clause of the 7th proposition, in the words following, “The trial of all crimes (except in cases of impeachment, and in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia when in actual service in time of war, or public danger) shall be by an impartial jury of freeholders of the vicinage, with the requisite of unanimity for conviction, the right of challenge, and other accustomed requisites; and no person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment, or indictment, by a grand jury;

but if a crime be committed in a place in the possession of an enemy, or in which an insurrection may prevail, the indictment and trial may by law be authorised in some other place within the same state; and if it be committed in a place not within a state, the indictment and trial may be at such place or places as the law may have directed."

Mr. Burke

Moved to change the word "vicinage" into "district or county in which the offence has been committed," he said this was conformable to the practice of the state of South Carolina, and he believed to most of the states in the union, it would have a tendency also to quiet the alarm entertained by the good citizens of many of the states for their personal security, they would no longer fear being dragged from one extremity of the state to the other for trial, at the distance of 3 or 400 miles.

Mr. Lee

Thought the word "vicinage" was more applicable than that of "district, or county," it being a term well understand by every gentleman of legal knowledge.

The question of mr. Burke's motion being put was negatived.

Mr. Burke then revived his motion for preventing prosecutions upon information, but on the question this was also lost.

The clause was now adopted without amendment.

Congressional Register, August 18, 1789, vol. 2, p. 233.

7.2.1.2.b The house then resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the subject of amendments.

Mr. Boudinot in the chair.

The committee took up the fifteenth amendment which is as follows:

"The trial of all crimes (except in cases of impeachment, and in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger) shall be by an impartial jury of freeholders of the vicinage, with the requisite of unanimity for conviction, the right of challenge, and other accustomed requisites; and no person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment by a grand jury; but if a crime be committed in a place in the possession of an enemy, or in which an insurrection may prevail, the indictment and trial may by law be authorized in some other place within the same state; and if it be committed in a place not within a state, the indictment and trial may be at such place or places as the law may have directed."

Some inconsiderable amendments to this amendment were moved and lost, and the main question was carried.

Daily Advertiser, August 19, 1789, p. 2, col. 2.

7.2.1.2.c Committee of the whole on the subject of amendments.

Mr. Boudinot in the chair.

The committee took up the fifteenth amendment, which is

"The trial of all crimes (except in cases of impeachment, and in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger) shall be by an impartial jury of freeholders of the vicinage, with the requisite of unanimity for conviction, the right of challenge, and other accustomed requisites; and no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment by a grand jury; but if a crime be committed in a place in the possession of an enemy, or in which an insurrection may prevail, the indictment and trial may by law be authorized in some other place within the same state; and if it be committed in a place not within a state, the indictment and trial may be at such place or places as the law may have directed."

Mr. Burke moved to strike out "vicinage," and to insert county or district in which the offence has been committed." The gentleman enforced the motion by a variety of observations; and among others said that it was agreeable to the practice of the state he represented, and would give the constitution a more easy operation; that it was a matter of serious alarm to the good citizens of many of the States, the idea that they might be dragged from one part of the State perhaps 2 or 300 miles to the other for trial.

Mr. Gerry objected to the word "district" as too indefinite.

Mr. Sedgwick said, that he conceived that the proposed amendment is not so adequate to the gentleman's object as the word "vicinage"—the latter part of the clause is sufficient for the gentleman's purpose.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. Burketh n [sic; then] proposed to add a clause to prevent prosecutions upon informations: This was objected to, as the object of the clause was to provide that high crimes, &c. should be by presentment of a grand jury; but that other things should take the course heretofore practised. This motion was lost.

And then the paragraph was adopted.

Gazette of the U.S., August 22, 1789, p. 250, col. 1 (reported as August 19).

7.2.1.3August 21, 1789

7.2.1.3.a The house proceeded in the consideration of the amendments to the constitution reported by the committee of the whole, and took up the 2nd clause of the 4th proposition.

Mr. Gerry

Then proposed to amend it by striking out these words, “public danger” and to insert foreign invasion; this being negatived, it was then moved to strike out the last clause, “and if it be committed, &c.” to the end. This motion was carried, and the amendment was adopted.

Congressional Register, August 21, 1789, vol. 2, p. 243.

7.2.1.3.b The order of the day, on amendments to the constitution. 15th amendment under consideration.

Mr. Gerry moved to strike out these words, “public danger,” to insert foreign invasion. This was negatived. It was then moved to strike out the last clause, “and if it be committed, &c.” to the end. This motion obtained, and the amendment as it then stood was adopted.

New-York Daily Gazette, August 24, 1789, p. 818, col. 3.

7.2.2.1Massachusetts

7.2.2.1.a January 30, 1788

… Mr. HOLMES. Mr. President, I rise to make some remarks on the paragraph under consideration, which treats of the judiciary power.

It is a maxim universally admitted, that the safety of the subject consists in having a right to a trial as free and impartial as the lot of humanity will admit of. Does the Constitution make provision for such a trial? I think not; for in a criminal process, a person shall not have a right to insist on a trial in the vicinity where the fact was committed, where a jury of the peers would, from their local situation, have an opportunity to form a judgment of the character of the person charged with the crime, and also to judge of the credibility of the witnesses. There a person must be tried by a jury of strangers; a jury who may be interested in his conviction; and where he may, by reason of the distance of his residence from the place of trial, be incapable of making such a defence as he is, in justice, entitled to, and which he could avail himself of, if his trial was in the same county where the crime is said to have been committed.

These circumstances, as horrid as they are, are rendered still more dark and gloomy, as there is no provision made in the Constitution to prevent the attorney-general from filing information against any person, whether he is indicted by the grand jury or not; in consequence of which the most innocent person in the commonwealth may be taken by virtue of a warrant issued in consequence of such information, and dragged from his home, his friends, his acquaintance, and confined in prison, until the next session of the court, which has jurisdiction of the crime with which he is charged, (and how frequent those sessions are to be we are not yet informed of,) and after long, tedious, and painful imprisonment, though acquitted on trial, may have no possibility to obtain any kind of satisfaction for the loss of his liberty, the loss of his time, great expenses, and perhaps cruel sufferings.

But what makes the matter still more alarming is, that the mode of criminal process is to be pointed out by Congress, and they have no constitutional check on them, except that the trial is to be by a jury: but who this jury is to be, how qualified, where to live, how appointed, or by what rules to regulate their procedure, we are ignorant as of yet: whether they are to live in the county where the trial is; whether they are to be chosen by certain districts, or whether they are to be appointed by the sheriff ex officio; whether they are to be for one session of the court only, or for a certain term of time, or for good behavior, or during pleasure, are matters which we are entirely ignorant of as yet.

The mode of trial is altogether indetermined; whether the criminal is to be allowed the benefit of counsel; whether he is to be allowed to meet his accuser face to face; whether he is to be allowed to confront the witnesses, and have the advantage of cross-examination, we are not yet told.

These are matters of by no means small consequence; yet we have not the smallest constitutional security that we shall be allowed the exercise of these privileges, neither is it made certain, in the Constitution, that a person charged with the crime shall have the privilege of appearing before the court or jury which is to try him.

On the whole, when we fully consider this matter, and fully investigate the powers granted, explicitly given, and specially delegated, we shall find Congress possessed of powers enabling them to institute judicatories little less inauspicious than a certain tribunal in Spain, which has long been the disgrace of Christendom: I mean that diabolical institution, the Inquisition.

What gives an additional glare of horror to these gloomy circumstances is the consideration, that Congress have to ascertain, point out, and determine, what kind of punishments shall be inflicted on persons convicted of crimes. They are nowhere restrained from inventing the most cruel and unheard-of punishments, and annexing them to crimes; and there is no constitutional check on them, but that racks and gibbets may be amongst the most mild instruments of their discipline.

There is nothing to prevent Congress from passing laws which shall compel a man, who is accused or suspected of a crime, to furnish evidence against himself, and even from establishing laws which shall order the court to take the charge exhibited against a man for truth, unless he can furnish evidence of his innocence.

I do not pretend to say Congress will do this; but, sir, I undertake to say that Congress (according to the powers proposed to be given them by the Constitution) may do it; and if they do not, it will be owing entirely—I repeat it, it will be owing entirely—to the goodness of the men and not in the least degree owing to the goodness of the Constitution.

The framers of our state constitution took particular care to prevent the General Court from authorizing the judicial authority to issue a warrant against a man for a crime, unless his being guilty of the crime was supported by oath or affirmation, prior to the warrant being granted; why it should be esteemed so much more safe to intrust Congress with the power of enacting laws, which it was deemed so unsafe to intrust our state legislature with, I am unable to conceive.

Mr. GORE observed, in reply to Mr. Holmes, that it had been the uniform conduct of those in opposition to the proposed form of government, to determine, in every case where it was possible that the administrators thereof could do wrong, that they would do so, although it were demonstrable that such wrong would be against their own honor and interest, and productive of no advantage to themselves. On this principle alone have they determined that the trial by jury would be taken away in civil cases; when it had been clearly shown, that no words could be adopted, apt to the situation and customs of each state in this particular. Jurors are differently chosen in different states, and in point of qualification the laws of the several states are very diverse; not less so in the causes and disputes which are entitled to trial by jury. What is the result of this? That the laws of Congress may and will be conformable to the local laws in this particular, although the Constitution could not make a universal rule equally applying to the customs and statutes of the different states. Very few governments (certainly not this) can be interested in depriving the people of trial by jury, in questions of meum et tuum. In criminal cases alone are they interested to have the trial under their own control; and, in such cases, the Constitution expressly stipulates for trial by jury; but then, says the gentleman from Rochester, (Mr. Holmes,) to the safety of life it is indispensably necessary the trial of crimes should be in the vicinity; and the vicinity is construed to mean county; this is very incorrect, and gentlemen will see the impropriety, by referring themselves to the different local divisions and districts of the several states. But further, said the gentleman, the idea that the jury coming from the neighborhood, and knowing the character and circumstances of the party in trial, is promotive of justice, on reflection will appear not founded in truth. If the jury judge from any other circumstances but what are part of the cause in question, they are not impartial. The great object is to determine on the real merits of the cause, uninfluenced by any personal considerations; if, therefore, the jury could be perfectly ignorant of the person in trial, a just decision would be more probable. From such motives did the wise Athenians so constitute the famed Areopagus, that, when in judgment, this court should sit at midnight, and in total darkness, that the decision might be on the thing, and not on the person. Further, said the gentleman, it has been said, because the Constitution does not expressly provide for an indictment by grand jury in criminal cases, therefore some officer under this government will be authorized to file informations, and bring any man to jeopardy of his life, and indictment by grand jury will be disused. If gentlemen who pretend such fears will look into the constitution of Massachusetts, they will see that no provision is therein made for an indictment by grand jury, or to oppose the danger of an attorney-general filing informations; yet no difficulty or danger has arisen to the people of this commonwealth from this defect, if gentlemen please to call it so. If gentlemen would be candid, and not consider that, wherever Congress may possibly abuse power, they certainly will, there would be no difficulty in the minds of any in adopting the proposed Constitution.

Elliot, vol. 2, pp. 109–13.

7.2.2.1.bFebruary 1, 1788

Hon. Mr. ADAMS. As your Excellency was pleased yesterday to offer, for the consideration of this Convention, certain propositions intended to accompany the ratification of the Constitution before us, I did myself the honor to bring them forward by a regular motion, not only from the respect due to your excellency, but from a clear conviction, in my own mind, that they would tend to effect the salutary and important purposes which you had in view—"the removing the fears and quieting the apprehensions of many of the good people of this commonwealth, and the more effectually guarding against an undue administration of the federal government."

Your excellency's next proposition is, to introduce the indictment of a grand jury, before any person shall be tried for any crime, by which he may incur infamous punishment, or loss of life; and it is followed by another, which recommends a trial by jury in civil actions between citizens of different states, if either of the parties shall request it. These, and several others which I have mentioned, are so evidently beneficial as to need no comment of mine. And they are all, in every particular, of so general a nature, and so equally interesting to every state, that I cannot but persuade myself to think they would all readily join with us in the measure proposed by your excellency, if we should now adopt it.

Elliot, vol. 2, pp. 130, 132–33.

7.2.4NEWSPAPERS AND PAMPHLETS

7.2.4.1Federal Farmer, No. 16, January 20, 1788

Security against expost [sic] facto laws, the trial by jury, and the benefits of the writ of habeas corpus, are but a part of those inestimable rights the people of the United States are entitled to, even in judicial proceedings, by the course of the common law. These may be secured in general words, as in New-York, the Western Territory, &c. by declaring the people of the United States shall always be entitled to judicial proceedings according to the course of the common law, as used and established in the said states. Perhaps it would be better to enumerate the particular essential rights the people are entitled to in these proceedings, as has been done in many of the states, and as has been done in England. In this case, the people may proceed to declare, that no man shall be held to answer to any offence, till the same be fully described to him; nor to furnish evidence against himself: that, except in the government of the army and navy, no person shall be tried for any offence, whereby he may incur loss of life, or an infamous punishment, until he be first indicted by a grand jury: that every person shall have a right to produce all proofs that may be favourable to him, and to meet the witnesses against him face to face: that every person shall be entitled to obtain right and justice freely and without delay; that all persons shall have a right to be secure from all unreasonable searches and seizures of their persons, houses, papers, or possessions; and that all warrants shall be deemed contrary to this right, if the foundation of them be not previously supported by oath, and there be not in them a special designation of persons or objects of search, arrest, or seizure: and that no person shall be exiled or molested in his person or effects, otherwise than by the judgment of his peers, or according to the law of the land. A celebrated writer observes upon this last article, that in itself it may be said to comprehend the whole end of political society. These rights are not necessarily reserved, they are established, or enjoyed but in few countries: they are stipulated rights, almost peculiar to British and American laws. In the execution of those laws, individuals, by long custom, by magna charta, bills of rights &c. have become entitled to them. A man, at first, by act of parliament, became entitled to the benefits of the writ of habeas corpus—men are entitled to these rights and benefits in the judicial proceedings of our state courts generally: but it will by no means follow, that they will be entitled to them in the federal courts, and have a right to assert them, unless secured and established by the constitution or federal laws. We certainly, in federal processes, might as well claim the benefits of the writ of habeas corpus, as to claim trial by a jury—the right to have council—to have witnesses face to face—to be secure against unreasonable search warrants, &c. was the constitution silent as to the whole of them:—but the establishment of the former, will evince that we could not claim them without it; and the omission of the latter, implies they are relinquished, or deemed of no importance. These are rights and benefits individuals acquire by compact;

they must claim them under compacts, or immemorial usage—it is doubtful, at least, whether they can be claimed under immemorial usage in this country; and it is, therefore, we generally claim them under compacts, as charters and constitutions.

7.2.4.2Hampden, January 26, 1788

I have had no hand in the productions respecting the proposal plan of government—but I feel interested as a citizen. I have waited to see if any motion might be made, or any disposition appear in the Convention, to prevent one of two evils taking place; the first is, that of rejecting the Constitution; the second is, that of adopting it by a bare majority.

I am not contented with it as it now stands, my reasons are assigned:—

I am not satisfied with the provision for amendments, as it stands in that system, because the amendments I propose, are such as two thirds of the Senate will perhaps never agree to—the indictment by grand jury, and trial of fact by jury, is not so much set by in the southern States, as in the northern—the great men there, are too rich and important to serve on the juries, and the smaller are considered as not having consequence enough to try the others; in short, there can be no trial by peers there:—The middle States gain advantages by having the legal business done in one of them, which may prevent their leading men, from engaging seriously in amendments:—I therefore propose the adopting the Constitution, in the following manner, in which I conceive there will be great unanimity.

That this Convention do adopt and ratify the Constitution, or frame of government for the United States of America, proposed by the Federal Convention, lately holden at Philadelphia; upon the following conditions, viz.

That the first Congress which shall be holden under the same, shall before they proceed to exercise any powers possessed under the Constitution, excepting those of organising themselves, and of establishing rules of procedure, take into consideration all amendments proposed by the Convention of this or any other State, and to make such amendments therein proposed as aforesaid, as any seven of the States shall agree to; and which amendments shall be considered as part of the Constitution.

And that the Senators and Representatives of the several States, shall set together in one body, and vote by States, in considering such amendments;—but the President or Vice-President elect, shall have no vote therein.

5th. In the second clause of the same section, strike out the words, “Both as to law and fact,” and add to that clause these words—Provided nevertheless, that all issues of fact shall be tried by a jury to be appointed according to standing laws made by Congress.

This will preserve the inestimable right of a trial by jury—This right is the democratical balance in the Judicary [sic] power; without it, in civil actions, no relief can be had against the High Officers of State, for abuse of private citizens; without this the English Constitution would be a tyranny—See Judge Blackstone's excellent Commentary on this privilege, in his third volume, page 2.

6th. In the last clause in the same section next after the word State, insert these words, In, or near the County.

This keeps up the idea of trial in the vicinity. See the Massachusetts declaration of rights on this point —Also, that of other States, &c.

7th. At the end of the same clause, add these words—Provided that no person shall be held to answer to any charge of a criminal nature, unless it be upon indictment of a Grand Jury, appointed, sworn and charged according to known and standing laws.

This is the greatest security against arbitrary power; without this, every person who opposes the violation of the constitutional right of the people, may be dragged to the bar, and tried upon a bare information of an Attorney-General.—The loss of this privilege carries with it the loss of every friend to the people.—There is no instance yet, in England, or in America, excepting in the Stuart's reign, of a person's being tried for his life, otherwise than upon indictment. It was attempted before the Revolution, but successfully opposed.

7.2.5LETTERS AND DIARIES

7.2.5.1William Pierce to St. George Tucker, September 28, 1787

"As to trial by jury in criminal cases, it is right, it is just, perhaps it is indispensable,—the life of a citizen ought not to depend on the fiat of a single person. Prejudice, resentment, and partiality, are among the weaknesses of human nature, and are apt to pervert the judgment of the greatest and best of men. The solemnity of trial by jury is suited to nature of criminal cases, because, before a man is brought to answer the indictment, the fact or truth of every accusation is inquired into by the Grand Jury, composed of his fellow citizens, and the same truth or fact afterwards (should the Grand Jury find the accusation well founded) is to be confirmed by the unanimous suffrage of twelve good men, "superior to all suspicion." I do not think there can be a greater guard to the liberties of a people than such a mode of trial on the affairs of life and death … . ["]

7.3.1TREATISES

7.3.1.1Hale, 1736

CHAP. XIX.

Concerning Presentments, Inquisitions, and Indictments, and their kinds.

That which follows to be considered is the manner of bringing the offender to his legal trial and judgment, which is either by appeal, which is the suit of the party, or by indictment, which is immediately the king's suit.

The former of these, namely appeals, I shall consider after the business of indictments, because it is but rare to have an appeal, and the most prosecutions of this nature are by indictment or presentment, and therefore I shall consider this first.

I shall distribute this matter into these general heads, namely, 1. Touching indictments and presentments. 2. Process. 3. Arraignment. 4. Pleas of the offender. 5. Trial. 6. Judgment. 7. Execution; each of which will take in several particular heads and distributions.

Presentment is a more comprehensive term than indictment, for regularly an indictment is an accusation given in against a person by the grand inquest for some misdemeanor, whereunto he is put to answer; but presentments do not only include such indictments, but also some other informations whereunto the party is not put to answer, as presentments of felo de se, of fugam fecit, of deodands, of deaths per infortunium, and many others.

In this title concerning presentments and indictments I shall consider these points. 1. The several kinds of presentments and indictments. 2. Where a man shall be put to answer in criminals without indictment. 3. Who may be indicters, and how returned. 4. Of what they may inquire. 5. What the penalty of not inquiring or presenting. 6. What formalities are required in indictments.

First, Touching the several kinds of presentments; inquisitions and indictments in matters capital.

They may be distinguished, 1. In relation to the courts or judicatories, or jurisdictions, where they are made.

And, 2. In respect of their effects or natures.

1. Touching the former branch of distribution in relation to the jurisdictions where made, and that multiplies presentments or indictments according to the jurisdictions, as some are in the leet, some in the sheriff's Turn, some before the coroner, some before justices of peace, justices of oyer and terminer, gaol-delivery, king's bench, whereof enough before hath been said, and shall not need here to be repeated.

But those, that most concern capital offenses, are such as are taken before the coroner, or such as are taken before justices by commission, whereof more shall be said in the ensuing chapters.

II. As to the second kind of distribution in respect of the nature and effect thereof.

1. Some presentments are of themselves convictions, and not traversable.
2. Others are not convictions, but only in nature of informations, and therefore traversable.

Regularly all presentments or indictments before justices of the peace, oyer and terminer, gaol-delivery, &c. are traversable, and conclude not the party or those claiming under him.

And therefore, tho it hath been held, that the presentment of a felo de se before the coroner be not traversable, (de quo supra, yet of all hands it is agreed, that a presentment of a felo de se before justices of peace or oyer and terminer is traversable by the executors, &c. Co. P. C. cap. 8. p. 55. H. 37 Eliz. B. R. Laughton's case.

If a presentment be made super visum corporis, that A. kild B. and fled, this presentment of the flight is held not traversable, but conclusive to forfeit the goods, tho he be after acquitted of the felony, and expressly found by the petty jury upon his trial, that non se retraxit [d], 13 H. 4. 13. b. Forfeiture 32. 3 E. 3. Forfeiture 35. 7 Eliz. Dy. 238. b. And the same law is, if it be found super visum corporis, that the felon fled and was kild in the flight, this presentment, tho after the party's death is conclusive as to the forfeiture for the flight. 3 E. 3. Coron. 289, 290, 312.

But if before justices assigned to hear and determine, it be presented, that J. S. committed a felony and fled, or if upon the arraignment of a person for felony he be found not guilty, and that he fled, this is but in nature of an inquest of office, and the flight is traversable in an action, or information, or scire facias brought by the king for the goods of the person; 37 Assiz. 7. 47

E. 3. 26. a. And all the reason, that can be given why the coroner's inquest of a fugam fecit is conclusive, and not the other, is only that which is given 8 E. 4. 4. a. Ceo est un ancient positif ley del coron'.

If a man be presented to have suffered an escape, because in this case the party is at least to be fined, he shall have his traverse to it, and is not concluded by it.

But if either before the justices in eyre or before the coroner an escape be presented upon a vill either before or after the arrest, this is held not to be traversable, because there is only an amercement to be set upon the vill, viz. villata in misericordia; and the reason given by Stamford is, quia de minimis non curat lex; Stamf. P. C. Lib. I. cap. 32. f. 35. b.

But if it fall out, that there be an indictment for such an escape, (as there hath been formerly against the city of London for the escape of those, that riotously kild Dr. Lamb [e], who were thereupon fined 2000 l.) such an indictment is not conclusive, but traversable.

Whether an inquisition of a felo de se before the coroner be traversable, vide que supra, Part. I. cap. 31. p. 414.

And there are no presentments besides what are before mentiond, that are in themselves convictions and not traversable, but a presentment in a leet of bloodshed or the like, and in the Swanimote court of the forest for offenses of Vert and Venison.

But even those presentments are traversable also in two cases, viz. 1. If the offense presented be out of their jurisdiction. 2. Or if the presentment be such as concerns the freehold, as presentments of nusances, or such matter as charge the freehold; 41 E. 3. 26. b. 45 E. 3. 8. b.

And therefore it was resolved in the Exchequer in a quo warranto against the water-bailiff and conservator of the river Severn, 22 Car. 2. that upon a bare presentment the conservators cannot set a fine upon a supposed unlawful fishing or the like, unless the party comes in and confesses it, or plead to it, and be convicted by a jury of the offense.

A presentment of a riot or forcible detainer by a justice or two justices of peace, as the case shall require, is a conviction by the statute of 15 R. 2. cap. 2. 8 H. 6. cap. 9. 13 H. 4. cap. 7.

But a presentment by a justice of a default in repairs of an highway, tho by the statute of 5 Eliz. cap. 13. it is such a presentment, as the parties shall be put to answer, yet it is not conclusive, but the traverse of the party is saved by the statute; and it is but reason, for tho the view of the justice can ascertain the decay or want of repairs, yet it cannot ascertain in what parish it lies, or who is bound by tenure or prescription to repair.

CHAP. XX.

Where a man shall be put to answer in criminal and capital offenses without indictment at the king's suit.

AT the common law there were several means of putting the party to answer a felony without any indictment, some whereof are still in force, others are taken away by statute.

I. If a thief or robber were taken with the mainouvre, cum manu opere, and the mainouvre brought into court with the prisoner, he should have been arraignd upon the mainouvre at the king's suit; 2 E. 3. Coron. 156. And therefore M. 18 & 19 E. 1. coram rege, rot. 28. Norf. Et quia praedictus Johannes de Brampton [falsarius sigilli regis & brevium suorum, ut dicitur,] non est appellatus, nec indictatus, nec captus cum manu opere, per quod secta domino regi in hujusmodi casu potest competere, ideò [consideratum est, quòd] praedictus Johannes [eat inde] sine die, &c.

And T. 10 E. 2. rot. 132. Bucks, Robert Legat was arraignd for counterfeiting the king's seal, upon the counterfeit commission brought into court without indictment, and he pleaded not guilty; and was acquit[*].

But upon a bare information or bill, without indictment or the mainouvre at common law no party was to be put to answer for a felony; and therefore, M. 20 & 21 E. 1. coram rege, rot. 27. Hibernia, William Prene, the king's carpenter in Ireland, being accused for felony by a bill in the king's-bench there, and convicted and condemned, but after ransomed for 200 l. and a writ of error brought in the king's-bench in England, and assignd, that he ought not to be put to answer in case of life or member per vocem & per billam, quam Nigellus le Broun porrexit versùs ipsum, licèt non esset indictatus per 12. [f]

But it seems to me, that this proceeding upon the mainouvre is wholly taken away by the statutes of 25 E. 3. cap. 4. 28 E. 3. cap. 3. 42 E. 3. cap. 3. and therefore I do not find any proceeding upon the mainouvre since these statutes.

II. A second sort of proceeding in cases capital without indictment is, where an appeal is brought at the suit of the party, and the plaintiff is nonsuit upon that appeal, yet the offender shall be arraigned at the king's suit upon such appeal; and so it is in case the appellant die or release; and in such case, altho the party be indicted as well as appeald, yet upon the nonsuit of the plaintiff, the proceeding for the king shall not be upon the indictment, but upon the appeal. 4 E. 4. 10. a.

But this hath these two qualifications.

1. It must be where the plaintiff in the appeal hath either declared upon his appeal by writ, or formed his appeal by bill, for the bare suing of a writ without a declaration is not such an appeal, as the party being nonsuit the defendant shall be thereupon arraigned, for 1. The writ may be brought in his name by a stranger without his privity. 2. Because the writ alone contains not such certainty of time, place, and other matters, whereby the party may be put to answer. 7 H. 7. 6. b.

2. It must be where an appeal is well begun, and by a party enabled to prosecute it, therefore, if the appeal abate, because the plaintiff is outlawd, or a woman (who cannot bring an appeal, but only of the death of her husband,) or if the year and day be past, or by the misnosmer of the defendant, &c. there the appellee shall not be arraigned at the king's suit, because the appeal was never good, but shall be dismissed, only the judges may arraign him upon an indictment, if any be before them for that offense, or if none be, yet they may bind him over to another sessions, and in the mean time to be of good behaviour; 19 E. 2. Coron. 317. All the learning touching this business is fully declared by Stamf. Lib. III. cap. 59. f. 147. & sequentibus.

III. A third sort is upon an appeal by an approver, but the whole learning touching that will come in its proper place hereafter. [g]

IV. The fourth sort is by appeals by particular persons, especially of treason in parliament; and this was very frequent in antient times, especially in the time of R. 2. namely anno septimo, undecimo, & duodecimo, which bred great inconveniencies.

And therefore by the statute of 1 H. 4. cap. 14. all these kinds of appeals in parliament are wholly taken away; and since that time I find not any such appeals brought in parliament.

And therefore, when the now earl of Bristol in this present parliament in the lords house preferd articles of high treason and other misdemeanors against the earl of Clarendon, then lord chancellor, upon a reference unto all the judges and upon great consideration the judges unâ voce returned their opinions, that these articles were contrary to the statute of 1 H. 4. and could not be preferd in the lords house by the said earl or any other private person.[h]

But impeachments by the house of commons of high treason, or other misdemeanors in the lords house have been frequently in practice, notwithstanding the statute of 1 H. 4. and are neither within the words nor intent of that statute, for it is a presentment by the most solemn grand inquest of the whole kingdom.

