5. The fifth and last auxiliary right of the subject, that I shall at present mention, is that of having arms for their defence, suitable to their condition and degree, and such as are allowed by law. Which is also declared by the same statute 1 W. & M. st. 2. c. 2. and is indeed a public allowance, under due restrictions, of the natural right of resistance and self-preservation, when the sanctions of society and laws are found insufficient to restrain the violence of oppression.

In these several articles consist the rights, or, as they are frequently termed, the liberties of Englishmen: liberties more generally talked of, than thoroughly understood; and yet highly necessary to be perfectly known and considered by every man of rank or property, lest his ignorance of the points whereon it is founded should hurry him into faction and licentiousness on the one hand, or a pusillanimous indifference and criminal submission on the other. And we have seen that these rights consist, primarily, in the free enjoyment of personal security, of personal liberty, and of private property. So long as these remain inviolate, the subject is perfectly free; for every species of compulsive tyranny and oppression must act in opposition to one or other of these rights, having no other object upon which it can possibly be employed. To preserve these from violation, it is necessary that the constitution of parliaments be supported in it's full vigor; and limits certainly known, be set to the royal prerogative. And, lastly, to vindicate these rights, when actually violated or attacked, the subjects of England are entitled, in the first place, to the regular administration and free course of justice in the courts of law; next to the right of petitioning the king and parliament for redress of grievances; and lastly to the right of having and using arms for self-preservation and defence. And all these rights and liberties it is our birthright to enjoy entire; unless where the laws of our country have laid them under necessary restraints. Restraints in themselves so gentle and moderate, as will appear upon farther enquiry, that no man of sense or probity would wish to see them slackened. For all of us have it in our choice to do every thing that a good man would desire to do; and are restrained from nothing, but what would be pernicious either to ourselves or our fellow citizens. So that this review of our situation may fully justify the observation of a learned French author, who indeed generally both thought and wrote in the spirit of genuine freedom [x] ; and who hath not scrupled to profess, even in the very bosom of his native country, that the English is the only nation in the world, where political or civil liberty is the direct end of it's constitution. Recommending therefore to the student in our laws a farther and more accurate search into this extensive and important title, I shall close my remarks upon it with the expiring wish of the famous father Paul to his country, "esto perpetua!"[26]

Blackstone Commentaries, book I, ch. 1; vol. I, pp. 117–41.

10.3.1.4Cunningham, 1765

Liberties and rights. Magna Charta, 9 Hen. 3. cap. 9. The city of London shall have all her ancient liberties and customs; and all other cities, boroughs and towns, and the barons of the five ports, and all ports, shall have all their liberties and free customs.

Magna Charta, 9 Hen. 3. cap. 29. No freeman shall be taken or imprisoned, or disseised of his freehold, or of his liberties or free customs, or be outlawed, banished or otherwise destroyed; nor shall the King pass or send upon him, but by the lawful judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land. The King shall sell to none, or deny or delay to none, right or justice. See afterwards 25 Ed. 3. st. 5. cap. 4. and 42 Ed. 3. cap. 3.

Stat. Marleb. 52 Hen. 3. cap. 22. None may distrain his freeholders to answer for their freehold, or of any thing thereunto appertaining, nor make them swear against their will, without the King's command.

Stat. Confirm. Chart. 25 Ed. 1. cap. 2. If any judgment be given contrary to the great charters, it shall be undone and holden for nought.

Stat. Confirm. Chart. 25 Ed. 1. cap. 3. The same charters shall be sent under seal to cathedral churches, and shall be read before the people two times by the year.

Stat. Confirm. Chart. 25 Ed. 1. cap. 4. All archbishops and bishops shall pronounce sentence of excommunication against those that by word, deed or counsel, do contrary to the said charters, or that in any point break them; and the said curses shall be twice a year denounced; and if the prelates be remiss in the denunciation of the sentences, the archbishops of Canterbury and York shall compel them to the execution of their duties. See Excommunication.

Stat. Confirm. Chart. 25 Ed. 1. cap. 5. The aids and tasks which the people have given of their own good-will shall not be drawn into custom.

Stat. Confirm. Chart. 25 Ed. 1. cap. 6. The King shall not take such aids or tasks but by the common assent of the realm, and for the common profit thereof, saving the ancient aids and prises.

Artic. Super Chart. 28 Ed. 1. stat. 3. cap. 1. The great charter of liberties, and the charter of the forest, shall be delivered to every sheriff to be read four times in the year before the people in full county, viz. the next county after the feast of St. Michael, and the next after Christmas, and at the next after Easter, and the next after the feast of St. John; and there shall be chosen in every shire-court by the commonalty three substantial men, knights or other, which shall be justices sworn and assigned by the King's letters patent, to bear and determine (without any other writ but their commission), such plaints as shall be made upon those that offend against any point in the charters, and to hear the plaints from day to day without the delays allowed by the Common law; and the same knights shall have power to punish all such as shall be attainted of any trespass done contrary to the charters (where no remedy was by the Common law), by imprisonment, or by ransom or amercement; nevertheless the knights shall not hold plea where there hath been remedy provided after the course of the Common law by writ, nor shall any prejudice be done to the Common law, nor to the charters aforesaid; and if all three cannot attend to do their office, two of them shall do it; and the King's sheriffs and bailiffs shall be attendant to do the commandments of the said justices.

Stat. de Talleg. non concedend. 34 Ed. 1. stat. 4. cap. 1. No tallage or aid shall be taken without the assent of archbishops, bishops, earls, barons, knights, burgesses and other freemen of the land.

Stat. 34 Ed. 1. stat. 4. cap. 4. Clerks and laymen shall have their laws, liberties and free customs, as they have used to have the same at any time when they had them best; and if any statutes have been made, or any customs brought in, contrary to them, such statutes and customs shall be void.

Stat. 34 Ed. 1. stat. 4. cap. 6. All archbishops and bishops for ever shall read this charter in their cathedral churches twice in the year, and in their parish churches shall openly denounce accursed all those that willingly procure to be done any thing contrary to this charter.

Stat. 1 Ed. 3. stat. 2. cap. 9. Cities, boroughs and franchised towns, shall enjoy their franchises, customs and usages.

Stat. 2 Ed. 3. cap. 8. It shall not be commanded by the Great seal or the Little seal, to disturb or delay common right; and tho' such commandments come, the justices shall not cease to do right.

Stat. 5 Ed. 3. cap. 9. No man shall be attached by any accusation, nor forejudged of life or limb, nor shall his lands or goods be seised into the King's hands, against the great charter and the law of the land.

Stat. 14 Ed. 3. stat. 1. cap. 1. Holy church shall have her liberties in quietness; and the city of London, and all other cities and boroughs, shall have all their franchises and customs which they have reasonably used in time past.

Stat. 14 Ed. 3. st. 2. cap. 1. The subsidy given to the King shall not be had in example, nor shall the prelates, earls, barons and commons, citizens, burgesses and merchants, be charged to make any aid, if it be not by the common assent of the great men and commons in parliament.

Stat. 14 Ed. 3. st. 5. The realm of England shall not be put in subjection of the King, his heirs or successors, as Kings of France.

Stat. 25 Ed. 3. st. 5. cap. 4. None shall be taken by petition or suggestion made to the King or his council, unless it be by indictment of lawful people of the neighbourhood, or by process made by writ original at the Common law. And none shall be put out of his franchises or freehold, unless he be duly brought to answer, and forejudged by course of law; and if any thing be done to the contrary, it shall be redressed and holden for none.

Stat. 28 Ed. 3. cap. 3. No man shall be put out of land, nor taken, nor imprisoned, nor disherited, nor put to death, without being brought in to answer by due process of law.

Stat. 42 Ed. 3. cap. 3. No man shall be put to answer without presentment before justices, or matter of record of due process, or writ original, according to the ancient law of the land. And if any thing be done to the contrary, it shall be void in law, and held for error.

Stat. 1 Ric. 2. cap. 2. Peace shall be firmly kept, so that all loyal subject may safely go, come and abide, according to the laws and usages of the realm; and good justice and equal right shall be done to every one.

Stat. 11 Ric. 2. cap. 10. Letters of the signet or privy seal shall not be sent in prejudice of the realm or disturbance of the law.

Stat. 15 Ric. 2. cap. 12. None of the King's subjects shall be constrained to appear before the council of any lord, to answer for his freehold, nor any other thing real or personal, which belongeth to the law of the land; and if any find himself grieved contrary to this ordinance, he shall sue to the Chancellor, who shall give remedy.

Stat. 16 Ric. 2. cap. 2. If any lord or other the King's subject do contrary to the statute 15 Richard 2. cap. 12. he shall incur the pain of 20 l. to the King.

Stat. 2 Hen. 4. cap. 1. Holy church shall have her rights and liberties; and all the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and all cities, boroughs and towns enfranchised, shall enjoy their liberties which they have duly used; and all the lieges may in safe protection of the King, go and come to his courts; and full justice and right shall be done, as well to the poor as the rich, in the said courts.

Petition of Right, 3 Car. 1. sect. 10. No man shall be compelled to yield any gift, loan, benevolence, tax or such like charge, without common content by act of parliament; and none shall be called to make answer, or take oath, or to give attendance, or be confined, or otherwise disquieted concerning the same, or for refusal thereof, and no freeman shall be imprisoned or detained, without cause shewn, to which he may make answer according to law; and the people shall not be burthened to suffer soldiers and mariners to sojourn in their houses against their wills; and no commissions shall issue, to proceed within the land according to martial law.

Sect. 11. The late proceedings in the premisses shall not be drawn into consequence; and all the King's officers shall serve him according to the laws of the realm, as they tender the honour of his Majesty, and the prosperity of the Kingdom.

Stat. 16 Car. 1. cap. 10. sect. 3. The court called the StarChamber shall be dissolved, and neither the Lord Chancellor, Lord Treasurer, Keeper of the Privy seal, or President of the Council, nor any Bishop, Temporal Lord, Privy Counsellor or Judge, shall have power to hear or determine any matter in the court called the StarChamber, or to do any judicial or ministerial act in the said court; and all acts of parliament, by which any jurisdiction is given to the court called the StarChamber, shall, for so much, be repealed.

Sect. 4. The like jurisdiction used in the court before the President and council in the marches of Wales, and in the court before the President and council in the Northern parts, and also in the court of the dutchy of Lancaster, and in the court of Exchequer of the county palatine of Chester, held before the chamberlain and council of that court, shall be also repealed; and no court or place of judicature shall be erected within England or Wales, which shall have the like jurisdiction, as hath been used in the court of Star–Chamber.

Sect. 5. Neither his Majesty, nor his privy council, have any jurisdiction, power or authority, by English bill, petition, articles, libel, or any other arbitrary way whatsoever, to examine or draw into question, determine or dispose of the lands or goods of any subjects of this kingdom; but the same ought to be tried and determined in the ordinary court of justice, as by course of law.

Sect. 6. If any Lord Chancellor, Lord Treasurer, Keeper of the Privy seal, President of the council, Bishop, Temporal Lord, Privy Counsellor, Judge or Justice, shall offend contrary to this law, they shall forfeit 500 l. unto any party grieved, his executors or administrators, who shall prosecute for the same, and first obtain judgment, to be recovered in any court of record at Westminster; and if any person against whom any such recovery shall be had, shall offend again in the same, he shall forfeit 1000 l. unto any party grieved, who shall prosecute, &c. and if any person against whom such second recovery shall be had, shall offend again in the same kind, and shall be convicted by indictment or information, or any other lawful way, such person shall be incapable to bear his office, and shall be likewise disabled to make any gift or disposition of his lands or goods, or to take any gift or legacy to his own use.

Sect. 7. Every person so offending shall likewise pay unto the party grieved his treble damages, to be recovered in any of his Majesty's courts at Westminster.

Sect. 8. If any person shall be restrained of his liberty by order or decree of any such court as before, or by command of the King's Majesty in person, or by warrant of the council-board, or of any of his Majesty's Privy council; every person so restrained, upon demand, or motion made by counsel, or other employed by him, unto the judges of the King's Bench, or Common Pleas, in open court, shall without delay, for the ordinary fees, have a habeas corpus directed generally unto all and every sheriffs [sic], gaoler, minister, officer or other person, in whose custody the party shall be, and the sheriffs or other person shall at the return of the writ (upon due notion given, at the charge of the party who procureth such writ, and upon security by his own bond, to pay the charge of carrying back the prisoner, if he shall be remanded; such charges to be ordered by the court, if any difference shall arise) bring the body of the party before the judges in open court, and shall certify the cause of his detainer, and thereupon the court, within three court days after such return made, shall proceed to determine whether the cause of commitment be just, and shall thereupon do what to justice shall appertain. And if any thing shall be willfully done or omitted by any judge, officer, &c. contrary to the direction hereof, such person offending shall forfeit to the party grieved his treble damages, to be recovered as aforesaid.

Sect. 9. This act shall extend only to the court of Starchamber, and to the said courts holden before the President and council in the marches of Wales, and before the President and council in the northern parts, and to the court of the Dutchy of Lancaster, and the court of Exchequer of the county palatine of Chester, and all courts of like jurisdiction to be hereafter erected, and to the warrants and directions of the council-board, and to the commitments of any persons made by the King in person, or by the Privy council.

Sect. 10. No person shall be molested for any offence against this act, unless he be impleaded within two years after the offence committed.

Stat. 1 Will. & Mar. St. 2. cap. 2. sect. 1. Whereas the Lords spiritual and temporal and commens assembled at Westminster, representing all the estates of the people of this realm, did upon the 13th of February 1688. present unto their Majesties, then Prince and Princess of Orange, a declaration, containing that,

The said Lords spiritual and temporal and commons, being assembled in a full and free representative of this nation, for the vindicating their ancient rights and liberties, declare,

That the pretended power of suspending of laws, or the execution of laws, by regal authority, without consent of parliament, is illegal;

That the pretended power of dispensing with laws, or the execution of laws, by regal authority, as it hath been assumed and exercised of late, is illegal;

That the commission for erecting the late court of commissioners for ecclesiastical causes, and all other commissions and courts of like nature, are illegal and pernicious;

That having money for or to the use of the crown, by pretence of prerogative, without grant of parliament, for longer time, or in other manner than the same is or shall be granted, is illegal;

That it is the right of the subjects to petition the King, and all commitments and prosecutions for such petitioning are illegal;

That the raising or keeping a standing army within the kingdom in time of peace, unless it be with consent or parliament, is against law;

That the subjects which are protestants may have arms for their defence suitable to their conditions, and as allowed by law;

That election of members of parliament ought to be free;

That the freedom of speech, and debates or proceedings in parliament, ought not to be impeached or questioned in any court or place out of parliament;

That excessive bail ought not do be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments indicted;

That jurors ought to be duly impanelled and returned, and jurors which pass upon men in trials for high treason ought to be freeholders;

That all grants and promises of fines and forfeitures of particular persons before conviction, are illegal and void;

And for redress of all grievances, and for the amending, strengthening and preserving of the laws, parliaments ought to be held frequently;

And they do claim, demand and insist upon all and singular the premisses, as their undoubted rights and liberties; and that no declarations, judgments, doings or proceedings, to the prejudice of the people in any of the said premisses, ought in any wise to be drawn hereafter into consequence or example;

Sect. 6. All and singular the rights and liberties asserted and claimed in the said declaration are the true, ancient and indubitable rights and liberties of the people of this kingdom, and so shall be esteemed, allowed, adjudged and taken to be; and all the particulars aforesaid shall be firmly holden as they are expressed in the said declaration; and all officers shall serve their Majesties according to the same in all times to come.

Sect. 12. No dispensation by non obstanto of any statute shall be allowed, except a dispensation be allowed of in such statute; and except in such cases as shall be specially provided for during this session of parliament.

Sect. 13. No charter granted before the 23d of October 1689. shall be invalidated by this act, but shall remain of the same force as if this act had never been made.

Stat. 12 & 13 Will. 3. cap. 2. sect. 3. Whereas it is necessary that further provision be made for securing our religion, laws and liberties, after the death of his Majesty and the Princess Anne of Denmark, and in default of issue of the body of the said Princess, and of his Majesty respectively; it is enacted.

That whosoever shall hereafter come to the possession of this crown, shall join in communion with the church of England, as by law established.

That in case the crown and imperial dignity of this realm shall hereafter come to any person, not being a native of this kingdom of England, this nation be not obliged to engage in any war for the defence of any dominions or territories which do not belong to the crown of England, without consent of parliament.

That from the time that the further limitation of this act shall take effect, no person born out of the kingdoms of England, Scotland or Ireland, or the dominions thereunto belonging, although he be naturalized or made a denizen, (except such as are born of English parents) shall be capable to be of the privy council, or a member of either house of parliament, or to enjoy any office or place of trust, either civil or military, or to have any grant of lands, tenements or hereditaments from the crown to himself, or to any other in trust for him.

That no person who has an office or place of profit under the King, or receives a pension from the crown, shall be capable of serving as a member of the house of commons.

That after the said limitation shall take effect, judges commissions be made quamdiu se bene gesserint, and their salaries ascertained and established; but upon the address of both houses of parliament, it may be lawful to remove them.

That no pardon under the Great seal of England be pleadable to an impeachment by the commons in parliament.

Sect. 4. Whereas the laws of England are the birthright of the people thereof, and all the Kings and Queens who shall ascend the throne of this realm, ought to administer the government of the same according to the said laws, and all their officers and ministers ought to serve them according to the same; all the laws and statutes of this realm for securing the established religion, and the rights and liberties of the people, and all other laws and statutes now in force, are by his Majesty, with the advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, ratified and confirmed. See Habeas Corpus, King, Naturalization.

11.2.4.1The Federal Farmer, No. 6, December 25, 1787

The following, I think, will be allowed to be unalienable or fundamental rights in the United States: —

No man, demeaning himself peaceably, shall be molested on account of his religion or mode of worship — The people have a right to hold and enjoy their property according to known standing laws, and which cannot be taken from them without their consent, or the consent of their representatives; and whenever taken in the pressing urgencies of government, they are to receive a reasonable compensation for it — Individual security consists in having free recourse to the laws — The people are subject to no laws or taxes not assented to by their representatives constitutionally assembled — They are at all times intitled to the benefits of the writ of habeas corpus, the trial by jury in criminal and civil causes — They have a right, when charged, to a speedy trial in the vincinage; to be heard by themselves or counsel, not to be compelled to furnish evidence against themselves, to have witnesses face to face, and to confront their adversaries before the judge — No man is held to answer a crime charged upon him till it be substantially described to him; and he is subject to no unreasonable searches or seizures of his person, papers or effects — The people have a right to assemble in an orderly manner, and petition the government for a redress of wrongs — The freedom of the press ought not to be restrained — No emoluments, except for actual service — No hereditary honors, or orders of nobility, ought to be allowed — The military ought to be subordinate to the civil authority, and no soldier be quartered on the citizens without their consent — The militia ought always to be armed and disciplined, and the usual defence of the country — The supreme power is in the people, and power delegated ought to return to them at stated periods, and frequently — The legislative, executive, and judicial powers, ought always to be kept distinct — others perhaps might be added.

11.2.4.2Luther Martin, Genuine Information, No. 8, January 22, 1788

I considered, Sir, that there might be times of such great public calamities and distress, and of such extreme scarcity of specie as should render it the duty of a government for the preservation of even the most valuable part of its citizens in some measure to interfere in their favour, by passing laws totally or partially stopping the courts of justice — or authorising the debtor to pay by instalments, or by delivering up his property to his creditors at a reasonable and honest valuation. — The times have been such as to render regulations of this kind necessary in most, or all of the States, to prevent the wealthy creditor and the monied man from totally destroying the poor though even industrious debtor — Such times may again arrive. — I therefore, voted against depriving the States of this power, a power which I am decided they ought to possess, but which I admit ought only to be exercised on very important and urgent occasions. — I apprehended, Sir, the principal cause of complaint among the people at large is, the public and private debt with which they are oppressed, and which, in the present scarcity of cash, threatens them with destruction, unless thay can obtain so much indulgence in point of time that by industry and frugality they may extricate themselves.

This government proposed, I apprehend so far from removing will greatly encrease those complaints, since grasping in its all powerful hand the citizens of the respective States, it will buy the imposition of the variety of taxes, imposts, stamps, excises and other duties, squeeze from them the little money they may acquire, the hard earnings of their industry, as you would squeeze the juice from an orange, till not a drop more can be extracted, and then let loose upon them, their private creditors, to whose mercy it consigns them, by whom their property is to be seized upon and sold in this scarcity of specie at a sheriffs sale, where nothing but ready cash can be received for a tenth part of its value, and themselves and their families to be consigned to indigence and distress, without their governments having a power to give them a moment's indulgence, however necessary it might be, and however desirous to grant them aid.

III. THE third absolute right, inherent in every Englishman, is that of property: which consists in the free use, enjoyment, and disposal of all his acquisitions, without any control or diminution, save only by the laws of the land. The original of private property is probably founded in nature, as will be more fully explained in the second book of ensuing commentaries: but certainly the modifications under which we at present find it, the method of conserving it in its present owner, and of translating it from man to man, are entirely derived from society; and are some of those civil advantages, in exchange for which every individual has resigned a part of his natural liberty. The laws of England are therefore, in point of honor and justice, extremely watchful in ascertaining and protecting this right. Upon this principle the great charter [p] has declared that no freeman shall be disseised or divested, of his freehold, or of his liberties, or free customs, but by the judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land. And by a variety of antient statutes [q] it is enacted, that no man's lands or goods shall be seised into the king's hands, against the great charter, and the law of the land; and that no man shall be disinherited, nor put out of his franchises or freehold, unless he be duly brought to answer, and be forejudged by course of law; and if any thing be done to the contrary, it shall be redressed, and holden for none.[4]

So great moreover is the regard of the law for private property, that it will not authorize the least violation of it; no, not even for the general good of the whole community. If a new road, for instance, were to be made through the grounds of a private person, it might be perhaps be extensively beneficial to the public; but the law permits no man, or set of men, to do this without the consent of the owner of the land. In vain may it be urged, that the good of the individual ought to yield to that of the community; for it would be dangerous to allow any private man, or even any public tribunal, to be the judge of this common good, and to decide whether it be expedient or no. Besides, the public good is in nothing more essentially interested, than in the protection of every individual's private rights, as modelled by the municipal law. In this, and similar cases the legislature alone can, and indeed frequently does, interpose and compel the individual to acquiesce. But how does it interpose and compel? Not by absolutely stripping the subject of his property in an arbitrary manner; but by giving him a full indemnification and equivalent for the injury thereby sustained. The public is now considered an individual, treating with an individual for an exchange. All that the legislature does is to oblige the owner to alienate his possessions for a reasonable price; and even this is an exertion of power, which the legislature indulge with caution, and which nothing but the legislature can perform.

11.3.2CASE LAW

11.3.2.1RESPUBLICA V. SPARHAWK, 1788

THIS was an appeal from the Comptroller General's decision, on the trial of which, by consent of the Attorney General, Sparhawk was considered as Plaintiff.

There was a verdict and judgment nisi for the Commonwealth, when Ingersol obtained a rule to shew cause why a new trial should not be granted.

The case was this:—Congress, perceiving that it was the intention of the British army to possess themselves of Philadelphia, and being informed that considerable deposits of provisions &c. were made in that city, entered into a resolution on the 11th of April, 1777, thats "a Committee should be appointed to examine into the truth of their information; and, if it was found true, to take effectual measures, in conjunction with the Pennsylvania Board of War, to prevent such provisions from falling into the hands of the enemy," [sic]

On the 13th of the same month, the Pennsylvania Board of War, in aid of this resolution, addressed a circular letter to a number of citizens in each ward of the city, requesting them "to obtain from every family a return of the provisions &c. then in possession, and the number of persons that composed the families respectively, in order that proper measures might be pursued for removing any unnecessary quantity of supplies to a place of security." At the same time, it was mentioned, that "this proceeding was not intended to alter or divest the property in the articles removed: but, on the contrary, that the same should be at all times liable to the order of the respective owners, provided they were not exposed to be taken by the enemy."

That no precaution might be omitted upon this occasion, the Pennsylvania Board of War, on the succeeding day, desired General Schuyler to prevent the introduction of further supplies, and to adopt the most effectual means for preventing the departure of the waggons which were then in the city, and for procuring as many more as would be necessary to transport, not only the public stores, but also such private effects, as it might be thought expedient to remove.

Several intercepted letters having encreased the apprehensions of Congress, on the 16th of April, 1777, they resolved, "that it be recommended to the President and Members of the executive authority of this State, to request the commanding officer of the continental forces in this city, to take the most effectual means, that all provisions, and every other article, which, by falling into the hands of the enemy, may aid them in their operations of war against the United States, or the loss of which might distress the continental army, be immediately removed to such places, as shall be deemed most convenient and secure."

This recommendation was transmitted by the Executive Council to the Pennsylvania Board of War, who, on the 18th of April, passed an order, that "houses, barns, stores, &c. should be hired or seized, for the reception of such articles, as should be sent out of the city by their direction or that of Congress;" and, accordingly, a very considerable quantity of property was soon removed to Chestnut-Hill, and placed under the care of Messrs. Loughead and Barnhill; who gave receipts to the owners, promising "to restore what belonged to them respectively, or to deliver the same to their respective orders."

The enemy, not approaching so rapidly as was expected, a considerable part of this property had, accordingly, been re-delivered to the order of the owners, before the city was entered by the British troops; when, however, the depot at Chestnut-Hill fell, likewise, into their hands, and, with it, 227 barrels of flour, belonging to Sparhawk; being the remainder of 323 barrels that had been originally removed thither, in consequence of the above mentioned proceedings.

For the price of these 227 barrels of flour, with interest from the time of their being taken, Sparhawk exhibited an account, amounting to £919 6 6 against the public; upon which the Comptroller-General reported to the Executive Council, that "neither the principal, the interest, nor any part of either, could be allowed;" and against this decision the present appeal was entered.

The question, therefore, on the motion for a new trial, was, whether this claim, under all the circumstances, ought to be admitted? and it was argued on the 28th of April, by Ingersol, for the Appellant; and the Attorney General, for the Commonwealth.

On the part of the Appellant, it was premised, that, in a season of peace, the law had so great a regard for private property, that it would not authorize the least violation of it; no, not even for the general good of the whole community. 1 Black. Com. 139 [135?]. And, it was contended, that, although a state of war entitled one nation to seize and lay waste the property of another, and their respective subjects to molest the persons, and to seize the effects of their opponents, yet, as between a state and its own citizens, the principle, with respect to the rights or property, is immutably the same, in war as well as peace. Sometimes, indeed, the welfare of the public may be allowed to interfere with the immediate possessions of an individual; but these must be cases of absolute necessity, in which every good citizen ought chearfully [sic] to acquiesce: Yet, even then, justice requires, and the law declares, that an adequate compensation should be made for the wrong that is done. For, the burthen of the war ought to be equally borne by all who are interested in it, and not fall disproportionately heavy upon a few. These general principles are fortified by the explicit language of the Declaration of Rights, Sect. 8. which provides, that "no part of a man's property can be justly taken from him, or applied to public uses, without his own consent, or that of his legal Representatives." In the present case the Appellant did not voluntarily surrender his property, nor was it taken from him by any legislative sanction.

That there are, however, some instances where an individual is not entitled to redress for injuries committed on his property in the prosecution of public objects, must be admitted; but these instances are carefully distinguished by the writers on the law of nations; Vatt. B. 3. Sect 232. and are in no degree analogous to the foundation of the Appellant's claim. If, indeed, the property in question had remained in Philadelphia, and had there been seized by the enemy, there could have been no reason to claim an indemnification from the public; but, when it was taken out of the possession of the owner by the executive authority of the State, and removed to a distant place, with a promise of restoring it on demand, the subsequent capture being clearly a consequence of this interference, the government is bound to indemnify the Appellant for his loss.

It is unnecessary to travel into an investigation of the various modes, by which an individual may seek for redress and compensation, where his property has been divested for the use of the public. The right is clear, and that every right must have a remedy, is a principle of general law, which the Legislature of Pennsylvania has expressly recognized; directing, by an early

Act of Assembly, the settlement of the accounts of the Committee and Council of Safety; and prescribing in what manner the claims of individuals should be settled and discharged. 2 State Laws 144. To these bodies, the Pennsylvania Board of War succeeded; the business of the Board was transacted in the same way; and there can be no good reason, why the obligations which they incurred, should not be as fairly and fully adjusted and satisfied. The Legislature, indeed, must have regarded the matter in the same light; for, finding that the former law was inadequate to its objects, another was enacted to appoint a Comptroller General, and to authorize him "to liquidate and settle, according to law and equity, all claims against the Commonwealth, for services performed, monies advanced, or articles furnished, by order of the legislative, or executive powers for the use of the same, or for any other purpose whatever."—This authority embraced the Appellant's claim, and the Comptroller General has erred in deciding against it.

The Attorney General, for the Commonwealth, stated the case to be breifly this; that the Pennsylvania Board of War, acting under the recommendations of Congress, removed, among other things, a quantity of flour belonging to the Appellant, in order to prevent its falling into the hands of the enemy: declaring, however, that the removal was not intended to divest the property, but that the flour should still be subject to the order of the owner, provided it was not exposed to a capture. The flour being afterwards seized by the British troops at the place where the Pennsylvania Board of War had deposed it, two questions arise:—1st. Whether this Court has power to grant relief to the Appellant, if any ought to be granted. And 2dly. Whether, on principles of the law and equity, he is entitled to be relieved.

I. Considering this as a case immediately between Sparhawk and the Commonwealth, it is clear, that a sovereign is not amenable in any Court, unless by his own consent; I Black. Com. 242. And, therefore, unless the Commonwealth has expressly consented, there is nothing in the constitution of this Court, which can warrant their sustaining the present proceeding. What then is the evidence of consent? We are refered [sic] to the law appointing the Comptroller General. Let us examine this law; and as the case comes by appeal from the Comptroller, if it appears that he had no authority to liquidate and settle Sparhawk's claim, it follows, as a necessary consequence, that this Court, also, has no jurisdiction for the purpose.

By the Act of Assembly which gives the appeal from the Comptroller General's decision to the Supreme Court, 3 State Laws 444. this in restricted to such accounts as he shall settle in pursuance of the preceding Act, by which he was appointed; 3 State Laws 57. and there, we find, the specific object of his authority to be, the liquidation and settlement of all claims against the Commonwealth, "for services performed, monies advanced, or articles furnished, by order of the legislative, or executive powers, &c." In order, therefore, to found the jurisdiction of the Comptroller, two thing must concur—1st. that the claim be for services performed, movies advanced, or articles furnished; and 2dly. that the debt has been incurred by order of the legislative or executive power.

Now, in the present case, the Appellant makes no claim for services performed, or money advanced, and it is impossible for the most ingenious fancy to bring his demand within the description of articles furnished. It is conceded, indeed, that the law does not, in peace, acknowledge any authority to violate the rights of property, or to interfere with the possessions of individuals; but there is in war a transcendant power, which is connected with the fundamental principle of all governments, the preservation of the whole; and the interest of private persons may certainly, in that season, be sacrificed, ne quid respublica detrimenti capiat. The loss, of which the Appellant complains, was occasioned by the exercise of this power. As a tort it cannot be charged against the Commonwealth; for, a declaration stating it so would be cause of demurrer: And, therefore, as it is only in cases of contract, either express or implied, that the Comptroller General is authorized to act, there is no jurisdiction which can relieve him, but that of the Legislative.

But, in the next place, the claim does not originate upon any order of the legislative, or executive, power, agreeably to the terms of the act. The order for the removal of the provision, &c. to Chestnut-Hill was issued by the Pennsylvania Board of war, not in obedience to the Executive Council, but in pursuance of a recommendation from Congress, which the Executive Council merely transmitted to the Board. Even, indeed, if the Executive Council had undertaken to direct this proceeding, a question would still arise, whether they had a right to do so? for, the act of Assembly, providing for the settlement of claims against the public by order of the Executive Council, though not in express words, yet, by a necessary implication, must intend a legitimate order, founded upon the constitutional powers of that department, or issued under the authority of some law. The Executive Council cannot otherwise charge the public; without the legislative sanction they cannot erect magazines, or any other public building; nor enter into the most trifling contract; of which, indeed, a recent proof apears, in the refusal of the General Assembly to pay for the arms of the State, that had been placed in the Supreme Court, or to discharge the additional expence of the Triumphal Arch, which had been incurred by the direction and upon the faith of the Executive Council.

II. But, it is further to be shewn; that, even supposing the Comptroller General, or this Court upon appeal, had the power of granting Sparhawk's claim, yet, that the claim itself is not founded in law or equity, and ought, therefore, to be rejected.—If the Appellant's claim is just, he ought either to urge it against the immediate agent in the wrong which he has sustained, or travel to the source, and demand reparation from Congress. The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania cannot be liable; for, the persons who took and kept the provisions, &c. at Chestnut-Hill, acted under the authority of the Board of war, who, it is true, were appointed by the Executive Council; but, in this instance, proceeded entirely upon the recommendation of Congress, which the Executive Council did not, and could not legally, enjoin or enforce. It is possible, however, that, in strict law, Messers. Loughead and Barnhill would have been liable as trespassers, had not the Legislature interfered to protect persons in their situation from vexatious prosecutions: 3 State Laws. 178. And this act, although it relates immediately to individuals, shews, generally, that the temporary bodies, by whose orders such individuals were governed, are, likewise, to be exempted from suits, on account of their conduct in the service of their country.

But, on what ground can redress be at all expected on this occasion? The removal of the Appellant's property arose from the necessity of the war; it was not done to convert the flour to the public use, nor to deprive the owner of the advantages of it, any farther than the paramount consideration of the public welfare required. The object was to secure it from the depredations of the enemy; and, that it, afterwards, fell into their hands, was an event involuntary, and merely accidental, in which case Vattel expressly says, no compensation shall be made. Vatt. lib. 3. sect. 232. If the Appellant is entitled to relief, every farmer whose cattle have been driven from his plantation to avoid the enemy; every man whose liquors have been staved, or provisions destroyed, upon the approach of the British troops; all the owners of Tynicum island, which was deluged by a military mandate; and, in short, every one whose interests have been affected by the chance of war, must also, in an equal distribution of justice, be effectually indemnified.—

What nation could sustain the enormous load of debt which so ruinous a doctrine would create!

Ingersoll, in reply. — With respect to the first point made on the part of the Commonwealth, it is not contended, for the Appellant, that, generally speaking, citizens may sue the State; but only that every Government, which is not absolutely despotic, has provided some means (in England, for instance, by petition in Chancery) to obtain a redress of injuries from the Sovereign.

As to the second point; — The Pennsylvania Board of war acted under the authority of the Executive Council; and the principal is responsible for the agent. When the Appellant's property was taken out of his own custody, the Government stood in his place, and undertook all the consequent risques. The individuals, who were charged with the care of it, are protected by the act of Assembly; but the State, upon every principle of justice, is still liable for the loss; and the authority of the Comptroller General was intended and has always been understood, to be competent for granting the satisfaction which is now claimed.

The Chief Justice, after stating the case, delivered the opinion of the Court as follows:

McKean, Chief Justice. — On the circumstances of this case, two points arise: 1st, Whether the Appellant ought to receive any compensation, or not? And 2dly, Whether this Court can grant the relief which is claimed?

Upon the first point we are to be governed by reason, by the law of nations, and by precedents analogous to the subject before us. The transaction, it must be remembered, happened flagrante bello; and many things are lawful in that season, which would not be permitted in a time of peace. The seizure of the property in question, can, indeed, only be justified under this distinction; for, otherwise, it would clearly have been a trespass; which, from the very nature of the term, transgressio, imports to go beyond what is right. 5 Bac. Abr. 150. It is a rule, however, that it is better to suffer a private mischief, than a public inconvenience; and the rights of necessity, form a part of our law.

Of this principle, there are many striking illustrations. If a road be out of repair, a passenger may lawfully go through a private enclosure 2 Black. Com. 36. So, if a man is assaulted, he may fly through another's close. 5 Bac. Abr. 173. In time of war, bulwarks may be built on private ground. Dyer. 8. Brook. trespass. 213. 5 Bac. Abr. 175. and the reason assigned is particularly applicable to the present case, because it is for the public safety. 20 Vin. Abr. (treaspass) B. a. sec. 4. fo. 476. Thus, also, every man may, of common right, justify the going of his servants, or horses, upon the banks of navigable rivers, for towing barges, &c. to whomsoever the right of the soil belongs. I Ld. Raym. 725. The pursuit of Foxes through another's ground is allowed, because the destruction of such animals is for the public good, 2 Buls. 62. Cro. I. 321. And, as the safety of the people is a law above all others, it is lawful to part affrayers in the house of another man. Keyl. 46. 5 Bac. Abr. 177. 20 Vin Abr. fo. 407. sec. 14. Houses may be razed to prevent the spreading of fire, because for the public good. Dyer. 36. Rud. L. and E. 312. See Puff. lib. 2. c. 6. sec. 8. Hutch. Mor. Philos. lib. 2. c. 16. We find, indeed, a memorable instance of folly recorded in the 3 Vol. of Clarendon's History, where it is mentioned, that the Lord Mayor of London, in 1666, when that city was on fire, would not give directions for, or consent to, the pulling down forty wooden houses, or to the removing the furniture, &c. belonging to the Lawyers of the Temple, then on the Circuit, for fear he should be answerable for a trespass; and in consequence of this conduct half that great city was burnt.

We are clearly of opinion, that Congress might lawfully direct the removal of any articles that were necessary to the maintenance of the Continental army, or useful to the enemy, and in danger of falling into their hands; for they were vested with the powers of peace and war, to which this was a natural and necessary incident: And, having done it lawfully, there is nothing in the circumstances of the case, which, we think, entitles the Appellant to a compensation for the consequent loss.

With respect to the second point;—This Court has authority to confirm, or alter, any proceedings, that come properly before the Comptroller General; but if he had no jurisdiction, we can have none. It appears then, that his power is expressly limited to claims "for services performed, monies advanced, or articles furnished," by order of the Legislature, or the Executive Council. And, as he has no right to adjudge a compensation from the State for damages, which individuals may have suffered in the course of our military operations, we are of opinion, that we could grant no relief, even if the Appellant was entitled to it.

By the Court:—Let the rule be discharged; and the Judgment for the Commonwealth be made absolute.

CHAPTER 12

AMENDMENT VI

CRIMINAL TRIAL CLAUSES

12.1TEXTS

12.1.1DRAFTS IN FIRST CONGRESS

12.1.1.1Proposal by Madison in House, June 8, 1789

12.1.1.1.a Fourthly. That in article 1st, section 9, between clauses 3 and 4 [of the Constitution], be inserted these clauses, to wit, …

In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, to be informed of the cause and nature of the accusation, to be confronted with his accusers, and the witnesses against him; to have a compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor; and to have the assistance of counsel for his defence.

Seventhly. That in article 3d, section 2, the third clause be struck out, and in its place be inserted the clauses following, to wit:

The trial of all crimes (except in cases of impeachments, and cases arising in the land or naval forces, or the militia when on actual service in time of war or public danger) shall be by an impartial jury of freeholders of the vicinage, with the requisite of unanimity for conviction, of the right of challenge, and other accustomed requisites; and in all crimes punishable with loss of life or member, presentment or indictment by a grand jury, shall be an essential preliminary, provided that in cases of crimes committed within any county which may be in possession of an enemy, or in which a general insurrection may prevail, the trial may by law be authorised in some other county of the same state, as near as may be to the seat of the offence.

In cases of crimes committed not within any county, the trial may by law be in such county as the laws shall have prescribed. In suits at common law, between man and man, the trial by jury, as one of the best securities to the rights of the people, ought to remain inviolate.

Congressional Register, June 8, 1789, vol. 1, pp. 427–29.

12.1.1.1.b Fourthly. That in article 1st, section 9, between clauses 3 and 4 [of the Constitution], be inserted these clauses, to wit: …

Seventhly. That in article 3d, section 2 [of the Constitution], the third clause be struck out, and in its place be inserted the clauses following, to wit:

The trial of all crimes (except in cases of impeachments, and cases arising in the land or naval forces, or the militia when on actual service in time of war, or public danger,) shall be by an impartial jury of freeholders of the vicinage, with the requisite of unanimity for conviction, of the right of challenge, and other accustomed requisites; and in all crimes punishable with loss of life or member, presentment or indictment by a grand jury, shall be an essential preliminary, provided that in cases of crimes committed within any county which may be in possession of an enemy, or in which a general insurrection may prevail, the trial may by law be authorised in some other county of the same state, as near as may be to the seat of the offence.

In cases of crimes committed not within any county, the trial may by law be in such county as the laws shall have prescribed. In suits at common law between man and man, the trial by jury, as one of the best securities to the rights of the people, ought to remain inviolate.

12.1.1.1.c Fourth. That in article 1st, section 9, between clauses 3 and 4, be inserted these clauses, to wit: …

Seventh. In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, to be informed of the cause and nature of the accusation, to be confronted with his accusers, and the witnesses against him; to have a compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favour; and to have the assistance of counsel for his defence.

The trial of all crimes (except in cases of impeachments, and cases arising in the land or naval forces, or the militia when on actual service in time of war, or public danger,) shall be by an impartial jury of freeholders of the vicinage, with the requisite of unanimity for conviction, of the right of challenge, and other accustomed requisites; and in all crimes punishable with loss of life or member, presentment or indictment by a grand jury shall be an essential preliminary, provided that in cases of crimes committed within any county which may be in possession of an enemy, or in which a general insurrection may prevail, the trial may by law be authorised in some other county of the same state, as near as may be to the seat of the offence.

In cases of crimes committed not within any county, the trial may by law be in such county as the laws shall have prescribed. In suits at common law between man and man, the trial by jury, as one of

12.1.1.5.a Mr. Burke

Moved to amend this proposition in such a manner, as to leave it in the power of the accused to put off their trial to the next session, provided he made appear to the court, that the evidence of the witnesses, for whom process was granted, but not served, was material to his defence.

Congressional Register, August 17, 1789, vol. 2, p. 228 ("The question on mr. Burke's motion was taken, and lost. Affirmative 9, negative 41.").

12.1.1.5.b Several amendments to this article were proposed, some of them were withdrawn and others negatived; and one only obtained, which respected the place of trial, which was to be in the State where the supposed crime was committed.

This amendment was adopted.

12.1.1.6Motion by Livermore in House, August 17, 1789

Mr. Livermore moved to alter the clause, so as to secure to the criminal the right of being tried in the state where the offence was committed.

12.1.1.7Motion by Burke in House, August 17, 1789

Mr. Burke

… proposed to add to the clause, that no criminal prosecution should be had by way of information.

Congressional Register, August 17, 1789, vol. 2, p. 228 ("Mr. Burke withdrew it for the present.").

12.1.1.8House Consideration, August 18, 1789

12.1.1.8.a The house now resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the subject of amendments, and took into consideration the 2d clause of the

7th proposition, in the words following, “The trial of all crimes (except in cases of impeachment, and in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia when in actual service in time of war, or public danger) shall be by an impartial jury of freeholders of the vicinage, with the requisite of unanimity for conviction, the right of challenge, and other accustomed requisites; and no person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment, or indictment, by a grand jury; but if a crime be committed in a place in the possession of an enemy, or in which an insurrection may prevail, the indictment and trial may by law be authorised in some other place within the same state; and if it be committed in a place not within a state, the indictment and trial may be at such place or places as the law may have directed.”

Congressional Register, August 18, 1789, vol. 2, p. 233 (after the motions noted below, “[t]he clause was now adopted without amendment.” Id.).

12.1.1.8.b The committee took up the fifteenth amendment which is as follows:

“The trial of all crimes (except in cases of impeachment, and in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger) shall be by an impartial jury of freeholders of the vicinage, with the requisite of unanimity for conviction, the right of challenge, and other accustomed requisites; and no person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment by a grand jury; but if a crime be committed in a place in the possession of an enemy, or in which an insurrection may prevail, the indictment and trial may by law be authorized in some other place within the same state; and if it be committed in a place not within a state, the indictment and trial may be at such place or places as the law may have directed.”

Daily Advertiser, August 19, 1789, p. 2, cols. 2–3 (“Some inconsiderable amendments to this amendment were moved and lost, and the main question was carried.”).

12.1.1.8.c The committee took up the fifteenth amendment, which is

“The trial of all crimes (except in cases of impeachment, and in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger) shall be by an impartial jury of freeholders of the vicinage, with the requisite of unanimity for conviction, the right of challenge, and other accustomed requisites; and no person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment by a grand jury; but if a crime be committed in a place in the possession of an enemy, or in which an insurrection may prevail, the indictment and trial may by law be authorized in some other place within the same state; and if it be committed in a place not within a state, the indictment and trial may be at such place or places as the law may have directed.”

12.1.2PROPOSALS FROM THE STATE CONVENTIONS

12.1.2.1Maryland Minority, April 26, 1788

2. That there shall be a trial by jury in all criminal cases, according to the course of proceeding in the state where the offence is committed; and that there be no appeal from matter of fact, or second trial after acquittal; but this provision shall not extend to such cases as may arise in the government of the land or naval forces.

Maryland Gazette, May 1, 1788 (committee majority).

12.1.2.2New York, July 26, 1788

That (except in the Government of the Land and Naval Forces, and of the Militia when in actual Service, and in cases of Impeachment) a Presentment or Indictment by a Grand Jury ought to be observed as a necessary preliminary to the trial of all Crimes cognizable by the Judiciary of the United States, and such Trial should be speedy, public, and by an impartial Jury of the County where the Crime was committed; and that no person can be found Guilty without the unanimous consent of such Jury. But in cases of Crimes not committed within any County of the United States, and in Cases of Crimes committed within any County in which a general Insurrection may prevail, or which may be in the possession of a foreign Enemy, the enquiry and trial may be in such County as ∧ [the] Congress shall by Law direct; which County in the two Cases last mentioned should be as near as conveniently may be to that County in which the Crime may have been committed. And that in all Criminal Prosecutions, the Accused ought to be informed of the cause and nature of his Accusations, to be confronted with his accusers and the Witnesses against him, to have the means of producing his Witnesses, and the assistance of Council for his defence, and should not be compelled to give Evidence against himself.

That the trial by Jury in the extent that it obtains by the Common Law of England is one of the greatest securities to the rights of a free People, and ought to remain inviolate.

XIII. And this Convention doth further, in the Name, and by the Authority of the good People of this State, ORDAIN, DETERMINE, AND DECLARE, That no Member of this State shall be disfranchised, or deprived of any the Rights or Privileges secured to the Subjects of this State by this Constitution, unless by the Law of the Land, or the Judgment of his Peers.

XXXIV. AND IT IS FURTHER ORDAINED, That in every Trial on Impeachment or Indictment for Crimes or Misdemeanors, the Party impeached or indicted, shall be allowed Counsel, as in civil Actions.

XLI. And this Convention doth further ORDAIN, DETERMINE, AND DECLARE, in the Name and by the Authority of the good People of this State, That Trial by Jury, in all Cases in which it hath heretofore been used in the Colony of New-York, shall be established, and remain inviolate for ever. And that no Acts of Attainder shall be passed by the Legislature of this State, for Crimes other than those committed before the Termination of the present War; and that such Acts shall not work a Corruption of Blood. And further, that the Legislature of this State shall at no Time hereafter, Institute any new Court or Courts, but such as shall proceed according to the Course of the Common Law.

Second, That no Citizen of this State shall be taken or imprisoned, or be disseised of his or her Freehold, or Liberties, or Free-Customs: or outlawed, or exiled, or condemned, or otherwise destroyed, but by lawful Judgment of his or her Peers, or by due Process of Law.

Third, That no Citizen of this State shall be taken or imprisoned for any Offence, upon Petition or Suggestion, unless it be by indictment or Presentment of good and lawful Men of the same Neighbourhood where such Deeds be done, in due Manner, or by due Process of Law.

Fourth, That no Person shall be put to answer without Presentment before Justices, or Matter of Record, or due Process of Law, according to the Law of the Land; and if any Thing be done to the Contrary, it shall be void in Law, and holden for Error.

Fifth, That no Person, of what Estate or Condition soever, shall be taken, or imprisoned, or disinherited, or put to death, without being brought to answer by due Process of Law; and that no Person shall be put out of his or her Franchise or Freehold, or lose his or her Life or Limb, or Goods and Chattels, unless he or she be duly brought to answer, and be forejudged of the same, by due Course of Law; and if any Thing be done contrary to the same, it shall be void in Law, and holden for none.

Sixth, That neither Justice nor Right shall be sold to any Person, nor denied, nor deferred; and that Writs and Process shall be granted freely and without Delay, to all Persons requiring the same; and nothing from henceforth shall be paid or taken for any Writ or Process, but the accustomed Fees for writing, and for the Seal of the same Writ or Process; and all Fines, Duties and Impositions whatsoever, heretofore taken or demanded, under what Name or Description soever, for, or upon granting any Writs, Inquests, Commissions, or Process to Suitors in their Causes, shall be, and hereby are abolished.

Seventh, That no Citizens of this State shall be fined or amerced without reasonable Cause, and such Fine or Amerciament shall always be according to the Quantity of his or her Trespass or Offence, and saving to him or her his or her Contenement; That is to say, Every Freeholder saving his Freehold, a Merchant saving his Merchandize, and a mechanic saving the Implements of his Trade.

… That the trial by jury in criminal and civil cases, and the modes prescribed by the common law for safety of life in criminal prosecutions shall be held sacred —… That such parts of the new constitution be amended as provide imperfectly for the trial of criminals by a jury of the vicinage, and to supply the omission of a jury trial in civil causes or disputes about property between individuals where by the common law is directed, and as generally it is secured by the several State constitutions. That such parts of the new constitution be amended, as permit the vexatious and oppressive calling of citizens from their own country, and all controversies between citizens of different states and between citizens and foreigners, to be tried in a far distant court, and as it may be without a jury, whereby in a multitude of cases, the circumstances of distance and expence may compel numbers to submit to the most unjust and illfounded demand… .

12.2DISCUSSION OF DRAFTS AND PROPOSALS

12.2.1.1June 8, 1789[3]

12.2.1.2August 15, 1789

Mr.Madison.

> [H]ave not the people been told that the rights of conscience, the freedom of speech, the liberty of the press, and trial by jury, were in jeopardy. That they ought not to adopt the constitution until those important rights were secured to them.
> Congressional Register, August 15, 1789, vol. 1, p. 216.

12.2.1.3.a The committee then proceeded to consider the 7th proposition in the words following:

> Art. 3, Sect. 2. Strike out the whole of the 3d paragraph, and insert, “In all criminal prosecutions, the accused, shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation, to be confronted with the witnesses against him, to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defence.”

Mr.Burke

> Moved to amend this proposition in such a manner, as to leave it in the power of the accused to put off their trial to the next session, provided he made appear to the court, that the evidence of the witnesses, for whom process was granted, but not served, was material to his defence.

Mr.Hartley

> Said that in securing him the right of compulsatory process, the government did all it could, the remainder must lay in the discretion of the court.

Mr. Smith (of S.C.) Thought the regulation would come properly in, as part of the judicial system.

The question on mr. Burke's motion was taken, and lost. Affirmative 9, negative 41.

Mr. Livermore moved to alter the clause, so as to secure to the criminal the right of being tried in the state where the offence was committed.

Mr. Stone observed, that full provision was made on the subject in the subsequent clause.

On the question, mr. Livermore's motion was adopted.

Mr. Burke

Said he was not so much discouraged by the fate of his former motions, but what he would venture upon another, he therefore proposed to add to the clause, that no criminal prosecution should be had by way of information.

Mr. Hartley only requested the gentleman to look to the clause, and he would see the impropriety of inserting it in this place.

A desultory conversation rose, respecting the foregoing motion, and after some time mr. Burke withdrew it for the present.

The committee then arose, and reported progress, after which the house adjourned.

Congressional Register, August 17, 1789, vol. 2, pp. 228–29.

12.2.1.3.b Fourteenth Amendment — Art. 2 [3]. Sec. 3 [2], Strike out the whole of the 3d par. And insert — "In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation, to be confronted with the witnesses against him, to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defence."

This amendment passed.

The committee then rose and the house adjourned.

Daily Advertiser, August 18, 1789, p. 2, col. 4.

12.2.1.3.c Fourteenth amendment — Art, II [III]. Sec. 3 [2], strike out the whole of the 3d par. and insert — "In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation, to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defence."

This amendment passed.

The committee then rose and the house adjourned.

New-York Daily Gazette, August 19, 1789, p. 802, col. 4.

12.2.1.3.d 14th Amendment. Art. II [III]. Sec. 3d [2d], Strike out the whole of the 3d par. and insert: “In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation, to be confronted with the witnesses against him, to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favour, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defence.”

Several amendments to this article were proposed, some of them were withdrawn and others negatived; and one only obtained, which respected the place of trial, which was to be in the State where the supposed crime was committed.

This amendment was then adopted.

The committee then arose and the house adjourned.

12.2.1.4August 18, 1789

12.2.1.4.a The house again resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the subject of amendments, and took into consideration the 2d clause of the 7th proposition, in the words following, “The trial of all crimes (except in cases of impeachment, and in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia when in actual service in time of war or public danger) shall be by an impartial jury of freeholders of the vicinage, with the requisite of unanimity for conviction, the right of challenge, and other accustomed requisites; and no person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment, or indictment, by a grand jury; but if a crime be committed in a place in the possession of an enemy, or in which an insurrection may prevail, the indictment and trial may by law be authorised in some other place within the same state; and if it be committed in a place not within a state, the indictment and trial may be at such place or places as the law may have directed.”

Mr. Burke

Moved to change the word “vicinage” into “district or county in which the offence has been committed," he said this was conformable to the practice of the state of South Carolina, and he believed to most of the states in the union, it would have a tendency also to quiet the alarm entertained by the good citizens of many of the states for their personal security, they would no longer fear being dragged from one extremity of the state to the other for trial, at the distance of 3 or 400 miles.

Mr. Lee

Thought the word "vicinage" was more applicable than that of "district, or county," it being a term well understood by every gentleman of legal knowledge.

The question on mr. Burke's motion being put was negatived.

Mr. Burke then revived his motion for preventing prosecutions upon information, but on the question this was also lost.

The clause was now adopted without amendment.

Congressional Register, August 18, 1789, vol. 2, p. 233.

12.2.1.4.b The house then resolved inself into a committee of the whole on the subject of amendments.

Mr. Boudinot in the chair.

The committee took up the fifteenth amendment which is as follows.

"The trial of all crimes (except in cases of impeachment, and in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger) shall be by an impartial jury of freeholders of the vicinage, with the requisite of unanimity for conviction, the right of challenge, and other accustomed requisites; and no person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment by a grand jury; but if a crime be committed in a place in the possession of an enemy, or in which an insurrection may prevail, the indictment and trial may by law be authorized in some other place within the same state; and if it be committed in a place not within a state, the indictment and trial may be at such place or places as the law may have directed."

Some inconsiderable amendments to this amendment were moved and lost, and the main question was carried.

12.2.1.4.c Committee of the whole on the subject of amendments.

The committee took up the fifteenth amendment, which is

of challenge, and other accustomed requisites; and no person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment by a grand jury; but if a crime be committed in a place in the possession of an enemy, or in which an insurrection may prevail, the indictment and trial may by law be authorized in some other place within the same state; and if it be committed in a place not within a state, the indictment and trial may be at such place or places as the law may have directed."

Mr. Burke moved to strike out "vicinage," and to insert "county or district in which the offence has been committed." The gentleman enforced this motion by a variety of observations; and among others said that it was agreeable to the practice of the state he represented, and would give the constitution a more easy operation; that it was a matter of serious alarm to the good citizens of many of the States, the idea that they may be dragged from one part of the State perhaps 2 or 300 miles to the other for trial.

Mr. Gerry objected to the word "district" as too indefinite.

Mr. Sedgwick said, that he conceived that the proposed amendment is not so adequate to the gentleman's object as the word "vicinage"—the latter part of the clause is sufficient for the gentleman's purpose.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. Burketh [sic; then] proposed to add a clause to prevent prosecutions upon informations: This was objected to, as the object of the clause was to provide that high crime, &c. should be by presentment of a grand jury; but that other things should take the course heretofore practised. This motion was lost.

And then the paragraph was adopted.

12.2.1.5August 21, 1789

12.2.1.5.a The house proceeded in its consideration of the amendments to the constitution reported by the committee of the whole, and took up the 2d clause of the 4th proposition.

Mr.Gerry

Then proposed to amend it by striking out these words, "public danger" and to insert foreign invasion; this being negatived, it was then moved to strike out the last clause, "and if it be committed, &c." to the end. This motion was carried, and the amendment was adopted.

Congressional Register, August 21, 1789, vol. 2, p. 243.

Congressional Register, August 21, 1789, Vol. I, p. 249.

12.2.1.5.b Mr. Gerry moved to strike out these words, “public danger,” to insert foreign invasion. This was negatived. It was then moved to strike out the last clause, “and if it be committed, &c.” to the end. This motion obtained, and the amendment as it then stood was adopted.

New-York Daily Gazette, August 24, 1789, p. 818, col. 3.

12.2.1.5.c 15th Amendment under consideration.

Mr. GERRY moved to strike out these words “public danger” to insert foreign invasion. This was negatived. It was then moved to strike out the last clause “and if it be committed, &c.” to the end. This motion obtained, and the amendment as it then stood adopted.

12.2.2.1Massachusetts, January 30, 1788

Mr. HOLMES… . It is a maxim universally admitted, that the safety of the subject consists in having a right to a trial as free and impartial as the lot of humanity will admit of. Does the Constitution make provision for such a trial? I think not; for in a criminal process, a person shall not have a right to insist on a trial in the vicinity where the fact was committed, where a jury of the peers would, from their local situation, have an opportunity to form a judgment of the character of the person charged with the crime, and also to judge of the credibility of the witnesses. There a person must be tried by a jury of strangers; a jury who may be interested in his conviction; and where he may, by reason of the distance of his residence from the place of trial, be incapable of making such a defence, as he is, in justice, entitled to, and which he could avail himself of, if his trial was in the same county where the crime is said to have been committed.

But what makes the matter still more alarming is, that the mode of criminal process is to be pointed out by Congress, and they have no constitutional check on them, except that the trial is to be by a jury: but who this jury is to be, how qualified, where to live, how appointed, or by what rules to regulate their procedure, we are ignorant of as yet: whether they are to live in the county where the trial is; whether they are to be chosen by certain districts, or whether they are to be appointed by the sheriff ex officio; whether they are to be for one session of the court only, or for a certain term of time, or for good behavior, or during pleasure, are matters which we are entirely ignorant of as yet.

The mode of trial is altogether indetermined; whether the criminal is to be allowed the benefit of counsel; whether he is to be allowed to meet with his accuser face to face; whether he is to be allowed to confront the witnesses, and have the advantage of cross-examination, we are not yet told.

These are matters of by no means small consequence; yet we have not the smallest constitutional security that we shall be allowed the exercise of these privileges, neither is it made certain, in the Constitution, that a person charged with the crime shall have the privilege of appearing before the court or jury which is to try him.

Mr. GORE observed, in reply to Mr. Holmes, that it had been the uniform conduct of those in opposition to the proposed form of government, to determine, in every case where it is possible that the administrators thereof could do wrong, that they would do so, although it were demonstrable that such wrong would be against their own honor and interest, and productive of no advantage to themselves. On this principle alone have they determined that the trial by jury would be taken away in civil cases; when it had been clearly shown, that no words could be adopted, apt to the situation and customs of each state in this particular. Jurors are differently chosen in different states, and in point of qualification the laws of the several states are very diverse; not less so in the causes and disputes which are entitled to trial by jury. What is the result of this? That the laws of Congress may and will be conformable to the local laws in this particular, although the Constitution could not make a universal rule equally applying to the customs and statutes of the different states. Very few governments (certainly not this) can be interested in depriving the people of trial by jury, in questions of meum et tuum. In criminal cases alone are they interested to have the trial under their own control; and, in such cases, the Constitution expressly stipulates for trial by jury; but then, says the gentleman from Rochester, (Mr. Holmes,) to the safety of life it is indispensably necessary the trial of crimes should be in the vicinity; and the vicinity is construed to mean county; this is very incorrect, and gentlemen will see the impropriety, by referring themselves to the different local divisions and districts of the several states. But further, said the gentleman, the idea that the jury coming from the neighborhood, and knowing the character and circumstances of the party in trial, is promotive of justice, on reflection will appear not founded in truth. If the jury judge from any other circumstances but what are part of the cause in question, they are not impartial. The great object is to determine on the real merits of the cause, uninfluenced by any personal considerations; if, therefore, the jury could be perfectly ignorant of the person in trial, a just decision would be more probable. From such motives did the wise Athenians so constitute the famed Areopagus, that, when in judgment, this court should sit at midnight, and in total darkness, that the decision might be on the thing, and not on the person… .

Mr. DAWES said, he did not see that the right of trial by jury was taken away by the article. The word court does not, either by a popular or technical construction, exclude the use of a jury to try facts. When people, in common language, talk of a trial at the Court of Common Pleas, or the Supreme Judicial Court, do they not include all the branches and members of such court — the jurors as well as the judges? They certainly do, whether they mention the jurors expressly or not. Our state legislators have construed the word court in the same way; for they have given appeals from a justice of peace to the Court of Common Pleas, and from thence to the Supreme Court, without saying any thing of the jury; but in cases which, almost time out of mind, have been tried without jury, there the jurisdiction is given expressly to the justices of a particular court, as may be instanced by suits upon the absconding act, so called.

Gentlemen have compared the article under consideration to that power which the British claimed, and we resisted, at the revolution; namely, the power of trying the Americans without a jury. But surely there was no parallel in the cases; it was criminal cases in which they attempted to make this abuse of power. Mr. D. mentioned one example of this, which, though young, he well remembered; and that was the case of Nickerson, the pirate, who was tried without a jury, and whose judges were the governors of Massachusetts and of some neighboring provinces, together with Admiral Montague, and some gentlemen of distinction. Although this trial was without a jury, yet, as it was a trial upon the civil law, there was not so much clamor about it as otherwise there might have been; but still it was disagreeable to the people, and was one of the then complaints. But the trial by jury was not attempted to be taken from civil causes. It was no object of power, whether one subject's property was lessened, while another's was increased; nor can it be now an object with the federal legislature. What interest can they have in constituting a judiciary, to proceed in civil causes without a trial by jury? In criminal causes, by the proposed government, there must be a jury. It is asked, Why is not the Constitution as explicit in securing the right of jury in civil as in criminal cases? The answer is, Because it was out of the power of the Convention. The several states differ so widely in their modes of trial, some states using a jury in causes wherein other states employ only their judges, that the Convention have very wisely left it to the federal legislature to make such regulations as shall, as far as possible, accommodate the whole. Thus our own state constitution authorizes the General Court to erect judicatories, but leaves the nature, number, and extent of them, wholly to the discretion of the legislature… .

Mr. TREDWELL… . I could have wished, sir, that a greater caution had been used to secure to us the freedom of election, a sufficient and responsible representation, the freedom of the press, and the trial by jury both in civil and criminal cases.

… What better provisions have we made for mercy, when a man, for ignorantly passing a counterfeit continental note, or bill of credit, is liable to be dragged to a distant county, two or three hundred miles from home, deprived of the support and assistance of friends, to be tried by a strange jury, ignorant of his character, ignorant of the character of the witnesses, unable to contradict any false testimony brought against him by their own knowledge of facts, and with whom the prisoner being unacquainted, he must be deprived totally of the benefit of his challenge? and besides all that, he may be exposed to lose his life, merely for want of property to carry his witnesses to such a distance; and after all this solemn farce and mockery of a trial by jury, if they should acquit him, it will require more ingenuity than I am master of, to show that he does not hold his life at the will and pleasure of the Supreme Court, to which an appeal lies, and consequently depend on the tender mercies, perhaps, of the wicked, (for judges may be wicked;) and what those tender mercies are, I need not tell you. You may read them in the history of the Star Chamber Court in England, and in the courts of Philip, and in your Bible.

12.2.2.3.aJuly 28, 1788

Mr. IREDELL… . The greatest danger from ambition is in criminal cases. But here they have no option. The trial must be by jury, in the state wherein the offence is committed; and the writ of habeas corpus will in the mean time secure the citizen against arbitrary imprisonment, which has been the principal source of tyranny in all ages.

Mr. J. M'DOWALL. Mr. Chairman, the learned gentleman made use of several arguments to induce us to believe that the trial by jury, in civil cases, was not in danger, and observed that, in criminal cases, it is provided that the trial is to be in the state where the crime was committed. Suppose a crime is committed at the Mississippi; the man may be tried at Edenton. They ought to be tried by the people of the vicinage; for when the trial is at such an immense distance, the principal privilege attending the trial by jury is taken away; therefore the trial ought to be limited to a district or certain part of the state. It has been said, by the gentleman from Edenton, that our representatives will have virtue and wisdom to regulate all these things. But it would give me much satisfaction, in a matter of this importance, to see it absolutely secured. The depravity of mankind militates against such a degree of confidence. I wish to see every thing fixed.

Gov. JOHNSTON. Mr. Chairman, the observations of the gentleman last up confirm what the other gentleman said. I mean that, as there are dissimilar modes with respect to the trial by jury in different states, there could be no general rule fixed to accommodate all. He says that this clause is defective, because the trial is not to be by a jury of the vicinage. Let us look at the state of Virginia, where, as long as I have known it, the laws have been executed so as to satisfy the inhabitants, and, I believe, as well as in any part of the Union. In that country, juries are summoned every day from the by-standers. We may expect less partiality when the trial is by strangers; and were I to be tried for my property or life, I would rather be tried by disinterested men, who were not biased, than by men who were perhaps intimate friends of my opponent. Our mode is different from theirs; but whether theirs be better than ours or not, is not the question. It would be improper for our delegates to impose our mode upon them, or for theirs to impose their mode upon us. The trial will probably be, in each state, as it has been hitherto used in such state, or otherwise regulated as conveniently as possible for the people. The delegates who are to meet in Congress will, I hope, be men of virtue and wisdom. If not, it will be our own fault. They will have it in their power to make necessary regulations to accommodate the inhabitants of each state. In the Constitution, the general principles only are laid down. It will be the object of the future legislation to Congress to make such laws as will be most convenient for the people… .

Mr. BLOODWORTH. Mr. Chairman, the footing on which the trial by jury is, in the Constitution, does not satisfy me. Perhaps I am mistaken; but if I understand the thing right, the trial by jury is taken away. If the Supreme Federal Court has jurisdiction both as to law and fact, it appears to me to be taken away. The honorable gentleman who was in the Convention told us that the clause, as it now stands, resulted from the difficulty of fixing the mode of trial. I think it was easy to have put it on a secure footing. But, if the genius of the people of the United States is so dissimilar that our liberties cannot be secured, we can never hang long together. Interest is the band of social union; and when this is taken away, the Union itself must dissolve.

Mr. MACLAINE. Mr. Chairman, I do not take the interest of the states to be so dissimilar; I take them to be all nearly alike, and inseparably connected. It is impossible to lay down any constitutional rule for the government of all the different states in each particular. But it will be easy for the legislature to make laws to accommodate the people in every part of the Union, as circumstances may arise. Jury trial is not taken away in such cases where it may be found necessary. Although the Supreme Court has cognizance of the appeal, it does not follow but that the trial by jury may be had in the court below, and the testimony transmitted to the Supreme Court, who will then finally determine, on a review of all the circumstances. This is well known to be the practice in some of the states. In our own state, indeed, when a cause is instituted in the county court, and afterwards there is an appeal upon it, a new trial is had in the superior court, as if no trial had been before. In other countries, however, when a trial is had in an inferior court, and an appeal is taken, no testimony can be given in the court above, but the court determines upon the circumstances appearing upon the record. If I am right, the plain inference is, that there may be a trial in the inferior courts, and that the record, including the testimony, may be sent to the Supreme Court. But if there is a necessity for a jury in the Supreme Court, it will be a very easy matter to empanel a jury at the bar of the Supreme Court, which may save great expense, and be very convenient to the people. It is impossible to make every regulation at once. Congress, who are our own representatives, will undoubtedly make such regulations as will suit the convenience and secure the liberty of the people.

Mr. IREDELL declared it as his opinion that there might be juries in the Superior Court as well as in the inferior courts, and that it was in the power of Congress to regulate it so.

Elliot, vol. 4, pp. 145, 149–52.

12.2.2.3.bJuly 29, 1788

Mr. SPENCER… . The trial by jury has been also spoken of. Every person who is acquainted with the nature of liberty need not be informed of the importance of this trial. Juries are called the bulwarks of our rights and liberty; and no country can ever be enslaved as long as those cases which affect their lives and property are to be decided, in a great measure, by the consent of twelve honest, disinterested men, taken from the respectable body of yeomanry. It is highly improper that any clause which regards the security of the trial by jury should be any way doubtful. In the clause that has been read, it is ascertained that criminal cases are to be tried by jury in the states where they are committed. It has been objected to that clause, that it is not sufficiently explicit. I think that it is not. It was observed that one may be taken to a great distance. One reason of the resistance to the British government was, because they required that we should be carried to the country of Great Britain, to be tried by juries of that country. But we insisted on being tried by juries of the vicinage, in our own country. I think it therefore proper that something explicit should be said with respect to the vicinage.

With regard to that part, that the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction both as to law and fact, it has been observed that, though the federal court might decide without a jury, yet the court below, which tried it, might have a jury. I ask the gentleman what benefit would be received in the suit by having a jury trial in the court below, when the verdict is set aside in the Supreme Court. It was intended by this clause that the trial by jury should be suppressed in the superior and inferior courts. It has been said, in defence of the omission concerning the trial by jury in civil cases, that one general regulation could not be made; that in several cases the constitution of several states did not require a trial by jury,—for instance, in cases of equity and admiralty,—whereas in others it did, and that, therefore, it was proper to leave this subject at large. I am sure that, for the security of liberty, they ought to have been at the pains of drawing some line. I think that the respectable body who formed the Constitution should have gone so far as to put matters on such a footing as that there should be no danger. They might have provided that all those cases which are now triable by a jury should be tried in each state by a jury, according to the mode usually practiced in such state. This would have been easily done, if they had been at the trouble of writing five or six lines. Had it been done, we should have been entitled to say that our rights and liberties were not endangered. If we adopt this clause as it is, I think, notwithstanding what gentlemen have said, that there will be danger. There ought to be some amendments to it, to put this matter on a sure footing. There does not appear to me to be any kind of necessity that the federal court should have jurisdiction in the body of the country. I am ready to give up that, in the cases expressly enumerated, an appellate jurisdiction (except in one or two instances) might be given. I wish them also to have jurisdiction in maritime affairs, and to try offences committed on the high seas… .

Mr. MACLAINE… . But the gentleman seems to be most tenacious of the judicial power of the states. The honorable gentleman must know, that the doctrine of reservation of power not relinquished, clearly demonstrates that the judicial power of the states is not impaired. He asks, with respect to the trial by jury, “When the cause has gone up to the superior court, and the verdict is set aside, what benefit arises from having had a jury trial in the inferior court?” I would ask the gentleman, “What is the reason, that, on a special verdict or case agreed, the decision is left to the court?” There are a number of cases where juries cannot decide. When a jury finds the fact specially, or when it is agreed upon by the parties, the decision is referred to the court. If the law be against the party, the court decides against him; if the law be for him, the court judges accordingly. He, as well as every gentleman here, must know that, under the Confederation, Congress set aside juries. There was an appeal given to Congress: did Congress determine by a jury? Every party carried his testimony in writing to the judges of appeal, and Congress determined upon it.

Mr. SPENCER… . I contend that there should be a bill of rights, ascertaining and securing the great rights of the states and people. Besides my objection to the revision of facts by the federal court, and the insecurity of jury trial, I consider the concurrent jurisdiction of those courts with the state courts as extremely dangerous… .

Mr. IREDELL… . In criminal cases, however, no latitude ought to be allowed. In these the greatest danger from any government subsists, and accordingly it is provided that there shall be a trial by jury, in all such cases, in the state wherein the offence is committed. I thought the objection against the want of a bill of rights had been obviated unanswerably. It appears to me most extraordinary. Shall we give up anything but what is positively granted by that instrument? It would be the greatest absurdity for any man to pretend that, when a legislature is formed for a particular purpose, it can have any authority but what is so expressly given to it, any more than a man acting under a power of attorney could depart from the authority it conveyed to him, according to an instance which I stated when speaking on the subject before. As for example:—if I had three tracts of land, one in Orange, another in Caswell, and another in Chatham, and I gave a power of attorney to a man to sell the two tracts in Orange and Caswell, and he should attempt to sell my land in Chatham, would any man of common sense suppose he had authority to do so? In like manner, I say, the future Congress can have no right to exercise any power but what is contained in that paper. Negative words, in my opinion, could make the matter no plainer than it was before. The gentleman says that unalienable rights ought not to be given up. Those rights which are unalienable are not alienated. They still remain with the great body of the people. If any right be given up that ought not to be, let it be shown. Say it is a thing which affects your country, and that it ought not to be surrendered: this would be reasonable. But when it is evident that the exercise of any power not given up would be a usurpation, it would be not only useless, but dangerous, to enumerate a number of rights which are not intended to be given up; because it would be implying, in the strongest manner, that every right not included in the exception might be impaired by the government without usurpation; and it would be impossible to enumerate every one. Let any one make what collection or enumeration of rights he pleases, I will immediately mention twenty or thirty more rights not contained in it.

Mr. BLOODWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with attention to the gentleman's arguments; but whether it be for want of sufficient attention, or from the grossness of my ideas, I cannot be satisfied with his defence of the omission, with respect to the trial by jury. He says that it would be impossible to fall on any satisfactory mode of regulating the trial by jury, because there are various customs relative to it in the different states. Is this a satisfactory cause for the omission? Why did it not provide that the trial by jury should be preserved in civil cases? It has said that the trial should be by jury in criminal cases; and yet this trial is different in its manner in criminal cases in the different states. If it has been possible to secure it in criminal cases, notwithstanding the diversity concerning it, why has it not been possible to secure it in civil cases? I wish this to be cleared up… .

Mr. IREDELL. Mr. Chairman, I hope some other gentleman will answer what has been said by the gentlemen who have spoken last. I only rise to answer the question of the member from New Hanover—which was, if there was such a difficulty, in establishing the trial by jury in civil cases, that the Convention could not concur in any mode, why the difficulty did not extend to criminal cases? I beg leave to say, that the difficulty, in this case, does not depend so much on the mode of proceeding, as on the difference of the subjects of controversy, and the laws relative to them… .

We have been told, and I believe this was the real reason, why they could not concur in any general rule. I have great respect for the characters of those gentlemen who formed the Convention, and I believe they were not capable of overlooking the importance of the trial by jury, much less of designedly plotting against it. But I fully believe that the real difficulty of the thing was the cause of the omission. I trust sufficient reasons have been offered, to show that it is in no danger. As to criminal cases, I must observe that the great instrument of arbitrary power is criminal prosecutions. By the privileges of habeas corpus, no man can be confined without inquiry; and if it should appear that he has been committed contrary to law, he must be discharged. That diversity which is to be found in civil controversies, does not exist in criminal cases. That diversity which contributes to the security of property in civil cases, would have pernicious effects in criminal ones.

There is no other safe mode to try these but by a jury. If any man had the means of trying another his own way, or were it left to the control of arbitrary judges, no man would have that security for life and liberty which every freeman ought to have. I presume that in no state on the continent is a man tried on a criminal accusation but by a jury. It was necessary, therefore, that it should be fixed, in the Constitution, that the trial should be by jury in criminal cases; and such difficulties did not occur in this as in the other case… .

Mr. Hartley… . Even on that principle, however, it has occasionally been found necessary to make laws for the security of the subject — a necessity that has produced the writ of habeas corpus, which affords an easy and immediate redress for the unjust imprisonment of the person, and the trial by jury, which is the fundamental security for every enjoyment that is valuable in the contemplation of a freeman. These advantages have not been obtained by the influence of a bill of rights, which after all we find is an instrument that derives its validity only from the sanction and ratification of the prince. How different then is our situation from the circumstances of the British nation?

12.2.2.4.bDecember 11, 1787

Mr. WILSON… . We have been told, sir, by the honorable member from Fayette, (Mr. Smilie,) “that the trial by jury was intended to be given up, and the civil law was intended to be introduced into its place, in civil cases.”

Before a sentiment of this kind was hazarded, I think, sir, the gentleman ought to be prepared with better proof in its support than any he has yet attempted to produce. It is a charge, sir, not only unwarrantable, but cruel: the idea of such a thing, I believe, never entered into the mind of a single member of that Convention; and I believe further, that they never suspected there would be found, within the United States, a single person that was capable of making such a charge. If it should be well founded, sir, they must abide by the consequences; but if (as I trust it will fully appear) it is ill founded, then he or they who make it ought to abide by the consequences.

Trial by jury forms a large field for investigation, and numerous volumes are written on the subject; those who are well acquainted with it may employ much time in its discussion; but in a country where its excellences are so well understood, it may not be necessary to be very prolix in pointing them out. For my part, I shall confine myself to a few observations in reply to the objections that have been suggested.

The member from Fayette (Mr. Smilie) has labored to infer that, under the Articles of Confederation, the Congress possessed no appellate jurisdiction; but this being decided against him by the words of that instrument, by which is granted to Congress the power of "establishing courts for receiving, and determining finally, appeals in all cases of capture, he next attempts a distinction, and allows the power of appealing from the decisions of the judges, but not from the verdict of a jury; but this is determined against him also by the practice of the states; for, in every instance which has occurred, this power has been claimed by Congress, and exercised by the Courts of Appeals. But what would be the consequence of allowing the doctrine for which he contends? Would it not be in the power of a jury, by their verdict, to involve the whole Union in a war? They may condemn the property of a neutral, or otherwise infringe the law of nations, in this case, ought their verdict to be without revisal? Nothing can be inferred from this to prove that trials by jury were intended to be given up. In Massachusetts, and all the Eastern States, their causes are tried by juries, though they acknowledge the appellate jurisdiction of Congress.["]

I think I am not now to learn the advantages of a trial by jury. It has excellences that entitle it to a superiority over any other mode, in cases to which it is applicable.

Where jurors can be acquainted with the characters of the parties and the witnesses,—where the whole cause can be brought within their knowledge and their view, — I know no mode of investigation equal to that by a jury: they hear every thing that is alleged; they not only hear the words, but they see and mark the features of the countenance; they can judge of weight due to such testimony; and moreover, it is a cheap and expeditious manner of distributing justice. There is another advantage annexed to the trial by jury; the jurors may indeed return a mistaken or illfounded verdict, but their errors cannot be systematical.

Let us apply these observations to the objects of the judicial department, under this Constitution. I think it has been shown, already, that they all extend beyond the bounds of any particular state; but further, a great number of the civil causes there enumerated depend either upon the law of nations, or the marine law, that is, the general law of mercantile countries. Now, sir, in such cases, I presume it will not be pretended that this mode of decision ought to be adopted; for the law with regard to them is the same here as in every other country, and ought to be administered in the same manner. There are instances in which I think it highly probable that the trial by jury will be found proper; and if it is highly probable that it will be found proper, is it not equally probable that it will be adopted? There may be causes depending between citizens of different states; and as trial by jury is known and regarded in all the states, they will certainly prefer that mode of trial before any other. The Congress will have the power of making proper regulations on this subject, but it was impossible for the Convention to have gone minutely into it; but if they could, it must have been very improper, because alterations, as I observed before, might have been necessary; and whatever the Convention might have done would have continued unaltered, unless by an alteration of the Constitution. Besides, there was another difficulty with regard to this subject. In some of the states they have courts of chancery, and other appellate jurisdictions, and those states are as attached to that mode of distributing justice as those that have none are to theirs.

I have desired, repeatedly, that honorable gentlemen, who find fault, would be good enough to point out what they deem to be an improvement. The member from Westmoreland (Mr. Findley) tells us that the trial between citizens of different states ought to be by a jury of that state in which the cause of action rose. Now, it is easy to see that, in many instances, this would be very improper and very partial; for, besides the different manner of collecting and forming juries in the several states, the plaintiff comes from another state; he comes a stranger, unknown as to his character or mode of life, while the other party is in the midst of his friends, or perhaps his dependents. Would a trial by jury, in such a case, insure justice to the stranger? But again: I would ask that gentleman whether, if a great part of his fortune was in the hands of some person in Rhode Island, he would wish that his action to recover it should be determined by a jury of that country, under its present circumstances.

The gentleman from Fayette (Mr. Smilie) says that, if the Convention found themselves embarrassed, at least they might have done thus much—they should have declared that the substance should be secured by Congress. This would be saying nothing unless the cases were particularized.

Mr. SMILIE. I said the Convention ought to have declared that the legislature should establish the trial by jury by proper regulations.

Mr. WILSON. The legislature shall establish it by proper regulations! So, after all, the gentleman has landed us at the very point from which we set out. He wishes them to do the very thing they have done—to leave it to the discretion of Congress. The fact, sir, is nothing more could be done.

It is well known that there are some cases that should not come before juries; there are others, that, in some of the states, never come before juries, and in those states where they do come before them, appeals are found necessary, the facts reexamined, and the verdict of the jury sometimes is set aside; but I think, in all cases where the cause has come originally before a jury, that the last examination ought to be before a jury likewise.

The power of having appellate jurisdiction, as to facts, has been insisted upon as a proof, "that the Convention intended to give up the trial by jury in civil cases, and to introduce the civil law." I have already declared my own opinion on this point, and have shown not merely that it is founded on reason and authority;—the express declaration of Congress (Journals of Congress, March 6, 1779) is to the same purpose. They insist upon this power, as requisite to preserve the peace of the Union; certainly, therefore, it ought always to be possessed by the head of the Confederacy. We are told, as an additional proof, that the trial by jury was intended to be given up; "that appeals are unknown to the common law; that the term is a civil-law term, and with it the civil law is intended to be introduced." I confess I was a good deal surprised at this observation being made; for Blackstone, in the very volume which the honorable member (Mr. Smilie) had in his hand, and read us several extracts from, has a chapter entitled "Of Proceeding in the Nature of Appeals," — and in that chapter says, that the principal method of redress for erroneous judgments, in the king's courts of record, is by writ of error to some superior "court of appeal." (3 Blackstone, 406.) Now, it is well known that his book is a commentary upon the common law. Here, then, is a strong refutation of the assertion, "that appeals are unknown to the common law."

I think these were all the circumstances adduced to show the truth of the assertion, that, in this Constitution, the trial by jury was intended to be given up by the late Convention in framing it. Has the assertion been proved? I say not: and the allegations offered, if they apply at all, apply in a contrary direction. I am glad that this objection has been stated, because it is a subject upon which the enemies of this Constitution have much insisted. We have now had an opportunity of investigating it fully; and the result is, that there is no foundation for the charge, but it must proceed from ignorance, or something worse.

12.2.2.4.c December 12, 1787

… Mr. Whitehill then read, and offered as the ground of a motion for adjourning to some remote day the consideration of the following articles, which, he said, might either be taken collectively, as a bill of rights, or, separately, as amendments to the general form of government proposed…

3. That in all capital and criminal prosecutions, a man has a right to demand the cause and nature of his accusation, as well in the federal courts, as in those of the several States; to be heard by himself or his counsel; to be confronted with the accusers and witnesses; to call for evidence in his favor, and a speedy trial, by an impartial jury of the vicinage, without whose unanimous consent he cannot be found guilty, nor can he be compelled to give evidence against himself; that no man be deprived of his liberty, except by the law of the land or the judgment of his peers.

McMaster & Stone, p. 421.

12.2.2.4.d Address and Reasons of Dissent of the Minority of the Pennsylvania Convention, December 12, 1787

The first consideration that this review suggests, is the omission of a bill of rights, ascertaining and fundamentally establishing those unalienable and personal rights of men, without the full, free, and secure enjoyment of which there can be no liberty, and over which it is not necessary for a good government to have the controul. The principal of which are the rights of conscience, personal liberty by the clear and unequivocal establishment of the writ of habeas corpus, jury trial in criminal and civil cases, by an impartial jury of the vicinage or county, with the common-law proceedings, for the safety of the accused in criminal prosecutions; and the liberty of the press, that scourge of tyrants, and the grand bulwark of every other liberty and privilege. The stipulations heretofore made in favor of them in the state constitutions, are entirely superseded by this constitution.

The judicial power, under the proposed constitution, is founded on well-known principles of the civil law, by which the judge determines both on law and fact, and appeals are allowed from the inferior tribunals to the superior, upon the whole question; so that facts as well as law, would be reexamined, and even new facts brought forward in the court of appeals; and to use the words of a very eminent Civilian — "The cause is many times another thing before the court of appeals, than it was at the time of the first sentence."

That this mode of proceeding is the one which must be adopted under this constitution, is evident from the following circumstances: 1st. That the trial by jury, which is the grand characteristic of the common law, is secured by the constitution only in criminal cases. — 2d. That the appeal from both law and fact is expressly established, which is utterly inconsistent with the principles of the common law, and trials by jury. The only mode in which an appeal from law and fact can be established, is, by adopting the principles and practice of the civil law; unless the United States should be drawn into the absurdity of calling and swearing juries, merely for the purpose of contradicting their verdicts, which would render juries contemptible and worse than useless… .

Not to enlarge upon the loss of the invaluable right of trial by an unbiased jury, so dear to every friend of liberty, the monstrous expence and inconveniences of the mode of proceedings to be adopted, are such as will prove intolerable to the people of this country. The lengthy proceedings of the civil law courts in the chancery of England, and in the courts of Scotland and France, are such that few men of moderate fortune can endure the expence of; the poor man must therefore submit to the wealthy. Length of purse will too often prevail against right and justice. For instance, we are told by the learned judge Blackstone, that a question only on the property of an ox, of the value of three guineas, orginating under the civil law proceedings in Scotland, after many interlocutory orders and sentences below, was carried at length from the court of sessions, the highest court in that part of Great Britain, by way of appeal to the house of lords, where the question of law and fact was finally determined. He adds, that no pique or spirit could in the court of king's bench common pleas Westminster, have given continuance to such a cause for a tenth part of the time, nor have cost a twentieth part of the expence. Yet the costs in the courts of king's bench and common pleas in England, are infinitely greater than those which the people of this country have ever experienced. We abhor the idea of losing the transcendant privilege of trial by jury, with the loss of which, it is remarked by the same learned author, that in Sweden, the liberties of the commons were extinguished by an aristocratic senate: and that trial by jury and the liberty of the people went out together. At the same time we regret the intolerable delay, the enormous expences and infinite vexation to which the people of this country will be exposed from the voluminous proceedings of the courts of civil law, and especially from the appellate jurisdiction, by means of which a man may be drawn from the utmost boundaries of this extensive country to the seat of the supreme court of the nation to contend, perhaps with a wealthy and powerful adversary. The consequence of this establishment will be an absolute confirmation of the power of aristocratical influence in the courts of justice: for the common people will not be able to contend or struggle against it.

Trial by jury in criminal cases may also be excluded by declaring that the libeller for instance shall be liable to an action of debt for a specified sum; thus evading the common law prosecution by indictment and trial by jury. And the common course of proceeding against a ship for breach of revenue laws by information (which will be classed among civil causes) will at the civil law be within the resort of a court, where no jury intervenes. Besides, the benefit of jury trial, in cases of a criminal nature, which cannot be evaded, will be rendered of little value, by calling the accused to answer far from home; there being no provision that the trial be by a jury of the neighbourhood or country. Thus an inhabitant of Pittsburgh, on a charge of crime committed on the banks of the Ohio, may be obliged to defend himself at the side of the Delaware, and so vice versa. To conclude this head: we observe that the judges of the courts of Congress would not be independent, as they are not debarred from holding other offices, during the pleasure of the president and senate, and as they may derive their support in part from fees, alterable by the legislature.

12.2.2.5South Carolina, January 17, 1788

Hon. RAWLINS LOWNDES… . It was true, no article of the Constitution declared there should not be jury trials in civil cases; yet this must be implied, because it stated that all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be tried by a jury. But even if trials by jury were allowed, could any person rest satisfied with a mode of trial which prevents the parties from being obliged to bring a cause for discussion before a jury of men chosen from the vicinage, in a manner conformable to the present administration of justice, which had stood the test of time and experience, and ever been highly approved of?…

Hon. ROBERT BARNWELL… . The honorable gentleman asks why the trial by jury was not established in every instance. Mr. Barnwell considered this right of trial as the birthright of every American, and the basis of our civil liberty; but still most certainly particular circumstances may arise, which would induce even the greatest advocates for this right to yield it for a time. In his opinion, the circumstances that would lead to this point were those which are specified by the Constitution. Mr. Barnwell said, Suffer me to state a case, and let every gentleman determine whether, in particular instances, he would not rather resign than retain this right of trial. A suit is depending between a citizen of Carolina and Georgia, and it becomes necessary to try it in Georgia. What is the consequence? Why, the citizen of this state must rest his cause upon the jury of his opponent's vicinage, where, unknown and unrelated, he stands a very poor chance for justice against one whose neighbors, whose friends and relations, compose the greater part of his judges. It is in this case, and only in cases of a similar nature with this, that the right of trial by jury is not established; and judging from myself, it is in this instance only that every man would wish to resign it, not to a jury with whom he is unacquainted, but to an impartial and responsible individual.

12.2.2.6.aJune 5, 1788

Mr. HENRY… . Here is a resolution as radical as that which separated us from Great Britain. It is radical in this transition; our rights and privileges are endangered, and the sovereignty of the states will be relinquished: and cannot we plainly see that this is actually the case? The rights of conscience, trial by jury, liberty of the press, all your immunities and franchises, all pretensions to human rights and privileges, are rendered insecure, if not lost, by this change, so loudly talked of by some, and inconsiderately by others. Is this tame relinquishment of rights worthy of freemen? Is it worthy of that manly fortitude that ought to characterize republicans?…

Having premised these things, I shall, with the aid of my judgment and information, which, I confess, are not extensive, go into the discussion of this system more minutely. Is it necessary for your liberty that you should abandon those great rights by the adoption of this system? Is the relinquishment of the trial by jury and the liberty of the press necessary for your liberty?…

… In some parts of the plan before you, the great rights of freemen are endangered; in other parts, absolutely taken away. How does your trial by jury stand? In civil cases gone—not sufficiently secured in criminal — this best privilege is gone. But we are told that we need not fear; because those in power, being our representatives, will not abuse the powers we put in their hands. I am not well versed in history, but I will submit to your recollection, whether liberty has been destroyed most often by the licentiousness of the people, or by the tyranny of rulers… . My great objection to this government is, that it does not leave us the means of defending our rights… .

12.2.2.6.bJune 7, 1788

Mr. HENRY… . If we are to have one representative for every thirty thousand souls, it must be by implication. The Constitution does not positively secure it. Even say it is a natural implication, — why not give us a right to that proportion in express terms, in language that could not admit of evasions or subterfuges? If they can use implication for us, they can also use implication against us. We are giving power; they are getting power; judge, then, on which side the implication will be used! When we once put it in their option to assume constructive power, danger will follow. Trial by jury, and liberty of the press, are also on this foundation of implication. If they encroach on these rights, and you give your implication for a plea, you are cast; for they will be justified by the last part of it, which gives them full power “to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to carry their power into execution.” Implication is dangerous, because it is unbounded: if it be admitted at all, and no limits be prescribed, it admits of the utmost extension… .

Elliot, vol. 3, p. 149.

12.2.2.6.cJune 9, 1788

Gov. RANDOLPH… . Why have we been told that maxims can alone save nations; that our maxims are our bill of rights; and that the liberty of the press, trial by jury, and religion, are destroyed? Give me leave to say, that the maxims of Virginia are union and justice.

Elliot, vol. 3, p. 190.

12.2.2.6.dJune 10, 1788

Gov. RANDOLPH… . It is also objected that the trial by jury, the writ of habeas corpus, and the liberty of the press, are insecure. But I contend that the habeas corpus is at least on as secure and good a footing as it is in England. In that country, it depends on the will of the legislature. That privilege is secured here by the Constitution, and is only to be suspended in cases of extreme emergency. Is this not a fair footing? After agreeing that the government of England secures liberty, how do we distrust this government? Why distrust ourselves? The liberty of the press is supposed to be in danger. If this were the case, it would produce extreme repugnancy in my mind. If it ever will be suppressed in this country, the liberty of the people will not be far from being sacrificed. Where is the danger of it? He says that every power is given to the general government that is not reserved to the states. Pardon me if I say the reverse of the proposition is true. I defy any one to prove the contrary. Every power not given it by this system is left with the states. This being the principle, from what part of the Constitution can the liberty of the press be said to be in danger?

[Here his excellency read the 8th section of the 1st article, containing all the powers given to Congress.]

Go through these powers, examine every one, and tell me if the most exalted genius can prove that the liberty of the press is in danger. The trial by jury is supposed to be in danger also. It is secured in criminal cases, but supposed to be taken away in civil cases. It is not relinquished by the Constitution; it is only not provided for. Look at the interest of Congress to suppress it. Can it be in any manner advantageous for them to suppress it? In equitable cases, it ought not to prevail, nor with respect to admiralty causes; because there will be an undue leaning against those characters, of whose business courts of admiralty will have cognizance. I will rest myself secure under this reflection — that it is impossible for the most suspicious or malignant mind to show that it is the interest of Congress to infringe on this trial by jury.

Elliot, vol. 3, pp. 203–04.

12.2.2.6.eJune 12, 1788

Mr. HENRY… . His amendments go to that despised thing, called a bill of rights, and all the rights which are dear to human nature — trial by jury, the liberty of religion and the press, &c. Do not gentlemen see that, if we adopt, under the idea of following Mr. Jefferson's opinion, we amuse ourselves with the shadow, while the substance is given away?

Elliot, vol. 3, p. 314.

12.2.2.6.fJune 14, 1788

Mr. HENRY… . By this Constitution, some of the best barriers of human rights are thrown away. Is there not an additional reason to have a bill of rights? By the ancient common law, the trial of all facts is decided by a jury of impartial men from the immediate vicinage. This paper speaks of different juries from the common law in criminal cases; and in civil controversies excludes trial by jury altogether. There is, therefore, more occasion for the supplementary check of a bill of rights now than then. Congress, from their general powers, may fully go into business of human legislation. They may legislate, in criminal cases, from treason to the lowest offence — petty larceny. They may define crimes and prescribe punishments. In the definition of crimes, I trust they will be directed by what wise representatives ought to be governed by. But when we come to punishments, no latitude ought to be left, nor dependence put on the virtue of representatives. What says our bill of rights? — "that excessive bail ought not to be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted." Are you not, therefore, now calling on those gentlemen who are to compose Congress, to prescribe trials and define punishments without this control? Will they find sentiments there similar to this bill of rights? You let them loose; you do more — you depart from the genius of your country. That paper tells you that the trial of crimes shall be by jury, and held in the state where the crime shall have been committed. Under this extensive provision, they may proceed in a manner extremely dangerous to liberty: a person accused may be carried from one extremity of the state to another, and be tried, not by an impartial jury of the vicinage, acquainted with his character and the circumstances of the fact, but by a jury unacquainted with both, and who may be biased against him. Is this not sufficient to alarm men? How different is this from the immemorial practice of your British ancestors, and your own! I need not tell you that, by the common law, a number of hundredors were required on a jury, and that afterwards it was sufficient if the jurors came from the same county. With less than this the people of England have never been satisfied. That paper ought to have declared the common law in force.

12.2.2.6.gJune 15, 1788

Gov. RANDOLPH… . But let me ask the gentleman where his favorite rights are violated… . Are they violated by the enumerated powers? [Here his excellency read from the 8th to the 12th article of the bill of rights.] Is there not provision made, in this Constitution, for the trial by jury in criminal cases? Does not the 3d article provide that the trial of all crimes shall be by jury, and held where the said crimes shall have been committed? Does it not follow that the cause and nature of the accusation must be produced? — because, otherwise, they cannot proceed on the cause. Every one knows that the witnesses must be brought before the jury, or else the prisoner will be discharged. Calling of evidence in his favor is coincident to his trial. There is no suspicion that less than twelve jurors will be thought sufficient. The only defect is, that there is no speedy trial. Consider how this could have been amended. We have heard complaints against it because it is supposed the jury is to come from the state at large. It will be in their power to have juries from the vicinage. And would not the complaints have been louder if they had appointed a federal court to be had in every county in the state? Criminals are brought, in this state, from every part of the country to the general court, and jurors from the vicinage are summoned to the trials. There can be no reason to prevent the general government from adopting a similar regulation.

Gentlemen have been misled, to a certain degree, by a general declaration that the trial by jury was gone. We see that, in the most valuable cases, it is reserved. Is it abolished in civil cases? Let him put his finger on the part where it is abolished. The Constitution is silent on it… .

Elliot, vol. 3, pp. 467–68.

12.2.2.6.hJune 20, 1788

Mr. MADISON… . It was objected, yesterday, that there was no provision for a jury from the vicinage. If it could have been done with safety, it would not have been opposed. It might happen that a trial would be impracticable in the country. Suppose a rebellion in a whole district; would it not be impossible to get a jury? The trial by jury is held as sacred in England as in America. There are deviations from it in England; yet greater deviations have happened here, since we established our independence, than have taken place there for a long time, though it be left to the legislative discretion. It is a misfortune in any case that this trial should be departed from; yet in some cases it is necessary. It must be, therefore, left to the discretion of the legislature to modify it according to circumstances. This is a complete and satisfactory answer.

Mr. HENRY… . "In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, and those in which a state shall be a party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction. In all the other cases before mentioned, the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact… ." This will, in its operation, destroy the trial by jury. The verdict of an impartial jury will be reversed by judges unacquainted with the circumstances. But we are told that Congress are to make regulations to remedy this… . If Congress alter this part, they will repeal the Constitution… . When Congress, by virtue of this sweeping clause, will organize these courts, they cannot depart from the Constitution; and their laws in opposition to the Constitution would be void… . What then, Mr. Chairman? We are told that, if this does not satisfy every mind, they will yield. It is not satisfactory to my mind, whatever it may be to others… .

We are told of certain difficulties. I acknowledge it is difficult to form a constitution. But I have seen difficulties conquered which were as unconquerable as this. We are told that trial by jury is difficult to be had in certain cases. Do we not know the meaning of the term? We are also told it is a technical term. I see one thing in this Constitution; I made the observation before, and I am still of the same opinion, that everything with respect to privileges is so involved in darkness, it makes me suspicious—not of those gentlemen who formed it, but of its operations in its present form. Could not precise terms have been used? You find, by the observations of the gentleman last up, that, when there is a plentitude of power, there is no difficulty; but when you come to a plain thing, understood by all America, there are contradictions, ambiguities, difficulties, and what not. Trial by jury is attended, it seems, with insuperable difficulties, and therefore omitted altogether in civil cases. But an idea is held out that it is secured in criminal cases. I had rather it had been left out altogether than have it so vaguely and equivocally provided for. Poor people do not understand technical terms. Their rights ought to be secured in language of which they know the meaning. As they do not know the meaning of such terms, they may be injured with impunity. If they dare oppose the hands of tyrannical power, you will see what has been practised elsewhere. They may be tried by the most partial powers, by their most implacable enemies, and be sentenced and put to death, with all the forms of a fair trial. I would rather be left to the judges. An abandoned juror would not dread the loss of character like a judge. From these, and a thousand other considerations, I would rather the trial by jury were struck out altogether. There is no right of challenging partial jurors. There is no common law of America, (as has been said,) nor constitution, but that on your table. If there be neither common law nor constitution, there can be no right to challenge partial jurors. Yet the right is as valuable as the trial by jury itself.

Mr. HENRY… . To hear gentlemen of such penetration make use of such arguments, to persuade us to part with that trial by jury, is very astonishing. We are told that we are to part with that trial by jury which our ancestors secured their lives and property with, and we are to build castles in the air, and substitute visionary modes of decision for that noble palladium. I hope we shall never be induced, by such arguments, to part with that excellent mode of trial. No appeal can now be made as to fact in common-law suits. The unanimous verdict of twelve impartial men cannot be reversed. I shall take the liberty of reading to the committee the sentiments of the learned Judge Blackstone, so often quoted, on the subject.

The opinion of this learned writer is more forcible and cogent than any thing I could say. Notwithstanding the transcendent excellency of this trial, its essentiality to the preservation of liberty, and the extreme danger of substituting any other mode, yet we are now about to alienate it.

But on this occasion, as on all others, we are admonished to rely on the wisdom and virtue of our rulers. We are told that the members from Georgia, New Hampshire, &c., will not dare to infringe this privilege; that, as it would excite the indignation of the people, they would not attempt it: that is, the enormity of the offence is urged as a security against its commission. It is so abominable that Congress will not exercise it. Shall we listen to arguments like these, when trial by jury is about to be relinquished? I beseech you to consider before you decide. I ask you, What is the value of that privilege? When Congress, in all the plentitude of their arrogance, magnificence, and power, can take it from you, will you be satisfied? Are we to go so far as to concede every thing to the virtue of Congress? Throw yourselves at once on their mercy; be no longer free than their virtue will predominate: if this will satisfy republican minds, there is an end of every thing. I disdain to hold any thing of any man. We ought to cherish that disdain. America viewed with indignation the idea of holding her rights in England. The Parliament gave you the most solemn assurances that they would not exercise this power. Were you satisfied with their promises? No. Did you trust any man on earth? No. You answered that you disdained to hold your innate, indefeasible rights of any one. Now, you are called upon to give an exorbitant and most alarming power. The genius of my countrymen is the same now that it was then. They have the same feelings. They are equally martial and bold. Will not their answer therefore be the same? I hope that gentlemen will, on a fair investigation, be candid, and not on every occasion recur to the virtue of our representatives.

When deliberating on the relinquishment of the sword and purse, we have a right to some other reason than the possible virtue of our rulers. We are informed that the strength and energy of the government call for the surrender of this right. Are we to make our country strong by giving up our privileges? I tell you that, if you judge from reason, or the experience of other nations, you will find that your country will be great and respectable according as you will preserve this great privilege. It is prostrated by that paper. Juries from the vicinage being not secured, this right is in reality sacrificed. All is gone. And why? Because a rebellion may arise. Resistance will come from certain countries, and juries will come from the same countries.

I trust the honorable gentleman, on a better recollection, will be sorry for this observation. Why do we love this trial by jury? Because it prevents the hand of oppression from cutting you off. They may call any thing rebellion, and deprive you of a fair trial by an impartial jury of your neighbors. Has not your mother country magnanimously preserved this noble privilege upwards of a thousand years? Did she relinquish a jury of the vicinage because there was a possibility of resistance to oppression? She has been magnanimous enough to resist every attempt to take away this privilege. She has had magnanimity enough to rebel when her rights were infringed. That country had juries of hundredors for many generations. And shall Americans give up that which nothing could induce the English people to relinquish? The idea is abhorrent to my mind. There was a time when we should have spurned at it. This gives me comfort—that, as long as I have existence, my neighbors will protect me. Old as I am, it is probable I may yet have the appellation of rebel. I trust that I shall see congressional oppression crushed in embryo. As this government stands, I despise and abhor it. Gentlemen demand it, though it takes away the trial by jury in civil cases, and does worse than take it away in criminal cases. It is gone unless you preserve it now. I beg pardon for speaking so long. Many more observations will present themselves to the minds of gentlemen when they analyze this part. We find enough, from what has been said, to come to this conclusion—that it was not intended to have jury trials at all; because, difficult as it was, the name was known, and it might have been inserted. Seeing that appeals are given, in matters of fact, to the Supreme Court, we are led to believe that you must carry your witnesses an immense distance to the seat of government, or decide appeals according to the Roman law. I shall add no more, but that I hope that gentlemen will recollect what they are about to do, and consider that they are going to give up this last and best privilege.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. Chairman, before I enter upon the objections made to this part, I will observe that I should suppose, if there were any person in this audience who had not read this Constitution, or who had not heard what has been said, and should have been told that the trial by jury was intended to be taken away, he would be surprised to find, on examination, that there was no exclusion of it in civil cases, and that it was expressly provided for in criminal cases. I never could see such intention, or any tendency towards it. I have not heard any arguments of that kind used in favor of the Constitution. If there were any words in it which said that trial by jury should not be used, it would be dangerous. I find it secured in criminal cases, and that the trial is to be had in the state where the crime shall have been committed. It is strongly insisted that the privilege of challenging, or excepting to the jury, is not secured. When the Constitution says that the trial shall be by jury, does it not say that every incident will go along with it? I think the honorable gentleman was mistaken yesterday in his reasoning on the propriety of a jury from the vicinage.

He supposed that a jury from the neighborhood is had from this view — that they should be acquainted with the personal character of the person accused. I thought it was with another view — that the jury should have some personal knowledge of the fact, and acquaintance with the witnesses, who will come from the neighborhood. How is it understood in this state? Suppose a man, who lives in Winchester, commits a crime at Norfolk; the jury to try him must come, not from Winchester, but from the neighborhood of Norfolk. Trial by jury is secured by this system in criminal cases, as are all the incidental circumstances relative to it. The honorable gentleman yesterday made an objection to that clause which says that the judicial power shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and such inferior courts as Congress may ordain and establish. He objects that there is an unlimited power of appointing inferior courts. I refer to that gentleman, whether it would have been proper to limit this power. Could those gentlemen who framed that instrument have extended their ideas to all the necessities of the United States, and seen every case in which it would be necessary to have an inferior tribunal? By the regulations of Congress, they may be accommodated to public convenience and utility. We may expect that there will be an inferior court in each state; each state will insist on it; and each, for that reason, will agree to it.

Mr. JOHN MARSHALL… . The exclusion of trial by jury, in this case, he [Patrick Henry] urged to prostrate our rights. Does the word court only mean the judges? Does not the determination of a jury necessarily lead to the judgment of the court? Is there any thing here which gives the judges exclusive jurisdiction of matters of fact? What is the object of a jury trial? To inform the court of the facts. When a court has cognizance of facts does it not follow that they can make inquiry by a jury? It is impossible to be otherwise. I hope that in this country, where impartiality is so much admired, the laws will direct facts to be ascertained by a jury. But, says the honorable gentleman, the juries in the ten miles square will be mere tools of parties, with which he would not trust his person or property; which, he says, he would rather leave to the court. Because the government may have a district of ten miles square, will no man stay there but the tools and officers of the government? Will nobody else be found there? Is it so in any other part of the world, where a government has legislative power? Are there none but officers, and tools of the government of Virginia, in Richmond? Will there not be independent merchants, and respectable gentlemen of fortune, within the ten miles square? Will there not be worthy farmers and mechanics? Will not a good jury be found there, as well as anywhere else? Will the officers of the government become improper to be on a jury? What is it to the government whether this man or that man succeeds? It is all one thing. Does the Constitution say that juries shall consist of officers, or that the Supreme Court shall be held in the ten miles square? It was acknowledged, by the honorable member, that it was secure in England. What makes it secure there? Is it their constitution? What part of their constitution is there that the Parliament cannot change? As the preservation of this right is in the hands of Parliament, and it has ever been held sacred by them, will the government of America be less honest than that of Great Britain? Here a restriction is to be found. The jury is not to be brought out of the state. There is no such restriction in that government; for the laws of Parliament decide every thing respecting it. Yet gentlemen tell us that there is safety there, and nothing here but danger. It seems to me that the laws of the United States will generally secure trials by a jury of the vicinage, or in such manner as will be most safe and convenient for the people.

But it seems that the right of challenging the jurors is not secured in this Constitution. Is this done by our own Constitution, or by any provision of the English government? Is it done by their Magna Charta, or bill of rights? This privilege is founded on their laws. If so, why should it be objected to the American Constitution, that it is not inserted in it? If we are secure in Virginia without mentioning it in our Constitution, why should not this security be found in the federal court?

The honorable gentleman said much about the quitrents in the Northern Neck. I will refer it to the honorable gentleman himself. Has he not acknowledged that there was no complete title? Was he not satisfied that the right of the legal representatives of the proprietor did not exist at the time he mentioned? If so, it cannot exist now. I will leave it to those gentlemen who come from that quarter. I trust they will not be intimidated, on this account, in voting on this question. A law passed in 1782, which secures this. He says that many poor men may be harassed and injured by the representatives of Lord Fairfax. If he has no right, this cannot be done. If he has this right, and comes to Virginia, what laws will his claims be determined by? By those of the state. By what tribunals will they be determined? By our state courts. Would not the poor man, who was oppressed by an unjust prosecution, be abundantly protected and satisfied by the temper of his neighbors, and would he not find ample justice? What reason has the honorable member to apprehend partiality or injustice? He supposes that, if the judges be judges of both the federal and state courts, they will incline in favor of one government. If such contests should arise, who could more properly decide them than those who are to swear to do justice? If we can expect a fair decision any where, may we not expect justice to be done by the judges of both the federal and state governments? But, says the honorable member, laws may be executed tyrannically. Where is the independency of your judges? If a law be exercised tyrannically in Virginia, to what can you trust? To your judiciary. What security have you for justice? Their independence. Will it not be so in the federal court?

Gentlemen ask, What is meant by law cases, and if they be not distinct from facts? Is there no law arising on cases of equity and admiralty? Look at the acts of Assembly. Have you not many cases where law and fact are blended? Does not the jurisdiction in point of law as well as fact, find itself completely satisfied in law and fact? The honorable gentleman says that no law of Congress can make any exception to the federal appellate jurisdiction of facts as well as law. He has frequently spoken of technical terms, and the meaning of them. What is the meaning of the term exception? Does it not mean alteration and diminution? Congress is empowered to make exceptions to the appellate jurisdiction, as to law and fact, of the Supreme Court. These exceptions certainly go as far as the legislature may think proper for the interest and liberty of the people. Who can understand this word, exception, to extend to one case as well as the other? I am persuaded that a reconsideration of this case will convince the gentlemen that he was mistaken. This may go to the cure of the mischief apprehended. Gentlemen must be satisfied that this power will not be so much abused as they have said.

The honorable member says that he derives no consolation from the wisdom and integrity of the legislature, because we call them to rectify defects which it is our duty to remove. We ought well to weigh the good and evil before we determine. We ought to be well convinced that the evil will be really produced before we decide against it. If we be convinced that the good greatly preponderates, though there be small defects in it, shall we give up that which is really good, when we can remove the little mischief it may contain, in the plain, easy method pointed out in the system itself?

I was astonished when I heard the honorable gentleman say that he wished the trial by jury to be struck out entirely. Is there no justice to be expected by a jury of our fellow citizens? Will any man prefer to be tried by a court, when the jury is to be of his countrymen, and probably of his vicinage? We have reason to believe the regulations with respect to juries will be such as shall be satisfactory. Because it does not contain all, does it contain nothing? But I conceive that this committee will see there is safety in the case, and that there is no mischief to be apprehended.

He states a case, that a man may be carried from a federal to an antifederal corner, (and vice versa) where men are ready to destroy him. Is this probable? Is it presumable that they will make a law to punish men who are of different opinions in politics from themselves? Is it presumable that they will do it in one single case, unless it be such a case as must satisfy the people at large? The good opinion of the people at large must be consulted by their representatives; otherwise, mischiefs would be produced which would shake the government to its foundation. As it is late, I shall not mention all the gentleman's argument, but some parts of it are so glaring that I cannot pass them over in silence. He says that the establishment of these tribunals, and more particularly in their jurisdiction of controversies between citizens of these states and foreign citizens and subjects, is like a retrospective law. Is there no difference between a tribunal which shall give justice and effect to an existing right, and creating a right that did not exist before? The debt or claim is created by the individual. He has bound himself to comply with it. Does the creation of a new court amount to a retrospective law?

We are satisfied with the provision made in this country on the subject of trial by jury. Does our Constitution direct trials to be by jury? It is required in our bill of rights, which is not a part of the Constitution. Does any security arise from hence? Have you a jury when a judgment is obtained on a replevin bond, or by default? Have you a jury when a motion is made for the commonwealth against an individual; or when a motion is made by one joint obligor against another, to recover sums paid as security? Our courts decide in all these cases, without the intervention of a jury; yet they are all civil cases. The bill of rights is merely recommendatory. Were it otherwise, the consequence would be that many laws which are found convenient would be unconstitutional. What does the government before you say? Does it exclude the legislature from giving a trial by jury in civil cases? If it does not forbid its exclusion, it is on the same footing on which your state government stands now. The legislature of Virginia does not give a trial by jury where it is not necessary, but gives it wherever it is thought expedient. The federal legislature will do so too, as it is formed on the same principles.

The honorable gentleman says that unjust claims will be made, and the defendant had better pay them than go to the Supreme Court. Can you suppose such a disposition in one of your citizens, as that, to oppress another man, he will incur great expenses? What will he gain by an unjust demand? Does a claim establish a right? He must bring his witnesses to prove his claim. If he does not bring his witnesses, the expenses must fall upon him. Will he go on a calculation that the defendant will not defend it, or cannot produce a witness? Will he incur a great deal of expense, from a dependence on such a chance? Those who know human nature, black as it is, must know that mankind are too well attached to their interest to run such a risk. I conceive that this power is absolutely necessary, and not dangerous; that, should it be attended by little inconveniences, they will be altered, and that they can have no interest in not altering them. Is there any real danger? When I compare it to the exercise of the same power in the government of Virginia, I am persuaded there is not. The federal government has no other motive, and has every reason for doing right which the members of our state legislature have. Will a man on the eastern shore be sent to be tried in Kentucky, or a man from Kentucky be brought to the eastern shore to have his trial? A government, by doing this, would destroy itself. I am convinced the trial by jury will be regulated in the manner most advantageous to the community.

He [Mr. Henry] then proceeded to state the appellate jurisdiction of the judicial power, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as Congress shall make. He observed, that, as Congress had a right to organize the federal judiciary, they might or might not have recourse to a jury, as they pleased. He left it to the candor of the honorable gentleman to say whether those persons who were at the expense of taking witnesses to Philadelphia, or wherever the federal judiciary may sit, could be certain whether they were to be heard before a jury or not. An honorable gentleman (Mr. Marshall) the other day observed, that he conceived the trial by jury better secured under the plan on the table than in the British government, or even in our bill of rights. I have the highest veneration and respect for the honorable gentleman, and I have experienced his candor on all occasions; but, Mr. Chairman, in this instance, he is so materially mistaken that I cannot but observe, he is much in error. I beg the clerk to read that part of the Constitution which relates to trial by jury. [The clerk then read the 8th article of the bill of rights.]

Mr. MARSHALL rose to explain what he had before said on this subject: he informed the committee that the honorable gentleman (Mr. Henry) must have misunderstood him. He said that he conceived the trial by jury was as well secured, and not better secured, in the proposed new Constitution as in our bill of rights. [The clerk then read the 11*th article of the bill of rights*.]

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Chairman: The gentleman's candor, sir, as I informed you before, I have the highest opinion of, and am happy to find he has so far explained what he meant; but, sir, has he mended the matter? Is not the ancient trial by jury preserved in the Virginia bill of rights? and is that the case in the new plan? No, sir; they can do it if they please. Will gentlemen tell me the trial by jury of the vicinage where the party resides is preserved? True, sir, there is to be a trial by the jury in the state where the fact was committed; but, sir, this state, for instance, is so large that your juries may be collected five hundred miles from where the party resides — no neighbors who are acquainted with their characters, their good or bad conduct in life, to judge of the unfortunate man who may be thus exposed to the rigor of that government. Compare this security, then, sir, in our bill of rights with that in the new plan of government; and in the first you have it, and in the other, in my opinion, not at all. But, sir, in what situation will our citizens be, who have made large contracts under our present government? They will be called to a federal court, and tried under the retrospective laws; for it is evident, to me at least, that the federal court must look back, and give better remedies, to compel individuals to fulfill them.

The whole history of human nature cannot produce a government like that before you. The manner in which the judiciary and other branches of the government are formed, seems to me calculated to lay prostrate the states, and the liberties of the people. But, sir, another circumstance ought totally to reject that plan, in my opinion; which is, that it cannot be understood, in many parts, even by the supporters of it. A constitution, sir, ought to be, like a beacon, held up to the public eye, so as to be understood by every man. Some gentlemen have observed that the word jury implies a jury of the vicinage. There are so many inconsistencies in this, that, for my part, I cannot understand it. By the bill of rights of England, a subject has a right to a trial by his peers. What is meant by his peers? Those who reside near him, his neighbors, and who are well acquainted with his character and situation in life. Is this secured in the proposed plan before you? No, sir. As I have observed before, what is to become of the purchases of the Indians? — those unhappy nations who have given up their lands to private purchasers; who, by being made drunk, have given a thousand, nay, I might say, ten thousand acres, for the trifling sum of sixpence! It is with true concern, with grief, I tell you that I have waited with pain to come to this part of the plan; because I observed gentlemen admitted its being defective, and, I had my hopes, would have proposed amendments. But this part they have defended; and this convinces me of the necessity of obtaining amendments before it is adopted. They have defended it with ingenuity and perseverance, but by no means satisfactorily. If previous amendments are not obtained, the trial by jury is gone. British debtors will be ruined by being dragged to the federal court, and the liberty and happiness of our citizens gone, never again to be recovered.

12.2.2.6.jJune 24, 1788

Mr. HENRY… . The honorable member must forgive me for declaring my dissent from it; because, if I understand it rightly, it admits that the new system is defective, and most capitally; for, immediately after the proposed ratification, there comes a declaration that the paper before you is not intended to violate any of these three great rights — the liberty of religion, liberty of the press, and the trial by jury. What is the inference when you enumerate the rights which you are to enjoy? That those not enumerated are relinquished. There are only three things to be retained — religion, freedom of the press, and jury trial. Will not the ratification carry every thing, without excepting these three things? Will not all the world pronounce that we intended to give up all the rest? Every thing it speaks of, by way of rights, is comprised in these things. Your subsequent amendments only go to these three amendments.

… In my weak judgment, a government is strong when it applies to the most important end of all governments — the rights and privileges of the people. In the honorable member’s proposal, jury trial, the press and religion, and other essential rights, are not to be given up. Other essential rights — what are they? The world will say that you intended to give them up. When you go into an enumeration of your rights, and stop that enumeration, the inevitable conclusion is, that what is omitted is intended to be surrendered.

Friends Countrymen and Fellow Citizens: Permit one of yourselves to put you in mind of certain liberties and privileges secured to you by the constitution of this commonwealth, and to beg your serious attention to his uninterested opinion upon the plan of federal government submitted to your consideration, before you surrender these great and valuable privileges up forever… . 12.2.4.2The Federal Farmer, No. 2, October 9, 1787

The essential parts of a free and good government are a full and equal representation of the people in the legislature, and the jury trial of the vicinage in the administration of justice — a full and equal representation, is that which possesses the same interests, feelings, opinions, and views the people themselves would were they all assembled — a fair representation, therefore, should be so regulated, that every order of men in the community, according to the common course of elections, can have a share in it — in order to allow professional men, merchants, traders, farmers, mechanics, &c. to bring a just proportion of their best informed men respectively into the legislature, the representation must be considerably numerous — We have about 200 state senators in the United States, and a less number than that of federal representatives cannot, clearly, be a full representation of this people, in the affairs of internal taxation and police, were there but one legislature for the whole union. The representation cannot be equal, or the situation of the people proper for one government only — if the extreme parts of the society cannot be represented as fully as the central — It is apparently impracticable that this should be the case in this extensive country — it would be impossible to collect a representation of the parts of the country five, six, and seven hundred miles from the seat of government.

Under one general government alone, there could be but one judiciary, one supreme and a proper number of inferior courts. I think it would be totally impracticable in this case to preserve a due administration of justice, and the real benefits of the jury trial of the vicinage — there are now supreme courts in each state in the union, and a great number of county and other courts, subordinate to each supreme court — most of these supreme and inferior courts are itinerant, and hold their sessions in different parts every year of their respective states, counties and districts — with all these moving courts, our citizens, from the vast extent of the country, must travel very considerable distances from home to find the place where justice is administered. I am not for bringing justice to individuals as to afford them any temptation to engage in law suits; though I think it one of the greatest benefits in a good government, that each citizen should find a court of justice within a reasonable distance, perhaps, within a day’s travel of his home; so that without great inconveniences and enormous expense, he may have the advantages of his witnesses and jury — it would be impracticable to derive these advantages from one judiciary — the one supreme court at most could only set in the centre of the union, and move once a year into the centre of the eastern and southern extremes of it — and, in this case, each citizen, on an average, would travel 150 or 200 miles to find this court — that, however, inferior courts might be properly placed in the different counties, and districts of the union, the appellate jurisdiction would be intolerable and expensive.

If it were possible to consolidate the states, and preserve the features of a free government, still it is evident that the middle states, the parts of the union, about the seat of government, would enjoy great advantages, while the remote states would experience the many inconveniences of remote provinces. Wealth, offices, and the benefits of government would collect in the centre: and the extreme states; and their principal towns, become much less important.

There are other considerations which tend to prove that the idea of one consolidated whole, on free principles, is ill founded — the laws of a free government rest on the confidence of the people, and operate gently — and never can extend the influence very far — if they are executed on free principles, about the centre, where benefits of the government induce the people to support it voluntarily; yet they must be executed on the principles of fear and force in the extremes — This has been the case with every extensive republic of which we have any accurate account.

There are certain unalienable and fundamental rights, which in forming the social compact, ought to be explicitly ascertained and fixed — a free and enlightened people, in forming this compact, will not resign all their rights to those who govern, and they will fix limits to their legislators and rulers, which will soon be plainly seen by those who are governed, as well as by those who govern: and the latter will know they cannot be passed unperceived by the former, and without giving a general alarm — These rights should be made the basis of every constitution; and if a people be so situated, or have such different opinions that they cannot agree in ascertaining and fixing them, it is a very strong argument against their attempting to form one entire society, to live under one system of laws only. — I confess, I never thought the people of these states differed essentially in these respects; they having derived all these rights from one common source, the British systems; and having in the formation of their state constitutions, discovered that their ideas relative to these rights are very similar. However, it is now said that the states differ so essentially in these respects, and even in the important article of the trial by jury, that when assembled in convention, they can agree to no words by which to establish that trial, or by which to ascertain and establish many other of these rights, as fundamental articles in the social compact. If so, we proceed to consolidate the states on no solid basis whatever.

Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 14, pp. 25–27.

12.2.4.3The Federal Farmer, No. 3, October 10, 1787

… There are some powers proposed to be lodged in the general government in the judicial department, I think very unnecessarily, I mean powers respecting questions arising upon the internal laws of the respective states… . In almost all these cases, either party may have the trial by jury in the state courts;… justice may be obtained in these courts on reasonable terms; they must be more competent to proper decisions on the laws of their respective states, than the federal courts can possibly be… . It is true, those courts may be so organized by a wise and prudent legislature, as to make the obtaining of justice in them tolerably easy; they may in general be organized on the common law principles of the country: But this benefit is by no means secured by the constitution. The trial by jury is secured only in those few criminal cases, to which the federal laws will extend — as crimes committed on the seas against the law of nations, treason and counterfeiting the federal securities and coin: But even in these cases, the jury trial of the vicinage is not secured, particularly in the large states, a citizen may be tried for a crime committed in the state, and yet tried in some states 500 miles from the place where it was committed; but the jury trial is not secured at all in civil causes. Though the convention have not established this trial, it is to be hoped that congress, in putting the new system into execution, will do it by a legislative act, in all cases in which it can be done with propriety. Whether the jury trial is not excluded [in] the supreme judicial court, is an important question… .

12.2.4.4The Federal Farmer, No. 4, October 12, 1787

… If the federal constitution is to be construed so far in connection with the state constitutions, as to leave the trial by jury in civil causes, for instance, secured; on the same principles it would have left the trial by jury in criminal causes, the benefits of the writ of habeas corpus, &c. secured; they all stand on the same footing; they are the common rights of Americans, and have been recognized by the state constitutions: But the convention found it necessary to recognize or reestablish the benefits of that writ, and the jury trial in criminal cases… . The establishing of one right implies the necessity of establishing another and similar one.

On the whole, the position appears to me to be undeniable, that this bill of rights ought to be carried farther, and some other principles established, as a part of this fundamental compact between the people of the United States and their federal rulers.

… There are other essential rights, which we have justly understood to be the rights of freemen… . The trials by jury in civil causes, it is said, varies [sic] so much in the several states, that no words could be found for the uniform establishment of it. If so the federal legislation will not be able to establish it by any general laws. I confess I am of opinion it may be established, but not in that beneficial manner in which we may enjoy it, for the reasons beforementioned. When I speak of the jury trial of the vicinage, or the trial of the fact in the neighbourhood, — I do not lay so much stress upon the circumstance of our being tried by our neighbors: in this enlightened country men may be probably impartially tried by those who do not live very near them: but the trial of facts in the neighborhood is of great importance in other respects. Nothing can be more essential than the cross examining witnesses, and generally before the triers of the facts in question. The common people can establish facts with much more ease with oral than written evidence; when trials of fact are removed to a distance from the homes of the parties and witnesses, oral evidence becomes intolerably expensive, and the parties must depend on written evidence, which to the common people is expensive and almost useless; it must be frequently taken ex-parte, and but very seldom leads to the proper discovery of truth.

The trial by jury is very important in another point of view. It is essential in every free country, that common people should have a part and share of influence, in the judicial as well as in the legislative department. To hold open to them the offices of senators, judges, and offices to fill which an expensive education is required, cannot answer any valuable purposes for them; they are not in a situation to be brought forward and to fill those offices; these, and most other offices of any considerable importance, will be occupied by the few. The few, the well born, &c. as Mr. Adams calls them, in judicial decisions as well as in legislation, are generally disposed, and very naturally too, to favour those of their own description.

The trial by jury in the judicial department, and the collection of the people by their representatives in the legislature, are those fortunate inventions which have procured for them, in this country, their true proportion of influence, and the wisest and most fit means of protecting themselves in the community. Their situation, as jurors and representatives, enables them to acquire information and knowledge in the affairs and government of the society; and to come forward, in turn, as the centinels and guardians of each other. I am very sorry that even a few of our countrymen should consider jurors and representatives in a different point of view, as ignorant, troublesome bodies, which ought not to have any share in the concerns of government.

Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 14, pp. 45–47.

12.2.4.5One of the People, October 17, 1787

The… trials by jury are not infringed on. The Constitution is silent, and with propriety too, on these and every other subject relative to the internal government of the states. These are secured by the different state constitutions.

Pennsylvania Gazette, Jensen, vol. 2, p. 190.

12.2.4.6An Old Whig, No. 3, October 20, 1787

… As to the trial by jury, the question may be decided in a few words. Any future Congress sitting under the authority of the proposed new constitution, may, if they chuse, enact that there shall be no more trial by jury, in any of the United States; except in the trial of crimes; and this "supreme law" will at once annul the trial by jury, in all other cases. The author of the speech supposes that no danger "can possibly ensue, since the proceedings of the supreme court are to be regulated by the Congress, which is a faithful representation of the people; and the oppression of government is effectually barred; by declaring that in all criminal cases the trial by jury shall be preserved." Let us examine the last clause of this sentence first. — I know that an affected indifference to the trial by jury has been expressed, by some persons high in the confidence of the present ruling party in some of the states; — and yet for my own part I cannot change the opinion I had early formed of the excellence of this mode of trial even in civil causes. On the other hand I have no doubt that whenever a settled plan shall be formed for the extirpation of liberty, the banishment of jury trials will be one of the means adopted for the purpose. — But how is it that "the oppression of government is effectually barred by declaring that in all criminal cases the trial by jury shall be preserved?" — Are there not a thousand civil cases in which the government is a party? — In all actions for penalties, forfeitures and public debts, as well as many others, the government is a party and the whole weight of government is thrown into the scale of the prosecution[,] yet there are all of them civil causes. — These penalties, forfeitures and demands of public debts may be multiplied at the will and pleasure of government. — These modes of harassing the subject have perhaps been more effectual than direct criminal prosecutions… . No, Mr. Printer, we ought not to part with the trial by jury; we ought to guard this and many other privileges by a bill of rights, which cannot be invaded. The reason that is pretended in the speech why such a declaration; as a bill of rights requires, cannot be made for the protection of the trial by jury; — "that we cannot with any propriety say 'that the trial by jury shall be as heretofore' " in the case of a federal system of jurisprudence, is almost too contemptible to merit notice. — Is this the only form of words that language could afford on such an important occasion? Or if it were to what did these words refer when adopted in the constitutions of the states? — Plainly sir, to the trial by juries as established by the common law of England in the state of its purity; — That common law for which we contended so eagerly at the time of the revolution, and which now after the interval of a very few years, by the proposed new constitution we seem ready to abandon forever; at least in that article which is the most invaluable part of it; the trial by jury.

12.2.4.7An American Citizen, No. 4, October 21, 1787

… Both the old and new foederal constitutions, and indeed the constitution of Pennsylvania, admit of courts in which no use is made of a jury. The board of property, the court of admiralty, and the high court of errors and appeals, in the state of Pennsylvania, as also the court of appeals under the old confederation, exclude juries. Tryal by jury will therefore be in the express words of the Pennsylvania constitution, "as heretofore," — almost always used, though sometimes omitted. Trials for lands lying in any state between persons residing in such state, for bonds, notes, book debts, contracts, trespasses, assumptions, and all other matters between two or more citizens of any state, will be held in the state courts by juries, as now.

In these cases, the foederal courts cannot interfere. But when a dispute arises between the citizens of any state about lands lying out of the bounds thereof, or when a trial is to be had between the citizens of any state and those of another, or the government of another, the private citizen will not be obliged to go into a court constituted by the state, with which, or with the citizens of which, his dispute is. He can appeal to a disinterested foederal court. This is surely a great advantage, and promises a fair trial, and an impartial judgement. The trial by jury is not excluded in these foederal courts. In all criminal cases, where the property or life of the citizen is at stake, he has the benefit of a jury. If convicted on impeachment, which is never done by a jury in any country, he cannot be fined, imprisoned or punished, but only may be disqualified from doing public mischief by losing his office, and his capacity to hold another. If the nature of his offence, besides its danger to his country, should be criminal in itself — should involve a charge of fraud, murder or treason — he may be tried for such crime, but cannot be convicted without a jury. In trials about property in the foederal courts, which can only be as above stated, there is nothing in the new constitution to prevent a trial by jury. No doubt it will be the mode in every case, wherein it is practicable. This will be adjusted by law, and it could not be done otherwise. In short, the sphere of jurisdiction for the foederal courts is limited, and that sphere only is subject to the regulations of our foederal government. The known principles of justice, the attachment to trial by jury whenever it can be used, the instructions of the state legislatures, the instructions of the people at large, the operation of the foederal regulations on the property of a president, a senator, a representative, a judge, as well as on that of a private citizen, will certainly render those regulations as favorable as possible to property; for life and liberty are put more than ever into the hands of the juries. Under the present constitution of all the states, a public officer may be condemned to imprisonment or death on impeachment, without a jury; but the new foederal constitution protects the accused, till he shall be convicted, from the hands of power, by rendering a jury the indispensible judges of all crimes.

12.2.4.8Centinel, No. 2, October 24, 1787

Mr. Wilson says, that it would have been impracticable to have made a general rule for jury trial in the civil cases assigned to the federal judiciary, because of the want of uniformity in the mode of jury trial, as practiced by the several states. This objection proves too much, and therefore amounts to nothing. If it precludes the mode of common law in civil cases, it certainly does in criminal. Yet in these we are told "the oppression of government is effectually barred by declaring that in all criminal cases trial by jury shall be preserved." Astonishing, that provision could not be made for a jury in civil controversies, of 12 men, whose verdict should be unanimous, to be taken from the vicinage; a precaution which is omitted as to trial of crimes, which may be any where in the state within which they have been committed. So that an inhabitant of Kentucky may be tried for treason at Richmond.

12.2.4.9Timothy Meanwell, October 29, 1787

… I was informed that the trial by jury, which was guaranteed to us by the constitution of Pennsylvania, was in many instances abolished; this I did not believe when I heard it — I could not entertain an opinion that men so enlightened as those of the convention, among whose names I saw friend — and friend —, could be inattentive to the preservation of the trial by jury. I immediately took the constitution in my hand, and began to search it from end to end, and was in hopes of finding some clause like that in the Bill of Rights in the constitution of Pennsylvania, that would secure the trial by juries in all cases whatsoever, but I was disappointed.

12.2.4.10Cincinnatus, No. 1, November 1, 1787

Let us suppose then, that what has happened, may happen again: That a patriotic printer, like Peter Zenger, should incur the resentment of our new rulers, by publishing to the world, transactions which they wish to conceal. If he should be prosecuted, if his judges should be as desirous of punishing him, at all events, as the judges were to punish Peter Zenger, what would his innocence or his virtue avail him? This constitution is so admirably framed for tyranny, that, by clear construction, the judges might put the verdict of a jury out of the question. Among the cases in which the court is to have appellate jurisdiction, are — controversies, to which the United States are a party: — In this appellate jurisdiction, the judges are to determine, both law and fact. That is, the court is both judge and jury. The attorney general then would have only to move a question of law in the court below, to ground an appeal to the supreme judicature, and the printer would be delivered up to the mercy of his judges. Peter Zenger's case will teach us, what mercy he might expect. Thus, if the president, vice-president, or any other officer, or favorite of state, should be censured in print, he might effectually deprive the printer, or author, of his trial by jury, and subject him to something, that will probably very much resemble the Star Chamber of former times. The freedom of the press, the sacred palladium of public liberty, would be pulled down; — all useful knowledge on the conduct of government would be withheld from the people — the press would become subservient to the purposes of bad and arbitrary rulers, and imposition, not information, would be its object.

… Yet it was the jury only, that saved Zenger, it was a jury only, that saved Woodfall, it can only be a jury that will save any future printer from the fangs of power.

New York Journal, Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 13, pp. 532–33.

12.2.4.11Timoleon, November 1, 1787

"… With as little ceremony, and similar constructive doctrine, the inestimable trial by jury can likewise be depraved and destroyed — because the Constitution in the 2d section of the 3d article, by expressly assuming the trial by jury in criminal cases, and being silent about it in civil causes, evidently declares it to be unnecessary in the latter. And more strongly so, by giving the supreme court jurisdiction in appeals, 'both as to law and fact.' If this be added, that the trial by jury in criminal cases is only stipulated to be 'in the state,' not in the county where the crime is supposed to have been committed; one excellent part of the jury trial, from the vicinage, or at least from the county, is even in criminal cases rendered precarious, and at the mercy of rulers under the new Constitution. — Yet the danger to liberty, peace, and property, from restraining and injuring this excellent mode of trial, will clearly appear from the following observations of the learned Dr. Blackstone, in his commentaries on the laws of England, Art. Jury Trial Book 3. chap. 33. — 'The establishment of jury trial was always so highly esteemed and valued by the people, that no conquest, no change of government, could ever prevail to abolish it. In the magna charta it is more than once insisted upon as the principle bulwark of our liberties — And this is a species of knowledge most absolutely necessary for every gentleman; as well, because he may be frequently called upon to determine in this capacity the rights of others, his fellow subjects; as, because his own property, his liberty, and his life, depend upon maintaining in its legal force the trial by jury… And in every country as the trial by jury has been gradually disused, so the great have increased in power, until the state has been torn to pieces by rival factions, and oligarchy in effect has been established, though under the shadow of regal government; unless where the miserable people have taken shelter under absolute monarchy, as the lighter evil of the two… . It is therefore upon the whole, a duty which every man owes to his country, his friends, his posterity, and himself, to maintain, to the utmost of his power, this valuable trial by jury in all its rights'." Thus far the learned Dr. Blackstone, — "Could the Doctor, if he were here, at this moment,"… "have condemned those parts of the new Constitution in stronger terms, which give the supreme court jurisdiction both as to law and fact; which have weakened the jury trial in criminal cases and which have discountenanced it in all civil causes? At first I wondered at the complaint that some people made of this new Constitution, because it led to the government of a few; but it is fairly to be concluded, from this injury to the trial by jury, that some who framed this new system, saw with Dr. Blackstone, how operative jury trial was in preventing the tyranny of the great ones, and therefore frowned upon it, as this new Constitution does… ."

For the security of life, in criminal prosecutions, the bill of rights of most of the states have declared, that no man shall be held to answer for a crime until he is made fully acquainted with the charge brought against him; he shall not be compelled to accuse, or furnish evidence against himself — The witnesses against him shall be brought face to face, and he shall be fully heard by himself or counsel. That it is essential to the security of life and liberty, that trial of facts be in the vicinity where they happen. Are not provisions of this kind as necessary in the general government, as in that of a particular state? The powers vested in the new Congress extend in many cases to life; they are authorised to provide for the punishment of a variety of capital crimes, and no restraint is laid upon them in its exercise, save only, that "the trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury; and such trial shall be in the state where the said crimes shall have been committed." No man is secure of a trial in the county where he is charged to have committed a crime; he may be brought from Niagara to New-York, or carried from Kentucky to Richmond for trial for an offence, supposed to be committed. What security is there, that a man shall be furnished with a full and plain description of the charges against him? That he shall be allowed to produce all proof he can in his favor? That he shall see the witnesses against him face to face, or that he shall be fully heard in his own defence by himself or counsel?

12.2.4.13An Old Whig, No. 5, November 1, 1787

… It is needless to repeat the necessity of securing other personal rights in the forming a new government. The same argument which proves the necessity of securing one of them shews also the necessity of securing others. Without a bill of rights we are totally insecure in all of them; and no man can promise himself with any degree of certainty that his posterity will enjoy the inestimable blessings of liberty of conscience, of freedom of speech and of writing and publishing their thoughts on public matters, of trial by jury, of holding themselves, their houses and papers free from seizure and search upon general suspicion or general warrants; or in short that they will be secured in the enjoyment of life, liberty and property without depending on the will and pleasure of their rulers.

12.2.4.14A Son of Liberty, November 8, 1787

MR. GREENLEAF, Having observed in your paper of the 25th ult. that a writer under the signature of A Slave, has pointed out a number of advantages or blessings, which, he says, will result from an adoption of the new government, proposed by the Convention: — I have taken the liberty to request, that you will give the following a place in your next paper, it being an enumeration of a few of the curses which will be entailed on the people of America, by this preposterous and newfangled system, if they are ever so infatuated as to receive it… . 3d. A suppression of trial by jury of your peers, in all civil cases, and even in criminal cases, the loss of the trial in the vicinage, where the fact and the credibility of your witnesses are known, and where you can command their attendance without insupportable expence, or inconveniences.

12.2.4.15Uncus, November 9, 1787

Mr. GODDARD, When you began publishing the Centinel in numbers, I expected we should have had one in each of your papers for some weeks, hoping, that after he had done finding fault with the doings of the late convention, the members of which were either too designing, — of too aristocratic principles, — too old, — or too ignorant, "inexperienced and fallible," for business of such magnitude; he would, by the perfect rule existing in his own mind, by which he has tried and condemned the proposed constitution, exhibit to the world a perfect model; which these States would have only to read, and invite "those who are competent to the task of developing the principles of government," to come forward, approve and adopt.

I believe, there is not a single article, wherein the new plan has proposed any amendment to the old, but what would be objected to by Centinel. To some he has objected, where they have made no amendment; as the power of Congress to try causes without a jury, which they have ever possessed.

12.2.4.16Gentleman in New-York, November 14, 1787

"… I have not only no objection to, but am extremely desirous of, a strong and general government, provided the fundamental principles of liberty be well secured. These I take to be, trial by jury as has been and is practised… . In all these great points the proposed constitution requires amendment, before it can be adopted even with safety.

"In the constitution of the faederal court, where its jurisdiction is original, the securing jury trial in criminal, is, according to all legal reasoning, an exclusion of it in civil matters — and in its appellant function it is expressly said the court shall judge both of law and fact. This of course renders the finding of a jury below, totally nugatory.

12.2.4.17A Georgian, November 15, 1787

And now we come to the point which at once teems with numberless enormous innovations by introducing strange and new courts of almost any denomination into any of the states whereby our own courts will soon be annihilated, and abolishing the only pledge of liberty, the trial by jury, to tyrants only formidable, in all civil cases, countenancing the greatest injustice to be lawfully, nay constitutionally, committed by the rich against their brave fellow citizens whose only misfortune is to be, perhaps, not so rich as they, by dragging their lawsuits of any denomination and of any sum, however small, if they choose, before the GRAND TRIBUNAL OF APPEAL to which the poor will be unable to follow with their evidences and witnesses, and on account of the great expenses. Therefore, fellow citizens, pray restrain this encroachment so destructive to the inestimable rights the more numerous part of middle-circumstanced citizens now enjoy. With horror beware of the precipice before you; and, if you will, please join me in amending the third Article in the Federal Constitution thus:

"The trial of all civil and criminal causes, except in cases of impeachment (as provided for in Article I, section 3) shall be by jury, drawn by lot out of a box from among the freeholders of that state where Congress shall reside, and within five miles thereof; and, when a crime against the United States has been committed within no state, the Supreme Court of Congress shall have the trial of the same where Congress then resides.

Of a very different nature, tho' only one degree better than the other reasoning, is all that sublimity of nonsense and alarm, that has been thundered against it in every shape of metaphoric terror, on the subject of a bill of rights, the liberty of the press, rights of conscience, rights of taxation and election, trials in the vicinity, freedom of speech, trial by jury, and a standing army. These last are undoubtedly important points, much too important to depend on mere paper protection. For, guard such privileges by the strongest expressions, still if you leave the legislative and executive power in the hands of those who are or may be disposed to deprive you of them — you are but slaves. Make an absolute monarch — give him the supreme authority, and guard as much as you will by bills of right, your liberty of the press, and trial by jury; — he will find means either to take them from you, or to render them useless.

Your General Assembly under your present constitution are supreme. They may keep troops on foot in the most profound peace, if they think proper. They have heretofore abridged the trial by jury in some cases, and they can again in all. They can restrain the press, and may lay the most burdensome taxes if they please, and who can forbid? But still the people are perfectly safe that not one of these events shall take place so long as the members of the General Assembly are as much interested, and interested in the same manner, as the other subjects.

On examining the new proposed constitution, there can not be a question, but that there is authority enough lodged in the proposed federal Congress, if abused, to do the greatest injury. And it is perfectly idle to object to it, that there is no bill of rights, or to propose to add to it a provision that a trial by jury shall in no case be omitted, or to patch it up by adding a stipulation in favor of the press, or to guard it by removing the paltry objection to the right of Congress to regulate the time and manner of elections.

12.2.4.19A Well-Informed Correspondent, November 28, 1787

… "The judicial powers of the Faederal Courts have, also, been grossly misrepresented. It is said "that the trial by jury is to be abolished, and that the courts of the several states are to be annihilated." But these, Sir, are mistaken notions, scandalous perversions of truth. The courts of judicature in each state will still continue in their present situation. The trial by jury in all disputes between man and man in each state will still remain inviolate, and in all cases of this description, there can be no appeal to the Faederal Courts. It is only in particular specified cases, of which each state cannot properly take cognizance, that the judicial authority of the Faederal Courts can be exercised. Even in the congressional courts of judicature, the trial of all crimes except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury. How then can any man say that the trial by jury will be abolished, and that the courts of the several states will be annihilated by the adoption of the Faederal Government? Must not the man who makes this assertion be either consummately imprudent, or consummately ignorant? My God! what can he mean by such bareface representations? Can he be a friend to his country? Can he be the friend to the happiness of mankind? Is he not some insidious foe? Some emissary, hired by British Gold — plotting the ruin of both, by disseminating the seeds of suspicion and discontent among us?

Virginia Independent Chronicle, Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 14, pp. 244–45.

12.2.4.20 James McHenry, Speech to the Maryland House, November 29, 1787

… 1st. The judicial power of the United States underwent a full investigation — it is impossible for me to Detail the observations that were delivered on that subject — The right of tryal by Jury was left open and undefined from the difficulty attending any limitation to so valuable a priviledge, and from the persuasion that Congress might hereafter make provision more suitable to each respective State — To suppose that mode of Tryal intended to be abolished would be to suppose the Representatives in Convention to act contrary to the Will of their Constituents, and Contrary to their own Interest. —…

Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 14, p. 284.

12.2.4.21 A Countryman, No. 3, November 29, 1787

… Last week I endeavored to evince, that the only surety you could have for your liberties must be in the nature of your government; that you could derive no security from bills of rights, or stipulations, on the subject of a standing army, the liberty of the press, trial by jury, or on any other subject. Did you ever hear of an absolute monarchy, where those rights which are proposed by the pigmy politicians of this day, to be secured by stipulation, were ever preserved? Would it not be mere trifling to make any such stipulations, in any absolute monarchy?

On the other hand, if your interest and that of your rulers are the same, your liberties are abundantly secure… .

No people can be more secure against tyranny and oppression in their rulers than you are at present; and no rulers can have more supreme and unlimited authority than your general assembly have.

New Haven Gazette, Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 4, p. 296.

12.2.4.22Philadelphiensis, No. 3, December 5, 1787

… The only thing in which a government should be efficient, is to protect the liberties, lives, and property of the people governed, from foreign and domestic violence. This, and this only is what every government should do effectually. For any government to do more than this is impossible, and every one that falls short of it is defective. Let us now compare the new constitution with this legitimate definition of an efficient government, and we shall find that it has scarce a particle of an efficient government in its whole composition.

In the first place then it does not protect the people in those liberties and privileges that all freemen should hold sacred — The liberty of conscience, the liberty of the press, the liberty of trial by jury, &c. are all unprotected by this constitution… .

12.2.4.23Agrippa, No. 5, December 11, 1787

There is another sense in which the clause relating to causes between the state and individuals is to be understood, and it is more probable than the other, as it will be eternal in its duration, and increasing in its extent. This is the whole branch of the law relating to criminal prosecutions. In all such cases the state is plaintiff, and the person accused is defendant. The process, therefore, will be, for the attorney-general of the state to commence his suit before a continental court. Considering the state as a party, the cause must be tried in another, and all of the expense of transporting witnesses incurred. The individual is to take his trial among strangers, friendless and unsupported, without its being known whether he is habitually a good or a bad man; and consequently with one essential circumstance wanting by which to determine whether the action was performed maliciously or accidentally. All these inconveniences are avoided by the present important restriction, that the cause shall be tried by a jury of the vicinity, and tried in the county where the offence was commited [sic]. But by the proposed derangement, I can call it by no softer name, a man must be ruined to prove his innocence. This is far from being a forced construction of the proposed form. The words appear to me not intelligible, upon the idea that it is to be a system of government, unless the construction now given, both for civil and criminal process, be admitted.

Massachusetts Gazette, Storing, vol. 4, pp. 78–79.

12.2.4.24Address and Reasons of Dissent of the Minority of the Pennsylvania Convention, December 12, 1787

The first consideration that this review suggests, is the omission of a BILL of RIGHTS ascertaining and fundamentally establishing those unalienable and personal rights of men, without the full, free, and secure enjoyment of which there can be no liberty, and over which it is not necessary for a good government to have the controul. The principal of which are the rights of conscience, personal liberty by the clear and unequivocal establishment of the writ of habeas corpus, jury trial in criminal and civil cases, by an impartial jury of the vicinage or county; with the common law proceedings, for the safety of the accused in criminal prosecutions and the liberty of the press, that scourge of tyrants; and the grand bulwark of every other liberty and, privilege; the stipulations heretofore made in favor of them in the state constitutions, are entirely superceded by this constitution.

We have before noticed the judicial power as it would effect a consolidation of the states into one government; we will now examine it, as it would affect the liberties and welfare of the people, supposing such a government were practicable and proper.

The judicial power, under the proposed constitution, is founded on the well-known principles of the civil law, by which the judge determines both on law and fact, and appeals are allowed from the inferior tribunals to the superior, upon the whole question; so that facts as well as law, would be reexamined, and even new facts brought forward in the court of appeals… .

That this mode of proceeding is the one which must be adopted under this constitution, is evident from the following circumstances: — 1st. That the trial by jury, which is the grand characteristic of the common law, is secured by the constitution, only in criminal cases. — 2d. That the appeal from both law and fact is expressly established, which is utterly inconsistent with the principles of the common law, and trials by jury. The only mode in which an appeal from law and fact can be established, is, by adopting the principles and practice of the civil law; unless the United States should be drawn into the absurdity of calling and swearing juries, merely for the purpose of contradicting their verdicts, which would render juries contemptible and worse than useless. — 3d. That the courts to be established would decide on all cases of law and equity, which is a well known characteristic of the civil law, …

Not to enlarge upon the loss of the invaluable right of trial by an unbiassed jury, so dear to every friend of liberty, the monstrous expence and inconveniences of the mode of proceeding to be adopted, are such as will prove intolerable to the people of this country… . We abhor the idea of losing the transcendent privilege of trial by jury, with the loss of which, it is remarked by the same learned author, that in Sweden, the liberties of the commons were extinguished by an aristocratic senate: and that trial by jury and the liberty of the people went out together.

12.2.4.25A Countryman, No. 5, December 20, 1787

The great power and influence of an hereditary monarch of Britain has spread many alarms, from an apprehension that the commons would sacrifice the liberties of the people to the money or influence of the crown: But the influence of a powerful hereditary monarch, with the national Treasury — Army — and fleet at his command — and the whole executive government — and one third of the legislative in his hands, — constantly operating on a house of commons, whose duration is never less than seven years, unless the same monarch should end it, (which he can do in an hour) has never yet been sufficient to obtain one vote of the house of commons which has taken from the people the liberty of the press, — trial by jury, — the rights of conscience, or of private property. — Can you then apprehend danger of oppression and tyranny from the too great duration of the power of your rulers.

12.2.4.26Richard Henry Lee to Edmund Randolph, December 22, 1787

… The rights of conscience, the freedom of the press, and the trial by jury are at mercy. It is there stated that in criminal cases, the trial shall be by jury. But how? In the state. What then becomes of the jury of the vicinage or at least from the county in the first instance, the states being from 50 to 700 miles in extent? This mode of trial even in criminal cases may be greatly impaired, and in civil cases the inference is strong, that it may be altogether omitted as the constitution positively assumes it in criminal, and is silent about it in civil causes. Nay it is more strongly discountenanced in civil cases by giving the supreme court in appeals, jurisdiction both as to law and fact.

Judge Blackstone in his learned commentaries (Art. Jury Trial) says, [“it] is the most transcendent privilege which any subject can enjoy or wish for, that he cannot be affected either in his property, his liberty, his person, but by the unanimous consent of twelve of his neighbors and equals. A constitution, that I may venture to affirm, has under providence, secured the just liberties of this nation for a long succession of ages. The impartial administration of justice, which secures both our persons and our properties, is the great end of civil society. But if that be entirely entrusted to the magistracy, a select body of men, and those generally selected by the prince, or such as enjoy the highest offices of the state, these decisions, in spite of their own natural integrity, will have frequently an involuntary bias towards those of their own rank and dignity. It is not to be expected from human nature, that the few should always be attentive to the good of the many.[”] The learned judge further says, that [“]every tribunal selected for the decision of facts is a step towards establishing aristocracy; the most oppressive of all governments.[”] The answer to these objections is, that the new legislature may provide remedies! but as they may, so they may not, and if they did, a succeeding assembly may repeal the provisions. The evil is found resting upon constitutional bottom, and the remedy upon the mutable ground of legislation, revocable at any annual meeting. It is the more unfortunate that this great security of human rights, the trial by jury, should be weakened in this system, as power is unnecessarily given in the second section of the third article, to call people from their own country in all cases of controversy about property between citizens of different states and foreigners, with citizens of the United States, to be tried in a distant court where the congress meets. For although inferior congressional courts may for the above parties be instituted in the different states, yet this is a matter altogether in the pleasure of the new legislature, so that if they please not to institute them, or if they do not regulate the right of appeal reasonably, the people will be exposed to endless oppression, and the necessity of submitting in multitudes of cases, to pay unjust demands, rather than follow suitors, through great expence, to far distant tribunals, and to be determined upon there, as it may be, without a jury. In this congressional legislature a bare majority of votes, can enact commercial laws, so that the representatives of the seven northern states, as they will have a majority, can by law create the most oppressive monopoly upon the five southern states, whose circumstances and productions are essentially different from theirs, although not a single man of these voters are the representatives of, or amenable to the people of the southern states. Can such a set of men be, with the least colour of truth, called a representative of those they make laws for? It is supposed that the policy of the northern states, will prevent such abuses.

12.2.4.27The Federal Farmer, No. 6, December 25, 1787

Of rights, some are natural and unalienable, of which even the people cannot deprive individuals: Some are constitutional or fundamental; these cannot be altered or abolished by the ordinary laws; but the people, by express acts, may alter or abolish them — These, such as the trial by jury, the benefits of the writ of habeas corpus, &c. individuals claim under the solemn compacts of the people, as constitutions, or at least under laws so strengthened by long usage as not to be repealable by the ordinary legislature — and some are common or mere legal rights, that is, such as individuals claim under laws which the ordinary legislature may alter or abolish at pleasure.

The following, I think, will be allowed to be unalienable or fundamental rights in the United States: —… The people… are at all times intitled to the benefits of the writ of habeas corpus, the trial by jury in criminal and civil causes — They have a right, when charged, to a speedy trial in the vicinage; to be heard by themselves or counsel, not to be compelled to furnish evidence against themselves, to have witnesses face to face, and to confront their adversaries before the judge — No man is held to answer a crime charged upon him till it be substantially described to him… .

… But you will say, that trial by jury, is an unalienable right, that ought not to be trusted with our rulers. Why not? If it is such a darling privilege, will not Congress be as fond of it, as their constituents? An elevation into that Council, does not render a man insensible to his privileges, nor place him beyond the necessity of securing them. A member of Congress is liable to all the operations of law, except during his attendance on public business; and should he consent to a law, annihilating any right whatever, he deprives himself, his family and estate, of the benefit resulting from that right, as well as his constituents. This circumstance alone, is a sufficient security.

But, why this outcry about juries? If the people esteem them so highly, why do they ever neglect them, and suffer the trial by them to go into disuse? In some States, Courts of Admiralty have no juries — nor Courts of Chancery at all. In the City-Courts of some States, juries are rarely or never called, altho' the parties may demand them; and one State, at least, has lately passed an act, empowering the parties to submit both law and fact to the Court. It is found, that the judgment of a Court, gives as much satisfaction, as the verdict of a jury, as the Court are as good judges of fact, as juries, and much better judges of law. I have no desire to abolish trials by jury, although the original design and excellence of them, is in many cases superseded. — While the people remain attached to this mode of deciding causes, I am confident, that no Congress can wrest the privilege from them.

12.2.4.29A Countryman, December 1787–January 1788

There is another thing our Congress told the people of Canada, in their letter, and I believe they were in earnest, “That the trial by jury, was one of the best securities in the world, for the life, liberty and property of the people.” — Now to be sure, I am very much of their opinion in this; for I would rather trust my life, liberty and property to a verdict of twelve of my honest neighbors, than to the opinion of any great man in the world, for great men are not always honest men, and they may be too proud, and not care to give themselves the trouble to enquire very narrowly into common people’s disputes; and if an honest farmer should happen to say any thing against a great man, tho’ it was ever so true, it would be in the power of the judge to punish him for it very severely—and I don’t doubt, but what he would do it; but I am sure a good honest jury of his neighbors would never punish him for speaking the truth; I know it is said that truth is not to be spoken at all times, but the best of us may be guilty of little acts of imprudence, for which however, we should not be too severely handled: I find the writers disagree about this matter; the one says this right of trial by jury is taken away by the new constitution, and the other says it is not. — Now, as they differ, I have been trying to find out the truth myself, and, it appears to me middling clear, that if it is not absolutely taken away; yet that this new General Congress, that we read of, may take it away whenever they please—now, if it is so good a thing that it never ought to be taken away, I think we ought not to give them power to do it; for I can’t see the reason of giving them power, which they never can make use of, without doing us a great deal of hurt: Now all parties may mean what is honest at present, but notwithstanding, there may be a time, when we have bad men to rule us, and I think it would be imprudent to give power, which every one allows there is no necessity for, and with which bad men, if so disposed, might do us a great deal of harm, and I am more confirmed in this belief, when I think of what the said Mr. Beccaria says about this desire, which has always prevailed in men of increasing their power. This is all I can say about the matter at present… .

12.2.4.30Agrippa, No. 10, January 1, 1788

… For a more concise view of my proposal, I have thrown it into the form of a resolve to be passed by the [Massachusetts] convention which is shortly to set in this town.

"Commonwealth of Massachusetts

Resolved… .

"XIV. The United States shall have power to regulate the intercou[r]se between these states and foreign dominions, under the following restrictions… . [T]he United S[t]ates shall have authority to constitute judicatories, whether supreme or subordinate, with power to try all piracies and felonies done on the high seas… . They shall also have authority to try all causes in which ambassadours shall be concerned. All these trials shall be by jury and in some seaport town… .

Massachusettes Gazette, Storing, vol. 4, p. 89.

12.2.4.31The Federal Farmer, No. 15, January 18, 1788

… By the same section [article 3, section 2 of the Constitution], the jury trial, in criminal causes, except in cases of impeachment, is established; but not in civil causes, and the whole state may be considered as the vicinage in cases of crimes. These clauses present to view the constitutional features of the federal judiciary: this has been called a monster by some of the opponents, and some, even of the able advocates, have confessed they do not comprehend it. For myself, I confess, I see some good things in it, and some very extraordinary ones… . [T]he legislature will have full power to form and arrange judicial courts in the federal cases enumerated, at pleasure, with these eight exceptions only… . 6. There must be a jury trial in criminal causes. 7. The trial of crimes must be in the state where committed —… .

[T]he supreme court shall have jurisdiction both as to law and fact. What is meant by court? Is the jury included in the term, or is it not? I conceive it is not included: and so do the members of the convention, I am very sure, understand it.

12.2.4.32Curtiopolis, January 18, 1788

Fathers, Friends, Countrymen, Brethren and Fellow Citizens, The happiness and existence of America being now suspended upon your wise deliberations; three or four sly Aristocrats having lashed the public passions, like wild horses, to the car of Legislation, and driving us all in the midst of political clouds of error, into that ditch of despotism lately dug by the Convention: Such dismal circumstances have induced a private citizen to lay before you, in as concise a manner as possible, the objections that have been made, by the Pennsylvania Secession, Brutus, Cato, Cincinnatus, Farmer, An Officer, &c. &c. our best men.

26. It allows of other modes of trial besides that by jury, and of course this is abolished: such modes will be instituted under the direction of Congress, as will leave offenders, traitors, malcontents, or such of us as fall under the lash, no chance at all.

12.2.4.33The Federalist, No. 41, January 19, 1788

Had no other enumeration or definition of the powers of the Congress been found in the Constitution than the general expressions just cited, the authors of the objection might have had some color for it; though it would have been difficult to find a reason for so awkward a form of describing an authority to legislate in all possible cases. A power to destroy the freedom of the press, the trial by jury, or even to regulate the course of descents, or the forms of conveyances, must be very singularly expressed by the terms "to raise money for the general welfare."

Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 15, p. 424.

12.2.4.34The Federal Farmer, No. 16, January 20, 1788

The trial by jury in criminal as well as in civil causes, has long been considered as one of our fundamental rights, and has been repeatedly recognized and confirmed by most of the state conventions. But the constitution expressly establishes this trial in criminal, and wholly omits it in civil causes. The jury trial in criminal causes, and the benefit of the writ of habeas corpus, are already as effectually established as any of the fundamental or essential rights of the people in the United States… . [I]nstead of establishing it in criminal causes only; we ought to establish it generally; — instead of the clause of forty or fifty words relative to this subject, why not use the language that has always been used in this country, and say, "the people of the United States shall always be entitled to the trial by jury." This would shew the people still hold the right sacred, and enjoin it upon congress substantially to preserve the jury trial in all cases, according to the usage and custom of the country. I have observed before, that it is the jury trial we want; the little different appendages and modifications tacked to it in the different states, are no more than a drop in the ocean: the jury trial is a solid uniform feature in a free government; it is the substance we would save, not the little articles of form.

Security against expost [sic] facto laws, the trial by jury, and the benefits of the writs of habeas corpus, are but a part of those inestimable rights the people of the United States are entitled to, even in judicial proceedings, by the course of the common law. These may be secured in general words, as in New-York, the Western Territory, &c. by declaring the people of the United States shall always be entitled to judicial proceedings according to the course of the common law, as used and established in the said states. Perhaps it would be better to enumerate the particular essential rights the people are entitled to in these proceedings, as has been done in many of the states, and as has been done in England… . We certainly, in federal processes, might as well claim the benefits of the writ of habeas corpus, as to claim trial by a jury — the right to have council — to have witnesses face to face — to be secure against unreasonable search warrrants, &c. was the constitution silent as to the whole of them: — but the establishment of the former, will evince that we could not claim them without it; and the omission of the latter, implies they are relinquished, or deemed of no importance. These are rights and benefits individuals acquire by compact; they must claim them under compacts, or immemorial usage — it is doubtful, at least, whether they can be claimed under immemorial usage in this country; and it is, therefore, we generally claim them under compacts, as charters and constitutions.

… I could very easily imagine, that a gentleman of far less understanding than "Alexander Hamilton," is said to be, would have had modesty enough to wait for further authority, before he set his name to an instrument of such immense importance to the state which entrusted him, and honored him with its interests and commands.

What was this but setting the state and his colleagues at open defiance, and, tacitly, telling the legislature and them, "I want none of your instructions, advice, nor assistance. I better know than you or they what ought to be done, and how to do it. Yes, I know what will suit you all, much better than any body else in the state. I know, that trial by jury, of the vicinage, is a foolish custom, besides frequently embarrassing the judges, it often disappoints the lawyers, and therefore, as I may never have it in my power again, I will now contribute all I can to the abolition of it." If it be true, that actions may speak plainer than words, which, I believe, is a maxim pretty well established, must not the foregoing, or something like it, have been the language or ideas held by the gentleman?

… But the matter now in debate has no relation to that: the men opposed to the new constitution have the same cause to defend, that the people of America had during the period of a seven years war. Who is he so base, that will peaceably submit to a government that will eventually destroy his sacred rights and privileges? The liberty of conscience, the liberty of the press, the liberty of trial by jury, &c. must lie at the mercy of a few despots — an infernal junto, that are for changing our free republican government into a tyrannical and absolute monarchy. These are what roused the sons of America to oppose Britain, and from the nature of things, they must have a similar effect now.

Mr. Russell, … I am not contented with it [the proposed plan of government] as it now stands, my reasons are assigned: —

I am not satisfied with the provision for amendments, as it stands in that system, because the amendments I propose, are such as two thirds of the Senate will perhaps never agree to — the indictment by grand jury, and trial of fact by jury, is not so much set by in the southern States, as in the northern—the great men there, are too rich and important to serve on the juries, and the smaller are considered as not having consequence enough to try the others; in short, there can be no trial by peers there… .

5th. In the second clause of the same section, strike out the words, "Both as to law and fact," and add to that clause these words — Provided nevertheless, that all issues of fact shall be tried by a jury to be appointed according to standing laws made by Congress.

This will preserve the inestimable right of a trial by jury — This right is the democratical balance in the Judciary power; without it, in civil actions, no relief can be had against the High Officers of State, for abuse of private citizens; without this the English Constitution would be a tyranny — See Judge Blackstone's excellent Commentary on this privilege, in his third volume, page [section 23].

6th. In the last clause in the same section next after the word State, insert these words, In, or near the County.

This keeps up the idea of trial in the vicinity. See the Massachusetts declaration of rights on this point — Also, that of other States, &c.

12.2.4.38Aristides, January 31, 1788

The institution of the trial by jury has been sanctified by the experience of ages. It has been recognised by the constitution of every state in the union. It is deemed the birthright of Americans; and it is imagined, that liberty cannot subsist without it. The proposed plan expressly adopts it, for the decision of all criminal accusations, except impeachment; and is silent with respect to the determination of facts in civil causes.

The inference, hence drawn by many, is not warranted by the premises. By recognising the jury trial in criminal cases, the constitution effectually provides, that it shall prevail, so long as the constitution itself shall remain unimpaired and unchanged. But, from the great variety of civil cases, arising under this plan of government, it would be unwise and impolitic to say ought [sic] about it, in regard to these. Is there not a great variety of cases, in which this trial is taken away in each of the states? Are there not many more cases, where it is denied in England? For the convention to ascertain in what cases it shall prevail, and in what others it may be expedient to prefer other modes, was impracticable. On this subject, a future congress is to decide; and I see no foundation under Heaven for the opinion, that congress will despise the known prejudices and inclination of their countrymen. A very ingenious writer of Philadelphia has mentioned the objections without deigning to refute that, which he conceives to have originated "in sheer malice." —

I proceed to attack the whole body of antifederalists in their strong hold. The proposed constitution contains no bill of rights.

My friends and fellow farmers, I intended here to have made an end, and left Alfredus, with all his impudence to return peaceably to his cell, where I sent him in the first paragraph — But when I came to read over his piece a second time couched in such language, it made me shudder to see how abusively he has treated our juries, the grand palladium of liberty. I will for your observation copy his sentiment, it appears to be written with blood. These are his words — "What are the advantages of this boasted Trial by Jury, and on which side do they lie, not certainly on the side of justice, for one unprincipled juror, secured in the interest of the opposite party, will frequently divert her course, and in four cases out of five, when injustice is done, it is by the ignorance or knavery of the jury." — This is a bold stroke, my friends, and shows you at once the disposition of Mr. Alfredus, that he is no friend to your liberties. I shall make no further observation on this particular, but when a leisure hour offers, I will give him a further combing for his insolence to the juries… .

To such lengths have these bold conspirators carried their scheme of despotism, that your most sacred rights and privileges are surrendered at discretion. When government thinks proper, under the pretence of writing a libel, &c. it may imprison, inflict the most cruel and unusual punishment, seize property, carry on prosecutions, &c. and the unfortunate citizen has no magna charta, no bill of rights, to protect him; nay, the prosecution may be carried on in such a manner that even a jury will not be allowed him… .

12.2.4.43An Old Whig, No. 8, February 6, 1788

First then, the general expectation seems to be that our future rulers will rectify all that is amiss. If a bill of rights is wanting, they will frame a bill of rights. If too much power is vested in them, they will not abuse it; nay, they will divest themselves of it. The very first thing they will do, will be to establish the liberties of the people by good and wholesome ordinances, on so solid a foundation as to baffle all future encroachments from themselves or their successors. Much good no doubt might be done in this way; if Congress should possess the most virtuous inclinations, yet there are some things which it will not be in their power to rectify. For instance; the appellate jurisdiction as to law and fact, which is given to the supreme court of the continent, and which annihilates the trial by jury in all civil causes, the Congress can only modify: — They cannot extinguish this power, so destructive of the principles of real liberty. It would not be by any means extravagant to say, that a new continental convention ought to be called, if it were only for the sake of preserving the sacred palladium — THE INESTIMABLE RIGHT OF TRIAL BY JURY.

… Again; how could the stripping people of the right of trial by jury conduce to the strength of the state? Do we find the government in England at all weakened by the people retaining the right of trial by jury? Far from it. Yet these things which merely tend to oppress the people, without conducing at all to the strength of the state, are the last which aristocratic rulers would consent to restore to the people; because they encrease the personal power and importance of the rulers. Judges, unincumbered by juries, have ever been found much better friends to government than to the people. Such judges will always be more desireable than juries to a self-created senate, upon the same principle that a large standing army, and the entire command of the militia and of the purse, is ever desireable to those who wish to enslave the people, and upon the same principle that a bill of rights is their aversion.

12.2.4.44Deliberator, February 20, 1788

9. Congress may, in their courts of judicature, abolish trial by a jury, in civil cases, altogether; and even in criminal cases, trial by a jury of the vicinage is not secured by the constitution — A crime committed at Fort-Pitt may be tried by a jury of the citizens of Philadelphia.

12.2.4.45Hugh Williamson, Speech, February 25, 1788

It seems to be generally admitted, that the system of Government which has been proposed by the late Convention, is well calculated to relieve us from many of the grievances under which we have been laboring. If I might express my particular sentiments on this subject, I should describe it as more free and more perfect than any form of government that ever has been adopted by any nation; but I would not say it has no faults. Imperfection is inseparable from every human device. Several objections were made to this system by two or three very respectable characters in the Convention, which have been the subject of much conversation; and other objections, by citizens of this State, have lately reached our ears. It is proper that you should consider of these objections. They are of two kinds; they respect the things that are in the system, and the things that are not in it. We are told that there… should also have been a Declaration of Rights. In the new system it is provided, that "the Trial of all crimes, except in cases of Impeachment," shall be by Jury, but this provision could not possibly be extended to all Civil cases. For it is well known that the Trial by Jury is not general and uniform throughout the United States, … hence it became necessary to submit the question to the General Legislature, who might accommodate their laws on this occasion to the desires and habits of the nation. Surely there is no prohibition in a case that is untouched.

I believe, it is acknowledged that the establishment of excises has been one of the greatest grievances, under which the English nation has labored for almost a century and an half… . If this branch of revenue takes place, all the consequent rigour of excise laws will necessarily be introduced in order to enforce a due collection. On any charges or offence in this instance you will see yourselves deprived of your boasted trial by jury. The much admired common law process will give way to some quick and summary mode, by which the unhappy defendant will find himself reduced, perhaps to ruin, in less time than a charge could be exhibited against him in the usual course… .

And what is that "appellate jurisdiction both as to law and fact," but an establishment, which may in effect operate as original jurisdiction? — Or what is an appeal to enquire into facts after a solemn adjudication in any court below, but a trial de novo*?*… Add to all, that this high prerogative court establishes no fundamental rule of proceeding, except that the trial by jury is allowed in some criminal cases. All other cases are left open — and subject "to such regulations as the Congress shall make." — Under these circumstances I beseech you all, as citizens of Virginia, to consider seriously whether you will not endanger the solemn trial by jury, which you have long revered, as a sacred barrier against injustice — which has been established by your ancestors many centuries ago, and transmitted to you, as one of the greatest bulwarks of civil liberty — which you have to this day maintained inviolate: — I beseech you, I say, as members of this commonwealth, to consider whether you will not be in danger of losing this inestimable mode of trial in all those cases, wherein the constitution does not provide for its security. Nay, does not that very provision, which is made, by being confined to a few particular cases, almost imply a total exclusion of the rest? Let it, then, be a reflection deeply impressed on your minds — that if this noble privilege, which by long experience has been found the most exquisite method of determining controversies according to the scale of equal liberty, should once be taken away, it is unknown what new species of trial may be substituted in its room. Perhaps you may be surprised with some strange piece of judicial polity, — some arbitrary method, perhaps confining all trials to the entire decision of the magistracy, and totally excluding the great body of the people from any share in the administration of public justice.

… For instance, if Congress should pass a law that persons charged with capital crimes shall not have a right to demand the cause or nature of the accusation, shall not be confronted with the accusers or witnesses, or call for evidence in their favor; and a question should arise respecting their authority therein, — can it be said that they have exceeded the limits of their jurisdiction, when that has no limits; when no provision has been made for such a right?

12.2.4.47Brutus, No. 14, February 28, 1788

I believe it is a new and unusual thing to allow appeals in criminal matters. It is contrary to the sense of our laws, and dangerous to the lives and liberties of the citizen. As our law now stands, a person charged with a crime has a right to a fair and impartial trial by a jury of his country, and their verdict is final. If he is acquitted no other court can call upon him to answer for the same crime. But by this system, a man may have had ever so fair a trial, have been acquitted by ever so respectable a jury of his country; and still the officer of the government who prosecutes, may appeal to the supreme court. The whole matter may have a second hearing. By this means, persons who may have disobliged those who execute the general government, may be subjected to intolerable oppression. They may be kept in long and ruinous confinement, and exposed to heavy and insupportable charges, to procure the attendance of witnesses, and provide the means of their defence, at a great distance from their places of residence.

I can scarcely believe there can be a considerate citizen of the United States, that will approve of this appellate jurisdiction, as extending to criminal cases, if they will give themselves time for reflection.

12.2.4.48The Landholder, No. 10, February 29, 1788

To the Honourable LUTHER MARTIN, Esq;

… Since the publication of the Constitution, every topic of vulgar declamation has been employed to persuade the people, that it will destroy the trial by jury, and is defective for being without a bill of rights. You, Sir, had more candour in the Convention than we can allow to those declaimers out of it; there you never signified by any motion or expression whatever, that it stood in need of a bill of rights, or in anywise endangered the trial by jury. In these respects the Constitution met your entire approbation: for had you believed it defective in these essentials, you ought to have mentioned it in the Convention, or had you thought it wanted further guards, it was your indispensable duty to have proposed them. I hope to hear that the same candour that influenced you on this occasion, has induced you to obviate any improper impressions such publications may have excited in your constituents, when you had the honour to appear before the General Assembly.

Maryland Journal, Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 16, pp. 267–68.

12.2.4.49Publicola, March 20, 1788

… The constitution of the respective states, and the rights of the people, are to remain as under the confederation, excepting such parts as interfere with the express powers given to Congress by the new constitution. All the clamour therefore, which has been raised about the trial by jury, and the liberty of the press, might have been spared, as altogether unfounded. To those who wish to trust themselves under separate state governments, which may, as they have hitherto done, disregard the recommendations and requisitions of the union, I would recommend an attentive perusal of history, and as they do not seem to place any dependance on the reasoning of their fellow citizens, learn to be wise from the experience of past ages. They will find that in all countries, a strict union among the people, has been the only means of preserving liberty… .

… But moreover does not Aristedes, and every lawyer, know that in the interpretation of all political as well as civil laws, this fundamental maxim must be observed, That where there are two objects in contemplation of any legislature, the express adoption of one, is the total exclusion of the other; and that the adoption of juries in civil criminal cases, in every legal interpretation, amounts to be an absolute rejection in civil cases: — If the right of establishing juries, by a Congressional law is admitted at all, it must be admitted, as an inherent legislative right, paramount to the constitution, as it is not derived from it, and then the power that can make, can by law unmake; so that referring this power to a source of authority superior to the act of government, would leave us without any juries at all (even in criminal cases) if Congress should so please; which position can never be the object of either friends or enemies to the system at present. — If it is defective, it is still bad policy to make it worse; but still in every view, we must reflect, that the establishment of trials by jury, belongs to political, not to civil legislation. It includes the right of organizing government, not of regulating the conduct of individuals, as the following enquiry will prove; we must never give an assembly the power of giving itself power.

As the worth and excellence of this mode of trial, preserved and handed down from generation to generation for near two thousand years, has drawn down the enthusiastic encomiums of the most enlightened lawyers and statesmen of every age; as it has taken deep root in the breast of every freeman, encompassed by the defences of affection and veneration, a repetition of its praises would be as tedious as useless: Some remarks however, still remain to be made, which will place this subject in a more important and conspicuous view.

The trial by jury, is the only remaining power which the Commons of England have retained in their own hands, of all that plentitude of authority and freedom, which rendered their northern progenitors irresistible in war, and flourishing in peace. — The usurpations of the few, gradually effected by artifice and force, have robbed the many, of that power which once formed the basis of those governments, so celebrated by mankind. — The government of Sparta, the form of which, it is said, has continued from the days of Lycurgus to our age, preserving its model amidst those overwheming tides of revolution and shipwrecks of governments, which Greece has sustained for near three thousand years; the same form of government among the Saxons and other Germans, consisting of King, Lords and Commons, applauded by Tacitus and Machiavelli, were thus distinguished from the present government of England — The power of the Commons resided with them, not in representatives but in the body of the people. — De minoribus rebus, principes consultant; de majoribus omnes, are either the words of Tacitus or Caesar. The administration of ordinary affairs was committed to the select men; but all important subjects were deliberated on by the whole body of the people. — Such was the constitution of Sparta, and of England, when Machiavelli gives them as a model, for there can be no doubt but that the folk-motes of the Saxons were not formed by representation — The venerable remembrance of which assemblies, hung long about the affections of Englishmen, and it was to restore them that they offered such frequent libations of their noblest blood; but the usurpations of the few have been unwearied and irresistible, and the trial by jury is all that now remains to the many.

The trial by jury is — the democratic branch of the judiciary power— more necessary than representatives in the legislature; for those usurpations, which silently undermine the spirit of liberty, under the sanction of law, are more dangerous than direct and open legislative attacks; in the one case the treason is never discovered until liberty, and with it the power of defence is lost; the other is an open summons to arms, and then if the people will not defend their rights, they do not deserve to enjoy them.

The judiciary power, has generally been considered as a branch of the executive, because these two powers, have been so frequently united; — but where united, there is no liberty. — In every free State, the judiciary is kept separate, independent, and considered as an intermediate power; — and it certainly partakes more of a legislative, than an executive nature — The sound definition which Delolme applied to one branch may be justly extended to the whole judiciary, — That it is a subordinate legislation in most instances, supplying by analogy, and precedent in each particular case, the defects of general legislative acts, — [W]ithout then the check of the democratic branch — the jury, to ascertain those facts, to which the judge is to apply the law, and even in many cases to determine the cause by a general verdict — the latitude of judicial power, combined with the various and uncertain nature of evidence, will render it impossible to convict a judge of corruption, and ascertain his guilt. — Remove the fear of punishment, give hopes of impunity, and vice and tyranny come scowling from their dark abodes in the human heart. — Destroy juries and every thing is prostrated to judges, who may easily disguise law, by suppressing and varying fact: — Whenever therefore the trial by juries has been abolished, the liberties of the people were soon lost — The judiciary power is immediately absorbed, or placed under the direction of the executive, as example teaches in most of the States of Europe. — So formidable an engine of power, defended only by the gown and the robe, is soon seized and engrossed by the power that wields the sword. — Thus we find the judiciary and executive branches united, or the former totally dependent on the latter in most of the governments in the world. — It is true, where the judges will put on the sword and wield it with success, they will subject both princes and legislature to their despotism, as was the case in the memorable usurpation of the Justizia of Arragon, where the judiciary erected themselves into a frightful tyranny.

Why then shall we risque this important check to judiciary usurpation, provided by the wisdom of antiquity? Why shall we rob the Commons of the only remaining power they have been able to preserve, for their personal exercise? Have they ever abused it? — I know it has and will be said — they have — that they are too ignorant — that they cannot distinguish between right and wrong—that decisions on property are submitted to chance; and that the last word, commonly determines the cause: — There is some truth in these allegations — but whence comes it — The Commons are much degraded in the powers of the mind: — They were deprived of the use of understanding, when they were robbed of the power of employing it. — Men no longer cultivate, what is no longer useful, — should every opportunity be taken away, of exercising their reason, you will reduce them to that state of mental baseness, in which they appear in nine-tenths of this globe — distinguished from brutes, only by form and the articulation of sound — Give them power and they will find understanding to use it — But taking juries with all their real and attributed defects, it is not better to submit a cause to an impartial tribunal, who would at least, as soon do you right as wrong — than for every man to become subservient to government and those in power? — Would any man oppose government, where his property would be wholly at the mercy and decision of those that govern? — We know the influence that property has over the minds of men — they will risque their lives rather than their property; and a government, where there is no trial by jury, has an unlimited command over every man who has any thing to loose. — It is by the attacks on private property through the judiciary, that despotism becomes as irresistible as terrible. I could relate numerous examples of the greatest and best men in all countries, who have been driven to despair, by vexatious lawsuits, commenced at the instigation of the court, of favorites and of minions, and all from the loss of juries. — France was reduced to the brink of destruction in one instance. — The Queen mother Louise of Savoy, piqued at the constable of Bourbon, a young and amiable man, who refused to marry her, commenced a suit against him for all his estate — The judges were ready at the beck of the court, and without a shadow of justice deprived him by law of every shilling he was worth; and drove from this country an unfortunate hero, whose mad revenge carried desolation into her bosom. — In Denmark a despicable minion, who came in rags to the court, after the establishment of their new government, which they solicited Frederick the IIId to make for them, acquired an immense fortune by plunder, sheltered by the favour of the Sovereign. At last he fixed his eyes on a most delightful estate, and offered to buy it — The owner did not want money, and could not think of selling the patrimony of an ancient family; this wretch then spirited up lawsuits against him, and after the most cruel vexations obliged him to sell the estate for much less than he at first offered him. This unfortunate gentleman was driven from the country which gave him birth, and a once happy society of relations and friends. — Such would have been the fate of England, from those courts without juries, which took cognizance of causes arising in the revenues and imports in Charles the first's time, the court fortunately for the liberties of England, seized the bull by the horns, when they attacked that wonderful man John Hampden. He spent 20,000 l. rather than pay an illegal tax of twenty shillings, brought the case before the Parliament, roused the spirit of the nation, and finally overturned courts, King, and even the constitution for many years. These dreadful examples may teach us the importance of juries in civil cases — they may recal [sic] to my countrymen a maxim which their ancestors, as wise, and more virtuous than their posterity, held ever in view — That if the people creep like tortoises, they will still find themselves too fast in giving away power.

12.2.4.51 Luther Martin, Speech to Maryland General Assembly, March 30, 1788

[N]or is trial by jury secured in criminal cases; it is true, that in the first instance, in the inferior court the trial is to be by jury, in this and in this only, is the difference between criminal and civil cases; but, Sir, the appellate jurisdiction extends, as I have observed, to cases criminal as well as to civil, and on the appeal the court is to decide not only on the law but on the fact, if, therefore, even in criminal cases the general government is not satisfied with the verdict of the jury, its officer may remove the prosecution to the supreme court; and there the verdict of the jury is to be of no effect, but the judges of this court are to decide upon the fact as well as the law, the same as in civil cases.

Thus, Sir, jury trials, which have ever been the boast of the English constitution, which have been by our several State constitutions so cautiously secured to us — jury trials which have so long been considered the surest barrier against arbitrary power, and the palladium of liberty, — with the loss of which the loss of our freedom may be dated, are taken away by the proposed form of government, not only in a great variety of questions between individual and individual, but in every case whether civil or criminal arising under the laws of the United States, or the execution of those laws. — It is taken away in those very cases where of all others it is most essential for our liberty, to have it sacredly guarded and preserved, in every case, whether civil or criminal, between government and its officers on the one part, and the subject or citizen on the other. — Nor was this the effect of inattention, nor did it arise from any real difficulty in establishing and securing jury trials by the proposed constitution, if the convention had wished so to do: but the same reason influenced here as in the case of the establishment of inferior courts; as they could not trust State Judges, so would they not confide in State juries. — They alleged that the general government and the State governments would always be at variance; that the citizens of the different States would enter into the views and interests of their respective States, and therefore ought not to be trusted in determining causes in which the general government was any way interested, without giving the general government an opportunity, if it disapproved the verdict of the jury, to appeal, and to have the facts examined into again and decided upon by its own judges, on whom it was thought a reliance might be had by the general government, they being appointed under its authority.

12.2.4.52A Citizen of New-York, April 15, 1788

We are told, among other strange things, that the liberty of the press is left insecure by the proposed Constitution, and yet that Constitution says neither more nor less about it, than the Constitution of the State of New-York does. We are told that it deprives us of trial by jury, whereas the fact is, that it expresly [sic] secures it in certain cases, and takes it away in none — it is absurd to construe the silence of this, or of our own Constitution, relative to a great number of our rights, into a total extinction of them — silence and blank paper neither grant nor take away any thing. Complaints are also made that the proposed Constitution is not accompanied by a bill of rights; and yet they who make these complaints, know and are content that no bill of rights accompanied the Constitution of this State. In days and countries where Monarchs and their subjects were frequently disputing about prerogative and privileges, the latter often found it necessary, as it were to run out the line between them, and oblige the former to admit by solemn acts, called bills of rights, that certain enumerated rights belonged to the people, and were not comprehended in the royal prerogative. But thank God we have no such disputes — we have no Monarchs to contend with, or demand admissions from — the proposed Government is to be the government of the people — all its officers are to be their officers, and to exercise no rights but such as the people commit to them. The Constitution only serves to point out that part of the people's business, which they think proper by it to refer to the management of the persons therein designated — those persons are to receive that business to manage, not for themselves, and as their own, but as agents and overseers for the people to whom they are constantly responsible, and by whom only they are to be appointed.

Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 17, pp. 112–13.

12.2.4.53Fabius, No. 4, April 19, 1788

It seems highly probable, that those who would reject this labour of public love, would also have rejected the Heaven-taught institution of trial by jury, had they been consulted upon its establishment. Would they not have cried out, that there never was framed so detestable, so paltry, and so tyrannical a device for extinguishing freedom, and throwing unbounded domination into the hands of the king and barons, under a contemptible pretence of preserving it? What! Can freedom be preserved by imprisoning its guardians? Can freedom be preserved, by keeping twelve men closely confined without meat, drink, fire, or candle, until they unanimously agree, and this to be infinitely repeated? Can freedom be preserved, by thus delivering up a number of freemen to a monarch and an aristocracy, fortified by dependant and obedient judges and officers, to be shut up, until under duress they speak as they are ordered? Why can't the twelve jurors separate, after hearing the evidence, return to their respective homes, and there take time, and think of the matter at their ease? Is there not a variety of ways, in which causes have been, and can be tried, without this tremendous, unprecedented inquisition? Why then is it insisted on; but because the fabricators of it know that it will, and intend that it shall reduce the people to slavery? Away with it — Freemen will never be enthralled by so insolent, so execrable, so pitiful a contrivance.

Trial by jury and the dependance of taxation upon representation, those corner stones of liberty, were not obtained by a bill of rights, or any other records, and have not been and cannot be preserved by them. They and all other rights must be preserved, by soundness of sense and honesty of heart. Compared with these, what are a bill of rights, or any characters drawn upon paper or parchment, those frail remembrances? Do we want to be reminded, that the sun enlightens, warms, invigorates, and cheers? or how horrid it would be, to have his blessed beams intercepted, by our being thrust into mines or dungeons? Liberty is the sun of freemen, and the beams are their rights.

… Trial by Jury is our birthright; and tempted to his own ruin, by some seducing spirit, must be the man, who in opposition to the genius of United America, shall dare to attempt its subversion.

In the proposed confederation, it is preserved inviolable in criminal cases, and cannot be altered in other respects, but when United America demands it.

Pennsylvania Mercury, Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 17, p. 182–84.

12.2.4.54Aristocrotis, April 1788

… Another privilege which the people possesses at present, and which the new congress will find it their interest to deprive them of, is trial by jury — for of all the powers which the people have wrested from government, this is the most absurd; it is even a gross violation of common sense, and most destructive to energy. In the first place it is absurd, that twelve ignorant plebians, should be constituted judges of a law, which passed through so many learned hands; — first a learned legislature after many learned animadversions and criticisms have enacted it — Second, learned writers have explained and commented on it. — Third, lawyers twisted, turned and new modeled it — and lastly, a learned judge opened up and explained it. Yet after all these learned discussions, an illiterate jury (who have scarce a right to think for themselves instead of judging for others) must determine whether it applies to the fact or not; and by their verdict the learned judge must be governed in passing sentence; and perhaps a learned gentleman be cast in an action with an insignificant cottager.

Secondly. Common sense recoils at the very idea of such a pernicious practice as this, because it makes no difference between the virtuous and the vicious, the precious and the vile; between those of noble birth, and illustrious descent, and those of base blood, and ignoble obscure pedigree — for an ignorant stupid jury, cannot discern the merit of persons — it is the merits of the cause they examine; which is just reversing the question, and beginning at the wrong end. Thirdly. This custom is fatal to energy, for tho' a law should be expressed in the most pointed terms, a jury may soften and mitigate, and in a great measure destroy the spirit of it… .

Storing, vol. 3, pp. 204–05.

12.2.4.55Address of a Minority of the Maryland Convention, May 1, 1788

The great objects of these amendments were, 1st. To secure the trial by jury in all cases, the boasted birthright of Englishmen, and their descendants, and the palladium of civil liberty; and to prevent the appeal from fact, which not only destroys that trial in civil cases, but by construction, may also elude it in criminal cases; a mode of proceeding both expensive and burthensome; and also by blending law with fact, will destroy all check on the judiciary authority, render it almost impossible to convict judges of corruption, and may lay the foundation of that gradual and silent attack on individuals, by which the approaches of tyranny become irresistable.

12.2.4.56The Federalist, No. 81, May 28, 1788

… To avoid all inconveniences, it will be safest to declare generally that the Supreme Court shall possess appellate jurisdiction both as to law and fact, and that this jurisdiction shall be subject to such exceptions and regulations as the national legislature may prescribe. This will enable the government to modify it in such a manner as will best answer the ends of public justice and security.

This view of the matter, at any rate puts it out of all doubt that the supposed abolition of the trial by jury by the operation of this provision is fallacious and untrue. The legislature of the United States would certainly have full power to provide that in appeals to the Supreme Court there should be no reexamination of facts where they had been tried in the original causes by juries. This would certainly be an authorised exception; but if for the reason already intimated it should be thought too extensive, it might be qualified with a limitation to such causes only as are determinable at common law in that mode of trial.

The amount of the observations hitherto made on the authority of the judicial department is this —… that this appellate jurisdiction does, in no case, abolish the trial by jury; and that an ordinary degree of prudence and integrity in the national councils will insure us solid advantages from the establishment of the proposed judiciary, without exposing us to any of the inconveniences which have been predicted from that source.

12.2.4.57The Federalist, No. 83, May 28, 1788

… The mere silence of the Constitution in regard to civil causes is represented as an abolition of the trial by jury, and the declamations to which it has afforded a pretext are artfully calculated to induce a persuasion that this pretended abolition is complete and universal, extending not only to every species of civil, but even to criminal causes. To argue with respect to the latter would be as vain and fruitless as to attempt the serious proof of the existence of matter, or to demonstrate any of those propositions which by their own internal evidence force conviction, when expressed in language adapted to convey their meaning.

[T]he Constitution proposed by the convention contains, as well as the constitution of this state, a number of such provisions [in favor of rights and privileges].

Independent of those which relate to the structure of the government, we find the following: … Article 3, section 2, clause 3 "The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury; and such trial shall be held in the State where the said crimes shall have been committed; but when not committed within any State, the trial shall be at such place or places as the Congress may by law have directed."

Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 18, p. 128.

12.2.4.59A [New Hampshire] Farmer, No. 3, June 6, 1788

I shall now make some observations on the unjust and illiberal sarcasms, passed by Mr. Alfredus, on our jurors: — And, as he has such a peculiar nack of leaping over important things, by saying "they are nothing to the purpose," or by stigmatizing them, "as impertinent observations, groundless assertions," etc. I shall copy his own words, and then follow, with the sentiments of the Hon. Justice Blackstone, who is one of the most celebrated Authors now extant.

Sir, in your publication of Friday, January 18th, ult. you say, "What are the advantages of this boasted trial by jury, and on which side do they lie?

Not certainly on the side of justice, for one unprincipled juror, secured in the interest of the opposite party, will frequently divert her course, and in four cases out of five where injustice is done, it is by the ignorance or knavery of the jury." This, I may venture to affirm, is an impudent and bold stroke; it attacks the whole community at once, and has a tendency to sap and undermine the best preservative of liberty, and therefore ought to be held in abhorrence by every freeman; it is totally repugnant to the sense of the best writers on the subject, and especially to the ideas of the renowned author above mentioned, whose sentiments I shall now quote, vol. 3, page 378. "When the jury have delivered in their verdict, and it is recorded in court, that ends the trial by jury; a trial which besides the other vast advantages which we have occasionally observed in its progress, is also as expeditious and cheap as it is convenient, equitable and certain: upon these accounts — the trial by jury has been, as I trust ever will be looked upon as the glory of the English law; and if it has so great an advantage over individuals in regulating civil property, how much must that advantage be heightened, when it is applied to criminal cases; it is the most transcendant privilege which any subject can enjoy or wish for; he cannot be affected either in his property, his liberty or his person, but by the unanimous consent of twelve of his neighbors and equals; a Constitution that I may venture to affirm has, under Providence, secured the just liberties of the English nation for a long succession of ages; and therefore a celebrated French writer (Montesque) who concludes, that because Rome, Sparta, and Carthage have lost their liberties, therefore those of England in time must perish, should have recollected that Rome, Sparta and Carthage, at the time when their liberties were lost, were strangers to the trial by jury.

Great as this eulogium may seem, it is no more than this admirable Constitution, when traced to its principles, will be found, in sober reason, to deserve. The impartial administration of justice, which secures both our persons and properties, is the great end of civil society; but if that be entirely entrusted to the magistracy of a select body of men, and those generally selected by the Prince, or those who enjoy the highest offices in the state, their decision, in spite of their own natural integrity, will have frequently an involuntary bias toward those of their own rank and dignity; here therefore, a competent number of sensible and upright jurymen, chosen by lot from among those of the middle rank, will be found the best investigators of truth, and the surest guardians of public justice; for the most powerful individual in the state, will be cautious of committing any flagrant invasion of another's right, when he knows that the fact of his oppression, must be examined, and decided by twelve indifferent men, not appointed till near the hour of trial: and that, when once the fact is ascertained, the law must of course redress it — This therefore preserves, in the hands of the people, that share which they ought to have, in the administration of public justice; and prevents the encroachments of the more powerful and wealthy citizens.

Every new tribunal erected for the decision of facts, without the intervention of a jury, whether composed of justices of the peace; commissioners of the revenue; judges of a court of conscience; or any other standing magistrate, is a step towards establishing aristocracy, the most oppressive of absolute government. It is, therefore, upon the whole, the duty which every man owes to his country, his friends, his posterity, and himself, to maintain to the utmost of his power, this valuable Constitution in all its rights, and above all to guard with the most jealous circumspection against the introduction of new, and arbitrary methods of trial, which, under a variety of plausible pretenses, may in time, imperceptibly undermine this best preservative of LIBERTY," — Added to this, there is a late law of this state, which puts the pay, and travel of our jurors upon a very respectable footing — And lest Mr. Alfredus should say, this is nothing to the purpose, because the trial, by jury, under the English Constitution, — may be very different from what it is in ours, I will just mention, wherein they differ, under the English Constitution, — The jurors are returned by the sheriff. — under ours they are draughted by lot, from each town, which, I think, is the most equitable method, and as to the modes of process through the trials, they are nearly the same, both endeavor to do justice to the parties.

12.2.4.60Sydney, Address, June 13 & 14, 1788

By the 13th paragraph "no member of this State shall be disfranchised, or deprived of any of the rights or privileges secured to the subjects of the State by this constitution, unless by the law of the land, or judgment of its peers."

The 41st provides "that the trial by jury remain inviolate forever; that no acts of attainder shall be passed by the legislature of this State for crimes other than those committed before the termination of the present war… .”

There can be no doubt that if the new government be adopted in all its latitude, every one of these paragraphs will become a dead letter… .

New York Journal, Storing, vol. 6, p. 116.

12.2.5.1Thomas Jefferson to James Madison, December 20, 1787

… I will now add what I do not like. First the omission of a bill of rights providing clearly and without the aid of sophisms for… the eternal and unremitting force of the habeas corpus laws, and trials by jury in all matters of fact triable by the laws of the land and not by the law of Nations. To say, as Mr. Wilson does that a bill of rights was not necessary because all is reserved in the case of the general government which is not given, while in the particular ones all is given which is not reserved might do for the Audience to whom it was addressed, but is surely gratis dictum, opposed by strong inferences from the body of the instrument, as well as from the omission of the clause of our present confederation which had declared that in express terms. It was a hard conclusion to say because there has been no uniformity among the states as to the cases triable by jury, because some have been so incautious as to abandon this mode of trial, therefore the more prudent states shall be reduced to the same level of calamity. It would have been much more just and wise to have concluded the other way that as most of the states had judiciously preserved this palladium, those who had wandered should be brought back to it, and to have established general right instead of general wrong.