V. If in a civil action de uxore raptâ cum bonis viri upon not guilty pleaded the defendant be convicted, this antiently served in nature of an indictment of felony. 13 Assiz. 6. 18 E. 3. 32. a. Stamf. P. C. f. 94. b. So if upon a special verdict in trespass brought in the king's-bench it be found, that the defendant took them feloniously, antiently this served for an indictment. 31 E. 1. Enditement 31.

So if in an action of slander for calling a man thief, the defendant justifies, that he stole goods, and issue thereupon taken, it be found for the defendant, if this be in the king's bench, and for a felony in the same county, where the court sits, or if it be before justices of assize, who have also a commission of gaol-delivery, he shall be forthwith arraigned upon this verdict, as on an indictment, and the reason is, because here is a verdict of twelve men in these cases, and so the verdict, tho in a civil action, serves the king's suit as an indictment, and is not contrary to the acts of 25, 28, & 42 E. 3. which enact, that no man shall be put to answer, &c. but upon indictment or presentment.

But if the sheriff return a rescue of a prisoner taken for felony, 1 H. 7. 6. a. or a breach of prison by one arrested for felony, 2 E. 3. 1. b. this is not sufficient to arraign the party, nor doth it countervail an indictment, for it is not by the oath of twelve men; vide hoc totum Stamf. P. C. Lib. II. cap. 29. f. 95. a.

By the statute of 11 H. 7. cap. 3. there was power given to proceed upon all penal statutes by information before justices of assize and peace, but there is an exception of all cases of treason, murder and felony.

Ill use was made of this statute by Empson and Dudley, and great inconvenience and trouble to the people did arise by it, and therefore 1 H. 8. cap. 6. it was repeald.

And tho informations are practised oftentimes in the crown-office in cases criminal, and by many penal statutes the prosecution upon them is by the acts themselves limited to be by bill, plaint, information or indictment, yet thus much is observable.

1. That the method of prosecution of capital offenses is still to be by indictment, except the cases above mentiond.

2. That in all criminal causes the most regular and safe way, and most consonant to the statutes of Magna Carta, cap. 29. 5 E. 3. cap. 9. 25 E. 3. cap. 4. 28 E 3. cap. 3. & 42 E. 3. cap. 3. is by presentment or indictment of twelve sworn men.

CHAP. XXI.

Who may be indictors, and where and how returned.

INquisitions, presentments, or indictments are taken before courts or officers of several kinds, and accordingly by acts of parliament several things are prescribed touching them.

I. Touching inquests before coroners: By the statute of 4 E. 1. De officio coronatoris, the coroner is to issue his precept to four, five or six vills to appear before him at a certain day to make inquiry, this precept is directed to the constables of the vills, who accordingly give summons to a competent number of inquirers, twelve at least [i], and by them the inquisition is made, when they have been sworn and have heard their evidence upon oath taken before the coroner.

II. Touching inquests of felonies in leets and Turns: By the statute of Westminster 2. cap. 13. indictments in the sheriffs Turns are to be by twelve at least, and they are to set their seals to the inquisitions, otherwise they are void [k].

And by the statute of 1 E. 3. cap. 17. which extends as well to leets as Turns, they are to be by indenture, one part to remain with the indictors, the other with the sheriff or steward.

And by the statute of 1 R. 3. cap. 4. no person shall be returned upon a pannel in the sheriff's Turns, unless he hath 20 s. per ann. of freehold, or 26 s. 8 d. of copyhold, and all indictments in the Turn taken otherwise shall be void.

But now by the statute of 1 E. 4. cap. 2. the sheriff cannot proceed upon any indictments for felony, or otherwise taken in his Turn, but must send them to the sessions of the peace, and the justices there are to make process and proceed thereupon.

But then there must be care taken, 1. That the indictments be of such matters only, as are within the jurisdiction of the sheriff's Turn, otherwise the justices may not proceed upon them, 4 E. 4. 31. a. 8 E. 4. 5. b. [*] and 2. That they be by indenture and under the seals of the presenters according to the former statutes.

III. Indictments taken in the county of Lancaster before the sheriff or justices against any person inhabiting out of the same county, or taken in any other county against inhabitents of the county of Lancaster ought to be by twelve men, and each indictor to have lands or tenements of the yearly value of 5 l. by the statute of 33 H. 6. cap. 2.[†]

IV. Touching murders, &c. committed in the king's palace the statute of 33 H. 8. cap. 12. hath appointed that twenty-four of the king's yeomen officers of the cheque-roll of the king's house shall be returned to make inquiry, and the trial to be by a jury of the gentlemen officers.

V. Concerning inquiries to be made before justices itinerant, the course was this: There first went out the writ of the common summons of the eyre, directed to the sheriff to summon de quálibet villâ quatuor homines & praepositum, & de quolibet burgo duodecim legales burgenses to be at the day and place for the eyre, and upon that day the sheriff and lords of liberties were to return the names of the bailiffs of their hundreds and liberties, and those bailiffs were sworn to elect two men in their several hundreds, and present their names to the court, and these two hundreders for each hundred were to choose of themselves and the rest of their several hundreders respectively, ordinarily sixteen, or sometimes only twelve, who were severally sworn upon inquiries and presentments of things done within their hundred, as so many grand inquests for every several hundred, and the twelve returned for each borough were the grand inquest for the borough; this caused a vast and chargeable attendance upon the courts in eyre, and hath been long disused, and therefore I shall not say more of it.

VI. Concerning the choosing and returning of the grand jury before justices assigned to keep the peace, oyer and terminer, and gaol-delivery, I shall be somewhat more large, because before these justices ordinarily criminal and capital causes are heard and determined.

Upon the summons of any session of the peace there goes out a precept either in the name of the king or of two or more justices of peace directed to the sheriff, …

Upon this precept the sheriff is to return twenty-four or more out of the whole county, namely a considerable number out of every hundred, out of which the grand inquest at the sessions of the peace, oyer and terminer, or gaol-delivery are taken and sworn ad inquirendum pro domino rege & corpore comitatûs, (not, as antiently in eyre, a kind of grand inquest out of every hundred;) but in some counties which consist of gildable and such franchise, where anciently several justices of gaol-delivery sat, as in Suffolk

[*] there are two grand juries, one for the gildable, another for the franchise, because there are two several commissions of gaol-delivery.

Now touching the grand jury thus returned before justices assigned there are some things considerable.

They must be probi & legales homines, and therefore, if any one of the indictors be outlawd, tho in a personal action, it is a sufficient plea to avoid the indictment; 11 H. 4. 41. b. M. 4 Car. B. R. Croke p. 134. Sir William Withipole's case, and the statute of 11 H. 4. cap. 9. hereafter mentioned fortifies this, de quo infra.

And therefore, if any of them be attainted in a conspiracy, or decies tantum, or of perjury, or outlawd in any personal action, or attaint of felony or in a praemunire, they are not to be indictors, because in law, they are not probi & legales. Lamb. Justic. 391.

Touching their annuus census I do not find any thing determined, but freeholders they ought to be. The statute of 2 H. 5. cap. 3. that requires jurors, that pass upon the trial of a man's life, to have 40 s. per ann. freehold, hath been the measure by which the freehold of grand jurymen hath been measured in precepts of summons of sessions [†].

By the statute of 11 H. 4. cap. ultimo, reciting, that inquests had been formerly returned of persons outlawd, fled to sanctuary for treason or felony, &c. enacts, "That no indictments be made by such persons but by inquest of loyal subjects returned by the sheriffs or bailiffs duly without denomination of any person, but only by the sworn bailiffs and ministers of the sheriff; and if any indictment be otherwise taken, it be void."

Upon this statute it hath been resolved in Sir William Withipole's case above cited. 1. That it extends to coroners inquests. 2. It is a good plea upon this statute, that one of the indictors is outlawd in a personal action, as well as of felony, or that any of the jurors were impanneld at the denomination of any contrary to this statute.

By the statute of 3 H. 8. cap. 12. it is enacted, "That the justices of gaol-delivery, and justices of peace, whereof one of the quorum, in open sessions may reform the pannels returned by the sheriff, (which be not at the suit of the parties,) by putting to and taking out the names of persons returned, and shall command the sheriff to return the same accordingly, upon pain of 20 l. and the king's pardon to be no bar to the prosecutor."

This act extends not only to pannels of grand inquests returned, but also to pannels of the petty jury, commonly called the jury of life and death, which may be reformed by the justices according to this act, and the sheriff is bound to return the pannel so reformed.

The grand inquest returned the first day of the sessions and sworn commonly serves the whole sessions of the peace, oyer and terminer, or gaol-delivery; yet the court may command another grand inquest to be returned and sworn, which is done ordinarily upon two occasions.

1. If before the end of the sessions the grand jury having brought in all their bills are discharged by the court, and after that discharge either some new felony or other misdemeanor is committed, and the party taken and brought into gaol; or if after the discharge of the grand inquest some offender be taken and brought in during the sessions. In the former case, there is a necessity to make a special record of the adjournment of the sessions from day to day, because otherwise the whole sessions are in supposition of law only the first day, and therefore without the entry of such adjournment the offense and proceedings will be in supposition of law after the sessions ended, and so the proceeding will be erronious [*]: This was the case of Sampson [b], who being arraigned and tried for a murder committed after the first day of the sessions and before the sessions ended, for want of entry of an adjournment it was ruled erronious. And the same is to be observed, if upon record it appears, that the grand inquest was returned after the first day of the sessions, unless an adjournment be enterd of record.
2. The second ordinary instance of a new grand jury returned is upon the statute of 3 H. 7. cap. 1. namely, a grand inquest impanneld to inquire of the concealment of another grand inquest, upon which defaults presented the former grand inquest is to be amerced; and this tho it mention only an inquest thus to be taken by justices of peace, yet it extends to the king's bench, and hath been practised there accordingly in my knowledge, and possibly at the sessions of oyer and terminer and gaol-delivery, tho that can rarely come in question, because the sessions of the peace ordinarily accompanies those commissions.

And this is the proper and legal way of punishing the grand inquest, if they refuse to present such things as are within their charge, and for which they have probable evidence to make a presentment, but of this more in the next chapter.

CHAP. XXII.

Concerning the demeanor of the grand inquest in relation to their presentments.

THE coroners inquest may must hear evidence of all hands, if it be offerd to them, and that upon oath, because it is not so much an accusation or an indictment, as an inquisition or inquest of office, quomodo J. S. ad mortem suam devenit, tho it be also true, that the offender may be arraigned upon that presentment.

But the grand inquest before justices of peace, gaol-delivery, or oyer and terminer ought only to hear the evidence for the king, and in case there be probable evidence [a], they ought to find the bill, because it is but an accusation, and the party is to be put upon his trial afterwards.

But if a bill of indictment for murder, or other capital offense be presented against A. if upon the hearing the king's evidence, or upon their own knowledge of the incredibility of the witnesses they are dissatisfied, they may return the bill ignoramus.

If A. be kild by B. so that it doth constare de personâ occisi & occidentis, and a bill of murder be presented to them, regularly they ought to find the bill for murder, and not for manslaughter, or se defendendo, because otherwise offenses may be smotherd without due trial; and when the party comes upon his trial, the whole fact will be examined before the court and the petty jury, and in many cases it is a great disadvantage to the party accused [*]. For if a man kill B. in his own defense, or per infortunium, or possibly in executing the process of law upon an assault made upon him, or in his own defense upon the highway, or in defense of his house against those that come to rob him, (in which three last cases it is neither felony nor forfeiture, but upon not guilty pleaded he ought to be acquitted,) yet if the grand inquest find an ignoramus upon the bill, or find the special matter, whereby the prisoner is dismissed and discharged, he may nevertheless be indicted for murder seven years after.

But if the grand jury had found the bill for murder, (yea or for manslaughter,) and the party pleading not guilty the special matter is given in evidence, and the petty jury find the special matter, (or in the three last cases find him not guilty, as they may,) this acquittal upon this finding will be a good plea of autrefoits acquit, and he shall never be arraigned for it again.

If a bill be against A. for muder, and the grand inquest upon the evidence before them or their own knowledge be satisfied that it was but per infortunium, or se defendendo, and accordingly return the bill specially, the court may remand them to consider better of it, or may hear the evidence at the bar, and accordingly direct the grand inquest; but I have known a judge blamed for setting a fine upon the grand inquest for such a return, because in truth it comes not up to felony.

But if a bill go out against B. for murder, and it doth constare de personâ occidentis, may the grand inquest find the bill for manslaughter, and ignoramus for the murder? and is the court bound to receive such a return?

In this case of all hands it is agreed [b], that the grand jury is to blame, because they take upon them to anticipate the evidence, that is to be given to the petit jury, and so determine matter of law, which belongs to the court to determine, and by this means many murders may escape under the disguise of manslaughter, and so escape with their clergy.

Some therefore have made it a practice to set a fine upon the grand jury in this case, and it hath proceeded so far, as to fine petit juries also in such like cases; whereof hereafter.

That which I think herein, and in other concealments of grand inquests is, as follows, viz.

1. That the court may receive such a return from the grand inquest, and it is a matter of discretion, especially, if upon inquiry from the indictors or witnesses, or upon view of their examinations it do plainly appear, that the crime amounts to no more.
2. That barely upon such a return no fine can be set upon the grand inquest, unless the evidence to the grand inquest be given at the bar in the presence of the court; for otherwise the court cannot understand, whether the grand inquest doth well or ill in such case.
3. That if the evidence to the grand inquest be given at the bar upon an indictment in the king's bench, and the grand inquest will not find a bill according to the direction of that court, as for instance, will find a man guilty, only se defendendo, or of manslaughter, when it is murder, that court may set a fine upon the grand inquest, and so it hath been practised; for it is the highest court in England of ordinary justice, especially in criminal causes.
4. That if, the justices of oyer and terminer, or gaol-delivery having heard the evidence at the bar, the grand inquest will not find according to their directions, the justices may bind them over by recognizance into the king's bench, and upon an information against them they may be fined.
5. That in such a case justices of peace, oyer and terminor, or gaol-delivery may according to the statute of 3 H. 7. cap. 1. impanel another inquest to inquire of their concealments, and thereupon set fines upon them.
6. But in my opinion fines set upon grand inquests by justices of the peace, oyer and terminer, or gaol-delivery for concealments or non-presentments in any other manner are nor warrantable by law; and tho the late practice hath been for such justices to set fines arbitrarily, yea not only upon grand inquests, but also upon the petit jury in criminal causes, if they find not according to their directions, it weighs not much with me for these reasons; 1. because I have seen arbitrary practice still go from one thing to another, the fines set upon grand inquests began, then they set fines upon for petit juries for not finding according to the directions of the court; then afterwards the judges of nisi prius proceeded to fine jurors in civil causes, if they gave not a verdict according to direction even in points of fact; this was done by a judge of assise [c] in Oxfordshire, and the fine estreated, but I by the advice of most of the judges of England staid process upon that fine; the like was done by the same judge in a case of burglary, the fine was estreated into the Exchequer; but by like advice I stayed process, and in the case of Wagstaff [d] and other jurors fined at the Old-Bailey for giving a verdict contrary to direction, by the advice of all the judges of England (only one dissenting) it was ruled to be against law; but of this hereafter [e]. 2. My second reason is, because the statute of 3 H. 7. cap. 1. prescribes a way for their fining, which would not have been, if they had been arbitrarily subject to a fine before. 3. It is of very ill consequence, for the privilege of an Englishman is, that his life shall not be drawn in danger without due presentment or indictment, and this would be but a slender screen or safeguard, if every justice of peace or commissioner of oyer and terminer, or gaol-delivery may make the grand jury present what he pleases, or otherwise fine them; and there is no parity of reason or example between inferior judges and the court of king's bench, which is the supreme ordinary court of justice in such cases; and thus far concerning fining of grand inquests. [f]

They are sworn to keep the king's counsel undiscovered, the revealing or disclosing whereof was heretofore taken for felony, 27 Ass. 63. but that law is antiquated, it is now only fineable; if there be thirteen or more of the grand inquest, a presentment by less than twelve ought not to be; but if there be twelve assenting, tho some of the rest of their number dissent, it is a good presentment; for if twelve agree, it is not necessary for the rest to agree. Lamb. Justice 400.

But in case of a trial by the petit jury, it can be by no more nor less than twelve, and all assenting to the verdict, [g] accordingly it was adjudged M. 42 E. 3. Rot. 16. Suff. Rex [h], the judgment was reversed, because but eleven indictors.

But if a presentment be deliverd into a court of sessions and received, no amerciament lies, that it was not assented to by twelve, but otherwise it is in case of a presentment by a leet, for the party distrained, &c. may aver, that it was not presented by twelve. 45 E. 3. 26. b. B. Leet 7.

The indictors are presumed in law to be indifferent, unless the contrary appear; 1. Because returned by the sheriff. 2. Because sworn by the court to present, and therefore shall never be charged by writ of conspiracy for any conspiracy before their being sworn, tho the party be acquit. 7 H. 4. 31. b. 19 H. 6. 19. a. But 21 E. 3. 17. by R. Th. it is a good replication to say, he procured himself to be returned of the grand inquest.

If a bill of indictment be for murder, and the grand jury return it billa vera quoad manslaughter, & ignoramus quoad murder, the usual course is in the presence of the grand jury to strike out malitiosè & ex malitiâ suâ praecogitatâ and murderavit, and leave in so much as makes the bill to be but bare manslaughter, and so to receive it.

But the safest way is to deliver them a new bill for manslaughter, and they to indorse it generally billa vera, for the words of the indorsement make not the indictment, but only evidence the assent or dissent of the grand inquest, it is the bill itself is the indictment, when affirmed. And so in like cases, where the bill contains two offenses, as burglary and theft, forcible entry and detainer. H. 4 Jac. B. R. Yelverton 99. Ford's case.

The grand jury are sworn ad inquirendum pro corpore comitatûs, and therefore regularly they cannot inquire of a fact done out of that county for which they are sworn, unless specially enabled by act of parliament, but only in some special cases. Mich. 9 Car. B. R. Bell's case.

If a man had been stricken in the county of A. and had died in the county of B. the offender had not been indictable of murder, &c. in the county of A. because the death was in the county of B. neither had he been indictable in the county of B. because the stroke was given in the county of A. but by the statute of 2 & 3 E. 6. cap. 24. he may be indicted in the county, where the party died, tho the stroke were in another county, and also the offender shall be tried there, but an appeal may be brought in either county. 7 Co. Rep. 2. a. Bulwer's case.

So if A. had committed a felony in the county of D. and B. had been accessary before or after in the county of C. B. could not have been indicted as accessary in either county at common law, but by that statute he is indictable, and shall be tried in the county where he so became accessary.

Stamf. P. C. Lib. I. cap. 46.

So if a stroke were given super altum mare, and the party came into the body of the county, and there died, this is casus omissus, and the party is neither indictable by the jury of the county where he died, nor before the admiral by the statute of 28 H. 8. cap. 15. Co. P. C. cap. 7. p. 48.

If A. rob B. in the county of C. and carry the goods into the county of D. A. cannot be indicted of robbery in the county of D. because the robbery was in another county, but he may be indicted of larciny or theft in the county of D. because it is theft wherever he carries the goods; the like law in an appeal, 4 H. 7. 5 b. 7 Co. Rep. 2. a. Bulwer's case.

But by the force of some acts of parliament treasons and felonies committed in one county may be indicted and tried in another county.

By the statute 33 H. 8. cap. 23. upon examination, as in that statute is provided, treasons, misprisions of treasons, and murders committed in any place within the king's dominions or without may be inquired of, heard, and determined in any county, where the king by his commission shall appoint.

This statute, at least as to the trial of treasons and misprisions, is repealed by the statute of 1 & 2 P. & M. cap. 10. Stamf. P. C. Lib. II. cap. 26. fol. 89, 90. Co. P. C. cap. 2. p. 27.

But it seems that statute stands in force as to indictments and trials of murder, the circumstances required by that statute being observed.

By the statute 35 H. 8. cap. 2. because some doubt was conceived, whether forein treasons committed out of this realm might be inquired of, heard and determined within the realm, it is enacted, that such offenses shall be inquired of, heard and determined in the king's bench, or in such counties, where the king shall issue his commission, by the good men of the same county.

This statute stands in force, not repealed by 1 & 2 P. & M. cap. 10. Co. P. C. cap. 2. p. 24.

By the statute 27 Eliz. cap. 2. treasons by priests or jesuits coming into England, and felony for receiving them; and by the statute 1 Jac. cap. 11. felony for taking a second husband or wife, the first living, are inquirable and determinable where the offender is apprehended; the like for felony in exportation of wools by the statute of 14 Car. 2. cap. 18. But yet it was held at common law, that treason in adhering to the king's enemies beyond the sea was inquirable and triable where the offender had lands, vide Coke super Littleton, Sect. 440. p. 261. b. 5 R. 2. Trial 54. but this is now settled by the statute of 35 H. 8. cap. 2. vid. Co. P. C. cap. 1. p. 11.

If A. by reason of tenure of lands in the county of B. be bound to repair a bridge in the county of C. if the bridge be in decay, he may be indicted in the county of C. that he is bound ratione tenurae of lands in the county of B. to repair the bridge. 5 H. 7. 3. 3 E. 3. Assise 446.

CHAP. XXV.

Of Indictment.

Sect. 1. AN Indictment is an Accusation, at the Suit of the King, by the Oaths of twelve Men of the same County wherein the Offence was committed, returned to inquire of all Offences in general in the County, determinable by the Court into which they are returned, and finding a Bill brought before them to be true; but when such Accusation is found by a Grand Jury, without any Bill brought before them, and [d] afterwards reduced to a formed Indictment, it is called a Presentment; and when it is found by Jurors returned to inquire of that particular Offence only which is indicted, it is properly called an Inquisition. And for the better Understanding the Nature of such Proceedings, I shall consider the following Particulars,

1. Whether a Grand Jury may find Part of a Bill brought before them true, and Part false.
2. Whether an Indictment be merely the Suit of the King.
3. What Matters are indictable.
4. Where a Man may be tried at the Suit of the King for a capital Offence, without any Indictment.
5. Whether a Man may be arraigned on an Indictment while an Appeal is depending against him for the same Offence.
6. Who may and ought to be Indictors, and in what Manner they are to be returned.
7. Within what Place the Offences inquired of must arise.
8. What ought to be the Form of the Body of an Indictment.
9. What ought to be the Form of the Caption of it.
10. Upon what Proof it may be found.
11. In what Cases it may be quashed.
12. What may be pleaded to it, and in what Manner.

Sect. 2. As to the first Point, viz. Whether a Grand Jury may find Part of the Bill brought before them true, and Part false; it seems to be generally agreed, That they must either find Billa Vera, or Ignoramus, for the Whole; and that if they take upon them to find it specially, or conditionally, or to be true for Part only, and not for the rest, the Whole is void, and the Party [a] cannot be tried upon it, but ought to be indicted anew; and accordingly it hath been resolved, that if a Grand Jury indorse a Bill of Murder, [b] Billa vera se defendendo; or Billa vera for Manslaughter, [c] and not Murder; or it they indorse a Bill upon the Statutes of News, Billa Vera, [d] but whether Ista verba prolata fuerunt maliciose, seditiose, vel econtra, ignoramus; or if they indorse an Indictment of Forcible Entry, and Forcible Detainer, Billa vera [e] as to the Forcible Entry, and Ignoramus as to the Forcible Detainer; or if they indorse, [f] That if the Freehold were in J. S. or the Possession were in J. S. then they find Billa vera, the Whole is void.

Sect. 3. As to the second Point, viz. Whether an Indictment be merely the Suit of the King; it is every Day's Practice, That it is so far esteemed the King's Suit, that the Party who prosecutes it is a good Witness to prove it: Also it seems to be agreed, [g] That no Damages can be given to the Party grieved upon an Indictment, or any other criminal Prosecution, [h] notwithstanding the King, by his Commission erecting a New Court, expressly direct, That the Party shall recover his Damages by such a Prosecution. Also, where by Statute Damages are given to the Party grieved by the Offence intended to be redressed, it [i] seems that they cannot be recovered on an Indictment grounded on such Statute, unless such Method of recovering them be expressly given by the Statute; but that they ought to be sued for in an Action on the Statute, in the Name of the Party grieved. But it seems [k] certain, That the Court of King's Bench having the King's Privy Seal for that Purpose, may give to the Prosecutor the third Part of the Fine assessed on a Criminal Prosecution, for any Offence whatsoever. Also, it is every Day's Practice of that Court, to induce Defendants to make Satisfaction to Prosecutors for the Costs of the Prosecution, and also for the Damages sustained by the Injury whereof the Defendants are convicted, by intimating an Inclination on that Account to mitigate the Fine due to the King.

Sect. 4. As to the third Point, viz. What Matters are indictable: There can be no Doubt, but that all Capital Crimes whatsoever, and also all Kinds of inferior Crimes of a publick Nature, as Misprisons, and all other Contempts, all Disturbances of the Peace, all Oppressions, and all other Misdemeanors whatsoever of a publick evil Example against the Common Law, may be indicted; but no Injuries of a [l] private Nature, unless they some Way concern the King. Also it seems to be a good general Ground, That where-ever the Statute prohibits a Matter of a publick Grievance to the [m] Liberties and Security of a Subject; or commands a Matter of publick [n] Convenience, as the repairing of the Common Streets of a Town; an Offender against such Statute is punishable, not only at the Suit of the Party aggrieved, but also by Way of Indictment for his Contempt of the Statute, unless such Method of Proceeding do manifestly appear to be excluded by it. Yet if the Party offending have been fined to the King in the Action brought by the Party, as it is said [o] that he may in every Action for doing a Thing prohibited by Statute, it seems questionable, whether he may afterwards be indicted, because that would make him liable to a second Fine for the same Offence. Also, if a Statute extend only to private [a] Persons, or if it extend to all Persons in general, but chiefly concern Disputes of a private Nature, as those relating to [b] Distresses made by Lords on their Tenants, It is said that Offences against such Statute will hardly bear an Indictment. Also, where a Statute make a new Offence, which was no Way prohibited by the Common Law, and appoints a particular Manner of proceedings against the Offender, as by Commitment, or Action of Debt, or Information, &c. without mentioning an Indictment, it seems to be [c] settled at this Day, that it will not maintain an Indictment, because of Mentioning the other Methods of proceeding only, seems impliedly to exclude that of indictment. [d] Yet it hath been adjudged, That if such a Statute give a Recovery by Action of Debt, Bill, Plaint, or Information, or otherwise, it authorizes a Proceeding by Way of Indictment. [e] Also, where a Statute adds a farther Penalty to an Offence prohibited by the Common Law, there can be no Doubt but that the Offender may still be indicted, if the Prosecutor think fit, at the Common Law. And if the Indictment for such Offence conclude contra formam Statuti, and cannot be made good as an Indictment upon the Statute, it seems [f] to be now settled, That it may be maintained as an Indictment at Common Law, as will be more fully shewn in the following Part of this Chapter.

As to the fourth Point, viz. Where a Man may be tried at the Suit of the King for a capital Offence without any Indictment, I shall endeavour to shew,

1. Where one may be so tried as having been taken with the Manner.
2. Where one may be so tried upon a Verdict.
3. Where upon an Appeal not prosecuted.
4. Whether one may be so tried upon a Sheriff’s Return.

Sect. 5. As to the first Point, viz. Where one may be so tried as having been taken with the Manner: [g] It is said, That anciently if one guilty of Larceny had been freshly pursued and taken with the Manner, and the Goods so found upon him had been brought into the Court with him, he might be tried immediately without any Indictment; and this is said to have been the proper Method of Proceeding in such Manors which had the Franchise of Infangthefe, but seems to be altogether obsolete at this Day.

Sect. 6. As to the second Point, viz. Where one may be so tried upon a Verdict: It is [h] said, That in an Action of Trespass in the King's Bench, De muliere abducta cum bonis viri, if the Defendant be found guilty of having carried away the Woman and Goods with Force, and feloniously; or [i] in a common Action of Trespass in the said Court, for Goods carried away, if it be found that the Defendant feloniously stole them, he shall be put to answer the Felony without any further Accusation; for such a Charge by the Oath of twelve Men, on their Inquiry into the Merits of a Cause, in a Court which has Jurisdiction over the Crime, is equivalent to an Indictment, and the King being always in Judgment of Law present in Court, may take Advantage of any Matter therein properly disclosed for his Benefit. But such a Verdict in a Court which has [k] no Jurisdiction over criminal Matters, seems to be of little Force, because such Court has nothing to do with such Matters. And it seems,

[a] That even in the King's Bench, if on any Indictment whatsoever, except only an Inquisition of Death found before a Coroner on View, a Person not mentioned in it be found guilty of the Crime whereof others are indicted, yet such Finding shall not serve for an Indictment against him, because it was wholly extrajudicial. [b] But such finding of others guilty, whether in the King's Bench, or other Court of Criminal Jurisdiction, upon an Inquisition of Death, found before a Coroner on View, is of greater Force, because the Jury acquitting the Party so indicted, [c] ought to inquire what other Person did the Fact; because it appears by a Record of the highest Credit, that a Person is killed, [d] Also, if a Person be declared against in a proper Court, for having been guilty of a Misdemeanor, simul cum A. B. & C. and thereupon the Jury find A. B. and C. guilty; it seems that such Verdict will serve for an Indictment against them, because it was not wholly extrajudicial.

As to the third Point, viz. Where one may be so tried upon an Appeal not prosecuted; the following Particulars seem most remarkable.*

Sect. 7. First, That an Appeal by an innocent Person, and an Appeal by an [e] Approver, are equally favoured in this Respect.

Sect. 8. Secondly, That regularly where a Person is indicted and appealed of the same [f] Crime, and the Appeal is not prosecuted, he shall not [g] be arraigned upon the Indictment, but upon the Appeal.[34]

Sect. 9. Thirdly, [h] That if an Appellant be nonsuit in an Appeal by Writ, before he hath declared, the Appellee cannot be arraigned at the King's Suit on the Writ of Appeal; not only because it contains no Certainty of the Circumstances of the Fact, which is the proper [i] Office of the Declaration to ascertain; but also because, for what appears to the contrary by the Record, the Writ might [k] have been purchased by a Stranger. And therefore in such case it seems to be in the Discretion [l] of the Court, either to dismiss the Appellee, or to bail him, till it shall appear whether there will be any other Prosecution against him. But if an Appellant, by Writ, be nonsuit after Declaration, or any Appellant by Bill or Approver, be nonsuit, it seems, [m] That regularly the Appellee shall be arraigned at the King's Suit, on the Bill Declaration; because they must be as certain as an Indictment, and cannot be commenced but in Person.

Sect. 10. Fourthly, That it seems to be a settled Rule, That where-ever an Appeal is once well commenced, and afterwards so far determined, without a full Acquittal, That neither the same, nor any [n] other Plaintiff, can never [sic] bring another Appeal against the same Appellee, he may be arraigned upon the Bill or Declaration, at the Suit of the King; as where an Appellant, having a good Title to the Appeal, makes a Release [o] to the Appellee, hanging the Action, or suffers a [p] Nonsuit, or [q] Retraxit, or [r] demurs to a good Plea or Issue, tendered by the Appellee, which Demurrer is adjudged against him; or where such an Appellant or Approver [s] confess their Appeal to be false, [t] unless they make such Confession in the Field, upon a Trial awarded by Battel; for such Confession amounts to a Vanquishment of the Appellant or Approver, and consequently is a full Acquittal of the Appellee; after which his Life shall not be brought again into Danger for the same Crime. And this seems to be the only Reason why after such a Vanquishment, or a Verdict in his Favour, an Appellee shall be discharged, as well against the Suit of the King, as that of the Party. But it seems, That in all other Cases whatsoever, an Appellee, in an Appeal well commenced, being wholly discharged of the Suit of the Party, may be arraigned upon the Appeal, at the Suit of the King, whether such discharge were merely owing to the Act of the Party, as in the Cases abovementioned, or to the Act of the Court; as [a] where an Approver is judged to be hanged before he hath perfected his Appeal; or partly to the Act of Law, and partly to the Act of the Party; as [b] where an Appeal by a Woman for the Death of her first Husband, is abated by her marrying a second; or where an Appellee is discharged of an Appeal, for not [c] having been made a Defendant in a former Appeal, brought by the same Appellant for the very same Fact; or whether such Discharge be merely owing to the Act of God; as [d] where an Appellant dies a natural Death, while his Appeal is depending. It seems indeed to be holden in the Year-Book [e] of 4 H. 6. As a general Rule, that wherever a Writ is abated, the Declaration depending upon it is determined also, and consequently, that the Appellee cannot be arraigned upon it; but to this it may be answered, that in the very same Place it is allowed, that after a Nonsuit in an Appeal, the Appellee may be arraigned at the Suit of the King; and it seems difficult to give a Reason, why a Writ is not as much determined upon a Nonsuit, as upon an Abatement; to which may be added, that the Point adjudged, which was this, That where a Writ abates for a Misnosmer, the Defendant shall not be arraigned at the Suit of the King, seems plainly to go on this Ground, That where a Suit is ill commenced, the King shall not have a greater Advantage from it than the Party might have had; and therefore the Opinion abovementioned; being also contradicted by the best [f] Authorities, seems to be of little Weight.

Sect. 11. Fifthly, That wherever [g] an Appeal abates for an Insufficiency of the Writ, or is barred for want of a good Title in the Appellant, or for any other Matter which shews it was ill commenced, the Defendant shall not be arraigned upon it at the Suit of the King, because it never had a good Foundation, and cannot give a greater Advantage to the King than to the Party himself who sued it; and therefore it seems to be agreed, That if an Appeal be abated for want of Form apparent in the Writ, as [h] for the Omission of the Word Habeas, or for false [i] Latin, or for any other [k] apparent Defect; or if it be abated for a Defect not apparent of itself, but disclosed by the Pleadings of the Parties, as for a [l] Misnosmer, or wrongful Addition, or any such like Insufficiency; or if it be abated on Account of the Disability of the Appellant, as by the Plea of Outlawry [m] for Felony or Trespass; or if it be put without Day upon a Plea of Excommunication of the Appeallant; or [n] if it be barred by a Release made before the Commencement of the Suit, or by Reason that the Time for bringing it was elapsed [o] before it was commenced, or because the Appellant appears to have never had any Right to bring it; as where in an Appeal by one as Wife, it is found that she was [p] never lawfully married to the Deceased; or in an Appeal by one as Heir [q] to his Father, it is found that he hath an elder Brother alive by the same Father, &c. the Appellee shall not be arraigned upon the Appeal, the Suit of the King, but shall be wholly discharged of it. But where an Appeal is put without Day on the Plea of [a] Excommunication, the Appellee shall be mainprised from Day to Day till the Plaintiff be absolved; and notwithstanding it seems to be holden generally in some [b] Books, That where an Appeal is abated for any of the Insufficiencies abovementined, or barred, the Appellee shall be set at large, and be discharged, as well against the King as Party; yet [c] surely this must be understood only of such Cases wherein it appears, That neither any Indictment is preferred, nor intended to be preferred by the King, nor any other Appeal preferred, nor intended to be preferred by the same or some other Party; for otherwise surely it cannot but be intended, that it must be in the Discretion of the Court, upon Consideration of the Circumstances of the Case, either to commit or bail the Appellee for a reasonable Time, in order to answer such further Prosecution, or [d] to bind him to his Good Behaviour for a certain Time, &c.

Sect. 12. Sixthly, That whatsoever may be pleaded by an Appellee either in Bar or Abatement of an Appeal, while it is carried on at the Suit of the Party, may [e] as well be pleaded by him, when it is prosecuted at the Suit of the King; as [f] that the Appellant suing an Appeal of Death, as Wife to the Deceased, was never married to him, or [g] that she is outlawed, &c. which depends upon the Reason taken Notice of in the precedent Sections, viz. That an Appeal shall not give the King a greater Advantage than the Party himself who sued it.

Sect. 13. Seventhly, That [h] wherever an Appellee is arraigned upon the Suit of the King, he may plead the King's Pardon, in the same Manner as if he had been arraigned upon an Indictment: But if an Appellee, who by pleading such a Pardon discharges himself of an Appeal at the Suit of the King, be also indicted, it is adviseable [i] to take Care at the same Time when he is in such Manner discharged of the Appeal, to have a Cesser of Process entered on the Indictment, to prevent the Vexation of causeless Prosecution upon it.

Sect. 14. As to the fourth Point, viz. Whether one may be tried at the Suit of the King for a Capital Offence, without any Indictment upon a Sheriff's Return, it seems to be generally agreed, [k] That neither the Sheriff's Return of a Rescous or Escape, or of any other Matter, nor any other Record whatsoever, except only an Appeal or Indictment, or something equivalent thereto, as the Verdict of twelve Men, finding a Man guilty in such Manner as is above set forth in the sixth Section of this Chapter, can at this Day put a Man upon his Trial for a Capital Offence, as being contrary not only to the Common Law, but to [l] Magna Charta, and other [m] Statutes made in Affirmance of it.

Sect. 15. As to the fifth general Point of this Chapter, viz. Whether a Man may be arraigned on an Indictment, while an Appeal is depending against him for the same offence, it seems [n] that it it was the Common Practice before the Statute of 3 H. 7. 1. whether any Appeal were depending or not, not to try any Man upon an Indictment of Murder, be-before [sic; before] the Year and Day were passed, lest thereby the Suit of the Party should be prevented. And if such Regard were had to an Appeal where none was depending, it cannot be thought but that much [o] greater was had to one actually depending whether before or after the Year and Day were passed, [a] Yet in seems that the Court was never in any Case peremptorily bound to suspend the Proceedings on an Indictment in respect of an Appeal, but might always in Discretion, whenever it should seem proper, proceed on an Indictment, hanging an Appeal. And accordingly we find, that in many Instances [b] in the Old Books, when it is was holden, That in an Appeal by an Infant, the Parol should [c] demur till his full Age, the Court have proceeded to try a Man upon an Indictment, while an Appeal by an Infant was depending against him, to prevent the Delay, which could not but be occasioned, if the Pceceedings [sic; Proceedings] should be deferred till the Appellant should come to full Age. Also [d] where a Writ of Appeal of Robbery hath been sued out against a Person under an Indictment for the same Robbery, and ready to be tried, the Court have refused to put off the Trial of the Indictment in respect of such Writ of Appeal; because before the Appellant hath declared, it doth not judicially appear, that both the Indictment and Appeal are for the very same Fact. But if there was no such special Reason to induce the Court to proceed upon an Indictment while an Appeal is depending, if seems to have been the general [e] Practice to suspend the Proceedings on the Indictment till the Appeal were determined.

As to the sixth general Point of this Chapter, viz. Who may be, and ought to be Indictors, and in what Manner they are to be returned, I shall endeavour to shew,

1. How these Matters stand by the Common Law.
2. How by Statute.

Sect. 16. As to the first Particular, it seems clear, That by the Common Law every Indictment most be found by twelve [f] Men at the least, every [g] one of which ought to be of the same [h] County, and returned by the Sheriff, or other proper Officer, without the Nomination of any other Person whatsoever; and ought also to be a Freeman, and a Lawful liege Subject; and consequently neither under an [i] Attainder of any Treason or Felony; nor a [k] Villein, nor Alien, nor outlawed, whether for a criminal Matter, or, as [l] some say, in a personal Action. And from hence it seems clear, that if it appear by the Caption of an Indictment, or otherwise, that it was found by [m] less than twelve, the Proceedings upon it will be erroneous.[n] Also, it seems that any one who is under a Prosecution for any Crime whatsoever, may, by the Common Law, before he is indicted, challenge any of the Persons returned on the Grand Jury; as being outlawed for Felony, &c. or Villeins, or returned at the Instance of a Prosecutor, or not returned by the proper Officer, &c.

Sect. 17. Also may Indictments in inferior [o] Courts have been [p] quashed for want of the Words Proborum & legalium hominum, in the Caption of the Indictment, setting forth by what Persons it was found; [q] but this is said to be no Exception to an Indictment found in the Court of King's Bench, or Grand Sessions, or Counties Palatine, and hath been often [r] overruled, as to Indictments in other Courts, because all Men shall be intended to be honest and lawful, till the contrary appear.

Sect. 18. It is resolved in the [a] Year-Book of 11 H. 4. by the Advice of all the Justices, That one outlawed on an Indictment of Felony, may plead in Avoidance of it, that one of the Indictors was outlawed for Felony, &c. But it seems to be the general [b] Opinion, That this Resolution is rather grounded on the Statute of 11 H. 4. ch. 9. which was made in the same Term, in which this Resolution was given, than on the Common Law; because it appears by the very same Year-Book, that when this Plea was first proposed it was disallowed; from whence, as I suppose, it is collected, that the subsequent Resolution was founded on the Authority of the said Statute, which may be intended to have been made after the Plea was disallowed, and before the subsequent Resolution, by which it was adjudged good. Yet, considering that the said Resolution was given in the Beginning of Hillary Term, and that the Parliament which made the said Statute was not holden before the Beginning of the same Term; and therefore it is not likely that the said Statute was so soon made; and also considering, that the said Resolution was given by Advice of all the Judges, who seem to have been consulted about the Validity of the Plea abovementioned at the Common Law, and takes no Manner of Notice of any Statute, but only of the Law in General, it may deserve a Question, Whether such Plea be not good at the Common Law?

Sect. 19. I do not find it any where holden, that none but Freeholders ought to be returned on a Grand Jury; but how far the Law is in this Respect altered by Statute, shall be shewn in the twenty-first Section.[*]

Sect. 20. As to the second Particular, viz. How the Matters abovementioned stand by Statute, it is enacted by the Statute of Westminster 2. 28. That old Men above the Age of seventy Years, Persons perpetually sick, or infirm at the Time of the Summons, or not dwelling in the County, shall not be put in Juries, or lesser Assises. And the Equity thereof, and the Reason of the Thing, seem plainly so far to extend to Grand Juries, that if it shall appear, that any of the persons abovementioned be returned on a Grand Jury, the Court, into which they are returned, will easily excuse their Non-appearance. But it seems clear, [c] that any such Persons being returned on a Grand Jury, may lawfully serve upon it, if they think fit; neither do I find that they can have an Action on the said Statute for being so returned; for the Writ [d] in the Register grounded on, and reciting the statute, mentions the Prohibition of it to be, that Men above the Age of seventy Years shall not be put in Assisis, juratis, vel recognitionibus aliquibus, which Expressions seem proper for Petit. Juries only; whereas the [e] Writ grounded on the Statue of Articuli super chartas, set forth at large in the twenty-first Section, recites the Prohibition thereof to be, that none of the Persons in the Writ mentioned shall be put in inquisitionibus nec juratis, which Expression seems to be of a larger Extent, and to take in Grand as well as Petit Juries; by which it seems clearly to be implied, that in the Judgment of those who formed the said Writ, the Statute last mentioned is more general than the former.

Sect. 21. It is farther enacted by the abovementioned Statue of Westminster 2. 38. That none shall be put on Assises or Juries, though they ought to be taken in the proper County, who have less Tenements than to the Value of twenty Shillings yearly. And it is required by the Statue of 21 Ed. 1. Commonly called the Statute De his qui ponendi sunt in Assisis, That they should have Tenements to the Value of 40 s. yearly; Provided, That before Justices in Eyre for Common Pleas in their Eyres, and also in Assises, and Juries, which shall be taken in Cities and Burghs, and other trading Towns, the same may be done as was accustomed: And this Exception is likewise mentioned in the [a] Writ in the Register, which seems to be grounded on both these Statutes; by which it appears, That neither by the Common Law nor by these Statutes there was any Necessity in Proceedings before Justices in Eyre, &c. That Petit Jurors should be Freeholders; and if so, it seems probable that there is no greater Necessity that Grand Jurors making an Inquiry before them should be Freeholders; and if a Grand Juror before such Justices need not to be a Freeholder, why should there be a greater Necessity that a Grand Juror before other Justices should be a Freeholder? And it is farther remarkable, that the above mentioned Writ in the Register, which seems to be grounded on these Statutes, mentions only Persons put in assisis, juratis vel recognitionibus aliquibus; To which may be added, that the [b] several subsequent Statutes, which require that none but Freeholders or Copyholders of Lands of such a Value shall be returned on Juries, expresly [sic] extend only to Juries returned for the Trial of Issues, except only the [c] Statutes concerning Indictments in the Sheriff's Torn, which require, that every Juror finding such Indictment shall have 20 s. yearly of Freehold, or 26 s. of Copyhold, and also except 3 H. 7. 1. which requires that every Juror of an Inquest by which Justices of Peace shall inquire of Concealments by other Inquests shall have Tenements of the yearly Value of 40 s. and also except 33 H. 6. 2. which requires that every Indictment in the County Palatine of Lancaster, of Persons supposed by the same Indictment to live in some other County, and also every Indictment in any other County, of Persons in the same Indictment, supposed to live in the said County of Lancaster, shall be taken by such Jurors only as have Lands to the yearly Value of one hundred Shillings; All which seems to make it doubtful, Whether there be any Necessity either by the Common Law or Statute, That a Grand Juror in any other Case must be a Freeholder.

Sect. 22. It is enacted by 28 Ed. 1. Commonly called the Statue of Articuli super Chartas, cap. 9. That no Sheriff, nor Bailiff shall impanel in Inquests, nor in Juries over many Persons, nor others, nor otherwise than as is ordained by Statute: And that they shall put in those Inquests and Juries, such as be next Neighbours, most sufficient and least suspicious. And the like is enacted almost in the very same Words by 42 Ed. 3. 11. And it is farther enacted by the said Statute of Articuli super Chartas, That he who doth contrary, and is attainted thereupon, shall pay unto the plaintiff his Damages double, and shall be grievously amerced to the King. And the said Statute of Articuli super Chartas, is said by Sir Edward Coke [d] to extend to all Suits or Proceedings, either criminal or civil, Real, Personal, or mixed, Publick or Private, Assises or Enquests; and surely that Part of it which ordains, that the most sufficient and least suspicious shall be returned on all Juries, is so agreeable to common Right and natural Justice, that it cannot but be thought to be in Affirmance of the Common Law, and equally to extend to Grand and Petit Juries, and consequently if any Officer shall be willfully guilty of an Offence against it in the Return of any Jury, he cannot but be punishable for his Contempt, at the Suit of the King. And it is enacted by 23 E. 3. 6. That Justices of Assises shall have Commissions sufficient to inquire in their Sessions of Sheriffs, &c. for putting into Panels Jurors suspect and of evil Fame. And it is farther enacted by 34 Ed. 3. 4. That all Panels shall be made of the next People, which shall not be suspect nor procured. And that the Ministers which do against the same, shall be punished before the Justices who take the Inquest, according to the Quantity of their Trespass, as well against the King as against the Party for the Quantity of the Damage which he hath suffered in such Manner; and both these Statutes seem equally to extend to the undue Return of Grand and Petit Juries. But it is observable, that the Clause of the above recited Statute of Articuli super Chartas, which ordains that the Sheriff, &c. shall render double Damages, extends only to Juries returned in Suits between Party and Party, because it says, that he shall render them to the Plaintiff, which is a Denomination never given to the King or Prosecutor, where the Proceeding is by Way of Indictment; and accordingly we find that the Writs in the [a] Register grounded on this Statute expressly relate to suits between Party and Party.

Sect. 23. But the principal Statutes relating to the Return of Grand Juries, are 11 H. 4. 9. and 3 H. 8. 12. the first whereof is as followeth, Because that now of late Enquests were taken at Westminster, of Persons named to the Justices, without due Return of the Sheriff, of which Persons some were outlawed before the said Justices of Record, and some fled to Sanctuary for Treason, and some for felony, there to have Refuge, by whom, as well many Offenders were indicted, as other lawful liege People of our Lord the King, not guilty, by Conspiracy, Abetment, and false Imagination of other Persons, for their special Advantage and singular Lucre, against the Course of the Common Law used and accustomed before this Time: Our said Lord the King, for the greater Ease and Quietness of his People, will and granteth, that the same Indictment so made, with all the Dependance thereof, be revoked [,] annulled, void, and holden for none for ever: and that from henceforth no Indictment be made by any such Persons, but by Enquest of the King's lawful liege People, in the Manner as was used in the Time of his noble Progenitors, returned by the Sheriffs, or Bailiffs of Franchises, without any Denomination to the Sheriffs, or Bailiffs of Franchises before made by any Person, of the Names, which by him should be impanelled, except it be by the Officers of the said Sheriffs or Bailiffs of Franchises sworn and known to make the same, and other Officers to whom it pertaineth to make the same according to the Law of England: And if any Indictment be made hereafter in any Point to the contrary, that the same Indictment be also void, revoked, and for ever holden for none.

Sect. 137. First, That where the Statute of 1 Ed. 6. requires, That the Party be accused [of Treason] by two lawful Witnesses; and the 5 & 6 Ed. 6. That he be accused by two lawful Accusers; they both mean the very [a] same Thing, because the Common Law admits of no other Accusers but Witnesses.

Sect. 138. Secondly, That according to the general [b] Opinion, it is not required either by the 1st, or 5 & 6 Ed. 6. That such Accusers or Witnesses be present with the Indictors in Person, but that they may send their Accusation to the Indictors in Writing under their Hands, which will be sufficient even after their Death. Also it is observable, That the Books which speak of this Matter do not expressly say, that such Accusation must be upon Oath, but surely this cannot but be intended; for how can any Accuser be said to be a lawful Witness, if he be not upon his Oath? But this is cleared by 7 W. 3. as to the Treasons within that Statute; for it expresly provides, That no Person shall be indicted thereof, but by and upon the Oath and Testimony of two lawful Witnesses.

Sect. 139. Thirdly, By the Judgment both of [a] Coke and [b] Hale, one who can only witness by Hearsay what he had heard a good Witness say, is not a lawful Accuser within any of these Statutes; for if this were to be allowed, nothing would be more easy than in any Case, where there is one Witness, to get a second, which would totally elude the Provision of the Statutes in requiring two lawful Witness, &c.

Sect. 140. Fourthly, That the Words, unless the Party shall willingly, without Violence, confess the same, in the 1st, and 5 & 6 Ed. 6. are to be understood [c] where the Party accused upon his Examination, before his Arraignment, willingly confesses the same without Torture: But it is observable, that 7 W. 3. is thus expressed, Unless the Party indicted and arraigned, or tried, shall willingly, without Violence, in open Court confess the same.

Sect. 141. Fifthly, That one Witness to one, and another Witness to another Overt Act of the very same [d] Treason, have been construed to be sufficient, within the Statutes of the 1st, and 5 & 6 Ed. 6. and the express Words of 7 W. 3. are agreeable hereto.

Sect. 142. Sixthly, That the Statute of 1 & 2 Ph. & Ma. 10. by enacting, That all Trials of Treason shall from thenceforth be according to the Course of Common Law, doth not [e] take away the Necessity of two Witnesses upon an Indictment, required by the 1st, and 5 & 6 Ed. 6. because the Indictment is no Part of the Trail, but is more properly the Accusation to be tried.

Sect. 143. Seventhly, [f] That the said Statute of 1 & 2 Ph. & Ma. doth not extend to Misprision of Treason; but this is expressly provided for by 7 W. 3. as to such Treasons as are within that Statute, and therefore there must be two Witnesses to the Indictment, as well as Trial of every such Misprision.

Sect. 144. Eighthly, That [g] Petit Treason is within the 1st, and 5 & 6 Ed. 6. and 1 & 2 Ph. & Ma. 10. but not within the 7th of W. 3. from whence it follows, That two Witnesses are required to the Indictment, and not to the Trial of it, and that two Witnesses are not necessary even upon the Indictment, if [h] the Party, upon his Examination, confess it.

Sect. 145. Ninthly, That the Statute of 1 & 2. Ph. & Ma. 11. which enacts, That all Persons accused of any Offences concerning the Impairing, Counterfeiting or Forging the Coin, shall be indicted and tried as at the Common Law, hath been construed [i] to extend to Clipping, and all other Offences in impairing the Coin, which have been made Treasons since the said Statute of 1 & 2 Ph. & Ma. From whence it may be probably argued, That the Statute of 7 W. 3. by expresly providing, That nothing therein shall extend to High Treason for counterfeiting the Coin, intended in like Manner, that it should not extend to any other High Treason concerning the Coin.

Sect. 146. As to the eleventh general Point of this Chapter, viz. In what Cases an Indictment may be quashed: I take it to be [k] settled, That by the Common Law the Court may, in Discretion, quash any Indictment, for any such Insufficiency, either in the Caption, or Body of it, as will make any Judgment whatsoever, given upon any Part of it against the Defendant, erroneous; yet it seems That Judges are in no Case bound, ex debito justitiae, to quash an Indictment, but may oblige the Defendant either to plead or to demur to it: And this they generally do where it is for a Crime of an enormous or publick Nature, as Perjury, Forgery, Sedition, Nusances to the Highways, and other Offences of the like Nature.[a] Neither will the Court quash an Indictment removed by Certiorari, if a Recognisance for the Trial of it hath been forfeited.

Sect. 147. Also it is enacted by 7 W. 3. 3. That no Indictment for High Treason, or Misprision thereof, (except only Indictments for counterfeiting the King's Coin, Seal, Sign or Signet,) nor any Process or Return thereupon, shall be quashed on the Motion of the Prisoner, or his Counsel, for miswriting, misspelling false or improper Latin, unless Exception concerning the same be taken and made in the respective Court, where such Trial shall be, by the Prisoner, or his Counsel assigned, before any Evidence given in open Court upon such Indictment; not shall any such Miswriting, Misspelling, false or improper Latin, after Conviction on such Indictment, be any Cause to stay or arrest Judgment thereupon: But nevertheless, any Judgment given upon such Indictment shall and may be liable to be reversed upon a Writ of Error, in the same Manner, and no other than as if this Act had not been made.

Sect. 148. It hath been settled [b] in the Construction of this Statute, that no such Exception can be taken, after Plea pleaded.

Sect. 149. It is said [c] in Siderfin's Reports, That the Court never [d] quasheth an Information exhibited by a common Person, but that it will quash an Information exhibited by the Attorney General, or by the Master of the Crown Office, upon Motion, if there be Cause: But this was denied in one [e] Nixon's Case, wherein the Court seemed to be agreed, That they never have, or will quash any Information whatsoever.

Sect. 150. As to the twelfth general Point of this Chapter, viz. What may be pleaded to an Indictment, and in what Manner: Having already shewn in this Chapter how a Defendant may plead [f] to an Inictment, That the Indictors were returned contrary to the Purview of 11 H. 4. 9. And having also [g] shewn, how he may plead a Misnosmer, or wrongful Addition; and intending in the following Part of the Book to shew, how he may plead a former Acquittal, Conviction or Attainder, or a Pardon or other special Plea, or the general Issue: I shall in this Place only take Notice, That the Defendant may plead any Plea in Abatement of an Indictment of Felony; and also plead over in Bar, and take [h] the general Issue also, in the same Manner as an Appellee may do, as hath been more fully shewn, Ch. 23. Sect. 127, 138.

The next step towards the punishment of offenders is their prosecution, or the manner of their formal accusation. And this is either upon a previous finding of the fact by an inquest or grand jury; or without such previous finding. The former way is either by presentment, or indictment.

I. A presentment, generally taken, is a very comprehensive term; including not only presentments properly so called, but also inquisitions of office, and indictments by a grand jury. A presentment, properly speaking, is the notice taken by a grand jury of any offence from their own knowledge or observation [a], without any bill of indictment laid before them at the suit of the king. As, the presentment of a nusance, a libel, and the like; upon which the officer of the court must afterwards frame an indictment, before the party presented as the author can be put to answer it. An inquisition of office is the act of a jury, summoned by the proper officer to enquire of matters relating to the crown, upon evidence laid before them. Some of these are in themselves convictions, and cannot afterwards be traversed or denied; and therefore the inquest, or jury, ought to hear all that can be alleged on both sides. Of this nature are all inquisitions of felo de se; of flight in persons accused of felony; of deodands, and the like; and presentments of petty offences in the sheriff's tourn or court-leet, whereupon the presiding officer may set a fine. Other inquisitions may be afterwards traversed and examined; as particularly the coroner's inquisition of the death of a man, when it finds any one guilty of homicide: for in such cases the offender so presented must be arraigned upon this inquisition, and may dispute the truth of it; which brings it to a kind of indictment, the most usual and effectual means of prosecution, and into which we will therefore enquire a little more minutely.