Boyd, vol. 12, p. 440.

12.2.5.2Thomas Jefferson to Alexander Donald, February 7, 1788

I wish with all my soul that the nine first Conventions may accept the new Constitution, because this will secure to us the good it contains, which I think great and important. But I equally wish that the four latest conventions, whichever they be, may refuse to accede to it till a declaration of rights be annexed… . By a declaration of rights… . I mean one which shall stipulate… trials by juries in all cases… .

Boyd, vol. 12, p. 571.

12.2.5.3Thomas Jefferson to C. W. F. Dumas, February 12, 1788

… With respect to the new government, 9. or 10. states will probably have accepted it by the end of this month. The others may oppose it… . Besides other objections of less moment, she [Virginia] will insist on annexing a bill of rights to the new constitution, i.e. a bill wherein the government shall declare that… 3. Trials by jury preserved in all cases.

Boyd, vol. 12, pp. 583–84.

12.2.5.4George Washington to Marquis de Lafayette, April 28, 1788

… For example, there was not a member of the convention, I believe, who had the least objection to what is contended for by the Advocates for a Bill of Rights and Tryal by Jury.… [A]s to the second, it was only the difficulty of establishing a mode which should not interfere with the fixed modes of any of the States, that induced the Convention to leave it, as a matter of future adjustment.

12.2.5.5James Madison to George Eve, January 2, 1789

[I]t is my sincere opinion that the Constitution ought to be revised, and that the first Congress meeting under it, ought to prepare and recommend to the States for ratification, the most satisfactory provisions for all essential rights, particularly the rights of Conscience in the fullest latitude, the freedom of the press, trials by jury, security against general warrants &c.

Rutland & Hobson, vol. 11, p. 405.

12.2.5.6Thomas Jefferson to Francis Hopkinson, March 13, 1789

… What I disapproved from the first moment also was the want of the bill of rights to guard liberty against the legislative as well as the executive branches of the government, that is to say to secure freedom in religion, freedom of the press, freedom from monopolies, freedom from unlawful imprisonment, freedom from a permanent military, and a trial by jury in all cases determinable by the laws of the land.

12.2.5.7William R. Davie to James Madison, June 10, 1789

That farago of Amendments borrowed from Virginia is by no means to be considered as the sense of this Country; they were proposed amidst the violence and confusion of party heat, at a critical moment in our convention, and adopted by the opposition without one moment's consideration. I have collected with some attention the objections of the honest and serious… they also insist on the trial by jury being expressly secured to them in all cases… .

12.2.5.8Fisher Ames to Thomas Dwight, June 11, 1789

Mr. Madison has introduced his long expected Amendments. They are the fruit of much labour and research. He has hunted up all the grievances and complaints of newspapers — all the articles of Conventions — and the small talk of their debates. It contains a Bill of Rights — the right of enjoying property — of changing the govt. at pleasure — freedom of the press — of conscience — of juries — exemption from general Warrants gradual increase of representatives till the whole number at the rate of one to every 30,000 shall amount to and allowing two to every State, at least this is the substance. There is too much of it — O. I had forgot the right of the people to bear Arms.

Risum teneatis amici —

Upon the whole, it may do good towards quieting men who attend to sounds only, and may get the mover some popularity — which he wishes.

12.2.5.9Abraham Baldwin to Joel Barlow, June 14, 1789

A few days since, Madison brought before us propositions of amendment agreeably to his promise to his constituents… . “That what is not given is reserved, that liberty of the press & trial by jury shall remain inviolable.… [”]

12.2.5.10Tench Coxe to James Madison, June 18, 1789

I observe you have brought forward the amendments you proposed to the federal Constitution… . Those who are honest are well pleased at the footing on which the press, liberty of conscience, original right and power, trial by jury &c. are rested.

Hobson & Rutland, vol. 12, p. 239.

12.2.5.11Samuel Nasson to George Thatcher, July 9, 1789

I find that Ammendments are once again on the Carpet… anoather [sic] that I hope will be Established in the bill is tryals by Juryes in all Causes Excepting where the parties agree to be without… .

Veit, pp. 260–61.

12.2.5.12Henry Gibbs to Roger Sherman, July 16, 1789

… All Ambiguity of Expression certainly ought to be remov’d; Liberty of Conscience in religious matters, right of trial by Jury, Liberty of the Press &c. may perhaps be more explicitly secur’d to the Subject & a general reservation made to the States respectively of all the powers not expressly delegated to the general Government.

12.2.5.13 Benjamin Goodhue to Samuel Phillips, September 13, 1789

… The Amendments have come from the Senate with amendments, such as striking out the word vicinage as applied to Jurors, and have struck out the limitations of sums for an appeal to the federal Court &c. Those two have been the darling objects with the Virginians who have been the great movers on amendments, and I am suspicious, it may mar the whole business, at least so far as to refer it to the next session.

12.2.5.14 James Madison to Edmund Pendleton, September 14, 1789

The Senate have sent back the plan of amendments with some alterations which strike in my opinion at the most salutary articles. In many of the States juries even in criminal cases are taken from the State at large — in others from districts of conside[rable] extent — in very few from the County alone. Hence a [dis]like to the restraint with respect to vicinage, which has produced a negative on that clause… . Several others have had a similar fate. The difficulty of uniting the minds of men accustomed to think and act differently can only be conceived by those who have witnessed it.

Hobson & Rutland, vol. 12, pp. 402–03.

12.2.5.15 James Madison to Edmund Pendleton, September 23, 1789

The pressure of unfinished business has suspended the adjournment of Congs. till saturday next. Among the articles which required it was the plan of amendments, on which the two Houses so far disagreed as to require conferences. It will be impossible I find to prevail on the Senate to concur in the limitation on the value of appeals to the Supreme Court… They are equally inflexible in opposing a definition of the locality of Juries. The vicinage they contend is either too vague or too strict a term: too vague if depending on limits to be fixed by the pleasure of the law, too strict if limited to the County. It was proposed to insert after the word juries — "with the accustomed requisites" — leaving the definition to be construed according to the judgment of professional men. Even this could not be obtained. The truth is that in most of the States the practice is different, and hence the irreconcilable difference of ideas on the subject. In some States, jurors are drawn from the whole body of the community indiscrim[in]ately; In others, from large districts comprehending a number of Counties; and in a few only from a single County. The Senate suppose also that the provision for vicinage in the Judiciary bill, will sufficiently quiet the fears which called for an amendment on this point… .

Hobson & Rutland, vol. 12, pp. 418–19.

12.3.1.1Bacon, 1740

Juries.

THE Trial per Pais, or by a Jury of one's Country, is justly esteemed one of the chiefest Excellencies of our Constitution; for what greater Security can any Person have in his Life, Liberty, or Estate, than to be sure of not being devested of, or injured in any of these, without the Sense and Verdict of twelve honest and impartial Men of his Neighbourhood? And hence we find the Common Law herein confirmed by Magna Charta, cap. 29. Nullus Liber Homo capiatur, vel imprisonetur, aut disseisietur de libero Tenemento suo, vel Libertatibus, vel Liberis Consuetudinibus suis, aut utlagetur, aut exuletur, aut aliquo modo destruatur, nec super eum ibimus, nec super eum mittemus, nisi per legale judicium Parium suorum, vel per Legem terrae.[1]

Likewise the Antiquity of this Trial, and its being peculiar to us, have been taken Notice of, as Matters which reflect Honour on our Constitution; for tho' there were antiently several other Methods of Trial, such as by Battle, Ordeal, &c. yet have they, from the Inconveniencies attending them, been laid aside, and this alone cultivated and improved, as the best Method of investigating Truth.[2]

We shall consider this Head under the following Divisions.

(A) Of the several kinds of Juries and particular Inquests; and therein of the Number such Juries must consist of.

(B) Of the Jury Process, and Manner of convening the Jury: And herein,

1. Of the Necessity of such Process, and where a Panel may be returned by a bare Award without any Precept.
2. Of the several Kinds of Jury Process, and Manner of compelling a Jury to appear.
3. By whom such Processes are to be executed, and the Jury convened.
4. In what Time such Processes are returnable.
5. Where the Jury must appear.
6. What Number are to be returned.
7. Of awarding Process by Proviso.
8. Necessity of returning a Panel into Court, and where a Prisoner may demand a Copy of it.
9. Of the Trials going off pro Defectu Juratorum; and therein of drawing a Juror.

(C) In what Cases and in what Manner a Tales is grantable.

(D) In what Cases and in what Manner special Juries are appointed.

(E) Who are to be returned; and therein of the Qualifications and several Causes for which they may be challenged: And herein,

1. Of Challenges to the Array or to the Polls; and herein where the Insufficiency or Partiality of the Sheriff or Returning Officer is a principal Cause of Challenge, or to the Favour.
2. Where Insufficiency and not being Liber Homo is a good Cause of Challenge to the Polls.
3. Where the Want of Freehold, or a competent Estate, is a good Cause of Challenge.
4. Where the Jury's not being convened from a right Place is a good Cause of Challenge.

good Cause of Challenge.
5. Where Partiality in the Juror is a good Cause of Challenge; and therein where it shall be said a principal Cause of Challenge, or to the Favour.
6. Where the Quality of the Juror is a good Cause of Challenge; and herein who are exempt from serving on Juries.
7. Where from the Quality of either Party it is a good Cause of Challenge, that a Knight is not returned.
8. Of Trials per Medietatem Linguae, where an Alien is Party.
9. Of peremptory Challenges.
10. Of Challenges by the Crown.
11. At what Time a Challenge is to be taken.
12. How such a Challenge is to be tried.

(F) How Jurors are to be impanelled and sworn.

(G) How to be kept and discharged.

(H) In what Cases and in what Manner to have a view.

(I) What Irregularities and Defects in convening, or in the Qualifications of the Jurors are amendable, and aided after Verdict.

(K) What Irregularities or Defects in convening, or in the Qualifications of the Jurors, are aided by Consent.

(L) When and by whom to be paid.

(M) For what Misdemeanors punishable: And herein,

1. Where punishable by Attaint.
2. How otherwise punishable.
3. Where Abuses by others in Relation to them are punishable; and therein of the Offence of Embracery.

(A) OF THE SEVERAL KINDS OF JURIES AND PARTICULAR INQUESTS; AND THEREIN OF THE NUMBER SUCH JURY MUST CONSIST OF.

JURIES are distinguished into Grand and Petit Juries; the Grand Jury may (a) consist of thirteen, or any greater Number; for these being the Grand Inquisitors of the County, every Indictment and Presentment by them must be found by twelve at least; but it is not necessary that all above that Number should concur in such Presentment or Indictment.[3]

Upon the Summons of any Session of the Peace, and in Cases of Commissions of Oyer and Terminer and Gaol-Delivery, there goes out a Precept either in the Name of the King, or of two of more Justices, directed to the Sheriff, upon which he is to return twenty-four, or more, out of the whole County, namely, a considerable Number out of every Hundred, out of which the Grand Inquest at the Sessions of the Peace, Oyer and Terminer, or Gaol-Delivery are taken, and sworn ad Inquirendum pro Domino Rege & Corpore Comitatus.[4]

Those returned to serve on the Grand Jury must be (b) Probi & Legales Homines, and ought to be of the same County where the Crime was committed; and therefore it is a good Exception at Common Law to one returned on a Grand Jury, that he is an Alien or Villein, or that he is (c) outlawed for a Crime, or that he was not returned by the proper Officer, or that he was returned at the Instance of the Prosecutor; but these Exceptions must be taken before the Indictment found.[5]

It is laid down by my Lord Chief Justice Hale, that at Common Law every Person returned on the Grand Jury ought to be a Freeholder at least, and that the Statute of 2 H. 5. cap. 3. that requires Jurors that pass upon the Trial of a Man's Life to have 40 s. per Annum Freehold, hath been the Measure by which the Freehold of Grand Jurymen hath been measured in Precepts of Summons of Sessions.[6]

Also by several (a) Acts of Parliament it is provided, that those who serve on the Grand Jury be such as are duly qualified, the principal ones of which are the 11 H. 4. cap. 9. and 3 H. 8. cap. 12. the first whereof is as followeth: 'Because that now of late Enquests were taken at Westminster of Persons named to the Justices, without due Return of the Sheriff, of which Persons some were outlawed before the said Justices of Record, and some fled to Sanctuary for Treason, and some for Felony, there to have Refuge, by whom as well many Offenders were indicted, as other lawful liege People of our Lord the King, not guilty, by Conspiracy, Abetment, and false Imagination of other Persons, for their special Advantage and singular Lucre, against the Course of the Common Law used and accustomed before this Time; our said Lord the King, for the greater Ease and Quietness of his People, wills and granteth, that the same Indictment so made, with all the Dependance thereof, be revoked, annulled, void, and holden for none for ever, and that from henceforth no Indictment be made by any such Persons, but by Inquests of the King's lawful liege People, in the Manner it was used in the Time of his Noble Progenitors, returned by the Sheriffs or Bailiffs of Franchises, without any Denomination to the Sheriffs or Bailiffs of Franchises before made by any Person of the Names which by him should be impanelled, except it be by the Officers of the said Sheriffs or Bailiffs of Franchises sworn and known to make the same, and other Officers to whom it pertaineth to make the same, according to the Law of England; and if any Indictment be made hereafter in any Point to the contrary, that the same Indictment be also void, revoked, and for ever holden for none.'

In the Construction of this Statute the following Points have been resolved;

That if a Person not returned on a Grand Jury procure his Name to be read among those that are returned, whereupon he is sworn, &c. he may be indicted for a Contempt of this Statute.[7]

That Indictments before (b) Justices of the Peace are clearly within this Statute[8].

That a Person, arraigned on an Indictment taken contrary to the Statute, may plead such Matter in Avoidance of the Indictment, and also plead over to the Felony.[9]

That he, who is outlawed on an Indictment without any Trial, may clearly shew in Avoidance of such Outlawry, that the Indictment was taken contrary to the Statute; but the Court needs not admit of the Plea of the Outlawry of an Indictor in Avoidance of any such Indictment, unless he who pleads it have the Record ready, unless it be an Outlawry of the same Court wherein the Indictment is depending; in which Case it is said, that any one as Amicus Curiae may inform the Court of it; also it seems the better Opinion, that no Exception against an Indictor is allowable, unless the Party takes it before Trial.[10]

That if any one of the Grand Jury, who find an Indictment, be within any of the Exceptions in the Statute, he vitiates the Whole, tho' never so many unexceptionable Persons joined with him in finding it.[11]

That if a Prisoner indicted of Felony offer to take any such Exception, he shall, upon his Prayer, have Counsel assigned him for his Assistance.

By the 3 H. 8. cap. 12. it is Enacted, 'That all Panels to be returned, which be not at the Suit of any Party that shall be made, and put in by every Sheriff, and their Ministers, before any Justice of Gaol-Delivery, or Justices of Peace, whereof one to be of the Quorum, in their open Sessions, to inquire for the King, shall be reformed by putting to and taking out of the Names of the Persons which so be impanelled by every Sheriff, and their Ministers, by the Discretion of the same Justices before whom such Panels shall be returned, and that the same Justice and Justices shall command every Sheriff, and their Ministers in his Absence, to put other Persons in the same Panel by their Discretions, and that the same Panels so reformed by the said Justices be good and lawful; and that if any Sheriff, or any other

Minister, at any Time do not return the same Panels so reformed, that then every such Sheriff and Minister so offending shall forfeit for every such Offence twenty Pounds, &c.'

This Act extends not only to Panels of Grand Inquests returned, but also to Panels of the Petty Jury, commonly called the Petty Jury of Life and Death, which may be reformed by the Justices according to this Act, and the Sheriff is bound to return the Panel so reformed.[12]

It hath been holden, that this Statute doth not take away the Force of 11 H. 4. as to any Point wherein both may consist together; and therefore if any Indictor be outlawed, or returned at the Nomination of any Person, contrary to 11 H. 4. except of the Justices authorised as abovementioned to reform the Panel, the Indictment may be avoided in the same Manner as before.[13]

The Grand Jury, as has been already observed, must consist of twelve at (a) least, the Petty Jury of twelve, and can be neither more nor less; but it is said, that particular (b) Inquests may consist of a more or less Number than twelve.[14]

But on a Writ of Error a Judgment out of an inferior Court was reversed, because being by Default, the Inquiry of Damages was only by two Jurors; and tho' a Custom was alledged to warrant it, yet it was resolved, that there could not be less than twelve, tho' the Writ of Inquiry saith only per Sacramentum Proborum & Legalium Hominum, and not duodecim as in a Venire.[15]

Also it hath been frequently held, that a Custom in an inferior Court to try by six Jurors is void; and that tho' such Custom is used in Wales, yet that that is by Force of the Statute 34 H. 8. which appoints that such Trials may be by six only where the Custom hath been so.[16]

(B) OF THE JURY PROCESS, AND MANNER OF CONVENING THE JURY: And herein,

1. OF THE NECESSITY OF SUCH PROCESS, AND WHERE A PANEL MAY BE RETURNED BY A BARE AWARD WITHOUT ANY PRECEPT.

IT seems agreed, that a Person not duly summoned and returned is not obliged to serve on a Jury; also hath been held, that if a Stranger cause himself to be sworn in the Name of one who was of the Jury, it is such a Misdemeanor for which he may be indicted, and for which also an Action on the Case lies at the Suit of the Party injured.[17]

But Justices of Gaol-Delivery may have a Panel returned by the Sheriff without any Precept or Writ; and the Reason given for it is, that before their

Coming they make a general Precept to the Sheriff in Parchment, under their Seals, to bring before them at the Day of their Sessions twenty-four out of every Hundred, &c. to do those Things which shall be enjoined them on the Part of the King, &c. and therefore it is said, that they need not make any other Precept for the Return of a Jury for the Trial of any Issue joined before them, but that their bare Award that the Jury shall come is sufficient, because there are enow for that Purpose supposed to be present in Court, whom the Sheriff may return immediately, whenever the Court shall demand their Service.[18]

Also it is said, that a Jury may be so returned before Justices of Peace at their Sessions, because the Precept for the Summons of the Sessions hath a Clause to the same Effect, for the Summons of twenty-four out of every Hundred: But it is (a) doubted whether this Matter does not rather depend on Practice, and the constant Course of Precedents, than any Argument from the Reason of the Thing; and even in the Case of Justices of Gaol-Delivery, the Law is otherwise, if they have a special Commission.[19]

Also the Precept to the Sheriff from Justices of Oyer and Terminer, in order for the holding of their Sessions, hath in Effect the very same Clause for the bringing of twenty-four before them out of each Hundred at the Day of their Sessions, &c. and yet it seems agreed, that they cannot have a Jury returned for the Trial of an Issue joined before them by Force of a bare Award, but ought to make a particular Precept to the Sheriff for that Purpose under their Seals.[20]

By the Course of the King's Bench no Jury can be returned into it from a foreign County, without Process under the Seal of the Chief Justice; but Quaere if it may not be returned for a Trial in the County where it fits by a bare Praeceptum est?[21]

6. WHAT NUMBER ARE TO BE RETURNED.

Altho' by the Words of the Writ of Venire Facias the Sheriff is only to return twelve, yet by antient Course he was obliged to return twenty-four; and this, says my Lord Coke, is for Expedition of Justice; for if twelve should only be returned, no Man should have a full Jury appear or be sworn in respect of Challenges without a Tales, which would be a great Delay of Trials.[22]

But tho' the Sheriff return a lesser Number, as where the Sheriff returned only twenty-three, and a sufficient Number appear, and try the Issue, this will be aided by the Statutes of Jeofail as a Misreturn.[23]

The Precept that issues before a Sessions of Gaol-Delivery, Oyer and Terminer, and of the Peace, is to return twenty-four, and commonly the Sheriff returns upon that Precept forty-eight.[24]

But the Award or Precept to try the Prisoner after he hath pleaded, is only Venire Facias twelve, and (c) twenty-four are returned by the Sheriff on that Panel.[25]

At Common Law in Civil Causes, it seems the Sheriff might have returned above twenty-four if he pleased; and therefore by the Statute of (d) Westminster 2. cap. 38. it is recited, That whereas the Sheriffs were used to summon an unreasonable Multitude of Jurors, to the Grievance of the People, it is ordained, that from thenceforth in one Assise no more shall be returned than twenty-four.[26]

And now by the 3 Georg. 2. cap. 25. sect. 8. it is Enacted, ‘That every Sheriff or other Officer, to whom the Return of the Venire Facias Juratores, or other Process, for the Trial of Causes before Justices of Assise or Nisi Prius, in any County in (e) England, doth or shall belong, shall upon his Return of every such Writ of Venire Facias, (unless in Causes intended to be tried at Bar, or in Cases where a special Jury shall be struck by Order or Rule of Court,) annex a Panel to the said Writ, containing the Christian and Surnames, Additions, and Places of Abode of a competent Number of Jurors named in such Lists as qualified to serve on Juries, the Names of the Persons to be inserted in the Panel annexed to every Venire Facias for the Trial of all Issues at the same Assises in each respective County, which Number of Jurors shall be not less than forty-eight in any County, nor more than seventy-two, without Direction of the Judges appointed to go the Circuit and sit as Judges of Assise or Nisi Prius in such County, or one of them, who are respectively hereby impowered and required, if he or they see Cause, by Order under his or their respective Hand or Hands, to direct a greater or lesser Number; and then such Number, as shall be so directed, shall be the Number to serve on such Jury, and that the Writs of Habeas Corpora Juratorum or Distringas, subsequent to such Writ of Venire Facias, need not have inserted in the Bodies of such respective Writs the Names of all the Persons contained in such Panel; but it shall be sufficient to insert in the mandatory Part of such Writs respectively, Corpora separalium Personarum in Panello huic Brevi annexo nominatorum, or Words of the like Import, and to annex to such Writs respectively Panels containing the same Names as were returned in the Panel to such Venire

Facias, with their Additions and Places of Abode, that the Parties concerned in any such Trials may have timely Notice of the Jurors who are to serve at the next Assises, in order to make their Challenges to them, if there be Cause; and that for the making the Returns and Panels aforesaid, and annexing the same to the respective Writs, no other Fee or Fees shall be taken than what are now allowed by Law to be taken for the Return of the like Writs and Panels annexed to the same, and that the Persons named in such Panels shall be summoned to serve on Juries at the then next Assises or Sessions of Nisi Prius for the respective Counties to be named in such Writs, and no other.'[27]

7. OF AWARDING PROCESS BY PROVISO.

If the Plaintiff after Issue joined neglects to try his Cause the first Assises in the Country, or the first Term in Middlesex or London, the Defendant is at Liberty to bring down the Cause by Proviso, so called by the Clause in the Venire Facias, which says, Proviso semper quod si duo Brevia inde tibi pervenerint unum eorundem tantum retorn' & exequaris; for both Plaintiff and Defendant having put themselves upon their Country, the Plaintiff's Laches shall not prevent the Defendant's Discharging himself from the Action, and therefore the Process is as well open for him as for the Plaintiff.[28]

This Process by Proviso, (i. e. with a Clause that if two Writs come to the Sheriff, he shall execute one of them only,) may be taken out not only when the Plaintiff neglects to take out the Venire the same Term, but also upon his Neglect to get it returned; and in like Manner if the Plaintiff make the like Default in suing out an Habeas Corpora, or other subsequent Process, the Defendant may sue out the like Process by Proviso.[29]

But where the Defendant hath sued out any Process by Proviso, there are Authorities that the Plaintiff is to sue out the proper subsequent Process upon it in the same Manner as if he had sued out the first, and that it is irregular for a Defendant to take out any such subsequent Process till the Plaintiff has made a Default in respect of the same kind of Process, except only in such Actions wherein the Defendant is an Actor as well as the Plaintiff, as in Replevin, or Error, or Quare Impedit against a Patron only, or Prohibition, &c. in which Actions the Defendant may either take out Process by Proviso, without any Default in the Plaintiff, or may, if he think fit, take it out in the same Manner as the Plaintiff, without any Clause of Proviso.[30]

nor in Indictments, there can be any Process taken out by Proviso, because no Laches is imputable to the King; also it hath been questioned whether there can be any such Process in Informations Qui tam, because the King is in some sort a Party.[31]

But it seems agreed that it may be so awarded in any Appeal, whether Capital or not Capital, in the same Manner as in other Actions, after the Appellant hath made Default in Relation to the very same kind of Process.[32]

By the 7 & 8 W. 3. cap. 32. which gives a Venire Facias de Novo where the Cause is not tried the first Assises, it is Enacted, 'That if any Defendant or Tenant in any Action depending in any of the Courts of Westminster shall be minded to bring to Trial any Issue joined against him, when by the Course in any of the said Courts he may lawfully do the same by Proviso, such Defendant or Tenant shall or may, of the issuable Term next preceding such intended Trial to be had at the next Assizes, sue out a new Venire Facias to the Sheriff by Proviso, and prosecute the same by Writ of Habeas Corpora or Distringas, with a Nisi Prius, as tho' there had not been any former Venire Facias sued out or returned in that Cause; and so toties quoties as the Matter shall require.'

8. OF THE NECESSITY OF RETURNING A PANEL INTO COURT, AND WHERE A PRISONER MAY DEMAND A COPY OF IT.

By the 42 E. 3. cap. 11. it is recited, That divers Mischiefs had happened, because that the Panels of Inquests, which had been taken before Justices by Writ of Scire Facias, and other Writs, had not been returned before the Sessions of the Justices at the Nisi Prius, and otherwise, so that the Parties could not have Knowledge of the Names of the Persons which should pass in the Inquest; whereby divers of the People had been disherited and oppressed; and thereupon it is ordained, that no Inquest but (a) Assises and Deliverances of Gaols be taken by Writ of Nisi Prius, nor in any other Manner, at the Suit of the Great or Small, before the Names of all of them that shall pass in the Inquest be returned in the Court.

This Statute extends as well to Writs of Nisi Prius in Criminal Cases as in Civil, and to Jurors returned upon a Tales as well as to those returned upon a principal Panel.[33]

But it seems that in Trials before the Justices of Gaol-Delivery the Prisoner has not Right to a Copy of the Panel before the Time of his Trial, except only in Cases within the Purview of 7 & 8 W. 3. cap. 3. which Enacts, 'That every Person indicted and tried for High Treason, or Misprision thereof, (except it be for counterfeiting the Coin, &c.) shall have a Copy of the Panel of the Jurors who are to try him duly returned by the Sheriff, and delivered unto him two Days at least before he shall be tried.'

It hath been adjudged to be sufficient, within the Intent of this Act, to deliver to the Prisoner a Copy of a Panel arrayed by the Sheriff before it is returned into Court, if the very same Panel be afterwards returned.[34]

9. OF THE TRIALS GOING OFF PRO DEFECTU JURATORUM; AND THEREIN OF DRAWING A JUROR.

If a Venire is awarded, and the Parties do not go to Trial the next Assises, but it lies for several Terms, the Continuance may be made by a Vic' non misit Breve ; but if a Nisi Prius be awarded, and some of the Jury appear, and the Panel be not full, so that the Trial is not carried on, they enter those of the Jury that appeared, and alii non venerunt, ideo respectuentur to the next Term pro Defectu Jurat', and at the Day in the next Term they award an Alias Discringas to the next Assises, with a Nisi Prius until the next Term.[35]

It is held by the Opinions of some, that in a Criminal Case not Capital, after a Jury sworn and impanelled, and all the Evidence given, the King's Counsel may, without the Party's Consent, withdraw a Juror, and have the Cause tried over again.[36]

But herein the better Opinion seems to be; 1*st*, That in Capital Cases a Juror cannot be withdrawn, tho' all Parties consent to it. 2*dly*, That in Criminal Cases not Capital a Juror may be withdrawn, if both Parties consent; but not otherwise. 3*dly*, That in all (a) Civil Causes a Juror cannot be withdrawn, but by Consent of all Parties.[37]

It hath been held, that a Juror withdrawn from the Panel by Consent of both Parties, to the Intent the Trial might for that Time go off pro Defectu Juratorum, it being necessary for the Jury to have a View, may be of the Jury, when the Cause comes to be tried at a subsequent Time, and that this being neither a principal Cause of Challenge, nor to the Favour, cannot be Error.[38]

(C) IN WHAT CASES AND IN WHAT MANNER A TALES IS GRANTABLE.

SINCE the (b) 3 Georg. 2. for the Regulation of Juries, and by which the Sheriff cannot return less than forty-eight Jurors, the Use of a Tales seems to be taken away; but as the Statute herein extends only to Civil Causes, it will still be necessary to consider the Manner of awarding a Tales, especially in Criminal Cases.[39]

If all the Jury did not attend on the Habeas Corpus or Distringas whether by reason of the Death of some of the Persons returned, or for any other Cause; or if so many be challenged and drawn, that there do not remain a sufficient Number to make a Jury; or if after the Jury is charged one or more of them die, there are at Common Law the Writs of Undecim, Decem, or Octo Tales, according as the Number was deficient, to force others into Court to try the Issue, or by (c) Statute the Plaintiff may pray a Tales de Circumstantibus to prevent the Delay of the Decem Tales.[40]

A Tales may be granted as well on the Application of the Defendant as Plaintiff; but it seems that a Defendant cannot regularly pray it till there has been a Default in the Plaintiff.[41]

In Capital Cases the Tales may be granted for a larger Number than the first Process; as for sixty, or forty, or any other even Number, in order to prevent Delays from peremptory Challenges; and in this Respect a Tales in Capital Cases is different from what it is in any other Case; it being an allowed Rule, that in all (d) other Cases the Tales must be for a less Number than the first Process.[42]

Every subsequent Tales in Capital, as well as in all other Cases, must be for a less Number than the former, except the former were quashed, in which Case the next may be for the fame Number.[43]

The Quashing the Array of the principal Panel doth not quash that of the Tales, but the Inquest shall be taken by those returned on the Tales, if there be a sufficient Number, otherwise more shall be added to them by a new Tales; but if all the Persons returned on a Habeas Corpora be challenged and drawn, there shall not be a Tales awarded, but a new Venire; for the Word Tales plainly refers to some others, to whom the Persons returned are to be like; also if the first Habeas Corpora be quashed, the second with a Tales cannot but be quashed with it, and the Party must go on as if the Venire had only been returned, and nothing done upon it; for where a Process is quashed, all that follows and depends upon it falls with it.[44]

It seems, that a Tales is not grantable on the Return of a Venire, but only on the Return of a Habeas Corpora or Distringas, because it appears not before such Return, but that a full Jury may appear.[45]

A Distringas or Habeas Corpora, with a Command to add so many more to those summoned on the Venire, is the first Process against the Tales.[46]

If a Juror be withdrawn after a Trial commenced, whereon a Tales de circumstantibus was awarded, and afterwards a new Habeas Corpora be taken out with a Tales, it shall appoint the Tales to be added to the Jurors first returned, and also to those returned on the Tales de circumstantibus.[47]

The Statutes, which authorize Justices of Nisi Prius to award a Tales de circumstantibus, extend as well to all Capital Cases as to others; but it seems that such a Tales cannot be prayed for the King upon an Indictment, or Criminal Information, without a Warrant from the Attorney General, or an express Assignment from the Court, before which the Inquest is taken.[48]

It seems not to be clear that a Tales is grantable by Justices of Oyer, &c. or of (a) Gaol-Delivery; but if a Trial be put off before Justices of Gaol-Delivery for want of a full Jury, they may, without Doubt, order a larger Panel, whereon the former Jurors should be returned in the same Order as before, and called to be sworn as they stand, without any more Regard to those who were sworn before, than to the others; and the like Method is to be observed as to a Jury returned with a Tales.[49]

On a Writ of Error of a Judgment given in the Court of Bristol, it was solemnly adjudged, that a Custom in an inferior Court to try by a Tales de circumstantibus was void, as it breaks down that important Rule, that Trials must be per Pares, and admits an unlimited extravagant Latitude of gleaning together any Set of Men for Jurors, however profligate and unfit for the Office, and intirely deprives the Parties of their Challenges.[50]

(d) in what cases and in what manner special juries are appointed.

SPECIAL Juries are appointed on Motion and Application to the Court for that Purpose, on which, if the Court think it reasonable, the Sheriff is to attend the Secondary or Master with his Book of Freeholders, who, in the Presence of the Attornies on both Sides, names Forty-eight Freeholders, and then each Party strikes out twelve, by one at a Time, the Plaintiff or his Attorney beginning first, and the remaining Twenty-four are returned by the Secondary, as the Jury, to try the Cause.[51]

If the Rule was entered into by Consent, it is said to be a Contempt in the Attorney not to be present; but to remedy any Inconveniency, from hence, a Rule was made, that when a Master is to strike a Jury, viz. Forty-eight out of the Freeholders Book, he shall give Notice to the Attornies of both Sides to be present; and if the one comes, and the other does not, he that appears shall, according to the ancient Course, strike out twelve, and the Master shall strike out other twelve for him that is absent.[52]

And it is said, that if by Rule of Court the Master is ordered to strike a Jury, in case it be not expressed in such Rule that the Master shall strike Forty-eight, and each of the Parties shall strike out twelve, the Master is to strike Twenty-four, and the Parties have no Liberty to strike out any.[53]

It is said, that a Special Jury may be granted to try a Cause at Bar without the Consent of the Parties, but never at Nisi Prius, unless for good Cause shewn, such as Partiality of the Sheriff, &c.[54]

Also it is said to be contrary to the Course of the Court of B. R. in Capital Cases, to order the Clerk of the Crown to strike a Special Jury, as is done by the Secondary in Civil Causes upon Trials at Bar.[55]

By the 3 Georg. 2. cap. 25. Sect. 15. reciting, that whereas some Doubt had been conceived touching the Power of his Majesty's Courts of Law at Westminster, to appoint Juries to be struck before the Clerk of the Crown, Master of the Office, Prothonotaries, or other proper Officer of such respective Courts, for the Trial of Issues depending in the said Courts, without the Consent of the Prosecutor or Parties concerned in the Prosecution or Suit then depending, unless such Issues are to be tried at the Bar of the same Courts, it is enacted, 'That it shall and may be lawful to and for his Majesty's Courts of King's Bench, Common Pleas and Exchequer at Westminster, respectively, upon Motion made on Behalf of his Majesty, or on the Motion of any Prosecutor or Defendant in any Indictment or Information for any Misdemeanor or Information in Nature of a Quo Warranto, depending or to be brought or prosecuted in the said Court of Exchequer, or on the Motion of any Plaintiff or Plaintiffs, Defendant or Defendants, in any Action, Cause or Suit whatsoever depending, or to be brought and carried on in the said Courts of King's Bench, &c. or in any of them; and the said Courts are hereby respectively authorized and required, upon Motion aforesaid, in any of the Cases beforementioned, to order and appoint a Jury to be struck before the proper Officer of each respective Court, for the Trial of any Issue joined in any of the said Cases, and triable by a Jury of twelve Men, in such Manner as Special Juries have been, and are usually struck in such Courts respectively, upon Trials at Bar had in the said Courts, which said Jury, so struck as aforesaid, shall be the Jury returned for the Trial of the said Issue.'

And Sect. 16. it is further enacted by the said Statute, 'That the Person or Party, who shall apply for such Jury to be struck as aforesaid, shall bear and pay the Fees for the Striking such Jury, and shall not have any Allowance for the same upon Taxation of Costs.'

Sect. 17. Provided, 'That where any Special Jury shall be ordered, by Rule of any of the said Courts, to be struck by the proper Officer of such Court, in the Manner aforesaid, in any Cause arising in any City or County of a City or Town, the Sheriff or Sheriffs, or UnderSheriff of such City, or County of a City or Town, shall be ordered by such Rule to bring, or cause to be brought before the said Officer, the Books or Lists of Persons qualified to serve on Juries within the same; out of which Juries ought to be returned by such Sheriff or Sheriffs, in like Manner as the Freeholders Book hath been usually ordered to be brought, in order to the Striking of Juries for Trials at the Bar in Causes arising in Counties at large; and in every such Case the Jury shall be taken and struck out of such Books or Lists respectively.'

A Rule was made for a Special Jury, which was entered into by Consent; and afterwards when the Parties attended the Master, the Defendant struck out some Hundredors, and at the Trial challenged the Array for want of Hundredors, which the Judge of Assise allowed a good Challenge; and this was held such a Breach and Contempt of the Rule, for which an Attachment was granted.[56]

But where in the Trial of a Quo Warranto, the Defendant challenged the Array of a Special Jury, that had been struck at his Request, for Partiality in the Sheriff; and an Attachment being moved for, and the Case next above relied on, it was denied, and said per Curiam, that the Attachment in the Case supra was granted by Reason of the Abuse of the Rule; but here the only Foundation is the Jury's being so struck at his Request, which is not alone sufficient; for he had a Right to challenge the Array on the Process's being directed to a wrong Officer; and the Rule might have been fulfilled another way, viz. as the Sheriff was partial, a proper Entry might have been made, and Process directed to the Coroner.[57]

(e) who are to be returned; and therein of the qualifications and several causes for which they may be challenged: And herein,

1. OF CHALLENGES TO THE ARRAY, OR TO THE POLLS; AND HEREIN WHERE THE INSUFFICIENCY OR PARTIALITY OF THE SHERIFF OR RETURNING OFFICER IS A PRINCIPAL CAUSE OF CHALLENGE, OR TO THE FAVOUR.

A Challenge (a) to Jurors is twofold, either to the Array, or to the Polls, i. e. to the particular Jurors, to the Array of the principal Panel, and to the Array of the Tales; and herein my Lord Coke observes, that the Jurors Names are ranked in the Panel one under another, which Order or Ranking the Jury is called the Array; as in common Speech we say Battail Array for the Order of the Battle; so as to challenge the Array of the Panel, is at once to challenge or except against all the Persons so arrayed or impanelled, in respect of the Partiality or Default of the Sheriff, Coroner, or other Officer who made the Return.[58]

This kind of Challenge is twofold, either a principal Cause of Challenge, or to the Favour, like that to the Polls or particular Jurors; for they thought there could be no better Rule to ascertain what should be a proper Challenge to their Officer, than what was a proper Challenge to each Juror's Partiality; for they did not suppose that they had a Jury per quos rei

veritas melius sciri poterit, unless they were settled by a Person absolutely indifferent.[59]

A Principal is grounded on such a manifest Presumption of Partiality, that if it be found true it unquestionably sets aside the Array or the Juror, but a Challenge to the Favour leaves it to the Discretion of the Triers.[60]

There are many principal Causes of Challenge to the Array; as if the Officer return any Juror at the Party's Denomination, or that he may be more favourable to one Party than the other; or if the Array be returned by a Bailiff of a Franchise, and the Sheriff return it as of himself; in which Case the Party should lose his Challenges in a Default in the Bailiff, because the Return on Record is in the Sheriff's Name; but if the Sheriff return one within a Liberty, this is good, and the Lord of the Franchise is put to his Action against him.[61]

If the Sheriff be liable to the Distress of either of the Parties mediately or immediately, or if he be his Servant or Officer in Fee, or of Robes, or his (a) Counsellor or Attorney, or have Part of the Land depending on the same Title; or if he has been Godfather to a Child of either of the Parties, or either of them to his; or if either of them have an Action of Debt against him; or if an Action of Battery, or such like, which imply Malice, are depending between them, these are principal Challenges to the Array.[62]

But if either of the Parties be subject to the Distress of the Sheriff, &c. or if the Sheriff, &c. have an Action of Debt against either of the Parties, these are Causes of Challenge to the Favour only; for the Sheriff, &c. thereby is not under the Party's Influence, but the Party under his.[63]

Consanguinity, how remote soever between the Sheriff or Juror, and either of the Parties, or Affinity by Marriage of either Party himself with the Cousin of the Sheriff or the Juror, or e converso, are principal Causes of Challenge to the Array, or to the Polls; but if the Marriage be between the Son of the one and Daughter of the other, it is a Cause of Challenge to the Favour only; and he, that challenges the Array or a Juror for a Cousinage, must shew how the Party is Cousin; but if it be found that he is Cousin it is (b) sufficient, whether it be found in the Manner alledged or not; and here my Lord Coke notes, that a Bastard can have no Kindred.[64]

That the Sheriff and one of the Parties are Fellow-Servants, not a principal Cause of Challenge, but only to the Favour.[65]

It has been doubted, whether the (c) Lessor in Ejectment, being of kin to the Sheriff in such a Manner as to make it a principal Cause of Challenge, in case he had been Plaintiff or Defendant; it has been held by some to be a principal Cause of Challenge, for that this is but a fictitious Action, the Lessor being only concerned in Interest, and the Plaintiff a fictitious Person; and that the Courts take Notice of the Lessor as the real Plaintiff, by ordering him in certain Cases to pay Costs, &c. but the better Opinion is, that it is no principal Cause of Challenge; that he not being Party to the Record, the Judges ex officio are not obliged to take Notice of him, and that to do it in this Case would tend to Delay, which the Courts always avoid.[66]

The Array of a Panel was challenged ore tenus, because it was returned by the Sheriff two Days after he had received a Writ of Discharge; and it was said per Cur. that it could not be challenged for that Cause, because it would be a direct Averment against the Record, for it is returned by him as Sheriff, and the Return accepted; but by the Advice of the Court the Party made his Challenge to the Array, because it was favourably made and returned in Favour of the Party, &c. and Issue being joined thereupon, and all this Matter given in Evidence, the Court directed the Triers, that it was not duly made and returned, for it was without Warrant; whereupon the Array was quashed.[67]

But where a Challenge to the Array was taken, because the Sheriff who made the Return had continued in his Office for more than three Months, and not taken the Oaths, and subscribed the Declaration required by the Act 25 Car. 2. made for preventing the Dangers by Popish Recusants; and so his Office, by that Act, was void to all Intents and Purposes before he made his Return of the Jury; but the Challenge was disallowed by the Court, for he must be taken here as Sheriff de facto; and if such a Challenge should be allowed, no Trial could be had, but should be put off, unless the Party were ready to shew that the Sheriff had taken the Test.[68]

The Plaintiff for his Expedition surmised that he was Servant to the Sheriff of the County where the Action was brought and triable, and prayed a Venire fac. to the Coroners, and the Defendant non dedixit; whereupon Process was awarded to the Coroners; and after Trial, and Verdict for the Plaintiff, it was moved that this Process was misawarded, and a Mistrial, for Process ought not to be awarded to the Coroners but where the Challenge is Principal; and here to say that he was Servant to the Sheriff, is no principal Challenge, but only to the Favour, wherefore, &c. but the Court held, for as much as if the Sheriff had returned this Panel, it had been a good Cause to quash the Array for Favour, (a) that the Plaintiff to avoid that Delay might well shew it, and have Process to the Coroners; and the rather, this being a (b) judicial and not an original Writ; and the Clerks said there were many

If the Challenge to the Array be found against the Party, he shall have his Challenge to the Polls; but neither Party shall take a Challenge to the Polls, which they might have had to the Array.[70]

2. WHERE INSUFFICIENCY AND NOT BEING LIBER HOMO IS A GOOD CAUSE OF CHALLENGE TO THE POLLS.

A Challenge to the Polls is, as has been observed, a Challenge to the particular Jurors, who, it seems, of old could not be challenged; for these by the feudal Law, as the Pares Curtis, were the Judges; and therein the Rule was Partes qui Ordinariam Jurisdictionem habent recusari non possunt; but tho' those Suitors, as Judges of the Court, could not be challenged, yet the Pares, when brought up by Writ, were subject to be challenged; and the Reason is, that there are several Qualifications required by the Writ, viz. that they be Liberos & Legales Hominos [Homines?] de vicineto (of the Place laid in the Declaration) quorum quilibet habeat decem Libras terrar', tenementor 'vel reddit' per ann' ad minus, per quos rei veritas melius sciri Poterit, & qui nec (of the Plaintiff nor Defendant) aliqua affinitate attingunt, ad faciend' quand' Jurat' Patriae inter partes Praedict'. These Qualifications were inserted, because this Manner of Trial was different from below; for there the Trial being by all the Pares, if there was a Majority amounting to twelve, the Cause was decided by such a Number as were necessary; but here, because they brought up but twelve, and they were all to be of one Mind, in order to make the Verdict, therefore it was necessary there should be several Qualifications mentioned in such Persons who are to give in the Verdict in that Cause; and if any of the Qualifications were wanting in any one, it was a sufficient Reason to reject such Person.[71]

The first Qualification is, that they should be Liberi & Legales Homines; hence it has been always clearly held, that Aliens, Minors or Villeins, cannot be Jurors.[72]

Also Infamy is a good Cause of Challenge to a Juror; as that he is outlawed, or that he hath been adjudged to any Corporal Punishment whereby he becomes infamous, or that he hath been convicted of Treason or Felony, or Perjury or Conspiracy, or of Forgery on 5 Eliz. or attainted in Attaint for giving a false Verdict; and it hath been holden, that such Exceptions are not solved by a Pardon; and it was anciently holden, that Excommunication was also a good Challenge, yet it seems that none of the above cited Challenges are principal ones, but only to the Favour, unless the Record of the Outlawry, Judgment or Conviction be produced, if it be a Record of another Court, or the Term, &c. be shewn, if it be a Record of the same Court.[73]

The Venire facias was Probos & Legales Homines; and it was objected, that it ought to have been (a) Liberos & Legales Homines, there being a Difference between Probus, Liber & Legalis; for that Legalis is he who is not outlawed, and against whom no Exception can be taken in this Behalf; that Probus is not taken Notice of in Law; and Liber Homo is not only one that hath Freehold Land, but that hath Freedom of Mind, and stands indifferent, no more inclining to the one than to the other; but it was adjudged that Probos & Liberos are of one Sense, and that the Statute of Westminster 2. which gives the Venire, does not tie the Writ to the very Words.[74]

3. WHERE THE WANT OF A FREEHOLD, OR COMPETENT ESTATE, IS A GOOD CAUSE OF CHALLENGE.

It seems to be admitted by the Statute of 21 E. 1. de his qui Ponendi sunt in Assisis, and also by the Register, that at Common Law there was no Necessity that Jurors should have any Freehold as to Inquests before Justices in Eyre, or in Cities or Burghs; for it seems, that in Corporations the Freedom, and not the Freehold, made them Liberos Homines.[75]

Also it seems agreed that the Common Law doth not require that a Juror should in any Case have a Freehold of any certain Value; and upon this Ground it hath been adjudged, that a Freehold worth but 20 s. or 5 s. or even 1 d. is still a sufficient Qualification for a Juror in such Cases as are not within the Statutes, which require a Freehold of a greater Value.[76]

Also by some Opinions it is holden, that the Common Law did not require that a Juror should in any Case have a Freehold; but this is not only contrary to what seems implied by the Books, which in saying that the Common Law did not require a Freehold of any certain Value, plainly suppose that it required some Freehold, but hath been also contradicted by many express Authorities; agreeably to which it seems to be settled at this Day, that the Want of a Freehold is a good Challenge of a Juror in all Cases not otherwise provided for by Statute, and consequently in a Trial for High Treason in London as well as in any other County.[77]

But it seems agreed, that wherever the Letter of the Common or Statute Law require that a Juror should have a Freehold, the Meaning is fully satisfied by his having the Use of a Freehold, and that it is not material whether he have it in his own or his Wife’s Right, or whether it be absolute or upon Condition, or an Estate of Inheritance, or only for Term of one’s own or another’s Life, so that it be in the same County wherein the Suit is brought, and actually continue in the Juror till the Time when he is sworn.[78]

But this Matter, as to the Freehold and Value of Jurors, has been regulated and settled by divers Statutes; to which Purpose, by the Statutes of Westm. 2. cap. 38. and 21 E. 1. de his qui Ponendi sunt in Assisis, it is enacted, 'That none shall be (a) put in Assises or Juries, except in Cities, Burghs, or Trading Towns, who have not Tenements to the yearly Value of 40 s.'

By the 2 H. 5. cap. 3. it is enacted, 'That no Person shall be admitted to pass in any Inquest upon Trial of the Death of a Man, nor in any Inquest betwixt Party or Party, in Plea Real or Plea Personal, whereof the Debt or the Damage declared amount to forty Marks, if the same Person have not Lands or Tenements of the yearly Value of 40 s. above all Charges of the same, so that it be challenged by the Party, &c.'

It hath been(b) held, that this Statute extends as well to collateral Issues as to the general one, but(c) that it doth not extend to an Indictment or Information for a Crime not Capital.

It has been held, that a Feoffee to the Use of another, or one who has only a dry Remainder, are not qualified to be Jurors within the Meaning of these Statutes, because whatsoever the Value of the Lands may be, they have no Income from them.[79]

By the 23 H. 8. cap. 13. 'Every Natural-born Subject, who doth enjoy and use the Liberties and Privileges of any City, Borough or Town Corporate, where he dwells and makes his Abode, being worth in moveable Goods and Substance to the clear Value of 40 l. shall be admitted in Trial of Felonies in every Sessions and Gaol-Delivery to be holden in and for the Liberty of such City, &c. albeit he have no Freehold; but this Act shall not extend to any Knight or Esquire in such City, &c.'

Special Provision is made by 11 H. 7. cap. 21. and 4 H. 8. cap. 3. for Jurors in London in Real and Personal Actions above the Value of forty Marks[80].

By the 4 & 5 W. & M. cap. 24. it is enacted, 'That all Jurors (other than Strangers upon Trials per Medietatem Linguae) who are to be returned for Trials of Issues joined in any of the Courts of King's Bench, Common Pleas or Exchequer, or before Justices of Assise or Nisi Prius, Oyer and Terminer, Gaol-Delivery, or General Quarter-Sessions of the Peace in any County of this Realm of England, shall every of them have in their own Name, or in Trust for them, within the same County, ten Pounds by the Year, at least, above Reprises, of Freehold or Copyhold Lands or Tenements, or of Lands or Tenements of (a) Ancient Demesne, or in Rents, or in all or any of the said Lands, Tenements or Rents in Fee-simple, Fee-tail, or for the Life of themselves, or some other Person; and that in every County in Wales, every such Juror shall have in the same County six Pounds by the Year, at least, in Manner aforesaid, above Reprises.'

Provided that it shall be lawful to return any Person on a Tales in England who shall have 5 l. by the Year, or in Wales who shall have 3 l. by the Year, in Manner aforesaid.

In this Statute, as also in the Statutes 27 Eliz. cap. 6. and 16 & 17 Car. 2. cap. 3. sect. 2. there is a Saving to all Cities, Boroughs and Towns Corporate, of their Ancient Usages; from whence it hath been settled, that Trials in those Places continue as before, or as prescribed by the 23 H. 8. cap. 13. which requires Jurors to be worth 40 l. in Goods, &c. lest there should be a Failure of Justice, it being generally impracticable to get a sufficient Number of such Freeholders as the Statutes require in Towns; but it hath been agreed, that for Trials in London for (b) High Treason, every Juror ought to have such Freehold or Copyhold as is required by 4 & 5 W. & M.[81]

By the 3 Geo. 2. cap. 25. sect. 18. it is enacted, 'That any Person or Persons having an Estate in Possession in Land, in their own Right, of the yearly Value of 20 l. or upwards, over and above the reserved Rent payable thereout, such Lands being held by Lease or Leases for the absolute Term of 500 Years, or more, or for 99 Years, or any other Term, determinable on one or more Life or Lives; the Names of every such Person or Persons shall and may, and are hereby directed and required to be inserted in the respective Lists, in order to their being inserted in the Freeholders Book; and the Persons appointed to make such Lists, are hereby directed to insert them accordingly; and such Leaseholder, or Leaseholders, shall and may be summoned or impanelled to serve on Juries, in like Manner as Freeholders may be summoned and impanelled, by Virtue of this or any other Act or Acts of Parliament for that Purpose, and be subject to the like Penalties for Non-appearance, any Law, &c.'

And Sect. 19. it is further enacted, 'That the Sheriffs of the City of London for the Time being, shall not impanel or return any Person or Persons to try any Issue joined in any of his Majesty's Courts of King's Bench, Common Pleas and Exchequer, or to be or serve on any Jury at the Sessions of Oyer and Terminer, Gaol-Delivery, or Sessions of the Peace, to be had or held for the said City of London, who shall not be a Housholder within the said City, and have Lands, Tenements, or Personal Estate, to the Value of 100 l. and the same Matter and Cause alledged by way of Challenge, and so found, shall be taken and admitted as a principal Challenge; and the Person or Persons so challenged shall and may be examined, on Oath, of the Truth of the said Matter.'

And Sect. 20. it is further enacted, 'That the Sheriffs, or other Officers, to whom the Returning of Juries doth or shall belong, for any County, City, or Place respectively, shall not impanel or return any Person or Persons to serve on any Jury, for the Trial of any Capital Offence, who at the Time of such Return would not be qualified in such respective County, City, or Place, to serve as Jurors in Civil Causes for that Purpose; and the same Matter and Cause, alledged by way of Challenge, and so found, shall be admitted and taken as a principal Challenge; and the Person or Persons so challenged shall and may be examined, on Oath, of the Truth of the said Matter.'

By the 4 Geor. 2. cap. 7. reciting, 'That whereas by the very frequent Occasions there are for Juries in the County of Middlesex,' and by the small Number of Freeholders that are in the said County the Sheriffs of the said County may be under Difficulties in procuring Juries; for Remedy whereof it is Enacted, 'That all Leaseholders upon Leases, where the improved Rents or Value shall amount to fifty Pounds or upwards per Annum, over and above, all Ground-Rents, or other Reservations, payable by Virtue of the said Leases, shall be liable and obliged to serve upon Juries, when they shall be legally summoned for that Purpose; any Thing in this or any former Act to the contrary, &c.'

4. WHERE THE JURY'S NOT BEING CONVENED FROM A RIGHT PLACE IS A GOOD CAUSE OF CHALLENGE.

The Jury is regularly to come from that County in which the Matter is alledged to arise and antiently from the Vicinity or very Hundred, pursuant to that Maxim, Vicini Vicinorum Facta praesumuntur scire, Persons living in the Neighbourhood being esteemed the most proper Judges of the Facts done within its Limits, as being most likely to be proved by Witnesses, and charged upon Persons with whose Integrity and Reputation they are best acquainted.[82]

But if a Declaration contain Matters lying in two Counties that join, the Jury may come out of both Counties, because the Sheriffs may be supposed to meet on the Bounds of each County, and impanel the Pares there; but if the Counties cannot join, and consequently the Sheriffs cannot meet each other in order to impanel, as if the Issue were, whether a Road from London to York, and from York to London, &c. this may be tried in either County.[83]

So it is said, that if a Man forge a Deed in one County, and publish it in another, the Trial shall be by a Jury of both Counties; for that the Writing, as well as the Publication of that Writing, is material.[84]

A Party Jury of the Counties of Bedford and Hereford came to the Bar, and first was sworn one of one County, and another of the other County, and so on in Order, till one of the County of Bedford was challenged, and then the Court proceeded to the next of that County till one was sworn, and so of the other County, until six of each County were sworn; for if there should be six sworn of one County first, and six of the other afterwards, it were disorderly and (a) erroneous.[85]

If the Jury did not come from the Hundred, it was a good Cause of Challenge to the Array, and it seems that originally they were (b) all obliged to be of the Hundred; this was changed by Statute, and they were settled first at (c) six, afterwards at (d) two, from the Difficulty of getting Hundredors, and the Partiality they found amongst them, Neighbours having generally a particular Attachment to one Party more than the other.[86]

And as the Jury was to come from the Hundred, it was necessary to lay the Venue from some known place where the Fact is supposed to be done; as in a Vill, Castle, Manor, Forest; because if it was not a known Place, there could be no proper Direction to the Sheriff who were the Pares that were to try the Fact there: It has been held, that a Street or Lane is no proper Place for a Venue, because it is not supposed to be sufficiently known to the Sheriff in what Hundred it is; but a Street in a Parish is a proper Venue, because it is sufficiently known in what Hundred the Parish is.[87]

If the Lord of the Hundred be a Party, then it is sufficient they should come from the next Hundred.[88]

So if an Action be brought on the Statute of Winton there, from the apparent Partiality, the Jury must come from the next Hundred where the Robbery was committed; for the proper Pares for the Trial of every Fact are the nearest (a) impartial Men to the Place where the Fact was done.[89]

He that takes such a Challenge must shew in what Hundred the Visne lies, and he must take it before so many are sworn as will serve for the Hundred, and he that is challenged for the Hundred shall not be drawn absolutely, but shall remain propter Hundredum.[90]

If a Person dwell in the Hundred, whether he have any Freehold there or not, or if he had a Freehold there when he was returned, and sell it before he appear, he is a good Hundredor; but if he sell as his Freehold, he may be challenged absolutely.[91]

If divers Hundreds are in a Leet, or if the Cause of Action arose in divers Hundreds, the Hundredors may come from any of them.[92]

And now by the 4 & 5 Annae, cap. 16. no Hundredors are required, except in Prosecutions criminal, and on penal Statutes, because in other Cases the Venire shall be de Corpore Comitatus.

5. WHERE PARTIALITY IN THE JUROR IS A GOOD CAUSE OF CHALLENGE; AND THEREIN WHERE IT SHALL BE SAID A PRINCIPAL CAUSE OF CHALLENGE, OR TO THE FAVOUR.

Jurors ought to be omni Exceptione Majores, and by the Words of the Writ such per quos Rei Veritas melius sciri poterit, & qui nec the Plaintiff, nec the Defendant, aliqua Affinitate attingunt; which Words contain all Causes of Objection from Impartiality or Incapacity, Consanguinity and Affinity; therefore if the Juror be under the Power of either Party, as if Counsel, Servant of the Robes, or Tenant, they are expresly within the Intent of the Writ; so if he has declared his Opinion touching the Matter, or has been chosen Arbitrator by one Side, or is a Parishioner of the Parish whereof the other Party is Parson, and the Right of the Church comes in Question, or has done any Act by which it appears that he cannot be impartial, as if he has eat or drank at the Expence of either Party, or taken Money to give his Verdict, these are principal Causes of Challenge.[93]

But tho' a Juror is not under the Distress of either Side, or has not given apparent Marks of Partiality, yet there may be sufficient Reason to suspect he may be more favourable to one Side than the other; and this is a Challenge to the Favour; as if the Juror's Son has married the Plaintiff's Daughter; because this is not contained within the Words of the Writ, and therefore no principal Cause of Challenge, but only to the Favour, because such Juror is not within the Power of the Party; and in these Inducements to Suspicion of Favour the Question is, whether the Juryman is indifferent as he stands unsworn; for a Juryman ought to be perfectly impartial to either Side; for otherwise his Affection will give Weight to the Evidence of one Party, and an honest but weak Man may be so much biassed, as to think he goes by his Evidence, when his Affections add Weight to the Evidence; now since the Writ expects those by whom the Truth may be best known, it excludes all those who are apparently partial without any Trial, because they are not under the Qualifications in the Writ, since the Truth cannot be known by them; but where the Partiality is not apparent, but only suspicious, then the Juror is to be tried whether favourable or not, that is, whether he comes within the Description of the Writ; and if the Triers think he does, then he is to be set aside.[94]

If an Action be brought (a) by a Corporation, and the Juror be of Kin to any Member, it is a principal Challenge.[95]

If a Juror be challenged for being of Kin to one Party, it is no CounterPlea that he is of Kin also to the other; for the Venire commands the Sheriff to return those who are of Kin to neither.[96]

An Arbitrator chosen by both Parties, whether he have treated of the Matter or not, or chosen by one Party, if he has never treated thereof, or a Commissioner chosen by one Party for Examination of Witnesses, and appointed under the Great Seal, cannot be challenged principally; but for such Cause one may be challenged for Favour.[97]

If a Juror be Cousin to him in Reversion, it is only a Challenge to the Favour, because he in Reversion is not Party to the Record; but it would be a principal Challenge if he be Party by Voucher, Aid, or Receipt.[98]

It is a principal Cause of Challenge, that the Juror is a Witness named in the Deed, or hath formerly given a Verdict on the same Cause, whether between the same Parties, or others; but this is only a Challenge to the Favour if the Record be of another Court, and not shewn forth; but if it be of the same Court, it is sufficient to shew the Day and the Term.[99]

By the 25 E. 3. cap. 3. it is Enacted, That no Indictor shall be put on Inquests upon Deliverance of the Indictees of Felony or Trespass, if he be challenged for the same Cause by him who is so indicted; and this hath been adjudged a good Exception not only on the Trial of the same Indictment, but also on the Trial of another Indictment or Action, wherein the Matter found in such former Indictment is either directly in Issue, or happens to be material.[100]

It is a good Cause of Challenge, that a Juror hath a Claim to the Forfeiture to be caused by the Conviction, or that he hath declared his Opinion beforehand; yet this hath been adjudged to be no Cause of Challenge where it has appeared to proceed not from any Ill Will, but from a Knowledge of the Cause.[101]

But it is no good Cause of Challenge, that the Juror has found others guilty on the same Indictment; for the Indictment in Judgment of Law is several against each Defendant, and every one must be convicted by particular Evidence against himself.[102]

It hath been ruled to be a good Challenge on the Part of the King, that the Juror hath given his Dogs the Names of the King’s Witnesses.[103]

Tho’ the King may take either a principal Challenge, or to the Favour, yet it is said that the Subject cannot take a Challenge to the Favour against the King, because every one is bound by his Allegiance to favour the King: It is said to be a principal Challenge against the King, that the Jury is of his Livery, or his immediate Tenant.[104]

In an Information of Forgery the Defendant challenged one of the Jury, for that the Prosecutor had been lately entertained at his House; and this was admitted to the Favour, tho' against the King.[105]

A Juror was challenged because he was Tenant of a Manor to which there was a Court-Leet, of which the Plaintiff was Steward; and it was held that this was no principal Challenge, but only to the Favour.[106]

Upon a Trial at Bar the Question was, whether the Fair called Waybill Fair should be kept at Waybill, or at Anderry, and one of the Jury was challenged because he lived at Waybill; and the Objection was, that the Fair occasioned Manure to improve the Ground; on the other Side it was considered, that the Fair occasioned Trampling of the Grass; and this being a Challenge to the Favour, two of the Jurors were sworn to be Triers; and their Oath was, You shall well and truly try whether A. (the Juryman challenged,) stand indifferent between the Parties to this Issue.[107]

Either Party labouring a Juror to appear, is no Cause of Challenge at all, but a lawful Act.[108]

6. WHERE THE DEGREE AND QUALITY OF THE JUROR IS A GOOD CAUSE OF CHALLENGE; AND HEREIN WHO ARE EXEMPT FROM SERVING ON JURIES.

It seems to be agreed, that all Persons, whose Attendance is required in the superior Courts of Justice, such as Serjeants at Law, Counsellors, Attornies, and other Officers of the Courts, are so far privileged as not to be summoned on Juries; also Peers of the Realm are excluded, as not coming within the Qualifications mentioned in the Writ, viz. Ad faciendum quand' Jurat' Patriae; for they are not Pares Patriae, but Pares of an higher Rank; and therefore it is clearly (a) agreed, that if a Peer be returned on a Jury, and bring a Writ of Privilege, he shall be discharged; also it seems to be the (b) better Opinion, that even without such a Writ he may challenge himself, or be challenged by either Party.[109]

But Members of the House of Commons seem not to have any Privilege to be exempt from serving on Juries; yet in the Case of Sir Edward Bainton, who being returned on a Jury in B. R. the Court would not force him to be sworn against his Will, he being a Parliament-Man, and the Parliament then sitting.[110]

Tenants in Ancient Demesne are not to be impanelled to appear at Westminster, or elsewhere in any other Court, upon any Inquest or Trial of

any Cause.[111]

It seems agreed, that the King by his Grant or Charter may exempt one, two, or more from serving on Juries; but he cannot exempt a whole County or Hundred, because in such Case there would be a Failure of Justice; also it seems that such Exemption does not extend to Jurors returned into the King's Bench, unless there be express Words including that Court; also by the better Opinion, the Sheriff cannot return such Privilege of Exemption, but each particular Juror must come in and demand it.[112]

By the Statute of Westminster 2. cap. 38. it is expresly provided, That neither Old Men above the Age of seventy Years, nor Persons perpetually sick, nor those who are infirm at the Time of their Summons, nor those who do not reside in the County, shall be put in Juries, or in the lesser Assizes: In the Construction of which it hath been held, that tho' such Persons may sue out a Writ of Privilege for their Discharge, grounded on this Statute, yet if they be actually returned, and appear, they can neither be challenged by the Party, nor excuse themselves from not serving, if there be not a sufficient Number without them.[113]

Clerks or Persons in (a) Holy Orders, Coroners, Ministers of the Forest, Officers of the Army, and other Officers and Ministers belonging to the King, are exempt from serving on Juries.[114]

By the 6 W. 3. cap. 4. 'Every Person using and exercising the Art of an Apothecary in the City of London, or within seven Miles thereof, being free of the Society of Apothecaries in the said City, and who shall have been duly examined and approved, &c. for so long Time as he shall exercise the said Mystery, and no longer, shall be exempted from serving on any Jury or Inquest; and other Persons exercising the said Art of an Apothecary in any other Parts of this Kingdom, who have served as Apprentices seven Years, according to the Statute 5 Eliz. shall likewise be exempted from serving on Juries for so long Time as they shall use and exercise the said Art, unless such Person voluntarily consent to serve.'

By the 7 & 8 W. 3. cap. 21. all registered Seamen are exempted from serving on Juries.

By the 7 & 8 W. 3. cap. 34. it is Enacted, that no Quaker, or reputed Quaker, shall serve on Juries.

7. WHERE FROM THE QUALITY OF EITHER PARTY IT IS A GOOD CAUSE OF CHALLENGE, THAT A KNIGHT IS NOT RETURNED.

Here we must observe, that if a Peer be impleaded by a Commoner, yet such Case shall not be tried by Peers, but by a Jury of the Country; for tho' the Peers are the proper Pares to a Lord of Parliament in (b) Capital Matters, where the Life and Nobility of a Peer is concerned, yet in Matter of Property the Trial of Facts is not by them, but by the Inhabitants of those Counties where the Facts arise, since such Peers living thro' the whole Kingdom, could not be generally cognisant of Facts arising in several Counties, as the Inhabitants themselves where they are done; but this Want of having Noblemen for their Jury was compensated as much as possible, by returning Persons of the best Quality.

And therefore if a Peer of the Realm or Lord of Parliament be Demandant or Plaintiff, Tenant or Defendant, there must be a Knight returned of his Jury, be he Lord (c) Spiritual or Temporal, or else the Array may be quashed; but (d) if he be returned, altho' he appear not, yet the Jury may be taken of the Residue; and if others be joined with the Lord of Parliament, yet if there be no Knight returned, the Array shall be quashed against all.[115]

But tho' a Peer may be concerned in the Event of a Cause, as if he have the Reversion upon an Estate for Life, and an Action is brought against the Tenant for Life, yet it is no Cause of Challenge if a Knight be not returned.[116]

Upon an Issue between a Peer of the Realm and another, if the Venire Facias be quod summoneat 12 Liberos & Legales Homines, and does not say tam Milites quam alios, as the Register is, (a) tho' the Peer of the Realm may assign it for Error, yet the other cannot, because it does not concern him.[117]

If there be no other Knights in the County, a Serjeant at Law that is a Knight may be returned, and his Privilege shall not excuse him.[118]

A Challenge to the Array quia nullo Milite in eodem Panello existente returnat', is not good; but it must be averred, that such a one and such a one returned upon the Panel are not Knights, and then it may be tried.[119]

It hath been settled, that the Lessor of the Plaintiff being a Nobleman, it was no Cause of Challenge to the Array, that a Knight was not returned, tho' there be an Averment that the Ejectment is brought to try the Peer's Title; because the Lessor does not appear as a Party to the Record.[120]

Also in an Attaint there ought to be a Knight returned of the Jury, and in a Writ of Right four Knights were to be returned.[121]

8. OF TRIALS PER MEDIETATEM LINGUAE, WHERE AN ALIEN IS PARTY.

By the 28 E. 3. cap. 13. sect. 2. it is Enacted, 'That in all manner of Inquests and Proofs which be to be taken or made against Aliens and Denizens, be they Merchants or others, as well before the Mayor of the Staple as before any other Justices or Ministers, altho' the King be Party, the one Half of the Inquest or Proof shall be Denizens, and the other Half Aliens, if so many Aliens and Foreigners be in the Town or Place where such Inquest or Proof is to be taken, that be not Parties, nor with the Parties in Contracts, Pleas, or other Quarrels, whereof such Inquests or Proofs ought to be taken; and if there be not so many Aliens, then shall be put in such Inquests or Proofs as many Aliens as shall be found in the same Towns or Places, which be not thereto Parties, nor with the Parties as aforesaid, and the Remnant of Denizens which be good Men, and not suspicious to the one Party nor to the other.'

In the Construction of this Statute it hath been agreed, that the Statutes which require that the Jurors shall have Tenements to a certain Value, do not (b) extend to Aliens returned by Virtue of this Statute, but only to Denizens, who are to have Lands or Tenements to the same Value as in other Cases.[122]

Also it is settled, that those on the Grand Jury, or who find an Indictment against an Alien, need not be Aliens.[123]

Neither is it necessary that the Petit Jury in an Action or Appeal by an Alien against an Alien, should be Half Aliens, and Half English; for the Words are, All Inquests, &c. between Aliens and Denizens.[124]

If an Alien neglect to pray the Benefit of the Statute (a) before the Return of a common Venire, he can neither except to such Venire, nor pray a subsequent Process de Medietate Linguae.[125]

The Return of a Venire de Medietate Linguae ought to (b) shew which of the Jurors are Denizens, and which Aliens, and a full Number of each must appear to be sworn; if there be not enow to make up a full Number of six Denizens and six Aliens, the Justices of Nisi Prius (c) may, by Construction of the Statutes which give a Tales de Circumstantibus, award such a Tales for so many Denizens and Aliens as shall be wanting.[126]

If on a Venire of Half Denizens and Half Aliens the Sheriff return twelve all Aliens, and among them some who in Truth are not such, the Party shall not be concluded by such Return, but may notwithstanding challenge the Array for Want of a sufficient Number of Aliens.[127]

Some of the Precedents of Awards of Venire's de Medietate Linguae mention, that the Aliens to be returned shall be of the same Country whereof the Party alledges himself; but others direct generally, that one

Half of the Jury shall be Aliens, without specifying any particular Country; and these last seem most agreeable to the Statute, and to be confirmed by the late Practice, and greater Number of Authorities.[128]

It hath been held, that Denizens so made by Letters Patent are Denizens within the Intent of this Statute; also that before the Union of England and Scotland under James I. a Scot was not an Alien within the Meaning of this Statute.[129]

It hath been held, that as to Treason this Statute is repealed by 1 & 2 Ph. & Mar. cap. 10. which requires that Trials of Treason shall be according to the Common Law.[130]

By the 2 & 3 Ph. & Mar. and 4 & 5 Eliz. Persons made Felons, as Egyptians, are to be tried by the Inhabitants of the County or Place where they shall be taken, and not per Medietatem Linguae.

9. OF PEREMPTORY CHALLENGES.

By the Common Law, in all Capital Cases (in which only peremptory Challenges were allowed,) the Prisoner could challenge thirty-five peremptorily; and this was because the Trial by the Petty Jury came instead of the Ordeal, and the Petty Jury of twelve being after the Manner of the Canonical Purgation, and because the whole Pares were not on his Jury, but only a select Number was chosen by the Criminal himself, as was usual among the Canonists, therefore they took a middle Way, and gave the Defendant Liberty to challenge peremptorily any Number under three Juries, four Juries being as many as generally appeared, to make the total Pares of the County.[131]

This Kind of Challenge, as has been observed, was allowable by the Common Law in all Capital Cases, both upon Indictments and Appeals, and also in Misprision of High Treason; but it was Enacted by 33 H. 8. cap. 23. sect. 3. That it should not be allowed in any Cases of High Treason, nor Misprision of High Treason; which Statute being repealed by 1 Ph. & Mar. cap. 10. the antient Course of the Common Law, as to Trials of Treason, is restored, and consequently such Challenge revived; but it is made a Doubt, whether by any Statute it is revived in case of Misprision of Treason, the Statute 1 Ph. & Ma. not extending, as it is said, to Misprision of High Treason.[132]

It is enacted by 22 H. 8. cap. 14. sect. 7. made perpetual by 32 H. 8. cap. That no Person arraigned for any Petit Treason, Murder or Felony, be admitted to any peremptory Challenge above the Number of twenty; but it has been held, that 1 & 2 Ph. & Mar. which restores the Course of the Common Law as to Trials of Treason, has revived the old Challenge of Thirty-five in Trials of Petit Treason; and therefore it is agreed, that at this Day, in Cases of High Treason and Petit Treason, the Prisoner may challenge Thirty-five peremptorily, and twenty in all other Capital Offences.[133]

This peremptory Challenge seems, by the better Opinion, to be only allowable when the Prisoner pleads the General Issue; therefore by the Common Law, if a Man were outlawed of Felony or Treason, and brought a Writ of Error upon the Outlawry, and assigned some Error in Fact, whereupon Issue was joined, he could not challenge peremptorily; the like Law if he had pleaded any foreign Plea in Bar or in Abatement, which went not to the Trial of the Felony, but of some collateral Matter only.[134]

There seems to be some Diversity of Opinions in case of a Prisoner's Challenging peremptorily more than he is allowed by Law; and herein my Lord Hale lays down the Law to be, that at Common Law if the Prisoner peremptorily challenged above Thirty-five Persons, and insisted upon it, and would not leave his Challenge, then in case of an Indictment of High Treason it amounted to Nihil dicit, and Judgment of Death should be given against him; but in case of Petit Treason, or Felony, the Prisoner anciently was put to Peine fort & dure, as declining the Trial the Law appointed; the Consequence whereof was only the Forfeiture of his Goods, but it amounted to no Attainder, and consequently no Escheat of his Lands; and thus, says he, the Practice was until the Beginning of the Reign of H. 7. but afterwards, by the Advice of all the Judges of both Benches, it was resolved, that the Party so peremptorily challenging above Thirty-five, should have Judgment of Death, and that it amounted to an Attainder; for having pleaded to the Felony, and put himself upon the Country, here could be no standing Mute; and therefore the Judges resolved on this Course, as most consonant to Law, to be practised in all Circuits; but for all this, adds he, the better Opinion of later Times, as well as of former, is, that the Judgment in the Case of such a peremptory Challenge of above Thirty-five at the Common Law, in case of Felony, was not an Attainder, but only Penance, to which the Party was awarded without having any Jury impanelled.[135]

There seems also some Diversity of Opinions, as to what is to be done with a Prisoner who, since the Statute of 22 H. 8. challenges above twenty in Felony; and herein the better Opinion seems to be, that he shall neither forfeit his Goods, nor have Judgment of Death, nor of Peine fort & dure, but shall only be overruled as to his Challenges, so far as they exceed twenty, and put upon his Trial; and herewith agrees my Lord Hale, and that, he says, for two Reasons; 1. Because the Statute hath made no Provision to attaint the Felon, if he challenge above the Number of twenty. 2. Because the Words of the Statute of 22 H. 8. are, That he be not admitted to challenge above the Number of twenty; so that if he challenge above twenty peremptorily, his Challenge shall only be disallowed.[136]

If twenty Men are indicted for the same Offence, tho' by one Indictment, yet every Prisoner is allowed his peremptory Challenge; and if there be but one Venire fac. awarded to try them, the Persons challenged by any one shall be withdrawn against them all.[137]

If A. be indicted and plead Not guilty, the Jury appears, he challengeth six of the Jury for Cause, and the Causes found insufficient, and the six are sworn, and the Rest of the Jury challenged off, whereby the Inquest remains pro defectu Juratorum; a Tales granted, and the Jury appear, the Prisoner may challenge peremptorily any of the six that were before challenged, for Cause allowed and sworn, for it is possible a new Cause of Challenge may intervene after the former Swearing; but if a Man challenge him for Cause, he must shew a Cause happened after the former Swearing.[138]

But if the Prisoner, upon the first Panel, had challenged, for Instance, fifteen peremptorily, and then the Jury remains for Default of Jurors, and a Distringas with a forty Tales is granted, he shall challenge peremptorily no more than will fill up his Number, viz. in case of Felony, at this Day, five more, and in case of Treason, or Petit Treason, twenty more, to make up his full Number of twenty peremptory Challenges in the first Case, and Thirty-five in the last.[139]

10. OF CHALLENGES BY THE KING.

The King, or any one on his Behalf, may, on sufficient Cause, challenge either the Array, or the Polls, in the same Manner as a private Person may; also by the Common Law, the King, without assigning any Reason, but barely alledging quod non sunt boni pro Rege, might have challenged peremptorily as many as he thought proper.

But this is remedied by 33 E. 1. commonly called Ordinatio de Inquisitionibus, which enacteth as follows; 'Of Inquests to be taken before any of the Justices, and wherein our Lord the King is Party, howsoever it be, it is agreed and ordained by the King and all his Counsel, that from henceforth, notwithstanding it be alledged by them that sue for the King, that the Jurors of those Inquests, or some of them, be not indifferent for the King, yet such Inquests shall not remain untaken for that Cause; but if they that sue for the King will challenge any of those Jurors, they shall assign of their Challenge a Cause certain, and the Truth of the same Challenge shall be inquired of according to the Custom of the Court.'[140]

In the Construction of this Statute it hath been clearly settled, that the Words thereof being general, it extends to all Causes, as well Criminal as Civil, whereto the King is Party.[141]

It hath also been agreed, and is now the established Practice of the Courts, that if the King challenge a Juror before the Panel is perused, he needs not shew any Cause of his Challenge till the whole Panel be gone thro', and it appear that there will not be a full Jury without the Person so challenged; and if the Defendant, in order to oblige the King to shew Cause presently, challenge touts paravaile, yet it hath been adjudged, that the Defendant shall be first put to shew all his Causes of Challenge before the King need to shew any.[142]

11. AT WHAT TIME A CHALLENGE IS TO BE TAKEN.

It is laid down as a Rule, that there can be no Challenge either to the Array, or Polls, before a full Jury appears; and therefore in a Case where the Plaintiff, after he had prayed a Tales, challenged the Array thereof for Partiality in the Sheriff; tho' it was objected, that this being by his own Desire; he was afterwards estoped to take any Exceptions to the Sheriff; yet the Challenge was allowed good, and the Venire directed to the Sheriffs; for if he had not prayed a Tales, there could not have been a full Jury, and then there could be no Challenges.[143]

Also it is laid down as a Rule, that no Juror can be challenged without Consent after he hath been sworn, either in a Criminal or Civil Case, or either at the Suit of the King or Subject, whether on the same Day, or, according to the better Opinion, on a former on the same Trial, unless it be for some Cause which happened since he was sworn.[144]

He who hath several Causes of Challenge against a Juror must take them all at once[145].

If a Juror be challenged by one Party and found indifferent, the other Party may challenge him afterwards.[146]

In case of Treason, or Felony, if the Prisoner challenge a Juror for Cause which is held insufficient, he may afterwards challenge him peremptorily.[147]

A Challenge for the Hundred must be taken before so many be sworn as will serve for Hundredors, or else the Party loseth the Advantage thereof.[148]

After a Challenge to the Array, the Party may challenge the Polls; but after a Challenge to the Polls, there can be no Challenge to the Array.[149]

12. HOW SUCH CHALLENGE IS TO BE TRIED.

Here we must take Notice, that a principal Cause of Challenge being grounded on such a manifest Presumption of Partiality, that if it be found true, it unquestionably sets aside the Array, or the Juror, without any other Trial than its being made out to the Satisfaction of the Court, before which the Panel is returned; but a Challenge to the Favour, where the Partiality is not apparent, must be left to the Discretion of the Triers.[150]

If the Array be challenged, it lies in the Discretion of the Court how it shall be tried; sometimes it is done by two Attornies, sometimes by two Coroners, and sometimes by two of the Jury; with this Difference, that if the Challenge be for Kindred in the Sheriff, it is most fit to be tried by two of the Jurors returned; if the Challenge found in Favour of Partiality, then by any other two assigned thereunto by the Court.[151]

As to a Challenge to the Polls, if a Juror be challenged before any Juror sworn, two Triers shall be appointed by the Court; and if he be found indifferent, and sworn, he and the two Triers shall try the next Challenge; and if he be tried, and found indifferent, then the two first Triers shall be discharged, and the two Jurors tried and found indifferent shall try the Rest.[152]

If the Plaintiff challenge ten, and the Prisoner one, then he that remains shall have added to him one chosen by the Plaintiff and another by the Prisoner, and they three shall try the Challenge; if six be sworn, and the Rest challenged, the Court may assign any two of the six sworn to try the Challenges.[153]

The Triers cannot exceed two, unless it be by Consent; which was taken up in Imitation of the Trial of the Summons of the Party, which was by two Persons; this being, (a) whether such a Juror, as was described in the Writ, was warned, viz. one per qu' rei verit' melius sciri Poterit, &c.[154]

The Triers, as far as they act herein, are Officers of the Court, and liable to be punishable for any Misdemeanor; also it is said, (a) that if they find against Law, and the Direction of the Court, they may be fined and imprisoned.[155]

The Truth of the Matter alledged as Cause of Challenge, must be made out, by (b) Witnesses, to the Satisfaction of the Triers; also the Juror challenged may, on a Voir dire, be asked such Questions as do not tend to Infamy or Disgrace; such as, whether he hath a Freehold, whether he hath an Interest in the Cause; and in a Civil Cause, whether he hath given his Opinion beforehand upon the Right, which he might have done as Arbitrator between the Parties.[156]

But in no Case can a Juror be asked, whether he hath been whipped for Larceny, or convict of Felony, or whether ever he was committed to Bridewell for a Pilferer, or to Newgate for clipping and coining, or whether he is a Villein or outlawed; because these kind of Questions tend to make a Man discover that of himself which tends to Shame, Infamy and Disgrace; also it was held in (c) a Trial for High Treason, that the Prisoner, in order to challenge a Juror, could not ask him, whether he had not declared his Opinion beforehand that he was guilty, or would be hanged, because these Questions tend to Reproach, as charging him with a Misdemeanor.[157]

If a Challenge be taken, and the other Side demur, and it be debated, and the Judge overrule it, it is entered upon the original Record; and if at Nisi Prius it appears upon the Postea what the Judge hath done; but if the Judge overruled the Challenge upon Debate without a Demurrer, then it is proper for (d) a Bill of Exceptions.[158]

It is said, that a Demurrer upon a Challenge is not like to a Demurrer upon a Plea; for in Case of a Demurrer upon a Challenge, as soon as the Demurrer is agreed on at the Bar, it is good enough, without other Circumstances, such as Counsel's Hand, &c. and the Prothonotaries of Right ought to enter such Demurrer.[159]

(F) HOW JURORS ARE TO BE IMPANELLED AND SWORN.

BY the 3 Georg. cap. 25. sect. 11. it is enacted, 'That the Name of each and every Person who shall be summoned and impanelled, with his Addition and the Place of his Abode, shall be written in several and distinct Pieces of Parchment, or Paper, being all, as near as may be, of equal Size and Bigness, and shall be delivered to the Marshal of such Judge of Assise or Nisi Prius, or of the said Great Sessions, or of the Sessions of the said Counties Palatine, who is to try the Causes in the said County, by the UnderSheriff of the said County, or some Agent of his, and shall, by Direction and Care of such Marshal, be rolled up all, as near as may be, in the same Manner, and put into a Box or Glass to be provided for that Purpose; and when any Cause shall be brought on to be tried, some indifferent Person, by Direction of the Court, may and shall, in open Court, draw out twelve of the said Parchments, or Papers, one after another; and if any of the Persons, whose Names shall be so drawn, shall not appear, or be challenged and set aside, then such further Number, until twelve Persons be drawn, who shall appear, and after all Causes of Challenge shall be allowed as fair and indifferent; and the said twelve Persons so first drawn and appearing, and approved as indifferent, their Names being marked in the Panel, and they being sworn, shall be the Jury to try the said Cause; and the Names of the Persons so drawn and sworn shall be kept apart by themseves, in some other Box or Glass to be kept for that Purpose, till such Jury shall have given in their Verdict, and the same is recorded; or until such Jury shall, by Consent of the Parties, or Leave of the Court, be discharged; and then the same Names shall be rolled up again and returned to the former Box or Glass, there to be kept with the other Names remaining at that Time undrawn; and so toties quoties, as long as any Cause remains then to be tried.'

Sect. 12. Provided, 'That if any Cause shall be brought on to be tried in any of the said Courts respectively, before the Jury in any other Cause shall have brought in their Verdict, or be discharged, it shall and may be lawful for the Court to order twelve of the Residue of the said Parchments, or Papers, not containing the Names of any of the Jurors who shall not have so brought in their Verdict, or be discharged, to be drawn in such Manner as is aforesaid, for the Trial of the Cause which shall be so brought on to be tried.'

In Capital Cases the Sheriff returns the Panel of the Jury, who being called, and appearing, the Prisoners are told by the Clerk, that these good Men now called, and appearing, are to pass on their Lives and Deaths; therefore if they will Challenge any of them, they are to do it before they are sworn; and if no Challenge hinder, the Jury are commanded to look on the Prisoners, and then severally twelve of them, (a) neither more nor less, are sworn.[160]

Altho' there be twenty Prisoners at the Bar for several Felonies, and the Oath is general to try between the King and the Prisoners at the Bar, yet the Jury is to inquire of no (b) more than what they are particularly charged with; and therefore tho' twenty have pleaded, and stand at the Bar when the Jury is sworn, yet the Court may stay any Number of the Prisoners, and so the Jury stand charged with no more than what are thus particularly charged upon them; and when they go from the Bar, and have brought in their Verdict couching these Particulars charged upon them, then if the same Jury pass upon the remaining Prisoners, yet they are to be called over again, the Prisoners reminded of their Challenges, and the Jury sworn de novo upon the Trial of the Rest of the Prisoners.[161]

(G) HOW TO BE KEPT AND DISCHARGED.

WHEN the Jurors depart from the Bar (a) a Bailiff ought to be sworn to keep them together, and not to suffer any to speak with them.[162]

After their Departure they may desire to hear one of the Witnesses again, and it shall be granted, so he deliver his Testimony in (b) open Court; and also they may desire to propound Questions to the Court, for their Satisfaction, and it shall be granted, so it be in open Court.[163]

The Jury must be kept together without Meat, Drink, Fire or Candle, till they are agreed.[164]

So in an inferior Court, if the Jury will not agree on their Verdict, the way is, as in other Courts, to keep them without Meat, Drink, Fire or Candle, till they agree; and the Steward may from Time to Time adjourn the Court till such Agreement.[165]

If they agree not before the Departure of the Justices of Gaol-Delivery into another County, the Sheriff must send them along in Carts, and the Judge may take and record their Verdict in a foreign County.[166]

If there be eleven agreed, and but one dissenting, who says he will rather die in Prison, yet the Verdict shall not be taken by eleven, no nor yet the Refuser fined or imprisoned; and therefore where such a Verdict was taken by eleven, and the twelfth fined and imprisoned, it was, upon great Advice, ruled the Verdict was void, and the twelfth Man delivered, and a new Venire awarded; for Men are not forced to give their Verdict against their Judgment.[167]

If the Jury say they are agreed, the Court may examine them by Poll; and if in Truth they are not agreed, they are fineable.[168]

It seems to have been anciently an uncontroverted Rule, and hath been allowed even by those of the contrary Opinion, to have been the general Tradition of the Law, that a Jury sworn and charged in a Capital Case cannot be discharged, (without the Prisoner’s Consent) till they have given a Verdict; and notwithstanding some Authorities to the contrary in the Reign of King Charles the Second, this hath been holden for clear Law, both in the Reign of King James the Second, and since the Revolution.[169]

(H) IN WHAT CASES AND IN WHAT MANNER TO HAVE A VIEW.

AT Common Law, in (a) most Real Actions, after the Demandant had counted, the Tenant might have demanded the (b) View of the Land; or if it were a Rent, or other Thing, View of the Land out of which it issued; and this was, that Things might be reduced to a greater Certainty; but because this was used often by the Tenant for Delay, and thereby the Demandant greatly prejudiced,[170]

By (b) [sic] Westm. 2. cap. 48. it is ordained and provided, 'That from thenceforth View shall not be granted but in case when View of Land is necessary; and if one lose Land by Default, and he that loseth moveth a Writ to demand the same Land, and in case when one by an Exception dilatory abateth a Writ after View of the Land, as by Nontenure, or Misnaming of the Town, or such like, if he purchase another Writ, in this Case, and in the Case beforementioned, from henceforth, the View shall not be granted, if he had View in the first Writ; in a Writ of Dower, where the Dower in Demand is of Land, that the Husband aliened to the Tenant, or his Ancestors, where the Tenant ought not to be ignorant what Land the Husband did alien to him or his Ancestor, tho' the Husband died not seised, yet from henceforth View shall not be granted to the Tenant. In a Writ of Entry also that is abated, because the Demandant misnamed the Entry; if the Demandant purchase another Writ of Entry, if the Tenant had View in the first Writ, he shall not have it in the second. In all Writs also where Lands be demanded, by reason of a Lease made by the Demandant, or his Ancestor, unto the Tenant, and not to his Ancestor; as that which he leased to him, being within Age, not whole of Mind, being in Prison, and such like, View shall not be granted hereafter; but if the Demise were made to his Ancestor, the View shall lie as it hath done before.'

Since this Statute, the Demandant, as to any of the Cases within the Statute, may counterplead the View, i. e. alledge Matter in Pleading which ousts him of View; as where he that loseth Land by Default brings a Quod ei deforciat for the Recovery of it, the Tenant shall not have View, because he is well enough ascertained of the Land by the former Record; so where View was had in a former Writ, and that Writ was abated after View for some Mistake that appeared upon the View, as Nontenure, Misnaming of the Town; so in Dower, when it is brought against the same Tenant that purchased the Land of the Husband; so if the Husband died seised, it is a good (c) Counterplea of View in Dower.[171]

In an Action of Waste, in which it was agreed, that a View should have been awarded, and that six at (d) least, of the Jurors should have viewed the Place, it was resolved, that if a View be awarded, tho' not returned by the Officer, and the Trial goes on, and a Verdict had, that the Omission of the Officer in not Returning the View is not Error; for it was the Duty of the Court to examine whether the Jury had a View or not; and if they found they had not, the Trial ought to have been stayed.[172]

So in an Assise in which it was likewise agreed, that a View was requisite in the same Manner, if the Officer does not return the View, it is not Error; for the Words of the Writ are, & interim videant, and not & interim haberi fac' Visum ; so that the Jurors might have had the View when the Officer was not present; and if it were otherwise, the Party might have challenged the Jury for this Cause; and tho' the Officer had returned, that the Jurors had had the View, yet if upon Examination in Court it appeared otherwise, the Parties could not be concluded by such Return.[173]

If the Court make a Rule, that the Jury shall have a View, and that they shall not hear any Evidence thereupon, and they notwithstanding hear Evidence, this is a good Cause of Challenge, and likewise a Misdemeanor, for which, it is said, they may be punished by the Court.[174]

In an Action of Waste it was agreed; 1. That if six of the Jury are examined on a Voir dire, if they have seen the Place wasted, that it is sufficient, and the rest of the Jury need not be examined upon a Voir dire, but only to the Principal. 2. It was agreed, if the Jury be sworn that they know the Place, it is sufficient, altho' they be not sworn that they saw it ; and altho' that the Place wasted be shewed to the Jury by the Plaintiff's Servants, yet if it be by Command of the Sheriff, it is as sufficient as if the same had been shewn them by the Sheriff himself.[175]

At the Trial of a Cause, for Want of a full Jury upon the principal Panel, some Talesmen were sworn, and had the View, but the Distringas was returnable as an original Distringas, and so many of the original panel left out who were not at the View; of which the Defendant complained; and would have set aside the Trial for Irregularity; but because no Venire appeared to the Court, and the Matter stood upon Record as an original Trial, and the Want of a Venire was helped by Verdict, and because the Cause was tried by those that were fittest, viz. those who had the View, the Court would do nothing in it.[176]

But it was ordered, that for the future, when in order to a View the last Juror is (a) withdrawn, the Plaintiff shall take out a new Distringas, amoto the last Man of the Panel, to distrain the other twenty-three, with an Apponas etiam decem Tales.[177]

It is said, that before the Court makes a Rule for a View, the Venire Facias must be (b) returned; and then the Court may make a Rule, that so many of the Panel shall view the Premisses.[178]

A View is grantable in such Cases where the Title is in Question; and in such Cases it may be granted on Motion, on a bare Suggestion, without any Affidavit.[179]

And to this Purpose it is Enacted by 4 & 5 Annae, cap. 16. ‘That in any Actions brought in any of her Majesty’s Courts of Record in Westminster, where it shall appear to the Courts in which such Actions are depending, that it will be proper and necessary that the Jurors who are to try the Issues in any such Actions should have the View of the Messuages, Lands, or Place in Question, in order to their better understanding the Evidence that will be given on the Trial of such Issues, in every such Case, the respective Courts in which such Actions shall be depending may order special Writs of Distringas or Habeas Corpora to issue, by which the Sheriff, or such other Officer, to whom the said Writs shall be directed, shall be commanded to have six out of the first twelve of the Jurors named in such Writs, or some greater Number of them, at the Place in Question, some convenient Time before the Trial, who then and there shall have the Matters in Question shewn to them by two Persons in the said Writs named, to be appointed by the Court, and the said Sheriff, or other Officer who is to execute the said Writs, shall, by a special Return on the same, certify that the View hath been had according to the Command of the said Writs.’

And by the 3 Georg. 2. cap. 25. a Provision is made for a View, in the following Words; ‘That where a View shall be allowed in any Cause, that in such Case six of the Jurors named in such Panel, or more, who shall be mutually consented to by the Parties or their Agents on both Sides, or, if they cannot agree, shall be named by the proper Officer of the respective Courts of King’s Bench, Common Pleas, or Exchequer at Westminster, or the Grand Sessions in Wales, and the Counties Palatine, for the Causes in their respective Courts, or, if Need be, by a Judge of the respective Courts where the Cause is depending, or by the Judge or Judges before whom the Cause shall be brought on to Trial respectively, shall have the View, and shall be first sworn, or such of them as appear upon the Jury, to try the said Cause, before any Drawing as aforesaid; and so many only shall be drawn, to be added to the Viewers who appear, as shall, after all Defaulters and Challenges allowed, make up the Number of twelve to be sworn for the Trial of such Cause.’

(I) WHAT IRREGULARITIES AND DEFECTS IN CONVENING, OR IN THE QUALIFICATIONS OF THE JURORS ARE AMENDABLE, AND AIDED AFTER VERDICT.

HERE we may lay it down in general, that by the express Words and Intent of the several Statutes of Jeofail and Amendments all Irregularities as to the Number, Qualifications, and Returns of the Jurors are aided after Verdict, so that the Venire be of the same Place, and in the same Action, and between the same Parties.[180]

So if there be no Venire Facias, or if there be such a Fault in the Venire as makes it a perfect Nullity, so that it has no Relation to the Cause, yet if there be a good Distringas, that being one of the Jury Process, the Omission of the former is cured ; for the Omission of any judicial Writ is aided by the Statutes, and a Venire, that is a Nullity, and has no Relation to the Cause, is as if there had not been any, and so of a Distringas where there is a proper Venire.[181]

So if the Award of a Venire Facias upon the Roll be well, and the Writ of Venire Facias wrong, yet this shall be amended by the Roll, being the (a) Warrant of the Writ, which is the Act of the Court, and the Default is only the Mistake of the Clerk.[182]

So if the Writ of Venire Facias out of the King's Bench be Venire Facias 12 Liberos & Legales Homines coram nobis apud Westmonasterium ubicunque fuerimus in Anglia; but the Roll is well, (the Words apud Westmonasterium being omitted therein,) this being in B. R. the Writ shall be amended by the Roll; for this is but Matter of Form.[183]

If the Return of the Venire be mistaken, this may be amended by the Roll, and if the Teste of the Venire be out of Term, or before Plea pleaded, it is no Error; for the Teste of Judicial Writs being only Matter of Form, if mistaken, shall not vitiate, since they have the proper Judges of the Fact by such Process.[184]

Therefore if a Venire Facias be dated 7 July, and made returnable 6 July, a Day before the Date of the Writ, this after Verdict is amendable, because a Judicial Process, and the Default of the Clerk.[185]

So if a Venire Facias be awarded upon the Roll, to be returned Octabis Trinitatis, and the Writ is made returnable six Days after, scilicet, a Day out of Term, but the Distringas is well without any Fault, and after the Jury impanelled find for the Plaintiff, this Writ of Venire Facias shall be amended by the Roll; for this was the Default of the Clerk only; for the Roll is the Warrant of the Writ.[186]

The Award of the Venire must be to a Day in the same Term, or to the next Term, but it must be in Term, otherwise it is erroneous; because this is not such (b) a Discontinuance as is aided by the Statute, since it is an Error in the Court by awarding the Process, which makes it utterly incertain when or where the Parties should appear to receive Judgment, and it is an Act of the Court, which is erroneous, and not a Mis-entry of the Clerk, which the Statutes do not intend to aid.[187]

If the Place be totally (c) misawarded, this is not helped by any Statute, because they have not the proper Judices Facti, unless they have them from the Place where the Fact arises; but if it is only misawarded in Part, this is helped by the express Words of (d) 21 Jac. 1. cap. 13. because it is supposed that the Persons that were near any Part of the Place might know the Fact in Issue between the Parties; and by the Statute of (e) 16 & 17 Car. 2. cap. 8. the Want of a right Venue is aided, so as the Trial was by a Jury of the proper County or Place where the Action is laid.

If there be a Blank left for the County to the Sheriff whereof the Writ should be awarded, yet it will be amended, because it cannot be awarded to the Sheriff of any other County, and therefore it is the Omission of the Officer in entering the Award of the Court; but if there were a local Plea into another County, so that there are two Counties mentioned in the Pleadings, there the Blank cannot be amended, because there is originally no Award of the Court to whom the Process shall go; but where the Plea carries the Matter into another County, there the Venire must be from the last Place, because the Declaration by such Plea stands confessed.[188]

After Issue joined, if upon the Roll a Venire Facias be awarded to the Sheriff of the County of Somerset, &c. and upon this a Venire Facias is made in this Manner, Carolus Dei Gratia Somerset salutem, &c. leaving out the Word (Vicecomiti); and upon this the Sheriff of Somerset returns a Jury, and upon this a Verdict, &c. this shall be amended by the Roll, because this was the Fault of the Clerk meerly, having the Roll before him when he made the Writ, by which he was directed to direct the Writ to the Sheriff of Somerset.[189]

If the Court on an insufficient Suggestion awards the Process to an improper Officer, yet this is aided after Verdict; for that only makes an Insufficiency in the Return of the Jury, and insufficient Returns are aided; for it was the Design of the (a) Statute, that if the Cause was tried by a right Jury, that it should not be material what Officer got them together.

But if on a Suggestion on the Roll Process be awarded to the Coroner, and the Sheriff returns either the Panel or Tales, it is said to be erroneous, because not collected by the proper Officer, and therefore they are not the Judices Facti of that Cause, and it appears on the Record that the Return is otherwise than the Court hath directed.[190]

But the latest Resolution is, that the Returns of Ministerial Officers are to be challenged at the Day of the Return; for if the Court then admits them to be their Officers, and the Parties do not except against them, they are concluded, since the proper Judices Facti are admitted by them to be returned.[191]

If a Venire is awarded to the Coroners, and returned by two of them only, whereas at the Time of the Award and Return thereof there were two more, this is only a Misreturn, and aided.[192]

But it is said, that if one Sheriff of (b) London makes a Return without the other, this is not helped, being no Return at all; for they make but one Officer, and the Court knows that one Sheriff there is two Persons.

If upon the Return of the Habeas Corpora the Surname of the Sheriff be omitted, as where his Name is Bartholomaeus Michel, and it is returned Bartholomaeus Miles, Sheriff, this shall be amended.[193]

It was held, that if before the Statute of 21 Jac. 1. cap. 13. the Sheriff did not return the Writ of Venire, nor set his Name on the Back thereof, or omitted inserting quod Executio istius Brevis patet in quodam Panello huic Brevi annexo, but it was album Breve, it could not be amended upon Examination of the Sheriff, being the (c) principal Process; but this is now helped by that Statute, so that a Panel of the Jurors be returned and annexed to the Writ.

If the Sheriff that returns his Venire be discharged before the Teste of the Venire, it is Error, and shall be tried by the Record of his Discharge; because if the legal Officer did not return the Writ, the proper Judices Facti did not try the Cause, and so the Verdict is ill.[194]

But if he be Sheriff at the Time of the Award of the Venire, and after his Discharge he returns the Panel to the Venire, this is no (a) principal Cause of Challenge; for the Sheriff having returned the Nomina Jurat' to the Court above on the Venire, on which they have awarded a Distringas with a Nisi Prius, the Sufficiency of that Return is not to be controverted before the Judge of Nisi Prius, but above, since the Judges of Nisi Prius are bound down by a Record of a superior Court, on whose Records it appears he is Sheriff.[195]

The Jury must come in the same Action, and between the same Parties, otherwise they are not Judges in that Cause; therefore in Ejectment where the Venire was de Placito Transgressionis, omitting & Ejection' firmae, the Court held the Venire to be ill, because it was not in the same Action; for an Action of Trespass and Ejectment are different, and there might be an Action of Trespass between the same Parties; but if the Distringas had been right, they would have adjudged this Venire to be null, and the Want of a Venire is aided by the Statute.[196]

If in an Action of Trespass Issue is joined between the Plaintiff and two Defendants, and one dies, and the Venire is awarded between the Plaintiff and both Defendants after such Defendant's Death, and Verdict is taken for the Plaintiff, and the Death suggested on the Roll, and Judgment against the Survivor, the Venire being only a Judicial Process, and pursuing the Award on the Roll, it plainly appears to be the same Cause, and that the Trial was had by proper Judges, and Judgment being given against the Defendant, who is charged with the whole Action, is good.[197]

If the Jurata mentions the Issue to be de Placito Transgressionis, where the Action is Debt, and the Award of the Venire and Distringas Debt, this shall be amended; for the Jurata is an Award of the Distringas, in Pursuance of the Award of the Venire, and the Venire being right, the (b) secondary Process ought to be made accordingly, and there is a sufficient Authority by the Writ of Distringas for the Judge of Assise to try the Cause[198].

So if the Sheriff return Nomina Jurat' inter Partes praedict' de Placito Transgressionis, where the Venire is de Placito Debit', this shall be amended; for in Dorso Brevis he says, Executio istius Brevis patet, &c. which could not be, if it was not in the same Action.[199]

If the Day when, and Place where the Assise was to be held, is not mentioned in the Distringas, it shall be amended by the Roll; for if there had been no Distringas, the Trial had been good, because the Jurata is the Warrant to try the Cause, and that was right.[200]

In Ejectment against seven Defendants, who entered into the common Rule, and pleaded to Issue, the Plea Roll, Venire, Distringas, and Jurata were right, but the Issue on the Nisi Prius Roll was between the Plaintiff and five Defendants only; after Verdict for the Plaintiff this was amended; for the Lessor's Title was the Gift of the Action, and the only Thing inquirable of by the Jury.[201]

If the (a) Number or (b) Qualifications of the Jury, as has been said, be omitted, it may be amended; for it is but Form to award the particular Number and Qualifications in each Roll, which is directed by the Law in all Cases.

The Nomina Juratorum on the Venire are the proper Parties to try the Action; and if there be a Mistake in the (c) Christian Name, it is incurable; for the Statute does not extend to it, but it extends to cure Surnames and Additions; for there can be but one Name of Baptism, but there may be various Surnames and Additions; and therefore if it can be proved what Person the Sheriff meant by his Surname or Addition, it may be amended and set right.

Also if the Names of either Christian or Surname be wrong in the Body of the Distringas, or in the Panel returned, or in the Panel of the Jury sworn, yet if it can be proved to be the same Man that was intended to be returned in the Venire, having there his right Christian Name, he is the proper Judex Facti, and it may be amended by the Statute[202].

As if Tippett be returned in the Venire Facias, and in the Habeas Corpora and Distringas Juratores he is named Typper, yet if his true Name be Tippett according to the Venire Facias, and Tippet is sworn, and tries the Issue, it shall be amended.[203]

If the Sheriff returns but twenty-three on the Venire, and twenty-four on the Habeas Corpora, and the twenty-fourth omitted on the Venire appears, and is sworn, the Verdict is ill, because he is not returned according to the Award of the Court, in Pursuance of the Venire, and therefore has no Authority to try the Cause; for the Award to distrain one not summoned is void, and he is not returned of the Tales de Circumstantibus, so that he is not a proper Juror by the Writ nor Statute.[204]

So if twenty-five are returned, and the twenty-fifth is sworn, and tries the Cause, it is not helped.[205]

But if the twenty-fourth Man had not been of the twelve that tried the Issue, it would be aided by the Statute; or if the Trial had been by eleven of the twenty-three, and one of the Tales de Circumstantibus, it had been good.[206]

(K) WHAT IRREGULARITIES OR DEFECTS IN CONVENING, OR IN THE QUALIFICATIONS OF THE JURORS, ARE AIDED BY CONSENT.

HERE we may lay it down as a general Rule, that all Defects in convening, or in the Qualifications of the Jurors, are aided by Consent of the Parties; for the Rule herein is, that omnis Consensus tollit Errorem.[207]

Therefore if a Venire Facias be awarded to the Coroners, where it ought to be to the Sheriff, or the Visne cometh out of a wrong Place, if it be per Assensum Partium, and so entered of Record, it will stand good.[208]

One of the Jury, after he had been sworn, and after he had heard Part of the Evidence, fell sick, and another being sworn in his Place by Consent of Plaintiff and Defendant, it was held a good Verdict.

(M) FOR WHAT MISDEMEANORS PUNISHABLE: And herein,

1. WHERE PUNISHABLE BY ATTAINT.

THE Jury when impanelled judged under the Penalty of an Attaint by the old Law, which was the only Curb they had over Juries; but this Method, from the Difficulty of attainting the Jury, and Severity of the Punishment, has been seldom used of late, and the Practice of granting new Trials, where the Jury find against Evidence and the Direction of the Court, introduced in the Room thereof; but since the Attaint is only disused, and not taken away, we shall here set down the most considerable Matters relating thereto.[209]

But herein, first, we must observe, that the Judgment in Attaint being so severe, all manner of Evidence was admitted in Support of the Verdict; but against the Verdict they admitted none that was not given at the former Trial; because the Jury might give in their Verdict, not only on the Evidence given in Court, but on their own Knowledge; and therefore (a) whatever otherwise they came to the Knowledge of, they might give in Evidence for the Support of their Verdict; but the Evidence not offered on the Trial can never be brought against them, because such Evidence might have altered their Judgment, had it been given; and the Want of that Light, which the Party neglected to offer, cannot convict them of a Falsity, which, if it had been offered, might have founded a different Verdict.[210]

The Jury may be attainted two Ways; 1 st, Where they find contrary to Evidence. 2*dly*, When they find out of the Compass of the Allegata: But to attaint them for finding contrary to Evidence is not so easy, because they may have Evidence of their own Conuzance of the Matter before them, or they may find on (b) Distrust of the Witnesses, on their (c) own proper Knowledge.[211]

But if they find upon Evidence that does not prove the Allegata, there it is easy to subject them to an Attaint, because it is manifest that what is so found is on Evidence not corresponding to their Issue; and hence it is necessary that the Matters in Issue should be set forth with all convenient Certainty, that it may be seen how far and when the Jury are mistaken; as in

Trespass, the Quantity and Value of the Thing demanded must be so conveniently described, that if the Jury find Damages beyond such Quantity and Value, it may be apparently excessive, and they subject to the Attaint; and so on special Contracts they must be set forth so precisely, that if Evidence be given of another Contract, and not that in the Allegations, and yet the Jury find for the Plaintiff, they may be subject to an Attaint.[212]

An Attaint does not lie in a Criminal Case, as it does in a Civil; and the Reason of the Difference, according to Hawkins, is, that in the last Case a Man's Property only is brought into Question a second Time, and not his Liberty or Life; also, says he, it may be generally presumed that a Jury is likely to be equally influenced with the Fear of an Attaint from either of the contending Parties; whereas if any such Examinations of their Proceedings were allowed in Criminal Causes, they might be often in great Danger of one Side, by incurring the Resentment of a powerful Prosecutor, and provoking him to call their Conduct in Question, for their supposed Partiality; but they could have little to fear from an injured Criminal, who would seldom be in Circumstances to make his Prosecution formidable.[213]

Where the King is sole Party against the Subject, and the Jury find for the King, no Attaint lies; but it is otherwise where the Suit is tam pro Domino Rege quam pro seipso.[214]

No Attaint lies upon an Inquest of Office; therefore if a Recovery be in a Quare Impedit by Default, and a Writ issues to the Sheriff to (a) inquire of the Damages and Plenarty, no Attaint lies upon this Inquest; for it is but an Inquest of Office.

But if the Inquiry be by the same Inquest that inquired of the Issue in the Quare Impedit, an Attaint lies.[215]

So in an Assise, if they are at Issue upon the Plea in Bar, and that is found for the Plaintiff, and it is inquired over of the Seisin and Disseisin, if the Disseisin be found by a false Verdict, an Attaint lies thereupon.[216]

In an Action against Tenant in Tail, if he makes Default, and he in the Reversion prays to be received, supposing him to be Tenant for Life, which is counterpleaded, upon which they are at Issue, and it is found against him in Reversion, and the same Inquest taxes the Damages against the Lessee, no Attaint lies upon this Verdict; because the Judgment against the Lessee is given upon the Default; and so this is but an Inquest of Office for the Damages.

An Attaint lies upon a Verdict before the Sheriff in a Writ of Inquiry of Waste, because by the Statute the Sheriff is made Judge in this Case.[217]

No Attaint lies upon a Verdict given by twenty-four Jurors, nor does it lie upon a Verdict given in an Attaint for the Thing of which the Jury is attainted; but if they find any collateral Matter praeter the Attaint, it lies thereupon, and they shall be attainted.[218]

In a Writ of (b) Right, if the Grand Assise be taken upon the meer Right, no Attaint lies thereupon; but if the Issue be taken upon a collateral Matter, and not upon the meer Right, an Attaint lies thereof.[219]

If a Deed with Witnesses be pleaded, and the Inquest passes in the Affirmative, no Attaint lies thereof; because the Witnesses have adjudged this to be true; but otherwise it is if it passes in the Negative, and Disaffirmance of the Deed; (c) for the Witnesses ought to testify nothing but what they see or hear.[220]

In an Assise, if the Jury find a Special Verdict, and refer it to the Court, whether upon the Matter the Tenant be a Disseisor, and upon the Matter the Court adjudge him to be a Disseisor, tho' in Law he be no Disseisor, yet no Attaint lies against the Jury, (a) because it is not their Fault, but the Fault of the Court.[221]

An Attaint lies before Execution sued, for the Danger of the Death of the Petit Jury in the mean Time; for after the Death of any of the Petit Jury, no Attaint lies.[222]

An Attaint lies for excessive Damages, as also where the Jury give too little; but if the Jury give excessive Damages, and the Court abridge them, and make them reasonable, no Attaint lies against the Jury, tho' they have made a false Oath; for such Abridgment is made upon the Prayer of the Party, and therefore he shall not have an Attaint also.[223]

So if the Court increases the Damages, and makes them reasonable, whereas before they were too small, no Attaint lies.[224]

So if the Jury give excessive Damages, and after the Plaintiff, to whom they are given, releases Part of the Damages, by which the Rest of the Damages which remain are reasonable enough, no Attaint lies; for hereby the Defendant's Cause of Grievance is taken away.[225]

In an Attaint, if the Plaintiff assigns the false Oath in excessive Damages, he ought to assign it in this Manner, scilicet, that the Goods for which the Damages were given were but of the Value of 40 s. and that in the Damages given over this Sum they made a false Oath.[226]

If in Trespass against two one pleads Not guilty, and this found against him, and excessive Damages given, and after the other Defendant comes and pleads Not guilty, and this is found against him also, he may have an

Attaint upon the first Verdict, because bound by the Damages given thereby; and tho' he is a Stranger to the Issue, yet he is privy in Charge.[227]

In a Quare Impedit against two, they make several Titles; and it is found for one Defendant, and that the other disturbed him, the other may have an Attaint upon this; for by this he loses the Presentation.[228]

He who is Party to the Recovery shall have an Attaint, altho' he was not Tenant at the Time of the first Writ brought, nor when the Judgment was given.[229]

If an Action of Joint-tenancy be pleaded with a Stranger, and the Stranger joins with the Tenant in the Maintenance thereof, and this is found against them, yet the Stranger shall not have an Attaint, because he is not Party to the Writ.[230]

So in an Action against A. and B. if it is found against them upon several Issues, A. shall not have an Attaint upon a false Verdict against B. because he was not Party to this Issue.[231]

So in Trespass against two, if one pleads a Release, upon which they are at Issue, and the other pleads the same Plea as Servant to him, if it be found against the Master, the Servant shall not have an Attaint thereupon, for he is not Party to his Issue.[232]

So in Waste against two, if one makes Default, and the other pleads, and it is found against him, the other who made Default shall not have an Attaint thereupon, because he is not Party to the Issue.[233]

If a Villein, be found free in a Homine Replegiando against the Lord, and after the Lord dies, the Heir shall have an Attaint; so if the Villein were found free by a false Verdict, in an Action of Trespass brought by him against the Lord, and after the Lord dies, his Heir shall have an Attaint, because hereby he loses his Inheritance in the Villein; but he cannot have an Attaint for the Damages, but the Executors may, because they belong to them.[234]

The Petit Jury can plead no Plea but such as may excuse them of the false Oath; and by the 23 H. 8. cap. 3. it is enacted, that after the Plaintiff hath assigned the false Oath, the Petit Jury, if they be the same Persons, and the Writ, Process, Return and Assignment good, shall have no Answer, but only that they made a true Oath; unless the Plaintiff, in an Attaint upon the same Verdict, hath before Nonsuit discontinued, or had Judgment against the Petit Jury.[235]

In an Attaint upon a Verdict in Trespass, one of the Petit Jury pleaded an Award between the Plaintiff and Defendant, and whether this was a good

Plea dubitatur. Kelw. 130.[236]

In an Attaint brought by the Issue in Tail, upon a Verdict in a Formedon against his Ancestor, the Release of the Ancestor is not any Bar, for the Attaint is intailed as well as the Land itself.[237]

By the 23 H. 8. cap. 3. all Attaints must be taken (a) in the King's Bench or Common Pleas, and not elsewhere; but a Nisi Prius may be granted.

The Judgment at Common Law was very (b) severe; and, according to my Lord Coke, importeth eight great and grievous Punishments; 1. Quod amittant Liberam Legem imperpetuum; that is, he shall be so infamous as never to be received as a Witness, or to be of any Jury. 2. Quod forisfaciant omnia bona & Catalla sua. 3. Quod terrae & Tenementa in manus Domini Regis Capiantur. 4. Quod uxores & Liberi extra Domus suas ejicerentur. 5. Quod Domus suae Prostrentur. 6. Quod arbores suae extirpentur. 7. Quod Prata sua arentur. 8. Quod Corpora sua Carceri mancipentur.[238]

But the Severity of this Punishment was mitigated by the Statute 23 H. 8. cap. 3. which prescribes the Methods of Proceeding in Attaint, and inflicts certain Pecuniary Punishments on the Jurors, in Proportion to the Damages sustained by the Party by the false Verdict, in which the (c) Party recovering is to be joined.[239]

If a Man recover in an Attaint, he shall be (d) restored to all that he hath lost by the Verdict, as well his Lands as the Mesne Profits; as also his Damage, if he lost in a Personal Action.[240]

So if a Man brings Debt and is barred, and he brings an Attaint, and it is found for him, he shall recover his Debt.[241]

So if the Issue in Tail recovers the Land in an Attaint upon a Recovery against his Ancestor, he shall recover the Issues of the Land from the Death of the Ancestor.[242]

2. HOW OTHERWISE PUNISHABLE.

And herein we must consider Jurors either in a Ministerial Capacity, as Persons bound to attend the Court, to do the Business for which they are returned till they are discharged; or in a Judicial Capacity, as Judges of the Fact to be tried.

In the former Capacity they are liable to be punished in several Instances; as for refusing to appear, withdrawing themselves before they are sworn, or refusing to be sworn; for which every Court of Record may, of common Right, impose such a reasonable Fine on any one returned on a Grand or Petit Jury, as shall seem convenient.[243]

So if after they are sworn they refuse to give any Verdict at all[244].

So if they endeavour to impose upon the Court; as where a Petit Jury offer a Verdict to the Court as agreed by their whole Number, where in Truth some of them have not agreed to it, or where they agree upon two Verdicts; and first, to offer one of them to the Court, and to stand to it, if the Court shall express no Dissatisfaction to it; but if the Court shall dislike it, then to give the other.

So for misbehaving themselves after their Departure from the Bar; as where they do not all keep together till they have given their Verdict, or where any of them carry any Thing [(a)] eatable with them in their Pockets, or eat or drink, or otherwise refresh themselves, without Leave from the Court, before they have given their Verdict, tho' they were agreed on it, and were also all the Time in the Custody of the Bailiff appointed to take care of them.[245]

Also where a Jury, after they departed from the Bar, being late on Saturday Night, separated and went every one to his own House without giving a privy Verdict, or without consulting upon the Evidence, and gave a Verdict according to the Direction of the Court; but for this Misdemeanor they were fined each forty Shillings, and a new Trial granted; and herein the Chief Justice said, that by such Trial both Parties may be prejudiced; for the Jurors going at large, without consulting together, may well forget the Evidence; and it is the Right of the King's Subjects to have their Issues determined when the Evidence is fresh in the Memory of the Jurors; and the suffering the Jurors to go to their Houses after a privy Verdict is only by Connivance, but by the strict Rules of Law ought not to be suffered.[246]

Also where the Jury have been divided, or in Doubt, about the Evidence, and have agreed to determine the Matter by throwing Cross or Pile, &c. and to give their Verdict as the Chance happened; this has been held such a Misdemeanor, for which they have been ordered to attend, and for which they are punishable, and for which a new Trial will be granted on the common Rule of Juratores male se gesserunt.[247]

Jurors are likewise punishable for sending for or receiving Instructions from either of the Parties concerning the Matter in Question[248].

So if a Juryman have a Piece of Evidence in his Pocket, and after the Jury sworn and gone together he (a) sheweth it to them, this is a Misdemeanor finable in the Jury; but it avoids not the Verdict, tho' the Case appear upon Examination.[249]

As to the Punishment of Jurors in their Judicial Capacity, there are several Instances where Jurors acquitting great and notorious Offenders, contrary to clear and manifest Evidence, and contrary to the Judge's Directions, have been punished in the StarChamber, and have also, not only in the King's Bench, but also by Justices of Oyer and Terminer and Gaol-Delivery, been fined and imprisoned, and bound over to their good Behaviour; but these Methods were thought to be contrary to the Opinions in the old Books, and contrary to the general Reason of the Law; and being fully considered in (a) Bushel's Case, it was there settled, and hath been ever since agreed to, that Jurors are no way punishable, except by Attaint, for giving a Verdict contrary to a Judge's Directions, and against what may seem to others clear and manifest Evidence, for that they are the proper Judges of the Fact to be tried, and may be reasonably influenced by Matters known only to themselves; as their own Personal Knowledge of the Fact, or of the Credit of the Witnesses, or of the Parties.[250]

And herewith my Lord Hale seems to agree, and shews the Unreasonableness of punishing a Jury for going contrary to the Direction of the Court in Matters of Law, because it is impossible any Matter of Law could come in Question till the Matter of Fact were settled and stated and agreed by the Jury, and of such Matter of Fact they were the only competent Judges; also, says he, it were the most unhappy Case that could be to the Judge, if he, at his Peril, must take upon him the Guilt or Innocence of the Prisoner; and if the Judge's Opinion must rule the Matter of Fact, the Trial by a Jury would be useless.[251]

But he seems to admit, that the long Use of fining Jurors in the King's Bench in Criminal Causes, may give possibly a Jurisdiction to fine in these Cases, yet that it can by no Means be extended to other Courts of Sessions, of Gaol-Delivery, Oyer and Terminer, or of the Peace, or other inferior Jurisdictions.[252]

Also by Hawkins, if it shall plainly appear in any Case, that Jurors are perfectly satisfied of the Truth of a Fact, whereupon they declare to the Court, that they find it in such a particular Manner; and the Court directly tell them, that upon the Fact so found, as they have agreed it to be, the Judgment of the Law is such or such, and therefore that they ought to give a Verdict accordingly, yet they obstinately insist upon a Verdict contrary to such a Direction; it seems agreeable to the general Reason of the Law, that the Jurors are finable by the Court in such a Case, unless an Attaint lies against them; for otherwise they would not be punishable for so palpable a Partiality in taking upon them to judge of Matters of Law, which they have nothing to do with, and are presumed to be ignorant of, contrary to the express Direction of one, who by the Law is appointed to direct them in such Matters, and is to be presumed of Ability to do it.[253]

Also if a Judge, for the better Direction and Information of a Jury, shall ask them their Opinions concerning such a particular Fact, and they shall refuse to answer him, and obstinately insist to deliver in their Verdict, as they think fit, contrary to his Direction, it seems questionable whether they may not be fined in such a Case also, unless an Attaint lie against them; for that it is the Duty of Jurors to take the Advice and Information of the Court, in order to be governed by it, as far as shall be consistent with their Consciences.[254]

3. HOW ABUSES BY OTHERS IN RELATION TO THEM ARE PUNISHABLE; AND THEREIN OF THE OFFENCE OF EMBRACERY.

Embracery is defined in general to be any Attempt by either Party; or a Stranger, to corrupt or influence a Jury, or to incline them to favour one Side by Gifts or Promises, Threats or Persuasions, or by instructing them in the Cause, or any other way, except by opening and enforcing the Evidence by Council at the Trial, whether the Jurors give any Verdict or not, and whether the Verdict be true or false.[255]

Also it is an Offence of this Kind for a Stranger barely to labour a Juror to appear and act according to his Conscience, or for any Person to labour a Juror not to appear; but it is no Offence for the Party himself, or for any Person, who can justify an act of Maintenance, to labour a Juror to appear and give a Verdict according to his Conscience.[256]

Also it is an Offence to give Money to a Juror after the Verdict, unless it be openly and fairly given to all alike, in Consideration of the Expences of their Journey and Trouble of their Attendance.[257]

So the bare giving of Money to another, to be distributed among Jurors, favours of Embracery, whether any of it be distributed or not; and it is an Offence of the like Kind for a Person, by indirect Means, to procure himself, or another, to be sworn of a Tales, in order to serve one Side; also it is as Criminal in a Juror, as in any other Person, to endeavour to prevail on his Companions to give a Verdict on one Side, by any other Arguments besides the Evidence produced, and the general Obligations of Conscience.[258]

The Offence of Embracery is punishable at (a) Common Law by Indictment or Action; and if it were not known before the Trial, it will be a good Cause to set aside the Verdict.[259]

Abuses by others, in Relation to Juries, are punishable by Fine and Imprisonment; as if a Man assault or threaten a Juror for having given a Verdict against him, he may be indicted as a Disturber of the Administration of Justice, and one who is guilty of a Contempt to the King's Courts.[260]

Also the Court of King's Bench granted an Information against a Town-Clerk, for publishing an Order of the Court against Jurors who had found a Person guilty of Manslaughter only, upon an Indictment of Murder, by which Order the said Jurors were declared to be justly suspected of Bribery.[261]

Jury, (from the Latin) signifies a certain Number of Men, who are sworn to make Inquiry of, and try the Matter of Fact in Dispute, and to declare the Truth upon such Evidence as shall be given them in a Cause. The Privilege of Trial by a Jury is said to be of great Antiquity it taking Place among the Britains as well as Saxons. Juries are not only used in the Circuits of our Judges, but also in other Courts, &c. as where a Coroner by Jury inquires of the Death of a Person; and the Justices of Peace, at their Quarter-Sessions, the Sheriff in the County Court, the Steward of a Court-Leet, or Court-Baron, &c. where they make Inquiry of any Offence, or decide any Controversy, they do it by a Jury. At the general Assises there are usually many Juries, on Account of the great Number of Causes both Civil and Criminal that are there to be tried, whereof one is termed the Grand Jury, and the rest are called Petit Juries, concerning whom it has been held there should be one for every Hundred. Lamb. Eiren. 384. The Juries anciently as well in the King's Bench as Common Pleas were twelve Knights, which we learn from Bracton and to make a Jury on a Writ of Right called the Grand Assise, there must be sixteen, thus made up, viz. four Knights and twelve others. A Grand Jury most commonly consists of twenty-four Men of greater Note and worth than those of the Petit Jury, and who are indifferently chosen out of the whole County by the Sheriff. A Petit Jury consisting of twelve Men impanelled in Criminal Cases, are called the Jury of Life and Death: Here the Grand Jury finds the Indictments against the Criminals; after which the Petit Jury convicts or acquits them by Verdict, in the giving of which all the twelve must agree. Finch 412. 3 Inst. 30.

JuryMen must be Freemen, indifferent, and not outlawed, or infamous; neither ought they to be Aliens, nor Men attainted of any Crime: And Infants, Persons seventy Years of Age, or upwards, Clergymen, Apothecaries, &c. are exempted from serving upon Juries. Likewise Barons, and all above them, are not to serve in any ordinary Jury. 3 Inst. 221. Our Common Law requires that Jurors shall be returned from the County wherein the Fact was done; and by 28 Ed. 1. c. 9. Jurors impanelled are to be the next Neighbours, and such as are most sufficient, and least suspicious; otherwise the Officer returning them is to forfeit double Damages. S. P. C. 154. The Qualification of a JuryMan for a County is 10 l. per Annum, either in Freehold or Copyhold Estate within the same County; Cities, Boroughs, and Corporate Towns, are excepted out of the Statutes. JuryMen that are summoned for not appearing, shall forfeit Issues, if they have no reasonable Excuse for their Defaults; the Issues to be forfeited are 5 s. on the first Writ, 10 s. upon the second, and upon the third 13 s. 4 d. by the 35 H. 8. But no Jury is obliged to appear at Westminster upon a Trial, where the Offence was committed thirty Miles off, except it be required by the King's Attorney General. 18 Eliz. c. 5. According to Usage, the Sheriff should return twenty-four Jurors, in Order to Speed the Trial in Case of Challenge, or Sickness, &c. and should he only return twelve, pursuant to the Writ, he is liable to be amerced. Jenk. Cent. 172. By 4 & 5 W. & M. No Sheriff, Bailiff, &c. under the Penalty of 10 l. shall return any Person to serve on a Jury, who has not been duly summoned six Days before the Day of Appearance; nor under the like Penalty, shall he accept of Money, or other Reward for excusing the Appearance of a JuryMan. Where a Trial relates to any Thing that concerns a Sheriff or UnderSheriff, the Jury must be returned by the Coroner. And in the King's Bench, the Process to bring in a Jury is called Distringas Juratores; and in the Common Pleas, it is Venire facias and Habeas Corpora Juratorum: Upon the Venire, the Sheriff returns the Jury in a Panel, or small Piece of Parchment which is annexed to the Writ; after which the Habeas Corpora issues for the bringing in of the Jury. In all Cases where, after Issue is joined, the suit is continued on the Roll, the Process from Time to Time must be continued against the Jurors. Lists of Jurors according to the Statutes 4 & 5 W. & M. & 7 & 8 W. 3. are now to be made from the Rates of each Parish, and fixed on the Doors of Churches, &c. twenty Days before Michaelmas, that publick Notice may be given of Persons omitted, who are qualified, for of Persons inserted that are not so: After which, the Lists being settled by the Justices of the Peace at the Quarter-Sessions, Duplicates are to be delivered to the Sheriffs by the Clerks of the Peace: And the Names contained in these Lists must be entered alphabetically by Sheriffs in a Book to be kept for that Purpose, together with their Additions, and places of Abode. The Sheriffs are liable to be fined for returning other Persons, or if they return Jurors, that have served two Years betore. Sheriffs, on the Return of Writs of Venire facias, are to annex a Panel of the Names of a competent Number of the Jurors mentioned in the Lists, not being less than forty-eight in any County, nor more than seventy-two, unless they are otherwise directed by the Judges, which Jurors shall be summoned to serve at the Assises, &c. The Names of the Persons impaneled shall be then wrote on several distinct Pieces of Paper of equal Size, and be delivered by the UnderSheriff to the Judge's Marshal, who causes them to be rolled up, all in the same Manner, and put together in a Box; and when any Cause is brought on to Trial, some indifferent Person is to draw out twelve of these Papers of Names, who, if not challenged, shall be the Jury to try the Cause; in Case any of them are challenged, and set aside, or do not appear, then a further Number is to be drawn 'till there is a full Jury; And Jurors neglecting to appear shall be fined in a Sum not exceeding 5 l. nor under 40 s. Jurors in London must not only be Housekeepers, but have Lands or Goods worth 100 l. and they may be examined on Oath as to that Point. 3 Geo. 2. c. 25. The Plaintiff and Defendant are both at Liberty to use their Endeavours for a JuryMan to appear; yet a Person who is not a Party to the Suit must not do it: In Case a JuryMan doth appear, but refuses to be sworn, or to give a Verdict, or if he endeavours to impose upon the Court, or is guilty of any Misbehaviour after his Departure from the Bar, he may be fined, and Attachment shall issue against him. 2 Hawk. 145. When a JuryMan is sworn, he must not depart from the Bar upon any Account whatsoever, until the Evidence is given, without Leave of the Court; and if that be obtained, he must have a Keeper with him. It is said, that the Jury, with the Leave of the Court, may eat or Drink at the Bar, but not out of Court; for as soon as the whole Evidence given is summed up, the Jury are to be kept together 'till they bring in their Verdict, without being admitted to the Speech of any, and without either Meat, Drink, Fire or Candle. 1 Inst. 227. 2 Lill. Abr. 123. They are fineable, if they agree to cast Lots for their Verdict; and likewise for being tamper'd with, in Relation to the giving it: 'Tis held they are not so for giving a Verdict contrary to Evidence, or against the Court's Direction; for this Reason, that the Law presumes the Jury may have some other Evidence than what is given in Court, and they may find Things of their own Knowledge, as well as go according to their Conscience; yet they shall not meddle with any Thing that is not in Issue. 2 Lev. 205. Vaugh. 153. 3 Leon. 147. Attaint will lie against a Jury for giving contrary to Evidence, where any Corruption appears: They shall not be punished for giving their Verdicts, unless by Attaint for a false Verdict, in the Case of which, if convicted, they are to lose their Lands and Goods, and their Houses to be rased, also their Bodies thrown into Prison; but how far this Punishment is altered, you may see in 23 H. 8. c. 3. Where a Juror is guilty of Bribery, he becomes disabled to be of any Assises or Juries, and is to be imprisoned, and ransomed at the King's Pleasure. 5 Ed. 3. c. 10. Also if a Juror takes any Thing, either of the Plaintiff or Defendant, to give a Verdict, he shall pay ten times as much as he has taken, or suffer a Year's Imprisonment, by 38 Ed. 3 c. 12. Yet JuryMen, when they try a Cause, are to have their Charges allowed them. 2 Lill. 125. In all Cases of Difficulty, it is safest for the Jury to find the special Matter, and leave it to the Judges to determine how the Law stands upon the Fact. 1 Inst. 30. If the Jury find any Thing against Law, or Sense, &c. it will be void: Nevertheless a Jury has been permitted to recall their Verdict; as where a Person was indicted of Felony, the Jury found him Not guilty; tho' immediately before they went from the Bar said they were mistaken, and found him Guilty, which last was recorded for their Verdict. Plowd. 211. In Cvil [sic] Cases a Jury may be discharged before they give a Verdict, on Nonsuits had, &c. 1 Inst. 155. There is a Special Jury, where it is conceived, that in indifferent and between the Parties by the Sheriff; in which Case the Court, upon Motion, will Order the Sheriff to attend the Secondary of the King's Bench with his Book of Freeholders of the County, and the Secondary in the Presence of the Attornies on both Sides, is to strike a Jury: And if there happens a Cause of Consequence to be tried at the Bar, the Court of King's Bench, on Motion upon an Affidavit made, will make a Rule for the Secondary to Name forty-eight Freeholders, whereout each Party is to strike twelve, one at a Time, the Plaintiff's Attorney beginning first, and the Remainder of the Jurors shall be the Jury for the Trial. 2 Lill. 123. The Nomination of a special Jury ought to be in Presence of the Attornies on each Side; but in Case either of them neglect or refuse to attend, the Secondary may proceed ex parte, and then he strikes twelve for the Attorney that makes Default. See 1 Salk. 405. By 3 Geo. 2. c. 25. In Trials of Issues on Indictments, &c. and in all Actions of what Kind soever, on the Motion of the Prosecutor, Plaintiff or Defendant, &c. the Courts at Westminster are authorized to Order a special Jury to be struck, in the like Manner as upon Trials at Bar. Where a special Jury is ordered by Rule of Court, in any Cause arising in a City, Corporation, &c. the Jury is to be taken out of Lists or Books of Persons qualified, which are to be produced by Sheriffs, &c. before the proper Officer. A Rule has been made for a good Jury, and that a special Verdict shall be found, &c. and where two Merchants are Plaintiff and Defendant in a Cause, the Court may be moved for a Jury of Merchants to be returned to try the Issue between them: Likewise if either of the Parties in a Suit be an Alien, the Jury ought to be half Foreigners, and English, at the Prayer of the Party. Mod. Cas. L. & E. 221. 2 Lill. 125. See Challenge and Verdict.

CHAP. XXXIX.

Where a Prisoner shall be allowed Counsel, and a Copy of the Indictment, &c.

A Person having pleaded Not guilty is to be tried either,

1. By his Country, or
2. By his Peers, or
3. By Battle.

But before I consider what is proper to each of these in their Order, I shall endeavour to shew,

1. In what Cases a Prisoner may have Counsel to assist him in his Defence.
2. Where he may have a Copy of the Indictment.

Sect. 1. As to the first of these Particulars, I take it to be a settled [a] Rule at Common Law, that no Counsel shall be allowed a Prisoner, whether he be a [b] Peer or Commoner, upon the General Issue, on an Indictment of Treason or Felony, unless some Point of Law arise, proper to be debated.[262]

Sect. 2. This indeed many have complained of as very unreasonable, yet if it be considered, that generally every one of Common Understanding may as properly speak to a Matter of Fact, as if he were the best Lawyer; and that it requires no manner of Skill to make a plain and honest Defence, which in Cases of this Kind is always the best; the Simplicity and Innocence, artless and ingenuous Behaviour of one whose Conscience acquits him, having something in it more moving and convincing than the highest Eloquence of Persons speaking in a Cause not their own. And if it be farther considered that it is the [c] Duty of the Court to be indifferent between the King and Prisoner, and to see that the Indictment be good in Law, and the Proceedings, regular, and the Evidence legal, and such as fully proves the Point in Issue, there seems no great Reason to fear but that, generally speaking, the Innocent, for whose safety alone the Law is concerned, have rather an Advantage than Prejudice in having the Court their only Counsel. Whereas on the other Side, the very Speech, Gesture and Countenance, and Manner of Defence of those who are guilty, when they speak for themselves, may often help to disclose the Truth, which probably would not so well be discovered from the artificial Defence of other speaking for them.

Sect. 3. But the Law allows a Defendant the same Benefit of Counsel, in an [a] Appeal, whether Capital or not Capital, as in any other Action. Perhaps for this Reason among [b] others, because Appeals are presumed to be generally carried on with greater Heat and Spleen than Indictments, and yet are not so much to be favoured as being for the most part rather grounded on a Desire of private Revenge than of publick Justice; and therefore the Defendant shall have at least the same Advantage in them as in Common Actions.[263]

Sect. 4. Also upon Indictments, the Court will never refuse to assign a Prisoner Counsel to argue a doubtful Point of Law, happening to arise at or after his Trial; as where it shall appear questionable whether the Facts proved, if true, fully [c] amount to the Crime charged against him; or whether the Persons offered to be Evidence against him be [d] legal Witnesses in Respect of such or such Exceptions against them; or whether certain Persons returned [e] of his Jury can be lawful Jurors, in Respect of certain Objections against them; or whether the [f] Indictment or [g] Process, &c. be strictly legal: In all which Cases the Prisoner must [h] propose the Point, and [i] if the Court think it will bear a Debate, they will assign him Counsel to argue it.

Sect. 5. Also where-ever a Prisoner hath a [k] Pardon or other [l] Special Matter to plead to an Indictment, or an [m] Error to assign in Order to reverse an Outlawry, the Court will of Course assign him Counsel. And it is [n] said, That for such collateral Matters any one may be of Counsel for a Prisoner without any Assignment.

Sect. 6. But if a Question arise on the Trial of a Peer concerning the Course of Parliamentary Proceedings, the Lords will not [o] suffer it to be argued by Counsel, but will debate it among themselves.

Sect. 7. There is a Case in the Year-Book of [p] H. 4. Where a Serjeant at Law, as amicus Curiae, offered his Opinion to the Court, concerning the Trial of an Indictment of Death, That it was not proper to proceed in it till the Year and Day were passed, nor doth he appear to have been any Way reprehended for it. [q] But it is not safe for any one to be either Counsel or Solicitor to one in Prison for a Capital Crime, in Order to prepare him for his Trial, without an Assignment from the Court. But by Leave of the Court Prisoners have sometimes been indulged the Assistance of Counsel, not only [r] advise them in Prison, but [s] also to stand by them at the Bar: But it is said, [t] That in Strictness they ought not be prompted by them as to Matters of Fact, [u] nor to have the Assistance of any Papers drawn up by Counsel to prepare them for their Trial.

Sect. 8. After a Prisoner hath had Counsel assigned him, the Court will not [x] discharge them without his Consent, though they desire it, but will sometimes add others to them.

Sect. 9. It is [y] said, That the Court cannot assign an Appellee any of the King's Counsel; but that if they will they may be either for or against him.

Sect. 10. It having been found by Experience that Prisoners have been often under great Disadvantages from the Want of Counsel, in Prosecutions of High Treason against the King's Person, which are generally managed for the Crown with greater Skill and Zeal than ordinary Prosecutions, it is enacted by 7 W. 3. 3. That all and every Person and Persons whatsoever, that shall be accused and indicted for High Treason, whereby any Corruption of Blood may or shall be made to any such Offender or Offenders, or to any the Heir or Heirs of any such Offender of Offenders, or for Misprision of such Treason, shall be received and admitted to make his and their full Defence by Counsel learned in the Law: And in Case any Person or Persons so accused or indicted shall desire Counsel, the Court, before whom such Person or Persons shall be tried, or some Judge of that Court is authorised and required, immediately upon his or their Request, to assign to such Person and Persons, such and so many Counsel, not exceeding two, as the Person or Persons shall desire, to whom such Counsel shall have free Access at all seasonable Hours; any Law or Usage to the contrary notwithstanding.

Sect. 11. But it is provided, S. 3. That any Person being indicted of such Treason may be outlawed, &c. and where by the Law, after such Outlawry, he may come in and be tried, he shall upon such Trial have the Benefit of the said Act.

Sect. 12. And it is farther provided, S. 12, 13. That nothing in the said Act shall extend, or be construed to extend to any Impeachment or other Proceedings in Parliament whatsoever. And also that it shall not any Ways extend to any Indictment of high Treason, nor to any Proceedings thereupon, for counterfeiting his Majesty's Coin, his Great of Privy Seal, his Sign Manual, or Privy Signet.

Sect. 13. As to the second Particular, viz. Where a Prisoner may have a Copy of the Indictment against him: It is said, [a] That by the Common Law it is always denied in Case of Treason or Felony. Yet if a Prisoner take a legal Exception to an Indictment, it is said, [b] That the Court will grant him a Copy of so much as concerns his Exception. Also if he have such Matter to plead which cannot well be put into Form without Knowledge of the Charge against him as laid in the Indictment, as Autrefoits acquit, &c. it is [c] said, That the Court will give him the Heads of the Indictment, to enable him to have his Plea so drawn as to suit the charge against him.[264]

Sect. 14. But it is enacted by 7 W. 3. That every Person and Persons indicted for High Treason, except for counterfeiting the Coin, or the Great or Privy Seal, or Sign Manual or Privy Signet, shall have a true Copy of the whole Indictment, but not the Names of the Witnesses, five Days at the least before Trial, to advise with Counsel thereupon, to plead and make their Defence, his or their Attorney, or Agent, requiring the same, and paying the Officer his reasonable Fees for writing thereof not exceeding five Shillings for the Copy of every such Indictment.

Sect. 15. What Exceptions may be taken to such Indictment, and when, hath been shewn, Ch. 25. Sect. 146, 147, 148, 149.

CHAP. XL.

From what County the Jury is to be returned, &c.

FOR the better Understanding what more particularly relates to a Trial by the Country in Capital Cases, having shewn, Ch. 5. Sect. 18. That by Virtue of a special Commission, Justices of Oyer and Terminer may sit in one County, for the Trial of a Fact in another by the proper Jurors. And having also shewn, Ch. 23. Sect. 92, 93. what is a proper Place from Whence a Visne may come, I shall in this Place only consider,

1. From what County the Jury is to be returned.
2. By Virtue of what Process.
3. Before what Court.
4. How they may be challenged.

As to the first of these Particulars, viz. From what County the Jury is to be returned: I shall endeavour to shew,

1. From what County they are to be returned for the Trial of the General Issue.
2. From what County for the Trial of a Foreign Plea.

Sect. 1. As to the first Point, viz. From what County a Jury is to be returned for the Trial of the General Issue: I take it to be [a] agreed, That [b] regularly by the Common Law they must be returned in all cases, for the Trial of the General Issue from the same County wherein the Fact was committed. And it is said, That in an Appeal of Death, where the Wound was given in one County, and the Party died in another, the Jury [c] ought to be returned from each County before the Statute of 2 & 3 Ed. 6. 24. since which the whole may be tried either upon an [d] Indictment or Appeal, in the County wherein the Death happens.[265]

Sect. 2. But it is enacted by 33 H. 8. 23. That if any Person being examined by the King's Council, or three of them upon any Manner of Treasons, Misprisions of Treasons, or Murders, do confess any such Offences, or that the said Council, or three of them, upon such Examination, shall think any Person so examined, to be vehemently suspected of any Treason, Misprisions of Treasons or Murder, that then in every such Case by the King's Commandment his Majesty's Commission of Oyer and Terminer under the Great Seal, shall be made by the Chancellor of England to such Persons and into such Vills and Places as shall be named and appointed by the King, for the speedy Trial, Conviction or Delivery of such offenders; which Commissioners shall have Power to enquire, hear and determine all such Treasons, Misprisions of Treasons and Murders, within the Places limited by their Commissions by such good and lawful Persons as shall be returned before them by Sheriff, or his Minister, or any other having Power to return Writs and Process for that Purpose, in whatsoever other Shire or Place within the King's Dominions, or without, such Offences were done or committed, and that in such Case, no Challenge for the Shire or Hundred shall be allowed.

Sect. 3. It hath been [a] adjudged, That this Statute as far as it relates to Treason done within the Realm, is repealed by 1 & 2 P. & M. 10. which enacts, That all Trials for Treason shall be according to the Common Law. But as to [b] Murder and[c] Misprision of Treason, it still seems to continue in Force.[d] And as to High Treason done without the Realm, it doth not seem material whether it be in Force or not, because that is fully provided for by 35. H. 8. 2. as hath been more fully shewn Ch. 25. Sect. 49, 50, 51, 52, 53.

Sect. 4. It hath been [e] adjudged, That the Word Murder in this Statute shall have the same strict Construction as in the [f] Statutes which take away the Benefit of Clergy from Murder, and consequently shall not extend to one examined before the Council as Accessary only, and not as Principal; for Murder is one Offence, and the being Accessaary to it is another.

Sect. 5. Having shewn already that he, who steals [g] Goods in one County, and carries them into another, or does a Fact in one County which proves a [h] Nusance to another, may be indicted or appealed in either; from whence it follows, That he may be also tried in either: Having also [i] shewn, That he who marries two Wives, the first in a Foreign Country, and the second in England, may be indicted and tried in England; and that he who takes a Woman by Force out of one County, and carries her into another and there marries her, [k] may be indicted and tried in the second County: And that Felonies in [l] Wales may by Force of 26 H. 8. 6. be indicted and tried in the next adjoining English County: And that Treasons upon the Seas, [m] or in any Foreign [n] Country, and Felonies [o] and Piracies upon the Sea, may be indicted and tried in any County in England; and that an [p] Accessary in one County to Murder in another, may be appealed and tried in the County wherein the Stroke was given; and that an Accessary to Murder, or any other Felony in one County, may be indicted [q] and tried in the County wherein he was Accessary; I shall refer to the Places cited in the Margin for the farther Consideration of these Matters.

Sect. 6. As to the second Point, viz. From what County the Jury is to be returned for the Trial of a Foreign Plea, That is, the Plea of issuable Matter alledged in a different County from that wherein the Party is indicted or appealed; as where a Man indicted in the County of A.[r] pleads, That he was taken out of a Sanctuary in the County of B. or where one appealed by a Woman for the Death of her Husband in one County, [s] pleads, That since the Death of her Husband she hath married J. S. in another County; it is [t] agreed, That by the Common Law such Pleas can only be tried by Juries returned from the Counties wherein they are alledged: And therefore if Issue be joined on such Matters before a Court which has no Jurisdiction out of the County wherein it sits, there seems to be [u] no Remedy by the Common Law, but to remove the Proceedings by Certiorari into the King's Bench, which having a Jurisdiction throughout the whole Kingdom, will award proper Process for the Trial.

Sect. 7. But for the more speedy Trials of Murders and Felonies, it is enacted by 23 H. 8. 14. Par. 5. That all Manner of Foreign Pleas triable by the Country, upon any Indictment for any Petit Treason, Murder of Felony, shall be forthwith tried before the same Justices afore whom the Party shall be arraigned, and by the Jurors of the same County that shall try the Petit Treason, Murder or Felony, whereof be shall be so arraigned, without any further Respite or Delay, in whatsoever County or Counties, Place or Places of this Realm, the Matter of the same Pleas be supposed or alledged.

Sect. 8. But this Statute extending neither to Indictments of High Treason, nor to Appeals, it [a] is said, That a Foreign Issue therein must still be tried by the Jury of the County wherein it is alledged.

CHAP. XLVI.
Of Evidence.

Sect. 1. AS to the Nature of Evidence, so far as it more particularly concerns Criminal Cases, having premised that it is a settled Rule, That in Cases of Life no [a] Evidence is to be given against a Prisoner but in his Presence; and that it hath been [b] adjudged, That no Bill of Exceptions is grantable on an Indictment of Treason or Felony, the Statute of Westm. 2. 3. cum aliquis implacitatus. &c. proponat exceptionem, &c. having been never thought to extend to any such Case, it being plain that it could not but cause an infinite Delay of Justice, if it should; I shall more fully consider the following Points.

1. How many Witnesses are required in Criminal Cases.
2. What is to be allowed as Evidence.
3. Who may be Witnesses.
4. In what Manner the Witnesses for the Defendant are to give their Evidence.
5. Whether a Defendant have Right to Process to bring in his Witnesses.
6. What Evidence maintains an Indictment, &c.
7. What may be given in Evidence on the Part of the Defendant.

Sect. 2. As to the first Point, viz. How may Witnesses are required in Criminal Cases: Having already endeavoured to shew that the Common Law did [c] not require any certain Number of Witnesses for the Trial of any Crime whatsoever, I shall only add in this Place, That it seems to have been the more [d] prevailing Opinion, That 1 [e] E. 6. 12. and 5 & 6 E. 6. 11. which required two Witnesses in Treason, were not repealed by 1 & 2 P. & M. 10. which ordered that all Trials of Treason should be according to the Course of the Common Law; and therefore that it was still necessary in all Trials of High Treason, not concerning the Coin, to have either two Witnesses to the [f] same Overt-Act, or one Witness to one, and another [g] Witness to another Overt-Act, of the same Kind of Treason, or at least one Witness to an Overt-Act, and [h] another to a material Circumstance to prove it. In Relation to which Matters the Law seeming to be settled by 7 [i] W. 3. which is express, That no Person shall be indicted, tried or attainted for High Treason, but upon the Oaths of two lawful Witnesses, either both of them to the same Overt-Act, or one of them to one, and the other of them to another Overt-Act of the same Treason; it will be needless at this Day to examine how far these Opinions were reconcileable with 1 Ph. & Ma.

As to the second Point, viz. What is to be allowed as Evidence in Criminal Cases: I shall consider,

1. Where the Confession of the Defendant or the Depositions of others out of Court may be allowed as Evidence.
2. How far Hearsay is Evidence.
3. Whether Similitude of Hands be any Evidence in Criminal Cases.

Sect. 3. As to the first Particular, viz. Where the Confession of the Defendant, or the Depositions of others, out of Court, may be allowed as Evidence: It seems that the Confession of the Defendant himself, whether taken upon an [a] Examination before Justices or Peace, in Pursuance of 1 & 2 Ph. & M. 13. or of 2 & 3 Ph. & Ma. 10. upon [b] a Bailment or [c] Commitment for Felony, or taken by the Common Law upon an Examination before a Secretary of State, or other Magistrates for [d] Treason, or [e] other Crimes, not within those Statues, or in [f] Discourse with private Persons, hath always been allowed to be given in Evidence against the Party confessing, but [g] not against others.

Sect. 4. Also it was [h] holden, That two Witnesses of a Confession of High Treason, upon an Examination before a Justice of Peace, were sufficient to convict the Person so confessing, within the Meaning of 1 E. 6. 12. and 5 & 6 E. 6. 11. which required two Witnesses in High Treason, unless the Offender should willingly without Violence confess the same: But this is remedied by 7 W. 3. 3. which requires two Witnesses, unless the Party shall willingly, without Violence, in open Court confess, &c.

Sect. 5. It [i] seems an established Rule, that where-ever a Man's Confession is made Use of against him, it must all be taken together, and not by Parcels.

Sect. 6. It seems [k] settled, that the Examination of an Informer taken upon [l] Oath, and [m] subscribed by him either before a [n] Coroner upon an Inquisition of Death in Pursuance of 1 & 2 Ph. & M. 13. or before [o] Justices of Peace in Pursuance of 1 & 2 Ph. & M. 13. and 2 & 3 P. & M. 10. upon a [p] Bailment or [q] Commitment for any Felony, may be given in Evidence at the Trial of such Inquisition, or of an Indictment for the same Felony, if it be made out by Oath to the Satisfaction of the Court, that such Informer is [r] dead, or unable to [s] Travel, or kept [t] away by the Means or Procurement of the Prisoner, and that the Examination offered in Evidence is the very same [u] that was sworn before the Coroner or Justice, without any Alteration whatsoever.

Sect. 7. But it hath been [a] adjudged, that it is not sufficient to authorize the Reading such an Examination, to make Oath that the Prosecutors have used all their Endeavours to find the Witness, but cannot find him.

Sect. 8. Also it hath been [b] adjudged, that Depositions taken before a Coroner upon an Inquisition of Death super visum corporis, cannot be given in Evidence upon an Appeal for the same Death, because it is a different Prosecution from that wherein they were taken.

Sect. 9. There are many[c] Instances in the Reigns of Queen Elizabeth and King James I. wherein the Depositions of absent Witnesses were allowed as Evidence in Treason and Felony, even where it did not appear but that the Witnesses might have been produced viva voce. And it was adjudged [d] the Earl of Strafford's Trail, that where Witnesses could not be produced viva voce, by Reason of Sickness, &c. their Depositions might be read for or against the Prisoner on a Trial of High Treason, but not where they might have been produced in Person. And it was admitted [e] in the Lord Stafford's Trial, that the Depositions taken by a Witness before a Justice of the Peace might at the Prisoner's Desire be read at the Trial, in order to take off the Credit of the Witness by shewing a Variance between such Depositions and the Evidence given in Court viva voce. And for the same Reason it seems [f] agreed, That where a Witness at one Trial varies from his own Evidence at another, in Relation to the same Matter, such Variance may also be given in Evidence to invalidate his Testimony at the second Trial.

Sect. 10. But it is [g] said to have been adjudged in the seventh Year of Will. 3. by the Court of King's Bench upon Advice with the Justices of the Common Pleas, upon an Indictment for a Libel, that Depositions taken before a Justice of Peace relating to the Fact, could not be given in Evidence, tho' the Deponent were dead; and that the Reason why such Depositions may be given in Evidence in Felony depends upon the Statutes of Ph. & Ma. And that this cannot be extended farther than the particular Case of Felony. But in the Report of this Case in 5 [h] Mod. it is said that the Reason why such depositions could not be read, was because the Defendant was not present, when they were taken, and therefore had not the Benefit of a Cross Examination.

Sect. 11. However it was [i] agreed in Sir John Fenwick's Case, that the Information of a Witness taken upon Oath before a Justice of Peace, being joined with the Evidence of one other Witness only viva voce, could not in the ordinary Course of Justice, amount to sufficient Evidence within the 7th of W. 3. which requires two Witnesses in High Treason; and therefore it was thought necessary to proceed in that Case by Bill of Attainder in Parliament, whose Power can be restrained by no Rules but those of natural Justice.

Sect. 12. And in the same Case it was [k] agreed, that the Evidence given by a Witness at one Trial, could not in the ordinary Course of Justice be made Use of against a Defendant on the Death of such Witness, at another Trial.

Sect. 13. Also it seems clear that Depositions taken in the Spriritual Court in a Cause of Divorce for a Forcible Marriage cannot [a] be given in Evidence upon an Indictment for such Marriage on the [b] Statute of 3 H. 7. 2.

Sect. 14. As to the second Particular, viz. How far Hearsay is Evidence: It seems [c] agreed, That what a [d] Stranger has been heard to say is in Strictness no Manner of Evidence either for or against a Prisoner, not only because it is not upon Oath, but also because the other Side hath no Opportunity of a cross Examination; and therefore it seems a settled Rule, that it shall never be made use of but only by way of Inducement[e] or Illustration of what is properly Evidence; yet it seems [f] that what the Prisoner hath been heard to say at another Time, may be given in Evidence for him, as well as against [g] him, and also what a [h] Witness hath been heard to say at another Time, may be given in Evidence in order either to invalidate or confirm the Testimony which he gives in Court.

Sect. 15. As to the third Particular, viz. Whether Similitude of Hands be any Evidence in Criminal Cases: It is observable that this with other Circumstances in [i] Algernoon Sidney's Case was ruled to be good Evidence of his having written a Paper charged against him as an Overt-Act of High Treason: Yet in the Trial of the seven [k] Bishops, the Court was divided in Opinion, whether Similitude of Hands were Evidence of the Defendants having signed the Paper charged against them as a Libel; and the Parliament having declared an Opinion in the Reversal of Algernoon Sidney's Attainder, that Comparison of Hands is no Evidence of a Man's HandWriting in Criminal Cases; It seems to have been generally holden [l] since that Time, that it is not Evidence in any Criminal Case, whether capital or not capital.

As to the third Point, viz. Who may be Witnesses in Criminal Cases, I shall endeavour to shew,

1. Whether a Husband or Wife may be Witnesses for or against one another.
2. Whether a Judge or Juror may be a Witness.
3. Where an Accomplice in the Crime charged against a Prisoner may be a Witness against him or for him.
4. Where a Person shall be disabled to be a Witness in Respect of his having been attainted or convicted of a Crime.
5. Where it is a good Exception against a Witness that his Interest is concerned.
6. What other Exceptions are good against a Witness.

Sect. 16. As to the first of these Particulars, viz. Whether a Husband or Wife may be Witnesses for or against one another: It seems, [m] agreed, That the Husband and Wife being as one and the same Person in Affection and Interest, can no more give Evidence for one another in any Case whatsoever than for themselves; and that regularly the one shall not be admitted to give Evidence against the other, nor the Examination of the one be made Use of against the other, by Reason of the implacable Dissension which might be caused by it, and the great Danger of Perjury from taking the Oaths of Persons under so great a Biass, and the extreme Hardship of the Case: And therefore it hath been [a] adjudged, That the Husband cannot be a Witness against the Wife, nor the Wife against the Husband, to prove the first Marriage on an Indictment on the Statute of 1 [b] Jac. 1. 11. for a second Marriage. Yet [c] some Exceptions have been allowed to this general Rule in Cases of evident Necessity, as in the Lord [d] Audley's Case who held his Wife's Hands and Legs while his Servant, by his Command, ravished her; or where a Man in indicted for a [e] forcible Marriage against the [f] Purport of 3 H. 7. or where either a Husband or Wife have Cause to demand [g] Sureties of the Peace against the other, &c.

Sect. 17. As to the second Particular, viz. Whether a Judge or Juror may be a Witness: It seems [h] agreed, that it is no Exception against a Person's giving Evidence either for or against a Prisoner, that he is one of the Judges or Jurors who are to try him. And in the Case of [i] Hacker, two of the Persons in the commission for the Trial came off from the Bench, and were sworn and gave Evidence, and did not go up to the Bench again during his Trial.

Sect. 18. As to the third Particular, viz. Where an Accomplice in the Crime charged against a Prisoner may be a Witness against him or for him: It has been long settled [k], That it is no Exception against a Witness that he hath confessed himself guilty of the same Crime, if he have not been [l] indicted for it; for if no Accomplices were to be admitted as Witnesses, it would be generally impossible to find Evidence to convict the greatest Offenders. Also it hath been often [m] ruled, That Accomplices who are indicted, are good Witnesses for the King, until they be convicted. Also it hath been [n] adjudged, That such of the Defendants in an Information against whom no Evidence is given, may be Witnesses for the others. It hath been also [o] adjudged that where A. B. and C. are sued in three several Actions on the Statute for a supposed Perjury in their Evidence concerning the same Thing, they may be good Witnesses in such Actions for one another.

Sect. 19. As to the fourth Particular, viz. Where a Person shall be disabled to be a Witness in Respect of his having been attainted, or convicted of a Crime: It seems agreed, That a Conviction, and therefore a fortiori an Attainder, or Judgment of [p] Treason, [q] Felony, [r] Piracy, [s] Praemunire or [t] Perjury, or of Forgery [u] on 5 Eliz. and also a Judgment in Attaint for giving a false Verdict, or in Conspiracy at the Suit of [v] the King, and also [z] Judgment for any [aa] Crime whatsoever to stand in the Pillory, or to be whipt or branded, being in a Court which had a [bb] Jurisdiction, are good Causes of Exception against a Witness, while they continue in Force.

Sect. 20. Bt [sic; But] it is [a] agreed, That no such Conviction or Judgment can be made Use of to this Purpose, unless the Record be actually produced in Court. Also it is a general Rule, That a [b] Witness shall not be asked any Question the Answering to which might oblige him to accuse himself of a Crime; and that his Credit is to [c] be impeached only by general Accounts of his Character and Reputation, and not by Proofs of particular Crimes, whereof he never was convicted.

Sect. 21. It seems clear [d] at this Day, That Outlawry in a personal Action is not a good Exception against a Witness, as it is against a Juror. And that a Person convicted of Felony, who is admitted to his Clergy and [e] burnt in the Hand, is thereby re-enabled to be a Witness.

Sect. 22. It seems [f] agreed, That the King's Pardon of Treason or Felony after a Conviction or Attainder, restores the Party to his Credit: Also it was holden by the late Chief Justice [g] Holt, That the King's Pardon will remove a Man's Disability to be a Witness in all Cases whatsoever, wherein it is only the Consequence of the Conviction or Judgment against him, and not an express Part of the Judgment, as it is in Conspiracy [h] at the Suit of the King, and in Perjury on the Statute. But this Matter [i] seems not to be fully settled.

Sect. 23. It hath been [k] ruled, That a Conviction of Perjury doth not disable a Man from making an Affidavit in Relation to the Irregularity of a Judgment.

Sect. 24. As to the fifth Particular, viz. Where it is a good Exception against a Witness that his Interest is concerned: It seems an uncontested [l] Rule, in all Cases whatsoever, That it is a good Exception against a Witness, that he is either to be a Gainer or Loser by the Event of the Cause; whether such Advantage be direct and immediate, or consequential only. And this seems to be the Reason why he who is Bail for the Defendant, [m] cannot be an Evidence for him without Consent. Also upon the same Ground it is [n] agreed, That he who borrows Money upon an usurious Contract, cannot be a Witness upon an Information for the Usury (unless he [o] hath paid the Money) whether such Information be brought by himself or any other; for if in such Case a Man might be a Witness, he would in Effect swear for himself, by proving a Matter which may avoid his own Contract. And upon the like Reason it hath been [p] ruled, That he who by a Slight hath been imposed upon to set his Hand to a Note for more Money than he intended, is no good Witness on an Information for the Cheat; because a Conviction may be a Means to avoid the Note, by being made Use of by the Party when sued upon it, as a Motive to influence the Jury, which cannot well be prevented, tho' in Law it be no [q] Evidence. And for the like Reason I take it to be generally [r] agreed, That he whose Property may be prejudiced by a Forgery, is no Evidence to prove it on an Indictment or Information. And if it be a Forgery within 5 Eliz. a farther Reason may be offered why such a Person cannot be an Evidence because he may have an Action on the Statute; and upon this Reason alone it hath been [s] adjudged, That he against whom a Verdict is given, cannot be a Witness to prove Perjury in the Evidence. And yet it appears from daily Experience, That [t] a Person beaten, and generally any other Person to whose [u] Damage a criminal Information concludes, is a good Evidence to prove such Battery or other Misdemeanor, nowithstanding the Objection that he may have an Action. And therefore, upon the Whole, the Rules of Evidence concerning this Matter seem not to be clearly settled.

Sect. 25. It seems [a] agreed, That it is no good Exception against a Witness, That he has a Maintenance from the King; for every one may maintain his own Witnesses. Also it hath been [b] adjudged to be no good Exception against a Witness, That he has received a Reward for having made a Discovery of the Crime to be proved against the Prisoner. Also it hath been [c] ruled to be no good Exception, That a Witness hath the Promise of a Pardon or other Reward on Condition of giving his Evidence, unless such Reward be promised by Way of Contract for giving such and such particular Evidence, or full Evidence, or any way in the least to biass him to go beyond the Truth; which not being easily avoided in Promises or Threats of this Kind, it is certain that too great Caution cannot be used in making them.

Sect. 26. As to the sixth Particular, viz. What other Exceptions are good against a Witness: It seems [d] agreed to be a good Exception, That a Witness is an Infidel; That is, as I [e] take it, That he believes neither the Old nor New Testament to be the Word of God; on one of which our Laws require the Oath should be administred.

Sect. 27. Also it is [f] certain, That Want of Discretion is a good Exception against a Witness; on which Account alone [g] it seems, That an Infant may be excepted against; for in some Cases an Infant of nine Years of Age has been allowed to give Evidence.

Sect. 28. But it seems agreed, That it is no good [h] Exception against a Witness that he is an Alien, or Villein, or Bondman, &c.

Sect. 29. As to the fourth Point, viz. In what Manner the Witnesses for the Defendant are to give their Evidence: It hath always been [i] agreed, That the Evidence for the King must in all Cases be upon Oath, and also that the Evidence for the Defendant in an [k] Appeal, whether capital or not capital, or in an Indictment or Information for a [l] Misdemeanor, must also be upon Oath. And it is said by Sir Edward [m] Coke, That we never read in any Statute, ancient Author, Book-Case or Record, that in Criminal Cases the Party accused should not have Witnesses sworn for him, and therefore that there is not so much as scintilla juris against it. And it is said by Sir [n] Matthew Hale, That there is no known Law, against it. However there having been a constant immemorial [o] Practice not to suffer Witnesses to be sworn against the King upon Indictments or capital Crimes [p] except in some Cases specially provided for by Statute; and the Judges being always tender of departing from the settled Practice of their Predecessors, and generally choosing rather to presume it originally sounded on some Statute or other good Foundation, than to suffer the Reasonableness of it to be nicely inquired into, which might be an Inlet to endless Uncertainties, it was thought necessary to enact by 1 Annae, 9. Par. 3. That after the twelfth of February 1702, every Person who shall be produced or appear as a Witness on the Behalf of the Prisoner, before he or she be admitted to depose, or give any Manner of Evidence, shall first take an Oath to depose the Truth, the whole Truth, and nothing but the Truth, in such Manner as the Witnesses for the Queen are by Law obliged to do; and if convicted of any willful Perjury in such Evidence, shall suffer all the Punishments, Penalties, Forfeitures and Disabilities, which by any of the Laws and Statutes of this Realm, are or may be inflicted upon Persons convicted of wilful [sic] Perjury.

Sect. 30. As to the fifth Point, viz. Whether a Defendant in criminal Cases have Right to Process to bring in his Witnesses: I take it that in Prosecutions for [a] Misdemeanors the Defendant may take out Subpoenas of Course, but that in capital Cases he hath no [b] Right by the Common Law to any Process against his Witnesses without a [c] special Order of the Court. But it is enacted by 7 W. 3. 3. Par. 7. That all Persons accused and indicted for any High Treason, whereby any Corruption of Blood may ensue, shall have the like Process of the Court where they shall be tried, to compel their Witnesses to appear for them at any such Trial or Trials, as is usually granted to compel Witnesses to appear against them. And it seems that since the Statute of 1 Annae, 9. set forth more at large in the precedent Section, which ordains, That the Witnesses for the Prisoner shall be sworn, Process may be taken out against them of Course in any Case whatsoever.

Sect. 31. As to the sixth Point, viz. What Evidence maintains an Indictment, &c. Having already shewn, Ch. 25. Sect. 115. and Book 1. Ch. 30. Sect. 9. That according to the later Opinions, where one is indicted upon a Statute, and the Evidence doth not bring the Case within the Statute, but yet proves the Offence in the Indictment as it is an Offence at the Common Law, the Defendant may be found guilty at the Common Law, and the Words contra formam Statuti rejected as Surplus: Having also shewn, Ch. 35. Sect. 11. That it is strongly holden that a Man cannot be found guilty of an Indictment against him as Principal, upon Evidence which only proves him to have been Accessary before, but shall be difcharged of the Indictment; I shall in this Place take Notice only of the following Particulars.

Sect. 32. First, That it is a settled Rule [d] in all Cases, whether capital or not capital, That the Day laid in the Indictment or [e] Appeal is not material upon Evidence, but that the Defendant may be convicted upon Proof of a Fact at any other Time, whether before or after the Day laid; so [f] that it were before the Time when the Indictment or Appeal were preferred. And agreeably hereto Sir [g] Henry Vane was found guilty of an Indictment of High Treason laid on the 30th of May, 11 Car. 2. upon Evidence of a Fact done the 30th of January, 1 Car. 2.

Sect. 33. Secondly, That where the Time proved varies from that laid in the Indictment or Appeal, the Jury may either find the Defendant guilty generally, in which Case the Forfeiture shall relate to the Time laid, till the Verdict be falsifyed by the Party interested, (as it may be in this [h] Respect, tho' not as to the Point of the Offence,) or they may [i] specially find him Guilty on the Day on which the Fact is proved, whether before or after the Day laid in the Indictment or Appeal, in which Case the Forfeiture shall relate to the Day so specially found. But where a Verdict expresly finds a Defendant guilty before the Time laid in the Indictment or Appeal, whether it may be falsifyed, as to the Time, by the Party interested, as it may be where it finds him guilty generally of the Offence in the Indictment of Appeal, upon Evidence of a Fact after the Time laid, may deserve to be considered.

Sect. 34. Thirdly, That where a certain [k] Place is made Part of the Description of the Fact which is charged against the Defendant, the least Variance as to such Place between the Evidence and Indictment is fatal; as where a Trespass in Taking away Goods, or any other Offence is alledged in such a Parish in the House of J. S. or in such a Parish in a Play-House in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, and upon Evidence it appear to have been done at the House of a different Person, or that there is no Play-House in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields. But it is a settled[l] Rule, That a Place laid only for a Venue in an Indictment or Appeal is no Way material upon Evidence; but that a Proof of the same Crime at any other Place in the [a] same County, maintains the Indictment or Appeal as well as if it had been proved in the very same Place. Also it hath been [b] adjudged, That after a Crime hath been proved in the County in which it is laid, Evidence may be given of other Instances of the same Crime in another County, in Order to satisfy the Jury. Also it was [c] adjudged, in Sir Henry Vane's Case, That where one is indicted for High Treason in compassing the King's Death in the County of M. and the Levying of War in the same County is laid as an Overt-Act of such Treason, and [d] proved in the same County by one Witness, the Levying of War in another County may also be proved by another Witness. But it seems to have been [e] agreed at the same Time, That where the Levying of War is the Treason for which the Party is indicted, it must be fully proved in the County in which it is laid. Also it seems, That at this Day the Levying of War can in no Case be given in Evidence as an Overt-Act in any County in which it is not laid, unless it tend to prove some Overt-Act that is expressly laid; for it is enacted by 7 Wil. 3. 3. Par. 8. That no [f] Evidence shall be admitted or given of any Overt-Act that is not expresly laid in the Indictment against any Person or Persons whatsoever. In the Construction whereof it hath been [g] adjudged, That where one is indicted for High Treason in adhering to the King's Enemies, and certain Acts of Hostility done by him in a certain Ship called the Clencarty, are laid as the Overt-Acts of such Adherence, no Evidence can be given of any other distinct Act of Adherence, having no Relation to, nor any Way tending to prove, what was done in the Clencarty, tho' it conduce to prove that same Species of Treason; and therefore that on such an Indictment no Evidence can be given of the Prisoner's having run away to the Enemy in a Custom-House-Boat, &c. But it hath been [h] adjudged, That where one is indicted for High Treason in compassing the King's Death, and a Consult and Agreement to assassinate the King is laid as one of the Overt-Acts of such Treason, the Defendant's giving about among the Conspirators a List of the Persons Names who were intended to be employed in the Assassination, may be given in Evidence against him upon such Indictment, because it naturally tends to prove his Agreement to the intended Assassination, which Agreement is one of the Overt-Acts laid in the Indictment. Also it hath been [i] adjudged, That where the Writing of several treasonable Letters is laid as an Overt-Act of High Treason in Compassing the King's Death, and the Purport of such Letters is only set forth in the Indictment without a particular Recital or Description of any of them, the particular Letters making good such Charge may be read at the Trial.

Sect. 35. Fourthly, That where several Overt-Acts, are laid in an Indictment of High Treason, the Proof of any [k] of them maintains the Indictment as much as if every one of them were proved.

Sect. 36. Fifthly, That where one is indicted for writing a [l] Libel secundum tenorem sequentem, or for forging a Deed so and so described, any the least Variance between the Libel recited, or Deed described, and those given in Evidence, is fatal; but that where the Substance only of a Libel is set forth in Latin, it is sufficient if the Libel be proved to have the same Sense as is set forth. Yet it seems [m] agreed, That it is no Evidence in any criminal Case, that the Defendant said so and so, or Words to the like Effect; because the Court must know the very Words to judge of their Force and Effect.

Sect. 37. Sixthly, That a Variance between an Indictment or Appeal of Death, and the Evidence, as to the Instrumental Cause mentioned in such Indictment or Appeal, is no [a] way material, so that the Party be proved to have died by the same Kind of Death as is alledged in the Indictment or Appeal. And therefore it is [b] agreed, That if one be indicted or appealed for killing another with a Sword, and upon Evidence it appear that he killed him with a Staff, Hatchet, Bill or Hook, or any other Weapon with which a Wound may be given, he ought to be found guilty, for the Substance of the Matter is, whether he gave the Party a Wound of which he died; and it is not material with what Weapon he gave it, tho' for Form's sake it be [c] necessary to set forth a particular Weapon. And on the same Ground it hath been also [d] adjudged that an Indictment, or Appeal for poisoning a Man with one Kind of Poison, may be maintained by Evidence of a different Kind of Poison; for the Substance of the Matter is whether the Defendant did poison the Deceased or not. [e] Yet it seems clear, That Evidence of poisoning, burning, or famishing, or any other Kind of killing wherein no Weapon is used, will not maintain an Indictment or Appeal of Death by killing with a Weapon; and that Evidence of killing with a Weapon will not maintain an Indictment or Appeal of Poisoning, &c. because they are different Kinds of Deaths; and in like Manner that an Indictment of Treason could [f] never be maintained by Evidence of Treason of a different Species.

Sect. 38. Seventhly, That it seems a [g] general Rule, That where-ever a Variance between an Indictment or Appeal, and the Evidence brought to support them, is material or immaterial in Respect of the Principal; in the same Cases also it will be material or immaterial in Respect of the Accessary.

Sect. 39. Eighthly, That it is [h] settled at this [i] Day, That if an Indictment or Appeal against A. B. and C. for the Death of D. charge A. as having given the mortal Blow, and B. and C. as having been present, procuring and abetting, and the Evidence prove that B. and C. gave the Blow, and that A. was only present procuring and abetting; yet it maintains the Indictment, because in such a Case in the [k] Judgment of Law, the Act of any of them is the Act of all.

Sect. 40. Ninthly, That it hath been [l] resolved, That if one be indicted as Accessary to two, and upon Evidence appear to have been Accessary to one of them only, yet he shall be found guilty. But it is [m] holden by Sir Edward Coke, That if an Appeal be brought against two as Principals and against another as Accessary to them, and one of those charged as Principals be found Not guilty, the Accessary is discharged, for which he gives this Reason, That because the Plaintiff made him Accessary to two, he cannot be found Accessary to one. But no Authority is cited for the Maintenance of this Opinion; neither doth it seem easy to reconcile it with the Resolution abovementioned, unless the Rules of Evidence on an Appeal differ from those on an Indictment, which I do not [n] find that they do as to other Variances.

Sect. 41. Tenthly, That it hath been [a] agreed, That if a Person be generally indicted for the Murder of another ex malitia praecogitata, and no express Malice appear upon the Evidence but only [b] Malice implied by Law, yet he shall be found guilty. Also it hath been [c] adjudged, That where an Indictment sets forth all the special Matter in Respect whereof the Law implies Malice, a Variance between the Indictment and Evidence as to the Circumstances doth no Hurt, so that the Substance of the Matter be found. As [d] where an Indictment for the Murder of a Serjeant upon an Arrest, supposes that the Sheriff made a Precept to such Serjeant for the Arrest, and upon the Evidence it appears that there was not any such Precept, but that the Serjeant made the Arrest ex officio at the Plaintiff's Request upon the Entry of the Plaint, according to the Custom of the City; for the Substance of the Matter is whether the Defendant killed an Officer in the lawful Execution of legal Process.

Sect. 42. Eleventhly, That violent [e] Presumption from plain Circumstances is in some Cases taken for full Proof; as where a Man is stabbed in a House, and another runs out with a bloody Knife in his Hand, and no one else is in the House at the Time; also it is [f] said, That a probable Presumption is of some Weight, but that a light one is not to be regarded at all.

Sect. 43. Twelfthly, That it is enacted by 21 Jac. 27. That if any Woman be delivered of any Issue of her Body, Male or Female, which being born alive should by the Laws of this Realm be a Bastard, and that she endeavour privately, either by drowning, or secret burying thereof, or any other way, either by herself or the procuring of others, so to conceal the Death thereof, as it may not come to light, whether it were born alive or not, but be concealed; in every such Case, the said Mother so offending shall suffer Death as in Case of Murder, except such Mother can make Proof by one Witness at the least, that the Child whose Death was by her so intended to be concealed was born dead. In the Construction whereof it hath been [g] adjudged, That in order to convict a Woman by Force of this Statute, there is no need that the Indictment be drawn specially, or conclude contra formam Statuti; but that it is the better Way to set forth only that the Defendant infantem masculum vivum parturiit, qui quidem infans masculus adtunc & ibidem vivus existens natus per legem hujus regni Angliae Spurius fuit, Anglice a Bastard, and then to go on in the ordinary Way to shew that she murdered him, &c. contra pacem, &c. for the Statute doth not make a new Offence, but only makes such Concealment an undeniable Evidence of Murder. Also it hath been [h] agreed, That where a Woman appears to have endeavoured to conceal the Death of such Child within the Statute, there is no Need of any Proof that the Child was born alive, or that there were any Signs of Hurt upon the Body, but it shall be undeniably taken that the Child was born alive, and murdered by the Mother. But it hath been [i] adjudged, That where a Woman lay in a Chamber by herself, and went to Bed without Pain, and waked in the Night, and knocked for Help but could get none, and was delivered of a Child and put it in a Trunk, and did not discover it till the following Night, yet she was not within the Statute, because she knocked for Help. Also it hath been [k] agreed, that if a Woman confess herself with Child beforehand, and afterwards be surprised and delivered, no Body being with her, she is not within the Statute, because there was no Intent of Concealment. And therefore in such Cases it must appear by Signs of Hurt upon the Body, or some other way, that the Child was born alive.

Sect. 44. As to the seventh Point, viz. What may be given in Evidence on the Part of the Defendant: It seems [a] agreed, that son assault Demesne may be given in Evidence on the General Issue in an Indictment, but not in an Action of Battery. Also it seems to have been always [b] agreed, that the Defendant in an information on a Penal Statute may give in Evidence any Exception in his Favour in the Body of the Act. And it hath also been [c] holden that he may give in Evidence any such Exception in a Proviso of the Act, (because any such Exception shews that he did not act against the Form of the Statute;) but that he cannot [d] give in Evidence any Clause of Exemption in a latter Statute, but ought to plead it.

CHAP. XLVII.

Of Verdict.

FOR the general Learning of Verdicts I shall refer to other Books, and in this Place take Notice only of the following Particulars;

Sect. 1. 1st, That it seems to have been [a] anciently an uncontroverted Rule, and hath been allowed, even by those [b] of the contrary Opinion, to have been the general Tradition of the Law, that a Jury sworn and charged in a capital [c] Case, cannot be discharged (without the [d] Prisoner's Consent) till they have given a Verdict. And notwithstanding some [e] Authorities to the contrary in the Reign of King Charles II. this hath been holden for clear Law both in the Reign of King[f] James II. and [g] since the Revolution.

Sect. 2. 2dly, That it seems to have been [h] always agreed, that in all [i] capital Cases the Jury must give their Verdict openly in Court, and cannot give a privy Verdict.

Sect. 3. 3dly, That it is settled, [k] that the Jury may give a special Verdict in any criminal Case, whether Capital or not Capital, as well as in a Civil.

Sect. 4. 4thly, That it hath been [l] adjudged, that where the Jury find a Man not guilty of an Indictment or Appeal of Murder, they are not bound to make any Inquiry, whether he be guilty of Manslaughter, &c. But that if they will they may, according to the Nature of the Evidence, find him guilty of [m] Manslaughter or [n] Homicide se defendendo, or per infortunium; for the Killing is the Substance, and the Malice but a Circumstance, a [a] Variance as to which hurts not the Verdict. Yet the Books seem to make this Difference that where the Jury find the Defendant guilty of Manslaughter on an Indictment of Murder, they may give their Verdict [b] generally, without setting out any of the Circumstances of the Fact: But that they shall not [c] be received to find him guilty generally of Homicide se defendendo, or per infortunium, but must set out the whole Circumstances of the Facts, and in the[d] Conclusion shew of what Crime they find the Defendant guilty, wherein if they be mistaken, it is [e] said, that the Court may notwithstanding give such Judgment as shall appear to be proper from the Circumstances of the Fact specially set forth.

Sect. 5. 5thly, That it hath been [f] adjudged, That if the Jury on an Indictment or Appeal of Murder find the Defendant guilty of Manslaughter, without saying any thing expresly as to the Murder, it is insufficient and void, as being only a Verdict for Part. And Quaere if the Law be not the same where the Jury upon such an Indictment find that the Defendant killed the Deceased se defendendo or per infortunium, and do not expressly find that he did not murder him, according to the Generality of the ancient [g]

Authorities.

Sect. 6. 6thly, That it is agreed, that on an Indictment for stealing Goods of a certain Value above 12 d. the [h] Jury may find the Defendant guilty, but that the Goods are but of the Value of 10 d. &c. But it seems that if a Man be indicted for Felony generally, and upon the Evidence it [i] plainly appear that the Fact amounts to no more than a bare Trespass, he cannot be found guilty of the Trespass, but ought to be indicted anew. Yet if the special Circumstances of the Case be set forth in an Indictment for an Offence laid as Felony, and the Defendant be found guilty generally, and afterwards the Court be of Opinion that the Fact doth not amount to Felony, but only to an enormous Trespass, it seems [k] agreed, That Judgment may by given as for a Trespass only. Also if the Jury find a special Verdict on a general Indictment for Felony; and the Crime be adjudged upon such Verdict to be but a Trespass, [l] Judgment may be give upon it as for a Trespass only. Also if on an Indictment of Trespass the Fact appear to have been felonious, it hath been [m] adjudged, That the Defendant may be found guilty of the Indictment as it is laid, because the King may proceed against the Offender as he thinks fit, either as a Trespasser or Felon. But the contrary is [n] said to have been holden by the late Chief Justice Holt; and it hath been [o] adjudged, that if it appear in an Action of Trespass that the Taking was felonious, no Verdict ought to be taken unless the Defendant have been before tried for the Felony, because the Suffering such Actions might be a Means to prevent Prosecutions for Felonies.

Sect. 7. Seventhly, That it hath been holden, That a Verdict acquitting a Defendant of the Death of a Man found against him by the Coroner's Inquest, ought not to be received unless it shew what other Person did the Fact; but for this I shall refer to Ch. 9. Sect. 33.[266]

Sect. 8. Eighthly, That on an Indictment for a Riot against three or more, if a Verdict acquit all but two, and find them guilty; or on an Indictment for a Conspiracy, if the Verdict acquit all but one, and find him guilty, it is repugnant and [a] void as to the two found guilty in the first Case, and as to the one found guilty in the second, unless the Indictment charge them with having made such Riot or Conspiracy, simul cum aliis juratoribus ignotis; for otherwise it appears that the Defendants are found guilty of an Offence whereof it is impossible that they should be guilty; for there can be no Riot where there are no more Persons than two, nor can there be a Conspiracy where there is no Partner. Yet it seems [b] agreed, That if twenty Persons are indicted for a Riot or Conspiracy, and any three found guilty of the Riot, or any two of the Conspiracy, the Verdict is good: And that [c] where several are indicted for Treason or Felony, or other Crime, which may be as well done by one only, as by more, a Verdict [d] may find one of the Defendants only guilty, and acquit all the rest. And in like Manner it seems [e] agreed, That a Verdict on an Information on a penal Statute against several Persons jointly charged with the Offence against the Statute, may acquit some and find others guilty; because tho' the Word of the Information be joint, yet in Judgment of Law, each Defendant is severally charged for his own Offence. And in like Manner [f] it seems, That the Defendant in such Information may be found guilty for a less Time or Degree than is laid, unless the Offence consist in the Doing some entire Thing, which must be precisely proved in the same Manner as it is laid.

Sect. 9. Ninthly, That the Court in judging upon a special Verdict is confined to the Fact expresly found, and cannot supply the Want thereof, as to any material Part by any Argument or Implication from what is expresly found; and therefore where an Indictment set forth that the Defendant discharged a Gun against J. S. and thereby gave him a mortal Wound, &c. and the special Verdict found that he discharged a Gun and thereby killed J. S. but did not expresly say, that he discharged it against J. S. it was [g] adjudged, That the Court could not take it from the other Circumstances of the Fact, which were expresly found, tho' they were as full to the Purpose as possibly they could well be, that the Defendant discharged the Gun against J. S.

Sect. 10. Tenthly, That it hath been [h] adjudged, That where an Indictment found at the Assises is removed into the King's Bench by Certiorari, and there the Defendant pleads Not guilty, & de hoc ponit se super patriam, & T. F. Miles Coronator & attornatus Dom' Regis, &c. similiter, and thereupon the Defendant is found guilty of the Offence in Indictamento praedict' interius ei imposit' prout praedict' T. F. interius versus eum queritur, the Verdict is good; for these Words prout praedict' T. F. interius versus eum queritur shall be rejected as Surplus, [i] repugnant and void, and the Verdict is compleat without them.

Sect. 11. Eleventhly, That it hath been [a] adjudged, That if the Jury acquit a Prisoner of an Indictment of Felony against manifest Evidence, the Court may, before the Verdict is recorded, but [b] not after, order them to go out again and reconsider the Matter; but this is by many thought hard, and seems not of late Years to have been so frequently practised as formerly. Also there are [c] Instances where Defendants acquitted against plain Evidence, of Felonies and other enormous Crimes, have been bound to their Good Behaviour. However it is settled, That the Court cannot set aside a Verdict which [d] acquits a Defendant of a Prosecution properly criminal, as it seems that they may a Verdict that [e] convicts him for having been given contrary to Evidence, and the Direction of the Judge, or any Verdict whatever for [f] Mistrial.

Jury, (Jurata,) May be derived from the Latin jurare, to swear, and signifies either twenty-four or twelve men, sworn to inquire of the matter of fact, and declare the truth upon such evidence as shall be delivered to them, touching the matter in question. And observe, that in England there are three sorts of trials, viz, one by parliament, another by battle, and the third by assise of jury. Smith de Rep. Ang. lib. 2. cap. 5, 6, 7. Of the two former read him, and see Battle, Combat, and Parliament. The trial by assise, (be the action civil or criminal, publick or private, personal or real); is referred for the fact to a jury, and as they find it, so passeth the judgment; and the great favour that by this the King shews to his subjects, more than the Princes of other nations, you may read in Glanvil, lib. 2. cap. 7. where he calls it, Regale beneficium elementis principis de consilio procerum populis indultum, quo vitae hominum & status integritati tam salubriter consulitur, ut in jure, quod quis in libero soli tenemento possidet, retinendo, duelli casum declinare possint homines ambiguum, &c. This jury is not only used in circuits of justices errant, but also in other courts and matters of office, as if the escheator make inquisition in any thing touching his office, he doth it by jury or inquest. If the coroner enquire how a subject found dead, came to his end, he useth an inquest. The justices of peace in their quarter-sessions, the sheriff in his county and turn, the bailiff of a hundred, the steward of a court leet or court baron, if they inquire of any offence, or decide any cause between party and party, they do it in the same manner: So that where it is said, all things are triable by parliament, battle or assise, assise in this place is taken for a jury or inquest, impaneled upon any cause in a court where this kind of trial is used; and though it be commonly supposed that this custom of ending and deciding causes proceeded from the Saxons and Britons, and was of favour permitted to us by the Conqueror; yet we find by the Grand Custumary of Normandy, cap. 24. that this course was likewise used in that country; for assise is in that chapter defined to be an assembly of wise men, with the bailiff, in a place certain, at a time assigned forty days before, whereby justice may be done in causes heard in that court; of this custom also, and these knights of Normandy, Johannes Taber maketh mention in the Rubrick of the title De Militari Testamento, in Institut. This jury, though it appertains to most courts of the Common law, yet it is most notorious in the half-year courts of the justices errant, commonly called the Great Assises; and in the quarter-sessions, and in them it is must ordinarily called a jury, and that in civil causes; whereas in other courts it is termed oftner an inquest, and in the court-baron, a jury of the homage: In the general assise, there are usually many juries, because there are store of causes both civil and criminal, commonly to be tried; whereof one is called The grand jury, and the rest Petit juries, whereof it seemeth there should be one for every hundred. Lamb. Eirenarch. lib. 4. cap. 3. pag. 384. The grand jury consists ordinarily of twenty-four grave substantial gentlemen or some of the better sort of yeomen, chosen indifferently by the sheriff out of the whole shire to consider of all bills of indictment preferred to the court, which they do either approve by writing upon them Billa vera, or disallow by indorsing Ignoramus: Such as they do approve, if they touch life and death, are farther referred to another jury to be considered of, because the case is of such importance; but others of lighter moment are, upon their allowance, without more work, fined by the Bench, except the party traverse the indictment, or challenge it for insufficiency, or remove the cause to a higher court by certiorari; in which two former cases it is referred to another jury, and in the latter transmitted to a higher court. Lamb. Eir. lib. 4. cap. 7. And presently upon the allowance of this bill by the grand inquest, a man is said to be indicted; such as they disallow, are delivered to the Bench, by whom they are forthwith cancelled or torn. The petit jury consists of twelve men, impanelled as well upon criminal as upon civil causes: Those that pass upon offences of life and death, do bring in their verdict either Guilty or Not guilty; whereupon the prisoner, if he be found guilty, is said to be convicted, and so afterwards receiveth his judgment and condemnation, or otherwise is acquitted, and set free. Of this read Fortescue, cap. 47. Those that pass upon civil causes real, are all, or so many as can conveniently be had, of the same hundred, where the land or tenement in question doth lie, being four at least, and they upon due examination bring in their verdict either for the demandant or tenant. Of this also see Fortescue, cap. 25, 26. According to which, judgment passeth afterward in the court, where the cause began: And the reason hereof is, because these justices of assise are in this case, for the ease of the country only, to make the verdict of the jury by virtue of the writ called nisi prius, and so return it to the court where the cause is depending. See Nisi prius, and Lambard in his Explication of Saxon words verbo Centuria; his words are these, In singulis centuriis comitia sunto, atque liberae conditionis viri duodeni aetate superiores, una cum praeposito sacra tenentes, juranto, se adeo virum aliquem innocentem haud condemnaturos, sontemve absoluturos. See also the Custumory of Normandy, cap. 69. See Twelve men, and Lambard's Eiren. b. 4. c. 3. pag. 384. Mr. Sheringham, in his De Anglorum Gentis Origine, derives the origin of our jury from great antiquity: Quod autem Wodenus (Asgardiae Rex) dicitur duodecim regni proceres sibi assumpsisse, iisdemque jurisdicendi in populum provinciam dedisse, hinc forte illa nunquam apud nos satis laudanda consuetudo invaluit, qua duodecim juratis viris, quos patrio sermone a jury idcirco vocamus, tota juris decernendi & litium expediendi potestas concessa est. f. 272. This trial by jury was anciently called Duedecim virale judicium. We read it likewise in the laws of King AEthelred, made by him at Wantage, a town in Berkshire viz. Habeantur placita in singulis wapentakiis ut exeunt seniores duodecim Thayni & praepositus cum eis jurent super sanctuarium quod eis dabatur in manus, quod neminem innocentum velint accusare vel noxium concelare. 'Tis true, this may seem to intend the number of the judges, and not of the jury: But the jury themselves in some cases are judges, that is, they are judges of the fact, and the judge is bound to give sentence according to their verdict of the fact. Cowell, edit. 1727.

The trial per pais, or by a jury of one's country, is justly esteemed one of the chiefest excellencies of our constitution; for what greater security can any person have in his life, liberty or estate, than to be sure of not being devested of, or injured in any of these, without the sense and verdict of twelve honest and impartial men of his neighbourhood? Hence we find the Common law herein confirmed by Magna Charta, cap. 29. Nullus liber homo capiatur, &c. Fortesc. de Laud. Leg. Ang. cap. 25. Co. Lit. 155. Co. Preface to 3*d and* 8*th Report*.

Likewise the authority of this trial, and its being peculiar to us, have been taken notice of, as matters which reflect honour on our constitution; for tho' there were anciently several other methods of trial, such as by battle, ordeal, &c. yet have they, from the inconveniencies attending them, been laid aside; and this alone cultivated and improved, as the best method of investigating truth. Spelm. Gloss. verbo Jurate. Glan. lib. 2. cap. 7.

1. STATUTES CONCERNING JURIES.

Stat. Marleber. 52 Hen. 3. cap. 14. Concerning charters of exemption, and liberties, that the purchasers shall not be impanelled in assises, juries and inquests, if their oaths be so requisite that without them justice cannot be ministred, as in great assises, perambulations, and in deeds where they be named for witnesses, or in attaints, and in other cases like, they shall be compelled to swear, saving to them at another time their exemption.

Stat. Westm. 2. 13 Edw. 1. cap. 38. In one assise no more shall be summoned than twenty-four; and old men above seventy years, and such as be sick at the time of the summons, or not dwelling in that country, shall not be put in juries or petty assises; and if such assises and juries be taken out of the shire, none shall pass in them but those that may dispend 40 s. yearly at least, except such as be witnesses in writings; neither shall this statute extend to great assises; and if the sheriff or bailiffs offend in any point of this statute, and thereupon be convict, damages shall be awarded to the parties grieved, and they shall nevertheless be amerced to the King; and justices assigned to take assises shall have power to hear plaints as to the articles in this statute.

Stat. 21 Ed. 1. stat. 1. No sheriff nor bailiff shall put in any recognizance that shall pass out of their proper bailiwicks any, except they have lands to the yearly value of an 100 s. at least. And this statute shall not restrain the last statute of Westminster, cap. 38. so that within the county before justices of the King, assigned to the taking of inquests or other recognizances, none shall be impanelled except he have lands to the yearly value of 40 s. and likewise saving that before justices errant, and also in cities, boroughs and other market-towns, it shall be done as it hath been accustomed.

Stat. 28 Edw. 1. stat. 3. cap. 9. No sheriff nor bailiff shall impanel in juries too many persons, nor otherwise than is ordained by the statute, and they shall put in the jury such as be next neighbours, most sufficient and least suspicious; and he that otherwise doth, and is attainted thereupon, shall pay the plaintiff his damages double, and be grievously amerced to the King.

Stat. 33 Edw. 1. stat. 4. Of inquests to be taken wherein the King is party, notwithstanding it be alleged that the jurors or some of them, be not indifferent for the King, yet such inquests shall not remain untaken for that cause; but if they that sue for the King will challenge any of those jurors, they shall assign a cause, and the truth of the challenge shall be inquired of.

Stat. 5 Edw. 3. cap. 10. If any juror in assises, juries or inquests, take of the one party or the other, and be thereof attainted, he shall not be put in any assises, juries or inquests, and nevertheless he shall be commanded to prison, and further ransomed at the King's will; and the justices before whom such assises, &c. shall pass, shall have power to inquire and determine according to this statute.

Stat. 25 Edw. 3. stat. 5. cap. 3. No indictor shall be put in inquests upon the deliverances of the indictees of felony or trespasses, if he be challenged for the same cause.

Stat. 34 Edw. 3. cap. 4. Panels shall be made of the next people not suspected nor procured; and the sheriffs, coroners and other ministers, which do against the same, shall be punished, before the justices take the inquest, according to their trespass, as well against the King as against the party.

Stat. 34 Edw. 3. cap. 8. In every plea whereof the inquest or assise doth pass, if any of the parties will sue against any of the jurors, that they have taken of his adversary, or of him, for their verdict, he shall have his plaint by bill presently before the justices before whom they did swear, and if the juror plead to the country, the inquest shall be taken forthwith; and if any other than the party will sue for the King against the juror; it shall be heard; and if the jurors be attainted at the suit of other than the party, he that sueth shall have half the fine; and the parties to the plea shall recover their damages by the taxing of the inquest; and the juror so attainted shall have imprisonment one year, which shall not be pardoned; and if the party will sue by writ before other justices, he shall have the suit in the form aforesaid.

Stat. 38 Edw. 3. stat. 1. cap. 12. If any jurors do take any thing of the plaintiff or defendant to say their verdict, and thereof be attainted by the process contained in stat. 34 Edw. 3. cap. 8. be it at the suit of the party that will sue for himself or for the King, or at the suit of any other, every of the said jurors shall pay ten times as much as he hath taken; and he that will sue shall have the one half, and the King the other; and all imbraceors to procure such inquest for gain shall be punished as the jurors; or if the juror or imbraceor have not whereof to make gree, he shall have imprisonment for one year; and no justice or other minister shall inquire of office upon the points of this article, but only at the suit of the party or of other.