II. An indictment [b] is a written accusation of one or more persons of a crime or misdemesnor, preferred to, and presented upon oath by, a grand jury. To this end the sheriff of every county is bound to return to every session of the peace, and every commission of oyer and terminer, and of general gaol delivery, twenty four good and lawful men of the county, some out of every hundred, to enquire, present, do, and execute all those things, which on the part of our lord the king shall then and there be commanded them [c]. They ought to be freeholders, but to what amount is uncertain [d]: which seems to be casus omissus, and as proper to be supplied by the legislature as the qualifications of the petit jury; which were formerly equally vague and uncertain, but are now settled by several acts of parliament. However, they are usually gentlemen of the best figure in the county. As many as appear upon this panel, are sworn upon the grand jury, to the amount of twelve at the least, and not more than twenty three; that twelve may be a majority. Which number, as well as the constitution itself, we find exactly described, so early as the laws of king Ethelred [e]. "Exeant seniores duodecim thani, et praefectus cum eis, et jurent super sanctuarium quod eis in manus datur, quod nolint ullum innocentem accusare, nec aliquem noxium celare." In the time of king Richard the first (according to Hoveden) the process of electing the grand jury, ordained by that prince, was as follows: four knights were to be taken from the county at large, who chose two more out of every hundred; which two associated to themselves ten other principal freemen, and those twelve were to answer concerning all particulars relating to their own district. This number was probably found too large and inconvenient; but the traces of this institution still remain, in that some of the jury must be summoned out of every hundred. This grand jury are previously instructed in the articles of the enquiry, by a charge from the judge who presides upon the bench. They then withdraw, to sit and receive indictments, which are preferred to them in the name of the king, but at the suit of any private prosecutor; and they are only to hear evidence on behalf of the prosecution: for the finding of an indictment is only in the nature of an enquiry or accusation, which is afterwards to be tried and determined; and the grand jury are only to enquire upon their oaths, whether there be sufficient cause to call upon the party to answer it. A grand jury however ought to be thoroughly persuaded of the truth of an indictment, so far as their evidence goes; and not to rest satisfied merely with remote probabilities: a doctrine, that might be applied to very oppressive purposes [f].

The grand jury are sworn to enquire, only for the body of the county, pro corpore comitatus; and therefore they cannot regularly enquire of a fact done out of that county for which they are sworn, unless particularly enabled by act of parliament. And to so high a nicety was this matter antiently carried, that where a man was wounded in one county, and died in antoher, the offender was at common law indictable in neither, because no complete act of felony was done in any one of them: but by statute 2 & 3 Edw. VI. c. 24. he is now indictable in the county where the party died. And so in some other cases: as particularly, where treason is committed out of the realm, it may be enquired of in any county within the realm, as the king shall direct, in pursuance of statutes 26 Hen. VIII. c. 13. 35 Hen. VIII. c. 2. and 5 & 6 Edw. VI. c. 11. But, in general, all offences must be enquired into as well as tried in the county where the fact is committed.

When the grand jury have heard the evidence, if they think it a groundless accusation, they used formerly to endorse on the back of the bill, "ignoramus;" or, we know nothing of it; intimating, that though the facts might possibly be true, that truth did not appear to them: but now, they assert in English, more absolutely, "not a true bill;" and then the party is discharged without farther answer. But a fresh bill may afterwards be preferred to a subsequent grand jury. If they are satisfied of the truth of the accusation, they then endorse upon it, "a true bill;" antiently, "billa vera." The indictment is then said to be found and the party stands indicted. But, to find a bill, there must at least twelve of the jury agree: for so tender is the law of England of the lives of the subjects, that no man can be convicted at the suit of the king of any capital offence, unless by the unanimous voice of twenty four of his equals and neighbours: that is, by twelve at least of the grand jury, in the first place, assenting to the accusation; and afterwards, by the whole petit jury, of twelve more, finding him guilty upon his trial. But, if twelve of the grand jury assent, it is a good presentment, though some of the rest disagree [g]. And the indictment, when so found, is publicly delivered into court.

Indictments must have a precise and sufficient certainty. By statute 1 Hen. V. c. 5. all indictments must set forth the christian name, sirname [sic], and addition of the state and degree, mystery, town, or place, and the county of the offender: and all this to identify his person. The time, and place, are also to be ascertained, by naming the day, and township, in which the fact was committed: though a mistake in these points is in general not held to be material, provided the time be laid previous to the finding of indictment, and the place to be within the jurisdiction of the court. But sometimes the time may be very material, where there is any limitation in point of time assigned for the prosecution of offenders; as by the statute 7 Will. III. c. 3. which enacts, that no prosecution shall be had for any of the treasons or misprisions therein mentioned (except an assassination designed or attempted on the person of the king) unless the bill of indictment be found within three years after the offence committed [h]; and, in case of murder, the time of the death must be laid within a year and a day after the mortal stroke was given. The offence itself must also be set forth with clearness and certainty: and in some crimes particular words of art must be used which are so appropriated by the law to express the precise idea which it entertains of the offence, that no other words, however synonymous they may seem, are capable of doing it. Thus in treasons, the facts must be laid to be done, "treasonably, and against his allegiance;" antiently "proditorie et contra ligeantiae suae debitum:" else the indictment is void. In indictments for murder, it is necessary to say that the party indicted "murdered," not "killed" or "slew," the other; which till the late statute was expressed in Latin by the word "murdravit" [i]. In all indictments for felonies, the adverb "feloniously, felonice," must be used; and for burglaries also, "burglariter," or in English, "burglariously:" and all these to ascertain the intent. In rapes, the word "rapuit," or "ravished," is necessary, and must not be expressed by any periphrasis; in order to render the crime certain. So in larcinies also, the words "felonice cepit et asportavit, feloniously took and carried away," are necessary to every indictment; for these only can express the very offence. Also in indictments for murder, the length and depth of the wound should in general be expressed, in order that it may appear to the court to have been of a mortal nature: but if it goes through the body, then it's dimensions are immaterial, for that is apparently sufficient to have been the cause of the death. Also where a limb, or the like, is absolutely cut off, there such description is impossible.[k] Lastly, in indictments the value of the thing, which is the subject or instrument of the offence, must sometimes be expressed. In indictments for larcinies this is necessary, that it may appear whether it be grand or petit larciny; and whether entitled or not to the benefit of clergy: in homicide of all sorts it is necessary; as the weapon, with which it is committed, is forfeited to the king as a deodand.

[Then a Bill of High-Treason was offered against the Earl of Shaftesbury; and Sir Francis Withins moved, That the evidence might be heard in court.]

Foreman. My Lord Chief Justice, it is the opinion of the jury, that they ought to examine the witnesses in private, and it hath been the constant practice of our ancestors and predecessors to do it; and they insist upon it as their right to examine in private, because they are bound to keep the king's secrets, which they cannot do, if it be done in court.

[Pemberton,] L.C.J. Look ye, gentlemen of the jury, it may very probably be, that some late usage has brought you into this error, that it is your right, but it is not your right in truth … . What you say concerning keeping your counsels, that is quite of another nature, that is, your debates, and those things, there you shall be in private, for to consider of what you hear publicly. But certainly it is the best way, both for the king, and for you, that there should, in a case of this nature, be an open and plain examination of the witnesses, that all the world may see what they say.

Foreman. My lord, if your lordship pleases, I must beg your lordship's pardon, if I mistake in anything, it is contrary to the sense of what the jury apprehend. First, they apprehend that the very words of the oath doth bind them, it says, "That they shall keep the counsel's, and their own secrets:" Now, my lord, there can be no secret in public; the very intimation of that doth imply, that the examination should be secret; besides, my lord, I beg your lordship's pardon if we mistake, we do not understand any thing of law.

Mr. Papillon [a juror] … . If it be the ancient usage and custom of England, that hath never been altered from time to time, and hath continued so, we desire your lordship's opinion upon that; as we would not do any that may be prejudicial to the king, so we would not do the least that should be prejudicial to the liberties of the people; if it be the ancient custom of the kingdom to examine in private, then there is something may be very prejudicial to the king in this public examination; for sometimes in examining witnesses in private, there come to be discovered some persons guilty of treason, and misprision of treason, that were not known, nor thought on before. Then the jury sends down to the court, and gives them intimation, and these men are presently secured; whereas, my lord, in case they be examined in open court publicly, then presently there is intimation given and these men are gone away. Another thing that may be prejudicial to the king, is, that all the evidences here, will be foreknown before they come to the main trial upon issue by the petty jury; then if there be not a very great deal of care, these witnesses may be confronted by raising up witnesses to prejudice them, as in some cases it has been: Then besides, the jury do apprehend, that in private they are more free to examine things in particular, for the satisfying their own consciences, and that without favour or affection; and we hope we shall do our duty.

[Pemberton,] L.C.J … . [T]he king's counsel have examined whether he hath cause to accuse these persons, or not; and, gentlemen, they understand very well, that it will be no prejudice to the king to have the evidence heard openly in court; or else the king would never desire it.

Foreman. My lord, the gentlemen of the jury desire that it may be recorded, that we insisted upon it as our right; but if the court overrule, we must submit to it.

7.3.2.2Respublica v. Shaffer, 1788

AFTER some conversation with the Grand Inquest, the Attorney General informed the court, that a list of eleven persons had been presented to him by the Foreman, with a request, that they might be qualified and sent to the jury, as witnesses upon a bill then depending before them. He stated that the list had been made out by the defendant's bail: that the persons named were intended to furnish testimony in favor of the party charged, upon facts with which the Inquest, of their own knowledge, were unacquainted; and he concluded with requesting, that the opinion of the court might be given upon this application. The Chief Justice, accordingly, addressed the Grand Jury to the following effect:

M'KEAN, Chief Justice.—Were the proposed examination of witnesses, on the part of the Defendant, to be allowed, the long-established rules of law and justice would be at an end. It is a matter well known, and well understood, that by the laws of our country, every question which affects a man's life, reputation, or property, must be tried by twelve of his peers; and that their unanimous verdict is, alone, competent to determine the fact in issue. If, then, you undertake to inquire, not only upon what foundation the charge is made, but, likewise, upon what foundation it is denied, you will, in effect, usurp the jurisdiction of the Petit Jury, you will supersede the legal authority of the court, in judging of the competency and admissibility of witnesses, and, having thus undertaken to try the question, that question may be determined by a bare majority, or by a much greater number of your body, than the twelve peers prescribed by the law of the land. This point has, I believe, excited some doubts upon former occasions; but those doubts have never arisen in the mind of any lawyer, and they may easily be removed by a proper consideration of the subject. For, the bills, or presentments, found by a grand Jury, amount to nothing more than an official accusation, in order to put the party accused upon his trial; 'till the bill is returned, there is, therefore, no charge from which he can be required to exculpate himself; and we know that many persons, against whom bills were returned, have been afterwards acquitted by a verdict of their country. Here, then, is the just line of discrimination: It is the duty of the Grand-Jury to enquire into the nature and probable grounds of the charge; but it is the exclusive province of the Petit Jury, to hear and determine, with the assistance, and under the direction of the court, upon points of law, whether the Defendant is, or is not guilty, on the whole evidence, for, as well as against, him. —— You will therefore, readily perceive, that if you examine the witnesses on both sides, you do not confine your consideration to the probable grounds of charge, but engage completely in the trial of the cause; and your return must, consequently, be tantamount to a verdict of acquittal or condemnation. But this would involve us in another difficulty; for, by the law, it is declared, that no man shall be twice put in jeopardy for the same offence: and, yet, it is certain, that the enquiry now proposed by the Grand Jury, would necessarily introduce the oppression of a double trial. Nor is it merely upon maxims of law, but, I think, likewise, upon principles of humanity, that this innovation should be opposed. Considering the bill as an accusation grounded entirely upon the testimony in support of the prosecution, the Petit Jury receive no biass [sic] from the sanction which the indorsement of the Grand Jury has conferred upon it.—But, on the other hand, would it not, in some degree, prejudice the most upright mind against the Defendant, that on a full hearing of his defence, another tribunal had pronounced it insufficient?—which would then be the natural inference from every true bill. Upon the whole, the court is of opinion, that it would be improper and illegal to examine the witnesses, on behalf of the Defendant, while the charge against him lies before the Grand-Jury.

One of the Grand Inquest then observed to the court, that “there was a clause in the qualifications of the Jurors, upon which he, and some of his brethren, wished to hear the interpretation of the Judges—to wit—what is the legal acceptation of the words “diligently to enquire?”[”] To this the Chief Justice replied, that “the expression meant, diligently to enquire into the circumstances of the charge, the credibility of the witnesses who support it, and, from the whole, to judge whether the person accused ought to be put upon his trial. For, (he added), though it would be improper to determine the merits of the cause, it is incumbent upon the Grand Jury to satisfy their minds, by a diligent enquiry, that there is a probable ground for the accusation, before they give it their authority, and call upon the Defendant to make a public defence.”

1 On August 17, 1789, Mr. Burke made an identical motion to amend the proposed amendment. After being referred to the proposed grand jury clause and after "[a] desultory conversation … Mr. Burke withdrew [the motion] for the present."

Congressional Register, August 17, 1789, vol. 2, pp. 228–29.

2 On August 22, 1789, the following motion was agreed to:

> ORDERED, That it be referred to a committtee of three, to prepare and report a proper arrangement of, and introduction to the articles of amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as agreed to by the House; and that Mr. Benson, Mr. Sherman, and Mr. Sedgwick be of the said committee.

And upon consideration of the whole matter the court of king's-bench in England were of opinion, "Quòd praedictum recordum est irritandum, & adnichilandum; & ideo mandatum est capitali justic' Hiberniae, quod corrigat, &c. & acceptâ securitate de praedicto Willielmo ad standum recto in com' ubi deliquisse debuit, & vocatis super hoc convocandis ponat praedictum Willielmum per apertum & manifestum indictamentum de certis feloniis in certis locis, si aliquis vel aliqui eum fortè indictare sive appellare voluerit secundùm legem & consuetudinem regni, &c. & quòd interim per manucaptionem bona & catalla, terras & tenements, eidem Willielmo deliberet, &c." a This same doctrine is laid down by C. J. Pemberton in the case of the earl of Shaftsbury, Stat. Tr. Vol. III. p. 415. Vide tamen Sir John Hawles remarks on that case, Stat. Tr. Vol. IV. p. 183. wherein he unanswerably shows, that a grand jury ought to have the same persuasion of the truth of the indictment, as a petty jury, or a coroner's inquest: vide supra p. 61.

* Notwithstanding this, according to lord Coke 9 Co. 119. a. indictments, which concern the life of a man, ought to be framed as near the truth, as may be.

b This is far from being agreed of all hands, for such an anticipation of the evidence by the grand jury is what they cannot avoid, they being bound by their oaths, as much as the petit jury, to present the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, nor do they in this case so properly determine matter of law as matter of fact; for whether murder or not depends upon a preconceived malice, which (tho it is to be presumed, where no provocation appears, is matter of fact, and proper for the consideration of a jury, and tho judges have sometimes fined jurors for not finding such bills for murder, yet such proceedings have been generally censured, as in the case of Sir H. Wyndham and others, P. 19 Car. 2. who were fined by Keeling, C. J. for not finding a bill of murder, albeit they were satisfied the man died by the hand of the party indicted; but upon complaint in parliament the chief justice was fain to submit. 2 Keb. 180.

f The court of king's bench, it is true, may much more safely be trusted, than other inferior courts, but yet our author's arguments do sufficiently evince, that no court whatever ought to have such a power of making juries find what they please, nor has the law vested such a power in any court; for as to matter of fact the jury are the sole judges, and herein are to be guided entirely by their own judgments and consciences; indeed in matters of law the court is the proper judge, and the jury are not to find contrary to their direction, but even here they are not bound to follow the direction of the court, but, if they cannot assent thereto, ought to find the fact specially; indeed where the fact is agreed, if they will obstinately find matter of law contrary to the direction of the court, there may be some reason why they should be fined. See Hood's case Kelyng 50. but barely finding matter of fact against the direction of the court is no sufficient cause to fine a jury. Bushell's case, Vaugh. 153. and this distinction is founded on the antient maxim of the common law; ad quaestionem juris non respondent juratoris, sed judices; ad quaestionem facti non respondent judices, sed juraratores. h This case proves nothing as to the petit jury, it being an indictment on the coroner's inquest, as appears by the record, which is as follows: "John Cobat of Ipswich was indicted by the coroner's inquest consisting only of eleven, quòd die Sabbati prox' ante festum Sancti ad vincula anno regni regis E. 3. post conquestum tricesimo quinto insultum fecit Johanni le Swon servienti Prioris sanctae Trinitat. Gippewici in suburbio libertat. villae praedictae in quodam compo juxta Tromons' Hegg, & dictum Johannem le Swon ibidem cum quadam armâ vocat' Sparth' precii quatuor denar, verberavit felon' de quâ quidem verberatione dictus Johannes le Swon moriebatur, sed languebat à dicto die Sabbati prox. ante festum Sancti Petri ad vincula usque ad diem Jovis tunc prox. sequent", the which indictment was afterwards in Mich' term anno 42 of the same reign removed into the king's bench, "& continuato inde processu versus praefat' Johannem usque à die Paschae in xv dies anno regni regis nunc Angliae quadragesimo tertio, ad quem diem coram domino rege apud Westm' venit praedictus Johannes Cobat per man', & viso & diligenter examinento per cur'

8.2DISCUSSION OF DRAFTS AND PROPOSALS

8.2.1THE FIRST CONGRESS

8.2.1.1June 8, 17892

8.2.1.2August 17, 1789

8.2.1.2.a The 5th clause of the 4th proposition was taken up, viz. “no person shall be subject, in case of impeachment, to more than one trial or one punishment for the same offence, nor shall be compelled to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty or property, without due process of law, nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.”

Mr. Benson

Thought the committee could not agree to the amendment in the manner it stood, because its meaning, appeared rather doubtful, it says that no person shall be tried more than once for the same offence, this is contrary to the right heretofore established, he presumed it was intended to express what was secured by our former constitution, that no man’s life should be more than once put in jeopardy for the same offence, yet it was well known, that they were intitled to more than one trial; the humane intention of the clause was to prevent more than one punishment, for which reason he would move to amend it by striking out the words “one trial or.”

Mr. Sherman

Approved of the motion, he said, that as the clause now stood, a person found guilty could not arrest the judgment, and obtain a second trial in his own favor, he thought that the courts of justice would never think of trying and punishing twice for the same offence, if the person was acquitted on the first trial, he ought not to be tried a second time, but if he was convicted on the first, and anything should appear to set the judgement aside, he was intitled to a second, which was certainly favorable to him. Now the clause as it stands would deprive him of this advantage.

Mr. Livermore

Thought the clause very essential, it was declaratory of the law as it now stood, striking out the words, would seem as if they meant to change the law by implication, and expose a man to the danger of more than one trial; many persons may be brought to trial for crimes they are guilty of, but for want of evidence may be acquitted; in such cases it is the universal practice in Great-Britain, and in this country, that persons shall not be brought to a second trial for the same offence, therefore the clause is proper as it stands.

Mr. Sedgwick thought, instead of securing the liberty of the subject, it would be abridging the privileges of those who were prosecuted.

The question on Mr. Benson's motion being put, was lost by a considerable majority.

Mr. Partridge moved to insert after "same offence," the words, "by any law of the United States;" this amendment was lost also.

Congressional Register, August 17, 1789, vol. 2, pp. 224–25.

8.2.1.2.b Eighth Amendment — "No person shall be subject, except in case of impeachment, to more than one trial or one punishment for the same offence, nor shall be compelled to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty or property, without due process of law, nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation."

Mr. Benson moved to strike out the words "One trial or"

This was negatived.

Mr. Partridge moved to insert after the words "same offence," the words "by any law of the United States," Resolved in the negative.

Mr. Lawrance moved to insert after the words "nor shall" these words "in any criminal case." This amendment was agreed to.

Daily Advertiser, August 18, 1789, p. 2, col. 4.

8.2.1.2.c Eighth amendment—"No person shall be subject, except in case of impeachment, to more than one trial or one punishment for the same offence, nor shall be compelled to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty or property, without due process of law, nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation."

Mr. Benson moved to strike out the words "one trial or."

This was negatived.

Mr. Partridge moved to insert after the words "same offence," the words "by any law of the United States." Resolved in the negative.

Mr. Lawrance moved to insert after the words "nor shall," these words, "in any criminal case."

This amendment was agreed to.

New-York Daily Gazette, August 19, 1789, p. 802, col. 4.

8.2.1.2.d 8th Amendment. "No person shall be subject, except in case of impeachment, to more than one trial for the same offence, nor shall be compelled to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty or property, without due process of law, nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation."

Mr. Benson observed, that it was certainly a fact, that a person might be tried more than once for the same offence: Instances of this kind frequently occured. He therefore moved to strike out the words "one trial or" This was negatived.

Mr. Sherman was in favor of the motion.

Mr. Livermore was opposed to it: He said: The clause appears to me essential; if it is struck out, it will hold up the idea that a person may be tried more than once for the same offence. Some instances of this kind have taken place; but they have caused great uneasiness: It is contrary to the usages of law and practice among us; and so it is to those of that country from which we have adopted our laws. I hope the clause will not be struck out.

Mr. Partridge moved to insert after the words "same offence," the words by any law of the United States," Negatived.

Mr. Laurance moved to insert after the words "nor shall" these words in any criminal case. This amendment was agreed to.

8.3 Discussion of Rights

8.3.1TREATISES

8.3.1.1Hale, 1736

CHAP. XXXII.

Concerning the plea of auterfoits attaint or convict of the same felony, or any other offense.

IF A. be indicted and convict of felony, but hath neither judgment of death, nor hath prayd his clergy, this is no bar of a new indictment for the same offense, if the first were insufficient. 4 Co. Rep. 45. a. Vauxe's case, and it seems, tho it were sufficient, yet it is no bar without clergy or judgment; but if he had his clergy allowd him, auterfoits convict and had his clergy is a good bar to an indictment, or an appeal for the same crime, and so remains at this day, notwithstanding the statute of 3 H. 7. cap. I. 4 Co. Rep. 40. a. 45. b. Wigg's case.

And so it is tho he prays his clergy, and the court will advise upon it, tho the clergy be not actually allowd.(*) 4 Co. Rep. 46. a. Holcroft's case. Co. P. C. cap. 57.

Auterfoits attaint de mesme felonie, tho upon an insufficient indictment, was at common law a bar to appeals, as well as indictments of the same offense. 4 Co. Rep. 45. a. Vauxe's case, and remains so still at this day in all cases but in appeals of death, which is alterd by the statute of 3 H. 7. cap. I.

If A. be attaint of felony by outlawry, yet, if he reverse the outlawry, he shall be put to answer the same felony, and plead to the indictment, whereof he was outlawd; but if he reverse the outlawry for this error, because he was auterfoits acquit for the same felony, (which, as before is said, is assignable for error,) he shall be discharged of the indictment, for it stands as well a plea to the indictment, as an error in the outlawry.

If A. be indicted of piracy and refusing to plead hath judgment of peine fort & dure, and by the general pardon piracies are excepted, but the judgment of peine fort & dure is pardond by the general words of all contempts, quaere, whether he may be arraigned for the same piracy, but by the better opinion he may be arraigned of any other piracy committed before that award. 14 Eliz. Dy. 308. a.

If A. be attaint of treason or felony by outlawry, yet he shall not be de novo indicted or appeald for the same felony till the outlawry be reversed, for auterfoits attaint of the same felony is a good plea. Co. P. C. 213.

Auterfoits attaint de murder is a good plea to an indictment of petit treason.

If A. had been indicted at common law of felony, and had judgment of death, yet he may notwithstanding his attainder be arraigned for treason committed before the felony for the advantage of the king, who is to have the escheat, but not for a treason committed after the felony. 1 H. 6. 5. b. Stamf. P. C. Lib. II. cap. 37. fol. 107. b. But in this my lord Coke differs from Stamford, and saith that for a treason committed after he shall be arraigned. Co. P. C. p. 213.[(a)]

If A. commit divers robberies, one upon B. another afterwards upon C. and afterwards another upon D. and they bring several appeals, and he be attaint at the suit of B. yet he shall be put to answer to the appeals of C. and D. for the benefit of the restitution of their goods. Stamf. ubi supra.

And if there be an indictment and attainder at the prosecution of B. yet quaere, whether after at the prosecution of C. he may not be put to answer an indictment at his prosecution to have benefit of restitution upon the statute of 21 H. 8. cap. II. Stamf. Lib. 3. cap. 10.

It seems in that case there may be an inquest of office to inquire of the robbery of C. so as to intitle him to restitution without arraigning the party upon the indictment of C.

If A. commit several felonies and be attaint for one of those felonies, and the king pardon that attainder and the felony, for which he was attaint, if he be after indicted or appeald for the same felony, he may plead his attainder, and it will be no good replication to say he was pardoned after.

But yet he may be indicted or appeald for the other felonies, and if he plead his former attainder, it is a good replication to say he was pardoned after, whereby he is now restored to be a person able to answer to those offenses. 6 H. 4. 6. b. 10 H. 4. Coron. 227. vide contra Co. P. C. p. 213.

And so if a person attaint commit a felony after, and be pardoned the first felony and attainder, yet he shall be put to answer the new felony. 6 H. 4. 6. b.

If A. commit several felonies and be convict for one of them, but no judgment of death nor clergy given him, he may be indicted for all those former felonies. Stamf. ubi supra.

But if he had been convict for any one felony, and prayd his clergy, and read and been deliverd to the ordinary, he should never be arraigned for any of those former felonies. And it seems by the better opinion, that if he had prayd his clergy, & tradito ei libro legit ut clericus, but no award of tradatur ordinario, yet he should not be arraigned for any felony committed before his clergy allowd, for it was the fault of the court, that they did not award tradatur ordinario. 4 Eliz. Dy. 211. b. Co. P. C. cap. 57.

And the reason is, because the statute of 25 E. 3. cap. 5. pro clero enacts, that he shall be arraigned of all his offenses together, and then deliverd to the ordinary, and therefore if once deliverd to the ordinary, all his capital offenses committed before are in effect discharged, and therefore at least before the prisoner departs from the bar after his clergy allowd, he must be indicted, or otherwise he is for ever discharged.

But for any felony committed after conviction and clergy allowd, he may be indicted and arraigned, but not if he stands attainted and unpardoned.

But at this day that old law concerning the discharge of offenses by clergy allowd is alterd.

By the statute of 8 Eliz. cap. 4. it is enacted, “That if any person admitted to his clergy shall before such his admission have committed any offense, whereupon clergy is not allowable by the laws and statutes of this realm, and not being thereof indicted and acquitted, convicted or attainted, or pardoned shall and may be indicted or appeald for the same, and put to answer, as if no such admission to clergy had been.”

And by the statute of 18 Eliz. cap. 7. delivery to the ordinary is taken away, and burning in the hand wholly substituted in lieu thereof, and that every person admitted to his clergy shall answer such felonies or offenses, as he should have done, if he had been deliverd to the ordinary and made his purgation.

So that now clergy doth discharge all offenses precedent within clergy, but not such other offenses, as are out of the benefit of clergy.

There remains one special kind of auterfoits acquit of another person, than he that pleads it, which I shall mention and so conclude this chapter.

The accessory upon his arraignment may plead the acquittal of the principal.

A gaoler arraigned for the voluntary escape of a prisoner for felony may plead the acquittal of the felon of the principal felony, and so may the rescuer arraigned upon an indictment for rescue of a felon, and that is the reason, that the gaoler and rescuer shall never be arraigned till the principal felon be tried and convicted, because if he be acquitted, the gaoler or rescuer cannot be guilty of felony.

If A. steal the goods of B. and break prison, A. may be arraigned for the felony of breaking the prison before the arraignment upon the principal felony, but if A. be arraigned upon the principal felony and acquitted before conviction of the felony for breaking the prison, A. may plead this acquittal, for hereby that felony is purged before his conviction, this was Mrs. Samford's case in Kent for stealing the goods of the earl of Leicester(*).

To conclude this whole matter of auterfoits acquit, convict or attaint these things are to be observed. 1. The party that pleads the record must plead it specially setting forth the record. 2. He must either shew the record sub pede sigilli, or have the record removed into the court, where it is pleaded by certiorari, or if it be a record of the same court must vouch the term, year and roll, for the record is part of his plea. 3. He must make averments, as the case shall require, as that he is the same person, that it is the same offense. 4. No issue shall be taken upon the plea of nul tiel record, because it is pleaded in court, but the king's attorney may have oyer of the record. 5. The averments are issuable. 6. If issue be taken upon them, they shall be tried by the jury, that is returned to try the prisoner by the statute of 22 H. 8. cap. 14. 7. He, that pleads these pleas, must also plead over not guilty to the felony, for if the pleas be adjudged against him, yet he shall be tried upon the not guilty.