Stat. 42 Edw. 3. cap. 11. No inquest but assises and deliverances of gaols shall be taken by writ of nisi prius, nor in other manner, before that the names of all that shall pass in the inquests be returned in court; and the sheriffs shall array the panels in assises four days at least before the sessions of the justices; upon pain of 20 l. and bailiffs of franchises shall make their answer to the sheriffs six days before the sessions, upon the same pain; and in all panels arrayed by the sheriffs or bailiffs shall be put the most substantial people and worthy of faith, and not suspect, and the nighest.

Stat. 11 Hen. 4. cap. 9. No indictment shall be made but by inquest of lawful people, returned by the sheriffs or bailiffs or franchises, without any denomination beforehand made according to law; and if any indictment be made to the contrary, the same shall be void.

Stat. 2. Hen. 5. stat. 2. cap. 3. No person shall pass in any inquest upon trial of the death of a man, not betwixt party and party in plea real or personal whereof the debt or damage amounts to forty marks, if he have not lands of the yearly value of 40 s. so that it be challenged by the party.

Stat. 8 Edw. 4. cap. 3. Every juror that shall be impanelled and returned within the county of Middlesex in the King's courts, at every fourth day of the return shall be demanded; and all persons impanelled in those courts, that appear at the said day, their appearance shall be recorded; and every default, essoin and other delay of any plaintiff or defendant in any personal action shall be adjudged, adjourned and allowed, as before this statute.

Stat. 1 Ric. 3. cap. 4. No bailiff, nor other officer, shall return in any panel any person in any the sheriff's turns, but such as be of good same, and having lands of freehold within the counties, to the yearly value of 20 s. at least, or copyhold, to the yearly value of 26 s. 8 d. and if any bailiff or other officer return any person contrary to the statute, he shall lose of every person so returned 40 s. and the sheriff other 40 s. the one half to the King, and the other half to the party that will sue by action of debt, &c. and every indictment before any sheriff in his turn otherwise taken shall be void.

Stat. 11 Hen. 7. cap. 21. sect. 1. No person shall be impanelled in any jury in London, except he be of lands or chattels to the value of forty marks; and no person shall be impanelled in any jury in the said city for lands or tenements, or action personal wherein the debt or damages amount to forty marks, except he be in lands and goods to the value of a hundred marks, and the same cause of challenge shall be admitted as a principal challenge; and every such person summoned to appear in any jury before any of the judges of the same city, making default at first summons, shall lose in issues 12 d. and at the second default 2. s. and so at every such default the issues to be doubled; and all such issues lost in the mayor's court shall be levied to the use of the mayor and commonalty; and all such issues lost in the sheriff's courts shall be levied to the use of the sheriffs toward their fee-farm. See the rest of this act in Attaint.

Stat. 3 Hen. 8. cap. 12. All panels returned, which be not at the suit of any party, that shall be made by every sheriff and their ministers afore any justices of gaol-delivery, or justices of peace in their sessions, to inquire for the King, shall be reformed by putting to and taking out of names, by the discretion of the justices; and the same justices shall command every sheriff and their ministers to put other persons in the panel by their discretions; and if any sheriff or other ministers do not return the panels so reformed, such sheriff or minister shall forfeit 20 l. the one half to the King, and the other half to him that will sue for the same by action of debt, &c. and the King's pardon shall be no bar against the parties that shall sue.

Stat. 4. Hen. 8. cap. 3. sect. 2. For all issues to be lost in the mayor's court, according to sat. 11 Hen. 7. cap. 21. it shall be lawful to the mayor to distrain; and in like manner it shall be lawful to the sheriffs to distrain for such issues lost in their courts.

Sect. 4. The sheriffs of London shall have power to return in panels or arrays of all actions in the courts of King's Bench and Common Pleas, or Exchequer, persons being citizens, having goods to the value of 100 marks, to try the issues joined in such action, as other persons having lands of the yearly value of 40 s.

Sect. 5. The sheriffs of the said city shall return upon the first distress upon every of the jurors 20 d. and upon the second distress 40 d. and upon every distress after that the double, till a full jury appear; and the sheriffs that shall make any return contrary to the form aforesaid shall forfeit 10 l. the one half to the King, and the other half to the party that will sue.

Stat. 5. Hen. 8. cap. 5. sect. 3. The act 4 Hen. 8. cap. 3. shall be expounded, that the sheriffs be bound to return at every first distress of nisi prius, to be had at St. Martins upon every of the jurors, 20 d. and upon the second distress of nisi prius, 40 d. and upon every distress of nisi prius after that the double, till a full jury appear; and no sheriff shall forfeit by force of the said statute for any return, except only upon writs of distresses before justices of nisi prius within the said city; and upon all other processes awarded out of the said court or Exchequer, it shall be lawful to the sheriffs to make their returns as they were wont to do.

Stat. 23 Hen. 8. cap. 13. sect. 1. Every person being the King's natural subject, who do enjoy the liberties of any city, borough or town corporate, where he dwelleth, being worth in goods to the value of 40 l. shall be admitted in trial of murders and felonies in every sessions and gaol-delivery for the liberty of such cities, &c. albeit they have no freehold.

Sect. 2. Provided that this act do not extend to any knight or esquire dwelling in any such city. &c.

Stat. 35. Hen. 8. cap. 6. sect. 3. In every case where such persons, as should pass upon the trial of any issue joined in the King's courts at Westminster, ought by law to dispend 40 s. by the year of freehold, the writs of venire facias shall be in this form: Rex, &c. Praecipimus, &c. quod venire facias coram, &c. 12 liberos et legales homines de visn. de B. quorum quilibet habeat quadraginta solid' terrae, tenementorum vel reddituum per annum ad minus, per quos rei veritas melius sciri poterit. Et qui nec. &c. And where it is not requisite that the persons shall dispend 40 s. by the year of freehold, the writs of venire shall be made after the form aforesaid, omitting this clause, quorum quilibet, &c. and upon every venire that shall have the said clause, quorum quilibet, &c. the sheriff shall not return any person unless he may dispend 40 s. by the year of freehold, out of ancient demesne, within the country; and also shall return in every such panel six hundredors, if there be so many within the hundred, where the venue lieth; upon pain to forfeit for every person that cannot dispend 40 s. by the year, 20 s. and for every hundred or omitted in such return, 20 s. and in every venire wherein the clause quorum quilibet, &c. shall be omitted, the sheriff shall not return any person, unless he may dispend some lands or tenements of freehold, out of ancient demesne, within the county, and also shall return in every such panel six hundredors, if there be so many, upon like pain.

Sect. 4. Upon every first writ of habeas corpora or distringas with a nisi prius, delivered of record, the sheriffs shall return in issues upon every person impanelled at least 5 s. and at the second habeas corpora or distringas, 10 s. and at the third writ, 13 s. 4 d. and upon every writ further, to double the issues until a full jury be sworn; on pain to forfeit 5 l.

Sect. 6. In every such habeas corpora or distringas with a nisi prius, where the jury is like to remain untaken for default of jurors, the justices upon request made by the plaintiff or demandant shall have authority to command the sheriff to name so many other able persons of the county then present as shall make up a full jury, which persons shall be added to the former panel.

Sect. 7. The parties shall have their challenge to the jurors so added as if they had been impanelled upon the venire.

Sect. 9. In case such persons as the sheriff shall name as aforesaid be present and do not appear, or do wilfully withdraw themselves, the justices shall set such fine upon such juror as they shall think good, to be levied as issues lost by jurors.

Sect. 10. Where any jury shall be made full by the command of the justices, such persons as were returned in the panel that shall make default shall lose issues as tho' the jury had remained for default of jurors.

Sect. 11. Upon a reasonable excuse for the default of any juror proved before the justices of assise or nisi prius, at the day of their appearance, by the oaths of two witnesses, the justices shall have authority to discharge such juror of such forfeiture of issues; and the sheriff shall be therein discharged of the issues.

Sect. 12. If the assise of nisi prius be discontinued for not coming of the justices, or any other occasion, other than by default of jurors, the jurors shall be discharged of any issues, and the sheriff shall be likewise discharged of the penalties for the non-returning of such issues.

Sect. 13. If upon any such habeas corpora or distringas with a nisi prins, issues be returned upon any hundredors or jurors where the same hundredors and jurors shall not be lawfully summoned, the sheriff or minister shall lose double so much as the issues returned upon such hundredors or jurors shall amount unto; the moiety of all which forfeitures, other than the issues to be returned upon the jurors, shall be to the King, and the other half to him that will sue for the same; saving to all persons all such right as they should have to such issues.

Sect. 14. This act shall not extend to any city or towns corporate, or to any sheriff or ministers in the same, but that they may return such persons as they have been accustomed to do, so that they return like issues as are

Made perpetual, 2. Edw. 6. cap. 32.

Stat. 4 & 5 Phil. & Mar. cap. 7. sect. 2. Justices of assise and nisi prius, before whom any trial shall be made by virtue of any writ of habeas corpora or distringas with a nisi prius (where the jury is like to remain for default of jurors) shall have authority, upon request made for the King, or by the party that followeth as well for the King as for himself upon any penal statute, or his attorney, to command the sheriff to name so many able persons of the county then present, and to add the names to the former panel as shall make a full jury.

Sect. 3. Every clause in the act 35 Hen. 8. cap. 6. shall be taken to give the same advantage to the King, and all such persons as shall pursue any action, &c. for the King and the party, as the plaintiff in any other action might have.

Stat. 14 Eliz. cap. 9. sect. 1. Where the plaintiff or demandant may have upon his request to the justices of nisi prius in England, or to the justices of oyer, or of assises, of the twelve shires of Wales and the counties palatines of Lancaster, Chester and Durham, a tales de circumstantibus, in all such cases the tenants, actors, avowants and defendants (if the plaintiffs or demandants shall forbear to pray the same) may upon their request have by the same justices the tales unto them granted in like manner as the plaintiff or demandant may.

Sect. 2. In all popular actions in the Queen's courts of record upon penal laws, wherein any person shall sue as well for the Queen as himself, the defendants shall he admitted to pray a tales de circumstantibus.

Stat. 27 Eliz. cap. 6. sect. 1. Where jurors returned for trial of any issues in the courts of King's Bench, Common Pleas or Exchequer, or before justices of assise, by the laws now in force ought to have freehold of the yearly value of 40 s. in every such case the jurors shall have estate of freehold to the yearly value of 4 l. at least; and the writs of venire facias shall be in this form: Regina, &c. Praecipimus, &c. quod venire facias coram, &c. duodecim liberos et legales homines de vicineto de B. quorum quilibet habeat quatuor libres terrae, tenementorum vel reddituum per annum ad minus, per quos rei veritas melius sciri poterit. Et qui nec. &c. And upon such writ the sheriff shall not return any person unless he may dispend 4 l. in the year of freehold, not of ancient demesne, within the county; upon pain to forfeit for every person 20 s.

Sect. 2. Upon every first writ of habeas corpora or distringas with a nisi prius delivered of record, the sheriff shall return in issues upon every person impanelled at least, 10 s. and at the second writ, 20 s. and the third writ, 30 s. and upon every writ further to double the issues, until a full jury be sworn; upon pain to forfeit for every return contrary to the form aforesaid, 5 l.

Sect. 3. If any sheriff or other minister return any person in any jury, wherein he shall for default of appearance lose any issues, where in truth such person shall not be summoned, the same sheriff, &c. shall forfeit to the person so returned double the value of the issues lost.

Sect. 4. If any sheriff, undersheriff, &c. or bailiff of franchise, shall take any money or other profit, or any agreement to have any profit for the not returning of any person to be sworn as juror for the trial of any issue joined before any justices, every sheriff, &c. so offending shall forfeit 5 l. the one moiety to the Queen, and the other moiety to such person as will sue for the same in any court of record.

Sect. 5. Upon the trial of any issue in any personal action, no challenge for the hundred shall be admitted if two hundredors appear.

Sect. 6. All other challenges principal, or for other cause, shall be admitted as if this act had never been.

Sect. 7. This act shall not extend to any juries or issues to be returned in any city or town corporate, or other place privileged to hold plea, or in the twelve shires of Wales.

Stat. 27 Eliz. cap. 7. sect. 2. No sheriff or other person shall return any juror dwelling out of any liberty, without the addition of the place of his abode, at the time of the return, or within one year next before, or some other addition by which the party may be known; nor any juror within any liberty, with other addition than such as shall be delivered to him by the bailiff of the liberty; nor any bailiff of liberty shall return any juror, or deliver to the sheriff the names of any persons to be returned, without the addition of the place of abode, &c. and no extract of issues against any juror shall be delivered out without such addition as is put in the original panel or tales wherein such juror shall be returned; and no undersheriff, bailiff or other person, shall levy any issues of any other persons than of such as by the said estreat is of right charged with the said issues; upon pain that every clerk that shall write or deliver any such estreat, and every other person offending contrary to this act, shall forfeit to the Queen five marks, and to the party grieved five marks.

Sect. 3. Justices of oyer and terminer, justices of assise and justices of peace, as well within liberties as without, shall have power to hear and determine the offences aforesaid.

Made perpetual, 39 Eliz. cap. 18. sect. 32.

Stat. 4 Will. & Mar. cap. 24. sect. 15. All jurors (other than strangers upon trials per medietatem linguae) to be returned for trials of issues joined in the courts of King's Bench, Common Pleas or Exchequer, or before justices of assise or nisi prius, oyer and terminer, gaol-delivery or quarter-sessions in any county of England, shall have within the county 10 l. by the year of freehold or copyhold, or ancient demesne, or in rents, in fee-simple, fee-tail or for life; and in every county of Wales every such juror shall have 6 l. by the year as aforesaid; and if any of a lesser estate be returned, it shall be a good cause of challenge, and the party returned shall be discharged upon the said challenge, or upon his own oath; and no juryman's issues shall be saved but by order of court, for some reasonable cause proved upon oath; and all issues shall be duly estreated and levied; and the writ of venire facias for impanelling of juries in cases aforesaid in England shall be after this form: Rex, &c. Praecipimus, &c. quod venire fac' coram, &c. duodecim liberos & legales homines de vicineto de A. quor' quilibet habeat decem librat' terrae, tenementor' vel reddituum per annum ad minus per quos, &c. & qui nec, &c. and the writs for returning of juries in Wales, shall be in the same manner, altering only the word decem for sex; and the sheriff shall not return any person, unless he have 10 l. or 6 l. respectively, by the year, at least, in the county; upon pain to forfeit for every person 5 l. to their Majesties.

Sect. 16. No sheriff or bailiff of liberty shall return any person to have been summoned, unless such person shall have been duly summoned six days before the day of appearance, nor shall take money or reward to excuse any juror; upon pain to forfeit 10 l. to their Majesties.

Sect. 17. Saving to all cities, boroughs and towns corporate, their ancient usage of returning jurors.

Sect. 18. It shall be lawful to return any person upon the tales in England, who shall have within the county 5 l. by the year, and not otherwise.

Sect. 19. It shall be lawful to return any person upon the tales in Wales, who shall have within the county 3 l. by the year.

Sect. 20. No fee shall be taken by any sheriff, clerk of assises or other person, upon account of any tales returned; upon pain of 10 l. one moiety to the prosecutor, and the other moiety to their Majesties, to be recovered by action of debt, &c.

Sect. 21. No writ de non ponendis in assisis & juratis shall be granted, unless upon oath made that the suggestions are true.

Sect. 22. So much of this act, as relates to the returning of jurors, shall be in force for three years, &c.

Continued by 7 Will. 3. cap. 32. together with that act, for 7 years from the first of May 1696, and to the end of the next session of parliament; and afterward continued along with the act 7 Will. 3. cap. 32.

Stat. 7 Will. 3. cap. 32. sect. 1[.] If any plaintiff or demandant in any cause in the courts at Westminster, which shall be at issue, shall sue forth a venire facias, upon which any habeas corpora or distringas with a nisi prius shall issue, in order to the trial of such issue at the assizes, and such plaintiff, &c. shall not proceed to trial at the first assizes; in all such cases (other than where views by jurors shall be directed) the plaintiff, &c. whensoever he shall think fit to try the issue, shall sue forth a new venire in the form: Quod de novo venire facias coram, &c. duodecim liberos & legales homines de vicineto de A. quorum quilibet habeat decem librat' terrae, tenementor' vel reddituum per annum ad minus, per quos, &c. & qui nec, &c. which writ being returned and filed, a habeas corpora or distringas with a nisi prius shall issue thereupon (for which the ancient fees shall be taken, as in case of the pluries habeas corpora or distringas), upon which the plaintiff, &c. may proceed to trial, as if no former venire facias had been filed, and so toties quoties; and if any defendant or tenant, in any action in the said courts, shall be minded to bring to trial any issue, when by the course of the court he may do the same by proviso, such defendant, &c. shall of the issuable term, next preceding such intended trial, sue out a new venire by proviso, and prosecute the same by habeas corpora or distringas, with a nisi prius, as though there had not been any former venire sued out or returned, and so toties quoties.

Sect. 3. In every writ of habeas corpora or distringes, with a nisi prius, where a full jury shall not appear, or where the jury is like to remain untaken for default of jurors, the sheriff shall upon the awarding the tales, return freeholders or copyholders of the county, who shall be returned upon some other panel to serve at the same assises, and not others, if so many of the other panels be present; and either of the parties shall have his challenge; and in case any such freeholder or copyholder, as the sheriff shall return upon the tales, being present, shall be called, and not appear, or shall wilfully withdraw himself, the judge of assise shall set fine upon such person.

Sect. 4. That sheriffs may be the better informed of persons to be returned for trials of issues joined in the courts of Chancery, King's Bench, Common Pleas or Exchequer, or to serve upon juries at assises, sessions of oyer and terminer, general gaol-delivery and sessions of the peace; all constables, tithingmen and headboroughs, shall yearly, at the quarter-sessions, in the week after St. Michael, upon the first day of the sessions, or upon the first day that the session shall be held by adjournment at any particular division, return a list of the names and places of abode of all persons within the places for which they serve, qualified to serve upon such juries, with their additions, between the age of one and twenty years and seventy years, to the justices; which justices, or two of them at the said sessions, shall cause to be delivered a duplicate of the list, by the clerks of the peace to the sheriffs, on or before the first of January, and cause the lists to be entred by the clerk of the peace, amongst the records of the sessions; and no sheriff shall impanel any persons to try issues joined in the said courts, or to serve in any jury at the assises, sessions of oyer and terminer, gaol-delivery or sessions of the peace, that shall not be named in the list; and any constable, tithingman or headborough, failing to make the return aforesaid, shall forfeit 5 l. to his Majesty.

Sect. 5. Every summons of any person qualified to the aforesaid services, shall be made by the sheriff, his officer or deputy, six days before at least, showing to every person so summoned, the warrant under the seal of the office; and in case any juror be absent from his habitation, notice of such summons shall be given, by having a note in writing under the hand of such officer, at the dwelling-house of such juror, with some person there inhabiting.

Sect. 6. The said return to the justices shall be a good excuse for the sheriff, for such summons and returns; and if any action shall be brought against any sheriff for such return, the sheriff may plead the general issue; and if the plaintiff be nonsuited, &c. the plaintiff or informer shall pay treble costs; and if the sheriff, his deputy or bailiffs, shall summons any freeholder or copyholder otherwise than as aforesaid, or neglect their duty in the services required by this act, or excuse any person for favour or reward, or allow of any writ of non ponendis in assizis & juratis, or other writ, to excuse any person from the service of any jury, under the age of seventy years; such sheriff, &c. shall forfeit 20 l. to be recoveed [sic] by such party grieved, or whom else shall sue for the same, in any of the courts at Westminster.

Sect. 7. No person shall be returned to serve upon any jury at the assises or general gaol-delivery for the county of York, or at any sessions of the peace for any part thereof (the city of York and town of Kingston upon Hull excepted) above once in four years; and every sheriff of the said county shall keep a register, wherein the names of all who have served as jurors, with their addition and places of abode, and the times and places of such their services shall be alphabetically entred, which register shall be delivered over to the succeeding sheriff within ten days after he shall be sworn into his office; and every juror who shall serve at any the said assises, gaol-delivery or sessions may, at the end of such assise, &c. repair to the sheriff to have his name entred, of which he shall have a certificate, upon request, gratis.

Sect. 8. Only one panel, consisting of forty-eight (each person having fourscore pounds land per annum) shall be returned to serve on the grand inquest, and no more than ten panels, consisting of twenty-four jurors each, shall be returned to serve upon trials in civil causes, at any assises for the county of York (except where special juries are directed by rule of court); and at no one quarter-sessions of the peace for the said county, or within any of the ridings within the same, or in any place where such sessions shall be holden by adjournment within the county, shall be returned above forty persons, to serve either upon the grand inquest or other service there.

Sect. 9. The inhabitants of the city of Westminster shall be exempted from serving in any jury at the sessions of the peace for Middlesex.

Sect. 10. The act 4 Will. & Mar. cap. 24, as to so much as doth relate to the returning of jurors, shall be a force, together with this act, for seven years, from the first of May 1696, and to the end of the next session of parliament.

Sect. 11. This act, or the said act, shall not give any longer time for the summoning of juries, to try any issues that are triable by jurors of London or Middlesex, than was required before; nor shall give any longer time of the return of any writ, precept or process of venire facias, habeas corpora or destringas; but where there shall not be six days between the awarding of such writ and return thereof, every juror may be summoned, attached or distrained, as he might have been before the said act.

Sect. 12. This act shall not extend to the city of London, nor to any county of any city or town, nor to any town corporate that have power by charter to hold sessions of gaol-delivery or sessions of the peace.

Farther continued by 1 Ano. st. 2. cap. 13. for seven years, and to the end of the next session, and continued farther for 11 years, &c. by 10 Ann. cap. 14. and continued farther for 7 years, &c. by 9 Geo. 1. cap. 8. and referred to by 3 Geo. 2. cap. 25, which act of 3 Geo. 2. cap. 25. is made perpetual by 6 Geo. 2. cap. 37.

Stat. 8 Will. 3. cap. 10. All justices of peace are required at their sessions next before the feast of St. Michael yearly, to issue precepts to the constables, requiring them to make such return of persons to serve upon juries, as by the act 7 Will. 3. cap. 32. is directed.

Stat. 1 Ann. st. 2. cap. 13. sect. 3. No person interested in such estate as will qualify him to serve on juries of the yearly value of 150 l. or of greater value, shall be returned to serve upon any jury, at any sessions of the peace for any part of the county of York, upon the penalty of 20 l. to be forfeited by any sheriff, or other officer making such return and summons, to be recovered for the use of any person that will sue for the same, in any of the courts of record at Westminster, by action of debt, &c.

Stat. 3 Ann. cap. 18. sect. 3. If any sheriff of the county of York shall, during the continuance of the act 7 Will. 3. cap. 32, neglect to keep such register, as in the act is directed, or shall neglect to enter the names of the jurors in any assises or quarter-sessions, as in the said act is directed, or shall neglect, within ten days after the succeeding sheriff shall be sworn into his office, to deliver over as well the registers that shall be made in the year wherein he shall have served sheriff, as also all such other registers as were prepared in the sheriffwick of any of his predecessors, within four years next before, and which were delivered over to him, or shall neglect to deliver such certificate gratis, as in the said act is mentioned; every such sheriff of the county of York shall forfeit 100 l. one moiety to her Majesty, and the other moiety to such person as shall sue for the same, in any of her Majesty's courts at Westminster.

Sect. 4. If any such sheriff of the said county, his deputy or bailiff, during the continuance of the said act, shall knowingly summon or return any person to serve on any jury at the assises or sessions of the peace, who shall within four years before such summons or return, have served on any jury at any assises or sessions within the county, and shall not, upon producing of such certificate, discharge the summons or return, and thereof give notice to the party summoned, six days before such assises or sessions of the peace; the said sheriff, &c. shall forfeit to the party so summoned 20 l. to be recovered as beforementioned, with costs.

Sect. 5. The justices of peace for all counties within England or Wales, shall yearly during the continuance of the said act, at the quarter-sessions next after the 24th of June, issue their warrants to the headconstables of every hundred, lathe or wapentake, requiring them to issue their precepts to the constables, tithingmen and headboroughs, requiring them to meet together with the headconstables, within fourteen days next after, at some usual place, where the constables, &c. shall prepare a list signed by them, of the names and places of abode of all the persons within the places for which they serve, qualified to serve on juries, according to the said act 4 Will. & Mar. cap. 24. with their additions, between the age of 21 years and 70 years, as by the said act 7 Will. 3. cap. 32. is directed; which list the constable, &c. yearly at the quarter-sessions in the week after St. Michael, upon the first day of the sessions, or upon the first day that the sessions shall be held by adjournment at any particular place, shall return to the justices; and any headconstable failing to issue his precept to meet with the constables, &c. shall forfeit 10 l. and any constable, &c. failing to meet the headconstable, and failing to prepare a list, and to return the same to the justices as aforesaid, shall forfeit 5 l. and every such high constable, constable and tithingman so offending, shall be prosecuted at the assises, sessions of oyer and terminer, or general gaol-delivery, or sessions of the peace, and the justices of peace at the quarter-sessions, after the 24th of June yearly, shall cause the said several acts to the read in court.

Continued by 10 Ann. cap. 14. along with 7 Will. 3. cap. 32.

Stat. 10 Ann. cap. 14. sect. 5. The stat. 7 Will. 3. cap. 32. shall be construed to extend, not only to any sessions of the peace to be holden for any of the ridings within the county of York, but also to any sessions that shall be holden by adjournment for any part of the said ridings.

Sect. 6. If any person interested in such estate as will qualify him to serve on juries of the yearly value of 150 l. shall serve as a juror at any of the said sessions or adjournments, he shall not be thereby exempted from serving at the assises for the county of York.

Stat. 3 Geo. 2. cap. 25. sect. 1. The persons required by 7 & 8 Will. 3. cap. 32. and by a clause in 3 & 4 Ann. cap. 18. to give in, or who are by this act to make up, lists of the names of persons qualified to serve on juries, shall (on request to any parish-officer, who shall have in his custody any of the rates for the poor, or land-tax) have liberty to inspect such rates, and take the names of such persons qualified dwelling within their precincts; and shall yearly, twenty days at least before Michaelmas, upon two Sundays, fix upon the door of the church, within their precincts, a list of all such persons intended to be returned to the quarter-sessions, and leave a duplicate of such list with a churchwarden or overseer of the poor; and if any person not qualified shall find his name mentioned in such list, and the person required to make such list, shall refuse to omit him, the justices at their quarter-sessions, on satisfaction from the oath of the party complaining, or other proof, shall order his name to be struck out.

Sect. 2. If any person, required to give in or make up any such list, shall wilfully omit any person whose name ought to be inserted, or insert any who ought to be omitted, or shall take any reward for omitting or inserting any person, he shall, for every person, so omitted or inserted, forfeit 20 s. on conviction before one justice of the county, &c. where the offender shall dwell, on the confession of the offender, or proof by one witness on oath; one half to the informer, the other half to the poor of the parish, &c. for which the list is returned; and if the penalty shall not be paid within five days, it shall be levied by distress and sale of goods, by warrant from one justice; and the justices before whom such person shall be convicted shall certify the same to the next quarter-sessions, which shall direct the clerk of the peace to insert or strike out the name; and duplicates of the lists, when delivered at the sessions and entred by the clerk of the peace, shall, during the sessions, or within ten days after, be transmitted by the clerk of the peace to the sheriff; and the sheriff shall take care that the names be entred alphabetically, with their additions and places of abode; and every clerk of the peace neglecting his duty therein, shall forfeit 20 l. to such person who shall prosecute for the same, till the party be convicted upon an indictment at the quarter-sessions.

Sect. 3. If any sheriff or officer shall summon and return any persons to serve on any jury before the justices of assise, nisi prius, or judges of the great sessions in Wales, or of the sessions for the counties palatine, whose name is not inserted in the duplicates transmitted to him by the clerk of the peace; or if any clerk of assise, judge's associate, or other officer, shall record the appearance of any person so summoned and returned, who did not really appear; then any judge of assise, nisi prius, &c. shall, upon examination in a summary way, set such fines upon such sheriff, &c. for every person so summoned and returned, and for every person whose appearance shall be so falsly recorded, as the said judge shall think meet, not exceeding 10 l. nor less than 40 s.

Sect. 4. No persons shall be returned as jurors at any assises, or nisi prius, &c. who have served within one year before in the county of Rutland, or four years in the county of York, or within two years in any other county, not being a county of a city or town; and if any sheriff shall wilfully transgress therein, any judge of assise, &c. is required, on examination and proof of such offence, in a summary way, to set a fine upon such offender, not exceeding 5 l.

Sect. 5. Every sheriff, &c. shall register the names of such persons, as shall be summoned and serve as jurors at any assises, &c. alphabetically, and the times of their services; and every person so summoned and serving shall, upon application to the sheriff, &c. have a certificate testifying his attendance, which the sheriff, &c. is to give without fee; and the book shall be transmitted by the sheriff, &c. to his successor.

Sect. 6. No sheriff or other person shall take any reward, to excuse any person from serving on juries; and no officer appointed to summon juries, shall summon any person other than such whose name is specified in a mandate signed by the sheriff, &c. And if any sheriff or officer shall wilfully transgress in the said cases, any judge of assise, &c. may, on examination and proof of such offence, in a summary way, set a fine on any person so offending, not exceeding 10 l.

Sect. 7. It shall be sufficient for any constables, tithingmen or headboroughs, after they have completed the lists for their precincts, according to 7 & 8 Will. 3. cap. 32. and 3 & 4 Ann. cap. 18. and this act, to subscribe the same in the presence of one justice for each county, &c. and at the same time to attest the truth of such lists, upon oath, to the best of their knowledge or belief; and the lists shall (being signed by the justices) be delivered by the constables, &c. to the high constables, who are to deliver in such lists to the quarter-sessions, attesting upon oath the receipt of such lists from the constable, &c. and that no alteration hath been made since their receipt thereof.

Sect. 8. Every sheriff, &c. in England, shall, upon the return of every venire facias (unless in causes intended to be tried at bar, or where a special jury shall be struck by rule of court) annex a panel to the writ, containing the names, additions and places of abode, of a competent number of jurors named in such lists, the names of the same persons to be inserted in the panel annexed to every venire facias, for the trial of issues at the same assises; which number of jurors shall not be less than forty-eight, nor more than seventy-two, without direction of the judges appointed to go the circuit, or one of them, by order under their hands; and the writs of habeas corpora or distringas, subsequent to such venire, need not have inserted in the bodies of such writs the names of the persons contained in such panel; but it shall be sufficient to insert in such writs, corpora separalium personarum in panello huic brevi annexo nominatarum, or words of like import, and to annex to such writs panels containing the names returned in the panel to the venire; and for making the said returns and panels, and annexing the same, no other fees shall be taken than what are now allowed.

Sect. 9. Every sheriff or officer, to whom the return of juries in the court of grand sessions in any county of Wales shall belong, shall, at least eight days before every grand sessions, summon a competent number of persons qualified out of every hundred and commote within such county, so as such number be not less than ten, or more than fifteen, without the direction of the judge of the grand sessions, by rule of court; and the officer shall return a list, containing the names of the persons so summoned the first court of the second day of every grand sessions; and the persons so summoned, or a competent number of them as the judges shall direct, and no other, shall be named in every panel to be annexed to every venire, habeas corpora and distringas, for the trial of causes in such grand sessions.

Sect. 10. Every sheriff or officer, to whom the return of the venire for the trial of causes before the justices of the sessions for the counties palatine of Chester, Lancaster or Durham, doth belong, shall, 14 days at least before the sessions, summon a competent number of persons qualified, so as such number be not less than 48, not more than 72, without the direction of the judges; and shall, eight days at least before such sessions, make a list of the persons so summoned; and such lists shall be hung up in the sheriff's office; and the persons named in such lists, and no others, shall be summoned to serve on juries at the next sessions; and the sheriff is to return such list on the first day of the sessions; and the persons so summoned, or a competent number of them, as the judges shall direct, and no other, shall be named in every panel to be annexed to every venire, habeas corpora and distringas in such sessions.

Sect. 11. The name of each person summoned and impanelled, with his addition and place of abode, shall be written in distinct pieces of parchment or paper of equal size, and shall be delivered to the marshal of the judge, &c. by the undersheriff, and shall, by the direction of the marshal, be rolled up all in the same manner and put into a box or glass; and when a cause is brought to be tried, some indifferent person shall in open court draw out twelve of the papers; and if any of the persons drawn shall not appear, or be challenged and set aside then a further number, 'till twelve be drawn who shall appear; and the said twelve persons so first drawn and approved, their names being marked in the panel, and they being sworn, shall be the jury to try the cause; and the names of the persons sworn shall be kept apart in some other box, &c. ’till the jury have given in their verdict, and the same is recorded, or ’till the jury be discharged; and then the same names shall be rolled up again and returned to the former box, &c. and so toties quoties.

Sect. 12. If a cause shall be brought on to be tried before the jury in any other cause shall have brought in their verdict, or be discharged, the court may order 12 of the residue to be drawn as before, for trial of the cause.

Sect. 13. Every person whose name shall be drawn, and who shall not appear, being called three times, on oath made that such person had been summoned, shall forfeit for every default (unless some reasonable cause of absence be proved by oath to the satisfaction of the judge) such fine, not exceeding 5 l. nor less than 40 s. as the judge shall think reasonable.

Sect. 14. Where a view shall be allowed, six of the jurors or more (who shall be consented to on both sides; or if they cannot agree shall be named by the proper officer of the court; or, if need be, by a judge, or by the judge before whom the cause shall be brought on to trial) shall have the view, and shall be first sworn, or such of them as appear on the jury, before any drawing; and so many only shall be drawn to be added to the viewers as shall make up the number of twelve.

Sect. 15. His Majesty’s courts of King’s Bench, Common Pleas and Exchequer at Westminster (upon motion made in behalf of his Majesty, or on the motion of any prosecutor or defendant in an indictment or information for any misdemeanor, or information in the nature of a quo warranto in the King’s Bench, or in an information in the Exchequer, or on motion of any plaintiff or defendant in any cause depending in the said courts) are required to order a jury to be struck before the proper officer for the trial of any issue, in such manner as special juries are usually struck in such court upon trials at bar.

Sect. 16. The person who shall apply for such jury shall pay the fees for striking it, and shall have no allowance for the same on taxation of costs.

Sect. 17. Where a special jury shall be ordered by rule of court in any cause arising in a county of a city or town, the sheriff shall be ordered by such rule to bring the books of persons qualified to serve on juries within the same, in like manner as the freeholders book hath been usually ordered to be brought in order to the striking of juries for trials at bar, and the jury shall be struck out of such book.

Sect. 18. Any person having land in his own right of the yearly value of 20 l. over and above the reserved rent, being held by least for the absolute term of 500 years or more, or for 99 years or any other term determinable on one or more lives; the name of every such person shall be inserted in the lists and in the freeholders book; and such leaseholder may be summoned to serve on juries as freeholders may.

Sect. 19. The sheriffs of London shall not return any person to try any issue joined in any of his Majesty's courts of King's Bench, Common Pleas or Exchequer, or to serve on a jury at the sessions of oyer and terminer or sessions of the peace to be held for the city, who shall not be a house-keeper within the city, and have lands, &c. or personal estate to the value of 100 l. and the same cause alleged by way of challenge, and found, shall be admitted as a principal challenge; and the person challenged may be examined on oath of the truth of the matter.

Sect. 20. The sheriffs or other officers shall not return any person to serve on a jury for the trial any capital offence, who would not be qualified to serve as a juror in civil causes; and the same matter shall be a principal challenge; and the person so challenged may be examined as oath of the truth of the matter.

Sect. 21. This act shall be read once in every year at the quarter-sessions to be held for every county or place within England and Wales next after the 24th of June.

Sect. 22. This act shall continue till the first of September 1723, &c. Made perpetual by 6 Geo. 2. cap. 37.

Sect. 4 Geo. 2 cap. 7. sect. 1. The clause of 3 Geo. 2. cap. 25. Sect. 4. shall not extend to the county of Middlesex.

Sect. 2. No person shall be returned to serve as a juror at nisi prius in Middlesex who has been returned at nisi prius in the said county in the two terms or vacations next preceding, under such penalty upon the sheriff, &c. as might have been inflicted for any offence against the said clause.

Sect. 3. All leaseholders upon leases where the improved rents shall amount to 50 l. per ann. over and above ground-rents or other reservations, shall be liable to serve upon juries.

Stat. 6 Geo. 2. cap. 37. sect. 2. The justices of the session or assises for the counties palatine of Chester, Lancaster and Durham, upon motion on behalf of his Majesty, or of any prosecutor or defendant in any indictment or information for misdemeanor, or on the motion of any plaintiff or defendant may, in case they think fit, order a jury to be struck before the proper officer of each court, in such manner as special juries have been usually struck in the courts at Westminster upon trials at bar.

Stat. 24 Geo. 2. cap. 18. sect. 1. The party who shall by virtue of 3 Geo. 2. cap. 25. or 6 Geo. 2. cap. 37. apply for a special jury, shall not only pay the fees for striking such jury, but shall also pay all the expences occasioned by the trial of the cause by such special jury, and shall not have any other allowance for the same upon taxation of costs, than such party would be intitled unto in case the cause had been tried by a common jury; unless the judge before whom the cause is tried immediately after the trial certify in open court under his hand upon the back of the record, that the same was a cause proper to be tried by a special jury.

Sect. 2. No person who serves upon any jury appointed by the authority of the said acts, shall take for serving on such jury more than the sum which the judge who tries the issue thinks reasonable, not exceeding 1 l. 1 s. except in causes wherein a view is directed.

Sect. 4. To prevent delays, where a peer is party, by challenges to the array for want of a knight returned on the panel, no challenge shall be taken to any panel of jurors, for want of a knight's being returned in such panel, nor any array quashed by reason of any such challenge.

Stat. 29 Geo. 2. cap. 19. sect. 1. Every person duly impanelled and summoned to serve upon any jury for the trial of any cause to be tried in any court of record within the city of London, or in any other city or town corporate, liberties or franchises within England, who shall not appear and serve on such jury (after being called three times, and on proof on oath of the person so making default, having been duly summoned) shall forfeit for every such default, such fine not exceeding 40 s. nor less than 20 s. as the judge of the respective court wherein such default is made shall impose, unless some just cause for such defaulter's absence be made appear by oath or affidavit to the satisfaction of the judge.

Sect. 2. If any person on whom any fine is imposed in pursuance of this act, refuse to pay the same to the person authorized by the judge to receive the same, it shall be lawful for the judge who imposed such fine, by warrant under his hand and seal, to cause such fine to be levied by distress and sale of the goods of the person on whom such fine was imposed, and the overplus, if any, after payment of such fine and the charges of such distress and sale, shall be rendered to the person whose goods were so destrained and sold.

Sect. 3. Every fine imposed in pursuance of this act, shall be paid by the person who receives or levies the same, to the proper officer of the city or town corporate, liberty or franchise, in which the court was holden; to be applied to such uses, as issues set on jurors, or other fines set in courts within such city, &c. are by charter, prescription, or usage applicable.

Sect 4. If any action be brought for any thing done in pursuance of this act, such suit shall be brought within six calendar months next after the matter complained of is committed; and the defendant may plead the general issue; and if a verdict be found for the defendant, &c. the defendant shall recover double costs.

2. WHO ARE EXEMPTED FROM SERVING ON JURIES.

It seems to be agreed, that all persons whose attendance is required in the superior courts of justice, such as serjeants at law, counsellors, attornies and other officers of the courts, are so far privileged as not to be summoned on juries; all peers of the realm are excluded, as to coming within the qualifications mentioned in the writ, viz. Ad faciendum quand' jurat' patriae; for they are not pares patriae, but pares of an higher rank; and therefore it is clearly agreed, that if a peer be returned on a jury, and bring a writ of privilege, he shall be discharged; also it seems to be the better opinion, that even without such a writ he may challenge himself, or be challenged by either party. Dyer 314. Moor 167. 2 Rol. Abr. 646. Co. Lit. 157. 9 Co. 49. 6 Co. 53. 1 Jones 153.

But members of the house of commons seem not to have any privilege to be exempt from serving on juries; yet in the case of Sir Edward Bainton, who being returned on a jury in B. R. the court would not force him to be sworn against his will, he being a parliament-man, and the parliament then sitting. Pasch. 17 Car. 2. Sir Edward Bainton's case.

Tenants in ancient demesne are not to be impanelled to appear at Westminster, or elsewhere in any other court, upon any inquest or trial of any cause. 4 Inst. 269.

It seems agreed, that the King by his grant or charter may exempt one, two or more from serving on juries; but he cannot exempt a whole county or hundred, because in such case there would be a failure of justice; also it seems that such exemption does not extend to jurors returned into the King's Bench, unless there be express words including that court; also by the better opinion, the sheriff cannot return such privilege of exemption, but each particular juror must come in, and demand it. 1 Sid. 127, 243. Raym. 113. Hard. 389. &c.

By the statute of Westm. 2. cap. 38. it is expressly provided, that neither old men above the age of seventy years, nor persons perpetually sick, nor those who are infirm at the time of their summons, nor those who do not reside in the county, shall be put in juries or in the lesser assizes: In the construction of which it hath been held, that though such persons may sue out a writ of privilege for their discharge, grounded on this statute, yet if they be actually returned, and appear, they can neither be challenged by the party, nor excuse themselves from not serving, if there be not a sufficient number without them. 2 Inst. 446. F. N. B. 165.

Clerks or persons in holy orders, coroners, ministers of the forest, officers of the army, and other officers and ministers belonging to the King, are exempt from serving on juries. Dalt. Sher. 121. Trials per Pais 86.

By the 6 W. 3. cap. 4. “Every person using and exercising the art of an apothecary in the city of London, or within seven miles thereof being free of the society of apothecaries in the said city, and who shall have been duly examined and approved, &c. for so long time as he shall exercise the said mystery, and no longer, shall be exempted from serving on any jury or inquest; and other persons exercising the said art of an apothecary in any other parts of this kingdom, who have served as apprentices seven years, according to the statute 5 Eliz. shall likewise be exempted from serving on juries for so long time as they shall use and exercise the said art, unless such person voluntarily consent to serve.”

By the 7 & 8 W. 3. cap. 21. all registered seamen are exempted front serving on juries.

By the 7 & 8 W. 3. cap. 34. it is enacted, That no quaker, or reputed quaker, shall serve on juries.

3. OF THE SEVERAL KINDS OF JURIES, AND JURY PROCESS; AND MANNER OF COMPELLING A JURY TO APPEAR.

Juries are distinguished into grand and petit juries; the grand jury may consist of thirteen, or any greater number; for these being the grand inquisitors of the county, every indictment and presentment by them must be sound by twelve at least; but it is not necessary that all above that number should concur in such presentment or indictment, Cro. Eliz. 654. 3 Inst. 30. 2 Inst. 387. 2 Hal. Hist. P. C. 154.

Upon the summons of any sessions of the peace, and in cases of commissions of oyer and terminer and gaol-delivery, there goes out a precept either in the name of the King, or of two or more justices, directed to the sheriff, upon which he is to return twenty-four or more out of the whole county, namely, a considerable number out of every hundred, out of which the grand inquest at the session of the peace, oyer and terminer, or gaol-delivery are taken, and sworn ad inquirendum pro domino rege & corpore comitatus. 2 Hal. Hist. P. C. 154.

Those returned to serve on the grand jury must be probi & legales homines, and ought to be of the same county where the crime was committed; and therefore it is a good exception at Common law to one returned on a grand jury, that he is an alien or villain, or that he is outlawed for a crime, or that he was not returned by the proper officer, or that he was returned at the instance of the prosecutor; but these exceptions must be taken before the indictment found. Cro. Eliz. 654. 3 Inst. 30. 12 Co. 99. 2 Rol. Rep. 82. 2 Hal. Hist. P.C. 154-5.

It is laid down by my Lord Chief Justice Hale, that at Common law every person returned on the grand jury ought to be a freeholder at least, and that the statute 2 Hen. 5. cap. 3. that requires jurors that pass upon the trial of a man's life to have 40 s. per ann. freehold, hath been the measure by which the freehold of grand jurymen hath been measured in precepts of summons of sessions. Hale Hist. P. C. 155. but for this vide 2 Hawk. P. C. 216.

Also by several acts of parliament it is provided, That those who serve on the grand jury be such as are duly qualified. See the first division, and particularly the acts 11 Hen. 4. cap. 9. and 3 H. 8. cap. 12.

In the construction of the said act 11 Hen. 4. c. 9. the following points have been resolved.

That if a person not returned on a grand jury procure his name to be read among those that are returned, whereupon he is sworn, &c. he may be indicted for a contempt of this statute. 12 Co. 99. 3 Inst. 33.

That indictments before justices of the peace are clearly within this stature. 12 Co. 98. 3 Inst. 33. Cro. Car. 134.

That a person arraigned on an indictment taken contrary to the statute, may plead such matter in avoidance of the indictment, and also plead over to the felony. 3 Inst. 34. Cro. Car. 134. 1 Jones 198.

That he who is outlawed on an indictment without any trial, may clearly shew in avoidance of such outlawry, that the indictment was taken contrary to the statute; but the court needs not admit of the plea of the outlawry of an indictor in avoidance of any such indictment, unless he who pleads it have the record ready, unless it be an outlawry of the same court wherein the indictment is depending; in which case it is said, that any one as amicus curiae may inform the court of it; also it seems the better opinion, that no exception against an indictor is allowable, unless the party takes it before trial. 3 Inst. 34. Cro. Car. 147.

That if any one of the grand jury who find an indictment, be within any of the exceptions in the statute, he vitiates the whole, though never so many unexceptionable persons joined with him in finding it. 11 H 4. 41. pl. 8. S. P. C. 88. 3 Inst. 33.

That if a prisoner indicted of felony offer to take any such exceptions, he shall, upon his prayer, have counsel assigned him for his assistance. Cro. Car. 134, 147. 1 Jones 198.

The said act 3 Hen. 8, c. 12. extends not only to panel of grand inquests returned, but to all panels of the petty jury, commonly called the petty jury of life and death which may be reformed by the justices according to this act; and the sheriff is bound to return the panel so reformed. 2 Hal. Hist. P. C. 156, 265.

It hath been holden, that this statute doth not take away the force of 11 H. 4. as to any point wherein both may consist together; and therefore if any indictor be outlawed, or returned at the nomination of any person, contrary to 11 H. 4. except of the justices authorized as abovementioned to reform the panel, the indictment may be avoided in the same manner as before. 3 Inst. 33. 2 Hawk. P. C. 219.

The grand jury, as has been already observed, must consist of twelve at least, the petty jury of twelve, and can be neither more nor less; but it is said, that particular inquests may consist of a more or less number than twelve. Trials per Pais 80. F. N. B. 107. Finch of Law 400, 464. A writ of inquiry of waste by thirteen was holden good. Cro. Car. 414.

But on a writ of error a judgment out of an inferior court was reversed, because being by default, the inquiry of damages was only by two jurors; and though a custom was alleged to warrant it, yet it was resolved, that there could not be less than twelve, though the writ of inquiry saith only per sacramentum proborum & legalium hominum, and not duodecim as in a venire. 2 Vent. 113.

Also it hath been frequently held, that a custom in an inferior court to try by six jurors is void; and that tho' such custom is used in Wales, yet that is by force of the statute 34 Hen. 8. which appoints that such trials may by six only where the custom hath been so. Cro. Car. 259. 1 Sid. 233. 1 Keb. 326.

The first process for convening the jury is the venire facias which must be awarded on the roll, and thereupon in the Common Pleas there issue the habeas corpora and distringas juratores; but in the King's Bench and Exchequer after the venire, they proceed on the distringas; for the venire being in the nature of a summons, if the jury did not appear thereon in those courts in which the King as a more immediate concern, they proceed on the strongest process, viz. the distringas. Trials per Pais 64.

If all the jury did not attend on the habeas corpora or distringas, which was to bring them into court, there was an undecim, decem, or octo tales, according as the number was deficient, to force others to the King's court to try the issue; this was without a new summons or venire, because it was supposed that the first habeas corpora and distringas had given notice to the vicinity that they ought to appear; and therefore the supplement of a jury were forced in without a particular summons to them. But if the whole jury be challenged off, then a new venire facias, and if none of the jury appear, then a distringas juratores shall issue, and no tales. 2 Hal. Hist P. C. 265.

Jurors being duly served with process are compellable to appear; and therefore where more than one appear but not enough to take the inquest, but some of the others come within view, or into the town where the court is holden, but refuse to come into court; in these cases the courts may order those who appear to inquire of the yearly value of such defaulters lands; which being done, the court may either summon them to appear, on pain of the sum found, or some lesser sum, or may fine them in like sum without more ado; but such juror shall only lose his issues, and not the yearly value of the lands, unless the party pray it; but one who makes default after appearance is liable to such forfeiture without any prayer; yet the court in discretion will sometimes only impose a small fine; also a juror who comes not to town where the court is holden, shall only lose his issues, or be amerced, but not fined; and it is said, that a juror is not amerceable at all at the returns of the first venire, except before justices of oyer and terminer. 2 Hawk, P. C. 146. and several authorities there cited. Trials per Pais 200.

See the stat. 27 Eliz. c. 6. sect. 2. and 3 Geo. 2. c. 25. sect, 13. in the first division of this title.

4. BY WHOM THE JURY PROCESSES ARE TO BE EXECUTED, AND THE JURY CONVENED; IN WHAT TIME SUCH PROCESSES ARE RETURNABLE, AND WHAT NUMBER TO BE RETURNED.

The sheriff is the proper officer by whom the jury process is to be executed, unless he be partial, that is, such a one, as from his consanguinity or affinity, his being under the power of either party, &c. cannot be presumed to be an indifferent person, as every officer who hath any way to do with the administration of justices ought to be; and in every such case the process shall be directed to the coroners, if they are impartial, or to those of them who are so, in case some of them lie under the aforementioned prejudices; and in case all the coroners are partial or not indifferent, then the venire shall be directed to two elizors named by the court, and against whom, for that reason, no challenge can be taken. Co. Lit. 158. a. Bro. Challenge 153.

When process is once awarded to the coroners, &c. for the sheiff's actual partiality, the entry is vicecomes se non intromittat, and in such case process shall not afterwards be awarded to any new sheriff, but where it was awarded to the coroners for that the sheriff is tenant, &c. it may be awarded to a new sheriff. Co. Lit. 158. 2 Roll. Abr. 670.

So if a venire facias is awarded to the coroner for partiality in the sheriff, and afterwards a tales is awarded, which is returned by the sheriff, this has been held error. Cro. Eliz. 574. Morgan v. Wyes; and see Cro. Eliz. 586.

See the statute 3 Geo. 2. c. 25. sect. 1—6. in the first division of this title.

Process against jurors may be returnable immediately into the King's Bench for the trial of an indictment found in the country where it sits; whether for a crime in such county, or for a treason beyond sea; but for the trial of an indictment removed by a certiorari from a different county, there must be fifteen days between the teste and return of every process. 2 Roll. Abr. 626. 9 Co. 118. b. 2 Inst. 568. 2 Hawk. P. C. 406.

Justices in eyre, or of gaol-delivery, may order a jury to be returned immediately for the trial of a prisoner; also it hath been adjudged, that justices of oyer and terminer, or of the peace, might for the trial of an issue joined before them, award a venire returnable the same day on which the party is arraigned; but it is said, that there are strong authorities to the contrary, unless the prisoner consent, or the crime amount to felony. 2 Hawk. P. C. 406. and several authorities there cited.

A venire before justices of oyer and terminer, returnable at a day certain, is erroneous, unless the sessions appear to be adjourned to the same day, because otherwise it shall not be intended that their commission contained so long; but such venire may be returnable at the next assizes, and there tried by virtue of 1 Ed. 6. cap. 7. 2 Hal. Hist. P. C. 261. 2 Hawk. P. C. 406.

See the stat. 7 & 8 Will. 3. c. 32. in the first division of this title.

Altho' by the words of the writ of venire facias the sheriff is only to return twelve, yet by ancient course he was obliged to return twenty-four; and this, says my Lord Coke, is for expedition of justice; for if 12 should only be returned, no man should have a full jury appear or to be sworn in respect of challenges without tales, which would be a great delay of trials. Co. Lit. 155. a.

But tho' the sheriff return a lesser member, as where the sheriff return only 23, and a sufficient number appear, and try the issue, this will be aided by the statute of Jeofails as a misreturn. 5 Co. 36. Cro. Eliz. 587. Cro. Car. 223.

The precept that issues before a sessions of gaol-delivery, oyer and terminer, and of the peace, is to return 24, and commonly the sheriff returns upon that precept 48. 2 Hal. Hist. P. C. 263.

But the award or precept to try the prisoner after he hath pleaded, is only venire facias 12, and 24 are returned by the sheriff on that panel. 2 Hal. Hist. P. C. 263.

At Common law in civil causes, it seems the sheriff might have returned above 24 if he pleased; and therefore by the statute of Westm 2. c. 28, it is recited, that whereas the sheriffs were used to summon an unreasonable multitude of jurors, to the grievance of the people, it is ordained, that from thenceforth in one assize no more shall be returned than 24. Godb. 370. 1 Keb. 310. See the stat. 3 Geo. 2. c. 25. sect. 8, in the first division of this title.

5. IN WHAT CASES AND IN WHAT MANNER SPECIAL JURIES ARE APPOINTED.

Special juries are appointed on motion and application to the court for that purpose, on which, if the court think it reasonable, the sheriff is to attend the secondary or master with his book of freeholders, who, in the presence of the attornies on both sides, names 48 freeholders, and then each party strikes out twelve, by one at a time, the plaintiff or his attorney beginning first, and the remaining 24 are returned by the secondary, as the jury, to try the cause. 2 Lil. Regist. 123. That the court may order a jury of merchants if they think convenient. 2 Lil. Regist. 122.

If the rule was entered into by consent, it is said to be a contempt in the attorney not to be present; but to remedy any inconveniency from hence, a rule was made, that when a master is to strike a jury, viz. forty-eight out of the freeholders book, he shall give notice to the attornies of both sides to be present; and if the one comes, and the other does not, he that appears shall, according to the ancient course, strike out twelve, and the master shall strike out other twelve for him that is absent. 2 Lil. Regist. 127. 1 Salk. 405.

And it is said, that it by rule of court the master is ordered to strike a jury, in case it be not expressed in such rule that the master shall strike 48, and each of the parties shall strike out twelve, the master is to strike 24, and the parties have no liberty to strike out any. 1 Salk. 405.

It is said, that a special jury may be granted to try a cause at bar without the consent of the parties, but never at nisi prius, unless for good cause shewn. 1 Mod. Ca. Law and Equity 248.

Also it is said, to be contrary to the course of the court of B. R. in capital case, to order the clerk of the crown to strike a special jury, as is done by the secondary in civil causes upon trials at bar. 2 Jon. 222.

See the statute 3 Geo. 2. c. 25. sect. 15. and 24 & 29 Geo. 2. in the first division of this title.

A rule was made for a special jury, which was entered into by consent; and afterwards when the parties attended the master, the defendant struck out some hundredors, and at the trial challenged the array for want of hundredors, which the judge of assise allowed a good challenge; and this was held such a breach and contempt of the rule, for which an attachment was granted. 1 Mod. Ca. Law and Eq. 245. The King v. Burridge.

But where in the trial of a quo warranto, the defendant challenged the array of a special jury, that had been struck at his request, for partiality in the sheriff; and an attachment being moved for, and the case next above relied on, it was denied; and said per curiam, That the attachment in the case supra was granted by reason of the abuse of the rule; but here the only foundation is the jury's being so struck at his request, which is not alone sufficient, for he had a right to challenge the array on the process's being directed to a wrong officer; and the rule might have been fulfilled another way, viz. as the sheriff was partial, a proper entry might have been made, and process directed to the coroner. The King v. Johnson, Mich. 8 Geo. 2. *in B. 6. FOR WHAT MISDEMEANORS JURORS ARE PUNISHABLE.

In what case juries are punishable by attaint, see Attaint. And as to the case where they are otherwise punishable, we must consider jurors either in a ministerial capacity, as persons bound to attend the court, to do the business for which they are returned till they are discharged; or in a judicial capacity, as judges of the fact to be tried. In the former capacity they are liable to be punished to several instances; as for refusing to appear, withdrawing themselves before they are sworn, or refusing to be sworn; for which every court of record may, of common right, impose such a reasonable fine on any one returned on a grand or petit jury, as shall seem convenient. 8 Co.

38. b. 41. a. 2 Inst. 242. 2 Hal. Hist. P. C. 309.

So if after they are sworn they refuse to give any verdict at all. Noy 49. 3 Buls. 173. Vaugh. 152.

So if they endeavour to impose upon the court; as where a petit jury offer a verdict to the court as agreed by their whole number, where in truth some of them have not agreed to it, or where they agree upon two verdicts; and first, to offer one of them to the court, and so stand to it, if the court shall express, no dissatisfaction to it; but if the court shall dislike it, then to give the other. 1 Rol. Abr. 219. Cro. Eliz. 779. 2 Hawk. P. C. 146. 2 Hal. Hist. P. C. 309. S. P. and that in such case they shall be fined every, one a-part.

So for misbehaving themselves after their departure from the bar; where they do not all keep together till they have given their verdict; or where any of them carry any thing eatable with them in their pockets, of eat or drink, or otherwise refresh themselves, without leave from the court, before they have given their verdict, tho' they were agreed on it, and were also all the time in the custody of the bailiff appointed to take care or them. Dyer 78. pl. 41. 218. pl. 4. Cro. Jac. 221. Vaugh. 21. 2 Hawk. P. C. 146.

Also where a jury, after they departed from the bar, being late on Saturday night, separated and went every one to his own house, without giving a privy verdict, or without consulting upon the evidence, and gave a verdict according to the direction of the court; but for this misdemeanor they were fined each forty shillings, and a new trial granted; and herein the Chief Justice said, that by such trial both parties may be prejudiced; for the jurors going at large without consulting together, may well forget the evidence; and it is the right of the King's subject to have their issues determined when the evidence is fresh in the memory of the jurors; and the suffering the jurors to go to their houses after a privy verdict is only by connivance, but by the strict rules of law ought not to be suffered. Pasch. 27. Car. 2. in B. R.

Also where the jury have been divided or in doubt about the evidence, and have agreed to determine the matter by throwing cross or pile, &c. and to give their verdict as the chance happens; this has been held such a misdemeanor for which they have been ordered to attend, and for which they are punishable, and for which a new trial will be granted on the common rule of juratores male se gesserunt. 2. Lev. 140, 205. 3 Jon. 83. 3 Keb. 805.

Jurors are punishable for sending for or receiving instructions from either of the parties concerning the matter in question. 2. Hawk. P. C. 147.

So if a juryman have a piece of evidence in his pocket, and after the jury sworn and gone together he sheweth it to them, this is a misdemeanor fineable in the jury; but it avoids not the verdict, tho' the case appear upon examination. Cro. Eliz. 616. 2 Hal. Hist. P. C. 306.

As to the punishment of jurors in their judicial capacity, there are several instances where jurors acquitting great and notorious offenders, contrary to clear and manifest evidence, that contrary to the judge's directions, having been punished in the StarChamber, and have also, not only in the King's Bench, but also by justices of oyer and terminer and gaol-delivery, been fined and imprisoned, and bound over to their good behaviors; but these methods were thought to be contrary to the opinions in the old books, and contrary to the general reason of the law, and being fully consider'd in Bushel's case, it was there settled, and hath been ever since agreed to, that jurors are no way punishable, except by attaint, for giving a verdict contrary to a judge's directions, and against what may seem to others clear and manifest evidence, for that they are the proper judges of the fact to be tried, and may be reasonably influenced by matters known only to themselves, as their own personal knowledge of the fact, or of the credit of the witness, or of the parties. 2 Hawk. P. C. 147-8, and several authorities there cited. Vaugh. 143. 2 Jon. 16, 17.

And herewith my Lord Hale seems to agree, and shews the unreasonableness of punishing a jury for going contrary to the direction of the court in matters of law, because it is impossible any matter of law could come in question till the matter of fact were settled and stated and agreed by the jury, and of such matter of fact they were the only competent judges; also, says he, it were the most unhappy case that could be to the judge, if he, at his peril, must take upon him the guilt or innocence of the prisoner, and if the judge's opinion must rule the matter of fact, the trial by a jury would be useless. 2 Hal. Hist. P. C. 160, 161, 211, &c.

But he seems to admit, that the long use of fining jurors in the King's Bench in criminal causes, may give possibly a jurisdiction to fine in these cases; yet that it can by no means be extended to other courts of sessions, of gaol-delivery, oyer and terminer, or of the peace, or other inferior jurisdictions. 2. Hal. Hist. P. C. 313.

Also by Hawkins, if it shall plainly appear in any case, that jurors are perfectly satisfied of the truth of a fact, whereupon they declare to the court, that they find it in such a particular manner; and the court directly tell them, that upon the fact so found, as they have agreed it to be, the judgment of the law is such or such, yet they obstinately insist upon a verdict contrary to such direction; it seems agreeable to the general reason of the law, that the jurors are finable by the court in such a case, unless an attaint lies against them; for otherwise they would not be punishable for so palpable a partiality in taking upon them to judge of matters of law which they have nothing to do with, and are presumed to be ignorant of, contrary to the express direction of one, who by the law is appointed to direct them in such matters, and is to be presumed of ability to do it. 2 Hawk. P. C. 148. for which is cited 2 Jon. 15, 16. Vaugh. 114-5. Palm. 363. and see Kel. 50.

Also if a judge, for the better direction and information of a jury, shall ask them their opinions concerning such a particular fact, and they shall refuse to answer him, and obstinately insist to deliver in their verdict, as they think fit, contrary to his direction, it seems questionable, whether they may not be fined in such case also, unless an attaint lie against, them; for that it is the duty of jurors to take the advice and information of the court, in order to be governed by it, as far as shall be consistent with their consciences. 2 Hawk. P. C. 149.

V. The trial by jury, or the country, per patriam, is also that trial by the peers of every Englishman, which, as the grand bulwark of his liberties, is secured to him by the great charter[e], "nullus liber homo capiatur, vel imprisonetur, aut exulet, aut aliquo alio modo destruatur, nisi per legale judicium parium suorum, vel per legem terrae."

The antiquity and excellence of this trial, for the settling of civil property, has before been explained at large[f]. And it will hold much stronger in criminal cases; since, in times of difficulty and danger, more is to be apprehended from the violence and partiality of judges appointed by the crown, in suits between the king and the subject, than in disputes between one individual and another, to settle the metes and boundaries of private property. Our law has therefore wisely placed this strong and twofold barrier, of a presentment and a trial by jury, between the liberties of the people, and the prerogative of the crown. It was necessary, for preserving the admirable ballance [sic] of our constitution, to vest the executive power of the laws in the prince: and yet this power might be dangerous and destructive to that very constitution, if exerted without check or control, by justices of oyer and terminer occasionally named by the crown; who might then, as in France or Turkey, imprison, dispatch, or exile any man that was obnoxious to the government, by an instant declaration, that such is their will and pleasure. But the founders of the English laws have with excellent forecast contrived, that no man should be called to answer to the king for any capital crime, unless upon the preparatory accusation of twelve or more of his fellow subjects, the grand jury: and that the truth of every accusation, whether preferred in the shape of indictment, information, or appeal, should afterwards be confirmed by the unanimous suffrage of twelve of his equals and neighbours, indifferently chosen, and superior to all suspicion. So that the liberties of England cannot but subsist, so long as this palladium remains sacred and inviolate, not only from all open attacks, (which none will be so hardy as to make) but also from all secret machinations, which may sap and undermine it; by introducing new and arbitrary methods of trial, by justices of the peace, commissioners of the revenue, and courts of conscience. And however convenient these may appear at first, (as doubtless all arbitrary powers, well executed, are the most convenient) yet let it be again remembered, that delays, and little inconveniences in the forms of justice, are the price that all free nations must pay for their liberty in more substantial matters; that these inroads upon this sacred bulwark of the nation are fundamentally opposite to the spirit of our constitution; and that, though begun in trifles, the precedent may gradually increase and spread, to the utter disuse of juries in questions of the most momentous concern.

What was said of juries in general, and the trial thereby, in civil cases, will greatly shorten our present remarks, with regard to the trial of criminal suits; indictments, informations, and appeals: which trial I shall consider in the same method that I did the former; by following the order and course of the proceedings themselves, as the most clear and perspicuous way to treating it.

When therefore a prisoner on this arraignment has pleaded not guilty, and for his trial hath put himself upon the country, which country the jury are, the sheriff of the county must return a panel of jurors, liberos et legales homines, de vicineto; that is, freeholders, without just exception, and of the visne or neighbourhood; which is interpreted to be of the county where the fact is committed[g]. If the proceedings are before the court of king's bench, there is time allowed, between the arraignment and the trial, for a jury to be impanelled by writ of venire facias to the sheriff, as in civil causes: and the trial in case of a misdemesnor is had at nisi prius, unless it be of such consequence as to merit a trial at bar; which is always invariably had when the prisoner is tried for any capital offence. But, before commissioners of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery, the sheriff by virtue of a general precept directed to him beforehand, returns to the court a panel of forty eight jurors, to try all felons that may be called upon their trial at that session: and therefore it is there usual to try all felons immediately, or soon, after their arraignment. But it is not customary, nor agreeable to the general course of proceedings, unless by consent of parties, to try persons indicted of smaller misdemesnors at the same court in which they have pleaded not guilty, or traversed the indictment. But they usually give security to the court, to appear at the next assises or sessions, and then and there to try the traverse, giving notice to the prosecutor of the same.

In cases of high treason, whereby corruption of blood may ensue, or misprision of such treason, it is enacted by statute 7 W. III. c. 3. first, that no person shall be tried for any such treason, except an attempt to assassinate the king, unless the indictment be found within three years after the offence committed: next, that the prisoner shall have a copy of the indictment, but not the names of the witnesses, five days at least before the trial; that is, upon the true construction of the act, before his arraignment[h]; for then is his time to take any exceptions thereto, by way of pleas or demurrer: thirdly, that he shall also have a copy of the panel of jurors two days before his trial: and, lastly, that he shall have the same compulsive process to bring in his witnesses for him. And, by statute 7 Ann. c. 21. (which did not take place till after the decease of the late pretender) all persons, indicted for high treason or misprision thereof, shall have not only a copy of the indictment, but a list of all the witnesses to be produced, and of the jurors impanelled, with their professions and places of abode, delivered to him ten days before the trial, and in the presence of two witnesses; the better to prepare him to make his challenges and defence. But this last act, so far as it affected indictments for the inferior species of high treason, respecting the coin and the royal seals, is repealed by the statute 6 Geo. III. c. 53. else it had been impossible to have tried those offences in the same circuit in which they are indicted: for ten clear days, between the finding and the trial of the indictment, will exceed the time usually allotted for any session of oyer and terminer[i]. And no person indicted for felony is, or (as the law stands) ever can be, entitled to such copies, before the time of this trial[k].

When the trial is called on, the jurors are to be sworn, as they appear, to the number of twelve, unless they are challenged by the party.

Challenges may here be made, either on the part of the king, or on that of the prisoner; and either to the whole array, or to the separate polls, for the very same reasons that they may be made in civil causes[l]. For it is here at least as necessary, as there, that the sheriff or returning officer be totally indifferent; that where an alien is indicted, the jury should be de medietate, or half foreigners; (which does not indeed hold in treasons[m], aliens being very improper judges of the breach of allegiance to the king) that on every panel there should be a competent number of hundredors; and that the particular jurors should be omni exceptione majores; not liable to objection either propter honoris respectum, propter defectum, propter affectum, or propter delictum.

Challenges upon any of the foregoing accounts are stiled [sic] challenges for cause; which may be without stint in both criminal and civil trials. But in criminal cases, or at least in capital ones, there is, in favorem vitae, allowed to the prisoner an arbitrary and capricious species of challenge to a certain number of jurors, without shewing any cause at all; which is called a peremptory challenge: a provision full of that tenderness and humanity to prisoners, for which our English laws are justly famous. This is grounded on two reasons. 1. As every one must be sensible, what sudden impressions and unaccountable prejudices we are apt to conceive upon the bare looks and gestures of another; and how necessary it is, that a prisoner (when put to defend his life) should have a good opinion of his jury, the want of which might totally disconcert him; the law wills not that he should be tried by any one man against whom he had conceived a prejudice, even without being able to assign a reason for such his dislike. 2. Because, upon challenges for cause shewn, if the reason assigned prove insufficient to set aside the juror, perhaps the bare questioning his indifference may sometimes provoke a resentment; to prevent all ill consequences from which, the prisoner is still at liberty, if he pleases, peremptorily to set him aside.

This privilege, of peremptory challenges, though granted to the prisoner, is denied to the king by the statute 33 Edw. I. st. 4. which enacts, that the king shall challenge no jurors without assigning a cause certain, to be tried and approved by the court. However it is held, that the king need not assign his cause of challenge, till all the panel is gone through, and unless there cannot be a full jury without the persons so challenged. And then, and not sooner, the king's counsel must shew the cause: otherwise the juror shall be sworn[n].

The peremptory challenges of the prisoner must however have some reasonable boundary; otherwise he might never be tried. This reasonable boundary is settled by the common law to be the number of thirty five; that is, one under the number of three full juries. For the law judges that five and thirty are fully sufficient to allow the most timorous man to challenge through mere caprice; and that he who peremptorily challenges a greater number, or three full juries, has not intention to be tried at all. And therefore it dealt with one, who peremptorily challenges above thirty five, and will not retract his challenge, as with one who stands mute or refuses his trial; by sentencing him to the peine forte et dure in felony, and by attainting him in treason[o]. And so the law stands at this day with regard to treason, of any kind.

But by statute 22 Hen. VIII. c. 14. (which, with regard to felonies, stands unrepealed by statute 1 & 2 Ph. & Mar. c. 10.) by this statute, I say, no person, arraigned for felony, can be admitted to make any more than twenty peremptory challenges. But how if the prisoner will peremptorily challenge twenty one? What shall be done? The old opinion was, that judgments of peine forte et dure should be given, as where he challenged thirty six at the common law[p]: but the better opinion seems to be[q], that such challenge shall only be disregarded and overruled. Because, first, the common law doth not inflict the judgment of penance for challenging twenty one, neither doth the statute inflict it; and so heavy a judgment shall not be imposed by implication. Secondly, the words of the statute are, "that he be not admitted to challenge more than twenty;" the evident construction of which is, that any farther challenge shall be disallowed or prevented: and therefore, being null from the beginning, and never in fact a challenge, it can subject the prisoner to no punishment; but the juror shall be regularly sworn.

If, by reason of challenges or the default of the jurors, a sufficient number cannot be had of the original panel, a tales may be awarded as in civil causes[r], till the number of twelve is sworn, "well and truly to try, and true deliverance make, between our sovereign lord the king, and the prisoner whom they have in charge; and a true verdict to give, according to their evidence."

When the jury is sworn, if it be a cause of any consequence, the indictment is usually opened, and the evidence marshalled, examined, and enforced by the counsel for the crown, or prosecution. But it is a settled rule at common law, that no counsel shall be allowed a prisoner upon his trial, upon the general issue, in any capital crime, unless some point of law shall arise proper to be debated[s]. A rule, which (however it may be palliated under cover of that noble declaration of the law, when rightly understood, that the judge shall be counsel for the prisoner; that is, shall see that the proccedings against him are legal and strictly regular[t]) seems to be not at all of a piece with the rest of the humane treatment of prisoners by the English law. For upon what face of reason can that assistance be denied to save the life of a man, which yet is allowed him in prosecutions for every petty trespass? Nor indeed is it strictly speaking a part of our antient law: for the mirrour[u], having observed the necessity of counsel in civil suits, "who know how to forward and defend the cause, by the rules of law and customs of the realm," immediately afterwards subjoins; "and more necessary are they for defence upon indictments and appeals of felony, than upon other venial causes[w]." And, to say that truth, the judges themselves are so sensible of this defect in our modern practice, that they seldom scruple to allow a prisoner counsel to stand by him at the bar, and instruct him what questions to ask, or even to ask questions for him, and with respect to matters of fact: for as to matters of law, arising on the trial, they are intitled to the assistance of counsel. But still this is a matter of too much importance to be left to the good pleasure of any judge, and is worthy the interposition of the legislature; which has shewn it's inclination to indulge prisoners with this reasonable assistance, by enacting in statute 7 W. III. c. 3. that persons indicted for such high treason, as works a corruption of the blood, or misprision thereof, may make their full defence by counsel, not exceeding two, to be named by the prisoner and assigned by the court or judge: and this indulgence, by statute 20 Geo. II. c. 30. is extended to parliamentary impeachments for high treason, which were excepted in the former act.

The doctrine of evidence upon pleas of the crown is, in most respects, the same as that upon civil actions. There are however a few leading points, wherein, by several statutes and resolutions, a difference is made between civil and criminal evidence.

First, in all cases of high treason, petit treason, and misprision of treason, by statutes 1 Edw. VI. c. 12. 5 &6 Edw. VI. c. 11. and 1 & 2 Ph. & Mar. c. 10. two lawful witnesses are required to convict a prisoner; except in cases of coining[x], and counterfeiting the seals; or unless the party shall willingly and without violence confess the same. By statute 7 W. III. c. 3. in prosecutions for those treasons to which that act extends, the same rule is again enforced, with this addition, that the confessions of the prisoner, which shall countervail the necessity of such proof, must be in open court; and it is declared that both witnesses must be to the same overt act of treason, or one to one overt act, and the other to another overt act of the same species of treason[y], and not of distinct heads or kinds: and no evidence shall be admitted to prove any overt act not expressly laid in the indictment. And therefore in sir John Fenwick's case, in king William's time, where there was but one witness, an act of parliament[z] was made on purpose to attaint him of treason, and he was executed[a]. But in almost every other accusation one positive witness is sufficient. Baron Montesquieu lays it down for a rule[b], that those laws which condemn a man to death in any case on the deposition of a single witness, are fatal to liberty: and he adds this reason[c], that the witness who affirms, and the accused who denies, makes an equal ballance; there is a necessity therefore to call in a third man to incline the scale. But this seems to be carrying matters too far: for there are some crimes, in which the very privacy of their nature excludes the possibility of having more than one witness: must these therefore escape unpunished? Neither indeed is the bare denial of the person accused equivalent to the positive oath of a disinterested witness. In cases of indictments for perjury, this doctrine is better founded; and there our law adopts it: for one witness is not allowed to convict a man indicted for perjury; because then there is only one oath against another[d]. In cases of treason also there is the accused's oath of allegiance, to counterpoise the information of a single witness; and that may perhaps be one reason why the law requires a double testimony to convict him: though the principal reason, undoubtedly, is to secure the subject from being sacrificed to fictitious conspiracies, which have been the engines of profligate and crafty politicians in all ages.

Secondly, though from the reversal of colonel Sidney's attainder by act of parliament in 1689[e] it may be collected[f], that the mere similitude of handwriting in two papers shewn to a jury, without other concurrent testimony, is no evidence that both were written by the same person; yet undoubtedly the testimony of witnesses, well acquainted with the party's hand, that they believe the paper in question to have been written by him, is evidence to be left to a jury[g].

Thirdly, by the statute 21 Jac. I. c. 27. a mother of a bastard child, concealing it's death, must prove by one witness that the child was born dead; otherwise such concealment shall be evidence of her having murdered it[h].

Fourthly, all presumptive evidence of felony should be admitted cautiously: for the law holds, that it is better that ten guilty persons escape, than that one innocent suffer. And sir Matthew Hale in particular[j] lays down two rules, most prudent and necessary to be observed: 1. Never to convict a man for stealing the goods of a person unknown, merely because he will give no account how he came by them, unless an actual felony be proved of such goods: and, 2. Never to convict any person of murder or manslaughter, till at least the body be found dead; on account of two instances he mentions, where persons were executed for the murder of others, who were then alive, but missing.

Lastly, it was an antient and commonly received practice[i] (derived from the civil law, and which also to this day obtains in the kingdom of France[k]) that, as counsel was not allowed to any prisoner accused of a capital crime, so neither should he be suffered to exculpate himself by the testimony of any witnesses. And therefore it deserves to be remembered, to the honour of Mary I, (whose early sentiments, till her marriage with Philip of Spain, seem to have been humane and generous[l]) that when she appointed sir Richard Morgan chief justice of the common-pleas, she injoined him, "that notwithstanding the old error, which did not admit any witness to speak, or any other matter to be heard, in favour of the adversary, her majesty being party; her highness' pleasure was, that whatsoever could be brought in favour of the subject should be admitted to be heard: and moreover, that the justices should not persuade themselves to sit in judgment otherwise for her highness than for her subject."[m] Afterwards, in one particular instance (when embezzling the queen's military stores was made felony by statute 31 Eliz. c. 4.) it was provided that any person, impeached for such felony, "should be received and admitted to make any lawful proof that he could, by lawful witness or otherwise, for his discharge and defence:" and in general the courts grew so heartily ashamed of a doctrine so unreasonable and oppressive, that a practice was gradually introduced of examining witnesses for the prisoner, but not upon oath[n]: the consequence of which still was, that the jury gave less credit to the prisoner's evidence, than to that produced by the crown. Sir Edward Coke[o] protests very strongly against this tyrannical practice: declaring that he never read in any act of parliament, book-case, or record, that in criminal cases the party accused should not have witnesses sworn for him; and therefore there was not so much as scintilla juris against it[p]. And the house of commons were so sensible of this absurdity, that, in the bill for abolishing hostilities between England and Scotland, when felonies committed by Englishmen in Scotland[q] were ordered to be tried in one of the three northern counties, they insisted on a clause, and carried it[r] against the efforts of both the crown and the house of lords, against the practice of the courts in England, and the express law of Scotland[s], "that in all such trials, for the better discovery of the truth, and the better information of the consciences of the jury and justices, there shall be allowed to the party arraigned the benefit of such credible witnesses, to be examined upon oath, as can be produced for his clearing and justification." At length by the statute 7 W. III. c. 3. the same measure of justice was established throughout all the realm, in cases of treason within the act: and it was afterwards declared by statute 1 Ann. st. 2. c. 9. that in all cases of treason and felony, all witnesses for the prisoner should be examined upon oath, in like manner as the witnesses against him.

When the evidence on both sides is closed, the jury cannot be discharged till they have given in their verdict; but are to consider of it, and deliver it in, with the same forms, as upon civil causes: only they cannot, in a criminal case, give a privy verdict[t]. But an open verdict may be either general, guilty, or not guilty; of special, setting forth all the circumstances of the case, and praying the judgment of the court, whether, for instance, on the facts stated, it be murder, manslaughter, or no crime at all. This is where they doubt the matter of law, and therefore chuse to leave it to the determination of the court; though they have an unquestionable right of determining upon all the circumstances, and finding a general verdict, if they think proper so to hazard a breach of their oaths: and, if their verdict be notoriously wrong, they may be punished and the verdict set aside by attaint at the suit of the king; but not at the suit of the prisoner[u]. But the practice, heretofore in use, of fining, inprisoning [sic], or otherwise punishing jurors, merely at the discretion of the court, for finding their verdict contrary to the direction of the judge, was arbitrary, unconstitutional and illegal: and is treated as such by sir Thomas Smith, two hundred years ago; who accounted "such doings to be very violent, tyrannical, and contrary to the liberty and custom of the realm of England[w]." For, as sir Matthew Hale well observes[x], it would be a most unhappy case for the judge himself, if the prisoner's fate depended upon his directions:—unhappy also for the prisoner; for, if the judge's opinion must rule the verdict, the trial by jury would be useless. Yet in many instances[y], where contrary to evidence the jury have found the prisoner guilty, their verdict hath been mercifully set aside, and a new trial granted by the court of king's bench; for in such case, as hath been said, it cannot be set right by attaint. But there hath yet been no instance of granting a new trial, where the prisoner was acquitted upon the first[z].

If the jury therefore find the prisoner not guilty, he is then for ever quit and discharged of the accusation[a]; except he be appealed of felony within the time limited by law. But if the jury find him guilty[b], he is then said to be convicted of the crime whereof he stands indicted. Which conviction may accrue two ways; either by his confessing the offence and pleading guilty, or by his being found so by the verdict of this country.

When the offender is thus convicted, there are two collateral circumstances that immediately arise. 1. On a conviction, in general, for any felony, the reasonable expenses of prosecution are by statute 25 Geo. II. c. 36. to be allowed to the prosecutor out of the county stock, if he petitions the judge for that purpose; and by statute 27 Geo. II. c. 3. poor persons, bound over to give evidence, are likewise entitled to be paid their charges, as well without conviction as with it. 2. On a conviction of larciny [sic] in particular, the prosecutor shall have restitution of his goods, by virtue of the statute 21 Hen. VIII. c. 11. For by the common law there was no restitution of goods upon an indictment, because it is at the suit of the king only; and therefore the party was enforced to bring an appeal of robbery, in order to have his goods again[c]. But, it being considered that the party, prosecuting the offender by indictment, deserves to the full as much encouragement as he who prosecutes by appeal, this statute was made, which enacts, that if any person be convicted of larciny by the evidence of the party robbed, he shall have a full restitution of his money, goods, and chattels; or the value of them out of the offender's goods, if [he] has any, by a writ to be granted by the justices. And this writ of restitution shall reach the goods so stolen, notwithstanding the property[d] of them is endeavoured to be altered by sale in market overt[e]. And, though this may seem somewhat hard upon the buyer, yet the rule of law is that "spoliatus debet, ante omnia, restitui;" especially when he has used all the diligence in his power to convict the felon. And, since the case is reduced to this hard necessity, that either the owner or the buyer must suffer; the law prefers the right of the owner, who has done a meritorious act by pursuing a felon to condign punishment, to the right of the buyer, whose merit is only negative, that he has been guilty of no unfair transaction. Or else, secondly, without such writ of restitution, the party may peaceably retake his goods, wherever he happens to find them[f], unless a new property be fairly acquired therein. Or, lastly, if the felon be convicted and pardoned, or be allowed his clergy, the party robbed may bring his action of trover against him for his goods; and recover a satisfaction in damages. But such action lies not, before prosecution; for so felonies would be made up and healed[g]: and also recaption is unlawful, if it be done with intention to smother or compound the larciny; it then becoming the heinous offence of theft-bote, as was mentioned in a former chapter[h].

It is not uncommon, when a person is convicted of a misdemesnor, which principally and more immeidately affects some individual, as a battery, imprisonment, or the like, for the court to permit the defendant to speak with the prosecutor, before any judgment is pronounced; and, if the prosecutor declares himself satisfied, to inflict but a trivial punishment. This is done, to reimburse the prosecutor his expenses, and make him some private amends, without the trouble and circuity of a civil action. But it surely is a dangerous practice: and, though it may be intrusted to the prudence and discretion of the judges in the superior courts of record, it ought never to be allowed in local or inferior jurisdictions, such as the quarter-sessions; where prosecutions for assaults are by this means too frequently commenced, rather for private lucre than for the great ends of public justice. Above all, it should never be suffered, where the testimony of the prosecutor himself is necessary to convict the defendant: for by this means, the rules of evidence are intirely subverted; the prosecutor becomes in effect a plaintiff, and yet is suffered to bear witness for himself. Nay even a voluntary forgiveness, by the party injured, ought not in true policy to intercept the stroke of justice. “This,” says an elegant writer[i], (who pleads with equal strength for the certainty as for the lenity of punishment) “may be an act of good-nature and humanity, but it is contrary to the good of the public. For, although a private citizen may dispense with satisfaction for his private injury, he cannot remove the necessity of public example. The right of punishing belongs not to any one individual in particular, but to the society in general, or the sovereign who represents that society: and a man may renounce his own portion of this right, but he cannot give up that of others.”

12.3.2.1Earl of Shaftesbury’s Trial, 1681

[Then a Bill of High-Treason was offered against the Earl of Shaftesbury; and Sir Francis Withins moved, That the evidence might be heard in court.]

Foreman. My Lord Chief Justice, it is the opinion of the jury, that they ought to examine the witnesses in private, and it hath been the constant practice of our ancestors and predecessors to do it; and they insist upon it as their right to examine in private, because they are bound to keep the king’s secrets, which they cannot do, if it be done in court.

[Pemberton,] L.C.J. Look ye, gentlemen of the jury, it may very probably be, that some late usage has brought you into this error, that it is your right, but it is not your right in truth… . What you say concerning keeping your counsels, that is quite of another nature, that is, your debates, and those things, there you shall be in private, for to consider of what you hear publicly. But certainly it is the best way, both for the king, and for you, that there should, in a case of this nature, be an open and plain examination of the witnesses, that all the world may see what they say.

Foreman. My lord, if your lordship pleases, I must beg your lordship’s pardon, if I mistake in anything, it is contrary to the sense of what the jury apprehend. First, they apprehend that the very words of the oath doth bind them, it says, “That they shall keep the counsel’s, and their own secrets:” Now, my lord, there can be no secret in public; the very intimation of that doth imply, that the examination should be secret; besides, my lord, I beg your lordship’s pardon if we mistake, we do not understand any thing of law.

Mr. Papillon [a juror]… . If it be the ancient usage and custom of England, that hath never been altered from time to time, and hath continued so, we desire your lordship’s opinion upon that; as we would not do any that may be prejudicial to the king, so we would not do the least that should be prejudicial to the liberties of the people; if it be the ancient custom of the kingdom to examine in private, then there is something may be very prejudicial to the king in this public examination; for sometimes in examining witnesses in private, there come to be discovered some persons guilty of treason, and misprision of treason, that were not known, nor thought on before. Then the jury sends down to the court, and gives them intimation, and these men are presently secured; whereas, my lord, in case they be examined in open court publicly, then presently there is intimation given and these men are gone away. Another thing that may be prejudicial to the king, is, that all the evidences here, will be foreknown before they come to the main trial upon issue by the petty jury; then if there be not a very great deal of care, these witnesses may be confronted by raising up witnesses to prejudice them, as in some cases it has been: Then besides, the jury do apprehend, that in private they are more free to examine things in particular, for the satisfying their own consciences, and that without favour or affection; and we hope we shall do our duty.

[Pemberton,] L.C.J… . [T]he king's counsel have examined whether he hath cause to accuse these persons, or not; and, gentlemen, they understand very well, that it will be no prejudice to the king to have the evidence heard openly in court; or else the king would never desire it.

Foreman. My lord, the gentlemen of the jury desire that it may be recorded, that we insisted upon it as our right; but if the court overrule, we must submit to it.

Howell's State Trials, vol. 8, pp. 759, 771–74.

12.3.2.2Respublica v. Shaffer, 1788

AFTER some conversation with the Grand Inquest, the Attorney General informed the court, that a list of eleven persons had been presented to him by the Foreman, with a request, that they might be qualified and sent to the jury, as witnesses upon a bill then depending before them. He stated that the list had been made out by the defendant's bail: that the persons named were intended to furnish testimony in favor of the party charged, upon facts with which the Inquest, of their own knowledge, were unacquainted; and he concluded with requesting, that the opinion of the court might be given upon this application. The Chief Justice, accordingly, addressed the Grand Jury to the following effect:

M'Kean, Chief Justice.—Were the proposed examination of witnesses, on the part of the Defendant, to be allowed, the long-established rules of law and justice would be at an end. It is a matter well known, and well understood, that by the laws of our country, every question which affects a man's life, reputation, or property, must be tried by twelve of his peers; and that their unanimous verdict is, alone, competent to determine the fact in issue. If, then, you undertake to inquire, not only upon what foundation the charge is made, but, likewise, upon what foundation it is denied, you will, in effect, usurp the jurisdiction of the Petit Jury, you will supersede the legal authority of the court, in judging of the competency and admissibility of witnesses, and, having thus undertaken to try the question, that question may be determined by a bare majority, or by a much greater number of your body, than the twelve peers prescribed by the law of the land. This point has, I believe, excited some doubts upon former occasions; but those doubts have never arisen in the mind of any lawyer, and they may easily be removed by a proper consideration of the subject. For, the bills, or presentments, found by a grand Jury, amount to nothing more than an official accusation, in order to put the party accused upon his trial; 'till the bill is returned, there is, therefore, no charge from which he can be required to exculpate himself; and we know that many persons, against whom bills were returned, have been afterwards acquitted by a verdict of their country. Here, then, is the just line of discrimination: It is the duty of the Grand-Jury to enquire into the nature and probable grounds of the charge; but it is the exclusive province of the Petit Jury, to hear and determine, with the assistance, and under the direction of the court, upon points of law, whether the Defendant is, or is not guilty, on the whole evidence, for, as well as against, him. —— You will therefore, readily perceive, that if you examine the witnesses on both sides, you do not confine your consideration to the probable grounds of charge, but engage completely in the trial of the cause; and your return must, consequently, be tantamount to a verdict of acquittal or condemnation. But this would involve us in another difficulty; for, by the law, it is declared, that no man shall be twice put in jeopardy for the same offence: and, yet, it is certain, that the enquiry now proposed by the Grand Jury, would necessarily introduce the oppression of a double trial. Nor is it merely upon maxims of law, but, I think, likewise, upon principles of humanity, that this innovation should be opposed. Considering the bill as an accusation grounded entirely upon the testimony in support of the prosecution, the Petit Jury receive no biass [sic] from the sanction which the indorsement of the Grand Jury has conferred upon it.—But, on the other hand, would it not, in some degree, prejudice the most upright mind against the Defendant, that on a full hearing of his defence, another tribunal had pronounced it insufficient?—which would then be the natural inference from every true bill. Upon the whole, the court is of opinion, that it would be improper and illegal to examine the witnesses, on behalf of the Defendant, while the charge against him lies before the Grand-Jury.

One of the Grand Inquest then observed to the court, that "there was a clause in the qualifications of the Jurors, upon which he, and some of his brethren, wished to hear the interpretation of the Judges—to wit—what is the legal acceptation of the words "diligently to enquire?"["] To this the Chief Justice replied, that "the expression meant, diligently to enquire into the circumstances of the charge, the credibility of the witnesses who support it, and, from the whole, to judge whether the person accused ought to be put upon his trial. For, (he added), though it would be improper to determine the merits of the cause, it is incumbent upon the Grand Jury to satisfy their minds, by a diligent enquiry, that there is a probable ground for the accusation, before they give it their authority, and call upon the Defendant to make a public defence."

12.3.2.3Holmes v. Comegys, 1789

… Shippen, President:—It would be of very dangerous consequence, if it was established, that a commercial agent was not amenable as a witness in a Court of Justice, in a cause against his constituent. It is straining the matter of privilege too far. And, if the law makes him a witness, we are too fond of getting at the truth, to permit him to excuse himself from declaring it, because he conceives, that, in point of delicacy, it would be a breach of confidence.

(b) Where the Evidence of a Witness is false in an immaterial Part, the Jury need not give him Credit in any other Part. Cro. Eliz. 310.

(c) If a Jury give a Verdict on their own Knowledge, they ought to tell the Court so; but they may be sworn as Witnesses; and the fair Way is to tell the Court, before they are sworn, that they have Evidence to give. 1 Salk. 405.

212 1 Rol. Abr. 282.

213 Vaugh. 146. 1 Hawk. P. C. 191. — But by Hal. Hist. P C. 310. the King may have an Attaint; for altho' a Man convicted upon an Indictment can have no Attaint, because the Guilt is affirmed by two Inquests, the Grand Inquest that present the Offence on their Oaths, and the Petit Jury that agrees with them; yet where the Petit Jury acquits, they stand as a single Verdict; for they disaffirm what the Grand Inquest of twelve Men have upon their Oaths presented.

(a) Therefore where the Matter omitted to be inquired by the principal Jury is such as goes to the very Point of the Issue, and upon which, if it be found by the Jury, an Attaint will lie against them by the Party, if they have given a false Verdict, there such Matter cannot be supplied by a Writ of Inquiry, because thereby the Plaintiff may lose his Action of Attaint, which will not lie upon an Inquest of Office. Carth. 362.

t Sir Edward Coke (3 Inst. 137.) gives another additional reason for this refusal, "because the evidence to convict a prisoner should be so manifest, as it could not be contradicted." It was therefore thought too dangerous an experiment, to let an advocate try, whether it could be contradicted or no.

w Father Parsons the jesuit, and after him bishop Ellys, (of English liberty, ii.26.) have imagined, that the benefit of counsel to plead for them was first denied to prisoners by a law of Henry I, meaning (I presume) chapters 47 and 48 of the code which is usually attributed to that prince. De causis criminalibus vel capitalibus nemo quaerat consilium; quin implacitatus statim perneget, sine omni petitione consilii. —— In aliis omnibus potest et debet uti consilio." But this consilium, I conceive, signifies only an imparlance, and the petitio consilii is craving leave to imparl; (See Vol. III. pag. 298.) which is not allowable in any criminal prosecution. This will be manifest by comparing this law with a co-temporary passage in the grand coustumier of Normandy, (ch. 85.) which speaks of imparlances in personal actions. "Apres ce, est tend le querelle a respondre; et aura congie de soy conseiller, s'il le demande: et, quand il sera conseille, il peut nyer le faict dont il est accuse." Or, as it stands in the Latin text, (edit. 1539.) "Querelatus autem postea tenetur respondere; et habebit licentiam consulendi, si requirat: habito autem consilio, debet factum negare quo accusatus est."

CHAPTER 13

AMENDMENT VII

CIVIL JURY TRIAL CLAUSES

13.1TEXTS

13.1.1DRAFTS IN FIRST CONGRESS

13.1.1.1Proposal by Madison in House, June 8, 1789

13.1.1.1.a Sixthly. That article 3d, section 2 [of the Constitution], be annexed to the end of clause 2d, these words to wit: but no appeal to such court shall be allowed where the value in controversy shall not amount to dollars: nor shall any fact triable by jury, according to the course of common law, be otherwise reexaminable than may consist with the principles of common law.

Seventhly. That in article 3d, section 2 [of the Constitution], the third clause be struck out, and in its place be inserted the clauses following, to wit:

The trial of all crimes (except in cases of impeachments, and cases arising in the land or naval forces, or the militia when on actual service in time of war or public danger) shall be by an impartial jury of freeholders of the vicinage, with the requisite of unanimity for conviction, of the right of challenge, and other accustomed requisites; and in all crimes punishable with loss of life or member, presentment or indictment by a grand jury, shall be an essential preliminary, provided that in cases of crimes committed within any county which may be in possession of an enemy, or in which a general insurrection may prevail, the trial may by law be authorised in some other county of the same state, as near as may be to the seat of the offence.

In cases of crimes committed not within any county, the trial may by law be in such county as the laws shall have prescribed. In suits at common law, between man and man, the trial by jury, as one of the best securities to the rights of the people, ought to remain inviolate.

Congressional Register, June 8, 1789, vol. 1, pp. 428–29.

13.1.1.1.b Sixthly. That article 3d, section 2 [of the Constitution], be annexed to the end of clause 2d, these words, to wit: but no appeal to such court shall be allowed where the value in controversy shall not amount to dollars: nor shall any fact triable by jury, according to the course of common law, be otherwise reexaminable than may consist with the principles of common law.

13.1.1.2Proposal by Sherman to House Committee of Eleven, July 21–28, 1789

[Amendment] 9 In Suits at common law in courts acting under the authority of the united States, issues of fact Shall be tried by a Jury if either party, request it.

Madison Papers, DLC.

13.1.1.3House Committee of Eleven Report, July 28, 1789

Art. 3, Sec. 2, add to the 2d Par. "But no appeal to such court shall be allowed, where the value in controversy shall not amount to one thousand dollars; nor shall any fact, triable by a Jury according to the course of the common law, be otherwise reexaminable than according to the rules of the common law."

Art. 3, Sec. 2—Strike out the whole of the 3d paragraph, and insert—"In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation, to be confronted with the witnesses against him, to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defence."

"The trial of all crimes (except in cases of impeachment, and in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service, in time of war or public danger) shall be by an impartial jury of freeholders of the vicinage, with the requisite of unanimity for conviction, the right of challenge and other accustomed requisites; and no person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment by a Grand Jury; but if a crime be committed in a place in the possession of an enemy, or in which an insurrection may prevail, the indictment and trial may by law be authorized in some other place within the same State; and if it be committed in a place not within a State, the indictment and trial may be at such place or places as the law may have directed."

"In suits at common law the right of trial by jury shall be preserved."

Broadside Collection, DLC.

13.1.3.6.a Concessions and Agreements of West New Jersey, 1676

CHAPTER XVII.

THAT no Proprietor, Freeholder or Inhabitant of the said Province of West New-Jersey, shall be deprived or condemned of Life, Limb, Liberty, Estate, Property or any ways hurt in his or their Privileges, Freedoms or Franchises, upon any account whatsoever, without a due Tryal, and Judgment passed by Twelve good and lawful Men of his Neighbourhood first had: And that in all Causes to be tryed, and in all Tryals, the Person or Persons, arrained may except against any of the said Neighbourhood, without any Reason rendered, (not exceeding Thirty five) and in case of any valid reason alledged, against every Person nominated for that Service.

CHAPTER XVIII.

AND that no Proprietor, Freeholder, Freedenison, or Inhabitant in the said Province, shall be attached, arrested, or imprisoned, for or by reason of a Debt, Duty, or other Thing whatsoever (Cases Felonious, Criminal and Treasonable excepted) before he or she have personal Summon, or Summons, left at his or her last dwelling Place, if in the said Province, by some legal authorized Officer, constituted and appointed for that Purpose, to appear in some Court of Judicature for the said Province, with a full and plain account of the Cause or Thing in demand, as also the Name or Names of the Person or Persons at whose suit, and the Court where he is to appear, and that he hath at least Fourteen Days Time to appear and answer the said suit, if he or she live or inhabit within Forty Miles English of the said Court, and if at a further distance, to have for every Twenty Miles, two Days more, for his and their appearance, and so proportionably for a larger distance of space.

That upon the Recording of the Summons, and non appearance of such Person and Persons, a Writ or attachment shall or may be issued out to arrest, or attach the Person or Persons of such defaulters, to cause his or their Appearance in such Court, returnable at a Day certain, to answer the Penalty or Penalties, in such Suit or Suits; and if he or they shall be condemned by legal Tryal and Judgment, the Penalty or Penalties shall be paid and satisfied out of his or their real or personal Estate so condemned, or cause the Person or Persons so condemned, to lie in execution till Satisfaction of the Debt and Damages be made, PROVIDED ALWAYS, if such Person or Persons so condemned, shall pay and deliver such Estate, Goods and Chattles which he or any other Person hath for his or their use, and shall solemnly declare and aver, that he or they have not any further Estate, Goods, or Chattles wheresoever, to satisfy the Person or Persons, (at whose Suit, he or they are condemned) their respective Judgments, and shall also bring and produce three other Persons as compurgators, who are well known and of honest Reputation, and approved of by the Commissioners of that Division, where they dwell or inhabit, which shall in such open Court, likewise solemnly declare and aver, that they believe in their Consciences, such Person and Persons so condemned, have not werewith [sic] further to pay the said Condemnation or Condemnations, he or they shall be thence forthwith discharged from their said imprisonment, any Law or Custom to the contrary thereof, heretofore in the said Province, notwithstanding. And upon such Summons and Default of appearance, recorded as aforesaid, and such Person and Persons not appearing within Forty Days after, it shall and may be lawful for such Court of Judicature to proceed to tryal, of twelve lawful Men to Judgment, against such Defaulters, and issue forth Execution against his or their Estate, real and personal, to satisfy such Penalty or Penalties, to such Debt and Damages so Recorded, as far as it shall or may extend.

CHAPTER XIX.

THAT there shall be in every Court, three Justices or Commissioners, who shall sit with the twelve Men of the Neighbourhood, with them to hear all Causes, and to assist the said Twelve Men of the Neighbourhood in Case of Law; and that they the said Justices shall pronounce such Judgment as they shall receive from, and be directed by the said Twelve Men, in whom only the Judgment resides, and not otherwise.

And in Case of their neglect and refusal, that then one of the Twelve, by consent of the rest, pronounce their own Judgment as the Justices should have done.

And if any Judgment shall be past, in any Case Civil or Criminal, by any other Person or Persons, or any other way, then according to this Agreement and Appointment, it shall be held null and void, and such Person or Persons so presuming to give Judgment, shall be severely Fin'd, and upon complaint made to the General Assembly, by them be declared incapable of any Office or Trust within this Province.

CHAPTER XX.

THAT in all Matters and Causes, Civil and Criminal, Proof is to be made by the solemn and plain averment, of at least two honest and reputable Persons; and in Case that any Person or Persons shall bear false Witness, and bring in his or their Evidence, contrary to the Truth of the Matter as shall be made plainly to appear, that then every such Person or Persons, shall in Civil Causes, suffer the Penalty which would be due to the Person or Persons he or they bear Witness against. And in Case any Witness or Witnesses, on the behalf of any Person or Persons, Indicted in a Criminal Cause, shall be found to have born False Witness for Fear, Gain, Malice, or Favour, and thereby hinder the due Execution of the Law, and deprive the suffering Person or Persons of their due Satisfaction, that then and in all other Cases of false Evidence, such Person or Persons, shall be first severely Fined, and next that he or they shall forever be disabled from being admitted in evidence, or into any Publick Office, Employment, or Service within this Province.

CHAPTER XXI.

THAT all and every Person and Persons whatsoever, who shall prosecute or prefer any Indictment or Information against others for any personal Injuries, or Matter Criminal, or shall Prosecute for any other Criminal Cause, (Treason, Murther, and Felony, only excepted) shall and may be Master of his own Process, and have full Power to forgive and remit the Person or Persons offending against him or herself only, as well before as after Judgment, and Condemnation, and Pardon and Remit the Sentence, Fine, and Punishment of the Person or Persons Offending, be it personal or other whatsoever.

CHAPTER XXII.

THAT the Tryals of all Causes, Civil and Criminal, shall be heard and decided by the Virdict or Judgment of Twelve honest Men of the Neighbourhood, only to be summoned and presented by the Sheriff of that Division, or Propriety where the Fact or Trespass is committed; and that no Person or Persons shall be compelled to Fee any Attorney or Counciller to plead his Cause, but that all Persons have free Liberty to plead his own Cause, if he please: And that no Person nor Persons imprisoned upon any account whatsoever within this Province, shall be obliged to pay any Fees to the Officer or Officers of the said Prison, either when committed or discharged.

CHAPTER XXIII.

That in all publick Courts of Justice for Tryals of Causes, Civil or Criminal, any Person or Persons, Inhabitants of the said Province, may freely come into, and attend the said Courts, and hear and be present, at all or any such Tryals as shall be there had or passed, that Justice may not be done in a Corner nor in any covert manner, being intended and resolved, by the help of the Lord, and by these our Concessions and Fundamentals, that all and every Person and Persons Inhabiting the said Province, shall, as far as in us lies, be free from Oppression and Slavery.

13.2.1.2August 17, 1789

13.2.1.2.a The 6th proposition, art. 3. sect. 2. add to the 2d paragraph “But no appeal to such court shall be allowed, where the value in controversy shall not amount to one thousand dollars; nor shall any fact, triable by jury according to the course of common law, be otherwise reexaminable than according to the rules of common law.”

Mr. Benson

Moved to strike out the first part of the paragraph respecting the limitation of appeals, because the question in controversy might be an important one, though the action was not to the amount of a thousand dollars.

Mr. Madison.

If the gentleman will propose any restriction to answer his purpose, and for avoiding the inconvenience he apprehends, I am willing to agree to it, but it will be improper to strike out the clause without a substitute.

There is little danger that any court in the United States will admit an appeal where the matter in dispute does not amount to a thousand dollars, but as the possibility of such an event has excited in the minds of many citizens, the greatest apprehension that persons of opulence would carry a cause from the extremities of the union to the supreme court, and therefore prevent the due administration of justice, it ought to be guarded against.

Mr. Livermore thought the clause was objectionable, because it comprehended nothing more than the value.

Mr. Sedgwick

Moved to insert 3,000 dollars, in lieu of 1,000, but on the question, this motion was rejected, and the proposition accepted in its original form.

Congressional Register, August 17, 1789, vol. 2, pp. 227–28.

13.2.1.2.b Thirteenth Amendment. — Art. 3. Sec. 2, add to the 2d par. “But no appeal to such court shall be allowed, where the value in controversy shall not amount to one thousand dollars; nor shall any fact triable by a jury, according to the course of the common law, be otherwise re examinable than according to the rules of common law.”

Mr. Benson moved to strike out the first part of the paragraph, respecting the limitation of appeals. This motion was negatived.

Mr. Sedgwick moved to strike out the words “one thousand” and insert “three thousand.” Negatived.

The amendment was accepted.

13.2.1.2.c Thirteenth amendmen: [sic] — “Art. III. Sec. 2, add to the 2d par. “But no appeal to such court shall be allowed, where the value in controversy shall not amount to one thousand dollars; nor shall any fact triable by a jury, according to the course of the common law, be otherwise re examinable than according to the rules of common law.”

Mr Benson moved to strike out the first part of the paragraph, respecting the limitation of appeals. This motion was negatived.

Mr. Sedgwick moved to strike out the words “one thousand” and insert “three thousand.” Negatived.

The amendment was accepted.

New-York Daily Gazette, August 19, 1789, p. 802, col. 4.

13.2.1.2.d 13th Amendment. Art. 3. Sec. 2, add to the 2d par. But no appeal to such court shall be allowed, where the value in controversy shall not amount to one thousand dollars; nor shall any fact triable by jury, according to the course of common law, be otherwise reexaminable than according to the rules of common law.

Mr. Benson moved to strike out the first part of the paragraph, respecting the limitation of appeals.

Mr. Madison observed, that except some adequate substitute was proposed, he thought it would be necessary to retain the clause: There is, said he, perhaps no danger of any court in the United States, granting an appeal where the value in dispute does not amount to 1,000 dollars; still the possibility of such an event has excited the greatest apprehensions in the minds of many citizens of the United States: The idea that opulent persons might carry a cause from one end of the continent to another has caused serious fears in the minds of the people: I think it best to retain the clause.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. Sedgwick, to strengthen the clause, moved to strike out 1,000 dollars and to insert 3,000 dollars.—This motion was seconded and supported by Mr. Livermore, but was negatived, and the amendment accepted.

Gazette of the U.S., August 22, 1789, p. 249, col. 3, and p. 250, col. 1.

13.2.1.3August 18, 1789

The 3d clause of the 7th proposition as follows, “In suits at common law, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved,” was considered and adopted.

Congressional Register, August 18, 1789, vol. 2, p. 233.

13.2.1.4August 21, 1789

The house then took into consideration the 3d clause of the 7th proposition, which was adopted without debate.

13.2.1.5Petition of John Fitch Read in the Senate, March 22, 1790

The petition of John Fitch, was read; praying that a clause, providing for the trial by jury, might be inserted in a Bill before Congress, “To promote the progress of useful arts.”

Ordered, That this petition be referred to the Committee who have under consideration the last mentioned Bill.

13.2.2.1Massachusetts

13.2.2.1.aJanuary 30, 1788

Mr. GORE observed, … that it had been the uniform conduct of those in opposition to the proposed form of government, to determine, in every case where it was possible that the administrators thereof could do wrong, that they would do so, although it were demonstrable that such wrong would be against their own honor and interest, and productive of no advantage to themselves. On this principle alone have they determined that the trial by jury would be taken away in civil cases; when it had been clearly shown, that no words could be adopted, apt to the situation and customs of each state in this particular. Jurors are differently chosen in different states, and in point of qualification the laws of the several states are very diverse; not less so in causes and disputes which are entitled to trial by jury. What is the result of this? That the laws of Congress may and will be conformable to the local laws in this particular, although the Constitution could not make a universal rule equally applying to the customs and statutes of the different states. Very few governments (certainly not this) can be interested in depriving the people of trial by jury, in questions of meum et tuum.…

Mr. DAWES said, he did not see that the right of trial by jury was taken away by the article. The word court does not, either by popular or technical construction, exclude the use of a jury to try facts. When people, in common language, talk of a trial at the Court of Common Pleas, or the Supreme Judicial Court, do they not include all the branches and members of such court — the jurors as well as the judges? They certainly do, whether they mention the jurors expressly or not. Our state legislators have construed the word court in the same way; for they have given appeals from a justice of peace to the Court of Common Pleas, and from thence to the Supreme Court, without saying any thing of the jury; but in cases which, almost time out of mind, have been tried without jury, there the jurisdiction is given expressly to the justices of a particular court, as may be instanced by suits upon the absconding act, so called.

Gentlemen have compared the article under consideration to that power which the British claimed, and we resisted, at the revolution; namely, the power of trying the Americans without a jury. But surely there was no parallel in the cases; it was criminal cases in which they attempted to make this abuse of power. Mr. D. mentioned one example of this, which, though young, he well remembered; and that was the case of Nickerson, the pirate, who was tried without a jury, and whose judges were the governors of Massachusetts and of some neighboring provinces, together with Admiral Montague, and some gentlemen of distinction. Although this trial was without a jury, yet, as it was a trial upon the civil law, there was not so much clamor about it as otherwise there might have been; but still it was disagreeable to the people, and was one of the then complaints. But the trial by jury was not attempted to be taken from civil causes. It was no object of power, whether one subject's property was lessened, while another's was increased; nor can it be now an object with the federal legislature. What interest can they have in constituting a judiciary, to proceed in civil causes without a trial by jury? In criminal causes, by the proposed government, there must be a jury. It is asked, Why is not the Constitution as explicit in securing the right of jury in civil as in criminal cases? The answer is, Because it was out of the power of the Convention. The several states differ so widely in their modes of trial, some states using a jury in causes wherein other states employ only their judges, that the Convention have very wisely left it to the federal legislature to make such regulations as shall, as far as possible, accommodate the whole. Thus our own state constitution authorizes the General Court to erect judicatories, but leaves the nature, number, and extent of them, wholly to the discretion of the legislature. The bill of rights, indeed, secures the trial by jury, in civil causes, except in cases where a contrary practice has obtained. Such a clause as this some gentlemen wish were inserted in the proposed Constitution, but such a clause would be abused in that Constitution, as has been clearly been stated by the honorable gentleman from Charlestown, (Mr. Gorham,) because the "exception of all cases where a jury have not heretofore been used," would include almost all cases that could be mentioned, when applied to all the states, for they have severally differed in the kinds of causes where they have tried without a jury.

13.2.2.1.bFebruary 1, 1788

Hon. Mr. ADAMS. … Your excellency's next proposition … recommends a trial by jury in civil actions between citizens of different states, if either of the parties shall request it. These, and several others which I have mentioned, are so evidently beneficial as to need no comment of mine. And they are all, in every particular, of so general a nature, and so equally interesting to every state, that I cannot but persuade myself to think they would all readily join with us in the measure proposed by your excellency, if we should now adopt it.

Mr. TREDWELL. … I could have wished, sir, that a greater caution had been used to secure to us the freedom of election, a sufficient and responsible representation, the freedom of the press, and the trial by jury both in civil and criminal cases.

Elliot, vol. 2, p. 399.

Mr. BLOODWORTH. … The honorable gentleman has said that the state courts and the courts of the United States would have concurrent jurisdiction. I beg the committee to reflect what would be the consequence of such measures. It has ever been considered that the trial by jury was one of the greatest rights of the people. I ask whether, if such causes go into the federal court, the trial by jury is not cut off, and whether there is any security that we shall have justice done us. I ask if there be any security that we shall have juries in civil causes. In criminal cases there are to be juries, but there is no provision made for having civil causes tried by jury. This concurrent jurisdiction is inconsistent with the security of that great right. If it be not, I would wish to hear how it is secured. I have listened with attention to what the learned gentlemen have said, and have endeavored to see whether their arguments had any weight; but I found none in them. Many words have been spoken, and long time taken up; but with me they have gone in at one ear, and out at the other. It would give me much pleasure to hear that the trial by jury was secured.

Mr. J. M'DOWALL. … We know that the trial by a jury of the vicinage is one of the greatest securities for property. If causes are to be decided at such a great distance, the poor will be oppressed; in land affairs, particularly, the wealthy suitor will prevail. A poor man, who has a just claim on a piece of land, has not substance to stand it. Can it be supposed that any man, of common circumstances, can stand the expense and trouble of going from Georgia to Philadelphia, there to have a suit tried? And can it be justly determined without the benefit of a trial by jury? These are things that have justly alarmed the people. What made the people revolt from Great Britain? The trial by jury, that great safeguard of liberty, was taken away, and a stamp duty was laid upon them. This alarmed them, and led them to fear that great oppressions would take place. We then resisted. It involved us in a war, and caused us to relinquish a government which made us happy in every thing else. The war as very bloody, but we got our independence. We are now giving away our dear-bought rights. We ought to consider what we are about to do before we determine.

Mr. SPAIGHT. Mr. Chairman, the trial by jury was not forgotten in the Convention; the subject took up a considerable time to investigate it. It was impossible to make any one uniform regulation for all the states, or that would include all cases where it would be necessary. It was impossible, by one expression, to embrace the whole. There are a number of equity and maritime cases, in some of the states, in which jury trials are not used. Had the Convention said that all causes should be tried by a jury, equity and maritime cases would have been included. It was therefore left to the legislature to say in what cases it should be used; and as the trial by jury is in full force in the state courts, we have the fullest security.

Mr. IREDELL. … I am by no means surprised at the anxiety which is expressed by gentlemen on this subject. Of all the trials that ever were instituted in the world, this, in my opinion, is the best, and that which I hope will continue the longest. … But I have been told that the omission of it arose from the difficulty of establishing one uniform, unexceptionable mode: this mode of trial being different, in many particulars, in the several states. Gentlemen will be pleased to consider that there is a material difference between an article fixed in the Constitution, and a regulation by law. An article in the Constitution, however inconvenient it may prove by experience, can only be altered by altering the Constitution itself, which manifestly is a thing that ought not to be done often. When regulated by law, it can easily be occasionally altered so as best to suit the conveniences of the people. Had there been an article in the Constitution taking away that trial, it would justly have excited the public indignation. It is not taken away by the Constitution. Though that does not provide expressly for a trial by jury in civil cases, it does not say that there shall not be such a trial. The reasons of the omission have been mentioned by a member of the late General Convention, (Mr. Spaight.) There are different practices in regard to this trial in different states. … I beg leave to say, that if any gentleman of ability and knowledge of the subject will only endeavor to fix upon any one rule that would be pleasing to all the states under the impression of their present different habits, he will be convinced that it is impracticable. … It is not to be presumed that the Congress would dare to deprive the people of this valuable privilege. …

… In respect to the trial by jury, its being taken away, in certain cases, was, to be sure, one of the causes assigned in the Declaration of Independence. … But this Constitution has not taken it away, and it is left to the discretion of our own legislature to act, in this respect, as their wisdom shall direct. In Great Britain, the people speak of the trial by jury with admiration. No monarch, or minister, however arbitrary in his principles, would dare to attack that noble palladium of liberty. The enthusiasm of the people in its favor would, in such a case, produce general resistance. That trial remains unimpaired there, although they have a considerable standing army, and their Parliament has authority to abolish it, if they please. But wo to those who should attempt it! If it be secure in that country, under these circumstances, can we believe that Congress either would or could take it away in this? Were they to attempt it, their authority would be instantly resisted. They would draw down on themselves the resentment and detestation of the people. They and their families, so long as any remained in being, would be held in eternal infamy, and the attempt prove as unsuccessful as it was wicked.

Gov. JOHNSTON. Mr. Chairman, the observations of the gentleman last up confirm what the other gentleman said. I mean that, as there are dissimilar modes with respect to the trial by jury in different states, there could be no general rule fixed to accommodate all. He says that this clause is defective, because the trial is not to be by a jury of the vicinage. Let us look at the state of Virginia, where, as long as I have known it, the laws have been executed so as to satisfy the inhabitants, and, I believe, as well as in any part of the Union. In that country, juries are summoned every day from the by-standers. We may expect less partiality when the trial is by strangers; and were I to be tried for my property or life, I would rather be tried by disinterested men, who were not biased, than by men who were perhaps intimate friends of my opponent. Our mode is different from theirs; but whether theirs be better than ours or not, is not the question. It would be improper for our delegates to impose our mode upon them, or for theirs to impose their mode upon us. The trial will probably be, in each state, as it has been hitherto used in such state, or otherwise regulated as conveniently as possible for the people. The delegates who are to meet in Congress will, I hope, be men of virtue and wisdom. If not, it will be our own fault. They will have it in their power to make necessary regulations to accommodate the inhabitants of each state. In the Constitution, the general principles only are laid down. It will be the object of the future legislation to Congress to make such laws as will be most convenient for the people. …

Mr. BLOODWORTH. Mr. Chairman, the footing on which the trial by jury is, in the Constitution, does not satisfy me. Perhaps I am mistaken; but if I understand the thing right, the trial by jury is taken away. If the Supreme Federal Court has jurisdiction both as to law and fact, it appears to me to be taken away. The honorable gentleman who was in the Convention told us that the clause, as it now stands, resulted from the difficulty of fixing the mode of trial. I think it was easy to have put it on a secure footing. But, if the genius of the people of the United States is so dissimilar that our liberties cannot be secured, we can never hang long together. Interest is the band of social union; and when this is taken away, the Union itself must dissolve.

Mr. MACLAINE. Mr. Chairman, I do not take the interest of the states to be so dissimilar; I take them to be all nearly alike, and inseparably connected. It is impossible to lay down any constitutional rule for the government of all the different states in each particular. But it will be easy for the legislature to make laws to accommodate the people in every part of the Union, as circumstances may arise. Jury trial is not taken away in such cases where it may be found necessary. Although the Supreme Court has cognizance of the appeal, it does not follow but that the trial by jury may be had in the court below, and the testimony transmitted to the Supreme Court, who will then finally determine, on a review of all the circumstances. This is well known to be the practice in some of the states. In our own state, indeed, when a cause is instituted in the county court, and afterwards there is an appeal upon it, a new trial is had in the superior court, as if no trial had been before. In other countries, however, when a trial is had in an inferior court, and an appeal is taken, no testimony can be given in the court above, but the court determines upon the circumstances appearing upon the record. If I am right, the plain inference is, that there may be a trial in the inferior courts, and that the record, including the testimony, may be sent to the Supreme Court. But if there is a necessity for a jury in the Supreme Court, it will be a very easy matter to empanel a jury at the bar of the Supreme Court, which may save great expense, and be very convenient to the people. It is impossible to make every regulation at once. Congress, who are our own representatives, will undoubtedly make such regulations as will suit the convenience and secure the liberty of the people.

Mr. IREDELL declared it as his opinion that there might be juries in the Superior Court as well as in the inferior courts, and that it was in the power of Congress to regulate it so.

Elliot, vol. 4, pp. 142–48, 150–52.

Mr. SPENCER. … The trial by jury has been also spoken of. Every person who is acquainted with the nature of liberty need not be informed of the importance of this trial. Juries are called the bulwarks of our rights and liberty; and no country can ever be enslaved as long as those cases which affect their lives and property are to be decided, in a great measure, by the consent of twelve honest, disinterested men, taken from the respectable body of yeomanry. It is highly improper that any clause which regards the security of the trial by jury should be any way doubtful. In the clause that has been read, it is ascertained that criminal cases are to be tried by jury in the states where they are committed. It has been objected to that clause, that it is not sufficiently explicit. I think that it is not. It was observed that one may be taken to a great distance. One reason of the resistance to the British government was, because they required that we should be carried to the country of Great Britain, to be tried by juries of that country. But we insisted on being tried by juries of the vicinage, in our own country. I think it therefore proper that something explicit should be said with respect to the vicinage.

With regard to that part, that the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction both as to law and fact, it has been observed that, though the federal court might decide without a jury, yet the court below, which tried it, might have a jury. I ask the gentleman what benefit would be received in the suit by having a jury trial in the court below, when the verdict is set aside in the Supreme Court. It was intended by this clause that the trial by jury should be suppressed in the superior and inferior courts. It has been said, in defence of the omission concerning the trial by jury in civil cases, that one general regulation could not be made; that in several cases the constitution of several states did not require a trial by jury, — for instance, in cases of equity and admiralty, — whereas in others it did, and that, therefore, it was proper to leave this subject at large. I am sure that, for the security of liberty, they ought to have been at the pains of drawing some line. I think that the respectable body who formed the Constitution should have gone so far as to put matters on such a footing as that there should be no danger. They might have provided that all those cases which are now triable by a jury should be tried in each state by a jury, according to the mode usually practiced in such state. This would have been easily done, if they had been at the trouble of writing five or six lines. Had it been done, we should have been entitled to say that our rights and liberties were not endangered. If we adopt this clause as it is, I think, notwithstanding what gentlemen have said, that there will be danger. There ought to be some amendments to it, to put this matter on a sure footing. There does not appear to me to be any kind of necessity that the federal court should have jurisdiction in the body of the country. I am ready to give up that, in the cases expressly enumerated, an appellate jurisdiction (except in one or two instances) might be given. I wish them also to have jurisdiction in maritime affairs, and to try offences committed on the high seas. …

Mr. MACLAINE. … But the gentleman seems to be most tenacious of the judicial power of the states. The honorable gentleman must know, that the doctrine of reservation of power not relinquished, clearly demonstrates that the judicial power of the states is not impaired. He asks, with respect to the trial by jury, “When the cause has gone up to the superior court, and the verdict is set aside, what benefit arises from having had a jury trial in the inferior court?” I would ask the gentleman, “What is the reason, that, on a special verdict or case agreed, the decision is left to the court?” There are a number of cases where juries cannot decide. When a jury finds the fact specially, or when it is agreed upon by the parties, the decision is referred to the court. If the law be against the party, the court decides against him; if the law be for him, the court judges accordingly. He, as well as every gentleman here, must know that, under the Confederation, Congress set aside juries. There was an appeal given to Congress: did Congress determine by a jury? Every party carried his testimony in writing to the judges of appeal, and Congress determined upon it.

Mr. SPENCER. … I contend that there should be a bill of rights, ascertaining and securing the great rights of the states and people. Besides my objection to the revision of facts by the federal court, and the insecurity of jury trial, I consider the concurrent jurisdiction of those courts with the state courts as extremely dangerous. …

Mr. IREDELL. … In criminal cases, however, no latitude ought to be allowed. In these the greatest danger from any government subsists, and accordingly it is provided that there shall be a trial by jury, in all such cases, in the state wherein the offence is committed. I thought the objection against the want of a bill of rights had been obviated unanswerably. It appears to me most extraordinary. Shall we give up anything but what is positively granted by that instrument? It would be the greatest absurdity for any man to pretend that, when a legislature is formed for a particular purpose, it can have any authority but what is so expressly given to it, any more than a man acting under a power of attorney could depart from the authority it conveyed to him, according to an instance which I stated when speaking on the subject before. As for example:—if I had three tracts of land, one in Orange, another in Caswell, and another in Chatham, and I gave a power of attorney to a man to sell the two tracts in Orange and Caswell, and he should attempt to sell my land in Chatham, would any man of common sense suppose he had authority to do so? In like manner, I say, the future Congress can have no right to exercise any power but what is contained in that paper. Negative words, in my opinion, could make the matter no plainer than it was before. The gentleman says that unalienable rights ought not to be given up. Those rights which are unalienable are not alienated. They still remain with the great body of the people. If any right be given up that ought not to be, let it be shown. Say it is a thing which affects your country, and that it ought not to be surrendered: this would be reasonable. But when it is evident that the exercise of any power not given up would be a usurpation, it would be not only useless, but dangerous, to enumerate a number of rights which are not intended to be given up; because it would be implying, in the strongest manner, that every right not included in the exception might be impaired by the government without usurpation; and it would be impossible to enumerate every one. Let any one make what collection or enumeration of rights he pleases, I will immediately mention twenty or thirty more rights not contained in it.

Mr. BLOODWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with attention to the gentleman’s arguments; but whether it be for want of sufficient attention, or from the grossness of my ideas, I cannot be satisfied with his defence of the omission, with respect to the trial by jury. He says that it would be impossible to fall on any satisfactory mode of regulating the trial by jury, because there are various customs relative to it in the different states. Is this a satisfactory cause for the omission? Why did it not provide that the trial by jury should be preserved in civil cases? It has said that the trial should be by jury in criminal cases; and yet this trial is different in its manner in criminal cases in the different states. If it has been possible to secure it in criminal cases, notwithstanding the diversity concerning it, why has it not been possible to secure it in civil cases? I wish this to be cleared up. …

Mr. IREDELL. Mr. Chairman, I hope some other gentleman will answer what has been said by the gentlemen who have spoken last. I only rise to answer the question of the member from New Hanover—which was, if there was such a difficulty, in establishing the trial by jury in civil cases, that the Convention could not concur in any mode, why the difficulty did not extend to criminal cases? I beg leave to say, that the difficulty, in this case, does not depend so much on the mode of proceeding, as on the difference of the subjects of controversy, and the laws relative to them. …

We have been told, and I believe this was the real reason, why they could not concur in any general rule. I have great respect for the characters of those gentlemen who formed the Convention, and I believe they were not capable of overlooking the importance of the trial by jury, much less of designedly plotting against it. But I fully believe that the real difficulty of the thing was the cause of the omission. I trust sufficient reasons have been offered, to show that it is in no danger. As to criminal cases, I must observe that the great instrument of arbitrary power is criminal prosecutions. By the privileges of habeas corpus, no man can be confined without inquiry; and if it should appear that he has been committed contrary to law, he must be discharged. That diversity which is to be found in civil controversies, does not exist in criminal cases. That diversity which contributes to the security of property in civil cases, would have pernicious effects in criminal ones. There is no other safe mode to try these but by a jury. If any man had the means of trying another his own way, or were it left to the control of arbitrary judges, no man would have that security for life and liberty which every freeman ought to have. I presume that in no state on the continent is a man tried on a criminal accusation but by a jury. It was necessary, therefore, that it should be fixed, in the Constitution, that the trial should be by jury in criminal cases; and such difficulties did not occur in this as in the other case. …

Mr. SPAIGHT. … The gentleman has again brought on the trial by jury. The Federal Convention, sir, had no wish to destroy the trial by jury. It was three or four days before them. There were a variety of objections to any one mode. It was thought impossible to fall upon any one mode but what would produce some inconveniences. … I should suppose that, if the representatives of twelve states, with many able lawyers among them, could not form any unexceptionable mode, this Convention could hardly be able to do it. …

Mr. J. M'DOWALL. … Trial by jury is not secured. The objections against this want of security have not been cleared up in a satisfactory manner. It is neither secured in civil nor criminal cases. The federal appellate cognizance of law and fact puts it in the power of the wealthy to recover unjustly of the poor man, who is not able to attend at such extreme distance, and bear such enormous expense as it must produce.

Address of the Seceding Assemblymen

Gentlemen: When in consequence of your suffrages at the last election we were chosen to represent you in the General Assembly of this Commonwealth, we accepted of the important trust, with a determination to execute it in the best manner we were able, and we flatter ourselves we acted in such a manner as to convince you, that your interests with that of the good of the state has been the object of our measures.

… You will be able likewise to determine, whether in a free government there ought or ought not to be any provision … whether the trial by jury in civil causes is become dangerous and ought to be abolished and whether the judiciary of the United States is not so constructed as to absorb and destroy the judiciaries of the several states?

… Findley: Contends for a bill of rights, the liberty of the press, trial by jury. When I was proposed as a member of the late Convention, I declined it as I thought it too great an undertaking for me to represent and guard all the rights and liberties of the people of Pennsylvania.

Mr. WILSON. … It is very true that trial by jury is not mentioned in civil cases; but I take it that it is very improper to infer from hence that it was not meant to exist under this government. Where the people are represented, where the interest of government cannot be separate from that of the people, (and this is the case in trial between citizen and citizen,) the power of making regulations with respect to the mode of trial may certainly be placed in the legislature; for I apprehend that the legislature will not do wrong in an instance from which they can derive no advantage. These were not all the reasons that influenced the Convention to leave it to the future Congress to make regulations on this head.

By the Constitution of the different states, it will be found that no particular mode of trial by jury could be discovered that would suit them all. The manner of summoning jurors, their qualifications, of whom they should consist, and the course of their proceedings, are all different in the different states; and I presume it will be allowed a good general principle, that, in carrying into effect the laws of the general government by the judicial department, it will be proper to make the regulations as agreeable to the habits and wishes of the particular states as possible; and it is easily discovered that it would have been impracticable, by any general regulation, to give satisfaction to all. We must have thwarted the custom of eleven or twelve to have accommodated any one. Why do this when there was no danger to be apprehended from the omission? We could not go into a particular detail of the manner that would have suited each state.

Time, reflection, and experience, will be necessary to suggest and mature the proper regulations on the subject; time and experience were not possessed by the Convention; they left it therefore to be particularly organized by the legislature — the representatives of the United States — from time to time, as should be most eligible and proper. Could they have done better?

I know, in every part where opposition has risen, what a handle has been made to this objection; but I trust, upon examination, it will be seen that more could not have been done with propriety. Gentlemen talk of bills of rights. What is the meaning of this continual clamor, after what has been urged? Though it may be proper, in a single state, whose legislature calls itself the sovereign and supreme power, yet it would be absurd in the body of the people, when they are delegating from among themselves persons to transact certain business, to add an enumeration of those things which they are not to do. "But trial by jury is secured in the bill of rights of Pennsylvania; the parties have a right to trials by jury, which ought to be held sacred." And what is the consequence? There have been more violations of this right in Pennsylvania, since the revolution, than are to be found in England in the course of a century.

Robert Whitehill…

(171) The trial of crimes is to be by jury; therefore the trial of civil causes is supposed not to be by jury.

(172) We preserved the trial by jury against the attempts of the British Crown.

(173) I wish, for the honor of the Convention, this had not been omitted.

John Smilie: (179) In common law cases there ought not to be an appeal as to facts. Facts found by a jury should never be reexamined.

Jury trials may be superseded in civil cases. Appellate jurisdiction is a civil law term. There can be no appeal after jury trials. I fear there is an intention to substitute the civil law in the room of the common law. Think of the expense of the different courts and of the federal system at large.

William Findley: …

(185) The judges are better for the guard of juries in all possible cases. The mistakes of juries are never systematical. The laws can never be so enacted as to prevent the judge's from doing wrong.

(186) I admit that it would have been impossible to accommodate the trial by jury to all the states; but power ought not to have been given applying to such internal objects.

(187) There might have been a declaration that the trial by jury in civil cases as it hath hitherto been in the several states; or in the state, where the cause arose.

(188) The jurisdiction will, I believe, be chiefly appellate; and therefore, chiefly without jury.

John Smilie: (193) I cannot see the great difficulty of securing at least the substance of jury [trial] in civil cases. It might have been said that the legislature should make regulations for the trial by jury in them.

(194) Whatever is not given is reserved. The trial by jury is given in criminal cases therefore reserved in civil cases.

John Smilie:…

(198) It was the design and intention of the Convention to divest us of the liberty of trial by jury in civil cases; and to deprive us of the benefits of the common law.

(199) The word “appeal” is a civil law term; and therefore the Convention meant to introduce the civil law.

(200) On an appeal the judges may set aside the verdict of a jury.

(201) Appeals are not admitted in the common law.

(202) If a jury give a false verdict, a writ of attaint lies or the verdict may be set aside. A writ of error lies as to matters of law; but on that writ the fact are not reexamined.

(212) The Convention might have said, that Congress should establish trials by jury in civil cases.

Robert Whitehill: (213) Are we to trust to all judges, who will have their favorites?

(226) Our greatest liberties will, by this Constitution, be sacrificed to the will of men.

(227) The trial by jury is given up to the will of Congress.

William Findley: …

(229) Trial by jury is not secured in civil cases as in criminal ones. It is at the mercy of the legislature.

(230) By the appellate clause, an appeal lies from the verdict of a jury, a thing hitherto unknown.

(231) Personal liberty cannot be enjoyed without trial by jury.

(232) All the northern countries have been zealous of freedom. Sweden till lately had trials by jury—and certainly a free government well-balanced, consisting of four branches.

Findley: On Saturday last, in the course of an argument to prove the dissolution of the trial by jury, if the proposed system was adopted, and the consequent sacrifice of the liberties of the people, Mr. Findley observed, that when the trial by jury, which was known in Sweden so late as the middle of the last century, fell into disuse, the commons of that nation lost their freedom and a tyrannical aristocracy prevailed.

James Wilson and Thomas Mckean interrupted Mr. Findley and called warmly for his authority to prove that the trial by jury existed in Sweden, Mr. Wilson declaring that he had never met with such an idea in the course of his reading; and Mr. M'Kean asserting that the trial by jury was never known in any other country than England and the governments descended from that kingdom. Mr. Findley answered that he did not, at that moment, recollect his authority, but having formerly read histories of Sweden, he had received and retained the opinion which he now advanced, and would on a future occasion, perhaps, refer immediately to the book.

William Findley: (233) Trial by jury is inconsistent with a complete aristocracy.

(234) The lower class of people will be oppressed without trial by jury.

(235) This part is explanatory of other parts of the plan.

(236) The people never expressed a wish to give up the trial by jury.

(237) In Pennsylvania the trial by jury must be by a jury of the proper county.

Findley: … Trials by jury are in disuse in Sweden except in the lower courts. … Every new tribunal without a jury is an introduction of aristocracy, the worst of all tyrannies. Trials by jury in Sweden have been in disuse for near a century past.

13.2.2.4.fDecember 11, 1787

Mr. WILSON. I shall now proceed, Mr. President, to notice the remainder of the objections that have been suggested by the honorable gentlemen who oppose the system now before you.

We have been told, sir, by the honorable member from Fayette (Mr. Smilie,) "that the trial by jury was intended to be given up, and the civil law was intended to be introduced into its place, in civil cases."

Before a sentiment of this kind was hazarded, I think, sir, the gentleman ought to be prepared with better proof in its support than any he has yet attempted to produce. It is a charge, sir, not only unwarrantable, but cruel: the idea of such a thing, I believe, never entered into the mind of a single member of that Convention; and I believe further, that they never suspected there would be found, within the United States, a single person that was capable of making such a charge. If it should be well founded, sir, they must abide by the consequences; but if (as I trust it will fully appear) it is ill founded, then he or they who make it ought to abide by the consequences.

Trial by jury forms a large field for investigation, and numerous volumes are written on the subject; those who are well acquainted with it may employ much time in its discussion; but in a country where its excellences are so well understood, it may not be necessary to be very prolix in pointing them out. For my part, I shall confine myself to a few observations in reply to the objections that have been suggested.

The member from Fayette (Mr. Smilie) has labored to infer that, under the Articles of Confederation, the Congress possessed no appellate jurisdiction; but this being decided against him by the words of that instrument, by which is granted to Congress the power of "establishing courts for receiving, and determining finally, appeals in all cases of capture," he next attempts a distinction, and allows the power of appealing from the decisions of the judges, but not from the verdict of a jury; but this is determined against him also by the practice of the states; for, in every instance which has occurred, this power has been claimed by Congress, and exercised by the Courts of Appeals. But what would be the consequence of allowing the doctrine for which he contends? Would it not be in the power of a jury, by their verdict, to involve the whole Union in a war? They may condemn the property of a neutral, or otherwise infringe the law of nations, in this case, ought their verdict to be without revisal? Nothing can be inferred from this to prove that trials by jury were intended to be given up. In Massachusetts, and all the Eastern States, their causes are tried by juries, though they acknowledge the appellate jurisdiction of Congress.

I think I am not now to learn the advantages of a trial by jury. It has excellences that entitle it to a superiority over any other mode, in cases to which it is applicable.

Where jurors can be acquainted with the characters of the parties and the witnesses, — where the whole cause can be brought within their knowledge and their view, — I know no mode of investigation equal to that by a jury: they hear everything that is alleged; they not only hear the words, but they see and mark the features of the countenance; they can judge of weight due to such testimony; and moreover, it is a cheap and expeditious manner of distributing justice. There is another advantage annexed to the trial by jury; the jurors may indeed return a mistaken or illfounded verdict, but their errors cannot be systematical.

Let us apply these observations to the objects of the judicial department, under this Constitution. I think it has been shown, already, that they all extend beyond the bounds of any particular state; but further, a great number of the civil causes there enumerated depend either upon the law of nations, or the marine law, that is, the general law of mercantile countries. Now, sir, in such cases, I presume it will not be pretended that this mode of decision ought to be adopted; for the law with regard to them is the same here as in every other country, and ought to be administered in the same manner. There are instances in which I think it highly probable that the trial by jury will be found proper; and if it is highly probable that it will be found proper, is it not equally probable that it will be adopted? There may be causes depending between citizens of different states; and as trial by jury is known and regarded in all the states, they will certainly prefer that mode of trial before any other. The Congress will have the power of making proper regulations on this subject, but it was impossible for the Convention to have gone minutely into it; but if they could, it must have been very improper, because alterations, as I observed before, might have been necessary; and whatever Convention might have done would have continued unaltered, unless by an alteration of the Constitution. Besides, there was another difficulty with regard to this subject. In some of the states they have courts of chancery, and other appellate jurisdictions, and those states are as attached to that mode of distributing justice as those that have none are to theirs.

I have desired, repeatedly, that honorable gentlemen, who find fault, would be good enough to point out what they deem to be an improvement. The member from Westmoreland (Mr. Findley) tells us that the trial between citizens of different states ought to be by a jury of that state in which the cause of action arose. Now, it is easy to see that, in many instances, this would be very improper and very partial; for, besides the different manner of collecting and forming juries in the several states, the plaintiff comes from another state; he comes a stranger, unknown as to his character or mode of life, while the other party is in the midst of his friends, or perhaps his dependents. Would a trial by jury, in such a case, insure justice to the stranger? But again: I would ask that gentleman whether, if a great part of his fortune was in the hands of some person in Rhode Island, he would wish that his action to recover it should be determined by a jury of that country, under its present circumstances.

The gentleman from Fayette (Mr. Smilie) says that, if the Convention found themselves embarrassed, at least they might have done thus much — they should have declared that the substance should be secured by Congress. This would be saying nothing unless the cases were particularized.

Mr. SMILIE. I said the Convention ought to have declared that the legislature should establish the trial by jury by proper regulations.

Mr. WILSON. The legislature shall establish it by proper regulations! … He wishes them to do the very thing that they have done—to leave it to the discretion of Congress. The fact, sir, is, nothing more could be done.

It is well known that there are some cases that should not come before juries; there are others, that, in some of the states, never come before juries, and in those states where they do come before them, appeals are found necessary, the facts reexamined, and the verdict of the jury sometimes is set aside; but I think, in all cases where the cause has come originally before a jury, that the last examination ought to be before a jury likewise.

The power of having appellate jurisdiction, as to facts, has been insisted upon as a proof, “that the Convention intended to give up the trial by jury in civil cases, and to introduce the civil law.” I have already declared my own opinion on this point, and have shown that not merely that it is founded on reason and authority; — the express declaration of Congress (Journals of Congress, March 6, 1779) is to the same purpose. They insist upon this power, as requisite to preserve the peace of the Union; certainly, therefore, it ought always to be possessed by the head of the confederacy. We are told, as an additional proof, that the trial by jury was intended to be given up; "that appeals are unknown to the common law; that the term is a civil-law term, and with it the civil law is intended to be introduced." I confess I was a good deal surprised at this observation being made; for Blackstone, … has a chapter entitled "Of Proceeding in the Nature of Appeals," — and in that chapter says, that the principal method of redress for erroneous judgements, in the king's courts of record, is by writ of error to some superior "court of appeal." (3 Blackstone, 406.) Now, it is well known that his book is a commentary upon the common law. Here, then, is a strong refutation of the assertion, "that appeals are unknown to the common law."

I think these were all the circumstances adduced to show the truth of the assertion, that, in this Constitution, the trial by jury was intended to be given up by the late Convention in framing it. Has the assertion been proved? I say not; and the allegations offered, if they apply at all, apply in a contrary direction. I am glad that this objection has been stated, because it is a subject upon which the enemies of this Constitution have much insisted. We have now had an opportunity of investigating it fully; and the result is, that there is no foundation for the charge, but it must proceed from ignorance, or something worse.

Thomas McKean: … Mr. M'Kean pronounced an animated eulogism on the character, information and abilities of Mr. George Mason, but concluded that the exclusion of juries in civil causes was not among the objections which had governed his [Mason's] conduct.

Robert Whitehill: On this assertion Mr. Whitehill quoted the following passage from Mr. Mason's objections: "There is no declaration of any kind for preserving the liberty of the press, the trial by jury in civil causes, nor against the danger of standing armies in time of peace."

Mr. Whitehill then read, and offered as the ground of a motion … the consideration of the following articles, …

2. That in controversies respecting property, and in suits between man and man, trial by jury shall remain as heretofore, as well in the federal courts, and in those of the several states.

Hon. CHARLES PINCKNEY. … Though at first he considered some declaration on the subject of trial by jury in civil causes, and the freedom of the press, necessary, and still thinks it would have been as well to have had it inserted, yet he fully acquiesced in the reasoning which was used to show that the insertion of them was not essential. …

On the subject of juries, in civil cases, the Convention were anxious to make some declaration; but when they reflected that all courts of admiralty and appeals, being governed in their propriety by the civil law and the laws of nations, never had, or ought to have, juries, they found it impossible to make any precise declaration upon the subject; they therefore left it as it was, trusting that the good sense of their constituents would never induce them to suppose that it could be the interest or intention of the general government to abuse one of the most invaluable privileges a free country can boast; in the loss of which, themselves, their fortunes and connections, must be so materially involved, and to the deprivation of which, except in the cases alluded to, the people of this country would never submit.

13.2.2.5.bJanuary 17, 1788

Hon. RAWLINS LOWNDES. … It was true, no article of the Constitution declared there should not be jury trials in civil cases; yet this must be implied, because it stated that all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be tried by a jury. But even if trials by jury were allowed, could any person rest satisfied with a mode of trial which prevents the parties from being obliged to bring a cause for discussion before a jury of men chosen from the vicinage, in a manner conformable to the present administration of justice, which had stood the test of time and experience, and ever been highly approved of? …

Hon. ROBERT BARNWELL. … The honorable gentleman asks why the trial by jury was not established in every instance. Mr. Barnwell considered this right of trial as the birthright of every American, and the basis of our civil liberty; but still most certainly particular circumstances may arise, which would induce even the greatest advocates for this right to yield it for a time. In his opinion, the circumstances that would lead to this point were those which are specified by the Constitution. Mr. Barnwell said, Suffer me to state a case, and let every gentleman determine whether, in particular instances, he would not rather resign than retain this right of trial. A suit is depending between a citizen of Carolina and Georgia, and it becomes necessary to try it in Georgia. What is the consequence? Why, the citizen of this state must rest his cause upon the jury of his opponent's vicinage, where, unknown and unrelated, he stands a very poor chance for justice against one whose neighbors, whose friends and relations, compose the greater part of his judges. It is in this case, and only in cases of a similar nature with this, that the right of trial by jury is not established; and judging from myself, it is in this instance only that every man would wish to resign it, not to a jury with whom he is unacquainted, but to an impartial and responsible individual.

Mr. HENRY. … Here is a resolution as radical as that which separated us from Great Britain. It is radical in this transition; our rights and privileges are endangered, and the sovereignty of the states will be relinquished: and cannot we plainly see that this is actually the case? The rights of conscience, trial by jury, liberty of the press, all your immunities and franchises, all pretensions to human rights and privileges, are rendered insecure, if not lost, by this change, so loudly talked of by some, and inconsiderately by others. Is this tame relinquishment of rights worthy of freemen? Is it worthy of that manly fortitude that ought to characterize republicans? …

Having premised these things, I shall, with the aid of my judgment and information, which, I confess, are not extensive, go into the discussion of this system more minutely. Is it necessary for your liberty that you should abandon those great rights by the adoption of this system? Is the relinquishment of the trial by jury and the liberty of the press necessary for your liberty? …

… In some parts of the plan before you, the great rights of freemen are endangered; in other parts, absolutely taken away. How does your trial by jury stand? In civil cases gone — not sufficiently secured in criminal — this best privilege is gone. But we are told that we need not fear; because those in power, being our representatives, will not abuse the powers we put in their hands. I am not well versed in history, but I will submit to your recollection, whether liberty has been destroyed most often by the licentiousness of the people, or by the tyranny of rulers. … My great objection to this government is, that it does not leave us the means of defending our rights. …

Elliot, vol. 3, pp. 44, 45, 47.

13.2.2.6.bJune 6, 1788

Gov. RANDOLPH. … Let us argue with unprejudiced minds. They say that the trial by jury is gone. Is this so? Although I have declared my determination to give my vote for it, yet I shall freely censure those parts which appear to me reprehensible.

The trial by jury in criminal cases is secured; in civil cases it is not so expressly secured as I should wish it; but it does not follow that Congress has the power of taking away this privilege, which is secured by the constitution of each state, and not given away by this Constitution. I have no fear on this subject. Congress must regulate it so as to suit every state. I will risk my property on the certainty that they will institute the trial by jury in such manner as shall accommodate the conveniences of the inhabitants in every state. The difficulty of ascertaining this accommodation was the principal cause of its not being provided for. It will be the interest of the individuals composing Congress to put it on this convenient footing.

Mr. HENRY. … If we are to have one representative for every thirty thousand souls, it must be by implication. The Constitution does not positively secure it. Even say it is a natural implication, — why not give us a right to that proportion in express terms, in language that could not admit of evasions or subterfuges? If they can use implication for us, they can also use implication against us. We are giving power; they are getting power; judge, then, on which side the implication will be used! When we once put it in their option to assume constructive power, danger will follow. Trial by jury, and liberty of the press, are also on this foundation of implication. If they encroach on these rights, and you give your implication for a plea, you are cast; for they will be justified by the last part of it, which gives them full power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to carry their power into execution." Implication is dangerous, because it is unbounded: if it be admitted at all, and no limits be prescribed, it admits of the utmost extension. …

13.2.2.6.dJune 9, 1788

Gov. RANDOLPH. … Why have we been told that maxims can alone save nations; that our maxims are our bill of rights; and that the liberty of the press, trial by jury, and religion, are destroyed? Give me leave to say, that the maxims of Virginia are union and justice.

Elliot, vol. 3, p. 190.

Gov. RANDOLPH. … It is also objected that the trial by jury, the writ of habeas corpus, and the liberty of the press, are insecure. But I contend that the habeas corpus is at least on as secure and good a footing as it is in England. In that country, it depends on the will of the legislature. That privilege is secured here by the Constitution, and is only to be suspended in cases of extreme emergency. Is this not a fair footing? After agreeing that the government of England secures liberty, how do we distrust this government? Why distrust ourselves? The liberty of the press is supposed to be in danger. If this were the case, it would produce extreme repugnancy in my mind. If it ever will be suppressed in this country, the liberty of the people will not be far from being sacrificed. Where is the danger of it? He says that every power is given to the general government that is not reserved to the states. Pardon me if I say the reverse of the proposition is true. I defy any one to prove the contrary. Every power not given it by this system is left with the states. This being the principle, from what part of the Constitution can the liberty of the press be said to be in danger?

[Here his excellency read the 8th section of the 1st article, containing all the powers given to Congress.]

Go through these powers, examine every one, and tell me if the most exalted genius can prove that the liberty of the press is in danger. The trial by jury is supposed to be in danger also. It is secured in criminal cases, but supposed to be taken away in civil cases. It is not relinquished by the Constitution; it is only not provided for. Look at the interest of Congress to suppress it. Can it be in any manner advantageous for them to suppress it? In equitable cases, it ought not to prevail, nor with respect to admiralty causes; because there will be an undue leaning against those characters, of whose business courts of admiralty will have cognizance. I will rest myself secure under this reflection — that it is impossible for the most suspicious or malignant mind to show that it is the interest of Congress to infringe on this trial by jury.

13.2.2.6.fJune 12, 1788

Mr. HENRY. … His amendments go to that despised thing, called a bill of rights, and all the rights which are dear to human nature—trial by jury, the liberty of religion and the press, &c. Do not gentlemen see that, if we adopt, under the idea of following Mr. Jefferson's opinion, we amuse ourselves with the shadow, while the substance is given away?

Elliot, vol. 3, p. 314.

13.2.2.6.gJune 14, 1788

Mr. HENRY. … By this Constitution, some of the best barriers of human rights are thrown away. Is there not an additional reason to have a bill of rights? By the ancient common law, the trial of all facts is decided by a jury of impartial men from the immediate vicinage. This paper speaks of different juries from the common law in criminal cases; and in civil controversies excludes trial by jury altogether. There is, therefore, more occasion for the supplementary check of a bill of rights now than then.

Elliot, vol. 3, pp. 446–47.

Gov. RANDOLPH. … Gentlemen have been misled, to a certain degree, by a general declaration that the trial by jury was gone. We see that, in the most valuable cases, it is reserved. Is it abolished in civil cases? Let him put his finger on the part where it is abolished. The Constitution is silent on it. What expression would you wish the Constitution to use, to establish it? Remember we are not making a constitution for Virginia alone, or we might have taken Virginia for our directory. But we were forming a constitution for thirteen states. The trial by jury is different in the different states. In some states it is excluded in cases in which it is admitted to others. In admiralty causes it is not used. Would you have a jury to determine the case of a capture? The Virginia legislature thought proper to make an exception of that case. These depend on the law of nations, and no twelve men that could be picked up could be equal to the decision of such a matter.

Mr. MADISON. … It was objected, yesterday, that there was no provision for a jury from the vicinage. If it could have been done with safety, it would not have been opposed. It might happen that a trial would be impracticable in the country. Suppose a rebellion in a whole district; would it not be impossible to get a jury? The trial by jury is held as sacred in England as in America. There are deviations from it in England; yet greater deviations have happened here, since we established our independence, than have taken place there for a long time, though it be left to the legislative discretion. It is a misfortune in any case that this trial should be departed from; yet in some cases it is necessary. It must be, therefore, left to the discretion of the legislature to modify it according to circumstances. This is a complete and satisfactory answer.

Mr. HENRY. … "In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, and those in which a state shall be a party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction. In all the other cases before mentioned, the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact. …" This will, in its operation, destroy the trial by jury. The verdict of an impartial jury will be reversed by judges unacquainted with the circumstances. But we are told that Congress are to make regulations to remedy this. … If Congress alter this part, they will repeal the Constitution. … When Congress, by virtue of this sweeping clause, will organize these courts, they cannot depart from the Constitution; and their laws in opposition to the Constitution would be void. … What then, Mr. Chairman? We are told that, if this does not satisfy every mind, they will yield. It is not satisfactory to my mind, whatever it may be to others. …

We are told of certain difficulties. I acknowledge it is difficult to form a constitution. But I have seen difficulties conquered which were as unconquerable as this. We are told that trial by jury is difficult to be had in certain cases. Do we not know the meaning of the term? We are also told it is a technical term. I see one thing in this Constitution; I made the observation before, and I am still of the same opinion, that everything with respect to privileges is so involved in darkness, it makes me suspicious — not of those gentlemen who formed it, but of its operations in its present form. Could not precise terms have been used? You find, by the observations of the gentleman last up, that, when there is a plentitude of power, there is no difficulty; but when you come to a plain thing, understood by all America, there are contradictions, ambiguities, difficulties, and what not. Trial by jury is attended, it seems, with insuperable difficulties, and therefore omitted altogether in civil cases. But an idea is held out that it is secured in criminal cases. I had rather it had been left out altogether than have it so vaguely and equivocally provided for. Poor people do not understand technical terms. Their rights ought to be secured in language of which they know the meaning. As they do not know the meaning of such terms, they may be injured with impunity. If they dare oppose the hands of tyrannical power, you will see what has been practised elsewhere. They may be tried by the most partial powers, by their most implacable enemies, and be sentenced and put to death, with all the forms of a fair trial. I would rather be left to the judges. An abandoned juror would not dread the loss of character like a judge. From these, and a thousand other considerations, I would rather the trial by jury were struck out altogether. There is no right of challenging partial jurors. There is no common law of America, (as has been said,) nor constitution, but that on your table. If there be neither common law nor constitution, there can be no right to challenge partial jurors. Yet the right is as valuable as the trial by jury itself.

Mr. HENRY. … To hear gentlemen of such penetration make use of such arguments, to persuade us to part with that trial by jury, is very astonishing. We are told that we are to part with that trial by jury which our ancestors secured their lives and property with, and we are to build castles in the air, and substitute visionary modes of decision for that noble palladium. I hope we shall never be induced, by such arguments, to part with that excellent mode of trial. No appeal can now be made as to fact in common-law suits. The unanimous verdict of twelve impartial men cannot be reversed. I shall take the liberty of reading to the committee the sentiments of the learned Judge Blackstone, so often quoted, on the subject.

The opinion of this learned writer is more forcible and cogent than any thing I could say. Notwithstanding the transcendent excellency of this trial, its essentiality to the preservation of liberty, and the extreme danger of substituting any other mode, yet we are now about to alienate it.

But on this occasion, as on all others, we are admonished to rely on the wisdom and virtue of our rulers. We are told that the members from Georgia, New Hampshire, &c., will not dare to infringe this privilege; that, as it would excite the indignation of the people, they would not attempt it: that is, the enormity of the offence is urged as a security against its commission. It is so abominable that Congress will not exercise it. Shall we listen to arguments like these, when trial by jury is about to be relinquished? I beseech you to consider before you decide. I ask you, What is the value of that privilege? When Congress, in all the plentitude of their arrogance, magnificence, and power, can take it from you, will you be satisfied? Are we to go so far as to concede every thing to the virtue of Congress? Throw yourselves at once on their mercy; be no longer free than their virtue will predominate: if this will satisfy republican minds, there is an end of every thing. I disdain to hold any thing of any man. We ought to cherish that disdain. America viewed with indignation the idea of holding her rights in England. The Parliament gave you the most solemn assurances that they would not exercise this power. Were you satisfied with their promises? No. Did you trust any man on earth? No. You answered that you disdained to hold your innate, indefeasible rights of any one. Now, you are called upon to give an exorbitant and most alarming power. The genius of my countrymen is the same now that it was then. They have the same feelings. They are equally martial and bold. Will not their answer therefore be the same? I hope that gentlemen will, on a fair investigation, be candid, and not on every occasion recur to the virtue of our representatives.

When deliberating on the relinquishment of the sword and purse, we have a right to some other reason than the possible virtue of our rulers. We are informed that the strength and energy of the government call for the surrender of this right. Are we to make our country strong by giving up our privileges? I tell you that, if you judge from reason, or the experience of other nations, you will find that your country will be great and respectable according as you will preserve this great privilege. It is prostrated by that paper. Juries from the vicinage being not secured, this right is in reality sacrificed. All is gone. And why? Because a rebellion may arise. Resistance will come from certain countries, and juries will come from the same countries.

I trust the honorable gentleman, on a better recollection, will be sorry for this observation. Why do we love this trial by jury? Because it prevents the hand of oppression from cutting you off. They may call any thing rebellion, and deprive you of a fair trial by an impartial jury of your neighbors. Has not your mother country magnanimously preserved this noble privilege upwards of a thousand years? Did she relinquish a jury of the vicinage because there was a possibility of resistance to oppression? She has been magnanimous enough to resist every attempt to take away this privilege. She has had magnanimity enough to rebel when her rights were infringed. That country had juries of hundredors for many generations. And shall Americans give up that which nothing could induce the English people to relinquish? The idea is abhorrent to my mind. There was a time when we should have spurned at it. This gives me comfort — that, as long as I have existence, my neighbors will protect me. Old as I am, it is probable I may yet have the appellation of rebel. I trust that I shall see congressional oppression crushed in embryo. As this government stands, I despise and abhor it. Gentlemen demand it, though it takes away the trial by jury in civil cases, and does worse than take it away in criminal cases. It is gone unless you preserve it now. I beg pardon for speaking so long. Many more observations will present themselves to the minds of gentlemen when they analyze this part. We find enough, from what has been said, to come to this conclusion — that it was not intended to have jury trials at all; because, difficult as it was, the name was known, and it might have been inserted. Seeing that appeals are given, in matters of fact, to the Supreme Court, we are led to believe that you must carry your witnesses an immense distance to the seat of government, or decide appeals according to the Roman law. I shall add no more, but that I hope that gentlemen will recollect what they are about to do, and consider that they are going to give up this last and best privilege.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. Chairman, before I enter upon the objections made to this part, I will observe that I should suppose, if there were any person in this audience who had not read this Constitution, or who had not heard what has been said, and should have been told that the trial by jury was intended to be taken away, he would be surprised to find, on examination, that there was no exclusion of it in civil cases, and that it was expressly provided for in criminal cases. I never could see such intention, or any tendency towards it. I have not heard any arguments of that kind used in favor of the Constitution. If there were any words in it which said that trial by jury should not be used, it would be dangerous. I find it secured in criminal cases, and that the trial is to be had in the state where the crime shall have been committed. It is strongly insisted that the privilege of challenging, or excepting to the jury, is not secured. When the Constitution says that the trial shall be by jury, does it not say that every incident will go along with it? I think the honorable gentleman was mistaken yesterday in his reasoning on the propriety of a jury from the vicinage.

He supposed that a jury from the neighborhood is had from this view — that they should be acquainted with the personal character of the person accused. I thought it was with another view — that the jury should have some personal knowledge of the fact, and acquaintance with the witnesses, who will come from the neighborhood. How is it understood in this state? Suppose a man, who lives in Winchester, commits a crime at Norfolk; the jury to try him must come, not from Winchester, but from the neighborhood of Norfolk. Trial by jury is secured by this system in criminal cases, as are all the incidental circumstances relative to it. The honorable gentleman yesterday made an objection to that clause which says that the judicial power shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and such inferior courts as Congress may ordain and establish. He objects that there is an unlimited power of appointing inferior courts. I refer to that gentleman, whether it would have been proper to limit this power. Could those gentlemen who framed that instrument have extended their ideas to all the necessities of the United States, and seen every case in which it would be necessary to have an inferior tribunal? By the regulations of Congress, they may be accommodated to public convenience and utility. We may expect that there will be an inferior court in each state; each state will insist on it; and each, for that reason, will agree to it.

Mr. JOHN MARSHALL. … The exclusion of trial by jury, in this case, he [Patrick Henry] urged to prostrate our rights. Does the word court only mean the judges? Does not the determination of a jury necessarily lead to the judgment of the court? Is there any thing here which gives the judges exclusive jurisdiction of matters of fact? What is the object of a jury trial? To inform the court of the facts. When a court has cognizance of facts does it not follow that they can make inquiry by a jury? It is impossible to be otherwise. I hope that in this country, where impartiality is so much admired, the laws will direct facts to be ascertained by a jury. But, says the honorable gentleman, the juries in the ten miles square will be mere tools of parties, with which he would not trust his person or property; which, he says, he would rather leave to the court. Because the government may have a district of ten miles square, will no man stay there but the tools and officers of the government? Will nobody else be found there? Is it so in any other part of the world, where a government has legislative power? Are there none but officers, and tools of the government of Virginia, in Richmond? Will there not be independent merchants, and respectable gentlemen of fortune, within the ten miles square? Will there not be worthy farmers and mechanics? Will not a good jury be found there, as well as anywhere else? Will the officers of the government become improper to be on a jury? What is it to the government whether this man or that man succeeds? It is all one thing. Does the Constitution say that juries shall consist of officers, or that the Supreme Court shall be held in the ten miles square? It was acknowledged, by the honorable member, that it was secure in England. What makes it secure there? Is it their constitution? What part of their constitution is there that the Parliament cannot change? As the preservation of this right is in the hands of Parliament, and it has ever been held sacred by them, will the government of America be less honest than that of Great Britain? Here a restriction is to be found. The jury is not to be brought out of the state. There is no such restriction in that government; for the laws of Parliament decide every thing respecting it. Yet gentlemen tell us that there is safety there, and nothing here but danger. It seems to me that the laws of the United States will generally secure trials by a jury of the vicinage, or in such manner as will be most safe and convenient for the people.

But it seems that the right of challenging the jurors is not secured in this Constitution. Is this done by our own Constitution, or by any provision of the English government? Is it done by their Magna Charta, or bill of rights? This privilege is founded on their laws. If so, why should it be objected to the American Constitution, that it is not inserted in it? If we are secure in Virginia without mentioning it in our Constitution, why should not this security be found in the federal court?

The honorable gentleman said much about the quitrents in the Northern Neck. I will refer it to the honorable gentleman himself. Has he not acknowledged that there was no complete title? Was he not satisfied that the right of the legal representatives of the proprietor did not exist at the time he mentioned? If so, it cannot exist now. I will leave it to those gentlemen who come from that quarter. I trust they will not be intimidated, on this account, in voting on this question. A law passed in 1782, which secures this. He says that many poor men may be harassed and injured by the representatives of Lord Fairfax. If he has no right, this cannot be done. If he has this right, and comes to Virginia, what laws will his claims be determined by? By those of the state. By what tribunals will they be determined? By our state courts. Would not the poor man, who was oppressed by an unjust prosecution, be abundantly protected and satisfied by the temper of his neighbors, and would he not find ample justice? What reason has the honorable member to apprehend partiality or injustice? He supposes that, if the judges be judges of both the federal and state courts, they will incline in favor of one government. If such contests should arise, who could more properly decide them than those who are to swear to do justice? If we can expect a fair decision any where, may we not expect justice to be done by the judges of both the federal and state governments? But, says the honorable member, laws may be executed tyrannically. Where is the independency of your judges? If a law be exercised tyrannically in Virginia, to what can you trust? To your judiciary. What security have you for justice? Their independence. Will it not be so in the federal court?

Gentlemen ask, What is meant by law cases, and if they be not distinct from facts? Is there no law arising on cases of equity and admiralty? Look at the acts of Assembly. Have you not many cases where law and fact are blended? Does not the jurisdiction in point of law as well as fact, find itself completely satisfied in law and fact? The honorable gentleman says that no law of Congress can make any exception to the federal appellate jurisdiction of facts as well as law. He has frequently spoken of technical terms, and the meaning of them. What is the meaning of the term exception? Does it not mean alteration and diminution? Congress is empowered to make exceptions to the appellate jurisdiction, as to law and fact, of the Supreme Court. These exceptions certainly go as far as the legislature may think proper for the interest and liberty of the people. Who can understand this word, exception, to extend to one case as well as the other? I am persuaded that a reconsideration of this case will convince the gentlemen that he was mistaken. This may go to the cure of the mischief apprehended. Gentlemen must be satisfied that this power will not be so much abused as they have said.

The honorable member says that he derives no consolation from the wisdom and integrity of the legislature, because we call them to rectify defects which it is our duty to remove. We ought well to weigh the good and evil before we determine. We ought to be well convinced that the evil will be really produced before we decide against it. If we be convinced that the good greatly preponderates, though there be small defects in it, shall we give up that which is really good, when we can remove the little mischief it may contain, in the plain, easy method pointed out in the system itself?

I was astonished when I heard the honorable gentleman say that he wished the trial by jury to be struck out entirely. Is there no justice to be expected by a jury of our fellow citizens? Will any man prefer to be tried by a court, when the jury is to be of his countrymen, and probably of his vicinage? We have reason to believe the regulations with respect to juries will be such as shall be satisfactory. Because it does not contain all, does it contain nothing? But I conceive that this committee will see there is safety in the case, and that there is no mischief to be apprehended.

He states a case, that a man may be carried from a federal to an antifederal corner, (and vice versa) where men are ready to destroy him. Is this probable? Is it presumable that they will make a law to punish men who are of different opinions in politics from themselves? Is it presumable that they will do it in one single case, unless it be such a case as must satisfy the people at large? The good opinion of the people at large must be consulted by their representatives; otherwise, mischiefs would be produced which would shake the government to its foundation. As it is late, I shall not mention all the gentleman’s argument, but some parts of it are so glaring that I cannot pass them over in silence. He says that the establishment of these tribunals, and more particularly in their jurisdiction of controversies between citizens of these states and foreign citizens and subjects, is like a retrospective law. Is there no difference between a tribunal which shall give justice and effect to an existing right, and creating a right that did not exist before? The debt or claim is created by the individual. He has bound himself to comply with it. Does the creation of a new court amount to a retrospective law?

We are satisfied with the provision made in this country on the subject of trial by jury. Does our Constitution direct trials to be by jury? It is required in our bill of rights, which is not a part of the Constitution. Does any security arise from hence? Have you a jury when a judgment is obtained on a replevin bond, or by default? Have you a jury when a motion is made for the commonwealth against an individual; or when a motion is made by one joint obligor against another, to recover sums paid as security? Our courts decide in all these cases, without the intervention of a jury; yet they are all civil cases. The bill of rights is merely recommendatory. Were it otherwise, the consequence would be that many laws which are found convenient would be unconstitutional. What does the government before you say? Does it exclude the legislature from giving a trial by jury in civil cases? If it does not forbid its exclusion, it is on the same footing on which your state government stands now. The legislature of Virginia does not give a trial by jury where it is not necessary, but gives it wherever it is thought expedient. The federal legislature will do so too, as it is formed on the same principles.

The honorable gentleman says that unjust claims will be made, and the defendant had better pay them than go to the Supreme Court. Can you suppose such a disposition in one of your citizens, as that, to oppress another man, he will incur great expenses? What will he gain by an unjust demand? Does a claim establish a right? He must bring his witnesses to prove his claim. If he does not bring his witnesses, the expenses must fall upon him. Will he go on a calculation that the defendant will not defend it, or cannot produce a witness? Will he incur a great deal of expense, from a dependence on such a chance? Those who know human nature, black as it is, must know that mankind are too well attached to their interest to run such a risk. I conceive that this power is absolutely necessary, and not dangerous; that, should it be attended by little inconveniences, they will be altered, and that they can have no interest in not altering them. Is there any real danger? When I compare it to the exercise of the same power in the government of Virginia, I am persuaded there is not. The federal government has no other motive, and has every reason for doing right which the members of our state legislature have. Will a man on the eastern shore be sent to be tried in Kentucky, or a man from Kentucky be brought to the eastern shore to have his trial? A government, by doing this, would destroy itself. I am convinced the trial by jury will be regulated in the manner most advantageous to the community.

He [Mr. Henry] then proceeded to state the appellate jurisdiction of the judicial power, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as Congress shall make. He observed, that, as Congress had a right to organize the federal judiciary, they might or might not have recourse to a jury, as they pleased. He left it to the candor of the honorable gentleman to say whether those persons who were at the expense of taking witnesses to Philadelphia, or wherever the federal judiciary may sit, could be certain whether they were to be heard before a jury or not. An honorable gentleman (Mr. Marshall) the other day observed, that he conceived the trial by jury better secured under the plan on the table than in the British government, or even in our bill of rights. I have the highest veneration and respect for the honorable gentleman, and I have experienced his candor on all occasions; but, Mr. Chairman, in this instance, he is so materially mistaken that I cannot but observe, he is much in error. I beg the clerk to read that part of the Constitution which relates to trial by jury. [The clerk then read the 8th article of the bill of rights.]

Mr. MARSHALL rose to explain what he had before said on this subject: he informed the committee that the honorable gentleman (Mr. Henry) must have misunderstood him. He said that he conceived the trial by jury was as well secured, and not better secured, in the proposed new Constitution as in our bill of rights. [The clerk then read the 11*th article of the bill of rights*.]

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Chairman: The gentleman's candor, sir, as I informed you before, I have the highest opinion of, and am happy to find he has so far explained what he meant; but, sir, has he mended the matter? Is not the ancient trial by jury preserved in the Virginia bill of rights? and is that the case in the new plan? No, sir; they can do it if they please. Will gentlemen tell me the trial by jury of the vicinage where the party resides is preserved? True, sir, there is to be a trial by the jury in the state where the fact was committed; but, sir, this state, for instance, is so large that your juries may be collected five hundred miles from where the party resides — no neighbors who are acquainted with their characters, their good or bad conduct in life, to judge of the unfortunate man who may be thus exposed to the rigor of that government. Compare this security, then, sir, in our bill of rights with that in the new plan of government; and in the first you have it, and in the other, in my opinion, not at all. But, sir, in what situation will our citizens be, who have made large contracts under our present government? They will be called to a federal court, and tried under the retrospective laws; for it is evident, to me at least, that the federal court must look back, and give better remedies, to compel individuals to fulfill them.

The whole history of human nature cannot produce a government like that before you. The manner in which the judiciary and other branches of the government are formed, seems to me calculated to lay prostrate the states, and the liberties of the people. But, sir, another circumstance ought totally to reject that plan, in my opinion; which is, that it cannot be understood, in many parts, even by the supporters of it. A constitution, sir, ought to be, like a beacon, held up to the public eye, so as to be understood by every man. Some gentlemen have observed that the word jury implies a jury of the vicinage. There are so many inconsistencies in this, that, for my part, I cannot understand it. By the bill of rights of England, a subject has a right to a trial by his peers. What is meant by his peers? Those who reside near him, his neighbors, and who are well acquainted with his character and situation in life. Is this secured in the proposed plan before you? No, sir. As I have observed before, what is to become of the purchases of the Indians? — those unhappy nations who have given up their lands to private purchasers; who, by being made drunk, have given a thousand, nay, I might say, ten thousand acres, for the trifling sum of sixpence! It is with true concern, with grief, I tell you that I have waited with pain to come to this part of the plan; because I observed gentlemen admitted its being defective, and, I had my hopes, would have proposed amendments. But this part they have defended; and this convinces me of the necessity of obtaining amendments before it is adopted. They have defended it with ingenuity and perseverance, but by no means satisfactorily. If previous amendments are not obtained, the trial by jury is gone. British debtors will be ruined by being dragged to the federal court, and the liberty and happiness of our citizens gone, never again to be recovered.

Mr. HENRY. … The honorable member must forgive me for declaring my dissent from it; because, if I understand it rightly, it admits that the new system is defective, and most capitally; for, immediately after the proposed ratification, there comes a declaration that the paper before you is not intended to violate any of these three great rights — the liberty of religion, liberty of the press, and the trial by jury. What is the inference when you enumerate the rights which you are to enjoy? That those not enumerated are relinquished. There are only three things to be retained — religion, freedom of the press, and jury trial. Will not the ratification carry every thing, without excepting these three things? Will not all the world pronounce that we intended to give up all the rest? Every thing it speaks of, by way of rights, is comprised in these things. Your subsequent amendments only go to these three amendments.

… In my weak judgment, a government is strong when it applies to the most important end of all governments — the rights and privileges of the people. In the honorable member's proposal, jury trial, the press and religion, and other essential rights, are not to be given up. Other essential rights — what are they? The world will say that you intended to give them up. When you go into an enumeration of your rights, and stop that enumeration, the inevitable conclusion is, that what is omitted is intended to be surrendered.

13.2.3.1September 12, 1787

Mr. WILLIAMSON observed to the House, that no provision was yet made for juries in civil cases, and suggested the necessity of it.

Mr. GORHAM. It is not possible to discriminate equity cases from those in which juries are proper. The representatives of the people may be safely trusted in this matter.

Mr. GERRY urged the necessity of juries to guard against corrupt judges. He proposed that the committee last appointed should be directed to provide a clause for securing the trial by juries.

Col. MASON perceived the difficulty mentioned by Mr. Gorham. The jury cases cannot be specified. A general principle laid down, on this and some other points, would be sufficient. …

Mr. SHERMAN … There are many cases, where juries are proper, which cannot be discriminated. The Legislature may be safely trusted.

Elliot, vol. 5, p. 538.

13.2.3.2September 15, 1787

Article 3, sect. 2, (the third paragraph,) Mr. PINCKNEY and Mr. GERRY moved to annex to the end, "and a trial by jury shall be preserved as usual in civil cases."

Mr. GORHAM. The constitution of juries is different in different states, and the trial itself is usual in different cases, in different states.

Mr. KING urged the same objections.

Gen. PINCKNEY also. He thought such a clause in the Constitution would be pregnant with embarrassments.

The motion was disagreed to, nem. con.

*

Mr. Gerry. Stated the objections which determined him to withhold his name from the Constitution. … He could however he said get over all these, if the rights of the Citizens were not rendered insecure … to establish a tribunal without juries, which will be a StarChamber as to Civil cases. Under such a view of the Constitution, the best that could be done he conceived was to provide for a second general Convention.

13.2.4.1Address of the Seceding Assemblymen, October 2, 1787

… You will be able likewise to determine, whether in a free government there ought or ought not to be any provision against a standing army in time of peace? or whether the trial by jury in civil causes is become dangerous and ought to be abolished? …

13.2.4.2Centinel, No. 1, October 5, 1787

Friends, Countrymen and Fellow Citizens, Permit one of yourselves to put you in mind of certain liberties and privileges secured to you by the constitution of this commonwealth, and to beg your serious attention to his uninterested opinion upon the plan of federal government submitted to your consideration, before you surrender these great and valuable privileges up forever. … Your constitution further provides "that in controversies respecting property, and in suits between man and man, the parties have a right to trial by jury, which ought to be held sacred." … Whether the trial by jury is to continue as your birthright, the freemen of Pennsylvania, nay, of all America, are now called upon to declare.

… And it is worthy of remark, that there is no declaration of personal rights, premised in most free constitutions; and that trial by jury in civil cases is taken away; for what other construction can be put on the following, viz. Article III. Sect. 2d. "In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and those in which a State shall be a party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction. In all other cases above mentioned, the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact?" It would be a novelty in jurisprudence, as well as evidently improper to allow an appeal from the verdict of a jury, on the matter of fact; therefore, it implies and allows of a dismission of the jury in civil cases, and especially when it is considered, that the jury trial in criminal cases is expresly [sic] stipulated for, but not in civil cases.

13.2.4.3Blessings of the New Government, October 6, 1787

Another correspondent observes, that although the tide seems to run so high at present in favor of the new constitution, there is no doubt but the people will soon change their minds, when they have time to examine it with coolness and impartiality.

Among the blessings of the new-proposed government our correspondent enumerates the following: — … 6. No trial by jury in civil cases. … 13. And death if we dare to complain.

13.2.4.4James Wilson, Address to the Citizens of Philadelphia, October 6, 1787

… Another objection that has been fabricated against the new Constitution, is expressed in disingenuous form — "the trial by jury is abolished in civil cases." … Let it be remembered then, that the business of the Fœderal Convention was not local, but general; not limited to the views and establishments of a single state, but co-extensive with the continent, and comprehending the views and establishments of thirteen independent sovereignties. When therefore, this subject was in discussion, we were involved in difficulties which pressed on all sides, and no precedent could be discovered to direct our course. The cases open to a trial by jury, differed in the different states, it was therefore impracticable on that ground to have made a general rule. The want of uniformity would have rendered any reference to the practice of the states idle and useless; and it could not, with any propriety, be said that "the trial by jury shall be as heretofore," since there has never existed any federal system of jurisprudence, to which the declaration could relate. Besides, it is not in all civil cases that the trial by jury is adopted in civil questions, for causes depending in courts of admiralty, such as relate to maritime captures, and such as are agitated in courts of equity, do not require the intervention of that tribunal. How then, was the line of discrimination to be drawn? The convention found the task too difficult for them, and they left the business as it stands, in the fullest confidence that no danger could possibly ensue, since the proceedings of the supreme court are to be regulated by the congress, which is a faithful representation of the people; …

13.2.4.5George Mason, Objections to the Constitution, October 7, 1787

There is no Declaration of Rights; and the Laws of the general Government being paramount to the Laws & Constitutions of the several States, the Declarations of Rights in the separate States are no Security.

There is no Declaration of any kind for preserving the Liberty of the Press, the Tryal by jury in civil Causes; nor against the Danger of standing Armys in time of peace.

This Government will commence in a moderate Aristocracy; it is at present impossible to foresee whether it will, in it's Operation, produce a Monarchy, or a corrupt oppressive Aristocracy; it will most probably vibrate some years between the two, and then terminate in the one or the other.

13.2.4.6The Federal Farmer, No. 2, October 9, 1787

The essential parts of a free and good government are a full and equal representation of the people in the legislature, and the jury trial of the vicinage in the administration of justice — a full and equal representation, is that which possesses the same interests, feelings, opinions, and views the people themselves would were they all assembled — a fair representation, therefore, should be so regulated, that every order of men in the community, according to the common course of elections, can have a share in it — in order to allow professional men, merchants, traders, farmers, mechanics, &c. to bring a just proportion of their best informed men respectively into the legislature, the representation must be considerably numerous — We have about 200 state senators in the United States, and a less number than that of federal representatives cannot, clearly, be a full representation of this people, in the affairs of internal taxation and police, were there but one legislature for the whole union. The representation cannot be equal, or the situation of the people proper for one government only — if the extreme parts of the society cannot be represented as fully as the central — It is apparently impracticable that this should be the case in this extensive country — it would be impossible to collect a representation of the parts of the country five, six, and seven hundred miles from the seat of government.

Under one general government alone, there could be but one judiciary, one supreme and a proper number of inferior courts. I think it would be totally impracticable in this case to preserve a due administration of justice, and the real benefits of the jury trial of the vicinage — there are now supreme courts in each state in the union, and a great number of county and other courts, subordinate to each supreme court — most of these supreme and inferior courts are itinerant, and hold their sessions in different parts every year of their respective states, counties and districts — with all these moving courts, our citizens, from the vast extent of the country, must travel very considerable distances from home to find the place where justice is administered. I am not for bringing justice to individuals as to afford them any temptation to engage in law suits; though I think it one of the greatest benefits in a good government, that each citizen should find a court of justice within a reasonable distance, perhaps, within a day's travel of his home; so that without great inconveniences and enormous expense, he may have the advantages of his witnesses and jury — it would be impracticable to derive these advantages from one judiciary — the one supreme court at most could only set in the centre of the union, and move once a year into the centre of the eastern and southern extremes of it — and, in this case, each citizen, on an average, would travel 150 or 200 miles to find this court — that, however, inferior courts might be properly placed in the different counties, and districts of the union, the appellate jurisdiction would be intolerable and expensive.

If it were possible to consolidate the states, and preserve the features of a free government, still it is evident that the middle states, the parts of the union, about the seat of government, would enjoy great advantages, while the remote states would experience the many inconveniences of remote provinces. Wealth, offices, and the benefits of government would collect in the centre: and the extreme states; and their principal towns, become much less important.

There are other considerations which tend to prove that the idea of one consolidated whole, on free principles, is ill founded — the laws of a free government rest on the confidence of the people, and operate gently — and never can extend the influence very far — if they are executed on free principles, about the centre, where benefits of the government induce the people to support it voluntarily; yet they must be executed on the principles of fear and force in the extremes — This has been the case with every extensive republic of which we have any accurate account.

There are certain unalienable and fundamental rights, which in forming the social compact, ought to be explicitly ascertained and fixed — a free and enlightened people, in forming this compact, will not resign all their rights to those who govern, and they will fix limits to their legislators and rulers, which will soon be plainly seen by those who are governed, as well as by those who govern: and the latter will know they cannot be passed unperceived by the former, and without giving a general alarm — These rights should be made the basis of every constitution; and if a people be so situated, or have such different opinions that they cannot agree in ascertaining and fixing them, it is a very strong argument against their attempting to form one entire society, to live under one system of laws only. — I confess, I never thought the people of these states differed essentially in these respects; they having derived all these rights from one common source, the British systems; and having in the formation of their state constitutions, discovered that their ideas relative to these rights are very similar. However, it is now said that the states differ so essentially in these respects, and even in the important article of the trial by jury, that when assembled in convention, they can agree to no words by which to establish that trial, or by which to ascertain and establish many other of these rights, as fundamental articles in the social compact. If so, we proceed to consolidate the states on no solid basis whatever.

Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 14, pp. 25–27.

… There are some powers proposed to be lodged in the general government in the judicial department, I think very unnecessarily, I mean powers respecting questions arising upon the internal laws of the respective states. … In almost all these cases, either party may have the trial by jury in the state courts; … justice may be obtained in these courts on reasonable terms; they must be more competent to proper decisions on the laws of their respective states, than the federal courts can possibly be. … It is true, those courts may be so organized by a wise and prudent legislature, as to make the obtaining of justice in them tolerably easy; they may in general be organized on the common law principles of the country: But this benefit is by no means secured by the constitution. The trial by jury is secured only in those few criminal cases, to which the federal laws will extend — as crimes committed on the seas against the law of nations, treason and counterfeiting the federal securities and coin: But even in these cases, the jury trial of the vicinage is not secured, particularly in the large states, a citizen may be tried for a crime committed in the state, and yet tried in some states 500 miles from the place where it was committed; but the jury trial is not secured at all in civil causes. Though the convention have not established this trial, it is to be hoped that congress, in putting the new system into execution, will do it by a legislative act, in all cases in which it can be done with propriety. Whether the jury trial is not excluded [in] the supreme judicial court, is an important question. …

Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 14, pp. 40–41.

13.2.4.8 The Federal Farmer, No. 4, October 12, 1787

… If the federal constitution is to be construed so far in connection with the state constitutions, as to leave the trial by jury in civil causes, for instance, secured; on the same principles it would have left the trial by jury in criminal causes, the benefits of the writ of habeas corpus, &c. secured; they all stand on the same footing; they are the common rights of Americans, and have been recognized by the state constitutions: But the convention found it necessary to recognize or reestablish the benefits of that writ, and the jury trial in criminal cases. … The establishing of one right implies the necessity of establishing another and similar one.

On the whole, the position appears to me to be undeniable, that this bill of rights ought to be carried farther, and some other principles established, as a part of this fundamental compact between the people of the United States and their federal rulers.

… There are other essential rights, which we have justly understood to be the rights of freemen. … The trials by jury in civil causes, it is said, varies [sic] so much in the several states, that no words could be found for the uniform establishment of it. If so the federal legislation will not be able to establish it by any general laws. I confess I am of opinion it may be established, but not in that beneficial manner in which we may enjoy it, for the reasons beforementioned. When I speak of the jury trial of the vicinage, or the trial of the fact in the neighbourhood, — I do not lay so much stress upon the circumstance of our being tried by our neighbors: in this enlightened country men may be probably impartially tried by those who do not live very near them: but the trial of facts in the neighborhood is of great importance in other respects. Nothing can be more essential than the cross examining witnesses, and generally before the triers of the facts in question.

The common people can establish facts with much more ease with oral than written evidence; when trials of fact are removed to a distance from the homes of the parties and witnesses, oral evidence becomes intolerably expensive, and the parties must depend on written evidence, which to the common people is expensive and almost useless; it must be frequently taken ex-parte, and but very seldom leads to the proper discovery of truth.

The trial by jury is very important in another point of view. It is essential in every free country, that common people should have a part and share of influence, in the judicial as well as in the legislative department. To hold open to them the offices of senators, judges, and offices to fill which an expensive education is required, cannot answer any valuable purposes for them; they are not in a situation to be brought forward and to fill those offices; these, and most other offices of any considerable importance, will be occupied by the few. The few, the well born, &c. as Mr. Adams calls them, in judicial decisions as well as in legislation, are generally disposed, and very naturally too, to favour those of their own description.

The trial by jury in the judicial department, and the collection of the people by their representatives in the legislature, are those fortunate inventions which have procured for them, in this country, their true proportion of influence, and the wisest and most fit means of protecting themselves in the community. Their situation, as jurors and representatives, enables them to acquire information and knowledge in the affairs and government of the society; and to come forward, in turn, as the centinels and guardians of each other. I am very sorry that even a few of our countrymen should consider jurors and representatives in a different point of view, as ignorant, troublesome bodies, which ought not to have any share in the concerns of government.

Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 14, pp. 45–47.

13.2.4.9A Democratic Federalist, October 17, 1787

The second and most important objection to the federal plan, which Mr. Wilson pretends to be made in a disingenuous form, is the entire abolition of the trial by jury in civil cases. It seems to me that Mr. Wilson's pretended answer, is much more disingenuous than the objection itself, which I maintain to be strictly founded in fact. He says "that the cases open to trial by jury differing in the different States, it was therefore impracticable to have made a general rule." This answer is extremely futile, because a reference might easily have been made to the common law of England, which obtains through every State, and cases in the maritime and civil law courts would of course have been excepted. I must also directly contradict Mr. Wilson when he asserts that there is no trial by jury in the courts of chancery — It cannot be unknown to a man of his high professional learning, that whenever a difference arises about a matter of fact in the courts of equity in America or England, the fact is sent down to the courts of common law to be tried by a jury, and it is what the lawyers call a feigned issue. This method will be impracticable under the proposed form of judicial jurisdiction for the United States.

But setting aside the equivocal answers of Mr. Wilson, I have it in my power to prove that under the proposed Federal Constitution, the trial of facts in civil cases by a jury of the Vicinage is entirely and effectually abolished, and will be absolutely impracticable. I wish the learned gentleman had explained to us what is meant by the appellate jurisdiction as to law and fact which is vested in the superior court of the United States? As he has not thought proper to do it, I shall endeavour to explain it to my fellow citizens, regretting at the same time that it has not been done by a man whose abilities are so much superior to mine. The word appeal, if I understand it right, in its proper legal signification includes the fact as well as the law, and precludes every idea of a trial by jury — It is a word of foreign growth, and is only known in England and America in those courts which are governed by the civil or ecclesiastical law of the Romans. Those courts have always been considered in England as a grievance, and have all been established by the usurpations of the ecclesiastical over the civil power. It is well known that the courts of chancery in England were formerly entirely in the hands of ecclesiastics, who took advantage of the strict forms of the common law, to introduce a foreign mode of jurisprudence under the specious name of Equity. Pennsylvania, the freest of the American States[,] has wisely rejected this establishment, and knows not even the name of a court of chancery — And in fact, there can not be any thing more absurd than a distinction between LAW and EQUITY. It might perhaps have suited those barbarous times when the law of England, like almost every other science, was perplexed with quibbles and Aristotelian distinctions, but it would be shameful to keep it up in these more enlightened days. At any rate, it seems to me that there is much more equity in a trial by jury, than in an appellate jurisdiction from the fact.

An appeal therefore is a thing unknown to the common law. Instead of an appeal from facts, it admits of a second, or even third trial by different juries, and mistakes in points of law, are rectified by superior courts in the form of a writ of error — and to a mere common lawyer, unskilled in the forms of the civil law courts, the words appeal from law and fact, are mere nonsense, and unintelligible absurdity.

But even supposing that the superior court of the United States had the authority to try facts by juries of the vicinage, it would be impossible for them to carry it into execution. It is well known that the supreme courts of the different states, at stated times in every year, go round the different counties of their respective states to try issues of fact, which is called riding the circuits. Now, how is it possible that the supreme continental court, which we will suppose to consist at most of five or six judges, can travel at least twice in every year, through the different counties of America, from New-Hampshire to Kentuckey [sic] and from Kentuckey to Georgia, to try facts by juries of the vicinage. Common sense will not admit of such a supposition. I am therefore right in my assertion, that trial by jury in civil cases, is, by the proposed constitution entirely done away, and effectually abolished.

Pennsylvania Herald, Storing, vol. 3, pp. 59–61.

13.2.4.10One of the People, October 17, 1787

The … trials by jury are not infringed on. The Constitution is silent, and with propriety too, on these and every other subject relative to the internal government of the states. These are secured by the different state constitutions.

Pennsylvania Gazette, Jensen, vol. 2, p. 190.

13.2.4.11A Citizen of Philadelphia, October 18, 1787

… Another objection is, that the new constitution abolishes tryals by jury in civil causes. I answer, I don’t see one word in the constitution, which by any candid construction can support even the remotest suspicion that this ever entered the heart of one member of the convention. I therefore set down the suggestion for sheer malice, and so dismiss it.

13.2.4.12An Old Whig, No. 3, October 20, 1787

… As to the trial by jury, the question may be decided in a few words. Any future Congress sitting under the authority of the proposed new constitution, may, if they chuse, enact that there shall be no more trial by jury, in any of the United States; except in the trial of crimes; and this "supreme law" will at once annul the trial by jury, in all other cases. The author of the speech supposes that no danger "can possibly ensue, since the proceedings of the supreme court are to be regulated by the Congress, which is a faithful representation of the people; and the oppression of government is effectually barred; by declaring that in all criminal cases the trial by jury shall be preserved." Let us examine the last clause of this sentence first. — I know that an affected indifference to the trial by jury has been expressed, by some persons high in the confidence of the present ruling party in some of the states; — and yet for my own part I cannot change the opinion I had early formed of the excellence of this mode of trial even in civil causes. On the other hand I have no doubt that whenever a settled plan shall be formed for the extirpation of liberty, the banishment of jury trials will be one of the means adopted for the purpose. — But how is it that "the oppression of government is effectually barred by declaring that in all criminal cases the trial by jury shall be preserved?" — Are there not a thousand civil cases in which the government is a party? — In all actions for penalties, forfeitures and public debts, as well as many others, the government is a party and the whole weight of government is thrown into the scale of the prosecution[,] yet there are all of them civil causes. — These penalties, forfeitures and demands of public debts may be multiplied at the will and pleasure of government. — These modes of harassing the subject have perhaps been more effectual than direct criminal prosecutions. … The reason that is pretended in the speech why such a declaration; as a bill of rights requires, cannot be made for the protection of the trial by jury; — "that we cannot with any propriety say 'that the trial by jury shall be as heretofore' " in the case of a federal system of jurisprudence, is almost too contemptible to merit notice. — Is this the only form of words that language could afford on such an important occasion? Or if it were to what did these words refer when adopted in the constitutions of the states? — Plainly sir, to the trial by juries as established by the common law of England in the state of its purity; — That common law for which we contended so eagerly at the time of the revolution, and which now after the interval of a very few years, by the proposed new constitution we seem ready to abandon forever; at least in that article which is the most invaluable part of it; the trial by jury.

… Both the old and new foederal constitutions, and indeed the constitution of Pennsylvania, admit of courts in which no use is made of a jury. The board of property, the court of admiralty, and the high court of errors and appeals, in the state of Pennsylvania, as also the court of appeals under the old confederation, exclude juries. Tryal by jury will therefore be in the express words of the Pennsylvania constitution, "as heretofore," — almost always used, though sometimes omitted. Trials for lands lying in any state between persons residing in such state, for bonds, notes, book debts, contracts, trespasses, assumptions, and all other matters between two or more citizens of any state, will be held in the state courts by juries, as now. In these cases, the foederal courts cannot interfere. But when a dispute arises between the citizens of any state about lands lying out of the bounds thereof, or when a trial is to be had between the citizens of any state and those of another, or the government of another, the private citizen will not be obliged to go into a court constituted by the state, with which, or with the citizens of which, his dispute is. He can appeal to a disinterested foederal court. This is surely a great advantage, and promises a fair trial, and an impartial judgement. The trial by jury is not excluded in these foederal courts. In all criminal cases, where the property or life of the citizen is at stake, he has the benefit of a jury. If convicted on impeachment, which is never done by a jury in any country, he cannot be fired, imprisoned or punished, but only may be disqualified from doing public mischief by losing his office, and his capacity to hold another. If the nature of his offence, besides its danger to his country, should be criminal in itself — should involve a charge of fraud, murder or treason — he may be tried for such crime, but cannot be convicted without a jury. In trials about property in the foederal courts, which can only be as above stated, there is nothing in the new constitution to prevent a trial by jury. No doubt it will be the mode in every case, wherein it is practicable. This will be adjusted by law, and it could not be done otherwise. In short, the sphere of jurisdiction for the foederal courts is limited, and that sphere only is subject to the regulations of our foederal government. The known principles of justice, the attachment to trial by jury whenever it can be used, the instructions of the state legislatures, the instructions of the people at large, the operation of the foederal regulations on the property of a president, a senator, a representative, a judge, as well as on that of a private citizen, will certainly render those regulations as favorable as possible to property; for life and liberty are put more than ever into the hands of the juries. Under the present constitution of all the states, a public officer may be condemned to imprisonment or death on impeachment, without a jury; but the new foederal constitution protects the accused, till he shall be convicted, from the hands of power, by rendering a jury the indispensible judges of all crimes.

13.2.4.14Centinel, No. 2, October 24, 1787

Mr. Wilson says, that it would have been impracticable to have made a general rule for jury trial in the civil cases assigned to the federal judiciary, because of the want of uniformity in the mode of jury trial, as practiced by the several states. This objection proves too much, and therefore amounts to nothing. If it precludes the mode of common law in civil cases, it certainly does in criminal. Yet in these we are told “the oppression of government is effectually barred by declaring that in all criminal cases trial by jury shall be preserved.” Astonishing, that provision could not be made for a jury in civil controversies, of 12 men, whose verdict should be unanimous, to be taken from the vicinage; a precaution which is omitted as to trial of crimes, which may be any where in the state within which they have been committed. So that an inhabitant of Kentucky may be tried for treason at Richmond.

13.2.4.15Proclamation, Wat Tyler, October 24, 1787

… Thus it may be argued … because the federal representation of the people will possess the power to declare in what civil cases the trial shall be by jury, therefore the trial by jury is abolished in all civil cases. …

Pennsylvania Herald, Jensen, vol. 2, p. 203.

13.2.4.16Timothy Meanwell, October 29, 1787

… I was informed that the trial by jury, which was guaranteed to us by the constitution of Pennsylvania, was in many instances abolished; this I did not believe when I heard it — I could not entertain an opinion that men so enlightened as those of the convention, among whose names I saw friend — and friend —, could be inattentive to the preservation of the trial by jury. I immediately took the constitution in my hand, and began to search it from end to end, and was in hopes of finding some clause like that in the Bill of Rights in the constitution of Pennsylvania, that would secure the trial by juries in all cases whatsoever, but I was disappointed.

Let us suppose then, that what has happened, may happen again: That a patriotic printer, like Peter Zenger, should incur the resentment of our new rulers, by publishing to the world, transactions which they wish to conceal. If he should be prosecuted, if his judges should be as desirous of punishing him, at all events, as the judges were to punish Peter Zenger, what would his innocence or his virtue avail him? This constitution is so admirably framed for tyranny, that, by clear construction, the judges might put the verdict of a jury out of the question. Among the cases in which the court is to have appellate jurisdiction, are — controversies, to which the United States are a party: — In this appellate jurisdiction, the judges are to determine, both law and fact. That is, the court is both judge and jury. The attorney general then would have only to move a question of law in the court below, to ground an appeal to the supreme judicature, and the printer would be delivered up to the mercy of his judges. Peter Zenger's case will teach us, what mercy he might expect. Thus, if the president, vice-president, or any other officer, or favorite of state, should be censured in print, he might effectually deprive the printer, or author, of his trial by jury, and subject him to something, that will probably very much resemble the Star Chamber of former times. The freedom of the press, the sacred palladium of public liberty, would be pulled down; — all useful knowledge on the conduct of government would be withheld from the people — the press would become subservient to the purposes of bad and arbitrary rulers, and imposition, not information, would be its object.

… Yet it was the jury only, that saved Zenger, it was a jury only, that saved Woodfall, it can only be a jury that will save any future printer from the fangs of power.