8.3.1.2Hawkins, 1762

CHAP. XXXV.

Of the Plea of Autrefoits acquit.

PLeas in Chief are either,

1. In Bar, or

2. The General Issue.

As to the Pleas in Bar, having shewn already, Chap. 23. Sect. 190. What Pleas of this Kind to an Appeal are good, which shew that the Plaintiff had never any Right to bring it; and in Sections 131, 132, 133, where a Retraxit, Nonsuit, Discontinuance, or Abatement, of one Appeal may be pleaded in Bar of another; and in Section 134. Where the Bringing of an Appeal against one Person will be a Bar to a subsequent one against another Person not named in the First; and in Section 135. where a Release will bar an Appeal; and in Section 136. where anAppellant may be barred as to one Appellee, and continue his Suit against the Rest; and in Section 137. what Pleas of this Kind are consistent with the General Issue, and in Ch. 26. Sect. 64, 65. what is a good Plea in Bar to an Information; I shall in this Place only consider,

1. The Plea of Autrefoits acquit.
2. The Plea of Autrefoits attaint or convict.
3. The Plea of a Pardon.

Sect. 1. And first of the Plea of Autrefoits acquit, which is grounded on this Maxim, [a] That a Man shall not be brought into Danger of his Life for one and the same Offence, more than once. From whence it is generally taken, by all the Books, [b] as an undoubted Consequence, that where a Man is once found Not guilty on an Indictment or Appeal free [c] from Error, and [d] well commenced before any [e] which hath Jurisdiction of the Cause, he may by the Common Law in all [f] cases whatsoever Court ever plead such Acquittal in Bar of any subsequent Indictment or Appeal for the same Crime. But for the more distinct Understanding hereof I shall particularly consider,

1. How far he who pleads this plea must be ready to produce the Record of his former Acquittal.
2. Where a Variance between the Record of the former Acquittal and the Indictment or Appeal to which it is pleaded, may be helped.
3. How far other Discharges of a former Prosecution have the same Effect as an Acquittal by Verdict.
4. How far it is necessary that the Indictment or Appeal in the Record of Acquittal be free from Error, and well commenced.
5. Whether an Acquittal in any Court which has a Jurisdiction be sufficient for this Purpose.
6. How far an Acquittal of a Person as Principal will bar a subsequent Prosecution against him as Accessary; & e converso, how far an Acquittal of a Man as Accessary will bar a Prosecution against him as Principal. 7. How far the Law is altered in these Respects as to an Indictment of Death, by 3 H. 7. 1.

Sect. 2. As to the first Particular, viz. How far he who pleads this Plea must be ready to produce the Record of his formal Acquittal: I take it to be [a] agreed, that such Plea being a Plea in [b] Bar, and the Record not in the Custody of nor the Property of him that pleads it, there is no need to plead with a profert sub pede sigilli; but the Defendant shall have a [c] Day given him to bring it in. And there is in Brook a Note of a [d] Case in the Time of Edw. 3. wherein a Plea of Autrefoits acquit was disallowed, because the Defendant shewed forth the Record when he pleaded it; and the Book gives this Reason, That the Record ought to come before the Court by Writ.

Sect. 3. As to the second Particular, viz. Where a [e] Variance between the Record of the former Acquittal, and the Indictment or Appeal to which it is pleaded, may be helped: I take it to be clear, That if the Nature of the Crime be in [f] Substance the same, a Variance may generally be helped by proper [g] Averments. And therefore if a Man be named in the first Record Yeoman, and in the second Gentleman, yet it seems [h] clear, That he may make good the Variance, with an Averment that he only was meant under each Addition. Also if a Man be acquitted of an Indictment of Murder or Robbery cujusdam [i] ignoti, and afterwards arraigned on an Indictment for the same Fact, describing the Person killed or robbed by his proper Name; yet it hath been holden, [k] That he may plead the Acquittal in Bar, averring that both the Indictments are for the very same Felony. Also if the Person kill'd be described by his proper Name and Surname in the first Indictment, and by the same Christain but by a different Surname in the second, yet it hath been [l] adjudged, That he may plead an Acquittal on the first in Bar of the second Indictment, averring that the Person so differently named was one and the same Person. But it seems [m] adviseable in such Case to add a farther Averment, That the Person killed was known as well by the Name in the first, as by that in the second Indictment; for if he were never known by the Name in the first Indictment, I much question whether the Defendant could be found guilty upon it; and if he could not, it seems plain that his Life having never been in Danger by it, the Acquittal upon it [n] cannot be any Bar to a subsequent Indictment. But if there be no other Variance between the first and second Indictment but only as to the [o] Times when the Crime is alledged to have been committed, or as to the [p] Places being both in the same County, there is no Doubt but that regularly it may be helped by an Averment, that the Felony in both is one and the same, because neither the Time nor Place laid in an Indictment &c. are material upon Evidence, so that the Defendant be proved guilty at any other [a] Time before the Indictment, or at any other place [b] within the County. And it is holden by [c] Staundforde, that an Acquittal of Murder in one County may be pleaded in Bar of a subsequent Indictment in another County for the same Murder. But this seems questionable, because all Indictments are local; and therefore if the first were laid in an improper County, the Defendant could not be found guilty upon it, and consequently was in no Danger of his Life, and therefore [d] cannot plead an Acquittal upon it in Bar of a subsequent Indictment in the proper County: But if the first Indictment were in the proper County, the second cannot but be in an improper one, and consequently the Defendant not being liable to be found guilty upon it, cannot be said to be reduced by it to the Inconvenience of being twice brought into Danger of his Life for one and the same Offence, the Avoiding of which Inconvenience [e] seems the chief Inducement for which the Law allows the Plea of Autrefoits acquit.

Sect. 4. But if a Man steal Goods in one County, and then carry them into another, in which Case it is certain [f] that he may be indicted and found guilty in either, it seems very reasonable, that an Acquittal in the one County for such Stealing may [g] be pleaded in Bar of a subsequent Prosecution for the same Stealing in another County, because the Defendant may be altogether as well convicted in the one County, as in the other; and therefore if he could not bar the second Prosecution by the Acquittal on the first, his Life would be twice in Danger from that which is in Truth but one and the same Offence, and only considered as a new one by a mere Fiction or Construction of Law, which shall hardly [h] take Place against a Maxim made in Favour of Life. And as to the [i] Objection, That the Jurors of the one County can take no Manner of Conusance of what is done in the other, and consequently cannot try whether the Felony whereof the Party is indicted in the second County be the very same with that of which he is acquitted in the first, it may be answered, That it appears from the old Books, that anciently the Judges often satisfied themselves of the Truth of an Averment that the Offences in both Indictments were the same, by [k] Witnesses, or by an [l] Inquest of Office, without putting it to a Trial by Jury upon an issue joined, on the Denial thereof by the Prosecutor, which seems [m] to have been of later Years the usual Method. But granting, that it is to be tried by such Jury, I do not see how it follows, That because they cannot convict a Defendant upon Evidence of a Fact done out of their own County, therefore they cannot collaterally inquire whether an offence laid in their own County be in Substance the same with that done in another other, since it cannot be denied but that in Abundance of cases a Jury of one County may receive Evidence of Facts done in another. To which may be added, That in the Year-Book of 4 H. 7. 5. pl. [sic] which is the [n] Chief Authority for the contrary Opinion, it is admitted that an Acquittal of an Appeal of Larceny in the one County, may be pleaded in Bar of a subsequent Appeal in the other; because such an Appeal intitles the Plaintiff to a Restitution of the Goods, whereof being once barred he is barred for ever. But granting this to be a good Reason, which yet it seems difficult to make out, the very same may be said at this Day as to an Indictment, which since [a] 21 H. 8. 11. intitles the Prosecutor to a Restitution also. Besides, taking the Law as it stood formerly, why may not a Jury of one County try whether a Felony therein indicted, be the same whereon the Party was before acquitted in another County, in the Case of a second Indictment, as well as of a second Appeal?

Sect. 5. It seems [b] that it is no Plea to an Appeal of Larceny, That the Defendant hath been found Not guilty in an Action of Trespass brought against him by the same Plaintiff for the same Goods; for Larceny and Trespass are entirely different: Also it seems a general [c] Rule, That a Bar in an Action of an inferior Nature, will not bar another of a superior. Yet it seems, [d] That an Acquittal in an Indictment of Murder, will be a good Bar of an Indictment of Petit Treason, because both Offences are in Substance the same. But it is clear, That an Acquittal of one Felony is [e] no Manner of Bar to a Prosecution for another in Substance different, whether committed before or at the same Time with that of which he is acquitted; and therefore if a Man commit a Burglary, and steal the Goods of A. and B. and be indicted for the Burglary, and stealing the Goods of A. and acquitted; it hath been adjudged, [f] that he cannot plead such Acquittal to an Indictment for stealing the Goods of B. But it seems agreed, That he may plead it to a second Indictment for the Burglary.

Sect. 6. As to the third Particular, viz. How far other Discharges of a legal Prosecution have the same Effect as an Acquittal by Verdict: Having shewn already in the [g] Chapter of Appeals, how far the Discharge of one Appeal will Bar another, I shall only add in this Place, That notwithstanding the [h] Allowance of a Pardon, or any other Bar of one Indictment, seems to be pleadable in Bar of another, and by the like Reason whatever hath been allowed a good Bar of one Appeal may be pleaded in Bar of another: Yet it seems that no other Discharge of an Indictment will bar an Appeal, and no other Discharge of an Appeal will bar an Indictment, but only an [i] Acquittal by Battel, or an Acquittal by Verdict on the general Issue, finding the Defendant's [k] Innocence; as where it finds him Not guilty on such an Issue, on an Indictment or Appeal of any Felony whatsoever; or where it finds [l] him guilty of Homicide se defendendo, or per infortunium, on an Indictment of Murder. But it hath been adjudged, [m] That where a Demurrer by an Appellant to a Tender of Battel, or to a Plea, hath been adjudged against him, yet the Appellee may be afterwards arraigned at the Suit of the King.

Sect. 7. It is said by Sir Matthew Hale in the [n] Chapter of Autrefoits acquit, That an Acquittal by Battel in an Appeal is no Bar of an Indictment. But I find no other Authority to this Point but a Note in Fitzherbert [o] of a Case to this Purpose in the Time of King Edward the Second. To which it may be answered, That this Matter is only spoken of incidentally, and not adjudged. And the Staunforde in the same Place [p] where he cites it, makes a Quaere, whether it be Law or not. And it is expresly holden by Bracton, [q] That an Appellee who vanquishes the Appellant in Battel, shall go quit not only from all other Appeals, but also from the Suit of the King; because by this he clears his Innocence against all, in the same Manner, as if he had put himself upon his Country, and his Country had acquitted him. Also it is admitted by Sir Matthew Hale in the [a] Chapter of Indictments, That if an Approver be vanquished in Battel joined on his Appeal, he shall be hanged, and the Appellee discharged, without being arraigned at the Suit of the King. Also it hath been [b] adjudged, That upon such a Vanquishment the Appellee is intitled to his Damages against the Appellant, as being legitimo modo acquietatus, which seems [c] necessarily to imply that he is finally acquitted as well against the King as against the Party.

Sect. 8. As to the fourth Particular, viz. How far it is necessary that the Indictment or Appeal in the Record of Acquittal be free from Error and well commenced: I take it to be settled [d] at this Day, [e] That where-ever the Indictment, or Appeal, whereon a Man is acquitted, is so far erroneous (either for want of Substance in setting out the Crime or of Authority in the [f] Judge before whom it was taken,) that no good Judgment could have been given upon it against the Defendant, the Acquittal can be no Bar of a subsequent Indictment or Appeal, because in Judgment of Law the Defendant was never in Danger of his Life from the first; for the Law will presume prima facie that the Judges would not have given a Judgment, which would have been liable to have been reversed. But if there be no Error in the Indictment or Appeal, but [g] only in the Process, it seems agreed, That the Acquittal will be a good Bar of a subsequent Prosecution, notwithstanding such Error; the best Reason whereof seems to be this, That such Error is [h] salved by the Appearance.

Sect. 9. It seems agreed, [i] That an Acquittal on an Appeal brought by one who had no Right to bring it, as by any other woman except the Wife of the deceased, or by any other Man [k] except the next Heir, is no more a Bar to an Appeal by another Appellant, or to an Indictment, than an Acquittal on an insufficient Appeal or Indictment would have been.

Sect. 10. As to the fifth Particular, viz. Whether an Acquittal in any Court which has a Jurisdiction, be sufficient for this Purpose: Notwithstanding the [m] Opinion in the Book of Assises, That no Acquittal in any other Court can be any Bar to a Prosecution in the Court of King's Bench, because that is the Highest Court, I take it to be settled [n] at this Day, That an Acquittal in any Court whatsoever, which has a Jurisdiction of the Cause, is as good a Bar of any subsequent Prosecution for the same Crime, as an Acquittal in the Highest Court. And therefore, it hath been adjudged, [o] That an Acquittal of Murder at a Grand Sessions in Wales, may be pleaded to an Indictment for the same Murder in England. For the [p] Rule is, That a Man's Life shall not be brought into Danger for the same Offence more than once.

Sect. 11. As to the sixth Particular, viz. How far an Acquittal of a Person as Principal will bar a subsequent Prosecution against him as Accessary; & è converso, how far an Acquittal of a Man as Accessary will bar a Prosecution against him as Principal: It seems to be [a] settled at this [b] Day, That an Acquittal of a Man as Principal is no Bar of a subsequent Prosecution against him as Accessary after the Fact, because such Acquittal clears him only of the Charge of having committed the Fact, which being a Crime entirely different from that of receiving him that hath committed it, there seems no more Reason that the Acquittal of it should Bar a Prosecution for the Receipt, than if they were Offences that bore no manner of Relation to one another. But it is [c] holden in many Books of good Authority, (contrary to what is admitted [d] to have been the ancient Law,) that the Acquittal of a Man as Principal is a good Bar of a subsequent Prosecution against him as Accessary before; for it is said, That such an Accessary is in some Measure [e] guilty of the Fact, and therefore that an Acquittal which clears a Man from being guilty of the Fact, doth by Consequence clear him from being such an Accessary. And this seems reasonable upon the Supposition that a Man may be found guilty of an Indictment against him as Principal, upon Evidence which only proves him to have been an Accessary before. But if a Man cannot be found guilty of such an Indictment upon such Evidence, as it is strongly [f] holden that he cannot, it may with great Reason be said, that the Acquittal of him as Principal no way acquits him as Accessary before; for if so, he might save himself by a mere Slip in the Indictment, and bar all other Prosecutions by an Acquittal on a Trial, which in Truth never brought him into [g] Danger of his Life. And it is upon this Supposition, as I suppose, that it is holden in some [h] Books, contrary to those abovecited, that one who has been acquitted as Principal may be tried again as Accessary before, as well as after.

Sect. 12. But it seems [i] agreed, That an Acquittal of a Man as Accessary before, or after, is no Bar to a subsequent Prosecution against him as Principal.

Sect. 13. Also it hath been holden, that an Acquittal of a Man as Accessary to one Principal, will not save him from being arraigned afterwards as Accessary to another in the same Fact; but for this I shall refer to Chap. 29. Sect. 46.

Sect. 14. As to the seventh Particular, viz. How far the Law is altered in these Respects as to an Indictment by 3 H. 7. 1. It seem agreed, [k] That by the Common Law an Acquittal on an Indictment might be pleaded in Bar of an Appeal of Death, in the same Manner as an Acquittal of any other Felony might be pleaded in Bar of a subsequent Prosecution, and therefore in Favour of Appeals a general Practice was introduced, [l] not to try any Person on an Indictment of Death, till after the Year and Day had been passed, by which Time it often happened that all was forgotten; and for Reformation thereof it is enacted, That if any Man be slain or Murdered, and thereof the Slayers, Murderers, Abettors, Maintainers and Comforters of the same, be indicted, that the same Slayers and Murderers, and all other Accessaries of the same, be arraigned and determined of the same Felony and Murder at any Time at the King's Suit, within the Year after the same Felony and Murder done and not tarry the Year and Day for any Appeal to be taken for the same Felony or Murder. And if it happen any Person named as Principal or Acessory to be acquitted of any such Murder at the King's Suit, within the Year and Day, that then the same Justices afore whom he is acquitted, shall not suffer him to go at large, but [a] either to remit him again to the Prison, or else to let him to Bail after their Discretion till that Year and Day be passed. And if it fortune the same Felons or Murderers, and Accessaries so arraigned or any of them to be acquit, or the Principal of the said Felony, or any of them to be attained, the Wife or next Heir to him so slain, as shall require, may take and have their Appeal of the same Death and Murder, within the Year and Day after the same Felony and Murder done, against the said Persons so arraigned and acquit, and all other their Accessaries, or against the Accessaries of the said Principal, or any of them so attainted, or against the said Principals so attained, if they be on live, and the Benefit of his Clergy thereof before not had; and that the Appellant shall have such and like Advantage, as if the said Acquittal or Attainder had not been, the said Acquittal or Attainder notwithstanding.[b]

Sect. 15. It seems [c] agreed, That this Statute shall not be construed to extend to any other Appeal, but of Death, nor to any other Acquittal but upon an Indictment; from whence it follows, That an Acquittal on an Indictment, or Appeal, for any other [d] Felony except Death, may still be pleaded in Bar of an Appeal for the same Crime, and that an Acquittal on an Appeal of Death [e] may still be pleaded in Bar of an Indictment, in the same Manner as by the Common Law.

Sect. 16. How far a Person found guilty of Manslaughter, or of Homicide se defendendo, on an Indictment of Murder, is liable to be tried again upon an Appeal by Force of this Statute, shall be considered in the next Chapter.

IV. Special pleas in bar; which go to the merits of the indictment, and give a reason why the prisoner ought not to answer it at all, nor put himself upon his trial for the crime alleged. These are of four kinds: a former acquittal, a former conviction, a former attainder, or a pardon. There are many other pleas, which may be pleaded in bar of an appeal [i] : but these are applicable to both appeals and indictments.

1. First, the plea of auterfoits acquit, or a former acquittal, is grounded on this universal maxim of the common law of England, that no man is to be brought into jeopardy of his life, more than once, for the same offence. And hence it is allowed as a consequence, that when a man is once fairly found not guilty upon any indictment, or other prosecution, he may plead such acquittal in bar of any subsequent accusation for the same crime. Therefore an acquittal on an appeal is a good bar to an indictment of the same offence. And so also was an acquittal on an indictment a good bar to an appeal, by the common law [k] : and therefore, in favour of appeals, a general practice was introduced, not to try any person on an indictment of homicide, till after the year and day, within which appeals may be brought, were past; by which time it often happened that the witnesses died, or the whole was forgotten. To remedy which inconvenience, the statute 3 Hen. VII. c. 1. enacts, that indictments shall be proceeded on, immediately, at the king's suit, for the death of a man, without waiting for bringing an appeal; and that the plea, of auterfoits acquit on an indictment, shall be no bar to the prosecuting of any appeal.

2. Secondly, the plea of auterfoits convict, or a former conviction for the same identical crime, though no judgment was ever given, or perhaps will be, (being suspended by the benefit of clergy or other causes) is a good plea in bar to an indictment. And this depends upon the same principle as the former, that no man ought to be twice brought in danger of his life for one and the same crime [l]. Hereupon it has been held, that a conviction of manslaughter, on an appeal, is a bar even in another appeal, and much more in an indictment, of murder; for the fact prosecuted is the same in both, though the offences differ in colouring and in degree. It is to be observed, that the pleas of auterfoits acquit, and auterfoits convict, or a former acquittal, and former conviction, must be upon a prosecution for the same identical act and crime. But the case is otherwise, in

3. Thirdly, the plea of auterfoits attaint, or former attainder; which is a good plea in bar, whether it be for the same or any other felony. For wherever a man is attainted of felony [m], by judgment of death either upon a verdict or confession, by outlawry, or heretofore by abjuration; and whether upon an appeal or an indictment; he may plead such attainder in bar to any subsequent indictment or appeal, for the same or for any other felony. And this because, generally, such proceeding on a second prosecution cannot be to any purpose; for the prisoner is dead in law by the first attainder, his blood is already corrupted, and he hath forfeited all that he had: so that it is absurd and superfluous to endeavour to attaint him a second time. But to this general rule however, as to all others, there are some exceptions; wherein, cessante ratione, cessat et ipsa lex. As, 1. Where the former attainder is reversed for error, for then it is the same as if it had never been. And the same reason holds, where the attainder is reversed by parliament, or the judgment vacated by the king's pardon, with regard to felonies committed afterwards. 2. Where the attainder was upon indictment, such attainder is no bar to an appeal: for the prior sentence is pardonable by the king; and if that might be pleaded in bar of the appeal, the king might in the end defeat the suit of the subject, by suffering the prior sentence to stop the prosecution of a second, and then, when the time of appealing is elapsed, granting the delinquent a pardon. 3. An attainder in felony is no bar to an indictment of treason: because not only the judgment and manner of death are different, but the forfeiture is more extensive, and the land goes to different persons. 4. Where a person attainted of one felony, as robbery, is afterwards indicted as principal in another, as murder, to which there are also accessories, prosecuted at the same time; in this case it is held, that the plea of auterfoits attaint is no bar, but he shall be compelled to take his trial, for the sake of public justice: because the accessories to such second felony cannot be convicted till after the conviction of the principal. And from these instances we may collect that the plea of auterfoits attaint is never good, but when a second trial would be quite superfluous.

8.3.2CASE LAW

8.3.2.1Respublica v. Shaffer, 1788

AFTER some conversation with the Grand Inquest, the Attorney General informed the court, that a list of eleven persons had been presented to him by the Foreman, with a request, that they might be qualified and sent to the jury, as witnesses upon a bill then depending before them. He stated that the list had been made out by the defendant's bail: that the persons named were intended to furnish testimony in favor of the party charged, upon facts with which the Inquest, of their own knowledge, were unacquainted; and he concluded with requesting, that the opinion of the court might be given upon this application. The Chief Justice, accordingly, addressed the Grand Jury to the following effect:

M'KEAN, Chief Justice.—Were the proposed examination of witnesses, on the part of the Defendant, to be allowed, the long-established rules of law and justice would be at an end. It is a matter well known, and well understood, that by the laws of our country, every question which affects a man's life, reputation, or property, must be tried by twelve of his peers; and that their unanimous verdict is, alone, competent to determine the fact in issue. If, then, you undertake to inquire, not only upon what foundation the charge is made, but, likewise, upon what foundation it is denied, you will, in effect, usurp the jurisdiction of the Petit Jury, you will supersede the legal authority of the court, in judging of the competency and admissibility of witnesses, and, having thus undertaken to try the question, that question may be determined by a bare majority, or by a much greater number of your body, than the twelve peers prescribed by the law of the land. This point has, I believe, excited some doubts upon former occasions; but those doubts have never arisen in the mind of any lawyer, and they may easily be removed by a proper consideration of the subject. For, the bills, or presentments, found by a grand Jury, amount to nothing more than an official accusation, in order to put the party accused upon his trial; 'till the bill is returned, there is, therefore, no charge from which he can be required to exculpate himself; and we know that many persons, against whom bills were returned, have been afterwards acquitted by a verdict of their country. Here, then, is the just line of discrimination: It is the duty of the Grand-Jury to enquire into the nature and probable grounds of the charge; but it is the exclusive province of the Petit Jury, to hear and determine, with the assistance, and under the direction of the court, upon points of law, whether the Defendant is, or is not guilty, on the whole evidence, for, as well as against, him. —— You will therefore, readily perceive, that if you examine the witnesses on both sides, you do not confine your consideration to the probable grounds of charge, but engage completely in the trial of the cause; and your return must, consequently, be tantamount to a verdict of acquittal or condemnation. But this would involve us in another difficulty; for, by the law, it is declared, that no man shall be twice put in jeopardy for the same offence: and, yet, it is certain, that the enquiry now proposed by the Grand Jury, would necessarily introduce the oppression of a double trial. Nor is it merely upon maxims of law, but, I think, likewise, upon principles of humanity, that this innovation should be opposed. Considering the bill as an accusation grounded entirely upon the testimony in support of the prosecution, the Petit Jury receive no biass [sic] from the sanction which the indorsement of the Grand Jury has conferred upon it.—But, on the other hand, would it not, in some degree, prejudice the most upright mind against the Defendant, that on a full hearing of his defence, another tribunal had pronounced it insufficient?—which would then be the natural inference from every true bill. Upon the whole, the court is of opinion, that it would be improper and illegal to examine the witnesses, on behalf of the Defendant, while the charge against him lies before the Grand-Jury.

One of the Grand Inquest then observed to the court, that "there was a clause in the qualifications of the Jurors, upon which he, and some of his brethren, wished to hear the interpretation of the Judges—to wit—what is the legal acceptation of the words "diligently to enquire?" To this the Chief Justice replied, that "the expression meant, diligently to enquire into the circumstances of the charge, the credibility of the witnesses who support it, and, from the whole, to judge whether the person accused ought to be put upon his trial. For, (he added), though it would be improper to determine the merits of the cause, it is incumbent upon the Grand Jury to satisfy their minds, by a diligent enquiry, that there is a probable ground for the accusation, before they give it their authority, and call upon the Defendant to make a public defence."

9.1.2.1New York, July 26, 1788

That (except in the Government of the Land and Naval Forces, and of the Militia when in actual Service, and in cases of Impeachment) a Presentment or Indictment by a Grand Jury ought to be observed as a necessary preliminary to the trial of all Crimes cognizable by the Judiciary of the United States, and such Trial should be speedy, public, and by an impartial Jury of the County where the Crime was committed; and that no person can be found Guilty without the unanimous consent of such Jury. But in cases of Crimes not committed within any County of any of the United States, and in Cases of Crimes committed within any County in which a general Insurrection may prevail, or which may be in the possession of a foreign Enemy, the enquiry and trial may be in such County as the Congress shall by Law direct; which County in the two Cases last mentioned should be as near as conveniently may be to that County in which the Crime may have been committed. And that in all Criminal Prosecutions, the Accused ought to be informed of the cause and nature of his Accusation, to be confronted with his accusers and the Witnesses against him, to have the means of producing his Witnesses, and the assistance of Council for his defence, and should not be compelled to give Evidence against himself.

9.2.1.2.a Mr. Lawrance

Said this clause contained a general declaration, in some degree contrary to laws passed, he alluded to that part where a person shall not be compelled to give evidence against himself; he thought it ought to be confined to criminal cases, and moved an amendment for that purpose, which amendment being adopted, the clause as amended was unanimously agreed to by the committee. . . .

9.2.2STATE CONVENTIONS

9.2.2.1Massachusetts, January 30, 1788

. . . Mr. HOLMES. Mr. President, I rise to make some remarks on the paragraph under consideration, which treats of the judiciary power.

On the whole, when we fully consider this matter, and fully investigate the powers granted, explicitly given, and specially delegated, we shall find Congress possessed of powers enabling them to institute judicatories little less inauspicious than a certain tribunal in Spain, which has long been the disgrace of Christendom: I mean that diabolical institution, the Inquisition.

What gives an additional glare of horror to these gloomy circumstances is the consideration, that Congress have to ascertain, point out, and determine, what kind of punishments shall be inflicted on persons convicted of crimes. They are nowhere restrained from inventing the most cruel and unheard-of punishments, and annexing them to crimes; and there is no constitutional check on them, but that racks and gibbets may be amongst the most mild instruments of their discipline.

There is nothing to prevent Congress from passing laws which shall compel a man, who is accused or suspected of a crime, to furnish evidence against himself, and even from establishing laws which shall order the court to take the charge exhibited against a man for truth, unless he can furnish evidence of his innocence.

I do not pretend to say that Congress will do this; but, sir, I undertake to say that Congress (according to the powers proposed to be given them by the Constitution) may do it; and if they do not, it will be owing entirely—I repeat it, it will be owing entirely—to the goodness of the men, and not in the least degree owing to the goodness of the Constitution.

Elliot, vol. 2, pp. 109, 111.

9.2.2.2Virginia, June 14, 1788

Mr. GEORGE NICHOLAS, in answer to the two gentlemen last up, observed that, though there was a declaration of rights in the government of Virginia, it was no conclusive reason that there should be one in this Constitution; for, if it was unnecessary in the former, its omission in the latter could be no defect.

But sir, this Constitution is defective because the common law is not declared to be in force! What would have been the consequence if it had? It would be immutable. But now it can be changed or modified as the legislative body may find necessary for the community. But the common law is not excluded. There is nothing in that paper to warrant the assertion. As to the exclusion of a jury from the vicinage, he has mistaken the fact. The legislature may direct a jury to come from the vicinage. But the gentleman says that, by this Constitution, they have power to make laws to define crimes and prescribe punishments; and that, consequently, we are not free from torture. Treason against the United States is defined in the Constitution, and the forfeiture limited to the life of the person attainted. Congress have power to define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and offences against the laws of nations; but they cannot define or prescribe the punishment of any other crime whatever, without violating the Constitution. If we had no security against torture but our declaration of rights, we might be tortured tomorrow; for it has been repeatedly infringed and disregarded. A bill of rights is only an acknowledgment of the preëxisting claim to rights in the people. They belong to us as much as if they had been inserted in the Constitution. But it is said that, if it be doubtful, the possibility of dispute ought to be precluded. Admitting it was proper for the Convention to have inserted a bill of rights, it is not proper here to propose it as the condition of our accession to the Union. Would you reject this government for its omission, dissolve the Union, and bring miseries on yourselves and posterity? I hope the gentleman does not oppose it on this ground solely. Is there another reason? He said that it is not only the general wish of this state, but all the states, to have a bill of rights. If it be so, where is the difficulty of having this done by way of subsequent amendment? We shall find the other states willing to accord with their own favorite wish. The gentleman last up says that the power of legislation includes every special power of legislation. Therefore, it does not contain that plenitude of power which he imagines. They cannot legislate in any case but those particularly enumerated. No gentleman, who is a friend to the government, ought to withhold his assent from it for this reason.

Mr. GEORGE MASON replied that the worthy gentleman was mistaken in his assertion that the bill of rights did not prohibit torture; for that one clause expressly provided that no man can give evidence against himself; and that the worthy gentleman must know that, in those countries where torture is used, evidence was extorted from the criminal himself. Another clause of the bill of rights provided that no cruel and unusual punishments shall be inflicted; therefore, torture was included in the prohibition.

Mr. NICHOLAS acknowledged the bill of rights to contain that prohibition, and that the gentleman was right with respect to the practice of extorting confession from the criminal in those countries where torture is used; but still he saw no security arising from the bill of rights as separate from the Constitution, for that it had been frequently violated with impunity.

9.2.4NEWSPAPERS AND PAMPHLETS

9.2.4.1Brutus, No. 2, November 1, 1787

For the security of life, in criminal prosecutions, the bill of rights of most of the States have declared, that no man shall be held to answer for a crime until he is made fully acquainted with the charge brought against him; he shall not be held to accuse, or furnish evidence against himself — The witnesses against him shall be brought face to face, and he shall be fully heard by himself and counsel. That it is essential to the security of life and liberty that trial of facts be in the vicinity where they happen. Are not provisions of this kind as necessary in the general government, as in that of a particular state? The powers vested in the new Congress extend in many cases to life; they are authorised to provide for the punishment of a variety of capital crimes, and no restraint is laid upon them in its exercise, save only, that "the trial of all crimes, except incases of impeachment, shall be by jury; and such trial shall be in the state where the said crimes shall have been committed."

9.2.4.2The Federal Farmer, No. 6, December 25, 1787

The following, I think, will be allowed to be unalienable or fundamental rights in the United States: —

No man, demeaning himself peaceably, shall be molested on account of his religion or mode of worship — The people have a right to hold and enjoy their property according to known standing laws, and which cannot be taken from them without their consent, or the consent of their representatives; and whenever taken in the pressing urgencies of government, they are to receive a reasonable compensation for it — Individual security consists in having free recourse to the laws — The people are subject to no laws or taxes not assented to by their representatives constitutionally assembled — They are at all times intitled to the benefits of the writ of habeas corpus, the trial by jury in criminal and civil causes — They have a right, when charged, to a speedy trial in the vicinage; to be heard by themselves or counsel, not to be compelled to furnish evidence against themselves, to have witnesses face to face, and to confront their adversaries before the judge — No man is held to answer a crime charged upon him till it be substantially described to him; and he is subject to no unreasonable searches or seizures of his person, papers or effects — The people have a right to assemble in an orderly manner, and petition the government for a redress of wrongs — The freedom of the press ought not to be restrained — No emoluments, except for actual service — No hereditary honors, or orders of nobility, ought to be allowed — The military ought to be subordinate to the civil authority, and no soldier be quartered on the citizens without their consent — The militia ought always to be armed and disciplined, and the usual defence of the country — The supreme power is in the people, and power delegated ought to return to them at stated periods, and frequently — The legislative, executive, and judicial powers, ought always to be kept distinct — others perhaps might be added.

THE Justices may examine Witnesses upon Oath; and by Virtue of the Statute of 2 & 3 Ph. & Mar. they may examine the Felon likewise, but not on Oath. H. P. C. 292.

This Examination must be in Writing, and it must be * certified to the next Assizes, or else the Justice may be fined by the Judge.[4]

It may be given in † Evidence at the Trial, but 'tis not sufficient to convict, unless the Accused confess at the Trial; yet Dalton mentions a Conviction upon it without any further Evidence.[5]

And yet in the Case of Tony Philips and Stubbs, who were indicted for High Treason, it was resolved by all the Judges, That if a Traitor is examined before a Justice of Peace, or Privy Counsellor, and confesseth the Treason, and should afterwards deny it at his Trial ; yet two Witnesses, who can prove such Confession, are good Evidence against the Party himself, who made it at his Examination, but not against any other Person whom he then accused ; and that in such Case there needs not two Witnesses to prove the Criminal guilty of Treason.

So in my Lord Morley's Case it was held, That if Witnesses examined before the Coroner were dead, or unable to travel, and Oath made thereof, such Examination might be read, the Coroner making Oath, That they are the same, and not altered.

Several Persons conspir'd, &c. to pull down Enclosures, and to provide Armour, &c. and to go to London and join with more ; and this they confessed on Examination : The Question was, Whether they should be arraigned for this Offence, because they had confessed it already? And it was held they should, and that their Confession before the Arraignment might be given in Evidence against them. If upon Examination the Felon confesseth the Fact, the Justice should take his Name subscribed to his Confession.[6]

And such Confession may be given in Evidence with an Oath, before whom it was made.[7]

Examination taken in one County, may be certified in another.

The Felon may be examined before he is committed, but not upon Oath, because nemo debet seipsum accusare.

His Examination, as well as that of the Witnesses, must be certified by the Justice to the next Assizes.

CHAP. XXX.
Of standing Mute.

HAVING shewn in what Manner a Prisoner is to be arraigned, I am in the next Place to examine in what Manner he is to he dealt with afterwards; and to that End shall endeavour to shew what is to be done with him,

1. Upon his standing Mute.
2. Upon his Confession.
3. Upon his Pleading.

And first as to the Prisoner's standing Mute I shall consider,

1. Where he shall be said to stand Mute.
2. How it shall be tried whether he do so of Malice, or by the Act of God.
3. What shall be done where one is found to stand Mute by the Act of God.
4. Where he who stands Mute shall be awarded to the same Execution as if he had not stood Mute, and where he shall be adjudged to his Penance.
5. What is the Nature of such Penance.
6. What he shall forfeit, and to whom.
7. Whether the Prosecutor of an Indictment of Appeal of Larceny be entitled to a Restitution of the Goods stolen, upon the Defendant's standing Mute.
8. Where one that stands Mute shall have the Benefit of Clergy.

Sect. 1. As to the first Point, viz. In what Cases a Man shall be said to stand Mute : I take it to be agreed, That he who answers impertinently, or ineffectually, or refuses to put himself upon his Trial in such Manner as the Law directs, may as properly be said to stand Mute as he who makes no Answer at all; as where a Man [a] refuses to plead a Plea in Chief, or the General Issue, but insists on some frivolous Defence, or even to plead a good [b] dilatory Plea, and refuses to plead over to the Felony, in which Case after such a Plea is found against him, he shall not [c] be admitted to plead in Chief, but shall be adjudged to his Penance in the same Manner as if he had made no Plea at all. And so shall he be who pleads a good Plea in Chief, or the General Issue, but [a] refuseth to put himself upon the Inquest (that is, to tried by God and his Country if a Commoner, or by God and his [b] Peers, if a Lord) or to wage Battle where such Trial is [c] allowed.[8]

Sect. 2. It seems to be holden in the [d] second Institute, and also in the latter Part of Sir Matthew Hale's Pleas of the [e] Crown, That if a Prisoner on his Trial peremptorily challenge above the Number allowed him by Law, he shall not be dealt with as one that stands Mute, but shall be hanged ; But this very Point is made a Quaere in another [f] Part of Hale's Pleas if the Crown ; and also in [g] Kelynge, and the Contrary is holden in the third [h] Institute : Neither does it seem easy to assign a Reason why he who challenges more Jurors than he ought, shall, in Respect of an implied Refusal of a legal Trial, be thought worthy if a greater Punishment than he who obstinately, directly, and expressly refused it. To which may be added, That there seems to be but one [i] full Authority in the Old Books for the Maintenance of this Opinion, whereas there is a great [k] Number of the other Side.[9]

Sect. 3. But it is clear, [l] That he who demurs in Law to an Indictment or Appeal, shall not be esteemed to stand Mute, nor be dealt with as such, as having refused a Trial by his Country, for he puts himself upon a Trial by the Court, which is the proper Trial of a Matter in Law.[10]

Sect. 4. Also it seems clear, That after a Man hath [m] confessed himself guilty, or pleaded, and put himself upon his [n] Country, he shall not afterwards be demeaned as one that stands Mute, in Respect of his subsequent Silence : But the Jury shall be charged, and the Trial shall proceed, and the like Judgment shall be given as in Common Case.[11]

Sect. 5. As to the second Point, viz. In what Cases, and in what Manner it shall be tried, whether one who stands Mute do so of Malice, or of the Act of God : It seems agreed, [o] That where a Prisoner wholly stands Mute without making any Answer at all, the Court shall take an Inquest of Office by the Oath of any [p] twelve Persons that [q] happen to be present, whether he do so of Malice, or by the Act of God. But [r] after an Issue hath been joined, if the Prisoner stand Mute when the Jury are in Court, if there be any Need for such Inquiry, it shall be made by them, and not by an Inquest of Office.[12]

Sect. 6. Where [s] a Man answers, but not effectually, it seems needless to make any Inquiry whether his Refusal be owing to his Malice or not, because it is apparent.[13]

Sect. 7. As to the third Point, viz. What shall be done where one is found to stand Mute by the Act of God : It is agreed, [t] That in such a Case, the Judges of the Court, (who are always to be of Counsel with the Prisoner, to see that he have Law and Justice) shall not only cause the Felony to be enquired of, but also whether the Prisoner be the same Person, and all other Matters which he might have pleaded in his Defence. And such Inquiry shall be made, as I suppose, not by an Inquest of Office, but by a Jury returned by the Sheriff in the same Manner as if the Defendant had actually pleaded ; for since it is no way his Fault that he did not so plead, there is no Reason why his Trial should be in a more loose and summary Manner, or any way less regular, or solemn, than if he had. To which may be added, That Sir Matthew Hale saith, [a] That the Felony shall be enquired of, &c. in the same Manner as if the Prisoner had pleaded Not guilty ; from which Words it seems plain, That in his Opinion the Inquiry ought to be an Inquest returned by the Sheriff as in other Trials at the Mise of the parties, because if the Defendant had pleaded, it must certainly have been so. And therefore it seems reasonable, That where Sir William Staundeforde [b] having spoken of such Inquiry, adds immediately, That it is but an Inquest of Office, ought to be understood, not of the Inquiry of the Felony, whereof he had last spoken, but of the Inquiry whether the Prisoner stood Mute of Malice, or by the Act of God, whereof he had spoken in the Sentence next before. And I the rather incline to think that this is his Meaning, because the [c] Books cited by him, to this Point, relate to this Inquiry only.[14]

As to the fourth Point, viz. in what Cases he that stands Mute shall be awarded to the same Execution as if he had not stood Mute, and where he shall be adjudged to his Penance, I shall consider,

1. What shall be done to him who stands Mute after an Attainder.
2. What to a Person arraigned for High Treason.
3. What to one arraigned for Petit Larceny.

4. What to one arraigned for a Felony by Statute.
5. What to one arraigned upon an Appeal.
6. What to one indicted of a Capital Felony, or Petit Treason.

Sect. 8. As to the first Particular, viz. What is to be done to him who stands Mute after an Attainder : It seems to be settled [d] at this Day, That where-ever one who is attainted, either by Judgment on a Verdict, or Confession, or by Outlawry, or Abjuration, stands Mute to the Demand why Execution should not go against him, he shall not be awarded to his Penance, but to the same kind of Execution, if any, that would have been awarded, if he had not stood Mute. Yet there seems to be this Difference, That where one who hath always continued in Prison, after an Attainder by Verdict or Confession, stands Mute to the Demand why Execution should not go, it shall be awarded [e] against him, without any Inquiry whether he stand Mute by Malice, or otherwise, or whether he be the same Person who is so attained or not ; because it sufficiently appears that he is the same Person, and that is sufficient to justify an Award of Execution against him, where nothing appears to the contrary. But if a Person so attainted, be retaken after an Escape; or if one be taken after an Outlawry or Abjuration, and stand Mute to the Demand, Why Execution should not go against him? It shall be inquired, whether he stand Mute of Malice, or of the Act of God, and if it be found of Malice it seems that Execution shall be awarded without any farther Inquiry: [f] But if it be found to be of the Act of God, it seems That it ought to be also inquired, whether he be the same Person or not, in the same Manner as where one stands Mute by the Act of God, when first brought upon his Trial.[15]

Sect. 9. As to the second Point, viz. What is to be done to one who stands Mute to an Arraignment for High Treason : It is clearly settled [a] at this Day, That standing Mute upon an Arraignment for High Treason is equivalent to a Conviction by Verdict, or Confession, and consequently subjects the Criminal to the same Kind of Judgment and Execution as such a Conviction would do. But I take it for granted, That such standing Mute must in [b] like manner appear to be obstinate ; and that if it be found to be the Act of God, the whole Matter shall in like Manner [c] be inquired of, as hath been more fully shewn in the former Part of this Chapter. But where such Person appears to stand obstinately Mute, I do not find it any where holden, that there is any Necessity that he probably appear to be Guilty, or that any Evidence be examined to prove him so, before he shall be condemned or executed. But this is advisable, where one stands obstinately Mute on an

Arraignment for Felony by Statute, as shall be more fully shewn in the fourteenth and fifteenth Sections.[16]

Sect. 10. As to the third Particular, viz. What is to be done to one who stands Mute to an Arraignment for Petit Larceny : I take it to be agreed, [d] That if a Man appear to stand obstinately Mute on an Arraignment for Petit Larceny, he shall have the like Judgment, &c. as if he had confessed the Indictment.[17]

Sect. 11. As to the fourth Particular, viz. What is to be done to those who stand Mute to an Arraignment for felony by Statute ; It is expressly enacted by 33 H. 8. 12. Par. 12. That if a Person indicted, and arraigned of Treason, Misprision of Treason, Murder, Manslaughter, or Bloodshed, &c. against that Act, within the Verge of the Court, shall obstinately refuse to answer directly, or shall stand Mute, he shall have the like Judgment, &c. as if he were found Guilty, &c. But [e] where a Statute, as that of Piracy, &c. ordains a Trial by the Common Course of the law, it hath been adjudged, That the Criminal shall have Judgment of his Penance &c. as in other Felonies.[18]

Sect. 12. As to the fifth particular, viz. What is to be done to one who stands Mute to an Arraignment on an Appeal: It is holden by Sir Matthew Hale, [f] That an Appellee of Felony standing Mute shall not have Judgment of Penance, but to be hanged; but this is made a Quaere in [g] Staundforde, and [h] Brook ; and the contrary Opinion seems to be favoured by Sir [i] Edward Coke, and is expressly holden by [k] Kelynge, and supported by several [l] Resolutions in the Old Books. Whereas the Year-Book of 21[m] E. 3. seems to be the only Resolution in favour of the other Side ; to which it may be answered, Not only that three of the abovecited Resolutions to the contrary, are much later, but also that the Appellee in this Case appears to have been taken with the Manner, [n] which probably might be a Circumstance of considerable Weight in the Judgment.[19]

Sect. 13. As to the sixth particular, viz. What is to be done to one who stands Mute to an Indictment of a Capital Felony, or a Petit Treason : It is enacted by the [o] abovementioned Statute of Westminster, 1, 12. That notorious Felons which openly be of evil Fame, and will not put themselves in Enquests of Felonies, that Men shall charge them with before the Justices at the King's Suit, shall have strong and hard Imprisonment, as they which refuse to stand to the Common Law of the Land. But this is not to be understood of such Prisoners as be taken on light Suspicion.[20]

Sect. 14. Sir [a] Edward Coke, in the Construction of this Statute, saith,

That no Person shall be put to this Punishment, unless the Matter be evident, or probable, which it is the Duty of the Judge to look into ; and Sir William [b] Staundforde, saith, That there ought to be evident or probable matter to convince the Party of the Crime whereof he is arraigned, or otherwise that he be a notorious Felon, or openly of bad Fame ; and therefore he advises the Judge, for the Satisfaction of this Statute, and Discharge of his Duty, to examine the Evidence which proves the Prisoner Guilty of the Fact, before he proceed to the Judgment of Pain fort & dure. Yet I cannot find any Book which takes Notice of any Examination of this Kind, or of any Entry that the Defendant appeared to be a notorious Felon, before such Judgment given against him, upon his standing Mute, whether upon an [c] Indictment or [d] Appeal ; But all the Books cited in the Margin seem to intimate, that the standing Mute is of itself a sufficient Ground for such Judgment. Yet all that can be inferred from thence seems to be this, That it is not necessary to make any thing of this Kind Part of the Record, it being a Matter left to the Discretion and Conscience of the Judge, and to be presumed where it is not expressed. But as to all Capital Appeals whatsoever, and all Indictments and Appeals of Petit Treason, perhaps it may be said, That [e] not being within this Statute, but remaining as they were at the Common Law, the Obstinacy of a Criminal in standing Mute to them, may be of itself, without more, a sufficient Inducement to a Judge to award him to his Penance. But considering that such Appeals and Indictments are within the same Reason with those mentioned in the Statute ; and it is uncertain how the Common Law stood in Relation to these Matters, as appears by the best Authors, [f] differing among themselves concerning them ; and seeing the Method prescribed by the Statute is very just and equitable, it seems prudent at least in a Judge to observe the same Rules in all Cases of this Kind.[21]

Sect. 15. I do not find it said in any Book, what shall be done to a Prisoner who obstinately standing Mute to an Arraignment, shall appear to be charged upon very light Suspicion ; but I take it for granted, That he may be severely fined and imprisoned for the Contempt.

Sect. 16. As to the fifth Point, viz. What is the Nature of the Penance to which a Prisoner is to be adjudged upon his obstinately standing Mute : It is observable, That the abovecited Statute of Westminster I. says only in general, That Felons standing Mute shall be put in Prison fort & dure, without saying any Thing of the Manner of it, which it seems to leave as a known Thing to the usual Practice in such Cases ; which we shall best find from the Books of Entries, and other Law Books, all of which generally agree That the Prisoner shall be remanded [g] to the Place from whence he came, and put [h] in some low dark Room, [i] and there laid on his Back, without any manner of Covering, except for the Privy Parts, and [a] that as many Weights shall be laid upon him as he can bear, and more, and that he shall have no Manner of Sustenance but of the worst [b] Bread and [c] Water, and that he shall [d] not eat the same Day in which he drinks, nor drink the same Day on which he eats; and that he shall so continue till he die.[e] But it is said, [f] That anciently the Judgment was not, That he should so continue till he should die, but till he should answer, and that he might save himself from the Penance by putting himself on his Trial, which he cannot do this Day after the Judgment of Penance is once given.[22]

Sect. 17. It seems clear, [g] That Women upon standing Mute, are liable to such Penance as well as Men.[23]

Sect. 18. It is said [h] to be the constant Practice of Newgate Sessions, where a Prisoner refuses to plead, to endeavour to compel him to do it by tying his Thumbs together with Whipcord, and not to proceed to the Judgment and Penance, before all Methods of persuading him to plead, are found ineffectual.[24]

Sect. 19. As to fifth Point, viz. What he who obstinately stands Mute shall forfeit, and to whom : There is no Doubt but that in Case of [i] High Treason he shall forfeit both Lands and Good [sic], in the same Manner as if he had been attainted any other way. Also I take it for granted that in the Case of Felony and Petit Treason, where a Person by standing Mute shall not avoid being attainted for such Crimes, he shall forfeit his Lands and Goods in the same Manner as on other Attainders. But where ever a Person standing Mute is adjudged to his Penance, and thereby prevents that Attainder which otherwise he might have incurred, it seems agreed, [k] That he forfeit his Chattels only, and not his Lands.[25]

Sect. 20. It is agreed in the Year-Book of 8 [l] H. 4. That the Goods so forfeited ought not to be delivered to any Person claiming them under a Grant from the Crown, till he have shewed a good Title to them in the King’s Court, by some Grant sufficient to pass them.[26]

Sect. 21. And it seems [m] That such Goods will not pass by Grant of all Felons Goods, having no Words specially extending to the Goods of those who stand Mute, &c. because a Person adjudged to his Penance for standing Mute, does not seem to suffer as a Felon, being neither attained nor convicted of any Felony, but as Person refusing to stand to the Law of the Land. And it seems rather the stronger Opinion, [n] That they pass not by the Grant of all Goods of Felons and Fugitives of all Persons within such a District ; so that if such Persons for any Trespass or other Fault ought to lose Life or Member ; or shall fly and refuse to stand Judgment, or do any other Trespass for which they ought to lose their Cattels.[27]

Sect. 22. As to the sixth Point, viz. Whether the Prosecutor of an Indictment or Appeal of Larceny be intitled to a Restitution of the Goods stolen, upon the Defendant's standing Mute : It seems agreed, [o] That by the Common Law, where a Person stands Mute to an Appeal of Larceny, it is proper to charge the same Inquest which is to enquire whether the standing Mute be of Malice or not, to enquire also whether the Goods mentioned in the Appeal are the Goods of the Appellant, and whether the Defendant were taken upon a fresh Suit [p] made by such Appellant, which Points being found [a] for him, he shall have an Award of Restitution to such Goods, and to such only, [b] in whose Hands soever [c] they are found. And it is said in general in some Books, [d] That in an Appeal of Larceny there shall be a Restitution of the Goods, upon the Appellee's standing Mute, without saying any thing of any Inquiry concerning the Property, or fresh Suit : But I take it for granted, That where it is so omitted, it is taken as a Thing known, and done of Course, and therefore needless to be expresly mentioned.[28]

Sect. 23. But it seems questionable, Whether the Prosecutor of an Indictment of Larceny, be in like Manner intitled to a Restitution, upon the Defendant's standing Mute? Because it seems agreed, [e] That by the Common Law there could be no such Restitution upon any other Prosecution but an Appeal ; and it is certain, That the Prosecutor of an Indictment is not intitled to a Restitution by the express Words of 21 [f] H. 8. 11. which require, That the Felon be found guilty, or otherwise attainted, &c. And I do not know that he is intitled to it by any other Statute, or any equitable Construction of this.[29]

Sect. 24. As to the seventh Point, viz. Where one who stands Mute shall have the Benefit of his Clergy : It seems clear, [g] That unless it happen to be otherwise specially provided by some Statute, where-ever he shall be allowed it upon a Conviction, by Verdict or Confession, he shall have it upon his standing Mute. Also I take it to be agreed,[h] That a Statute taking away the Benefit of Clergy from those who shall be convicted of a Crime, doth not thereby take it away from those who stand Mute on an Indictment or Appeal for such Crime. But it is enacted by 3 & 4 W. & M. 9. set forth more at large in the Chapter of Clergy, That if any Person shall be indicted of any Offence, for which by Virtue of any former Statute, he is excluded from the Benefit of his Clergy, if he had been thereof convicted by Verdict or Confession, if he stand Mute he shall not be admitted to it. But Appeals and Offences excluded from the Benefit of Clergy by subsequent Statutes, seem not to be within the Purview of this Statute; for the fuller Consideration whereof I shall refer the Reader to the Chapter of Clergy.[30]

CHAP. XXXI.
Of Confession and Demurrer.

AND now I am to consider what is to be done to a Prisoner upon his Confession, which may be either,

1. Express, or,
2. Implied.

Sect. 1. An express Confession is where a Person directly confesses [a] the Crime with which he is charged, which is the highest Conviction that can be, and may be received [b] after the Plea of Not guilty recorded, notwithstanding the Repugnancy ; for the Entry is, That the Defendant postea or relicta verificatione, cognovit indictamentum.[31]

Sect. 2. Such a Confession carries with it so strong a a [sic] Presumption of Guilt, that an Entry [c] on Record quod cognovit indictamentum, &c. in an Indictment of Trespass, estops the Defendant to plead Not guilty to an Action brought afterwards against him for the same Matter. But it seems questionable, Whether such Entry of a Confession of an Indictment of a Capital Crime, will in the like Manner estop a Defendant to plead Not guilty to an Appeal, because in Case of Life, the Court will be very tender in going upon Presumptions. And where a Person upon his Arraignment actually confesses [d] himself Guilty, or unadvisedly discloses the Special [e] Manner of the Fact, supposing that it doth not amount to Felony, where it doth, yet the Judges, upon probable Circumstances, that such Confession may proceed from Fear, Menace, or Duress, or from Weakness or Ignorance, may refuse to record such Confession, and suffer the Party to plead Not guilty.[32]

Sect. 3. An implied Confession is where a Defendant in a Case not Capital, doth not directly own himself Guilty, but in a Manner admits it by yielding to the King’s Mercy, and desiring it submit to a small Fine ; in which Case, if the Court think fit to accept of such Submission, and make an Entry that the Defendant posuit se in gratiam Regis, without putting him to a direct Confession, or Plea, (which in such Cases seems to be left to Discretion) the Defendant shall [f] not be estopped to plead Not guilty to an Action for the same Fact, as he shall [g] be where the Entry is quod cognovit indictamentum.[33]

Sect. 4. I take it for granted, That no Confession whatever shall, before final [h] Judgment, deprive the Defendant of the Privilege of taking Exceptions in Arrest of Judgment to Faults Apparent in the Record; [i] for the Judges must ex officio take Notice of all such Faults, and any one, as amicus Curiae may inform them of them.[34]

Sect. 5. It seems to be taken for granted, both by [a] Brook [b] Staunforde, [c] Coke and [d] Hale, speaking, as I suppose, of a general Demurrer, That it amounts so far to a Confession of the Indictment as laid, that if the Indictment be good, Judgment and Execution shall go against the Prisoner. But it is observable, That no adjudged Case is cited for the Maintenance of this Opinion, nor any Authority from the old Books except the Year-Book of 14 Ed. 4. 7. a. pl. 10. in which it is reported to have been said by Choke, That if a Defendant demur to a Plea, he shall be hanged, quod fuit concessum. But to this it may be said, That it was only spoken incidentally, and not a Point adjudged ; and besides that is so short and obscure that it is scarce intelligible, which appears by Brook's abridging it in different Senses ; for in one Place [e] he seems to understand it of a Demurrer by a Defendant to a Plea in Bar, which seems impossible; and in another [f] Place he seems to understand it in a different Sense. And therefore perhaps the Meaning of it may be only this, That after a Defendant hath pleaded such a Bar, as confesses the Fact, and concludes him to plead the General Issue afterwards, as some Pleas are said [g] to do ; if he afterwards demur to a Replication to such Plea, he shall be condemned if the Demurrer be adjudged against him, and the Indictment or Appeal be good.[35]

Sect. 6. But howsoever the Law may stand in Relation to a [h] General Demurrer concluding in Bar of an Appeal, or Indictment, as in Common Demurrers in Civil Actions, or a Demurrer to a Plea in Bar, [i] which admits the Fact, or to a [k] Replication to such a Plea : It hath been adjudged, That if an Appellee demur in Law to an Appeal by Reason of the [l] Insufficiency of the Declaration, or generally demur to the Declaration, with a [m] Conclusion & petit judicium de narratione illa & quod narratio illa cassetur ; or having prayed [n] Oyer of the Writ and Process, demand Judgment of the Appeal, quia dicit quod breve de appello praedict. & process. inde minus sufficient' in lege existunt ad ipsum W. C. ad dictum breve de Appello respondere compellend ; & hoc. parat. est verificare prout Cur', &c. unde petit judicium de brevi de Appello praedict. & petit inde allocationem, & quod breve illud de Appello cassetur ; such Demurrer shall not conclude him from pleading over to the Felony, either at the same Time [o] with the Demurrer, or [p] after it shall be adjudged against him.[36]

Sect. 7. But it seems, That in Criminal Cases not Capital, if the Defendant demur to an Indictment, &c. whether in Abatement or otherwise, the Court will not give Judgment against him to answer over, but final [q] Judgment ; for it seems, That in such Cases there can be no Demurrer properly in Abatement, except [r] it be to a Plea in Abatement, or to a [s] Replication to such a Plea.[37]

Sect. 8. A Demurrer to an Appeal hath been [t] received after Issue joined : But it hath been adjudged, [u] That a Demurrer to an Indictment ought not to be received after Verdict.[38]

EXAMINATION.