13.2.4.18Timoleon, November 1, 1787

"… With as little ceremony, and similar constructive doctrine, the inestimable trial by jury can likewise be depraved and destroyed — because the Constitution in the 2d section of the 3d article, by expressly assuming the trial by jury in criminal cases, and being silent about it in civil causes, evidently declares it to be unnecessary in the latter. And more strongly so, by giving the supreme court jurisdiction in appeals, 'both as to law and fact.' If this be added, that the trial by jury in criminal cases is only stipulated to be 'in the state,' not in the county where the crime is supposed to have been committed; one excellent part of the jury trial, from the vicinage, or at least from the county, is even in criminal cases rendered precarious, and at the mercy of rulers under the new Constitution. — Yet the danger to liberty, peace, and property, from restraining and injuring this excellent mode of trial, will clearly appear from the following observations of the learned Dr. Blackstone, in his commentaries on the laws of England, Art. Jury Trial Book 3. chap. 33. — 'The establishment of jury trial was always so highly esteemed and valued by the people, that no conquest, no change of government, could ever prevail to abolish it. In the magna charta it is more than once insisted upon as the principle bulwark of our liberties — And this is a species of knowledge most absolutely necessary for every gentleman; as well, because he may be frequently called upon to determine in this capacity the rights of others, his fellow subjects; as, because his own property, his liberty, and his life, depend upon maintaining in its legal force the trial by jury… And in every country as the trial by jury has been gradually disused, so the great have increased in power, until the state has been torn to pieces by rival factions, and oligarchy in effect has been established, though under the shadow of regal government; unless where the miserable people have taken shelter under absolute monarchy, as the lighter evil of the two. … It is therefore upon the whole, a duty which every man owes to his country, his friends, his posterity, and himself, to maintain, to the utmost of his power, this valuable trial by jury in all its rights'." Thus far the learned Dr. Blackstone, — "Could the Doctor, if he were here, at this moment," … "have condemned those parts of the new Constitution in stronger terms, which give the supreme court jurisdiction both as to law and fact; which have weakened the jury trial in criminal cases and which have discountenanced it in all civil causes? At first I wondered at the complaint that some people made of this new Constitution, because it led to the government of a few; but it is fairly to be concluded, from this injury to the trial by jury, that some who framed this new system, saw with Dr. Blackstone, how operative jury trial was in preventing the tyranny of the great ones, and therefore frowned upon it, as this new Constitution does. …"

13.2.4.19Brutus, No. 2, November 1, 1787

It has been said, in answer to this objection, that such declaration of rights, however requisite they might be in the constitutions of the states, are not necessary in the general constitution, because, "in the former case, every thing which is not reserved is given, but in the latter the reverse of the proposition prevails, and every thing which is not given is reserved." It requires but little attention to discover, that this mode of reasoning is rather specious than solid. The powers, rights, and authority, granted to the general government by this constitution, are as complete, with respect to every object to which they extend, as that of any state government — It reaches to every thing which concerns human happiness — Life, liberty, and property, are under its controul. There is the same reason, therefore, that the exercise of power, in this case, should be restrained within proper limits, as in that of the state governments. To set this matter in a clear light, permit me to instance some of the articles of the bills of rights of the individual states, and apply them to the case in question.

For the purpose of securing the property of the citizens, it is declared by all the states, "that in all controversies at law, respecting property, the ancient mode of trial by jury is one of the best securities of the rights of the people, and ought to remain sacred and inviolable."

Does not the same necessity exist of reserving this right, under this national compact, as in that of this state? Yet nothing is said respecting it.

13.2.4.20An Old Whig, No. 5, November 1, 1787

… It is needless to repeat the necessity of securing other personal rights in the forming a new government. The same argument which proves the necessity of securing one of them shews also the necessity of securing others. Without a bill of rights we are totally insecure in all of them; and no man can promise himself with any degree of certainty that his posterity will enjoy the inestimable blessings of liberty of conscience, of freedom of speech and of writing and publishing their thoughts on public matters, of trial by jury, of holding themselves, their houses and papers free from seizure and search upon general suspicion or general warrants; or in short that they will be secured in the enjoyment of life, liberty and property without depending on the will and pleasure of their rulers.

13.2.4.21An Officer of the Late Continental Army, November 6, 1787

… The objections that have been made to the new Constitution are these: …

8. TRIAL BY JURY, that sacred bulwark of liberty, is ABOLISHED IN CIVIL CASES, and Mr. [James] W[ilson], one of the Convention, has told you, that not being able to agree as to the FORM of establishing this point, they have left you deprived of the SUBSTANCE. Here are his own words: "The subject was involved in difficulties. The Convention found the task too DIFFICULT for them, and left the business as it stands."

… I come now to the consideration of the trial by jury in civil cases. … The objection you impute to your opponents is — the trial by jury is abolished in civil cases. This you call a disingenuous form — and truly it is very much so on your part and of your own fabrication. The objection in its true form is, that — trial by jury is not secured in civil cases. To this objection, you could not possibly give an answer; you therefore ingeniously coined one to which you could make a plausible reply. We expected, and we had a right to expect, that such an inestimable privilege as this would have been secured — that it would not have been less dependent on the arbitrary exposition of future judges, who, when it may suit the arbitrary views of the ruling powers will explain it away at pleasure. …

But, if taken even on your own ground it is not so clearly tenable. In point of legal construction, the trial by jury does seem to be taken away in civil cases. It is a law maxim, that the expression of one part is an exclusion of the other. In legal construction therefore, the preservation of trial by jury in criminal, is an exclusion of it in civil cases. Why else should it be mentioned at all? Either it followed of course in both cases, or it depended on being stipulated. If the first, then the stipulation was nugatory — if the latter, then it was in part given up. Therefore, either we must suppose the Convention did a nugatory thing; or that by the express mention of jury in criminal, they meant to exclude it in civil cases. And that they did intend to exclude it, seems the more probable, as in the appeal they have taken special care to render the trial by jury of no effect by expressly making the court judges both of law and fact. And though this is subjected to the future regulation of Congress, yet it would be absurd to suppose, that the regulation meant its annihilation. We must therefore conclude, that in appeals the trial by jury is expressly taken away, and in original process it is by legal implication taken away in all civil cases.

Here then I must repeat — that you ought to have stated fairly to the people, that the trial by jury was not secured; that they might know what, it was they were to consent to; and if knowing it, they consented, the blame could not fall on you. … The trial by [jury in] our country, is in my opinion, the great bulwark of freedom, and for certain, the admiration of all foreign writers and nations. The last writer of any distinguished note, upon the principles of government, the celebrated Montesquieu, is in raptures with this peculiar perfection in the English policy. …

Such are the opinions of Lord Camden and Vaughan, and multitudes of the first names, both English and other foreigners might be cited, who bestow unbounded approbation on this best of all human modes for protecting, life, liberty, and property.

I own then, it alarms me, when I see these Doctors of our constitutions cutting in twain this sacred shield of public liberty and justice. Surely my countrymen will think a little before they resign this strong hold of freedom. Our state constitutions have held it sacred in all its parts. They have anxiously secured it. But that these may not shield it from the intended destruction in the new constitution, it is therein as anxiously provided, that "this constitution, and the laws of the United States, which shall be made in pursuance thereof; or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme laws of the land; and the judges of every state, shall be bound thereby; any thing in constitution and the laws of any state, to the contrary notwithstanding."

Thus this new system, with one sweeping clause, bears down every constitution in the union, and establishes its arbitrary doctrines, supreme and paramount to all the bills and declarations of rights, in which we vainly put our trust, and on which we rested the security of our often declared, unalienable liberties. But I trust the whole people of this country, will unite, in crying out, as did our sturdy ancestors of old — Nolumus leges anglicae mutari. — We will not part with our birthright.

13.2.4.23A Son of Liberty, November 8, 1787

MR. GREENLEAF, Having observed in your paper of the 25th ult. that a writer under the signature of A Slave, has pointed out a number of advantages or blessings, which, he says, will result from an adoption of the new government, proposed by the Convention: — I have taken the liberty to request, that you will give the following a place in your next paper, it being an enumeration of a few of the curses which will be entailed on the people of America, by this preposterous and newfangled system, if they are ever so infatuated as to receive it. … 3d. A suppression of trial by jury of your peers, in all civil cases, and even in criminal cases, the loss of the trial in the vicinage, where the fact and the credibility of your witnesses are known, and where you can command their attendance without insupportable expence, or inconveniences.

13.2.4.24Uncus, November 9, 1787

Mr. Goddard, When you began publishing the Centinel in numbers, I expected we should have had one in each of your papers for some weeks, hoping, that after he had done finding fault with the doings of the late convention, the members of which were either too designing, — of too aristocratic principles, — too old, — or too ignorant, "inexperienced and fallible," for business of such magnitude; he would, by the perfect rule existing in his own mind, by which he has tried and condemned the proposed constitution, exhibit to the world a perfect model; which these States would have only to read, and invite "those who are competent to the task of developing the principles of government," to come forward, approve and adopt.

I believe, there is not a single article, wherein the new plan has proposed any amendment to the old, but what would be objected to by Centinel. To some he has objected, where they have made no amendment; as the power of Congress to try causes without a jury, which they have ever possessed.

13.2.4.25Gentleman in New-York, November 14, 1787

"… I have not only no objection to, but am extremely desirous of, a strong and general government, provided the fundamental principles of liberty be well secured. These I take to be, trial by jury as has been and is practised. … In all these great points the proposed constitution requires amendment, before it can be adopted even with safety.

"In the constitution of the foederal court, where its jurisdiction is original, the securing jury trial in criminal, is, according to all legal reasoning, an exclusion of it in civil matters — and in its appellant function it is expressly said the court shall judge both of law and fact. This of course renders the finding of a jury below, totally nugatory."

Virginia Independent Chronicle, Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 14, p. 103.

13.2.4.26A Georgian, November 15, 1787

And now we come to the point which at once teems with numberless enormous innovations by introducing strange and new courts of almost any denomination into any of the states whereby our own courts will soon be annihilated, and abolishing the only pledge of liberty, the trial by jury, to tryants only formidable, in all civil cases, countenancing the greatest injustice to be lawfully, nay constitutionally, committed by the rich against their brave fellow citizens whose only misfortune is to be, perhaps, not so rich as they, by dragging their lawsuits of any denomination and of any sum, however small, if they choose, before the GRAND TRIBUNAL OF APPEAL to which the poor will be unable to follow with their evidences and witnesses, and on account of the great expenses. Therefore, fellow citizens, pray restrain this encroachment so destructive to the inestimable rights the more numerous part of middle-circumstanced citizens now enjoy. With horror beware of the precipice before you; and, if you will, please join me in amending the third Article in the Federal Constitution thus:

"The trial of all civil and criminal causes, except in cases of impeachment (as provided for in Article I, section 3) shall be by jury, drawn by lot out of a box from among the freeholders of that state where Congress shall reside, and within five miles thereof; and, when a crime against the United States has been committed within no state, the Supreme Court of Congress shall have the trial of the same where Congress then resides."

Gazette of the State of Georgia, Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 3, pp. 241–42.

13.2.4.27Cincinnatus, No. 3, November 15, 1787

Sir, Your speech has varnished an iron trap, bated with some illustrious names, to catch the liberties of the people. And this you are pleased to call a constitution — “the best form of government that was ever offered to the world.” May Heaven then have mercy on the world and on us. …

In my former papers, I have shewn, … that the sacred trial by jury, in civil cases, is at best doubtful; and in all cases of appeal expressly taken away. … Upon the omission of the trial by jury in civil cases, you observe — “when this subject was in discussion, we were involved in difficulties which pressed on all sides, and no precedent could be discovered to direct our course. The cases open to trial by jury differed in the different states, it was therefore impracticable on that ground to have made a general rule.” — So, because the extent of the trial by jury varied in the different states, therefore it was proper to abolish it in all. For what else can your words — “it was impracticable to have made a general rule” mean? — If ever the rule is made, it must be general. And if this is impracticable — it surely follows, that in the foederal court we must go without it in civil cases. What sense is there in supposing, that what, for the reasons you alledge, was impracticable with the Convention, will be practicable with the Congress? What faculty can the one body have more than the other, of reconciling contradictions? … It is not possible to say, that the Convention could not have proposed, that there should be one similar general mode of trial by jury in the Fœderal court in all cases whatever. If the states would not have acceded to the proposition, we should only be where we are. And that this trial by jury is best, even in courts where the civil law process now prevails, I think no unbigoted man can doubt. …

13.2.4.28Letter, November 21, 1787

… The State of Rhode-Island refused to send delegates to the State Convention, and the event has manifested that their refusal was a happy one, as the New Constitution, which the Convention has proposed to us, is an elective monarchy, which is proverbially the worst government. … [T]he supreme continental court is to have, almost in every case, “appellate jurisdiction both as to law and fact,” which signifies, if there is any meaning in words, the setting aside the trial by jury; … Our correspondent, therefore, thinks it the part of wisdom to abide, like the state of Rhode-Island, by the old articles of confederation, which, if reexamined with attention, we shall find worthy of great regard. …

13.2.4.29Demosthenes Minor, November 22, 1787

Article 3, section 1. The comments made upon this Article are merely vain exclamations against the Constitution for abolishing the trial by jury. In civil cases, surely, all causes that should be determined by a court of equity do not require the intervention of that tribunal. …

13.2.4.30A Countryman, No. 2, November 22, 1787

Of a very different nature, tho' only one degree better than the other reasoning, is all that sublimity of nonsense and alarm, that has been thundered against it in every shape of metaphoric terror, on the subject of a bill of rights, the liberty of the press, rights of conscience, rights of taxation and election, trials in the vicinity, freedom of speech, trial by jury, and a standing army. These last are undoubtedly important points, much too important to depend on mere paper protection. For, guard such privileges by the strongest expressions, still if you leave the legislative and executive power in the hands of those who are or may be disposed to deprive you of them — you are but slaves. Make an absolute monarch — give him the supreme authority, and guard as much as you will by bills of right, your liberty of the press, and trial by jury; — he will find means either to take them from you, or to render them useless.

Your General Assembly under your present constitution are supreme. They may keep troops on foot in the most profound peace, if they think proper. They have heretofore abridged the trial by jury in some cases, and they can again in all. They can restrain the press, and may lay the most burdensome taxes if they please, and who can forbid? But still the people are perfectly safe that not one of these events shall take place so long as the members of the General Assembly are as much interested, and interested in the same manner, as the other subjects.

On examining the new proposed constitution, there can not be a question, but that there is authority enough lodged in the proposed federal Congress, if abused, to do the greatest injury. And it is perfectly idle to object to it, that there is no bill of rights, or to propose to add to it a provision that a trial by jury shall in no case be omitted, or to patch it up by adding a stipulation in favor of the press, or to guard it by removing the paltry objection to the right of Congress to regulate the time and manner of elections.

… The judicial powers of the Fœderal Courts have, also, been grossly misrepresented. It is said "that the trial by jury is to be abolished, and the courts of the several states are to be annihilated." But these, Sir, are mistaken notions, scandalous perversions of truth. The courts of judicature in each state will still continue in their present situation. The trial by jury in all disputes between man and man in each state will still remain inviolate, and in all cases of this description, there can be no appeal to the Fœderal Courts. It is only in particular specified cases, of which each state cannot properly take cognizance, that the judicial authority of the Fœderal Courts can be exercised. Even in the congressional courts of judicature, the trial of all crimes except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury. How then can any man say that the trial by jury will be abolished, and that the courts of the several states will be annihilated by the adoption of the Fœderal Government? Must not the man who makes this assertion be either consummately impudent, or consummately ignorant? My God! what can he mean by such bareface representations? Can he be the friend to his country? Can he be a friend to the happiness of mankind? Is he not some insidious foe? Some emissary, hired by British Gold — plotting the ruin of both, by disseminating the seeds of suspicion and discontent among us?

… 1st. The judicial power of the United States underwent a full investigation—it is impossible for me to Detail the observations that were delivered on that subject—The right of tryal by Jury was left open and undefined from the difficulty attending any limitation to so valuable a priviledge, and from the persuasion that Congress might hereafter make provision more suitable to each respective State — To suppose that mode of Tryal intended to be abolished would be to suppose the Representatives in Convention to act contrary to the Will of their Constituents, and Contrary to their own Interest. —

… Last week I endeavoured to evince, that the only surety you could have for your liberties must be in the nature of your government; that you could derive no security from bills of rights, or stipulations, on the subject of … trial by jury, or on any other subject. Did you ever hear of an absolute monarchy, where those rights which are proposed by the pygmy politicians of this day, to be secured by stipulation, were ever preserved? Would it not be mere trifling to make any such stipulations, in any absolute monarchy?

On the other hand, if your interest and that of your rulers are the same, your liberties are abundantly secure. …

No people can be more secure against tyranny and oppression in their rulers than you are at present; and no rulers can have more supreme and unlimited authority than your general assembly have.

Sir [James Wilson], In my former observations on your speech, to your fellow-citizens, explanatory and defensive of the new constitution; it has appeared, by arguments to my judgment unanswerable, that by ratifying the constitution, as the convention proposed it, the people will leave the liberty of the press, and the trial by jury, in civil cases, to the mercy of their rulers —

… Do not the several states harmonize in trial by jury of the vicinage. … Are not these the great principles on which every constitution is founded? In these the laws and habits of the several states are uniform.

13.2.4.36Essay by One of the Common People, December 3, 1787

Never was the trial by jury in civil cases thought so lightly of in America as at this day: we have bled for it, and are now almost ready to trifle it away — because in cases of default (which implies a consent of parties) there is no trial by jury, we must give up that inestimable privilege in all civil cases whatever. — This is fine reasoning sure; because we will not have a jury when we do not want them, we shall not when we do — This gentleman cannot be serious when he asserts, that "if it were to be expressed what civil causes should be tried by jury, it might take a volume of laws, instead of an article of rights;" If it did I would have the volume, rather than hazard the priviledge. — But I will ask whether it requires this volume of laws to express that privilege in our state constitution? and whether there would be any difficulty in having it declared, that the citizens of each state shall enjoy it conformably to the usage in the state where the tribunal shall be established? he says, "doubtless congress will make some general regulations in this matter," but it will be well to recollect that they may unmake them, or not make them too, if they please, and when they please; but if it is a part of the constitution, the people alone will have the power to change or annul it. — It is too great a privilege to be left at loose. I sincerely believe if the federal constitution which shall be given, be clearly defined, and a boundary line be marked out, declaratory of the extent of their jurisdiction, of the rights which the state hold [sic] unalienable, and the privilege which the citizens thereof can never part with, the republick of America will last for ages, and be free.

Boston Gazette, Storing, vol. 4, p. 122.

13.2.4.37Philadelphiensis, No. 3, December 5, 1787

… The only thing in which a government should be efficient, is to protect the liberties, lives, and property of the people governed, from foreign and domestic violence. This, and this only is what every government should do effectually. For any government to do more than this is impossible, and every one that falls short of it is defective. Let us now compare the new constitution with this legitimate definition of an efficient government, and we shall find that it has scarce a particle of an efficient government in its whole composition.

In the first place then it does not protect the people in those liberties and privileges that all freemen should hold sacred — The liberty of conscience, the liberty of the press, the liberty of trial by jury, &c. are all unprotected by this constitution.

13.2.4.38Cumberland County Petition to the Pennsylvania Convention, December 5, 1787

Secondly: … This, as we conceive, unlimited powers given to Congress, in which they are to be the judges of what laws shall be necessary and proper, uncontrolled by a bill of rights, submits every right of the people of these states, both civil and sacred to the disposal of Congress, who may exercise their power to the expulsion of the jury — trial in civil causes — to the total suppression of the liberty of the press; and to setting up and establishing of a cruel tyranny, if they should be so disposed, over all the dearest and most sacred rights of the citizens.

13.2.4.39The People: Unconstitutionalism, December 10, 1787

We know of no reason why they should interfere with our common law courts (which have stood an hundred and fifty years equal in rectitude to any in the world) and impose upon us a court of appeals in the common law to judge in equity law and fact denying the benefit of a jury, on credit the only security of property to the common or poor people; and as it is the only thing that has saved the British people from tyranny, we think it is the only thing that will save us as to that high court.

Middlesex Gazette, Jensen, vol. 3, pp. 494–95.

13.2.4.40Address and Reasons of Dissent of the Minority of the Pennsylvania Convention, December 12, 1787

The first consideration that this review suggests, is the omission of a BILL of RIGHTS, ascertaining and fundamentally establishing those unalienable and personal rights of men, without the full, free, and secure enjoyment of which there can be no liberty, and over which it is not necessary for a good government to have the controul. The principal of which are the rights of conscience, personal liberty by the clear and unequivocal establishment of the writ of habeas corpus, jury trial in civil and criminal cases; … the stipulations heretofore made in favor of them in the state constitutions, are entirely superseded by this constitution.

We have before noticed the judicial power as it would effect a consolidation of the states into one government; we will now examine it, as it would affect the liberties and welfare of the people, supposing such a government were practicable and proper.

The judicial power, under the proposed constitution, is founded on the well-known principles of the civil law, by which the judge determines both on law and fact, and appeals are allowed from the inferior tribunals to the superior, upon the whole question; so that facts as well as law, would be reexamined, and even new facts brought forward in the court of appeals; and to use the words of a very eminent Civilian. — “The cause is many times another thing before the court of appeals, than what it was at the time of the first sentence.”

That this mode of proceeding is the one which must be adopted under this constitution, is evident from the following circumstances: — 1st. That the trial by jury, which is the grand characteristic of the common law, is secured by the constitution, only in criminal cases. — 2d. That the appeal from both law and fact is expressly established, which is utterly inconsistent with the principles of common law, and trials by jury. The only mode in which an appeal from law and fact can be established, is, by adopting the principles and practice of the civil law; unless the United States should be drawn into the absurdity of calling and swearing juries, merely for the purpose of contradicting their verdicts, which would render juries contemptible and worse than useless. — 3d. That the courts to be established would decide on all cases of law and equity, which is a well known characteristic of the civil law. …

Not to enlarge upon the loss of the invaluable right of trial by an unbiased jury, so dear to every friend of liberty, the monstrous expense and inconveniences of the mode of proceedings to be adopted, are such as will prove intolerable to the people of this country. … We abhor the idea of losing the transcendent privilege of trial by jury, with the loss of which, it is remarked by the same learned author, that in Sweden, the liberties of the commons were extinguished by an aristocratic senate: and that trial by jury and the liberty of the people went out together.

13.2.4.41A Countryman, No. 5, December 20, 1787

… The great power and influence of an hereditary monarch of Britain has spread many alarms, from an apprehension that the commons would sacrifice the liberties of the people to the money or influence of the crown: But the influence of a powerful hereditary monarch, with the national Treasury — Army — and fleet at his command — and the whole executive government — and one third of the legislative in his hands, — constantly operating on a house of commons, whose duration is never less than seven years, unless this same monarch should end it, (which he can do in an hour) has never yet been sufficient to obtain one vote of the house of commons which has taken from the people the liberty of the press, — trial by jury, — the rights of conscience, or of private property.

— Can you then apprehend danger of oppression and tyranny from too great duration of the power of your rulers.

13.2.4.42Reply to George Mason's Objections to a Constitution, December 19 and 26, 1787

… Another important and weighty objection brought against the Constitution is that there is no security for the right of trial by jury in civil cases. The right of trial by jury most certainly is not taken away, neither is there anything in the Constitution that looks to that point; it is altogether left to the general government to dilate the subject as they please. It is in their power, by a law to be enacted for that purpose, to suit the temper and dispositions of the different states as they please. … The appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, I acknowledge, is both of law and fact; but this by no means excludes the idea of trial by jury. … The people are terrified with the idea that by means of this constitutional plan, justice will be unattainable here, as it is in England. If we can hope to have civil justice administered here to as great perfection and with as much integrity as it is in England, I will be content. … There is no part of the world wherein the laws relating to property are more judiciously and ably administered than in the courts of Great Britain. Had their conduct in every other department been equally wise and conducted with equal integrity, the good people of America would not this day been [sic] forming a government for themselves.

… But you will say, that trial by jury, is an unalienable right, that ought not to be trusted with our rulers. Why not? If it is such a darling privilege, will not Congress be as fond of it, as their constituents? An elevation into that Council, does not render a man insensible to his privileges, nor place him beyond the necessity of securing them. A member of Congress is liable to all the operations of law, except during his attendance on public business; and should he consent to a law, annihilating any right whatever, he deprives himself, his family and estate, of the benefit resulting from that right, as well as his constituents. This circumstance alone, is a sufficient security.

But, why this outcry about juries? If the people esteem them so highly, why do they ever neglect them, and suffer the trial by them to go into disuse? In some States, Courts of Admiralty have no juries — nor Courts of Chancery at all. In the City-Courts of some States, juries are rarely or never called, altho' the parties may demand them; and one State, at least, has lately passed an act, empowering the parties to submit both law and fact to the Court. It is found, that the judgment of a Court, gives as much satisfaction, as the verdict of a jury, as the Court are as good judges of fact, as juries, and much better judges of law. I have no desire to abolish trials by jury, although the original design and excellence of them, is in many cases superseded. — While the people remain attached to this mode of deciding causes, I am confident, that no Congress can wrest the privilege from them.

13.2.4.44 John Nicholson, Petition Against Confirmation of the Ratification of the Constitution, January 1788

That your petitioners are much alarmed at an instrument called a Constitution for the United States of America; framed by a Convention which had been appointed by several of the states, "solely to revise the Articles of the Confederation, and report such alterations and provisions therein as should when agreed to in Congress, And confirmed by the several states, render the Federal Constitution Adequate to the exigencies of government, and the preservation of the Union" inasmuch as the liberties, lives and property of your petitioners are not secured thereby.

That the powers therein proposed to be granted to the government of the United States are too great, and that the proposed distribution of those powers are dangerous and inimical to liberty and equality amongst the people. …

That the right of trial by jury should be secured both in civil and criminal cases.

13.2.4.45 A Citizen of New Haven, January 7, 1788

[N]or is their any thing in the constitution to deprive them of trial by jury in cases where that mode of trial has been heretofore used. All cases in the courts of common law between citizens of the same state, except those claiming lands under grants of different states, must be finally decided by the courts of the state to which they belong, so that it is not probable that more than one citizen to a thousand will ever have a cause that can come before a federal court.

Fathers, Friends, Countrymen, Brethren, and Fellow Citizens, The happiness and existence of America being now suspended upon your wise deliberations; three or four sly Aristocrats having lashed the public passions, like wild horses, to the car of Legislation, and driving us all in the midst of political clouds of error, into that ditch of despotism lately dug by the Convention: Such dismal circumstances have induced a private citizen to lay before you, in as concise a manner as possible, the objections that have been made, by the Pennsylvania Secession, Brutus, Cato, Cincinnatus, Farmer, An Officer, &c. &c. our best men.

26. It allows of other modes of trial besides that by jury, and of course this is abolished: such modes will be instituted under the direction of Congress, as will leave offenders, traitors, malcontents, or such of us as fall under the lash, no chance at all.

13.2.4.47The Federal Farmer, No. 15, January 18, 1788

As the trial by jury is provided for in criminal causes, I shall confine my observations to civil causes — and in these, I hold it is the established right of the jury by the common law, and the fundamental laws of this country, to give a general verdict in all cases when they chuse to do it, to decide both as to law and fact, whenever blended together in the issue put to them.

But it is said, that no words could be found by which the states could agree to establish the jury-trial in civil causes. I can hardly believe men to be serious, who make observations to this effect. The states have all derived judicial proceedings principally from one source, the British system; from the same common source the American lawyers have almost universally drawn their legal information. All the states have agreed to establish the trial by jury, in civil as well as in criminal causes. The several states, in congress, found no difficulty in establishing it in the Western Territory, in the ordinance passed in July 1787.

Storing, vol. 2, pp. 319–21.

13.2.4.48The Federalist, No. 41, January 19, 1788

Had no other enumeration or definition of the powers of the Congress been found in the Constitution than the general expressions just cited, the authors of the objection might have had some color for it; though it would have been difficult to find a reason for so awkward a form of describing an authority to legislate in all possible cases. A power to destroy the freedom of the press, the trial by jury, or even to regulate the course of descents, or the forms of conveyances, must be very singularly expressed by the terms "to raise money for the general welfare."

Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 15, p. 424.

The trial by jury in criminal as well as in civil causes, has long been considered as one of our fundamental rights, and has been repeatedly recognized and confirmed by most of the state conventions. But the constitution expressly establishes this trial in criminal, and wholly omits it in civil causes. The jury trial in criminal causes, and the benefit of the writ of habeas corpus, are already as effectually established as any of the fundamental or essential rights of the people in the United States. … [I]nstead of establishing it in criminal causes only; we ought to establish it generally; — instead of the clause of forty or fifty words relative to this subject, why not use the language that has always been used in this country, and say, "the people of the United States shall always be entitled to the trial by jury." This would shew the people still hold the right sacred, and enjoin it upon congress substantially to preserve the jury trial in all cases, according to the usage and custom of the country. I have observed before, that it is the jury trial we want; the little different appendages and modifications tacked to it in the different states, are no more than a drop in the ocean: the jury trial is a solid uniform feature in a free government; it is the substance we would save, not the little articles of form.

Security against expost [sic] facto laws, the trial by jury, and the benefits of the writs of habeas corpus, are but a part of those inestimable rights the people of the United States are entitled to, even in judicial proceedings, by the course of the common law. These may be secured in general words, as in New-York, the Western Territory, &c. by declaring the people of the United States shall always be entitled to judicial proceedings according to the course of the common law, as used and established in the said states. Perhaps it would be better to enumerate the particular essential rights the people are entitled to in these proceedings, as has been done in many of the states, and as has been done in England. … We certainly, in federal processes, might as well claim the benefits of the writ of habeas corpus, as to claim trial by a jury — the right to have council — to have witnesses face to face — to be secure against unreasonable search warrants, &c. was the constitution silent as to the whole of them: — but the establishment of the former, will evince that we could not claim them without it; and the omission of the latter, implies they are relinquished, or deemed of no importance. These are rights and benefits individuals acquire by compact; they must claim them under compacts, or immemorial usage — it is doubtful, at least, whether they can be claimed under immemorial usage in this country; and it is, therefore, we generally claim them under compacts, as charters and constitutions.

Storing, vol. 2, pp. 325–26.

13.2.4.50Philadelphiensis, No. 18, January 23, 1788

… But the matter now in debate has no relation to that: the men opposed to the new constitution have the same cause to defend, that the people of America had during the period of a seven years war. Who is he so base, that will peaceably submit to a government that will eventually destroy his sacred rights and privileges? The liberty of conscience, the liberty of the press, the liberty of trial by jury, &c. must lie at the mercy of a few despots — an infernal junto, that are for changing our free republican government into a tyrannical and absolute monarchy. These are what roused the sons of America to oppose Britain, and from the nature of things, they must have a similar effect now.

The institution of trial by jury has been sanctified by the experience of ages. It has been recognised by the constitution of every state in the union. It is deemed the birthright of Americans; and it is imagined, that liberty cannot subsist without it. The proposed plan expressly adopts it, for the decision of all criminal accusations, except impeachment; and is silent with respect to the determination of facts in civil causes.

The inference, hence drawn by many, is not warranted by the premises. By recognising the jury trial in criminal cases, the constitution effectually provides, that it shall prevail, so long as the constitution itself shall remain unimpaired and unchanged. But, from the great variety of civil cases, arising under this plan of government, it would be unwise and impolitic to say ought about it, in regard to these. Is there not a great variety of cases, in which this trial is taken away in each of the states? Are there not many more cases, where it is denied in England? For the convention to ascertain in what cases it shall prevail, and in what others it may be expedient to prefer other modes, was impracticable. On this subject, a future congress is to decide; and I see no foundation under Heaven for the opinion, that congress will despise the known prejudices and inclination of their countrymen. A very ingenious writer of Philadelphia has mentioned the objections without deigning to refute that, which he conceives to have originated "in sheer malice." —

Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 15, p. 536.

13.2.4.52Luther Martin, Genuine Information, No. 10, February 1, 1788

… And in all those cases where the general government has jurisdiction in civil questions, the proposed constitution not only makes no provision for the trial by jury in the first instance, but by its appellate jurisdiction absolutely takes away that inestimable privilege, since it expressly declares the supreme court shall have appellate jurisdiction both as to law and fact. — Should, therefore, a jury be adopted in the inferior court, it would only be a needless expence, since on an appeal the determination of that jury even on questions of fact, however honest and upright, is to be of no possible effect — the supreme court is to take up all questions of fact — to examine the evidence relative thereto — to decide upon them in the same manner as if they had never been tried by a jury —…

Thus, Sir, jury trials, which have ever been the boast of the English constitution, which have been by our several State constitutions so cautiously secured to us, — jury trials which have so long been considered the surest barrier against arbitrary power, and the palladium of liberty, — with the loss of which the loss of our freedom may be dated, are taken away by the proposed form of government, not only in a great variety of questions between individual and individual, but in every case whether civil or criminal arising under the laws of the United States or the execution of those laws. — It is taken away in those very cases where of all others it is most essential for our liberty, to have it sacredly guarded and preserved — in every case whether civil or criminal, between government and its officers on the one part and the subject or citizen on the other. — Nor was this the effect of inattention, nor did it arise from any real difficulty in establishing and securing jury trial by the proposed constitution, if the convention had wished so to do — But the same reason influenced here as in the case of the establishment of inferior courts; — as they could not trust State judges, so would they not confide in State juries. — They alleged that the general government and the State governments would always be at variance — that the citizens of the different States would enter into the views and interests of their respective States, and therefore ought not to be trusted in determining causes in which the general government was any way interested, without giving the general government an opportunity, if it disapproved the verdict of the jury, to appeal, and to have the facts examined into again and decided upon by its own judges, on whom it was thought a reliance might be had by the general government, they being appointed under its authority.

13.2.4.53Philadelphiensis, No. 9, February 6, 1788

To such lengths have these bold conspirators carried their scheme of despotism, that your most sacred rights and privileges are surrendered at discretion. When government thinks proper, under the pretence of writing a libel, &c. it may imprison, inflict the most cruel and unusual punishment, seize property, carry on prosecutions, &c. and the unfortunate citizen has no magna charta, no bill of rights, to protect him; nay, the prosecution may be carried on in such a manner that even a jury will not be allowed him.

13.2.4.54An Old Whig, No. 8, February 6, 1788

First then, the general expectation seems to be that our future rulers will rectify all that is amiss. If a bill of rights is wanting, they will frame a bill of rights. If too much power is vested in them, they will not abuse it; nay, they will divest themselves of it. The very first thing they will do, will be to establish the liberties of the people by good and wholesome ordinances, on so solid a foundation as to baffle all future encroachments from themselves or their successors. Much good no doubt might be done in this way; if Congress should possess the most virtuous inclinations, yet there are some things which it will not be in their power to rectify. For instance; the appellate jurisdiction both as to law and fact, which is given to the supreme court of the continent, and which annihilates the trial by jury in all civil causes, the Congress can only modify: — They cannot extinguish this power, so destructive to the principles of real liberty. It would not by any means be extravagant to say, that a new continental convention ought to be called, if it were only for the sake of preserving that sacred palladium — THE INESTIMABLE RIGHT OF TRIAL BY JURY.

… Again; how could the stripping people [sic] of the right of trial by jury conduce to the strength of the state? Do we find the government in England at all weakened by the people retaining the right of trial by jury? Far from

it. Yet these things which merely tend to oppress the people, without conducing at all to the strength of the state, are the last which aristocratic rulers would consent to restore to the people; because they encrease the personal power and importance of the rulers.

The same accounts say, that the British merchants are very much pleased with this scheme of government; they are laughing in their sleeves, at the prospect of now having it in their power to collect all their old American debts with interest: for foreigners are by the 2d article of the new constitution, allowed to sue in the courts of Congress, and to drag the citizens of America from the remotest parts of the continent, on an appeal to the supreme court at the national seat of government, where jury trial in civil cases is abolished: hitherto juries have been favorable to fellow citizens, they have considered their distresses; but a court of law will not attend to such trifles.

It seems to be generally admitted, that the system of Government which has been proposed by the late Convention, is well calculated to relieve us from many of the grievances under which we have been laboring. If I might express my particular sentiments on this subject, I should describe it as more free and more perfect than any form of government that ever has been adopted by any nation; but I would not say it has no faults. Imperfection is inseparable from every human device. Several objections were made to this system by two or three very respectable characters in the Convention, which have been the subject of much conversation; and other objections, by citizens of this State, have lately reached our ears. It is proper that you should consider of these objections. They are of two kinds; they respect the things that are in the system, and the things that are not in it. We are told that there should have been a section for securing the Trial by Jury in Civil cases, … that there should also have been a Declaration of Rights. In the new system it is provided, that "The trial of all crimes, except in cases of Impeachment," shall be by Jury, but this provision could not possibly be extended to all Civil cases. For it is well known that the Trial by Jury is not general and uniform throughout the United States, … hence it became necessary to submit the question to the General Legislature, who might accommodate their laws on this occasion to the desires and habits of the nation. Surely there is no prohibition in a case that is untouched.

I believe, it is acknowledged that the establishment of excises has been one of the greatest grievances, under which the English nation has labored for almost a century and an half. … If this branch of revenue takes place, all the consequent rigour of excise laws will necessarily be introduced in order to enforce a due collection. On any charges or offence in this instance you will see yourselves deprived of your boasted trial by jury. The much admired common law process will give way to some quick and summary mode, by which the unhappy defendant will find himself reduced, perhaps to ruin, in less time than a charge could be exhibited against him in the usual course. …

And what is that "appellate jurisdiction both as to law and fact," but an establishment, which may in effect operate as original jurisdiction?—Or what is an appeal to enquire into facts after a solemn adjudication in any court below, but a trial de novo? … Add to all, that this high prerogative court establishes no fundamental rule of proceeding, except that the trial by jury is allowed in some criminal cases. All other cases are left open—and subject "to such regulations as the Congress shall make." — Under these circumstances I beseech you all, as citizens of Virginia, to consider seriously whether you will not endanger the solemn trial by jury, which you have long revered, as a sacred barrier against injustice—which has been established by your ancestors many centuries ago, and transmitted to you, as one of the greatest bulwarks of civil liberty — which you have to this day maintained inviolate: — I beseech you, I say, as members of this commonwealth, to consider whether you will not be in danger of losing this inestimable mode of trial in all those cases, wherein the constitution does not provide for its security. Nay, does not that very provision, which is made, by being confined to a few particular cases, almost imply a total exclusion of the rest? Let it, then, be a reflection deeply impressed on your minds — that if this noble privilege, which by long experience has been found the most exquisite method of determining controversies according to the scale of equal liberty, should once be taken away, it is unknown what new species of trial may be substituted in its room. Perhaps you may be surprised with some strange piece of judicial polity, — some arbitrary method, perhaps confining all trials to the entire decision of the magistracy, and totally excluding the great body of the people from any share in the administration of public justice.

… For instance, if Congress should pass a law that persons charged with capital crimes shall not have a right to demand the cause or nature of the accusation, shall not be confronted with the accusers or witnesses, or call for evidence in their favor; and a question should arise respecting their authority therein, — can it be said that they have exceeded the limits of their jurisdiction, when that has no limits; when no provision has been made for such a right?

Virginia Independent Chronicle, Storing, vol. 5, pp. 181–83, 185.

13.2.4.58Brutus, No. 14, February 28 and March 6, 1788

The second paragraph of sect. 2d. art. 3. …

It has been the fate of this clause, as it has of most of those, against which unanswerable objections have been offered, to be explained different ways, by the advocates and opponents to the constitution. I confess I do not know what the advocates of the system, would make it mean, for I have not been fortunate enough to see in any publication this clause taken up and considered. It is certain however, they do not admit the explanation which those who oppose the constitution give it, or otherwise they would not so frequently charge them with want of candor, for alledging that it takes away the trial by jury, appeals from an inferior to a superior court, as practised in the civil law courts, are well understood. In these courts, the judges determine both on the law and the fact; and appeals are allowed from the inferior to the superior courts, on the whole merits: the superior tribunal will reexamine all the facts as well as the law, and frequently new facts will be introduced, so as many times to render the cause in the court of appeals very different from what it was in the court below.

It may still be insisted that this clause does not take away the trial by jury on appeals, but that this may be provided for by the legislature, under that paragraph which authorises them to form regulations and restrictions for the court in the exercise of this power.

… But supposing the Congress may under this clause establish the trial by jury on appeals. It does not seem to me that it will render this article much less exceptionable. An appeal from one court and jury, to another court and jury, is a thing altogether unknown in the laws of our state, and in most states in the union. A practice of this kind prevails in the eastern states; actions are there commenced in the inferior courts, and an appeal lies from them on the whole merits to the superior courts: the consequence is well known, very few actions are determined in the lower courts; it is rare that a case of any importance is not carried by appeal to the supreme court, and the jurisdiction of the inferior courts is merely nominal; this has proved so burthensome to the people in Massachusetts, that it was one of the principal causes which excited the insurrection in that state, in the year past; very few sensible and moderate men in that state but what will admit, that the inferior courts are almost entirely useless, and answer very little purpose, save only to accumulate costs against the poor debtors who are already unable to pay their just debts.

This method would preserve the good old way of administering justice, would bring justice to every man’s door, and preserve the inestimable right of trial by jury. It would be following, as near as our circumstances will admit, the practice of the courts in England, which is almost the only thing I would wish to copy in their government.

But as this system now stands, their is to be as many inferior courts as Congress may see fit to appoint, who are to be authorised to originate and in the first instance to try all the cases falling under the description of this article; there is no security that a trial by jury shall be had in these courts, but the trial here will soon become, as it is in Massachusetts’ inferior courts, mere matter of form; for an appeal may be had to the supreme court on the whole merits. This court is to have power to determine in law and in equity, on the law and the fact, and this court is exalted above all other power in the government, subject to no controul, and so fixed as not to be removeable, but upon impeachment, which I shall hereafter shew, is much the same thing as not to be removeable at all.

5. The abolition of trial by jury in civil causes. — This mode of trial the learned Judge Blackstone observes, "has been coeval with the first rudiments of civil government, that property, liberty and life, depend on maintaining in its legal force the constitutional trial by jury." He bids his readers pauze, and with Sir Matthew Hale observes, how admirably this mode is adapted to the investigation of truth beyond any other the world can produce. Even the party who have been disposed to swallow, without examination, the proposals of the secret conclave, have started on a discovery that this essential right was curtailed; and shall a privilege, the origin of which may be traced to our Saxon ancestors — that has been a part of the law of nations, even in the fewdatory systems of France, Germany, and Italy — and from the earliest records has been held so sacred, both in ancient and modern Britain, that it could never be shaken by the introduction of Norman customs, or any other conquests or change of government — shall this inestimable privilege be relinquished in America — either thro' the fear of inquisition for unaccounted thousands of public monies in the hands of some who have been officious in the fabrication of the consolidated system, or from the apprehension that some future delinquent possessed of more power than integrity, may be called to a trial by his peers in the hour of investigation?

13.2.4.60The Landholder, No. 10, February 29, 1788

To the Honourable LUTHER MARTIN, Esq;

Since the publication of the Constitution, every topic of vulgar declamation has been employed to persuade the people, that it will destroy the trial by jury, and is defective for being without a bill of rights. You, Sir, had more candour in the Convention than we can allow to those declaimers out of it; there you never signified by any motion or expression whatsoever, that it stood in need of a bill of rights, or in any wise endangered the trial by jury. In these respects the Constitution met your entire approbation: for had you believed it defective in these essentials, you ought to have mentioned it in Convention, or had you thought that it wanted further guards, it was your indispensable duty to have proposed them. I hope to hear that the same candour that influenced you on this occasion, has induced you to obviate any improper impressions such publications may have excited in your constituents, when you had the honour to appear before the General Assembly.

13.2.4.61Publicola, March 20, 1788

… The constitution of the respective states, and the rights of the people, are to remain as under the confederation, excepting such parts as interfere with the express powers given to Congress by the new constitution. All the clamour therefore, which has been raised about the trial by jury, and the liberty of the press, might have been spared, as altogether unfounded. To those who wish to trust themselves under separate state governments, which may, as they have hitherto done, disregard the recommendations and requisitions of the union, I would recommend an attentive perusal of history, and as they do not seem to place any dependance on the reasoning of their fellow citizens, learn to be wise from the experience of past ages. They will find that in all countries, a strict union among the people, has been the only means of preserving liberty. …

13.2.4.62A Farmer, No. 4, March 21, 1788

… But moreover does not Aristedes, and every lawyer, know that in the interpretation of all political as well as civil laws, this fundamental maxim must be observed, That where there are two objects in contemplation of any legislature, the express adoption of one, is the total exclusion of the other; and that the adoption of juries in civil criminal cases, in every legal interpretation, amounts to be an absolute rejection in civil cases: — If the right of establishing juries, by a Congressional law is admitted at all, it must be admitted, as an inherent legislative right, paramount to the constitution, as it is not derived from it, and then the power that can make, can by law unmake; so that referring this power to a source of authority superior to the act of government, would leave us without any juries at all (even in criminal cases) if Congress should so please; which position can never be the object of either friends or enemies to the system at present. — If it is defective, it is still bad policy to make it worse; but still in every view, we must reflect, that the establishment of trials by jury, belongs to political, not to civil legislation. It includes the right of organizing government, not of regulating the conduct of individuals, as the following enquiry will prove; we must never give an assembly the power of giving itself power.

As the worth and excellence of this mode of trial, preserved and handed down from generation to generation for near two thousand years, has drawn down the enthusiastic encomiums of the most enlightened lawyers and statesmen of every age; as it has taken deep root in the breast of every freeman, encompassed by the defences of affection and veneration, a repetition of its praises would be as tedious as useless: Some remarks however, still remain to be made, which will place this subject in a more important and conspicuous view.

The trial by jury, is the only remaining power which the Commons of England have retained in their own hands, of all that plentitude of authority and freedom, which rendered their northern progenitors irresistible in war, and flourishing in peace. — The usurpations of the few, gradually effected by artifice and force, have robbed the many, of that power which once formed the basis of those governments, so celebrated by mankind. — The government of Sparta, the form of which, it is said, has continued from the days of Lycurgus to our age, preserving its model amidst those overwheming tides of revolution and shipwrecks of governments, which Greece has sustained for near three thousand years; the same form of government among the Saxons and other Germans, consisting of King, Lords and Commons, applauded by Tacitus and Machiavelli, were thus distinguished from the present goverment of England — The power of the Commons resided with them, not in representatives but in the body of the people. — De minoribus rebus, principes consultant; de majoribus omnes, are either the words of Tacitus or Caesar. The administration of ordinary affairs was committed to the select men; but all important subjects were deliberated on by the whole body of the people. — Such was the constitution of Sparta, and of England, when Machiavelli gives them as a model, for there can be no doubt but that the folk-motes of the Saxons were not formed by representation — The venerable remembrance of which assemblies, hung long about the affections of Englishmen, and it was to restore them that they offered such frequent libations of their noblest blood; but the usurpations of the few have been unwearied and irresistible, and the trial by jury is all that now remains to the many.

The trial by jury is — the democratic branch of the judiciary power — more necessary than representatives in legislature; for those usurpations, which silently undermine the spirit of liberty, under the sanction of law, are more dangerous than direct and open legislative attacks; in the one case the treason is never discovered until liberty, and with it the power of defence is lost; the other is an open summons to arms, and then if the people will not defend their rights, they do not deserve to enjoy them.

The judiciary power, has generally been considered as a branch of the executive, because these two powers, have been so frequently united; — but where united, there is no liberty. — in every free State, the judiciary is kept separate, independent, and considered as an intermediate power; — and it certainly partakes more of a legislative, than an executive nature — The sound definition which Delolme applied to one branch may be justly extended to the whole judiciary, — That it is a subordinate legislation in most instance, supplying by analogy, and precedent in each particular case, the defects of general legislative acts, — [W]ithout then the check of the democratic branch — the jury, to ascertain those facts, to which the judge is to apply the law, and even in many cases to determine the cause by a general verdict — the latitude of judicial power, combined with the various and uncertain nature of evidence, will render it impossible to convict a judge of corruption, and ascertain his guilt. — Remove the fear of punishment, give hopes of impunity, and vice and tyranny come scowling from their dark abodes in the human heart. — Destroy juries and every thing is prostrated to judges, who may easily disguise law, by suppressing and varying fact: — Whenever therefore the trial by juries has been abolished, the liberties of the people were soon lost — The judiciary power is immediately absorbed, or placed under the direction of the executive, as example teaches in most of the States of Europe. — So formidable an engine of power, defended only by the gown and the robe, is soon seized and engrossed by the power that wields the sword. — Thus we find the judiciary and executive branches united, or the former totally dependent on the latter in most of the governments in the world. — It is true, where the judges will put on the sword and wield it with success, they will subject both princes and legislature to their despotism, as was the case in the memorable usurpation of the Justizia of Arragon, where the judiciary erected themselves into a frightful tyranny.

Why then shall we risque this important check to judiciary usurpation, provided by the wisdom of antiquity? Why shall we rob the Commons of the only remaining power they have been able to preserve, for their personal exercise? Have they ever abused it? — I know it has and will be said — they have — that they are too ignorant — that they cannot distinguish between right and wrong — that decisions on property are submitted to chance; and that the last word, commonly determines the cause: — There is some truth in these allegations — but whence comes it — The Commons are much degraded in the powers of the mind: — They were deprived of the use of understanding, when they were robbed of the power of employing it. — Men no longer cultivate, what is no longer useful, — should every opportunity be taken away, of exercising their reason, you will reduce them to that state of mental baseness, in which they appear in nine-tenths of this globe — distinguished from brutes, only by form and the articulation of sound — Give them power and they will find understanding to us it — But taking juries with all their real and attributed defects, it is not better to submit a cause to an impartial tribunal, who would at least, as soon do you right as wrong — than for every man to become subservient to government and those in power? — Would any man oppose government, where his property would be wholly at the mercy and decision of those that govern? — We know the influence that property has over the minds of men — they will risque their lives rather than their property; and a government, where there is no trial by jury, has an unlimited command over every man who has any thing to loose. — It is by the attacks on private property through the judiciary, that despotism becomes as irresistible as terrible. I could relate numerous examples of the greatest and best men in all countries, who have been driven to despair, by vexatious lawsuits, commenced at the instigation of the court, of favorites and of minions, and all from the loss of juries. — France was reduced to the brink of destruction in one instance. — The Queen mother Louise of Savoy, piqued at the constable of Bourbon, a young and amiable man, who refused to marry her, commenced a suit against him for all his estate — The judges were ready at the beck of the court, and without a shadow of justice deprived him by law of every shilling he was worth; and drove from this country an unfortunate hero, whose mad revenge carried desolation into her bosom. — In Denmark a despicable minion, who came in rags to the court, after the establishment of their new government, which they solicited Frederick the IIId to make for them, acquired an immense fortune by plunder, sheltered by the favour of the Sovereign. At last he fixed his eyes on a most delightful estate, and offered to buy it — The owner did not want money, and could not think of selling the patrimony of an ancient family; this wretch then spirited up lawsuits against him, and after the most cruel vexations obliged him to sell the estate for much less than he at first offered him. This unfortunate gentleman was driven from the country which gave him birth, and a once happy society of relations and friends. — Such would have been the fate of England, from those courts without juries, which took cognizance of causes arising in the revenues and imports in Charles the first's time, the court fortunately for the liberties of England, seized the bull by the horns, when they attacked that wonderful man John Hampden. He spent 20,000 l. rather than pay an illegal tax of twenty shillings, brought the case before the Parliament, roused the spirit of the nation, and finally overturned courts, King, and even the constitution for many years. These dreadful examples may teach us the importance of juries in civil cases — they may recal [sic] to my countrymen a maxim which their ancestors, as wise, and more virtuous than their posterity, held ever in view — That if the people creep like tortoises, they will still find themselves too fast in giving away power.

… Another privilege which the people possesses at present, and which the new congress will find it their interest to deprive them of, is trial by jury — for of all the powers which the people have wrested from government, this is the most absurd; it is even a gross violation of common sense, and most destructive to energy. In the first place it is absurd, that twelve ignorant plebians, should be constituted judges of a law, which passed through so many learned hands; — first a learned legislature after many learned

animadversions and criticisms have enacted it — Second, learned writers have explained and commented on it. — Third, lawyers twisted, turned and new modeled it — and lastly, a learned judge opened up and explained it. Yet after all these learned discussions, an illiterate jury (who have scarce a right to think for themselves instead of judging for others) must determine whether it applies to the fact or not; and by their verdict the learned judge must be governed in passing sentence; and perhaps a learned gentleman be cast in an action with an insignificant cottager.

Secondly. Common sense recoils at the very idea of such a pernicious practice as this, because it makes no difference between the virtuous and the vicious, the precious and the vile; between those of noble birth, and illustrious descent, and those of base blood, and ignoble obscure pedigree — for an ignorant stupid jury, cannot discern the merit of persons — it is the merits of the cause they examine; which is just reversing the question, and beginning at the wrong end. Thirdly. This custom is fatal to energy, for tho' a law should be expressed in the most pointed terms, a jury may soften and mitigate, and in a great measure destroy the spirit of it. …

13.2.4.64Address of a Minority of the Maryland Convention, May 1, 1788

The great objects of these amendments were, 1st. To secure the trial by jury in all cases, the boasted birthright of Englishmen, and their descendants, and the palladium of civil liberty; and to prevent the appeal from fact, which not only destroys that trial in civil cases, but by construction, may also elude it in criminal cases; a mode of proceeding both expensive and burthensome; and also by blending law with fact, will destroy all check on the judiciary authority, render it almost impossible to convict judges of corruption, and may lay the foundation of that gradual and silent attack on individuals, by which the approaches of tyranny become irresistable.

13.2.4.65The Federalist, No. 81, May 28, 1788

… To avoid all inconveniences, it will be safest to declare generally that the Supreme Court shall possess appellate jurisdiction both as to law and fact, and that this jurisdiction shall be subject to such exceptions and regulations as the national legislature may prescribe. This will enable the government to modify it in such a manner as will best answer the ends of public justice and security.

This view of the matter, at any rate puts it out of all doubt that the supposed abolition of the trial by jury by the operation of this provision is fallacious and untrue. The legislature of the United States would certainly have full power to provide that in appeals to the Supreme Court there should be no reexamination of facts where they had been tried in the original causes by juries. This would certainly be an authorised exception; but if for the reason already intimated it should be thought too extensive, it might be qualified with a limitation to such causes only as are determinable at common law in that mode of trial.

The amount of the observations hitherto made on the authority of the judicial department is this — … that this appellate jurisdiction does, in no case, abolish the trial by jury; and that an ordinary degree of prudence and integrity in the national councils will insure us solid advantages from the establishment of the proposed judiciary, without exposing us to any of the inconveniences which have been predicted from that source.

Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 18, p. 110.

13.2.4.66The Federalist, No. 83, May 28, 1788

The objection to the plan of the convention, which has met with most success in this state, and perhaps in several of the other states, is that relative to the want of a constitutional provision for the trial by jury in civil cases. The disingenuous form in which this objection is usually stated, has been repeatedly adverted to and exposed; but continues to be pursued in all the conversations and writings of the opponents of the plan. The mere silence of the constitution in regard to civil causes, is represented as an abolition of the trial by jury; and the declamations to which it has afforded a pretext, are artfully calculated to induce a persuasion that this pretended abolition is complete and universal; extending not only to every species of civil, but even to criminal causes. To argue with respect to the latter, would, however, be as vain and fruitless, as to attempt the serious proof of the existence of matter, or to demonstrate any of those propositions which by their own internal evidence force conviction, when expressed in language adapted to convey their meaning.

With regard to civil causes, subtleties almost too contemptible for refutation, have been adopted to countenance the surmise that a thing, which is only not provided for, is entirely abolished. Every man of discernment must at once perceive the wide difference between silence and abolition. But as the inventors of this fallacy have attempted to support it by certain legal maxims of interpretation, which they have perverted from their true meaning, it may not be wholly useless to explore the ground they have taken.

The maxims on which they rely are of this nature, “a specification of particulars is an exclusion of generals”; or, “the expression of one thing is the exclusion of another.” Hence, say they, as the constitution has established the trial by jury in criminal cases, and is silent in respect to civil, this silence is an implied prohibition of trial by jury in regard to the latter.

The rules of legal interpretation are rules of common sense, adopted by the courts in the construction of the laws. The true test therefore, of a just application of them, is its conformity to the source from which they are derived. This being the case, let me ask if it is consistent with reason or common sense to suppose, that a provision obliging the legislative power to commit the trial of criminal causes to juries, is a privation of its right to authorise or permit that mode of trial in other cases? Is it natural to suppose, that a command to do one thing, is a prohibition to the doing of another, which there was a previous power to do, and which is not incompatible with the thing commanded to be done? If such a supposition would be unnatural and unreasonable, it cannot be rational to maintain that an injunction of the trial by jury in certain cases is an interdiction of it in others.

A power to constitute courts, is a power to prescribe the mode of trial; and consequently, if nothing was said in the constitution on the subject of juries, the legislature would be at liberty either to adopt that institution, or to let it alone. This discretion in regard to criminal causes is abridged by the express injunction of trial by jury in all such cases; but it is of course left at large in relation to civil causes, there being a total silence on this head. The specification of an obligation to try all criminal causes in a particular mode, excludes indeed the obligation or necessity of employing the same mode in civil causes, but does not abridge the power of the legislature to exercise that mode if it should be thought proper. The pretence therefore, that the national legislature would not be at full liberty to submit all the civil causes of federal cognizance to the determination of juries, is a pretence destitute of all just foundation.

From these observations, this conclusion results, that the trial, by jury in civil cases would not be abolished, and that the use attempted to be made of the maxims which have been quoted, is contrary to reason and common sense, and therefore not admissible. Even if these maxims had a precise technical sense, corresponding with the ideas of those who employ them upon the present occasion, which, however, is not the case, they would still be inapplicable to a constitution of government. In relation to such a subject, the natural and obvious sense of its provisions, apart from any technical rules, is the true criterion of construction.

The friends and adversaries of the plan of the convention, if they agree in nothing else, concur at least in the value they set upon the trial by jury: Or if there is any difference between them, it consists in this; the former regard it as a valuable safeguard to liberty, the latter represent it as the very palladium of free government. For my own part, the more the operation of the institution has fallen under my observation, the more reason I have discovered for holding it in high estimation; and it would be altogether superfluous to examine to what extent it deserves to be esteemed useful or essential in a representative republic, or how much more merit it may be entitled to as a defence against the oppressions of an hereditary monarch, than as a barrier to the tyranny of popular magistrates in a popular government. Discussions of this kind would be more curious than beneficial, as all are satisfied of the utility of the institution, and of its friendly aspect to liberty. But I must acknowledge that I cannot readily discern the inseparable connection between the existence of liberty and the trial by jury in civil cases. Arbitrary impeachments, arbitrary methods of prosecuting pretended offences, and arbitrary punishments upon arbitrary convictions have ever appeared to me to be the great engines of judicial despotism; and these have all relation to criminal proceedings. The trial by jury in criminal cases, aided by the habeas corpus act, seems therefore to be alone concerned in the question. And both of these are provided for in the most ample manner in the plan of the convention.

It is evident that it can have no influence upon the legislature, in regard to the amount of the taxes to be laid, to the objects upon which they are to be imposed, or to the rule by which they are to be apportioned. If it can have any influence therefore, it must be upon the mode of collection, and the conduct of the officers entrusted with the execution of the revenue laws.

As to the mode of collection in this state, under our own constitution, the trial by jury is in most cases out of use. …

And as to the conduct of the officers of the revenue, the provision in favor of trial by jury in criminal cases, will afford the security aimed at. Wilful abuses of a public authority, to the oppression of the subject, and every species of official extortion, are offences against the government; for which, the persons who commit them, may be indicted and punished according to the circumstances of the case.

The excellence of the trial by jury in civil cases, appears to depend on circumstances foreign to the preservation of liberty. The strongest argument in its favour is, that it is a security against corruption. As there is always more time and better opportunity to tamper with a standing body of magistrates than with a jury summoned for the occasion, there is room to suppose, that a corrupt influence would more easily find its way to the former than to the latter. The force of this consideration, is however, diminished by others. The sheriff who is the summoner of ordinary juries, and the clerks of courts who have the nomination of special juries, are themselves standing officers, and acting individually, may be supposed more accessible to the touch of corruption than the judges, who are a collective body. It is not difficult to see that it would be in the power of those officers to select jurors who would serve the purpose of the party as well as a corrupted bench. In the next place, it may fairly be supposed that there would be less difficulty in gaining some of the jurors promiscuously taken from the public mass, than in gaining men who had been chosen by the government for their probity and good character. But making every deduction for these considerations the trial by jury must still be a valuable check upon corruption. It greatly multiplies the impediments to its success. As matters now stand, it would be necessary to corrupt both court and jury; for where the jury have gone evidently wrong, the court will generally grant a new trial, and it would be in most cases of little use to practice upon the jury, unless the court could be likewise gained. Here then is a double security; and it will readily be perceived that this complicated agency tends to preserve the purity of both institutions. By increasing the obstacles to success it discourages attempts to seduce the integrity of either. The temptations to prostitution, which the judges might have to surmount, must certainly be much fewer while the co-operation of a jury is necessary, than they might be if they had themselves the exclusive determination of all causes.

Notwithstanding therefore the doubts I have expressed as to the essentiality of trial by jury, in civil cases, to liberty, I admit that it is in most cases, under proper regulations, an excellent method of determining questions of property; and that on this account alone it would be entitled to a constitutional provision in its favour, if it were possible to fix the limits within which it ought to be comprehended. There is however, in all cases, great difficulty in this; and men not blinded by enthusiasm, must be sensible that in a federal government which is a composition of societies whose ideas and institutions in relation to the matter materially vary from each other, that difficulty must be not a little augmented. For my own part, at every new view I take of the subject, I become more convinced of the reality of the obstacles, which we are authoritatively informed, prevented the insertion of a provision on this head in the plan of the convention.

From this sketch it appears, that there is a material diversity as well in the modification as in the extent of the institution of trial by jury in civil cases in the several states; and from this fact, these obvious reflections flow. First, that no general rule could have been fixed upon by the convention which would have corresponded with the circumstances of all the states; and secondly, that more, or at least as much might have been hazarded, by taking the system of any one state for a standard, as by omitting a provision altogether, and leaving the matter as it has been left, to legislative regulation.

13.2.4.67The Federalist, No. 84, May 28, 1788

[T]he Constitution proposed by the convention contains, as well as the constitution of this state, a number of such provisions [in favor of rights and privileges].

Independent of those which relate to the structure of the government, we find the following: … Article 3, section 2, clause 3 “The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury; and such trial shall be held in the State where the said crimes shall have been committed; but when not committed within any State, the trial shall be at such place or places as the Congress may by law have directed."

13.2.4.68A [New Hampshire] Farmer, No. 3, June 6, 1788

I shall now make some observations on the unjust and illiberal sarcasms, passed by Mr. Alfredus, on our jurors: — And, as he has such a peculiar nack of leaping over important things, by saying "they are nothing to the purpose," or by stigmatizing them, "as impertinent observations, groundless assertions," etc. I shall copy his own words, and then follow, with the sentiments of the Hon. Justice Blackstone, who is one of the most celebrated Authors now extant.

Sir, in your publication of Friday, January 18th, ult. you say, "What are the advantages of this boasted trial by jury, and on which side do they lie? Not certainly on the side of justice, for one unprincipled juror, secured in the interest of the opposite party, will frequently divert her course, and in four cases out of five where injustice is done, it is by the ignorance or knavery of the jury." This, I may venture to affirm, is an impudent and bold stroke; it attacks the whole community at once, and has a tendency to sap and undermine the best preservative of liberty, and therefore ought to be held in abhorrence by every freeman; it is totally repugnant to the sense of the best writers on the subject, and especially to the ideas of the renowned author above mentioned, whose sentiments I shall now quote, vol. 3, page 378. "When the jury have delivered in their verdict, and it is recorded in court, that ends the trial by jury; a trial which besides the other vast advantages which we have occasionally observed in its progress, is also as expeditious and cheap as it is convenient, equitable and certain: upon these accounts — the trial by jury has been, as I trust ever will be looked upon as the glory of the English law; and if it has so great an advantage over individuals in regulating civil property, how much must that advantage be heightened, when it is applied to criminal cases; it is the most transcendant privilege which any subject can enjoy or wish for; he cannot be affected either in his property, his liberty or his person, but by the unanimous consent of twelve of his neighbors and equals; a Constitution that I may venture to affirm has, under Providence, secured the just liberties of the English nation for a long succession of ages; and therefore a celebrated French writer (Montesque) who concludes, that because Rome, Sparta, and Carthage have lost their liberties, therefore those of England in time must perish, should have recollected that Rome, Sparta and Carthage, at the time when their liberties were lost, were strangers to the trial by jury.

Great as this eulogium may seem, it is no more than this admirable Constitution, when traced to its principles, will be found, in sober reason, to deserve. The impartial administration of justice, which secures both our persons and properties, is the great end of civil society; but if that be entirely entrusted to the magistracy of a select body of men, and those generally selected by the Prince, or those who enjoy the highest offices in the state, their decision, in spite of their own natural integrity, will have frequently an involuntary bias toward those of their own rank and dignity; here therefore, a competent number of sensible and upright jurymen, chosen by lot from among those of the middle rank, will be found the best investigators of truth, and the surest guardians of public justice; for the most powerful individual in the state, will be cautious of committing any flagrant invasion of another's right, when he knows that the fact of his oppression, must be examined, and decided by twelve indifferent men, not appointed till near the hour of trial: and that, when once the fact is ascertained, the law must of course redress it—This therefore preserves, in the hands of the people, that share which they ought to have, in the administration of public justice; and prevents the encroachments of the more powerful and wealthy citizens.

Every new tribunal erected for the decision of facts, without the intervention of a jury, whether composed of justices of the peace; commissioners of the revenue; judges of a court of conscience; or any other standing magistrate, is a step towards establishing aristocracy, the most oppressive of absolute government. It is, therefore, upon the whole, the duty which every man owes to his country, his friends, his posterity, and himself, to maintain to the utmost of his power, this valuable Constitution in all its rights, and above all to guard with the most jealous circumspection against the introduction of new, and arbitrary methods of trial, which, under a variety of plausible pretenses, may in time, imperceptibly undermine this best preservative of LIBERTY," — Added to this, there is a late law of this state, which puts the pay, and travel of our jurors upon a very respectable footing — And lest Mr. Alfredus should say, this is nothing to the purpose, because the trial, by jury, under the English Constitution, — may be very different from what it is in ours, I will just mention, wherein they differ, under the English Constitution, — The jurors are returned by the sheriff. — under ours they are draughted by lot, from each town, which, I think, is the most equitable method, and as to the modes of process through the trials, they are nearly the same, both endeavor to do justice to the parties.

13.2.4.69Sydney, Address, June 13 & 14, 1788

By the 13th paragraph "no member of this State shall be disfranchised, or deprived of any of the rights or privileges secured to the subjects of the State by this constitution, unless by the law of the land, or judgment of its peers."

The 41st provides "that the trial by jury remain inviolate forever; that no acts of attainder shall be passed by the legislature of this State for crimes other than those committed before the termination of the present war. …"

There can be no doubt that if the new government be adopted in all its latitude, every one of these paragraphs will become a dead letter. …

13.2.5LETTERS AND DIARIES

13.2.5.1David Redick to William Irvine, September 24, 1787

The new plan of government proposed by the convention has made a bustle in the city and its vicinity. All people, almost, are for swallowing it down at once without examining its tendencies.

… Why is the trial by jury destroyed in civil causes before Congress? … I hope Congress will be very deliberate and digest it thoroughly before they send it recommended to the states.

Jensen, vol. 2, p. 134.

13.2.5.2William Pierce to St. George Tucker, September 28, 1787

… "A defect is found by some people in this new Constitution, because it has not provided, except in criminal cases, for Trial by Jury. I ask if the trial by jury in civil cases is really and substantially of any security to the liberties of a people. In my idea the opinion of its utility is founded more in prejudice than in reason. I cannot but think that an able Judge is better qualified to decide between man and man than any twelve men possibly can be. The trial by jury appears to me to have been introduced originally to soften some of the rigors of the feodal system. … An Englishman to be sure will talk of it in raptures; it is a virtue in him to do so, because it is insisted on in Magna Charta (that favorite instrument of English liberty) as the great bulwark of the nation's happiness. …["]

Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 16, pp. 444–45.

13.2.5.3James Madison to George Washington, September 30, 1787

An attempt was made in the next place by R.H. Lee to amend the act of the convention before it should go forth from Congress. He proposed a bill of Rights, — provision for juries in civil cases and several other things corresponding with the ideas of Colonel Mason. … It was amendments, and it was their duty to make use of it in a case where the essential guards of liberty had been omitted.

Hobson & Rutland, vol. 10, pp. 179–181.

13.2.5.4Arthur Lee to John Adams, October 3, 1787

… The omission of a Declaration of rights — … securing trial by Jury in criminal cases only — … are errors, if errors, gross as a mountain.

Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 13, pp. 307–08.

13.2.5.5Louis Guillaume Otto to Comte de Montmorin, October 20, 1787

… The Constitution is not even accompanied by a Declaration of rights, so that no recourse remains for the Citizen against oppression. … In England the right of resistance is part of the Constitution, here it is not even mentioned. — All civil cases will be decided in the supreme Court without benefit of Juries; but Judges will be named by Congress; what an unjust way of applying unjust laws!

Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 13, p. 424.

13.2.5.6Richard Henry Lee to Samuel Adams, October 27, 1787

Our mutual friend Mr. Gerry furnishes me with an opportunity of writing to you without danger of my letter being stopt on its passage, as I have some reason to apprehend has been the case with letters written by me and sent by the Post —. … In my letter to you …, I sent you the amendments that I proposed in Congress. … [Mr. Wilson's] principal Sophism is, that bills of rights were necessary in the State Constitutions because every thing not reserved was given to the State Legislatures, but in the Federal government, every thing was reserved that was not given to the federal Legislature. This is clearly a distinction without difference. Because Independent States are in the same relation to each other as Individuals are with respect to uncreated government. So that if reservations were necessary in one case, they are equally necessary in the other. But the futility of this distinction appears from the conduct of the Convention itself, for they have made several reservations — every one of which proves the Rule in Conventional ideas to be, that what was not reserved was given — … But they have no reservation in favor of the Press, Rights of Conscience, Trial by Jury in Civil Cases, or Common Law securities.

Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 13, pp. 484–85.

13.2.5.7William Grayson to William Short, November 10, 1787

I have received your favor, for which I am much obliged; the Convention at Philada. about which I wrote you, have at length produced (contrary to expectation) an entire new constitution; This has put us all in an uproar: — Our public papers are full of attacks and justifications of the new system: And if you go into private companies, you hear scarcely any thing else: —

In the Eastern states the thing is well received; the enemies to the Constitution say that this is no wonder, as they have overreached the Southern people so much in it's [sic] formation: In this State, I believe there is a great majority against it: the reason assigned by it's favorers is that they derives [sic] great advantages by imposing duties on ye. imports of Jersey & Connecticut, — In Jersey, nothing is more popular

With respect to my own sentiments I own I have important objections: — In the first place I think liberty a thing of too much importance to be trusted on the ground of implication: it should rest on principles expressed in the clearest & most unequivocal manner. A bill of rights ought then to have preceded. tryals [sic] by jury should have been expressly reserved in Civil as well as Criminal cases.

Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 14, pp. 81–82.

13.2.5.8David Ramsay to Benjamin Rush, November 10, 1787

As I suppose your convention is about convening & that you are a member I shall take the liberty of suggesting my wishes on the subject.

I am ready & willing to adopt the constitution without any alteration but still think objections might be obviated if the first state convention after accepting in its present form would nevertheless express their approbation of some alterations being made on the condition that Congress & the other States concurred with them. … I wish also that there might be added some declaration in favor of the Press and trial by Jury. I assent to Mr Wilsons reasoning that all is retained which is not ceded; but think that an explicit declaration on this subject might do good at least so far as to obviate objections. …

Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 14, pp. 83–84.

13.2.5.9Town of Preston, Connecticut, to the Connecticut Convention, November 12, 1787

5th. We observe that the right of trial by jury in civil causes is not secured in the federal courts. This is repugnant to the custom handed down from our ancestors and always set easy on the people and esteemed as a privilege.

Jensen, vol. 3, p. 441.

13.2.5.10 James White to Richard Caswell, November 13, 1787

… I must in candor confess, that I have regretted that the proposed constitution was not more explicit with respect to several essentials: but the great clamor is, that no express provision is made for the TRYAL BY JURY, and LIBERTY OF THE PRESS; things so interwoven with our political, or legal ideas, that I conceive the sacred immutability of these rights to be such, as never to have occurred as questionable objects to the convention. … Whatever may be our wish in theory, we find in practice, by our own example, that states in confederacy, like individuals in society, must part with some of their privileges for the preservation of the rest. In proof of which, it cannot be denied that, for want of attention to, or knowledge of that maxim, these states are now tottering on the brink of anarchy.

Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 14, p. 96.

13.2.5.11 William Shippen, Jr., to Thomas Lee Shippen, November 22, 1787

… There certainly should be a bill of rights prefixed securing the liberty of the press, the liberty of conscience and trial by jury. … It would then be an excellent Constitution don't you think so my son?

Jensen, vol. 2, p. 288.

13.2.5.12 From Roger Sherman, December 8, 1787

I am informed that you wish to know my opinion with respect to the new Constitution lately formed by the federal convention, and the Objections made against it.

To form a just opinion of the new constitution it Should be considered, whether the powers to be thereby vested in the federal government are Sufficient, and only Such as are necessary to Secure the Common interests of the States; and whether the exercise of those powers is placed in Safe hands. — In every government there is a trust, which may be abused; but the greatest Security against abuse is, that the interest of those in whom the powers of government are vested is the Same as that of the people they govern, and that they are dependent on the Suffrage of the people for their appointment to, and continuance in Office. this [sic] is a much greater Security than a declaration of rights, or restraining clauses upon paper.

The rights of the people under the new constitution will be Secured by a representation in proportion to their numbers in one branch of the legislature, and the rights of the particular State governments by their equal representation in the other branch.

It was thought necessary in order to carry into efect [sic] the laws of the union, and to preserve justice and harmony among the States to extend the judicial powers of the confederacy, they cannot be extended beyond the enumerated cases, but may be limited by Congress, and doubtless will be restricted to Such cases of importance & magnitude as cannot Safely be trusted to the final decision of the courts of the particular States, the Supreme court may have a circuit through the States to make the trials as convenient, and as little expensive to the parties as may be; and the trial by jury will doubtless be allowed in Cases proper for that mode of trial, …

13.2.5.13 George Lee Turberville to James Madison, December 11, 1787

… The operation of the Judiciary is a matter so far beyond the reach of most of our fellow Citizens that we are bounden to receive — & not to originate our opinions upon this branch of ye Federal government — Lawyers alone conceive themselves masters of this subject & they hold it forth to us danger & distress as the inevitable result of the new system — & that this will proceed from the immense power of the general Judiciary — which will pervade the states from one extremity to the other & will finally absorb — & destroy the state Courts — But to me their power seem’s very fairly defined by the clauses that constitute them — & the mention of Juries, in criminal cases — seeming therefor by implication in civil cases — not to be allowed, is the only objection I have to this Branch —

Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 14, pp. 406–07.

13.2.5.14Thomas Jefferson to William Carmichael, December 15, 1787

Our new constitution is powerfully attacked in the American newspapers. the objections are that it's effect would be to form the 13. states into one: that proposing to melt all down into one general government they have fenced the people by no declaration of rights, they have … reserved a power of abolishing trials by jury in civil cases. … You will perceive that these objections are serious, and some of them not without foundation. The constitution however has been received with a very general enthusiasm, and as far as can be judged from external demonstrations the bulk of the people are eager to adopt it.

Boyd, vol. 12, p. 425.

… I will now add what I do not like. First the omission of a bill of rights providing clearly and without the aid of sophisms for … trials by jury in all matters of fact triable by the laws of the land and not by the law of Nations. To say, as Mr. Wilson does that a bill of rights was not necessary because all is reserved in the case of the general government which is not given, while in the particular ones all is given which is not reserved might do for the Audience to whom it was addressed, but is surely gratis dictum, opposed by strong inferences from the body of the instrument, as well as from the omission of the clause of our present confederation which had declared that in express terms. It was a hard conclusion to say because there has been no uniformity among the states as to cases triable by jury, because some have been so incautious as to abandon this mode of trial, therefore the more prudent states shall be reduced to the same level of calamity. It would have been much more just and wise to have concluded the other way that as most of the states had judiciously preserved this palladium, those who had wandered should be brought back to it, and to have established general right instead of wrong. Let me add that a bill of rights is what the people are entitled to against every government on earth, general or particular, and what no just government should refuse, or rest on inference.

13.2.5.16 Timothy Pickering to Charles Tillinghast, December 24, 1787

… The trial by jury in civil cases, I grant, is not explicitly secured by the constitution: but we have been told the reason of the omission; and to me it is satisfactory. In many of the civil causes subject to the jurisdiction of the federal courts, trial by jury would evidently be improper; in others, it was found impracticable in the convention to fix on the mode of constituting juries. But we may assure ourselves that the first Congress will make provision for introducing it in every case in which it shall be proper & practicable. … So if the Convention had positively fixed a trial by jury in all the civil cases in which it is contended that it ought to have been established, — it might have been found as highly inconvenient in practice as the case above stated; but being fixed by the constitution, the inconvenience must be endured (whatever mischief might arise from it) until the Constitution itself should be altered.

Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 14, pp. 204–05.

13.2.5.17 Thomas Paine to George Clymer, December 29, 1787

… There are many excellent things in the new System. I perceive the difficulties you must have found in debating on certain points, such as the trial by Juries, because in some cases, such for instance as that of the United States against any particular State, for if the trial is to be held in the delinquent State, a Jury composed from that State, would be a part of the delinquent, and consequently Judges in their own case.

Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 14, p. 487.

13.2.5.18Thomas Jefferson to Uriah Forrest, December 31, 1787

… I will now tell you what I do not like. — First the Omission of a Bill of rights, providing clearly, and without the aid of sophisms, for … trials by jury in all matters of fact triable by the laws of the land, and not by the law of Nations. To say, as Mr. Wilson does, that a bill of rights was not necessary, because all is reserved in the case of the general government which is not given, while in the particular ones all is given which is not reserved, might do for the audience to which it was addressed: but is surely a gratis dictum, the reverse of which might as well be said; and it is opposed by strong inferences from the body of the instrument, as well as from the omission of the clause of our present confederation which had made the reservation in express terms. It was hard to conclude because there has been a want of uniformity among the states as to cases triable by jury, because some have been so incautious as to abandon this mode of trial in certain cases, therefore the more prudent states shall be reduced to the same level of calamity. It would have been much more just and wise to have concluded the other way, that as most of the states had preserved with jealousy this sacred palladium of liberty, those who had wandered should be brought back to it: and to have established general right instead of general wrong, for I consider all the ill as established, which may be established. I have a right to nothing which another has a right to take away; and Congress will have a right to take away trials by jury in all civil cases. Let me add that a bill of rights is what the people are entitled to against every government on earth, general or particular; and what no just government should refuse, or rest on inferences.

13.2.5.19Thomas B. Wait to George Thatcher, January 8, 1788

… How can you, after perusing the arguments of Crazy Jonathan, approve of the abolition of juries in civil causes — If the Genl. Court of this state are insurgents for depriving the subject of that right in 110 actions out of 120 — what shall we say to the Constitution that evidently deprives the subject of that right altogether? — O, my good friend, that cursed Small pox has made a crazy Jonathan of you in good earnest. — But your life is spared — and I am happy —

Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 15, p. 286.

13.2.5.20Samuel Holden Parsons to William Cushing, January 11, 1788

Trial by jury is said to be taken away. No such inference can be drawn from the Constitution. All civil [cases] were never tried by jury in this country or in Great Britain. … The mode of ascertaining the fact will be pointed out by law, and we cannot suppose Congress to divest themselves of all good sense as well as honesty so as to adopt measures totally repugnant to the habits and feelings of the people as the objection supposes.

13.2.5.21Charles Johnson to James Iredell, January 14, 1788

… For my part I will candidly, and in confidence, declare to you that it is a doubtful point with me, and which I cannot yet bring to a decision, whether it will be better to receive the new Constitution, with all its seeming imperfections on its head, or run the risk of obtaining another Convention, which may revise and amend, expunge those articles that seem repugnant to the liberties of the people — … and explicitly secure the trial by jury, according to former usage — … with all the other rights of the individual which are not necessary to be given up to government, and which ought not and cannot be required for any good purpose.

13.2.5.23Thomas Jefferson to William Stephen Smith, February 2, 1788

… But I own it astonishes me to find such a change wrought in the opinions of our countrymen since I left them, as that threefourths of them should be contented under a system which leaves to their governors the power of taking from them the trial by jury in civil cases. … This is degeneracy in the principles of liberty to which I had given four centuries instead of four years.

13.2.5.25George Washington to Marquis de Lafayette, April 28, 1788

… For example: there was not a member in the convention, I believe, who had the least objection to what is contended for by the Advocates for a Bill of Rights and Tryal by Jury. The first, where the people evidently retained every thing which they did not in express terms give up, was considered nugatory as you will find to have been more fully explained by Mr. Wilson and others:—And as to the second, it was only the difficulty of establishing a mode which should not interfere with the fixed modes of any of the States, that induced the Convention to leave it, as a matter of future

… Well and What now, is the fact to be tryed by Chancery powers. I am bold to say no Issue of fact ever was tryed or found for or against in Chancery. Facts often were carried into Chancery, as evidence but if they were doubted of, issue was joined on them, and directed to be tryed by a Jury. But now the ~~fact~~ Business unfolds itself, now we see what Gentlemen would be at, it is to try Facts on civil law principles, without the aid of a Jury, and this I promise You never will be submitted to. The question was put and wee carried it. But the House seemed rather to break up in a Storm.

As we came down the Stairs Docr. Johnson was by my side. Doctor (said I) I wish you would leave off, using these side Winds, and boldly at once bring in a Clause for deciding all Causes on civil law principles without the aid of a Jury. 13.2.5.29Thomas Jefferson to the Abbé Arnoux, July 19, 1789

> With respect to the value of this institution [trial by jury] I must make a general observation. We think in America that it is necessary to introduce people into every department of government as far as they are capable of exercising it; and that this is the only way to insure a long continued and honest administration of its powers. … They are not qualified to judge questions of law, but they are capable of judging questions of fact. In the form of juries they determine all matters of fact, leaving to the permanent judges to decide the law resulting from those facts. But we all know that permanent judges acquire an Esprit de corps, that being known they are liable to be tempted by bribery, that they are misled by favor, by relationship, by spirit of party, by a devotion to the Executive or Legislative, that it is better to leave a cause to the decision of cross and pile, than to that of a judge biased to one side, and that the opinion of 12 honest jurymen gives still a better hope of right, than cross and pile does. It is therefore left to the juries, if they think the permanent judges are under any bias whatever in any cause, to take upon themselves to judge the law as well as the fact. Were I called upon to decide whether the people had best be omitted in the Legislative or Judiciary department, I would say it is better to leave them out of the legislative. The execution of the laws is more important than the making of them.

13.3.1.1Giles Duncombe, 1695

> And first as to their number twelve: and this number is no less esteemed by our Law than by Holy Writ. If the twelve Apostles on their twelve Thrones, must try us in our Eternal State, good reason hath the Law to appoint the number of twelve to try our Temporal. The Tribes of Israel were twelve, the Patriarchs were twelve, and Solomon's Officers were twelve, I Kings, 4.7. … Therefore not only matters of Fact were tried by twelve, but of ancient times twelve Judges were to try matters in Law, in the Exchequer Chamber, and there were twelve Counsellors of State for matters of State; and he that wageth his Law must have eleven others with him, which think he says true. And the Law is so precise in this number of twelve, that if the tryal be by more or less, it is a mis-Tryal.

Book XI: Of the Laws Which Establish Political Liberty, with Regard to the Constitution

It is true that in democracies the people seem to act as they please; but political liberty does not consist in an unrestrained freedom. In governments, that is, in societies directed by laws, liberty can consist only in the power of doing what we ought to will, and in not being constrained to do what we ought not to will.

We must have continually present in our minds the difference between independence and liberty. Liberty is a right of doing whatever the laws permit; and if a citizen could do what they forbid, he would be no longer possessed of liberty, because all his fellow citizens would have the same power.

Democratic and aristocratic states are not necessarily free. Political liberty is to be met with only in moderate governments; yet even in these it is not always met with. It is there only when there is no abuse of power: but constant experience shews us, that every man invested with power is apt to abuse it; he pushes on till he comes to the utmost limit. Is it not strange, tho' true, to say that virtue itself has need of limits?

To prevent this abuse, 'tis necessary that by the very disposition of things power should be a check to power. A government may be so constituted, as no man shall be compelled to do things to which the law does not oblige him, nor forced to abstain from things which the law permits.

In every government there are three sorts of power: the legislative; the executive in respect to things dependent on the law of nations; and the executive, in regard to matters that depend on civil laws.

The political liberty of the subject is a tranquillity of mind, arising from the opinion each person has of his safety. In order to have this liberty, it is requisite the government be so constituted as one man need not be afraid of another.

When the legislative and executive powers are united in the same person, or in the same body of magistracy, there can be then no liberty; because apprehensions may arise, lest the same monarch or senate should enact tyrannical laws, to execute them in a tyrannical manner.

Again, there is no liberty, if the power of judging be not separated from the legislative and executive powers. Were it joined with the legislative, the life and liberty of the subject would be exposed to arbitrary control; for the judge would be then the legislator. Were it joined to the executive power, the judge might behave with all the violence of an oppressor.

The judiciary power ought not to be given to a standing senate; it should be exercised by persons taken from the body of the people, at certain times of the year, and pursuant to a form and manner prescribed by law, in order to erect a tribunal that should last only as long as necessity requires.

By this method the power of judging, a power so terrible to mankind, not being annexed to any particular state or profession, becomes, as it were, invisible. People have not then the judges continually present to their view; they fear the office, but not the magistrate.

In accusations of a deep or criminal nature, it is proper the person accused should have the privilege of chusing in some measure his judges in concurrence with the law; or at least he should have the right to except against so great a number, that the remaining part may be deemed his own choice.

The other two powers may be given rather to magistrates or permanent bodies, because they are not exercised on any private subject; one being no more than the general will of the state, and the other the execution of the general will.

But tho' the tribunals ought not to be fixt, yet the judgments ought, and to such a degree as to be ever conformable to the exact letter of the law. Were they to be the private opinion of the judge, people would then live in society without knowing exactly the obligations it lays them under.

Trial.

(G) WHAT IS TO BE TRIED BY A JURY.

It is in the General true that every Question of Fact is to be tried by a Jury.

And in some Cases where a Question of Fact may be otherwise tried it is in the Discretion of the Court to send it to be tried by a Jury.[1]

Under the foregoing Heads, which contain some Exceptions to the general Rule that Questions of Fact are to be tried by a Jury, it was necessary for the Illustration of the respective subjects to mention some Questions relating to Matters of Fact, concerning the Manner of trying which some Doubt had arisen, that are to be tried by a Jury.

It is not necessary to repeat here any of the Instances there given, which the Reader will upon referring to the foregoing Heads easily find.

And it is much less necessary to mention any particular Instances of Questions relating to Matters of Fact, concerning the Manner of trying which no Doubt has ever arisen, that are to be tried by a Jury.

It will therefore be sufficient in this Place to mention some few Instances of Questions concerning the Manner of trying of which some Doubt had arisen, that are to be tried by a Jury; for from these and those already mentioned a good Judgment may be formed what Questions are in other doubtful Cases to be tried by a Jury.

If any new Offence be created by a Statute and the Statute is silent as to the Manner of its being tried, the Trial thereof is to be by a Jury; because this Manner of Trial is agreeable to Magna Charta.[2]

Where the Agreement is in general Terms that a certain Fact shall be proved, the general Rule is that it must be proved to a Jury : For this is the most legal Way of proving any Matter of Fact.[3]

But if any particular Manner of proving a certain Fact has been agreed upon by the Parties, the Fact must always be proved in the Manner agreed upon.[4]

If the Agreement be that a certain Fact shall be proved before J. S. this is to be proved by Witnesses to be examined by J. S. [5]

And although the Agreement be in general Terms that a certain Fact shall be proved; yet if it appears clearly from any Circumstance attending the Agreement that the Parties did not intend a Proof to a Jury, the Fact may be otherways proved.

If the Agreement be that a certain Fact shall be proved in two Days, this is not to be proved to a Jury but by the Examination of Witnesses; for as a Trial by a Jury can never be had within so short a Time as two Days this Manner of Trial could not have been intended.[6]

The Condition of a Bond dated the 23d Day of August was, that the Defendant should pay to the Plaintiff Ten Shillings for every Twenty Shillings which the Plaintiff should by sufficient Proof make it appear that J. S. was indebted to him; and that one Half of the same should be paid on or before the 25th Day of November then next ensuing. An Action of Debt being brought upon this Bond the Defendant pleaded, that the Plaintiff did not make it appear by sufficient Proof that J. S. was indebted to him in the Sum of Twenty Shillings. The Plaintiff replied that before the said 25th Day of November he and J. S. settled an Account, by which J. S. acknowledged himself to be indebted to the Plaintiff in the Sum of 310 l.[7]

Upon a Demurrer to this Replication it was insisted that the Proof ought to have been made to a Jury : But it was held that such Proof could not have been intended : Because a Trial by a Jury could not have been had before the Time limited for the Payment of Part of the Money was expired.

And where it is necessary that a Fact should be proved to a Jury, it is not necessary that it should be proved in a distinct Action.

A Promise was made by J. S. to pay J. N. Three Pounds upon his proving that a certain Cock did win his Battle. An Action being brought for this Money J. S. pleaded that no such Proof had been made. The Plea was held to be bad; Et per Cur : It was not necessary to make the Proof before the bringing of an Action for the Money; for it may be made in such Action.[8]

A Penalty was given by a Statute upon proving by two Witnesses that a certain Thing thereby prohibited had been done. In an Action of Debt for this Penalty the Question was, whether it was necessary to make Proof of the Offence by two Witnesses in another Action before an Action could be brought upon this Statute? It was held not to be necessary; for that such Proof may be well made in the Action upon the Statute.[9]

It is in the general true that the Question, what the Intent of a Party was? is not to be tried by a Jury; because this it not being a Question of Fact cannot be well judged of by a Jury.

But wherever the Question does not depend upon a Fact alone unless it was coupled with a certain Intent, the Intent as well as the Fact must be tried by a Jury : Because the Intent is in such Case the only Thing material. And the Jury must judge of this in the best Manner they are able from the Circumstances which attended the Fact.[10]

If the Question be, whether a Tenant chased his Beasts from a Manor after the Lord who came to distrain had seen them upon the Manor with an Intent to prevent their being distrained? this Intent must be tried by a Jury.[11]

If the Question be, whether the Intent of the Defendant was to carry the Wool which had been by him put on board a Ship to Calais? the Intent in this Case must be tried by a Jury.[12]

Notwithstanding that the Words for which an Action is brought would in the General be actionable, the Jury are to judge from all the Circumstances that attended the speaking of them whether they were spoken with an Intent to slander the Plaintiff; for unless there was such an Intent the Plaintiff ought not to recover any Damages.[13]

(Q) OF GRANTING A NEW TRIAL.

1. IN THE GENERAL.

THE Case of Wood and Gunston, which was in the Year 1655, is the first Case that is to be met with in the Books; in which a new Trial was granted.[14]

But it ought not to be from thence concluded that this was the first Instance of granting a new Trial; for the Silence of Reporters as to this Matter may be fairly ascribed to its not having been formerly the Custom-to report any Motions.[15]

And it was said by Holt Ch. J. that the granting of new Trials must have been much more antient than the Case of Wood and Gunston : Because it was long before this Case a good Cause of Challenge to a Juror that he had been a Juror in the same Cause.[16]

But it is said in another Book that the Reasoning of Holt Ch. J. in the Case of Argent and Darrel is not conclusive; for that the Challenge because a Man had been a Juror in the same Cause was not perhaps where a new Trial had been granted : But where a Venire facias de novo had been awarded by Reason of a Mis-Trial or for some other Reason.[17]

The proper Time to move for a new Trial, if the Cause was tried in Term Time, is within the next four Days of the Term in which it was tried, if it was tried in Vacation Time, within the first four Days of the next Term : Because Judgment may be entered up after such four Days are respectively past.

But it has been held that if Judgment has not been in fact entered up, a Motion may be made for a new Trial after the Day upon which it might have been entered up is past. [18]

In a later Case however it was held that a new Trial cannot be moved for after the Day on which Jugment might have been entered up is past, although it has not been in fact entered up; unless the Matter upon which the Motion is founded was not discovered till such a Day was past.[19]

It is in the General true that a Motion for a new Trial cannot be made after a Motion in Arrest of Judgment; because by the latter Motion the Verdict is admitted to be good.[20]

But if the Matter upon which the Motion for a new Trial is founded was not discovered at the Time of the Motion in Arrest of Judgment a Motion for a new Trial may be made after a Motion in Arrest of Judgment.[21]

And if this is not the Case the Court will frequently give Leave to move for a new Trial after a Motion in Arrest of Judgment; because if there should be Reason to arrest the Judgment it would answer no Purpose for the Parties to be at the Expence of a second Trial; for the Judgment may after all be arrested.

A new Trial may be moved for although the Verdict was a special one and signed by the Counsel of both Sides; for the Intention in signing this was only to save a Matter of Law for the Opinion of the Court in Case the Verdict should stand; but the Matter of Law may be afterwards waved.[22]

If due Notice of Trial was not given this is a good Cause for the granting of a new Trial.[23]

But if a Defence has been made at the Trial the Court will not grant a new Trial although due Notice of Trial was not given; for the Defect of Notice is cured by the having made a Defence.[24]

A new Trial cannot be moved for after a Nonsuit; because the Plaintiff is by this out of Court.[25]

But the Court may be moved to set aside a Nonsuit for Irregularity, and if it appears to have been obtained irregularly the Court will make a Rule for proceeding in the Cause, which answers the same Purpose as granting a new Trial would do.[26]

A new Trial cannot be moved for in the Court of Common Pleas in a Cause which was tried before a Judge of another Court, unless the Matter upon which the Motion is founded be verified by Affidavit.[27]

It is in the General true that the Court will not grant a new Trial, until a Report is made of the Trial by the Judge before whom the Cause was tried; for that it is not proper to receive any Account thereof by Affidavit.[28]

But if the Judge before whom the Cause was tried happens to die before he has made a Report of the Trial, the Court will receive an Account thereof by Affidavit.[29]

The Report of the Judge before whom the Cause was tried is conclusive as to every Thing which passed at the Trial: But the Court may and ought in some Cases to grant a new Trial although the Judge reports that the Verdict is quite to his Satisfaction.[30]

A new Trial ought not to be granted by an inferior Court, and if the Judge thereof does grant one a Mandamus lies for a Procedendo ad Judicium upon the first Verdict.[31]

It is by no Means a general Rule in Courts of Equity to grant a new Trial as a Thing of Course, although an Estate of Inheritance will be bound by the Verdict; for the granting or not granting of a new Trial must always depend upon the Circumstances of the particular Case.[32]

If there has been a View the Court will not unless there be some special Reason therefore grant a new Trial : Because it is to be presumed, that the Jury were as much or perhaps more influenced by what they observed upon the View as by the Evidence given in Court.[33]

If there are two Defendants in a Cause and the Verdict is in Favour of one of them, the Court will not grant a new Trial at the Instance of the other; for the Verdict must if set aside be set aside as to both, and it would be unreasonable that he in whose Favour the Verdict is should be a second Time brought into Jeopardy.[34]

But if the Defendant in whose Favour the Verdict is will in such Case wave the Benefit thereof, and consent that there shall be a new Trial, the Court will provided it be in other Respects proper grant a new Trial.[35]

It is laid down that Embracery is a good Cause for the granting of a new Trial : But that Maintenance is not.[36]

The Court will not grant a new Trial if it be probable that the Verdict obtained at such new Trial will be given in Evidence in a criminal Prosecution.[37]

It is in the General true, that the Court will not grant a new Trial but upon the Payment of the Costs of the former Trial.[38]

But if a new Trial be granted upon the Account of any Irregularity at the former Trial, the Court will sometimes grant it without the Condition of paying the Costs of the former Trial.[39]

It being discovered that the Jury had drawn Lots in order to determine for which Party they should find a Verdict; the Court granted a new Trial, and ordered that the Costs of the former Trial should abide the Event thereof.[40]

In an Action of false Imprisonment brought against a Justice of the Peace it appeared in Evidence, that the Action was commenced within six Months after the End of the Imprisonment of the Plaintiff, but not within six Months after the Day of his Commitment. It was ruled by Willes Ch. J. before whom the Cause was tried that the Action was not commenced within the Time limited by the Statute, and the Plaintiff was for this Reason nonsuited. A new Trial was granted in this Case without the Condition of paying the Costs of the former Trial.[41]

It is said that when a new Trial is granted the first Verdict ought to stand as a Security, for that otherwise the Party against whom it was may spirit away the Witnesses upon whose Testimony it was obtained, and thereby deprive the other Party both of the Benefit of the first Verdict and of the Means of obtaining a second.[42]

It is in the General true, that where a new Trial has been granted, and there is a Verdict for the same Party that the Verdict upon the first Trial was for, the Court will not grant a third Trial.[43]

But upon the particular Circumstances of a Case, as if the second Verdict has been obtained by any bad Practice, the Court will grant a third Trial.[44]

2. AFTER A TRIAL AT BAR.

It is laid down in many Cases, that the Court cannot grant a new Trial after a Trial at Bar, unless there has been some Misbehaviour in the Jury; for that a Trial at Bar is by Reason of the greater Solemnity thereof of much more Authority than one at Nisi Prius.[45]

But as the Verdict upon an Issue directed from the Court of Chancery is only to inform the Conscience of the Chancellor, the Power of granting a new Trial after a Trial at Bar has been constantly exercised by this Court, which is not bound by the strict Rules of Law.[46]

And it has been held in some modern Cases, that a Court of Law has a Power of granting a new Trial as well after a Trial at Bar as after one at Nisi Prius.[47]

And it is in one of these observed, that in the Case of Wood and Gunston, which is the first that is to be found in the Books wherein a new Trial was granted, it was granted after a Trial at Bar.[48]

3. FOR ANY DEFECT OF MISTAKE IN THE JUDGE BEFORE WHOM THE CAUSE WAS TRIED.

If it appears that the Judge before whom the Cause was tried was therein interested the Court will grant a new Trial, and it is said the Court will do this even where all Parties did consent that the Cause should be tried before such Judge; for it is not to be imagined that he could be quite indifferent.[49]

A new Trial, was granted because a Lord who was interested in the Cause sat upon the Bench during the Trial.[50]

If the Judge before whom the Cause was tried was mistaken in any Thing the Court will grant a new Trial; for a Judge of Nisi Prius is to be considered as having acted rather in a ministerial Capacity than a judicial one, and as the Ground of granting a new Trial is the doing of Justice to the Party injured by the Verdict, it ought to be as well granted upon the Account of a Mistake in the Judge before whom the Cause was tried, as upon the Account of one in the Jury by whom it was tried.[51]

If the Judge before whom the Cause was tried did refuse to admit any proper Evidence, this is a good Reason for the granting of a new Trial.[52]

If the Judge before whom the Cause was tried did admit any improper Evidence which was objected to, the more regular Way was to have tendered a Bill of Exceptions at the Trial: But notwithstanding this has been omitted and the Trial did proceed the Court will in such Case grant a new Trial.[53]

4. FOR ANY DEFECT, MISTAKE OR FAULT IN THE JURY WHO TRIED THE CAUSE.

If the Sheriff did not follow the Direction of a Rule of Court in returning the Jury, this is a good Reason for the granting of a new Trial.[54]

But if the Party against whom the Verdict is did in such Case make a Defence at the Trial of the Cause the Court will not grant a new Trial; for as such Party would have had the Advantage of the Verdict if it had been in his Favour he ought to be bound by it now it is against him.[55]

In the Venire facias there was the Name of Thomas Bucher of A. In the Distringas this Name was left out and the Name of Thomas Carter of A. was inserted. Thomas Carter of A. being sworn upon the Jury which tried the Cause the Verdict was held to be void; because the Cause was in this Case tried only by eleven of the Persons returned upon the Pannel.[56]

In both the Venire facias and the Distringas there was the Name of John Taverner : But a Person of the Name of John Turner was sworn upon the Jury which tried the Cause. On a Motion in Arrest of Judgment the Court were clear that if the Variance had been in the Christian Name the Judgment ought to be arrested : But they had some Doubt whether as the Variance was in the Surname the Judgment ought to be arrested, because a Man may have two Surnames. It was however afterwards held that it should be arrested.[57]

But a contrary Doctrine is laid down in a modern Case.

A Person was returned and sworn upon the Jury by the Name of Henry. A new Trial was moved for upon an Affidavit that his Christian Name was Harry : But it was refused; Et per Cur' : The Record and all the Jury Process are uniform and such an Affidavit ought not to be received to contradict these. This was the Person who was returned and intended to be upon the Jury, and there is no Pretence that the Verdict is unjust. It is commonly understood that Henry and Harry are the same Name; or that Harry is a corrupt Way of spelling Henry.[58]

A Person of the Name of Richard Sheppard was returned to serve as a Juror at the Assizes on the Crown Side. This Person being in the Nisi Prius Court when Richard Gratter returned upon the Nisi Prius Pannel was called, he answered and was sworn upon the Jury in the room of Gratter. A new Trial being moved for on the Part of the Defendant, it was said that the Defendant ought to have challenged this Man, and that the Court will not now receive any Affidavit to contradict the Record : But a new Trial was granted; Et per Cur' : The Court are not in this Case concluded by the Record. All the twelve Jurors must by the Statute of the 3 Geo. 2. be drawn out of the Jury Box, and consequently as this Man's Name was never in the Box here has been no Trial. The Defendant had no Opportunity of challenging this Man; nor is this a Defect which is cured by the Statute of the 32 H. 8.[59]

John Pearce returned upon the Pannel did not appear : But when he was called his Son answered and was sworn upon the Jury. A new Trial was granted; Et per Cur' : The Verdict in this Case was by only eleven of the Persons returned upon the Pannel.[60]

A Person returned upon the Pannel by the Name of Hooper was challenged and the challenge was allowed. This Man being afterwards sworn upon the Jury as a Talesman by the Name of Hook a new Trial was for this Reason moved for and granted.[61]

The Court will not grant a new Trial because one of the Jurors was related to one of the Parties; for as the other Party might have challenged this Man he ought to suffer for his own Neglect.[62]

A new Trial was moved for because one of the Jurors had at the Time of the Trial a Suit depending with the Plaintiff against whom the Verdict was : But it was refused; Et per Cur' : Why did not the Plaintiff challenge this Man at the Trial of the Cause?[63]

If it appears however that there was a good Cause of Challenge to one or more of the Jurors, but that this was not known and consequently could not be taken Advantage of at the Trial of the Cause, the Court will in such Case grant a new Trial.[64]

A new Trial was granted because it was discovered after the Trial that the Foreman of the Jury had declared, that the Plaintiff should never have a Verdict whatsoever Witnesses he might produce.[65]

If the Jury receive any written Evidence which was not given in Court after they are gone from the Bar to consider of their Verdict, this is a good Reason for the granting of a new Trial.[66]

If after the Jury are gone from the Bar to consider of their Verdict they hear the Evidence of any Witness who was before examined in Court, the Verdict may be set aside although his Evidence was to the same Effect as the Evidence he had given in Court.[67]

But it is said that the Court will not in such Case grant a new Trial, unless it be indorsed upon the Postea that the Jury did receive such written or parol Evidence after they were gone from the Bar; for that this cannot be shewn by Affidavit.[68]

If the Jury carry any written Evidence which was given in Court with them from the Bar without the Direction or Leave of the Court, this is not a Reason for the granting of a new Trial : But it is a Misbehaviour in the Jury for which they are punishable.[69]

A new Trial was granted, because the Jury threw up Cross or Pile whether they should give the Plaintiff Five Hundred Pounds or Three Hundred Pounds Damages.[70]

The Jury drew Lots whether they should find a Verdict for the Plaintiff or for the Defendant. A new Trial was in this Case granted, notwithstanding the Lot fell upon the Party who was in the Opinion of the Judge before whom the Cause was tried intitled to a Verdict.[71]

But a new Trial was refused, where the Jurors had voted and found their Verdict according to the Majority of Votes.[72]

In a modern Case, where the Jurors had voted and seven of them were for finding the Verdict as it was found, a new Trial was moved for: But it was refused; and by Lee Ch. J. nothing was in this Case decided by Chance as was done in the Case of Phillips and Fowler. The five might ultimately be convinced: But if they only acquiesced in the finding of the Verdict it is enough; and they shall not now be received to say they did not.[73]

A new Trial was granted upon Affidavits of eleven of the Jurors, setting forth that they had agreed to find a Verdict for the Plaintiff and to give him Five Shillings Damages, but that the Foreman had by Mistake given in a Verdict for the Defendant.[74]

The Defendant was indicted for having put some Ducats into the Pocket of the Prosecutor with an Intent to charge him with Felony. The Jury found the Defendant guilty generally : But upon a Motion for a new Trial Affidavits of all the Jurors were produced, in which they swore that they only intended to find him guilty of the Fact of having put the Ducats into the Prosecutor's Pocket but not of the Intent; and Foster J. before whom the Indictment was tried reported that his Direction to the Jury was, that in Case they did not think the Defendant guilty of the Intent as well as of the Fact of having put the Ducats into the Prosecutor's Pocket they ought to acquit him. A new Trial was granted; and by Lee Ch. J. we do not grant a new Trial in this Case on the Account of any after Thought of the Jurors, for the doing of this might be a very bad Precedent; but because the Verdict was contrary to the Direction of the Judge in a Matter of Law. By Denison J. if the Verdict had been as the Jury intended it, that the Defendant was guilty of the Fact but not of the Intent there must have been a Venire facias de Novo; for it would have been an incompleat Verdict.[75]

The Court did in one Case refuse to grant a new Trial, although the Jury found a general Verdict after it was agreed by the Counsel on both Sides that there should be a Special one, and would not give their Reasons for finding such a Verdict.[76]

But it seems from the Report of this Case that a new Trial was refused because it was moved for after a Trial at Bar.[77]

For in another Case, where a special Verdict was prayed, and the Jury after being directed by the Judge before whom the Cause was tried to find a special Verdict did find a General one, a new Trial was granted.[78]

It is in the General true, that if the Jury have found a Verdict contrary to the Evidence the Court will grant a new Trial.

But if there be two Issues and the Verdict is not contrary to the Evidence as to one of these, the Court will not grant a new Trial although it be contrary to the Evidence as to the other; for where the Verdict is right in Part the Court will never set it aside.[79]

As the granting of a new Trial is discretionary if the Action be a hard one and there be a Verdict for the Defendant, the Court will not grant a new Trial although the Jury did find a Verdict contrary to the Evidence, because every such Action ought to be discouraged as much as possible.

In an Action upon the Case against J. S. for negligently keeping his Fire, by which Means the House of the Plaintiff was burnt down, the Verdict was for the Defendant. A new Trial was moved for: But it was refused although the Verdict was contrary to the Evidence because the Action was a hard one.[80]

But it is said that if in such Case the Verdict had been for the Plaintiff the Court would have granted a new Trial.[81]

J. S. was hung in Chains by the Sheriff upon the private Soil of J. N. An Action being brought for this by J. N. against the Sheriff there was a Verdict contrary to the Evidence for the Defendant : Yet the Court refused to grant a new Trial because the Action was a hard one; it appearing that the Sheriff had done this merely for the Conveniency of the Place and not with a Design either to affront or to annoy J. N.[82]

It has been held in divers Cases that the Court will not grant a new Trial unless the Justice of the Case requires it, although the Jury have found a Verdict contrary to the Evidence.

In an Action of Assumpsit the Jury found a Verdict for the Plaintiff notwithstanding the Defendant did prove her Defence which was Coverture. A new Trial being moved for it was refused; Et per Cur' : As the Defendant was reputed to be a Feme Sole and lived as one, she ought not to have set up such a Defence in order to hinder the Plaintiff from recovering a just Debt.[83]

The Plaintiff in an Ejectment who was a Mortgagee claimed under a Surrender, whereas the Premisses were not Copyhold. The Defendant on his Part claimed under a meer voluntary Conveyance. A Verdict having been found for the Plaintiff the Court would not grant a new Trial; because the granting thereof would have been contrary to the real Justice of the Case.[84]

for some Trees cut down by the latter the Jury found a Verdict for the Defendant contrary to the Evidence : Yet a new Trial was refused : Because it appeared that the Trees were cut down in the making of Ditches, which were of much more Advantage to the Plaintiff's Land than the Value of the Trees.[85]

A new Trial being moved for in an Action of Trespass Vi et Armis the Judge before whom the Cause was tried reported, that the Trespass was proved, and that the Jury who had found the Verdict for the Defendant ought to have found it for the Plaintiff; but that in his Opinion Sixpence Damages would have been sufficient. A new Trial was refused, and by Lord Mansfield Ch. J. as the granting of a new Trial is discretionary the Court will never minister to the Passions of any Person by granting one in such a Case as the Present, where the Justice of the Case does by no Means require it.[86]

Upon a Motion for a new Trial in an Action for a Libel accusing the Plaintiff of Disaffection the Judge before whom the Cause was tried reported, that the Jury had found the Verdict for the Defendant contrary both to the Evidence and to his Direction : But that as the general Character of the Plaintiff was proved to be that of a Jacobite, and no Damage was proved to have been sustained from the Libel, the Jury ought not in his Opinion to have given more than Two Shillings and Sixpence Damages. The Court refused to grant a new Trial and by Lord Mansfield Ch. J. a new Trial ought never to be granted unless some manifest Injustice is done by the Verdict. As this is a vindictive Action and it was not proved that the Plaintiff sustained any Damage from the Libel the granting of a new Trial, by which the Plaintiff must in all Probability be Money out of Pocket if he should obtain a Verdict, would answer no other End than that of vexing the Defendant. It is the Duty of the Court to see that substantial Justice be in every Case done to all the Parties, but they ought never to minister to the Passions of any one of them.[87]

It has been held in some Cases, that if the Jury have found a Verdict which is in the Opinion of the Judge before whom the Cause was tried contrary to the Weight of the Evidence this is a good Reason for the granting of a new Trial.

The Question at the Trial of the Cause was whether J. S. was of sane Mind? And the Verdict was for the Plaintiff : But upon the Report of Willes Ch. J. before whom it was tried that the Weight of the Evidence was in his Opinion with the Defendant a new Trial was granted.[88]

Upon a Motion for a new Trial Ryder Ch. J. before whom the Cause was tried reported, that there was Evidence on both Sides : But that in his Opinion the Jury had found the Verdict contrary to the Weight of the Evidence. A new Trial was in this Case granted.[89]

And in another Case it was laid down generally that the Court may grant a new Trial, if the Verdict is in the Opinion of the Judge before whom the Cause was tried contrary to the Weight of the Evidence, although there was Evidence on both Sides.[90]

But it has been held in other Cases that the Court ought not to grant a new Trial; because the Jury have in the Opinion of the Judge before whom the Cause was tried found a Verdict contrary to the Weight of the Evidence.

A new Trial was refused notwithstanding Lee Ch. J. before whom the Cause was tried reported, that the Evidence for the Plaintiff for whom the Jury had found a Verdict was very weak, and that he had summed up the Evidence strongly for the Defendant.[91]

Upon a Motion for a new Trial the Judge before whom the Cause was tried reported, that the Weight of the Evidence was with the Plaintiff, and that in his Opinion the Jury, who had found the Verdict for the Defendant, ought to have found it for the Plaintiff : But a new Trial was refused; Et per Cur' : As there was Evidence at the Trial on the Part of the Defendant the Jury were the proper Persons to judge on which Side the Weight thereof was. This cannot be said to be a Verdict against Evidence and therefore we will not grant a new Trial,[92]

Upon a Motion for a new Trial Pratt Ch. J. before whom the Cause was tried after reporting the Evidence specially expressed himself to this Effect. If I had been upon the Jury, and had known no more of the Witnesses than I did when this Cause was tried, I should have thought that the Verdict which is for the Plaintiff ought to have been for the Defendant; but I do not chuse to declare myself dissatisfied therewith : Because wherever there is a flat Contrariety of Evidence as to the principal Matter in Issue, and the Characters of the Witnesses on both Sides stand unimpeached, the Weight of Evidence does not altogether depend upon the Number of Witnesses; for it is the Province of the Jury who may know them all to determine which Witnesses they will give Credit to; and in my Opinion no Judge has a Right to blame a Jury for exercising their Power of determining in such a Case. He concluded with leaving the Matter to the other Justices.[93]

The Rule for a new Trial was discharged; and by Clive J. the granting of a new Trial in this Case would be taking away that Power which is by the Constitution vested in the Jury. It has been said that it is the Duty of the Judge to enlighten the Understanding of the Jury, but that he ought not to lead the Jury by the Nose.

Bathurst J. as there was in this Case strong Evidence for the Plaintiff a new Trial ought not to be granted, although the Weight of the Evidence was in My Lord's Opinion with the Defendant.

Gould J. it is very difficult to draw a Line between the Cases in which there ought or ought not to be a new Trial; and perhaps the granting of a new Trial must in every Case depend upon the particular Circumstances of the Case. In the present Case there is no Reason to grant one.

As the Law does not seem to be settled concerning the granting of a new Trial upon the Account either of the Smallness or Excessiveness of the Damages given by the Jury, it will be best to mention all the principal Cases as to both these Points.

In an Action for Words the Plaintiff had a Verdict and Twenty Shillings Damages were given. A new Trial being moved for it was refused; Et per Cur' : This is a very hard Case; but the Court has constantly refused to grant a new Trial upon Account of the Smallness of the Damages.[94]

In an Action for a malicious Prosecution of the Plaintiff for Felony the Damages given were only Six Shillings : Yet the Court would not grant a new Trial. It is in this Case laid down that the Court will never grant a new Trial upon Account of the Smallness of the Damages; because an Attaint would not lie in such a Case against the Jury, it not being a false Verdict which a Verdict for the Defendant would perhaps have been : And it is added that new Trials were introduced in the room of Attaints as being more expeditious and easier Remedies.[95]

In an Action of Scandalum Magnatum the Jury found for the Plaintiff but gave only Twelvepence Damages. A new Trial being moved for upon Account of the Smallness of the Damages it was refused.[96]

In an Action of Covenant for the Sum of One Hundred Pounds there was Judgment upon a Demurrer for the Plaintiff. A lesser Sum being given by the Jury upon a Writ of Enquiry a new Writ of Enquiry was awarded; Et per Cur' : As an Action of Debt might have been brought upon this Covenant the Jury ought to have given the whole Sum, unless the Defendant had proved something to lessen it. The general Rule of not granting a new Trial or a new Writ of Enquiry upon Account of the Smallness of the Damages does not extend to this Case; in which there must have been some Contrivance.[97]

Upon a Contract for Stock the Plaintiff and J. S. deposited Two Hundred Pounds each in the Hands of the Defendant. As J. S. did not perform his Part of Contract the Plaintiff brought an Action for the Four Hundred Pounds deposited, and obtained Judgment upon a Demurrer. A Writ of Enquiry was executed and the Plaintiff proved his Case; yet the Jury upon a mistaken Notion that the Defendant could not part with the Money without the Consent of both Parties gave him only a Penny Damages. A new Writ of Enquiry was awarded; Et per Cur' : The Rule of not setting aside a Verdict on Account of the Smallness of the Damages does not extend to this Case; in which the Jury were mistaken in a Point of Law.[98]

Upon the Execution of a Writ of Enquiry the Sheriff admitted improper Evidence to be given on the Part of the Defendant; for which Reason the Damages given were much less than they would otherwise have been. A new Writ of Enquiry was awarded; Et per Cur' : A Notion has prevailed that where the Damages are excessive the Court may grant a new Trial; but that it cannot where these are too small. There seems however to be no good Reason why a new Trial should not be as well granted in the latter Case as in the former.[99]

A new Trial being moved for on Account of the Smallness of the Damages it was refused; Et per Cur' : Where the Demand is certain, as if it arises upon a promisory Note, the Court will grant a new Trial upon Account of the Smallness of the Damages : But where the Demand is uncertain, as in the present Case where it is for the Cure of a Wound, the Court will not grant a new Trial upon Account of the Smallness of the Damages.[100]

In an Action of Scandalum Magnatum for these Words, he is an unworthy Man and acts against Law and Reason, the Jury found a Verdict for the Plaintiff and gave him 4000*l*. Damages. Upon a Motion for a new Trial it was sworn that one of the Jury had confessed, that they did not give such large Damages because the Plaintiff was so much damnified, but because he might have a greater Opportunity of shewing himself noble by remitting the Damages. A new Trial was refused and the Court gave their Opinions seriatim.[101]

North Ch. J. in a criminal Case a Man is by Magna Charta to be fined with a Salvo Contenemento suo, and consequently no greater Fine is to be imposed than he is able to pay; but in a Civil Action the Plaintiff ought in all Cases to recover a Compensation for the Damages which he hath sustained : And he ought in some Cases to recover both for the Damages which he hath sustained and for those which he may sustain. In an Action for Words if the Words are not actionable in themselves the Jury are only to consider what Damages the Plaintiff hath sustained, and not what he may sustain in futuro : Because for the latter he may have a new Action : But if the Words are in themselves actionable the Jury ought as well to consider the Damages which the Plaintiff may afterwards sustain as those which he hath sustained. In the present Case the Court cannot set a Value upon the Plaintiff's Honour. The Jury have given him 4000*l*. Damages for the Injury thereto done, and as they are by Law the proper Judges of Damages the Court has no Power either to lessen these or to grant a new Trial; and it would be very inconvenient if the Court should examine upon what Account the Jury gave their Verdict.

Atkins J. accorded.

Wyndham J. was of a different Opinion. In the Case of Wood and Gunston which was an Action upon the Case for calling the Plaintiff Bankrupt the Court granted a new Trial; because the Damages of 500*l*. given by the Jury were in the Opinion of the Court excessive. In the present Case the Jury ought only to have considered the Damages which the Plaintiff had sustained, and not to have given large Damages that he might have an Opportunity of shewing himself generous. It is very true that the Court cannot lessen the Damages given by the Jury: But if these are too large a new Trial may be granted.

Scroggs J. accorded with North and Wyndham. If I had been upon the Jury I should not have given such large Damages : But as it does not appear that there was any Practice upon the Jury a new Trial ought not to be granted. Suppose the Jury had given the Plaintiff only a Penny Damage, the Court would not have granted a new Trial in order to give him a Chance of obtaining larger Damages; and it is equally reasonable that the Court should not now grant a new Trial in order to give the Defendant a Chance of having lesser Damages given against him.

In an Action for Words the Jury gave 800*l*. Damages. A new Trial was moved for upon Account of the Excessiveness of the Damages : But it was refused; because the Judge before whom the Cause was tried reported, that the Plaintiff had given the Defendant no Provocation, and that he believed the Jury had done what they in their Consciences believed to be right.[102]

In an Action for criminal Conversation with the Plaintiff's Wife there was a Verdict for the Plaintiff with 500*l*. Damages. Upon a Motion for a new Trial on Account of the Excessiveness of the Damages, it appeared from the Report of Lord Mansfield Ch. J. before whom the Cause was tried, that the Woman had seduced the Defendant, and that the Defendant was in low Circumstances, being only a Clerk in the Exchequer at a Salary of Fifty Pounds a Year. A new Trial was refused; and by Lord Mansfield Ch. J. the Jury had all these Circumstances under their Consideration, and they are in every Action founded upon a Tort the proper Judges as to the Quantum of Damages.[103]

A new Trial was granted after a full Debate by Counsel on both Sides upon Account of the Excessiveness of the Damages in an Action for Words; and by Glyn Ch. J. Wherever the Court believe that the Jury gave their Verdict contrary to the Direction of the Judge before whom the Cause was tried a new Trial may be granted.[104]

But in another and fuller Report of this Case in the same Book the new Trial does not seem to have been granted merely upon Account of the Excessiveness of the Damages, but because the Jury had shewn a Partiality to the Plaintiff.[105]

In an Action of Assault and false Imprisonment the Jury gave 2000*l*. Damages, although the Plaintiff had been confined by her Mother only two or three Hours. A new Trial was granted on Account of the Excessiveness of the Damages; and by Holt Ch. J. the Jury were very shy of giving their Reasons for their Verdict, thinking they had an absolute Power to find it as they pleased : But this is a Mistake; for the Jury are to try the Cause with the Assistance of the Judge, and they ought to give their Reasons for their Verdict if they are required by the Judge so to do, that they may if they proceed upon a mistaken Notion be set right by him.[106]

In an Action of Assault and false Imprisonment the Verdict was for the Plaintiff with 300*l*. Damages. A new Trial being moved for on Account of the Excessiveness of the Damages it was refused; because the Court did not think that upon the whole Circumstances of this Case the Damages were too large. It was however in this Case said by Pratt Ch. J. that there is no Doubt but the Court may in every Action grant a new Trial upon Account of the Excessiveness of the Damages, although the Action be founded upon a Tort in which the Jury have no certain Rule of computing the Damages. But the Court should be very cautious of granting one in such a Case, and ought not to do it unless the Damages are quite enormous.[107]

5. FOR ANY NEGLECT OR MISTAKE IN THE COUNSEL OR ATTORNEY IN THE CAUSE.

A new Trial is said to have been granted, because the Counsel for the Defendant who did not expect that the Cause would be called on was absent.[108]

But it is added by the Reporter of this Case, that a new Trial had in a similar Case been refused.

And in a modern Case a new Trial was moved for because the Defendant's Attorney had neglected to attend the Trial of the Cause : But it was refused; Et per Cur' : As the Plaintiff has in this Case been guilty of no Fault there ought not to be a new Trial, which as his Witnesses may die or be out of the Way may be inconvenient to him : Nor is it necessary to grant one; for the Defendant who is bound by the Verdict has a Remedy against his own Attorney.[109]

At the Trial of the Cause a Matter of Law was started by the Judge before whom it was tried; the Consequence of which if it had been relied on must have been a Verdict for the Defendant : But instead of relying upon this the Defendant's Counsel put his Defence upon other Matters, and there was a Verdict for the Plaintiff. A new Trial being moved for it was refused; Et per Cur' : The Act of a Counsel in the Cause is always to be considered as the Act of his Client; and if he waves any Thing which would have been in Favour of his Client, it is the same Thing as if the Client does himself wave it. The Mistake of the Judge or of the Jury is always a good Reason for the granting of a new Trial : But it has never been held that the Mistake of a Counsel in the Cause is so.[110]

6. FOR ANY NEGLECT, MISTAKE OR FAULT, IN A PARTY TO THE CAUSE OR ONE OF HIS WITNESSES.

A new Trial was moved for, because a material Witness of the Party moving for this did not appear at the Trial of the Cause : But it was refused; Et per Cur' : If a new Trial was to be granted upon this Account one might be granted in almost every Case; for it would be almost always in the Power of a Party to prevail upon one of his own material Witnesses to be absent, on Purpose to make his Absence a Ground for the obtaining of a new Trial.[111]

Upon a Motion for a new Trial the Party who moved for it offered an Affidavit, that one of his material Witnesses did not appear at the Trial of the Cause : But the Court would not suffer this Affidavit to be read.[112]

But if the Appearance of a material Witness for one Party to the Cause has been prevented by any Contrivance of the other Party, as by the arresting of such Witness, the Court will grant a new Trial.[113]

So if the Appearance of a material Witness at the Trial of the Cause was prevented by his sudden Illness, this is a good Reason for the granting of a new Trial.[114]

It is however said that the Court will not in any Case grant a new Trial, because a material Witness did not appear at the Trial of the Cause, unless an Affidavit be produced of what he knows concerning the Matter in Question, that the Court may be able to judge of the Materiality of his Evidence.[115]

It is said that a Court of Equity will grant a new Trial, whenever it appears that the Witness, upon whose Testimony a Verdict at Law was principally founded, stands convicted of any infamous Crime.[116]

But it has been held that this is not a sufficient Ground for the granting of a new Trial; Et per Cur' : If the Record of the Conviction of such Witness had been produced at the Trial, the Judge would not have admitted his Testimony; and as this was not done the Party who has been guilty of a Neglect ought to suffer for it.[117]

It is in many Cases laid down that the Court will never grant a new Trial; because the Party who moves for it was not at the Trial of the Cause furnished with any Evidence, which it was in his Power to have been then furnished with.[118]

But it is said in one of these that if any material Evidence, of which the Party had no Knowledge at the Trial of the Cause, is afterwards discovered, this is a good Reason for the granting of a new Trial.[119]

The former however seems from what was laid down in a modern Case to be the better Opinion.

In an Action for criminal Conversation with the Plaintiff's Wife there was a Verdict for the Plaintiff, and 1000*l.* Damages were given. A new Trial was moved for upon an Affidavit of its having been discovered since the Trial, that the Woman was not the Wife of the Plaintiff; but it was refused; Et per Cur' : It is a settled Rule, that a new Trial is not to be granted on the Account of any Evidence having been discovered after the Trial, which by using due Diligence might have been discovered before the Cause was tried. It is laid down in divers Cases, that the Court will not grant a new Trial, because one of the Parties was not at the Trial of the Cause prepared to make out his Case; and it would be of the most dangerous Consequence to suffer one Party, after he has heard the Evidence of the other, to give new Evidence to contradict this. In the present Case the Defendant ought to have been prepared at the Trial to have proved that the Woman was not the Plaintiff's Wife; which was the very Gist of the

Action.[120]

A new Trial being moved for upon an Affidavit that a material Witness had made a Mistake in giving his Evidence at the Trial of the Cause it was refused; Et per Cur' : It would of the most dangerous Consequence to grant a new Trial after the Gist of the Cause is seen, in order to suffer a Witness to give Evidence different from what he had before given.[121]

Upon a Motion for a new Trial it appeared, that the Plaintiff's Attorney had wrote Letters to two Persons upon the Pannel, importuning them to appear and setting forth the Hardships his Client had suffered in the Cause. A new Trial was granted, and the Attorney was committed for having been guilty of Embracery; and he was obliged to pay Ten Pounds to the other Party towards his Costs, before the Court would consent to his being discharged.[122]

But it was in a later Case held that although one of the Parties has desired a Person to appear as a Juryman, this is not a good Reason for the granting of a new Trial.[123]

The latter Case is said to have been determined upon the Authority of the Case of Lady Herbert and Shaw.[124]

But the Case alluded to does not seem to warrant such a Determination.

In this Case the Duke of Leeds had wrote Letters to all the Persons upon the Pannel; every one of which Letters, after desiring the Person to appear at the Trial, concluded with these Words, "Which I shall take as a great Obligation, and shall be glad of an Occasion to shew you how much I am Sir your humble Servant." A new Trial being moved for on the Account of these Letters it was indeed refused; but it was refused upon the particular Circumstances of the Case, namely that the Defendant who had had Notice long before the Trial of these Letters did not move for a Trial at Bar, which the Plaintiff had offered to consent to; and it was moreover said by the Court, that such a Sort of Letter considered by itself is of the most dangerous Consequence, it being a Temptation to a Juryman to be partial.[125]

A new Trial was moved for, because the Plaintiff, in whose Favour it was, had after the finding of the Verdict given to every one of the Jurors Four Pounds, whereas by a Rule of the Court they were entitled to no more than Twenty Shillings each. The Court being equally divided no Rule could be made. Morton J. and Rainsford J. were of Opinion that although the Plaintiff might be punishable for Disobedience to the Rule of the Court, this was not a good Reason for the granting of a new Trial : But Keeling Ch. J. and Twisden J. were of Opinion that there ought to be a new Trial; for that if the Parties may give what they please to the Jurors after the Verdict, it is to be presumed that the Jurors will frequently be inclined to find a Verdict for that Party who is best able to reward them well.[126]

7. IN AN INDICTMENT OR INFORMATION.

The Court will not grant a new Trial where the Defendant in an Indictment or Information has been acquitted, although the Verdict was contrary to the Evidence.[127]

A new Trial being moved for because the Verdict for the Defendant in an Indictment for a Libel was contrary to the Evidence it was refused; Et per Cur' : A new Trial is never to be granted after an acquittal in a criminal Case, unless the Defendant has been guilty of some Fraud or bad Practice.[128]

The Defendant in an Information for a Riot having been acquitted a new Trial was moved for. The Verdict was in the Opinion of the Judge before whom the Information was tried contrary to the Evidence : Yet a new Trial was refused; because it did not appear to have been obtained by any corrupt Practice of the Defendant.[129]

Upon an Information in the Nature of a quo Warranto the Jury found for the Defendant. A new Trial was moved for; and the Judge before whom the Information was tried reported that the Verdict was in his Opinion contrary to the Evidence. Parker Ch. J. and Powis J. were of Opinion that a new Trial might in this Case be granted : But Eyre J. and Pratt J. were of a contrary Opinion. The Court of King's Bench being thus divided the rest of the Judges were consulted; who being also equally divided in their Opinions the Rule for a new Trial was of Course discharged.[130]

A new Trial was moved for because the Verdict, which was for the Defendant in an Information in the Nature of a quo Warranto, was contrary to the Evidence : But the Court refused to grant a Rule to shew Cause; and by Lee Ch. J. in Rex and Bennet the Judges were equally divided in their Opinions, whether a new Trial could in such Case be granted; and in Rex and Jones, Trin. 10 G. 1. wherein the same Question arose, the Court did not come to any Determination.[131]

It has been held that if the Defendant in an Indictment or Information has been acquitted by some Trick or Fraud of his own, he may be punished by Information for such Trick or Fraud, but that the Court will not grant a new Trial.[132]

And it is said to have been formerly held, that if the Defendant in an Indictment or Information had been acquitted the Court would not in any Case grant a new Trial, although the Verdict was obtained by some Trick or Fraud of the Defendant.[133]

But it seems to be the better Opinion, that if the Defendant in an Indictment or Information has obtained a Verdict by any Trick or Fraud of his own, the Court will in every Case except that of an Indictment for a capital Offence grant a new Trial.[134]

A new Trial was granted after the Defendant in an Indictment for keeping a Bawdy House had been acquitted : Because the Trial was brought on by the Defendant, and he had not given due Notice of Trial to the Prosecutor.[135]

It seems to be settled that a new Trial may be granted in an Indictment or Information, in Case the Defendant has been found guilty.[136]

It has indeed been formerly held, that the Court cannot grant a new Trial at the Instance of the Defendant in an Indictment or Information, without the Consent of the King's Counsel.[137]

But it has been since held, that the Court may grant a new Trial at the Instance of the Defendant in an Indictment or Information without the Consent of the King's Counsel; and it is in this Case said that Mr. Siderfin is mistaken in his Report of the Case of Read and Dawson.[138]

A new Trial cannot be moved for by a Defendant in an Indictment or Information after an Interlocutory Judgment has been signed.[139]

Upon a Motion for a new Trial at the Instance of the Defendant in an Indictment for Forgery it was insisted, that it was not necessary for him to be present in Court at the making of the Motion; for that this is different from the Case of a Motion in Arrest of Judgment: But it was held that he must be present in Court when such Motion is made; Et per Cur' : The Verdict fixes such a Suspicion of Guilt upon the Defendant, that the Court will always be sure of him before they intimate any Opinion concerning the granting of a new Trial; and the Chief Justice mentioned two Cases in which the Distinction attempted to be made in this Case had been overruled.[140]

8. IN A PENAL ACTION.

The Court will not grant a new Trial at the Instance of the Plaintiff in a penal Action.

In an Action for the Penalty given by Statute for killing a Hare, the Jury found for the Defendant contrary to the Direction of the Judge before whom the Cause was tried. A new Trial being moved for it was refused : Because the Action was a penal one.[141]

In an Action for the Penalty given by Statute for selling less than two Gallons of Spirituous Liquors the Fact was proved; and Eyre Ch. J. before whom the Cause was tried directed the Jury to find for the Plaintiff. Notwithstanding this Direction the Verdict was for the Defendant, yet a new Trial was refused.[142]

In an Action for the Penalty given by Statute for the fraudulent Exportation of Jesuits Bark, the Verdict was for the Defendant. A Motion was made for a new Trial : But it was refused by the whole Court of Exchequer.[143]

The Reporter does indeed add that it seemed to be admitted, that a new Trial might be granted in a Case of this Nature if the Fact would have admitted thereof; and the Counsel for the Plaintiff were prepared with Precedents to this Purpose.

But he does not mention where any such Precedent is to be met with, and this Doctrine is contrary to what is laid down in a later Case.

An Action having been brought for the Penalty given by the Statute against Horse-Racing, the Jury found a Verdict contrary to plain Evidence for the Defendant. A new Trial was refused in this Case; Et per Cur' : As there is no Proof in this Case of any Misbehaviour in the Defendant, it is within the Reason of the Practice of the Court of Exchequer, in which a new Trial is never granted at the Instance of the Plaintiff in an Action for a Penalty given by a Statute, unless the Defendant has been guilty of some Misbehaviour.[144]

9. IN SOME OTHER CASES.

It is laid down in some Cases, that the Court will never grant a new Trial in an Ejectment; because as the Verdict in this Action is not conclusive another Ejectment may be brought, and consequently there is no Necessity for the granting of a new Trial.[145]

And in one Modern Case it is said, that the Court will not grant a new Trial in an Ejectment, unless the Case be so particularly circumstanced that Justice cannot otherwise be attained.[146]

But these Cases do not seem to be Law.

For in one Modern Case it is only said, that the Court will not grant a new Trial in an Ejectment where the Verdict is for the Defendant; from whence it may fairly be inferred, that where the Verdict is for the Plaintiff a new Trial may be had.[147]

And in another very recent Case it is expresly laid down, that where the Verdict is for the Plaintiff the Court will grant a new Trial as readily in an Ejectment as in any other Action.

A Motion being made for a new Trial in an Ejectment it was refused upon the particular Circumstances of the Case : But by Lord Mansfield Ch. J. it is not true that the Court will in no case grant a new Trial so readily in an Ejectment as in another Action. Where the Verdict is for the Defendant the Court will not indeed grant a new Trial but for very strong Reasons; because as the Verdict is not conclusive the Plaintiff may bring another Ejectment: But where the Verdict is for the Plaintiff, the Court will grant a new Trial just as readily in an Ejectment as in any other Action, and the Court ought so to do; for if the Possession should once be changed in consequence of a Verdict in an Ejectment, it would perhaps answer no Purpose for the Person who has lost his Possession, which was perhaps his only Title, to be at Liberty to bring another Ejectment.[148]

Bacon Abridgment, vol. 5, pp. 227–28, 238–53.

THE subject of our next enquiries will be the nature and method of the trial by jury; called also the trial per pais, or by the country. A trial that hath been used time out of mind in this nation, and seems to have been co-eval with the first civil government thereof. Some authors have endeavoured to trace the original of juries up as high as the Britons themselves, the first inhabitants of our island; but certain it is, that they were in use among the earliest Saxon colonies, their institution being ascribed by bishop Nicolson to Woden himself, their great legislator and captain. Hence it is, that we may find traces of juries in the laws of all those nations which adopted the feodal system, as in Germany, France, and Italy; who had all of them a tribunal composed of twelve good men and true, "boni homines," usually the vasals or tenants of the lord, being the equals or peers of the parties litigant: and, as the lord's vasals judged each other in the lord's courts, so the king's vasals, or the lords themselves, judged each other in the king's court. In England we find actual mention of them so early as the laws of king Ethelred, and that not as a new invention. Stiernhook ascribes the invention of the jury, which in the Teutonic languages is denominated nembda, to Regner, king of Sweden and Denmark, who was co-temporary with our king Egbert. Just as we are apt to impute the invention of this, and some other pieces of juridical polity, to the superior genius of Alfred the great; to whom, on account of his having done much, it is usual to attribute every thing: and as the tradition of antient Greece placed to the account of their one Hercules whatever atchievement [sic] was performed superior to the ordinary prowess of mankind. Whereas the truth seems to be, that this tribunal was universally established among all the northern nations, and so interwoven in their very constitution, that the earliest accounts of the one give us also some traces of the other. It's establishment however and use, in this island, of what date soever it be, though for a time greatly impaired and shaken by the introduction of the Norman trial by battel, was always so highly esteemed and valued by the people, that no conquest, no change of government, could ever prevail to abolish it. In magna carta it is more than once insisted on as the principal bulwark of our liberties; but especially by chap. 29. that no freeman shall be hurt in either his person or property, "nisi per legale judicium parium suorum vel per legem terrae.["] A privilege which is couched in almost the same words with that of the emperor Conrad, two hundred years before: "nemo beneficium suum perdat, nisi secundum consuetudinem antecessorum nostrorum et per judicium parium suorum." And it was ever esteemed, in all countries, a privilege of the highest and most beneficial nature.

TRIALS by jury in civil causes are of two kinds; extraordinary, and ordinary. The extraordinary I shall only briefly hint at, and confine the main of my observations to that which is more usual and ordinary.

WITH regard to the ordinary trial by jury in civil cases, I shall pursue the same method in considering it, that I set out with in explaining the nature of prosecuting actions in general, viz. by following the order and course of the proceedings themselves, as the most clear and perspicuous way of treating it.

WHEN therefore an issue is joined, by these words, "and this the said A prays may be enquired of by the country," or, "and of this he puts himself upon the country, and the said B does the like," the court awards a writ of venire facias upon the roll or record, commanding the sheriff "that he cause to come here on such day, twelve free and lawful men, liberos et legales homines, of the body of his county, by whom the truth of the matter may be better known, and who are neither of kin to the aforesaid A, nor the aforesaid B, to recognize the truth of the issue between the said parties." And such writ is accordingly issued to the sheriff.

THUS the cause stands ready for the trial at the bar of the court itself: for all trials were there antiently had, in actions which were there first commenced; which never happened but in matters of weight and consequence, all trifling suits being ended in the court-baron, hundred, or county courts: and all causes of great importance or difficulty are still usually retained upon motion, to be tried at the bar in the superior courts. But when the usage began, to bring actions of any trifling value in the courts of Westminster-hall, it was found to be an intolerable burthen to compel the parties, witnesses, and jurors, to come from Westmorland perhaps or Cornwall, to try an action of assault at Westminster. Therefore the legislature took into consideration, that the king's justices came usually twice in the year into the several counties, ad capiendas assisas, to take or try writs of assise, of mort d'ancestor, novel disseisin, nusance, and the like. The form of which writs we may remember was stated to be, that they commanded the sheriff to summon an assise or jury, and go to view the land in question; and then to have the said jury ready at the next coming of the justices of assise (together with the parties) to recognize and determine the disseisin, or other injury complained of. As therefore these judges were ready in the country to administer justice in real actions of assise, the legislature thought proper to refer other matters in issue to be also determined before them, whether of a mixed or personal kind. And therefore it was enacted by statute Westm. 2. 13 Edw. I. c. 30. that a clause of nisi prius should be inserted in all the aforesaid writs of venire facias; that is, "that the sheriff should cause the jurors to come to Westminster (or wherever the king's courts should be held) on such a day in easter and michaelmas terms; nisi prius, unless before that day the justices assigned to take assises shall come into his said county." By virtue of which the sheriff returned his jurors to the court of the justices of assise, which was sure to be held in the vacation before easter and michaelmas terms; and there the trial was had.

LET us now pause awhile, and observe (with sir Matthew Hale) in these first preparatory stages of the trial, how admirably this constitution is adapted and framed for the investigation of truth, beyond any other method of trial in the world. For, first the person returning the jurors is a man of some fortune and consequence; that so he may be not only the less tempted to commit wilful errors, but likewise be responsible for the faults of either himself or his officers: and he is also bound by the obligation of an oath faithfully to execute his duty. Next, as to the time of their return: the panel is returned to the court upon the original venire, and the jurors are to be summoned and brought in many weeks afterwards to the trial, whereby the parties may have notice of the jurors, and of their sufficiency or insufficiency, characters, connections, and relations, that so they may be challenged upon just cause; while at the same time by means of the compulsory process (of distringas or habeas corpora) the cause is not like to be retarded through defect of jurors. Thirdly, as to the place of their appearance: which in causes of weight and consequence is at the bar of the court; but in ordinary cases at the assises, held in the county where the cause of action arises, and the witnesses and jurors live: a provision most excellently calculated for the saving of expense to the parties. For, though the preparation of the causes in point of pleading is transacted at Westminster, whereby the order and uniformity of proceeding is preserved throughout the kingdom, and multiplicity of forms is prevented; yet this is no great charge or trouble, one attorney being able to transact the business of forty clients. But the troublesome and most expensive attendance is that of jurors and witnesses at the trial; which therefore is brought home to them, in the country where most of them inhabit. Fourthly, the persons before whom they are to appear, and before whom the trial is to be held, are the judges of the superior court, if it be a trial at bar; or the judges of assise, delegated from the courts at Westminster by the king, if the trial be held in the country: persons, whose learning and dignity secure their jurisdiction from contempt, and the novelty and very parade of whose appearance have no small influence upon the multitude. The very point of their being strangers in the county is of infinite service, in preventing those factions and parties, which would intrude in every cause of moment, were it tried only before persons resident on the spot, as justices of the peace, and the like. And, the better to remove all suspicion of partiality, it was wisely provided by the statutes 4 Edw. III. c. 2. 8 Ric. II. c. 2. and 33 Hen. VIII. c. 24. that no judge of assise should hold pleas in any county wherein he was born or inhabits. And, as this constitution prevents party and faction from intermingling in the trial of right, so it keeps both the rule and the administration of the laws uniform. These justices, though thus varied and shifted at every assises, are all sworn to the same laws, have had the same education, have pursued the same studies, converse and consult together, communicate their decisions and resolutions, and preside in those courts which are mutually connected and their judgments blended together, as they are interchangeably courts of appeal or advice to each other. And hence their administration of justice, and conduct of trials, are consonant and uniform; whereby that confusion and contrariety are avoided, which would naturally arise from a variety of uncommunicating judges, or from any provincial establishment. …

A COMMON jury is one returned by the sheriff according to the directions of the statute 3 Geo. II. c. 25. which appoints, that the sheriff shall not return a separate panel for every separate cause, as formerly; but one and the same panel for every cause to be tried at the same assises, containing not less than forty eight, nor more than seventy two, jurors: and that their names, being written on tickets, shall be put into a box or glass; and when each cause is called, twelve of these persons, whose names shall be first drawn out of the box, shall be sworn upon the jury, unless absent, challenged, or excused; and unless a previous view of the lands, or tenements, or other matters in question, shall have been thought necessary by the court: in which case six or more of the jurors returned, to be agreed on by the parties, or named by a judge or other proper officer of the court, shall be appointed to take such view; and then such of the jury as have appeared upon the view (if any) shall be sworn on the inquest previous to any other jurors. These acts are well calculated to restrain any suspicion of partiality in the sheriff, or any tampering with the jurors when returned.

As the jurors appear, when called, they shall be sworn, unless challenged by either party. Challenges are of two sorts; challenges to the array, and challenges to the polls.

BUT challenges to the polls of the jury (who are judges of fact) are reduced to four heads by sir Edward Coke: propter honoris respectum; propter defectum; propter affectum; and propter delictum.

3. JURORS may be challenged propter affectum, for suspicion of biass or partiality. This may be either a principal challenge, or to the favour. A principal challenge is such, where the cause assigned carries with it prima facie evident marks of suspicion, either of malice or favour: as, that a juror is of kin to either party within the ninth degree; that he has been arbitrator on either side; that he has an interest in the cause; that there is an action depending between him and the party; that he has taken money for his verdict; that he has formerly been a juror in the same cause; that he is the party's master, servant, counsellor, steward or attorney, or of the same society or corporation with him: all these are principal causes of challenge; which, if true, cannot be overruled, for jurors must be omni exceptione majores. Challenges to the favour, are where the party hath no principal challenge; but objects only some probable circumstances of suspicion, as acquaintance, and the like; the validity of which must be left to the determination of triors, whose office it is to decide whether the juror be favourable or unfavourable. The triors, in case the first man called be challenged, are two indifferent persons named by the court; and, if they try one man and find him indifferent, he shall be sworn; and then he and the two triors shall try the next; and when another is found indifferent and sworn, and two triors shall be superseded, and the two first sworn on the jury shall try the rest.

4. CHALLENGES propter delictum are for some crime of misdemesnor, that affects the juror's credit and renders him infamous. As for a conviction of treason, felony, perjury, or conspiracy; or if he hath received judgment of the pillory, tumbrel, or the like; or to be branded, whipt, or stigmatized; or if he be outlawed or excommunicated, or hath been attainted of false verdict, praemunire, or forgery; or lastly, if he hath proved recreant when champion in the trial by battel, and thereby hath lost his liberam legem. A juror may himself be examined on oath of voir dire, veritatem dicere, with regard to the three former of these causes of challenge, which are not to his dishonour; but not with regard to his head of challenge, propter delictum, which would be to make him either forswear or accuse himself, if guilty.

WHEN the evidence is gone through on both sides, the judge in the presence of the parties, the counsel, and all others, sums up the whole to the jury; omitting all superfluous circumstances, observing wherein the main question and principal issue lies, stating what evidence has been given to support it, with such remarks as he thinks necessary for their direction, and giving them his opinion in matters of law arising upon that evidence.

THE jury, after the proofs are summed up, unless the case be very clear, withdraw from the bar to consider of their verdict: and, in order to avoid intemperance and causeless delay, are to be kept without meat, drink, fire, or candle, unless by permission of the judge, till they are all unanimously agreed. A method of accelerating unanimity not wholly unknown in other constitutions of Europe, and in matters of greater concern. For by the golden bulle of the empire, if, after the congress is opened, the electors delay the election of a king of the Romans for thirty days, they shall be fed only with bread and water, till the same is accomplished. But if our juries eat or drink at all, or have any eatables about them, without consent of the court, and before verdict, it is fineable; and if they do so at his charge for whom they afterwards find, it will set aside the verdict. Also if they speak with either of the parties or their agents, after they are gone from the bar; or if they receive any fresh evidence in private; or if to prevent disputes they cast lots for whom they shall find; any of these circumstances will entirely vitiate the verdict. And it has been held, that if the jurors do not agree in their verdict before the judges are about to leave the town, though they are not to be threatened or imprisoned, the judges are not bound to wait for them, but may carry them round the circuit from town to town in a cart. This necessity of a total unanimity seems to be peculiar to our own constitution; or, at least, in the nembda or jury of the antient Goths, there was required (even in criminal cases) only the consent of the major part; and in case of an equality, the defendant was held to be acquitted.

WHEN they are all unanimously agreed, the jury return back to the bar; and, before they deliver their verdict, the plaintiff is bound to appear in court, by himself, attorney, or counsel, in order to answer the amercement to which by the old law he is liable, as has been formerly mentioned, in case he fails in his suit, as a punishment for his false claim. To be amerced, or a mercie, is to be at the king's mercy with regard to the fine to be imposed; in misericordia domini regis pro falso clamore suo. The amercement is disused, but the form still continues; and if the plaintiff does not appear, no verdict can be given, but the plaintiff is said to be nonsuit, non sequitur clamorem suum. Therefore it is usual for a plaintiff, when he or his counsel perceives that he has not given evidence sufficient to maintain his issue, to be voluntarily nonsuited, or withdraw himself: whereupon the crier is ordered to call the plaintiff; and if neither he, nor any body for him, appears, he is nonsuited, the jurors are discharged, the action is at an end, and the defendant shall recover his costs. The reason of this practice is, that a nonsuit is more eligible for the plaintiff, than a verdict against him: for after a nonsuit, which is only a default, he may commence the same suit again for the same cause of action; but after a verdict had, and judgment consequent thereupon, he is for ever barred from attacking the defendant upon the same ground of complaint. But, in case the plaintiff appears, the jury by their foreman deliver in their verdict.

A VERDICT, vere dictum, is either privy, or public. A privy verdict is when the judge hath left or adjourned the court; and the jury, being agreed, in order to be delivered from their confinement, obtain leave to give their verdict privily to the judge out of court: which privy verdict is of no force, unless afterwards affirmed by a public verdict given openly in court; wherein the jury may, if they please, vary from their privy verdict. So that the privy verdict is indeed a mere nullity; and yet it is a dangerous practice, allowing time for the parties to tamper with the jury, and therefore very seldom indulged. But the only effectual and legal verdict is the public verdict; in which they openly declare to have found the issue for the plaintiff, or for the defendant; and if for the plaintiff, they assess the damages also sustained by the plaintiff, in consequence of the injury upon which the action is brought.

13.3.2.1Den dem. Bayard v. Singleton, 1787

That by the constitution every citizen has undoubtedly a right to a decision of his property by a trial by jury. For that if the Legislature could take away this right, and require him to stand condemned in his property without a trial, it might with as much authority require his life to be taken way without a trial by jury, and that he should stand condemned to die, without the formality of any trial at all: that if the members of the General Assembly could do this, they might with equal authority, not only render themselves the Legislators of the State for life, without any further election of the people, from thence transmit the dignity and authority of legislation down to their heirs male forever.

14.1.1.17.b A Message from the House of Representatives —

Mr. Beckley, their Clerk, brought up the Amendments to the "Articles to be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, as Amendments to the Constitution of the United States;" and informed the Senate, that the House of Representatives had receded from their disagreement to the 1st, 3d, 5th, 6th, 7th, 9th, 10th, 11th, 14th, 15th, 17th, 20th, 21st, 22d, 23d, and 24th Amendments, insisted on by the Senate: Provided that the "Two Articles, which by the Amendments of the Senate are now proposed to be inserted as the third and eighth Articles," shall be amended to read as followeth:

Article the Third. "Congress shall make no Law respecting an establishment of Religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of Speech, or of the Press; or the right of the People peaceably to assemble, and petition the Government for a redress of Grievances."

Article the Eighth. "In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial Jury of the State and District, wherein the crime shall have been committed, which District shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation, to be confronted with the witnesses against him, and to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of Counsel for his defence."

14.2.1.2.a The house went into a committee of the whole, on the subject of amendments.

[T]he committee … then proceeded to the 6th clause of the 4th proposition in these words, "excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted."

Mr. Smith (of S.C.) objected to the words "nor cruel and unusual punishments," the import of them being too indefinite.

Mr. Livermore.

The clause seems to express a great deal of humanity, on which account I have no objection to it; but as it seems to have no meaning in it, I do not think it necessary. What is meant by the terms excessive bail? Who are to be the judges? What is understood by excessive fines? It lays with the court to determine. No cruel and unusual punishment is to be inflicted; it is sometimes necessary to hang a man, villains often deserve whipping, and perhaps having their ears cut off; but are we in future to be prevented from inflicting these punishments because they are cruel? If a more lenient mode of correcting vice and deterring others from the commission of it could be invented, it would be very prudent in the legislature to adopt it, but until we have some security that this will be done, we ought not to be restrained from making necessary laws by any declaration of this kind.

The question was put on the clause, and it was agreed to by a considerable majority.

9th Amendment. "Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted."

Mr. Livermore said, the clause appears to express much humanity, as such, he liked it; but as it appeared to have no meaning, he did not like it: As to bail, the term is indefinite, and must be so from the nature of things; and so with respect to fines; and as to punishments, taking away life is sometimes necessary, but because it may be thought cruel, will you therefore never hang any body — the truth is, matters of this kind must be left to the discretion of those who have the administration of the laws.

This amendment was adopted.

14.2.2STATE CONVENTIONS

14.2.2.1Massachusetts, January 30, 1788

What gives an additional glare of horror to these gloomy circumstances is the consideration, that Congress have to ascertain, point out, and determine, what kind of punishments shall be inflicted on persons convicted of crimes. They are nowhere restrained from inventing the most cruel and unheard-of punishments, and annexing them to crimes; and there is no constitutional check on them, but that racks and gibbets may be amongst the most mild instruments of their discipline.

Elliot, vol. 2, p. 111.

14.2.2.2Virginia

14.2.2.2.aJune 14, 1788

Mr. HENRY…

> … Congress, from their general powers, may fully go into business of human legislation. They may legislate, in criminal cases, from treason to the lowest offence — petty larceny. They may define crimes and prescribe punishments. In the definition of crimes, I trust they will be directed by what wise representatives ought to be governed by. But when we come to punishments, no latitude ought to be left, nor dependence put on the virtue of representatives. What says our bill of rights? — "that excessive bail ought not to be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted." Are you not, therefore, now calling on those gentlemen who are to compose Congress, to prescribe trials and define punishments without this control? Will they find sentiments there similar to this bill of rights? You let them loose; you do more — you depart from the genius of your country. …
>
> In this business of legislation, your members of Congress will lose the restriction of not imposing excessive fines, demanding excessive bail, and inflicting cruel and unusual punishments. These are prohibited by your declaration of rights. What has distinguished our ancestors? — That they would not admit of tortures, or cruel and barbarous punishment. But Congress may introduce the practice of the civil law, in preference to that of the common law. They may introduce the practice of France, Spain, and Germany — of torturing, to extort a confession of the crime. They will say that they might as well draw examples from those countries as from Great Britain, and they will tell you that there is such a necessity of strengthening the arm of government, that they must have a criminal equity, and extort confession by torture, in order to punish with still more relentless severity. We are then lost and undone. …

Mr. GEORGE NICHOLAS. …

> … But the gentleman says that, by this Constitution, they have power to make laws to define crimes and prescribe punishments; and that, consequently, we are not free from torture. … If we had no security against torture but our declaration of rights, we might be tortured tomorrow; for it has been repeatedly infringed and disregarded. A bill of rights is only an acknowledgement of the prëexisting claim to rights in the people. …
> Mr. GEORGE MASON replied that the worthy gentleman was mistaken

in his assertion that the bill of rights did not prohibit torture; for that one clause expressly provided that no man can give evidence against himself; and that the worthy gentleman must know that, in those countries where torture is used, evidence was extorted from the criminal himself. Another clause of the bill of rights provided that no cruel or unusual punishments shall be inflicted; therefore, torture was included in the prohibition.

Mr. NICHOLAS acknowledged the bill of rights to contain that prohibition, and that the gentleman was right with respect to the practice of extorting confession from the criminal in those countries where torture is used; but still he saw no security arising from the bill of rights as separate from the Constitution, for that it had been frequently violated with impunity.

Elliot, vol. 3, pp. 447–48, 451–52.

Gov. RANDOLPH. …

As to the exclusion of excessive bail and fines, and cruel and unusual punishments, this would follow of itself, without a bill of rights. Observations have been made about watchfulness over those in power which deserve our attention. There must be a combination; we must presume corruption in the House of Representatives, Senate, and President, before we can suppose that excessive fines can be imposed or cruel punishments inflicted. Their number is the highest security. Numbers are the highest security in our own Constitution, which has attracted so many eulogiums from the gentlemen. Here we have launched into a sea of suspicions. How shall we check power? By their numbers. Before these cruel punishments can be inflicted, laws must be passed, and judges must judge contrary to justice. This would excite universal discontent and detestation of the members of the government. They might involve their friends in the calamities resulting from it, and could be removed from office. I never desire a greater security than this, which I believe to be absolutely sufficient.

that of the individual states; for the power of the former is as complete to the purpose of requiring bail, imposing fines, inflicting punishments, granting search warrants, and seizing persons, papers, or property, in certain cases, as the other.

… For instance, if Congress should pass a law that persons charged with capital crimes shall not have a right to demand the cause or nature of the accusation, shall not be confronted with the accusers or witnesses, or call for evidence in their own favor; and a question should arise respecting their authority therein, — can it be said that they have exceeded the limits of their jurisdiction, when that has no limits; when no provision has been made for such a right? — When no responsibility on the part of Congress has been required by the constitution? The same observation may be made on any arbitrary or capricious imprisonments contrary to the law of the land. The same may be made, if excessive bail should be required; if excessive fines should be imposed; if cruel and unusual punishments should be inflicted; if the liberty of the press should be restrained; in a word — if laws should be made totally derogatory to the whole catalogue of rights, which are now secured under your present form of government.

Virginia Independent Chronicle, Storing, vol. 5, p. 185.

14.2.4.6Marcus, No. 4, March 12, 1788

As to the constituting of new crimes, and inflicting unusual and severe punishment, certainly the cases enumerated wherein the Congress are empowered either to define offences, or prescribe punishments, are such as are proper for the exercise of such authority in the general Legislature of the Union. They only relate to “counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States; to piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and offences against the law of nations, and to treason against the United States.” These are offences immediately affecting the security, the honor or the interest of the United States at large, and of course must come within the sphere of the Legislative authority which is entrusted with their protection. Beyond these authorities Congress can exercise no other power of this kind, except in the enacting of penalties, to enforce their acts of Legislation in the cases where express authority is delegated to them, and if they could not enforce such acts by the enacting of penalties those powers would be altogether useless, since a legislative regulation without some sanction would be an absurd thing indeed. The Congress having, for these reasons, a just right to authority in the above particulars, the question is, whether it is practicable and proper to prescribe the limits to its exercise, for fear that they should inflict punishments unusual and severe? It may be observed, in the first place, that a declaration against “cruel and unusual punishments,” formed part of an article in the Bill of Rights at the Revolution in England, in 1688. The prerogative of the Crown having been grossly abused in some preceding reigns, it was thought proper to notice every grievance they had endured, and those declarations went to an abuse of power in the crown only, but were never intended to limit the authority of Parliament. Many of these articles of the Bill of Rights in England, without a due attention to the difference of the cases, were eagerly adopted when our Constitutions were formed, the minds of men then being so warmed with their exertions in the cause of liberty, as to lean too much perhaps towards a jealousy of power to repose a proper confidence in their own government. From these articles in the State Constitutions, many things were attempted to be transplanted into our new Constitution, which would either have been nugatory or improper: This is one of them. The expressions “unusual and severe,” or “cruel and unusual,” surely would have been too vague to have been of any consequence, since they admit of no clear and precise signification. If to guard against punishments being too severe, the Convention had enumerated a vast variety of cruel punishments, and prohibited the use of any of them, let the number have been ever so great, an inexhaustible fund must have been unmentioned, and if our government had been disposed to be cruel, to their invention would only have been put to a little more trouble. If to avoid this difficulty, they had determined, not negatively, what punishments should not be exercised, but positively what punishments should, this must have led them into a labyrinth of detail which in the original constitution of a government would have appeared perfectly ridiculous, and not left a room for such changes according to circumstances, as must be in the power of every Legislature that is rationally formed. Thus, when we enter into particulars, we must be convinced that the proposition of such a restriction would have led to nothing useful, or to something dangerous, and therefore that its omission is not chargeable as a fault in the new Constitution. Let us also remember, that as those who are to make those laws must themselves be subject to them, their own interest and feelings will dictate to them not to make them unnecessarily severe; and that in the case of treason, which usually in every country exposes men most to the avarice and rapacity of government, care is taken that the innocent family of the offender shall not suffer for the treason of their relation. This is the crime with respect to which a jealousy is of the most importance, and accordingly it is defined with great plainness and accuracy, and the temptations to abusive prosecutions guarded against as much as possible. …

For want of taking sufficient Bail, the Justices are fineable: If it be tendred and refused, they shall be grievously amerced in case when it is grantable, 3 Ed. 1. c. 15. 23 H 6. c. 10. On the other side where a person is not bailable, if he be let to Mainprise, it is a negligent Escape, and fineable as before, 25 Ed. 3. f. 39. and see Stamf. 33. and 79.

If any Sheriff, Constable, &c. shall bail any person in their Custody not bailable, and being convict thereof, he loses his Fees and Office for ever; but if an UnderSheriff, &c. shall do so without his Masters knowledge, he shall be imprisoned for three years, and fined at the King's pleasure, 3 Ed. 1. c. 15. Doct. &. Stud. 135.

Note, Officers which let to Bail contrary to 3 Ed. 1. cap. 15. Shall be punished by the Justice of Gaol delivery either according to the Statute or at Common Law.

Justices and Coroners within London and Middlesex, and Towns Corporate, have power to Bail Felons, &c. as they have formerly accustomed, 1 & 2 Ph. & Mar. c. 13.

It is held by the Authority of 23 H. 6. f. 1. That if a Sheriff, &c. shall Bail a person not bailable, the Recognizance is void.[1]

No person arrested for manslaughter, Felony or Suspicion thereof, shall be let to Bail by any Justice but in open Session, or by two of them at the least, Quorum unus, and both must be present at the time of Bailment, 1 & 2 Ph. & Mar. cap. 13.

The Justice which commits a Prisoner ought to shew in the Mittimus the Cause thereof, that it may appear whether Bailable or not.

Where one is Bailable by Law, Action lies against the Justice of Peace that committed him, Styles Rep. 182.

A Felon examined and committed by two Justices may be Bailed by one alone, Keble p. 188. §. 33.

One found guilty of Manslaughter by the Coroners Inquest denied to be Bailed in the Kings Bench, 1 Rol. Rep. 268.

One Herbert was Bailed for Murther, Latch. fo. 12.

One Outlawed of Murther bailed, Stiles [sic] 93.

Two suspected of Murther bailed, Styles 96.

One for suspicion of Treason bailed, 2 Sid. 179.

In the four Cases following a person is not Bailable at Common Law; See Westm. 1. cap. 15. Bro. Mainprise 47. F. N. B. 66 E.[2]

1. A person taken for the death of a man, sc. Murderer, or any other Homicide. See now Stat. 1 & 2 Ph. & Mar. cap. 13. which admits Bail for any Homicide except Murther.

> But the Justices cannot Bail a Manslayer if he confess the Offence to be taken in the manner, Dalt. c. 125.

2. No person taken by the King's Commandment, by his own Mouth, or by his Privy Council, is Bailable, Stamf. 72. Bro. Mainpris. 37, 47.

3. Person taken by the Commandment of the King's Justices, and this must be meant of their absolute Commandment for Misdemeanors in their presence, Stamf. 73.

4. Trespassers in the Forest were not Bailable by the Common Law, but that was remedied by 1 Ed 3. cap. 8. and 7 R. 2. cap. 4. And now by the Statute of 1 & 2 Ph. & Mar. cap. 13. it is provided, That no Justice of the Peace shall let to Bail contrary to the Statute of Westm. 1. cap. 15. by which Statute these persons following are not Bailable.

> 1. One that hath abjured the Realm. 2. An Approver. 3. One appealed by the Approvers, so long as the Approver lives, unless he be of good Fame, or that the Approver wave his Appeal or be vanquished, Stamf. 74. 25 Ed. 3. f. 42. 4. He that is taken for the Burning of an House. 5. One taken by an Excommunicato Capiende. 6. One taken with the manner. 7. A Thief openly defamed and known. 8. All persons outlawed, unless in some Cases such may be Bailed by the Court, Stamf. 74. 9. One that hath broke Prison. 10. Imprisoned for Treason touching the King himself. 11. One taken for falsifying the Kings moneys. 12. He which Counterfeits the Kings Seal, Bro. Mainprise 59. 13. Such as are taken for a great and manifest Offence, as one indicted and imprisoned for a Riot, &c.

By the aforesaid Statute persons are Bailable in the six ensuing Cases.[3]

1. One taken or indicted for a light suspicion of Felony, Lamb. 335. F. N. B. 249, 250, 251. F. unless he be of evil Fame, or that there be some strong presumption against him, Stamf. 74.

2. Taken or indicted for Petty Larceny, if not guilty of some Larceny before, Fitz. Mainprise 2. Fitz. 250.

3. Such as be indicted for Larceny before Sheriff, Coroner, &c. or in some base Court; if likewise of good Fame, Stamf. 47. Fitz 247. and 250. Fitz. Mainprise 97.

4. One indicted before the Coroner for killing a Man Se defendendo was Bailed by the Justices of Gaol-delivery. A Murderer indicted at the Kings Suit and acquitted within the year and day shall be either committed to Prison or Bailed until the year and day be passed, that the Wife or next Heir may bring their Appeal within that time, 3 H. 7. cap. 1. and Fitz. 251 G.

One Convict of Felony, and remaining in Prison, obtains the Kings Pardon, the Justices of the Gaol-delivery may Bail him, if he may come in with his Pardon at the next Gaol-delivery, Bro. Mainprise 94.

5. Such as are charged with the Receipt of Thieves, Felons, or of Command, or Force or Aid in Felony done, be Bailable, Stamf. 71. Bro. Mainprise 11. and 39. 58.

It seems that Abettors, Consentors, Procurers, and all Accessories to Felony, Bailable, are within the Equity of this Statute, as well in the Case of Murder as otherwise. But after the Principal is attainted they cannot be Bailed, until after they have come in and pleaded, for when he makes default it is in nature of a Fugam fecit, and a great cause of Suspicion, which when he appears is taken away, and so he becomes Bailable, Stamf. 71. Bro. Mainprise 6, 9, 22, 54, 64, 97.

If I. be Accessory to two, and but one Principal is Attaint, I. shall not be Bailed.

If the Principal in Felony die in Prison or be attainted of another Felony, the Accessory is Bailable, Fitz. Coron. 378. Bro. Mainprise 91.

6. Persons indicted of any Trespass not concerning Life or Member are Bailable. Westm. 1. c. 15.

A person imprisoned by a Process from the Sessions is Bailable by two Justices (1 Quorum) out of Sessions, Lamb. 337.

Justices of Peace can Bail no Prisoner, but such as is committed for Causes which may be heard and determined before themselves.

See the excellent Statute made 13 Car. 2. cap. 2. in favour of the Liberty of the Subject, appointing how, and in what Cases, when and by whom Prisoners shall be Bailed or discharged; but this concerns not the Justice of Peace.

Alehouses without License shall be committed without Bail; so if they have been suppressed, Vide Tit. Alehouses.[4]

Such as shall suffer Townsmen to continue Tipling in their Houses, or such as shall sell less than is appointed by the Stat. 1 Jac. cap. 9. 21 Jac. cap. 7.

Persons convict upon the Statute of Northampton (2 Ed. 3. c. 3.) such as shall procure another to be Arrested in the Name of a third Person not knowing thereof, 8 Eliz. cap. 2.

Petty Jury in London attaint, or receiving moneys, &c. 11 H. 7. cap. 21.

Mother or reputed Father of a Bastard Child not performing the Justices Order after notice, See Tit. Bastard.

Surveyors, &c. for repairing of Bridges, if they resuse to account, 21 H. 8. cap. 5.

Persons conspiring to indict another of Felony, Fitz. Mainp. 7.

Constable, &c. not levying the Forfeitures for abuses an Alehouse, &c. 1 Jac. c. 9.

Constables neglecting to execute the Justices Warrant concerning Alehouses, &c. 3 Car. Constables neglecting to whip Trespassers in Corn, Wood or Orchard, &c. 13 H. 6. cap. 10.

Breakers of the Kings Prison are not Bailable, by the Stat. Westm. 1. made 3 E. 1. cap. 15.

Speakers of false News, which may cause Discord between the King and his People; or of false News or Lies of the Barons and Great Men of the Realm, shall be Imprisoned till they produce the first Author, Westm. 1. (3 Ed. 1) cap. 34. 2 R. 2. cap. 5.

Refusers to be Overseers of Cloth, Vide Tit. Cloth.

Such as are convicted of making deceitful Cloth. Ibid.

Persons convicted for unlawful hunting of Deer, &c. 5 Eliz. cap. 21.

Dyers using Logwood, and thereof convict, 39 Eliz. cap. 11.

Destroyers of Ponds, Pools, &c. where Fish are kept, or unlawful Fishers in the same. Gagers, Packers, Searchers of Fish, 11 H. 7. cap. 23.

Forestallers, Regrators, Ingrossers, 5 Ed. 6. cap. 14.

Forgers of any Deed, the Assenters thereunto, and Publisher thereof, knowing the same, 5 Eliz. cap. 14.

In fraudulent Conveyances the parties thereunto, the Justifiers thereof, and such as put the same in use, or assign over such Lands, &c. knowing the same, 13 Eliz. cap. 5. 14 Eliz. cap. 11. 27 Eliz. cap. 4.

Unlawful Games, the maintainers of Houses for such; The Players in the same or elsewhere, 33 H. 8. cap. 9. Vid. Tit. Games. Such as shoot in, keep, carry or use any Guns, &c. 33 H. 8. cap. 6.

All persons which shall shoot at any Hare with a Gun, &c. or trace in the Snow, or destroy Hares with any Engin, 1 Jac. 27.

Hatters which shall take above two Apprentices, or for less than seven years, 8 Eliz. cap. 11.

Takers of Hawks or their Eggs out of another Man's Grounds, 5 Eliz. cap. 21.

Hawkers between the first of July, and the 31st of August, 7 Jac. cap. 11.

Bailiffs and High Constables not paying the Forfeitures concerning Highways collected by them, 2 Ph. & Mar. cap. 8.

Hostlers or Innkeepers which shall make any Horsebread or not sell the same, &c. for reasonable Gain, contrary to the Statute, 21 Jac. c. 21.

Hunters, &c. for any Deer or Conies contrary to the Statute, 5 Eliz. c. 21. 3 Jac. c. 13. 7 Jac. c. 13.

Labourers and Artificers departing from their Work before it be finished, 5 Eliz. c 4.

Servants departing before their Term be ended without leave of a Justice, or at the end of the Term without a Quarters warning. Ibid.

Persons compellable to serve, refusing so to do, for Wages rated by the Justice, or which have promised to serve, and not perform. Ibid.

Persons refusing to be bound Apprentice according to the Statute. Ibid.

Single Women between the years of twelve, and under forty years, which shall refuse to go to Service. Ibid.

Such Masters as shall give a Servant or Labourer, which shall take Wages, &c. contrary to the Rates assessed by Proclamation. Ibid.

Masters hiring Servants for less than one year, or which have departed out of Service without Testimonial, Ibid.

At Common Law, the Sheriff and Constables, as Conservators of the Peace, might have bailed one suspected of Felony, this Power is taken away and given to the Justice by the Statute following. Every Justice might Bail such Persons at his discretion, by the Statute, 1 R. 3. cap. 3. which for the abuse of it was altered by 3 H. 7. cap. 3. and there by two Justices, one being of the Quorum, were enabled to bail Person Mainpernable to the next Sessions or Gaol-delivery; afterwards by the Statute 1 & 2 *Ph. & Mar. cap.*13. it was provided that it be for Manslaughter or Felony, or suspition of either, then two Justices must be present together, at the time of the Bailment, which they must certifie to the next Gaol-delivery; if they do not, to be fined there; but Criminals for Offences under Felony, one single Justice may bail.

The Bail in Murther, Felony, &c. may keep the Murtherer, Felon, &c. as a Prisoner till the day of Appearance; For the Bail is Corpus pro corpore, and the Bail must render themselves if the Murtherer, Felon, &c. escape, Bulstr. 70. Hetly 157.

If an Indictment be removed by Certiorari, and no Bail put in above, the Court below may proceed without a Procedendo, Styl. 321.

If Proceedings be removed by Certiorari, and after sent back by a Procedendo, yet the Bail is for ever discharged, Co. Bail and Mainprise fo. 26.

14.3.1.2Bacon, 1736

14.3.1.2.aBail in Criminal Causes

Bail in Criminal Causes.

BAIL in Criminal Causes is regularly to be allowed in all such Cases wherein it seems doubtful, whether the Person accused be guilty of the Offence or not; in which Case, according to another General Rule, it may be allowed and taken by that Person who has Cognizance of the Crime, and therefore being Judge of the Offence, may, if he thinks fit, Bail the Offender.[5]

(A) In what Cases it is grantable by a Sheriff.

(B) Where by a Justice of the Peace.

(C) Where by Justices of Goal-Delivery.

(D) Where by the Court of King's Bench.

(E) Where by the other Courts of Westminster.

(F) What shall be said to be sufficient Bail.

(G) The Offence of taking insufficient Bail.

(H) The Offence of granting it where it ought to be denied.

(I) The Offence of denying, delaying or obstructing it where it ought to be granted.

(K) In what form it is to be taken.

(L) What shall forfeit the Recognizance.

(A) IN WHAT CASES IT IS GRANTABLE BY A SHERIFF.

BY the Common Law, according to some Opinions, the Sheriff without any Writ, might ex Officio as (a) principal Conservator of the Peace, Bail any Person arrested on Suspicion of Felony; and it is certain, that by the Common Law he (b) might Bail any Person who was indicted before him at his Torn for Felony, or any other Crime that is bailable.[6]

Also Bail is grantable by a Sheriff by Virtue of the following Writs 1. By that of Odio & Atia, by which a Person committed for the Death of a Man, might on an Inquest taken by the Sheriff, if he were found to have done the Fact by Misadventure or se Defendendo, be mainprized by 12 Men, upon the Writ de Ponendo in Ballium; but this Writ seems obsolete at this Day.[7] 2dly, By Writ of Mainprize, which of late has been disused, but seems still in Force, and may be brought by Persons Bailable, as those who are imprisoned for a slight Suspicion of Felony, or indicted of Larceny, before the Steward of a Leet, or of a Trespass before Justices of the Peace, &c.[8] 3dly, That of Homine replegiando, whereon if he return that the Plaintiff is esloigned, he may by Capias of Withernam imprison the Defendant, whether he be a Peer or Commoner, till the Plaintiff shall be replevied.[9]

By Westm. 1. cap. 15. it is enacted as followeth; “For as much as (c) Sheriffs and others, who have taken and kept in Prison Persons detected of Felony, and Incontinent, have let out by Replevin such as were not replevisable, and have kept in Prison such as were replevisable, because they would gain of one Party and grieve the other; and for as much as before this Time it was not determined which Persons were replevisable and which not, but only those that were taken for the (d) Death of a Man, or by (e) Commandment of the King, or of the (f) Justices, or for the (g) Forest: It is provided, and by the King commanded, That such Prisoners as before were (h) outlawed, and they which have abjured the Realm, (a) Provers, and such as be taken with the (b) Manner, and those which have broken the (c) King’s Prison, Thieves (d) openly defamed and known, and such as be appealed by Provers, so long as the Provers be living (if they be not of good Name) and (e) such as be taken for House-burning feloniously done, or for false Money, or for counterfeiting the King’s Seal, or Persons (f) excommunicate, taken at the Request of the Bishop, or for (g) manifest Offences, or for Treason touching the King himself, shall be in no wife replevisable by the common Writ, nor without Writ, but (h) such as be indicted of Larceny by Inquests taken before Sheriffs or Bailiffs by their Office, or of light Suspicion, or for Petit Larceny, that amounteth not above the Value of Twelve Pence, if they were not accused of some other Larceny

aforetime, or accused of (i) Receipt of Thieves or Felons, or of Commandment, or Force, or of Aid in Felony done, or accused of some other Trespass, for which one ought not to lose Life or Member, and a Man approved by a Prover after the Death of the Prover (if he be no common Thief nor defamed) shall be henceforth let out by sufficient Surety, whereof the Sheriff will be answerable, and that without giving ought of his Goods.[10]

(B) WHERE BY A JUSTICE OF THE PEACE.

IT seems clear, that where-ever Justices of the Peace have Power to hear and determine any Offence which is bailable within the Statute Westm. 1. any one of such Justices seems consequently to have Power to Bail any Person indicted at the Sessions for such Offence, because every such Justice is a Judge of the Court which is to determine it.[11]

Also every Justice of the Peace has a Discretionary Power of admitting Persons to Bail who have given a dangerous Wound.[12]

But the Power of Justices of admitting to Bail, is chiefly regulated by Acts of Parliament, to which Purpose it is recited by 1 R. 3. cap. 3. “That divers Persons had been daily arrested and imprisoned for Suspicion of Felony, sometime of Malice, and sometime of a light Suspicion, and so kept in Prison without Bail or Mainprize, to their great Vexation and Trouble; and thereupon it is enacted, That every Justice of the Peace in every Shire, City or Town, may by his or their Discretion, let such Prisoners and Persons so arrested to Bail or Mainprize, in like Form as though the same Prisoners or Persons were indicted thereof of Record before the same Justices at their Sessions.”

But this Statute, so far as it gives such Power to a single Justice, is repealed by 3 H. 7. cap. 3. which enacteth, “That Justices of the Peace, or two of them at the least, whereof one to be of the Quorum, have Power to Bail any Person Mainpernable by Law, to their next General Sessions, or to the next General Gaol-Delivery, as well within Franchise as without; and that the same Justices, or one of them, shall certify the same to such Sessions or Gaol-Delivery, on Pain of 10 l.”

But these Statutes having been often abused by Justices of the Peace bailing Persons in the Name of two Justices, where one only was present, and for Offences not bailable;

It is enacted by 1 & 2 Ph. & Mar. cap. 13. “That no Justice shall Bail any Person for Offences declared to be irreplevisable by Westm. 1. and that no Person arrested for Manslaughter or Felony, or Suspicion thereof, shall be let to Bail or Mainprize by any Justices of the Peace, if it be not in open Sessions, except it be by two Justices at the least, and one to be of the Quorum, and the same Justices to be present together at the Time; which Bailment or Mainprize they shall certify in Writing, subscribed or signed by them at the next General Gaol-Delivery; and such Justices before such Bailment for Felony, shall take the Examination of the Prisoner, and the Information of them that bring him, of the Fact and Circumstances thereof, and shall put in Writing so much thereof as shall be material, before they make the Bailment, and shall certify such Examination and Bailment to the next General Gaol-Delivery, and shall have Authority to bind all such by Recognizance or Obligation, as do declare any Thing material to prove the said Offences, to appear at the next General Gaol-Delivery, and to give Evidence, &c. and shall certify the said Evidence and Bonds, &c. before the Time of the Trial; and if any Justice of Quorum shall offend against this Act, he shall be fined in Discretion by the Justices of Gaol-Delivery, or Proof by Examination before them, &c. But it is Provided, That Justices in Middlesex, and in Cities, Boroughs, and Towns Corporate, shall have Authority to Bail Prisoners in such Manner as was before accustomed, and also shall take Examinations and Bonds as aforesaid, upon every Bailment, and certify the Bailment-Bond and Examination at the next General Gaol-Delivery."

The Authority given to one Justice of the Peace by 1 R. 3. to admit Persons to Bail for Felony, being repealed by 3 H. 7. and 1 & 2 Ph. & Ma. one Justice of the Peace cannot admit Persons to Bail, unless it be for an Offence directly tending to the Breach of the Peace, the Restraint whereof is the chief End of his Office, or for an Offence by Statute put under the Conuzance of one Justice, or for an Offence indictable at the Sessions.[13]

But though the Statute of Ph. & Ma. has prescribed the Statute of Westm. 1. as a Pattern for Justices to follow in relation to Bail, and it therefore follows, that a Person under an actual Arrest for any Crime, declared to be irreplevisable by that Act, cannot be bailed by any Justice; yet if a Person at large be only accused of any such Crime on a slight Suspicion, before a Justice of the Peace, it seems that the Justice ought not to commit him, but ought to take Surety from him to appear before a proper Court.[14]

Also the Statute of 1 & 2 Ph. & M. expresly mentioning the Bailing of Persons for Manslaughter, as well as for other Felonies, it is clear, that Justices of the Peace, may by Force thereof safely Bail any Person imprisoned on a slight Suspicion of a Fact, appearing to be no higher an Offence than Manslaughter; and much more if it appear to amount to no more than Homicide by Misadventure, or in Self-defence; but the Justices ought to be cautious the Offence does not amount to Murder; also that there be no violent Presumptions that the Party did the Fact; for if any such appear, the Party ought not to be Bailed, though the Offence amount to no more than Homicide by Misadventure or Self-defence.[15]

(C) WHERE BY JUSTICES OF GAOL-DELIVERY.

JUstices of Gaol-Delivery not being within the Restraint of the Statute Westm. 1. may bail Persons convicted before them of Homicide by Misadventure, or Self-defence, the better to enable them to Purchase their Pardon.[16]

Also it seems that in Discretion they may Bail a Person convicted before them of Manslaughter, upon Special Circumstances; as if the Evidence against him were flight, or if he had purchased his Pardon.[17]

Also if an Appellee plead an Excommunication in Disability of the Plaintiff, it seems they may bail him till the Plaintiff shall be absolved; for otherwise the Appellee might lie in Prison for ever, without having an Opportunity of coming to his Trial.[18]

And where such Justices have Power to admit Persons to Bail, it seems that they may do it after their Sessions is over, as well as during their Sessions.[19]

(D) WHERE BY THE COURT OF KING'S BENCH.

THIS Court by the Plenitude of its Power, may in Discretion admit Persons to Bail, though committed by other Courts for Crimes not bailable by those Courts, on Consideration of the Nature and Circumstances of the Case.[20]

But here it must be observed, that with respect to the Nature of Offence, although this Court is not tied down by the Rules prescribed by the Statute of Westm. 1. yet it will in Discretion pay a due Regard to the Rules prescribed by it, and not admit a Person to Bail who is expresly declared to be irreplevisable, without some particular Circumstances in his Favour.[21]

And therefore if a Person be attainted of Felony, or convicted thereof by Verdict General or Special, or notoriously guilty of Treason or Manslaughter, &c. by his own Confession or otherwise, he is not to be admitted to Bail without some special Motive to induce the Court to grant it.[22]

As where a Person taken by a Capias Utlagatum on an Appeal of Felony, by the Name of J. S. Gentleman, pleads that his Name is J. S. Yeoman, and not Gentleman, and so he is not the same Person that was outlawed; in which Case, the Court in Discretion may Bail him, for until the Plea be determined, it appears not whether he were the Person intended or not.[23]

So if a Man is convicted of Felony upon Evidence, by which it plainly appears to the Court that he is not guilty of it; in which Case even the Justices of Gaol-Delivery may bail him.[24]

Or where a Prosecution is unreasonably delayed, or where the Prisoner may be in Danger of losing his Life, either by Famine or dangerous Distemper, &c. unless he bailed.[25]

The Court of King's Bench hath always admitted Persons to Bail imprisoned by the King's Special Command, or by Order of the Privy Council, where the Commitments expressed the Crime or Cause for which the Party was committed, on the like Circumstances, on which in Discretion it will grant Bail on other Commitments.[26]

But it was formerly (a) holden by many, and at Length adjudged in (b). Sir John Corbet's Case, that Persons committed by the special Command of the King, signified by Warrant from the Lords of the Privy Council, were not Bailable without the King's Consent, unless there appeared some extraordinary Circumstances in the Case; it being to be presumed that the King could not exert his Prerogative in such a Manner, without some good Reason for the Safety of the State, not fit to be divulged; but this being thought to be a great Strain of the Prerogative, and to make the Liberty of the Subject precarious, and contrary to the Purport of Magna Charta, and many other Statutes, which declared, That no Man shall be imprisoned but by due Process of Law, &c. occasioned the Petition of Right, 13 Car. 1. and the 16 Car. 1. cap. 10. By which it seems now established, That where Commitments by the Privy Council do not with convenient Certainty express the Crime alledged against the Party, he ought to be bailed.[27]

The great Regard which is so justly due, and which has always been paid to the Proceedings of either House of Parliament, who are the Guardians of the Liberty of the Subject, makes it somewhat doubtful in what Cases the Court of King's Bench will Discharge or Bail a Person committed by either of those Houses.[28]

Hence no Precedent can be found, where the Court of King's Bench has bailed a Prisoner sitting the Parliament, on a Commitment, which on the Return of it stands indifferent whether it be strictly legal or not.[29]

And therefore in the Lord Shaftsbury's Case, who upon his Habeas

Corpus in the King's Bench was returned to have been committed by the House of Lords, for a High Contempt committed against the House; the Court would not take Notice of any Exceptions against the Form of the Commitment; as that it was too general, and did not express the Nature of the Contempt, or in what Place it was committed, &c. for that it shall be presumed that it was such, for which the Lords might lawfully make such an Order, and no other Court shall prescribe to them in what Form they ought to make it.[30]

But a Person committed for a Contempt by the Order of either House of Parliament, may be Discharged by the Court of King's Bench after a Dissolution or Prorogation of the Parliament, whether he were committed during the Sessions or afterwards; for that all the Orders of Parliament are (c) determined by a Dissolution or Prorogation, and all Matters before either House must be commenced a-new at the next Parliament, except only in the Case of a Writ of Error; and if the Subject should be deprived of his Liberty till the next Parliament, which perhaps may not meet again in many Years, no one could say when his Imprisonment would end.[31]

And though the Court of King's Bench may in their Discretion bail a Lord upon an Impeachment of High Treason, after a Dissolution or Prorogation of the Parliament, yet may they refuse it, not as a Matter out of their Power, but as a Thing which they are not bound to do, and improper on Consideration of the whole Circumstances of the Affair.[32]

The Earl of Salisbury was Impeached for being Reconciled to the Church of Rome, by the Convention that was turned into a Parliament 1 W. & M. and lay in the Tower till the next Parliament, which being adjourned for two Months, he moved to be Discharged on the Act of Oblivion, wherein neither his Crime nor his Person were excepted, but clearly within the Act of Pardon, or that he might be bailed; but as to the Act of Pardon, the Court held, that it should be (a) pleaded with proper Averments, which could not be done here, because there was nothing before the (b) Court upon which to ground such Plea; and that as to the Bailing him, this being a short Adjournment, the Application for that Purpose should be to the Parliament.[33]

In former Days, and particularly at the Time when Sir Edward Coke was Chief Justice, several Persons committed to the Fleet by the Lord Chancellor, were bailed by the Court of King's Bench, upon Exceptions to the (c) Generality of the Form of the Commitments.

Also one Glanvil, who was generally committed by the Command of the Lord Chancellor, without setting forth any Cause of such Command, seems to have been bailed upon Examination of the Merits of the Decree, for disobeying whereof he was in Truth committed; whereby it appeared that the Decree related to a Matter before adjudged at the Common Law; which was thought contrary to the Purport of 27 E. 3. cap. 1. and 4 H. 4. cap. 23. But this Proceeding being resented by the Lord Chancellor, the said Glanvil was afterwards recommitted by him for the same Matter, and yet was afterwards on another Habeas Corpus bailed the second Time by the Court of King's Bench.[34]

But as there have been no such Proceedings of late Days, the Disuse of them has certainly lessen'd, if not wholly removed the Force of these Resolutions, especially as it is now established, that a Court of Equity can give Relief after a Judgment at Law; for otherwise it would have no Power of moderating the Rigour of the Law, it being in many Cases very doubtful what the Law is before it be determined; the Superior Courts therefore will put the (d) most favourable Construction on one another's Proceedings, and not intend that they acted beyond their Jurisdiction.[35]

The Court of King's Bench having the Supreme Controul of all Inferior Courts, may in Discretion admit Persons to Bail committed by such Courts, upon Consideration of the whole Circumstances of the Case, as the (e) Length of the Imprisonment, the (f) Enormity, or dangerous Tendency, or Notoriety, or small Consequence of the Offence, or Obstinacy of the Offender, or the (g) Dignity of the Court by which he was committed, and other such like Circumstances; of which the Court will receive Information by Suggestion or Affidavit, being (a) consistent with the Return of the Habeas Corpus.[36]

(E) WHERE BY THE OTHER COURTS OF WESTMINSTER.

THE Courts of Common Pleas and Exchequer, at any Time during Term, and the Chancery, either in Term or Vacation, may by the Common Law award a Habeas Corpus for any Person committed for a Crime under the (b) Degree of Felony or Treason; and thereupon discharge him, if it shall plainly appear by the Return that the Commitment was illegal, or bail him if it shall appear doubtful.[37]

And by the Habeas Corpus Act, any of the said Courts in Termtime, and any Judge of the said Courts, being of the Degree of the Coif, in the Vacation, may award a Habeas Corpus for any Person bailable within the Intent of that Act, for any Crime under the Degree of Felony.[38]

(F) WHAT SHALL BE SAID TO BE SUFFICIENT BAIL.

NO Person shall be bailed for Felony by less than two, and it is said not to be usual for the King's Bench to bail a Man on a Habeas Corpus, on a Commitment for Treason or Felony, without four Sureties; the Sum in which the Sureties are to be bound, ought to be never less than 40 l. for a Capital Crime; but it may be higher in Discretion, on Consideration of the Ability and Quality of the Prisoner, and the Nature of the Offence; and the Sureties may be examined on Oath concerning their Sufficiency, by him that takes the Bail; and if a Person be bailed by insufficient Sureties, he may be required either by him who took the Bail, or by any other who hath Power to bail him, to find better Sureties, and on his Refusal may be committed; for insufficient Sureties are as none.[39]

But Justices must take care, that under Pretence of demanding sufficient Surety, they do not make so excessive a Demand, as in Effect amounts to a Denial of Bail; for this is looked upon as a great Grievance, and is complained of as such by 1 W. & M. Sess. 2. by which it is declared, that excessive Bail ought not to be required.[40]

(G) THE OFFENCE OF TAKING INSUFFICIENT BAIL.

IF the Party bailed by insufficient Sureties, do not appear according to the Condition of the Recognizance, the Justice, &c. who bailed him is Fineable by the Justices of Assise; but if he appear, it seems that the Person who bailed him is excused.[41]

(H) THE OFFENCE OF GRANTING IT WHERE IT OUGHT TO BE DENIED.

THE Bailing a Person not bailable by Law, is punishable at Common Law, as a negligent Escape, or as an Offence against the several following Statutes.[42]

By the Statute of Westm. 1. cap. 15. it is enacted, "That if the Sheriff or any other let any go at Large by Surety that is not replevisable, if he be Sheriff or Constable, or any other Bailiff of Fee, which hath keeping of Prisons, and be thereof attainted, he shall lose his Fee and Office for ever; and if the UnderSheriff, Constable or Bailiff of such as have Fee for keeping of Prisons, do it contrary to the Will of his Lord, or any other Bailiff, being not of Fee, they shall have three Years Imprisonment and make Fine at the King's Pleasure."

Also it is enacted by 27 E. 1. commonly called the Statute de Finibus levatis, cap. 3. "That the Justices assigned to take Assises, &c. when they Deliver the Gaols, &c. shall inquire if Sheriffs, or any other, have let out by Replevin Prisoners not replevisable, or have offended in any Thing contrary to the Form of the said Statute of Westm. 1. and whom they shall find guilty they shall chasten and punish in all Things according to the Form of the said Statute."

And it is further enacted by 4 E. 3. cap. 2. "That at the Time of the Assignment of Keepers of the Peace, Mention shall be made, that such as shall be indicted or taken by them, shall not be let to Mainprize by the Sheriffs, nor by none other Ministers, if they be not Mainpernable by Law, nor that none who are indicted shall be delivered but by the Common Law; and that the Justices assigned to deliver Gaols, shall have Power to inquire of Sheriffs, Gaolers and others, in whose Ward such Persons indicted shall be, if they make Deliverance, or let to Mainprize any so indicted, which be not mainpernable, and to punish the said Sheriffs, Gaolers and others, if they do any Thing against the said Act."

And it is enacted by 1 & 2 Ph. & M. cap. 13. "That no Justice or Justices of the Peace shall let to Bail or Mainprize, any Person or Persons, which for any Offence or Offences by them or any of them committed, be declared not to be replevised or bailed, or be forbidden to be replevised of bailed by the abovementioned Statute of Westm. 1. cap. 15. And that the Justices of Gaol-Delivery of the Place where such Justices of the Peace shall be guilty of such Offence, upon due Proof thereof, by Examination before them, shall for every such Offence set such Fine on every such Justice, as the same Justices of Gaol-Delivery shall think meet."

Justices of the Peace, before they bail a Man under Commitment, must at their Peril inform themselves of the Cause for which he was committed; for if he were in Truth committed for a Cause not bailable by Law, it is no Excuse that they did not know that he was committed for such Cause.[43]

(I) THE OFFENCE OF DENYING, DELAYING OR OBSTRUCTING IT WHERE IT OUGHT TO BE GRANTED.

IT is clearly agreed to be an Offence by the Common Law as well as by Statute, and punishable by Indictment as well as by Action, to deny or delay, or obstruct Bail where it ought to be granted.[44]

But it seems also clear, that he who has Power to bail another, is not bound to demand of him to find Sureties, and to forbear committing him till he shall refuse to find them, but may well justify his Commitment, unless the Party himself shall offer his Sureties.[45]

The principal Statutes relating to this Offence, are the abovementioned

Statute of Westm. 1. cap. 15. and the Statute de Finibus cap. 3. and 31 Car. 2. cap. 2. commonly called the Habeas Corpus Act; by the First whereof it is enacted, “That if any withhold Prisoners replevisable after that they have offered sufficient Surety, he shall pay a grievous Amercement to the King; and if he take any Reward for the Deliverance of such, he shall pay double to the Prisoner, and shall also be in the great Mercy of the King.” And by the latter of the said Statutes it is enacted, “That Justices of Assise shall inquire if Sheriffs, or any other have offended in any Thing contrary to the said Statute of Westm. and whom they shall find guilty, they shall punish in all Things according to the Form of the said Statute.”

Also it is recited by the abovementioned Statute of 31 Car. 2. “That great Delays had been used by Sheriffs, Gaolers, and other Officers, to whose Custody the King’s Subjects had been committed for Criminal, or supposed Criminal Matters; in making Return of Writs of Habeas Corpus, by standing out an Alias and Pluries, and sometimes more; and by other Shifts to avoid their yielding Obedience to such Writs, contrary to their Duty and the known Laws of the Land; whereby many Subjects had been detained in Prison in such Cases, where by Law they were bailable, &c. And thereupon it is enacted, That wheresoever any Person shall bring any Habeas Corpus directed to any Person whatsoever, for any Person in his Custody, and the said Writ shall be served upon the said Officer, or left at the Gaol or Prison with any of the Under-Officers, UnderKeepers, or Deputy of the said Officers, or Keepers or Deputies, shall within three Days after such Service thereof (unless the Commitment were for Treason or Felony, plainly and specially expressed in the Warrant of Commitment) upon Payment or Tender of the Charges of bringing the said Prisoner, to be ascertained by the Judge or Court that awarded the same, and endorsed on the said Writ, not exceeding 12 d. per Mile; and on Security given by his own Bond to pay the Charges of carrying back the Prisoner, if he should be remanded; and that he will not make any Escape by the Way, make Return of such Writ, and bring or cause to be brought, the Body of the Party so committed or restrained, unto or before the Lord Chancellor, or Lord Keeper, or the Judges or Barons of the Court from which the said Writ shall issue, or such other Persons before whom the said Writ is made returnable, according to the Command thereof; and shall then likewise certify the true Causes of his Detainer or Imprisonment, unless the Commitment be in a Place beyond Twenty Miles Distance, &c. and if beyond the Distance of Twenty, and not above one Hundred Miles, then within the Space of Ten Days; and if beyond the Distance of one Hundred Miles, then within the Space of Twenty Days."[46]

And it is further enacted, Par. 3. "That all such Writs shall be marked in this Manner, per Statutum tricesimo primo Caroli secundi Regis, and shall be signed by the Person that awards the same; and if any Person shall be, or stand committed or detained as aforesaid, for any Crime, unless for Treason or Felony, plainly expressed in the Warrant of Commitment, in the Vacation Time, it shall be lawful for such Person so committed or detained, (other than Persons Convict or in Execution by legal Process) or any one on his Behalf, to complain to the Lord Chancellor or Lord Keeper, or any Justice of either Bench, or Baron of the Exchequer of the Degree of the Coif; and the said Lord Chancellor, &c. Justice or Baron, on View of the Copy of the Warrant of the Commitment, or otherwise on Oath that it was denied, are authorised and required, on Request in Writing, by such Person, or any in his Behalf, attested and subscribed by two Witnesses who were present at the Delivery of the same, to grant an Habeas Corpus under the Seal of the Court, whereof he shall be one of the Judges, to be directed to the Officer in whose Custody the Party shall be, returnable immediate before the said Lord Chancellor, &c. Justice or Baron, and on Service thereof, as aforesaid, the Officer, &c. in whose Custody the Party is, shall within the Times respectively before limited, bring him before the said Lord Chancellor, Justice or Baron before whom the Writ is returnable; and in Case of his Absence, before any other of them, with the Return of such Writ, and the true Cause of the Commitment and Detainer; and thereupon within two Days after the Party shall be brought before them, the said Lord Chancellor, Justice or Baron before whom the Prisoner shall be brought, as aforesaid, shall discharge the said Prisoner from his Imprisonment, taking his Recognizance with one or more Sureties, in any Sum according to their Discretions, having regard to the