If a felony is committed, and one is brought before a justice upon suspicion thereof, and the justice finds upon examination that the prisoner is not guilty ; yet the justice shall not discharge him, but he must either be bailed or committed : for it is not fit that a man once arrested and charged with felony, or suspicion thereof, should be delivered upon any man's discretion, without farther trial [.] Dalt. c. 164.

In order to which bail or commitment, the examination and information of the parties must first be taken, according to the following statutes:

Two or more justices (1 Q.) or one of the said justices, before they bail a person apprehended for felony (if the offence is bailable) shall take his examination (A) and the information (B) of them that bring him, of the fact and circumstances thereof, and the same, or as much thereof as shall be material to prove the felony, shall put in writing ; which examination they shall certify (together with the bailment) at the next general gaol delivery, to be holden within the limits of their commission. 1 & 2 P. & M. c. 13. s. 4.

And they shall have power to bind by recognizance (C) all such as do declare any thing material to prove the offence, to appear at the next general gaol delivery, to be holden within the county where the trial shall be, then and there to give evidence against the party ; and shall certify such recognizance in like manner. s. 5.

And if they offend in any thing herein, thing shall be fined by the justices of gaol delivery. id.

In like manner, where the person is not bailed, but committed to ward, the justice or justices who commit him, shall before such commitment, take the like examination and information, and shall put the same in writing within two days after the said examination, and shall in like manner bind over the witnesses ; and certify the whole as above. 2 & 3 P. M. c. 10.

Shall take his examination]. And in order thereunto, if by some reasonable occasion, the justice cannot at the return of the warrant take the examination, he may by word of mouth command the constable or any other person, to detain in custody the prisoner till the next day, and then to bring him before the justice, for further examination. And this detainer is justifiable by the constable or any other person, without shewing the particular cause for which he was to be examined, or any warrant in writing. 1 H. H. 585.

But the time of the detainer must be no longer than is necessary for such purpose ; for which it is said, that the space of three days is a reasonable time. 2 Haw. 119.

But the examination of the person accused, ought not to be upon oath. 1 H. H. 585.

But if upon his examination he shall confess the matter, if shall not be amiss that he subscribe his name, or mark to it. Dalt. c. 164.

Which examination being voluntary, and sworn by the justice or his clerk to be truly taken, may be given in evidence against the party confessing, but not against others. 1 H. H. 585. 2 Haw. 429.

Information of them that bring him] Or of other witnesses ; whom the justice may bring before him by his warrant (D) for that purpose. 1 H. H. 586. Dalt. c. 164.

And this information must be upon oath. Dalt. c. 164. 1 H. H. 586.

And therefore if a quaker is witness, his affirmation must not be taken in this case ; for by the 7 & 8 W. c. 34. s. 36. it is provided, that no quaker shall be examined for or against any person in any criminal cause, unless it be upon oath.

And the said information being upon the trial sworn to be truly taken, by the justice or his clerk, may be given in evidence against the prisoner, if the witnesses be dead and not able to travel. 1 H. H. 586.

Or as much thereof as shall be material to prove the felony] Yet it seemeth also just and right, that the justices who take information against a felon, or person suspected of felony, should take and certify as well such information, proof, and evidence, as goeth to the acquittal or clearing of the prisoner, as such as maketh against the prisoner : for such information, evidence, or proof so taken, is only to inform the king and his justices of the truth of the matter. Dalt. c. 165.

Shall certify at the next gaol delivery] And yet for petty larcenies, and small felonies, the offenders may be tried at the quarter sessions, and the examinations and informations may be certified thither. Dalt. c. 164.

To be holden within the limits of their commission] And yet examinations taken by justices of the peace in one county, may be by them certified in another county, and there read, and given in evidence against the prisoner. Dalt. c. 164.

To bind by recognizance] And upon refusal may commit the person refusing. 1 H. H. 586.

And the parties grieved ought to be bound, not only to give evidence, but also to prefer a bill of indictment against the prisoner. Dalt. c. 164.

9.3.2CASE LAW

9.3.2.1The King v. Dr. Purnell, 1748[39]

9.3.2.2Brownsword v. Edwards, 1751

Lord Chancellor, This appears a very plain case, in which defendant may protect herself from making a discovery of her marriage; and I am afraid, if the court should overrule such a plea, it would be setting up the oath ex officio; which then the parliament in the time of Charles I. would in vain have taken away, if the party might come into this court for it. The general rule is, that no one is bound to answer so as to subject himself to punishment, whether that punishment arises by the ecclesiastical law of the land. (2 Ves. Sen. 389, 451; 1 Atk. 539; 2 Atk. 393; 1 Brown 97. In case of a bankrupt smuggler, the commissioners may examine him, but he may demur to the interrogatories, and have the opinion of the court. 2 Atk. 200; 1 vol. 247; 3 Wms. 376; 1 Vern. 109.) Incest is undoubtedly punishable in ecclesiastical court; and such a crime is generally excepted out of the acts of pardon. The ecclesiastical court has conusance of incest in two respects, diverso intuitu: first to judge of the legality of the marriage, and to pronounce sentence of nullity; and if they do so, proceeding lawfully and rightfully, it binds all parties, being the judgment of a court having proper jurisdiction of the cause. The other is to censure and punish persons guilty by ecclesiastical censure, as for fornication, adultery, &c. Nor is it material what the nature of the punishment is. It is a punishment which must be performed or got rid of by commutation, which is like a fine. Then consider the present case. The discovery whether lawfully married takes in the whole, whether married in fact, and whether that marriage was lawful. Defendant has pleaded to it; which she may do; and in the plea it is proper to bring in facts and averments to support that plea; whereas a demurrer can be to nothing but what appears on the face of the bill, otherwise it would be a speaking demurrer. (Averments are necessary to exclude intendments which would be made against the pleader, for the court will always intend the matters charged against the pleader unless fully denied. 2 Atk. 241; Gilb. 185.) But here it was necessary to bring in such an averment, that testator was lawfully married before to her sister, and had issue; which is a fact necessary to shew; and that fact she has taken on herself to prove: the plea therefore is regular in form, and good in substance. The objection to the plea is, that one of the parties to the incestuous marriage being dead, there can be no proceeding afterward. I always took the distinction to be what is laid down in Hicks v. Harris, that by the law of the land the ecclesiastical court cannot proceed to judge of the marriage and to pronounce sentence of nullity after death of one of the married parties, especially where there is issue, because it tends to bastardise the issue; and none after death of one of the parties to that marriage is to be bastardised: but there is no rule of law standing to prevent either of the parties from punishment after death of the other. Suppose it was an offence of adultery or fornication, there is no rule of the civil or ecclesiastical law, that after death of one of the parties the survivor may not be punished for the offence: undoubtedly they may, either proceeding ex officio, by office of the ecclesiastical judge, or by promotion of a proper informant. Then why may not the ecclesiastical court do it in the case of incest, whether without the formality of marriage or attended with it? But it is said, Hicks v. Harris is no judicial determination in the point, and that all that was material before the court, was the joint jurisdiction; which is true: but there was a plain difference. If the court held, that the proceeding (and this is an answer to one part of the objection) even for the censure against the surviving party would have tended to affect the legitimacy of the marriage or the issue, the court of B.R. would have stopped there: but they went on this, that it could not be given in evidence against the issue or the plaintiff claiming under that issue: as was determined solemnly in B.R. on a long trial at bar, directed out of this court in Hillyard v. Grantham, in which I was counsel.

(See 3 Wooddeson, 318.) In that cause during life of the father and mother there had been a proceeding against both of them in the consistory court of Lincoln for living together in fornication, and sentence given against them. On the trial that sentence was offered in evidence to prove, that they were not married: the whole court were of opinion that it could not be given in evidence; because first, it was a criminal matter, and could not be given in evidence in a civil cause; next that it was res inter alios acta, and could not affect the issue: but they held, that if it had been a sentence on the point of the marriage on a question of the lawfulness of the marriage, it being a sentence of a court having proper jurisdiction, might have been given in evidence. If indeed there had been collusion that might be shewn on the part of the child to take off the force of it; because collusion affects every thing: but if no collusion, it binds all the world: but in a proceeding in a criminal way that could not be given in evidence: and that was the distinction the court went on in Hicks v. Harris. But if there had not been the authority, I should not have doubted on the nature of the thing, but that the ecclesiastical court might have proceeded after death of one of the party as well for incest as fornication; in which case there is no doubt they may. Thus far as to the merits of the plea. Some collateral arguments have been used, that it is not in every case the party shall protect himself against relief in this court upon an allegation, that it will subject him to a supposed crime. It is true, it never creates a defence against relief in this court, therefore in case of usury of forgery, if a proof can be made of it, the court will let the cause go on still to a hearing, but will not force the party by his own oath to subject himself to punishment for it (if plaintiff waves [sic] the penalty, defendant shall be obliged to discover, 1 Vern. 60, or whether the penalty arises from defendant's own particular agreement, he is obliged to discover. 2 Ver. [sic] 244. Or where the discovery sought is not of a fact which can subject defendant to any penalty, but connected with some other fact which may, 2 Ves. sen. 493). In a bill to inquire into the reality of deeds on suggestion of forgery, the court has entertained jurisdiction of the cause; though it does not oblige the party to a discovery, but directs an issue to try whether forged. I remember a case where there was a deed of rent-charge suggested to be forged: it was tried twice at law, and found for the deed: a bill was afterward brought to set it aside for forgery, and to have it delivered up to be cancelled. Lord King, notwithstanding the two trials, which has been in Avowry and Replevin, directed an issue: wherein it was found forged, and, I remember, was cancelled and cut to pieces in court. There are several instances of that: so that the relief the party may have is no objection. As to the objection from the consequence of allowing this plea if the defendant should fail in the proof of it, that would be an objection to the allowing any plea to a discovery: though it would be no objection to a demurrer, because that must abide by the bill: but all pleas must suggest a fact (which fact must conduce to one single point, per Lord Thurlow, 1 Brown, 417. 1 Atk. 54): it must go to a hearing; and if the party does not prove that fact which is necessary to support the plea, the plaintiff is not to lose the benefit of his discovery: but the court may direct an examination on interrogatories in order to supply that. The plea therefore ought to be allowed.

Security against ex post facto laws, the trial by jury, and the benefits of the writ of habeas corpus, are but a part of those inestimable rights the people of the United States are entitled to, even in judicial proceedings, by the course of the common law. These may be secured in general words, as in New-York, the Western Territory, &c. by declaring the people of the United States shall always be entitled to judicial proceedings according to the course of the common law, as used and established in the said states. Perhaps it would be better to enumerate the particular essential rights the people are entitled to in these proceedings, as has been done in many of the states, and as has been done in England. In this case, the people may proceed to declare, that no man shall be held to answer to any offence, till the same be fully described to him; nor to furnish evidence against himself: that, except in the government of the army and navy, no person shall be tried for any offence, whereby he may incur loss of life, or an infamous punishment, until he be first indicted by a grand jury: that every person shall have a right to produce all proofs that may be favourable to him, and to meet the witnesses against him face to face: that every person shall be entitled to obtain right and justice freely and without delay; that all persons shall have a right to be secure from all unreasonable searches and seizures of their persons, houses, papers, or possessions; and that all warrants shall be deemed contrary to this right, if the foundation of them be not previously supported by oath, and there be not in them a special designation of persons or objects of search, arrest, or seizure: and that no person shall be exiled or molested in his person or effects, otherwise than by the judgment of his peers, or according to the law of the land. A celebrated writer observes upon this last article, that in itself it may be said to comprehend the whole end of political society. These rights are not necessarily reserved, they are established, or enjoyed but in few countries: they are stipulated rights, almost peculiar to British and American laws. In the execution of those laws, individuals by long custom, by magna charta, bills of rights &c. have become entitled to them. A man, at first, by act of parliament, became entitled to the benefits of the writ of habeas corpus — men are entitled to these rights and benefits in the judicial proceedings of our state courts generally: but it will by no means follow, that they will be entitled to them in the federal courts, and have a right to assert them, unless secured and established by the constitution or federal laws. We certainly, in federal processes, might as well claim the benefits of the writ of habeas corpus, as to claim trial by a jury — the right to have council — to have witnesses face to face — to be secure against unreasonable search warrants, &c. was the constitution silent as to the whole of them: — but the establishment of the former, will evince that we could not claim them without it; and the omission of the latter, implies they are relinquished, or deemed of no importance. These are rights and benefits individuals acquire by compact; they must claim them under compacts, or immemorial usage — it is doubtful, at least, whether they can be claimed under immemorial usage in this country; and it is, therefore, we generally claim them under compacts, as charters and constitutions.

Storing, vol. 2, pp. 327–28.

10.2.4.2The Impartial Examiner, No. 1, March 5, 1788

… For a system, which is to supersede the present different governments of the states, by ordaining that "laws made in pursuance thereof shall be supreme, and shall bind the judges in every state, any thing in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding," must be alarming indeed! What cannot this omnipotence of power effect? How will your bill of rights avail you any thing? By this authority the Congress can make laws, which shall bind all, repugnant to your present constitution— repugnant to every article of your right; for they are a part of your constitution, — they are the basis of it. So that if you pass this new constitution, you will have a naked plan of government unlimited in its jurisdiction, which not only expunges your bill of rights by rendering ineffectual, all the state governments; but is proposed without any kind of stipulation for any of those natural rights, the security whereof ought to be the end of all governments. Such a stipulaton is so necessary, that it is an absurdity to suppose any civil liberty can exist without it. Because it cannot be alledged in any case whatsoever, that a breach has been committed — that a right has been violated; as there will be no standard to resort to — no criterion to ascertain the breach, or even to find whether there has been any violation at all. Hence it is evident that the most flagrant acts of oppression may be inflicted; yet, still there will be no apparent object injured: there will be no unconstitutional infringement. For instance, if Congress should pass a law that persons charged with capital crimes shall not have a right to demand the cause or nature of the accusation, shall not be confronted with the accusers or witnesses, or call for evidence in their own favor; and a question should arise respecting their authority therein, — can it be said that they have exceeded the limits of their jurisdiction, when that has no limits; when no provision has been made for such a right? — When no responsibility on the part of Congress has been required by the constitution? The same observation may be made on any arbitrary or capricious imprisonments contrary to the law of the land. The same may be made, if excessive bail should be required; if excessive fines should be imposed; if cruel and unusual punishments should be inflicted; if the liberty of the press should be restrained; in a word — if laws should be made totally derogatory to the whole catalogue of rights, which are now secure under your present form of government.

10.3.1.1.a.Liberty

Liberty, (Libertas) Is a Privilege held by Grant or Prescription, by which Men enjoy some Benefit beyond the ordinary Subject. Bract. But in a more general Signification; it is said to be a Power to do as one thinks fit; unless restrained by the Law of the Land: And it is well observed, that human Nature is ever an Advocate for this Liberty; it being the Gift of God to Man in his Creation, and therefore every Thing is desirous of it, as a Sort of Restitution to it’s Primitive State. Fortescue 96. ’Tis upon that Account the Laws of England in all Cases favour Liberty, and which is counted very precious, not only in Respect of the Profit which every one obtains by his Liberty; but also in Respect of the Publick. 2 Lill. Abr. 169. The People of this Kingdom, are to enjoy their ancient Liberties, without Impeachment, by the Statute of Magna Charta. No Freeman shall be imprisoned or condemned, without Trial by his Peers, or the Law. Magn. Chart. c. 19. Likewise no Person is to be arrested, &c. without Process at Law: And Matters which concern Liberty are to be speedily determined, &c.

10.3.1.1.bRight, Rights and Liberties

Right, (Jus) In general Signification, includes not only a Right for which a Writ of Right lies ; but also any Title or Claim for which no Action is given by Law but only an Entry. 1 Inst. 265. There is Right of Entry, and of Action, where a Man is put out of his Lands ; of Property, when one is disseised, &c. and of Possession : There are also a Present, and future Right ; a Jus in Re, which may be granted to a Stranger ; and what is called a naked Right, or Jus ad Rem, where an Estate is turned to a Right, on a Discontinuance, &c. Co. Litt. 345. A Right in Writs and Pleadings, is properly in one, when he is ousted of the Possession of his Estate by Disseisin or Wrong, and hath Remedy by Entry, or Action : But Right doth also include an Estate in esse in Conveyances ; and therefore if Tenant in Fee simple makes a Lease and Release of all his Right in the Land to another, the whole Estate in Fee passes. Wood's Inst. 115, 116. Sir Edward Coke tells us, That of such an high Estimation is Right, that the Law preserveth it from Death and Destruction ; trodden down it may be, but never trodden out : And there is such an extream Enmity between an Estate gained by Wrong and an ancient Right, that the Right cannot possibly incorporate itself with the Estate gained by Wrong, 1 Inst. 279. 8 Rep. 105. 6 Rep. 70. A Right may sometimes sleep, though it never dies ; a long Possession exceeding the Memory of Man, will make a Right ; and if two Persons are in Possession by divers Titles, the Law will adjudge the Possession in him that hath the Right. Co, Litt. 478. 6 Litt. Sect. 158. Where there is no Remedy, there is presumed to be no Right by Law. Vaugh. 38. No Commands shall be made under the great or little Seal, to disturb or delay common Right. Stat. 2 Ed. 3. c. 8. See Recto.

Rights and Liberties. The Declaration of Rights and Liberties against the Conduct of K. James 2d set forth, That he by the Assistance of divers evil Counsellors, did indeavour to subvert the Laws and Liberties of this Kingdom ; by exercising a Power of dispensing with, and suspending of Laws ; by levying Money for the Use of the Crown by Pretence of Prerogative, without Consent of Parliament ; by raising and keeping a Standing Army, in Time of Peace ; by violating the Freedom of Election of Members to serve in Parliament ; by violent Prosecutions in the Court of King's Bench ; and causing partial and corrupt Jurors to be returned on Trials ; excessive Bail to be taken ; and excessive Fines to be imposed ; also cruel Punishments inflicted, &c. All which were declared to be illegal, and infringing upon the ancient Rights and Liberties of the People. Stat. 1 W. & M. cap. 2.

V. Liberty, consists in a Power to do as one thinks fit, unless restrained by Force, or the Law. [a] Imprisonment is a Restraint of a Man's Liberty under the Custody of another. One may be lawfully imprisoned by the King's Writ, &c. or unlawfully. [b] An unlawful Imprisonment is not only an unjust Imprisonment at the first, but when one is detained longer than he ought, though he was at first lawfully imprisoned. For if a Sheriff, or Gaoler detains a Prisoner in Gaol after his Acquittal (unless it be for his Fees, not for Meat, Drink, or Lodging) this is an unlawful Imprisonment. An Action of false Imprisonment doth lie against a Bailiff for Arresting One after the Return of the Writ is past, it being now without Writ. [c] He that is put into the Stocks, or is under an Arrest, is said to be in Prison. Unlawful Imprisonment is sometimes called Duress of Imprisonment (from Durities) [d] where one is wrongfully imprisoned or detained, 'till he seals a Bond, &c. But not where a Man is lawfully imprisoned for another Cause, and for his Delivery seals a Bond, &c. nor where being arrested at the Suit of another; and in Prison on such an Arrest, willingly seals a Bond to a Stranger. [e] A Son shall avoid the Action by Reason of the unlawful Imprisonment of His Father; a Husband by Reason of the unlawful Imprisonment of the Wife. So If One's Beasts are unlawfully imprisoned till He Seals a Deed, He may Avoid the Action. So if one is under a just [f] Fear of being imprisoned, killed, maimed, &c. and he seals a Bond to him that menaces him, it is Duress per Minas, and in both Cases he may plead the Duress, and avoid the Action. If it be only a Threatning of a Battery, which may be light, or to take away my Goods, or to burn my House, &c. this will not make the Deed made upon that occasion to be by Duress; for there One may have Satisfaction by Recovery of Damages. There must be some Threatning of Life, or Member, or of Imprisonment, and to the End of obtaining the Deed, and thereupon the Deed must be made. To threaten another to kill or maim, or imprison him if he will not seal a Deed to a third Person, and thereupon he do it, this is as voidable as if it were made to the Party himself.[4]

Even lawful Imprisonment is so far pitied, that by several Statutes, as well as by Common Law, Defaults are saved on that Account.

The Law [g] favours Liberty, and the Freedom of a Man from Imprisonment; and therefore kind Interpretations shall be made on its Behalf. If a Man is unlawfully imprisoned, he may have an Action of Trespass for false Imprisonment, and recover Damages: [a] Or he may have the Writ of Habeas Corpus, and upon Return of this Writ by the Gaoler, setting forth by whom he was committed, and for what Cause, He ought to be discharged if it appears to be against Law. [See Magna Charta, chap. 29.] But if the Case be doubtful, he may be bailed. If the Imprisonment appears to be just, He shall be remanded to the Prison, or bailed. [See Of Bail, Book 4. chap. 4. and 5.][5]

The King cannot send any Subject of England [b] against his Will to serve him out of the Kingdom; for that would be Banishment: No, he cannot send one into Ireland, against his Will, to serve as his Deputy there. [See the 7 Rep. 7, 8. Calvin's Case.][6]

By the 31 Car. 2. chap. 2. [called the Habeas Corpus Act, and entituled, An Act for the better securing the Liberty of the Subject, and for Prevention of Imprisonment beyond Seas.] A Prisoner may have an Habeas Corpus from any Judge, returnable immediately (unless committed for Treason or Felony, plainly and specially expressed in the Warrant, or for other Offences not bailable) and upon Certificate of the Cause of his Imprisonment may be discharged upon Bail, to appear in the King's Bench next Term, or the next Assizes or Sessions, or General Gaol-Delivery, or in any other Court where the Offence is cognizable.

And Persons committed for Treason or Felony, plainly and specially expressed in the Warrant, upon Prayer in open Court the first Week of the Term, or Day of the Sessions of Oyer and Terminer, or Gaol-Delivery, to be brought to Trial: If not indicted the next Term, or Sessions, after such Commitment, shall upon Motion the last Day of the Term, or Sessions, be let out upon Bail; unless it appear upon Oath that the King's Witnesses could not be ready that Term, or Sessions: And if such Persons, upon such Prayer, shall not be indicted, or tried the second Term after Commitment, they shall be discharged.

A Subject committed for any Crime, shall not be removed into the Custody of any other Officer, unless by Writ, &c.

This Act shall not extend to any Person charged in any Civil Cause. [This Statute has been several Times suspended by Act of Parliament. The last Suspension was by 20 Geo. 2. chap. 1. 10.3.1.3Blackstone, 1765

CHAPTER THE FIRST.

OF THE ABSOLUTE RIGHTS OF INDIVIDUALS.

THE objects of the laws of England are so very numerous and extensive, that, in order to consider them with any tolerable ease and perspicuity, it will be necessary to distribute them methodically, under proper and distinct heads; avoiding as much as possible divisions too large and comprehensive on the one hand, and too trifling and minute on the other; both of which are equally productive of confusion.

NOW, as municipal law is a rule of civil conduct, commanding what is right, and prohibiting what is wrong; or, as Cicero [a] , and after him our Bracton [b] , has expressed it, sanctio justa, jubens honesta et prohibens contraria; it follows, that the primary and principal objects of the law are RIGHTS, and WRONGS. In the prosecution therefore of these commentaries, I shall follow this very simple and obvious division; and shall in the first place consider the rights that are commanded, and secondly the wrongs that are forbidden by the laws of England.[7]

RIGHTS are however liable to another subdivision; being either, first, those which concern, and are annexed to the persons of men, and are then called jura personarum or the rights of persons; or they are, secondly, such as a man may acquire over external objects, or things unconnected with his person, which are stiled jura rerum or the rights of things. Wrongs also are divisible into, first, private wrongs, which, being an infringement merely of particular rights, concern individuals only, and are called civil injuries; and secondly, public wrongs, which, being a breach of general and public rights, affect the whole community, and are called crimes and misdemesnors.

THE objects of the laws of England falling into this fourfold division, the present commentaries will therefore consist of the four following parts: 1. The rights of persons; with the means whereby such rights may be either acquired or lost. 2. The rights of things; with the means also of acquiring and losing them. 3. Private wrongs, or civil injuries; with the means of redressing them by law. 4. Public wrongs, or crimes and misdemesnors; with the means of prevention and punishment.

WE are now, first, to consider the rights of persons; with the means of acquiring and losing them.

Now the rights of persons that are commanded to be observed by the municipal law are of two sorts; first, such as are due from every citizen, which are usually called civil duties; and, secondly, such as belong to him, which is the more popular acceptation of rights or jura. Both may indeed be comprized in this latter division; for, as all social duties are of a relative nature, at the same time that they are due from one man, or set of men, they must also be due to another. But I apprehend it will be more clear and easy, to consider many of them as duties required from, rather than as rights belonging to, particular persons. Thus, for instance, allegiance is usually, and therefore most easily, considered as the duty of the people, and protection as the duty of the magistrate; and yet they are, reciprocally, the rights as well as duties of each other. Allegiance is the right of the magistrate, and protection the right of the people.

PERSONS also are divided by the law into either natural persons, or artificial. Natural persons are such as the God of nature formed us: artificial are such as created and devised by human laws for the purposes of society and government; which are called corporations or bodies politic.

THE rights of persons considered in their natural capacities are also of two sorts, absolute, and relative. Absolute, which are such as appertain and belong to particular men, merely as individuals or single persons: relative, which are incident to them as members of society, and standing in various relations to each other. The first, that is, absolute rights, will be the subject of the present chapter.

BY the absolute rights of individuals we mean those which are so in their primary and strictest sense; such as would belong to their persons merely in a state of nature, and which every man is intitled to enjoy whether out of society or in it. But with regard to the absolute duties, which man is bound to perform considered as a mere individual, it is not to be expected that any human municipal laws should at all explain or enforce them. For the end and intent of such laws being only to regulate the behaviour of mankind, as they are members of society, and stand in various relations to each other, they have consequently no business or concern with any but social or relative duties. Let a man therefore be ever so abandoned in his principles, or vitious in his practice, provided he keeps his wickedness to himself, and does not offend against the rules of public decency, he is out of the reach of human laws. But if he makes his vices public, though they be such as seem principally to affect himself, (as drunkenness, or the like) they then become, by the bad example they set, of pernicious effects to society; and therefore it is then the business of human laws to correct them. Here the circumstance of publication is what alters the nature of the case. Public sobriety is a relative duty, and therefore enjoined by our laws: private sobriety is an absolute duty, which, whether it be performed or not, human tribunals can never know; and therefore they can never enforce it by any civil sanction. But, with respect to rights, the case is different. Human laws define and enforce as well those rights which belong to a man considered as an individual, as those which belong to him considered as related to others.

For the principal aim of society is to protect individuals in the enjoyment of those absolute rights, which were vested in them by the immutable laws of nature; but which could not be preserved in peace without that mutual assistance and intercourse, which is gained by the institution of friendly and social communities. Hence it follows, that the first and primary end of human laws is to maintain and regulate these absolute rights of individuals. Such rights as are social and relative result from, and are posterior to, the formation of states and societies: so that to maintain and regulate these, is clearly a subsequent consideration. And therefore the principal view of human laws is, or ought always to be, to explain, protect, and enforce such rights as are absolute, which in themselves are few and simple; and, then, such rights as are relative, which arising from a variety of connexions, will be far more numerous and more complicated. These will take up a greater space in any code of laws, and hence may appear to be more attended to, though in reality they are not, than the rights of the former kind. Let us therefore proceed to examine how far all laws ought, and how far the laws of England actually do, take notice of these absolute rights, and provide for their lasting security.

The absolute rights of man, considered as a free agent, endowed with discernment to know good from evil, and with power of choosing those measures which appear to him to be most desirable, are usually summed up in one general appellation, and denominated the natural liberty of mankind. This natural liberty consists properly in a power of acting as one thinks fit, without any restraint or control, unless by the law of nature: being a right inherent in us by birth, and one of the gifts of God to man at his creation, when he endued him with the faculty of freewill. But every man, when he enters into society, gives up a part of his natural liberty, as the price of so valuable a purchase; and, in consideration of receiving the advantages of mutual commerce, obliges himself to conform to those laws, which the community has thought proper to establish. And this species of legal obedience and conformity is infinitely more desirable, than that wild and savage liberty which is sacrificed to obtain it. For no man, that considers a moment, would wish to retain the absolute and uncontroled power of doing whatever he pleases; the consequence of which is, that every other man would also have the same power; and then there would be no security to individuals in any of the enjoyments of life. Political therefore, or civil, liberty, which is that of a member of society, is no other than natural liberty so far restrained by human laws (and no farther) as is necessary and expedient for the general advantage of the publick [c]. Hence we may collect that the law, which restrains a man from doing mischief to his fellow citizens, though it diminishes the natural, increases the civil liberty of mankind: but every wanton and causeless restraint of the will of the subject, whether practiced by a monarch, a nobility, or a popular assembly, is a degree of tyranny. Nay, that even laws themselves, whether made with or without our consent, if they regulate and constrain our conduct in matters of mere indifference, without any good end in view, are laws destructive of liberty: whereas if any public advantage can arise from observing such precepts, the control of our private inclinations, in one or two particular points, will conduce to preserve our general freedom in others of more importance; by supporting that state, of society, which alone can secure our independence. Thus the statute of king Edward IV [d], which forbad the fine gentlemen of those times (under the degree of a lord) to wear pikes upon their shoes or boots of more than two inches in length, was a law that savoured of oppression; because, however ridiculous the fashion then in use might appear, the restraining it by pecuniary penalties could serve no purpose of common utility. But the statute of king Charles II [e], which prescribes a thing seemingly as indifferent; viz. a dress for the dead, who are all ordered to be buried in woollen; is a law consistent with public liberty, for it encourages the staple trade, on which in great measure depends the universal good of the nation. So that laws, when prudently framed, are by no means subversive but rather introductive of liberty; for (as Mr Locke has well observed [f]) where there is no law, there is no freedom. But then, on the other hand, that constitution or frame of government, that system of laws, is alone calculated to maintain civil liberty, which leaves the subject entire master of his own conduct, except in those points wherein the public good requires some direction or restraint.[8]

THE idea and practice of this political or civil liberty flourish in their highest vigour in these kingdoms, where it falls little short of perfection, and can only be lost or destroyed by the folly or demerits of it's owner: the legislature, and of course the laws of England, being peculiarly adapted to the preservation of this inestimable blessing even in the meanest subject. Very different from the modern constitutions of other states, on the continent of Europe, and from the genius of the imperial law; which in general are calculated to vest an arbitrary and despotic power of controlling the actions of the subject in the prince, or in a few grandees. And this spirit of liberty is so deeply implanted in our constitution, and rooted even in our very soil, that a slave or a negro, the moment he lands in England, falls under the protection of the laws, and with regard to all natural rights becomes eo instanti a freeman[g].[9]

THE absolute rights of every Englishman (which, taken in a political and extensive sense, are usually called their liberties) as they are founded on nature and reason, so they are coeval with our form of government; though subject at times to fluctuate and change: their establishment (excellent as it is) being still human. At some times we have seen them depressed by overbearing and tyrannical princes; at others so luxuriant as even to tend to anarchy, a worse state than tyranny itself, as any government is better than none at all. But the vigour of our free constitution has always delivered the nation from these embarassments, and, as soon as the convulsions consequent on the struggle have been over, the ballance of our rights and liberties has settled to it's proper level; and their fundamental articles have been from time to time asserted in parliament, as often as they were thought to be in danger.

FIRST, by the great charter of liberties, which was obtained, sword in hand, from king John; and afterwards, with some alterations, confirmed in parliament by king Henry the third, his son. Which charter contained very few new grants; but, as sir Edward Coke [h] observes, was for the most part declaratory of the principal grounds of the fundamental laws of England. Afterwards by the statute called confirmatio cartarum[i], whereby the great charter is directed to be allowed as the common law; all judgments contrary to it are declared void; copies of it are ordered to be sent to all cathedral churches, and read twice a year to the people; and sentence of excommunication is directed to be as constantly denounced against all those that by word, deed, or counsel act contrary thereto, or in any degree infringe it. Next by a multitude of subsequent corroborating statutes, (sir Edward Coke, I think, reckons thirty two[k],) from the first Edward to Henry the fourth. Then, after a long interval, by the petition of right; which was a parliamentary declaration of the liberties of the people, assented to by king Charles the first in the beginning of his reign. Which was closely followed by the still more ample concessions made by that unhappy prince to his parliament, before the fatal rupture between them; and by the many salutary laws, particularly the habeas corpus act, passed under Charles the second. To these succeeded the bill of rights, or declaration delivered by the lords and commons to the prince and princess of Orange 13 February 1688; and afterwards enacted in parliament, when they became king and queen: which declaration concludes in these remarkable words; "and they do claim, demand, and insist upon all and singular the premises, as their undoubted rights and liberties." And the act of parliament itself [l] recognizes "all and singular the rights and liberties asserted and claimed in the said declaration to be the true, antient, and indubitable rights of the people of this kingdom." Lastly, these liberties were again asserted at the commencement of the present century, in the act of settlement[m], whereby the crown is limited to his present majesty's illustrious house, and some new provisions were added at the same fortunate aera for better securing our religion, laws, and liberties; which the statute declares to be "the birthright of the people of England;" according to the antient doctrine of the common law. [n],[10]

THUS much for the declaration of our rights and liberties. The rights themselves thus defined by these several statutes, consist in a number of private immunities; which will appear, from what has been premised, to be indeed no other, than either that residuum of natural liberty, which is not required by the laws of society to be sacrificed to public convenience; or else those civil privileges, which society hath engaged to provide, in lieu of the natural liberties so given up by individuals. These therefore were formerly, either by inheritance or purchase, the rights of all mankind ; but, in most other countries of the world being now more or less debased and destroyed, they at present may be said to remain, in a peculiar and emphatical manner, the rights of the people of England. And these may be reduced to three principal or primary articles; the right of personal security, the right of personal liberty; and the right of private property: because as there is no other known method of compulsion, or of abridging man's natural free will, but by an infringement or diminution of one or other of these important rights, the preservation of these, inviolate, may justly be said to include the preservation of our civil immunities in their largest and most extensive sense.

I. The right of personal security consists in a person's legal and uninterrupted enjoyment of his life, his limbs, his body, his health, and his reputation.

1. Life is the immediate gift of God, a right inherent by nature in every individual; and it begins in contemplation of law as soon as an infant is able to stir in the mother's womb. For if a woman is quick with child, and by a potion, or otherwise, killeth it in her womb; or if any one beat her, whereby the child dieth in her body, and she is delivered of a dead child; this, though not murder, was by the antient law homicide or manslaughter [o]. But at present it is not looked upon in quite so atrocious a light, though it remains a very heinous misdemesnor[p].[11]

An infant in ventre sa mere, or in the mother's womb, is supposed in law to be born for many purposes. It is capable of having a legacy, or a surrender of a copyhold estate made to it. It may have a guardian assigned to it [q]; and it is enabled to have an estate limited to it's use, and to take afterwards by such limitation, as if it were then actually born [r]. And in this point the civil law agrees with ours [s].[12]

2. A man's limbs, (by which for the present we only understand those members which may be useful to him in fight, and the loss of which only amounts to mayhem by the common law) are also the gift of the wise creator; to enable man to protect himself from external injuries in a state of nature. To these therefore he has a natural inherent right; and they cannot be wantonly destroyed or disabled without a manifest breach of civil liberty.

Both the life and limbs of a man are of such high value, in the estimation of the law of England, that it pardons even homicide if committed se defendendo, or in order to preserve them. For whatever is done by a man, to save either life or member, is looked upon as done upon the highest necessity and compulsion. Therefore if a man through fear of death or mayhem is prevailed upon to execute a deed, or do any other legal act; these, though accompanied with all other the requisite solemnities, are totally void in law, if forced upon him by a well-grounded apprehension of losing his life, or even his limbs, in case of his non-compliance [t]. And the same is also a sufficient excuse for the commission of many misdemesnors, as will appear in the fourth book.[13]

The constraint a man is under in these circumstances is called in law duress, from the Latin durities, of which there are two sorts; duress of imprisonment, where a man actually loses his liberty, of which we shall presently speak; and duress per minas, where the hardship is only threatened and impending, which is that we are now discoursing of. Duress per minas is either for fear of loss of life, or else for fear of mayhem, or loss of limb. And this fear must be upon sufficient reason; "non," as Bracton expresses it, "suspicio cujuslibet vani et meticulosi hominis, sed talis qui possit cadere in virum constantem; talis enim debet esse metus, qui in se contineat vitae periculum, aut corporis cruciatum [u]." A fear of battery, or being beaten, though never so well grounded, is no duress; neither is the fear of having one's house burnt, or one's goods taken away and destroyed; because in these cases, should the threat be performed, a man may have satisfaction by recovering equivalent damages[w] : but no suitable atonement can be made for the loss of life, or limb. And the indulgence shewn to a man under this, the principal, sort of duress, the fear of losing his life or limbs, agrees also with that maxim of the civil law; ignoscitur ei qui sanguinem suum qualiter qualiter redemptum voluit [x],[14]

THE law not only regards life and member, and protects every man in the enjoyment of them, but also furnishes him with every thing necessary for their support. For there is no man so indigent or wretched, but he may demand a supply sufficient for all the necessities of life, from the more opulent part of the community, by means of the several statutes enacted for the relief of the poor, of which in their proper places. A humane provision; yet, though dictated by the principles of society, discountenanced by the Roman laws. For the edicts of the emperor Constantine, commanding the public to maintain the children of those who were unable to provide for them, in order to prevent the murder and exposure of infants, an institution founded on the same principle as our foundling hospitals, though comprized in the Theodosian code [y], were rejected in Justinian's collection.[15]

THESE rights, of life and member, can only be determined by the death of the person; which is either a civil or natural death. The civil death commences

if any man be banished the realm [z] by the process of the common law, or enters into religion; that is, goes into a monastery, and becomes there a monk professed: in which cases he is absolutely dead in law, and his next heir shall have his estate. For, such banished man is entirely cut off from society; and such a monk, upon his profession, renounces solemnly all secular concerns: and besides, as the popish clergy claimed an exemption from the duties of civil life, and the commands of the temporal magistrate, the genius of the English law would not suffer those persons to enjoy the benefits of society, who secluded themselves from it, and refused to submit to it's regulations [a]. A monk is therefore accounted civiliter mortuus, and when he enters into religion may, like other dying men, make his testament and executors; or, if he makes none, the ordinary may grant administration to his next of kin, as if he were actually dead intestate. And such executors and administrators shall have the same power, and may bring the same actions for debts due to the religious, and are liable to the same actions for those due from him, as if he were naturally deceased [b]. Nay, so far has this principle been carried, that when one was bound in a bond to an abbot and his successors, and afterwards made his executors and professed himself a monk of the same abbey, and in process of time was himself made abbot thereof; here the law gave him, in the capacity of abbot, an action of debt against his own executors to recover the money due [c]. In short, a monk or religious is so effectually dead in law, that a lease made even to a third person, during the life (generally) of one who afterwards becomes a monk, determines by such his entry into religion: for which reason leases, and other conveyances, for life, are usually made to have and to hold for the term of one's natural life[d]. [16]

THIS natural life being, as was before observed, the immediate donation of the great creator, cannot legally be disposed of or destroyed by any individual, neither by the person himself nor by any other of his fellow creatures, merely upon their own authority. Yet nevertheless it may, by the divine permission, be frequently forfeited for the breach of those laws of society, which are enforced by the sanction of capital punishments; of the nature, restrictions, expedience, and legality of which, we may hereafter more conveniently enquire in the concluding book of these commentaries. At present, I shall only observe, that whenever the constitution of a state vests in any man, or body of men, a power of destroying at pleasure, without the direction of laws, the lives or members of the subject, such constitution is in the highest degree tyrannical: and that whenever any laws direct such destruction for light and trivial causes, such laws are likewise tyrannical, though in an inferior degree; because here the subject is aware of the danger he is exposed to, and may by prudent caution provide against it. The statute law of England does therefore very seldom, and the common law does never, inflict any punishment extending to life or limb, unless upon the highest necessity: and the constitution is an utter stranger to any arbitrary power of killing or maiming the subject without the express warrant of law. "Nullus liber homo, says the great charter [e], aliquo modo destruatur, nisi per legale judicium parium suorum aut per legem terrae." Which words, "aliquo modo destruatur," according to sir Edward Coke [f], include a prohibition not only of killing, and maiming, but also of torturing (to which our laws are strangers) and of every oppression by colour of an illegal authority. And it is enacted by the statute 5 Edw. III. c. 9. that no man shall be forejudged of life or limb, contrary to the great charter and the law of the land: and again, by statute 28 Ed. III. c. 3. that no man shall be put to death, without being brought to answer by due process of law.[17]

3. Besides those limbs and members that may be necessary to man, in order to defend himself or annoy his enemy, the rest of his person or body is also entitled by the same natural right to security from the corporal insults of menaces, assaults, beating, and wounding; though such insults amount not to destruction of life or member.

4. The preservation of a man's health from such practices as may prejudice or annoy it, and

5. The security of his reputation or good name from the arts of detraction and slander, are rights to which every man is intitled, by reason and natural justice; since without these it is impossible to have the perfect enjoyment of any other advantage or right. But these three last articles (being of much less importance than those which have gone before, and those which are yet to come) it will suffice to have barely mentioned among the rights of persons; referring the more minute discussion of their several branches, to those parts of our commentaries which treat of the infringement of these rights, under the head of personal wrongs.

II. Next to personal security, the law of England regards, asserts, and preserves the personal liberty of individuals. This personal liberty consists in the power of loco-motion, of changing situation, or removing one's person to whatsoever place one's own inclination may direct; without imprisonment or restraint, unless by due course of law. Concerning which we may make the same observations as upon the preceding article; that it is a right strictly natural; that the laws of England have never abridged it without sufficient cause; and, that in this kingdom it cannot ever be abridged at the mere discretion of the magistrate, without the explicit permission of the laws. Here again the language of the great charter [g] is, that no freeman shall be taken or imprisoned, but by the lawful judgment of his equals, or by the law of the land. And many subsequent old statutes [h] expressly direct, that no man shall be taken or imprisoned by suggestion or petition to the king, or his council, unless it be by legal indictment, or the process of the common law. By the petition of right, 3 Car. I, it is enacted, that no freeman shall be imprisoned or detained without cause shewn, to which he may make answer according to law. By 16 Car. I. c. 10. if any person be restrained of his liberty by order or decree of any illegal court, or by command of the king's majesty in person, or by warrant of the council board, or of any of the privy council; he shall, upon demand of his counsel, have a writ of habeas corpus, to bring his body before the court of king's bench or common pleas; who shall determine whether the cause of his commitment be just, and thereupon do as to justice shall appertain. And by 31 Car. II. c. 2. commonly called the habeas corpus act, the methods of obtaining this writ are so plainly pointed out and enforced, that, so long as this statute remains unimpeached, no subject of England can be long detained in prison, except in those cases in which the law requires and justifies such detainer. And, lest this act should be evaded by demanding unreasonable bail, or sureties for the prisoner's appearance, it is declared by 1 W. & M. st. 2. c. 2. that excessive bail ought not to be required.[18]

Of great importance to the public is the preservation of this personal liberty: for if once it were left in the power of any, the highest, magistrate to imprison arbitrarily whomever he or his officers thought proper, (as in France it is daily practiced by the crown) there would soon be an end of all other rights and immunities. Some have thought, that unjust attacks, even upon life, or property, at the arbitrary will of the magistrate, are less dangerous to the commonwealth, than such as are made upon the personal liberty of the subject. To bereave a man of life, or by violence to confiscate his estate, without accusation or trial, would be so gross and notorious an act of despotism, as must at once convey the alarm of tyranny throughout the whole kingdom. But confinement of the person, by secretly hurrying him to gaol, where his sufferings are unknown or forgotten; is a less public, a less striking, and therefore a more dangerous engine of arbitrary government. And yet sometimes, when the state is in real danger, even this may be a necessary measure. But the happiness of our constitution is, that it is not left to the executive power to determine when the danger of the state is so great, as to render this measure expedient. For the parliament only, or legislative power, whenever it sees proper, can authorize the crown, by suspending the habeas corpus act for a short and limited time, to imprison suspected persons without giving any reason for so doing. As the senate of Rome was wont to have recourse to a dictator, a magistrate of absolute authority, when they judged the republic in any imminent danger. The decree of the senate, which usually preceded the nomination of this magistrate, "dent operam consules, nequid respublica detrimenti capiat," was called the senatus consultum ultimae necessitatis. In like manner this experiment ought only to be tried in cases of extreme emergency; and in these the nation parts with it's liberty for a while, in order to preserve it for ever.

THE confinement of the person, in any wise, is an imprisonment. So that the keeping a man against his will in a private house, putting him in the stocks, arresting or forcibly detaining him in the street, is an imprisonment [i]. And the law so much discourages unlawful confinement, that if a man is under duress of imprisonment, which we before explained to mean a compulsion by an illegal restraint of liberty, until he seals a bond or the like; he may alledge this duress, and avoid the extorted bond. But if a man be lawfully imprisoned, and either to procure his discharge, or on any other fair account, seals a bond or a deed, this is not by duress of imprisonment, and he is not at liberty to avoid it [k]. To make imprisonment lawful, it must either be, by process from the courts of judicature, or by warrant from some legal officer, having authority to commit to prison; which warrant must be in writing, under the hand and seal of the magistrate, and express the causes of the commitment, in order to be examined into (if necessary) upon a habeas corpus. If there be no cause expressed, the goaler is not bound to detain the prisoner [l]. For the law judges in this respect, saith sir Edward Coke, like Festus the Roman governor; that it is unreasonable to send a prisoner, and not to signify withal the crimes alleged against him.[19]

A NATURAL and regular consequence of this personal liberty, is, that every Englishman may claim a right to abide in his own country so long as he pleases; and not to be driven from it unless by the sentence of the law. The king indeed, by his royal prerogative, may issue out his writ ne exeat regnum, and prohibit any of his subjects from going into foreign parts without licence [m]. This may be necessary for the public service, and safeguard of the commonwealth. But no power on earth, except the authority of parliament, can send any subject of England out of the land against his will; no not even a criminal. For exile, or transportation, is a punishment unknown to the common law; and, wherever it is now inflicted, it is either by the choice of the criminal himself, to escape a capital punishment, or else by the express direction of some modern act of parliament. To this purpose the great charter [n] declares that no freeman shall be banished, unless by the judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land. And by the habeas corpus act, 31 Car. II. c. 2. (that second magna carta, and stable bulwark of our liberties) it is enacted, that no subject of this realm, who is an inhabitant of England, Wales, or Berwick, shall be sent prisoner into Scotland, Ireland, Jersey, Guernsey, or places beyond the seas; (where they cannot have the benefit and protection of the common law) but that all such imprisonments shall be illegal; that the person, who shall dare to commit another contrary to this law, shall be disabled from bearing any office, shall incur the penalty of a praemunire, and be incapable of receiving the king's pardon: and the party suffering shall also have his private action against the person committing, and all his aiders, advisers and abettors, and shall recover treble costs; besides his damages, which no jury shall assess at less than five hundred pounds.[20]

THE law is in this respect so benignly and liberally construed for the benefit of the subject, that, though within the realm the king may command the attendance and service of all his liegemen, yet he cannot send any man out of the realm, even upon the public service: he cannot even constitute a man lord deputy or lieutenant of Ireland against his will, nor make him a foreign embassador [o]. For this might in reality be no more than an honorable exile.[21]

III. THE third absolute right, inherent in every Englishman, is that of property: which consists in the free use, enjoyment, and disposal of all his acquisitions, without any control or diminution, save only by the laws of the land. The original of private property is probably founded in nature, as will be more fully explained in the second book of the ensuing commentaries: but certainly the modifications under which we at present find it, the method of conserving it in the present owner, and of translating it from man to man, are entirely derived from society; and are some of those civil advantages, in exchange for which every individual has resigned a part of his natural liberty. The laws of England are therefore, in point of honor and justice, extremely watchful in ascertaining and protecting this right. Upon this principle the great charter [p] has declared that no freeman shall be disseised, or divested, of his freehold, or of his liberties, or free customs, but by the judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land. And by a variety of antient statutes [q] it is enacted, that no man's lands or goods shall be seised into the king's hands, against the great charter, and the law of the land; and that no man shall be disinherited, nor put out of his franchises or freehold, unless he be duly brought to answer, and be forejudged by course of law; and if any thing be done to the contrary, it shall be redressed, and holden for none.[22]

So great moreover is the regard of the law for private property, that it will not authorize the least violation of it; no, not even for the general good of the whole community. If a new road, for instance, were to be made through the grounds of a private person, it might perhaps be extensively beneficial to the public; but the law permits no man, or set of men, to do this without consent of the owner of the land. In vain may it be urged, that the good of the individual ought to yield to that of the community; for it would be dangerous to allow any private man, or even any public tribunal, to be the judge of this common good, and to decide whether it be expedient or no. Besides, the public good is in nothing more essentially interested, than in the protection of every individual's private rights, as modelled by the municipal law. In this, and similar cases the legislature alone can, and indeed frequently does, interpose, and compel the individual to acquiesce. But how does it interpose and compel? Not by absolutely stripping the subject of his property in an arbitrary manner; but by giving him a full indemnification and equivalent for the injury thereby sustained. The public is now considered as an individual, treating with an individual for an exchange. All that the legislature does is to oblige the owner to alienate his possessions for a reasonable price; and even this is an exertion of power, which the legislature indulges with caution, and which nothing but the legislature can perform.

Nor is this the only instance in which the law of the land has postponed even public necessity to the sacred and inviolable rights of private property. For no subject of England can be constrained to pay any aids or taxes, even for the defence of the realm or the support of government, but such as are imposed by his own consent, or that of his representatives in parliament. By the statute 25 Edw. I. c. 5 and 6. it is provided, that the king shall not take any aids or tasks, but by the common assent of the realm. And what that common assent is, is more fully explained by 34 Edw. I. st. 4. cap. 1. which enacts, that no talliage or aid shall be taken without assent of the archbishops, bishops, earls, barons, knights, burgesses, and other freemen of the land [r] : and again by 14. Edw. III. st. 2. c. 1. the prelates, earls, barons, and commons, citizens, burgesses, and merchants shall not be charged to make any aid, if it be not by the common assent of the great men and commons in parliament. And as this fundamental law had been shamefully evaded under many succeeding princes, by compulsive loans, and benevolences extorted without a real and voluntary consent, it was made an article in the petition of right 3 Car. I, that no man shall be compelled to yield any gift, loan, or benevolence, tax, or such like charge, without common consent by act of parliament. And, lastly, by the statute 1 W. & M. st. 2. c. 2. it is declared, that levying money for or to the use of the crown, by pretence of prerogative, without grant of parliament; or for longer time, or in other manner, than the same is or shall be granted, is illegal.[23]

IN the three preceding articles we have taken a short view of the principal absolute rights which appertain to every Englishman. But in vain would these rights be declared, ascertained, and protected by the dead letter of the laws, if the constitution had provided no other method to secure their actual enjoyment. It has therefore established certain other auxiliary subordinate rights of the subject, which serve principally as barriers to protect and maintain inviolate the three great and primary rights, of personal security, personal liberty, and private property. These are,

1. THE constitution, powers, and privileges of parliament, of which I shall treat at large in the ensuing chapter.
2. THE limitation of the king's prerogative, by bounds so certain and notorious, that it is impossible he should exceed them without the consent of the people. Of this also I shall treat in it's proper place. The former of these keeps the legislative power in due health and vigour, so as to make it improbable that laws should be enacted destructive of general liberty: the latter is a guard upon the executive power, by restraining it from acting either beyond or in contradiction to the laws, that are framed and established by the other.
3. A third subordinate right of every Englishman is that of applying to the courts of justice for redress of injuries. Since the law is in England the supreme arbiter of every man's life, liberty, and property, courts of justice must at all times be open to the subject, and the law be duly administred therein. The emphatical words of magna carta [s], spoken in the person of the king, who in judgment of law (says sir Edward Coke [t]) is ever present and repeating them in all his courts, are these; "nulli vendemus, nulli negabimus, aut differemus rectum vel justitiam: and therefore every subject," continues the same learned author, "for injury done to him in bonis, in terris, vel persona, by any other subject, be he ecclesiastical or temporal without any exception, may take his remedy by the course of the law, and have justice and right for the injury done to him, freely without sale, fully without any denial, and speedily without delay." It were endless to enumerate all the affirmative acts of parliament wherein justice is directed to be done according to the law of the land: and what that law is, every subject knows; or may know if he pleases: for it depends not upon the arbitrary will of any judge; but is permanent, fixed, and unchangeable, unless by authority of parliament. I shall however just mention a few negative statutes, whereby abuses, perversions, or delays of justice, especially by the prerogative, are restrained. It is ordained by magna carta [u], that no freeman shall be outlawed, that is, put out of the protection and benefit of the laws, but according to the law of the land. By 2 Edw. III. c. 8. and 11 Ric. II. c. 10. it is enacted, that no commands or letters shall be sent under the great seal, or the little seal, the signet, or privy seal, in disturbance of the law; or to disturb or delay common right: and, though such commandments should come, the judges shall not cease to do right. And by 1 W. & M. st. 2. c.2. it is declared, that the pretended power of suspending, or dispensing with laws, or the execution of laws, by regal authority without consent of parliament, is illegal.[24]

Not only the substantial part, or judicial decisions, of the law, but also the formal part, or method of proceeding, cannot be altered but by parliament: for if once those outworks were demolished, there would be no inlet to all manner of innovation in the body of the law itself. The king, it is true, may erect new courts of justice; but then they must proceed according to the old established forms of the common law. For which reason it is declared in the statute 16 Car. I. c. 10. upon the dissolution of the court of starchamber, that neither his majesty, nor his privy council, have any jurisdiction, power, or authority by English bill, petition, articles, libel (which were the course of proceeding in the starchamber, borrowed from the civil law) or by any other arbitrary way whatsoever, to examine, or draw into question, determine or dispose of the lands or goods of any subjects of this kingdom; but that the same ought to be tried and determined in the ordinary courts of justice, and by course of law.

4. If there should happen any uncommon injury, or infringement of the rights beforementioned, which the ordinary course of law is too defective to reach, there still remains a fourth subordinate right appertaining to every individual, namely, the right of petitioning the king, or either house of parliament, for the redress of grievances. In Russia we are told [w] that the czar Peter established a law, that no subject might petition the throne, till he had first petitioned two different ministers of state. In case he obtained justice from neither, he might then present a third petition to the prince; but upon pain of death, if found to be in the wrong. The consequence of which was, that no one dared to offer such third petition; and grievances seldom falling under the notice of the sovereign, he had little opportunity to redress them. The restrictions, for some there are, which are laid upon petitioning in England, are of a nature extremely different; and while they promote the spirit of peace, they are no check upon that of liberty. Care only must be taken, lest, under the pretence of petitioning, the subject be guilty of any riot or tumult; as happened in the opening of the memorable parliament in 1640: and, to prevent this, it is provided by the statute 13 Car. II. st. 1. c. 5. that no petition to the king, or either house of parliament, for any alterations in church or state, shall be signed by above twenty persons, unless the matter thereof be approved by three justices of the peace or the major part of the grand jury, in the country; and in London by the lord mayor, aldermen, and common council; nor shall any petition be presented by more than two persons at a time. But under these regulations, it is declared by the statute 1 W. & M. st. 2. c. 2. that the subject hath a right to petition; and that all commitments and prosecutions for such petitioning are illegal.[25]
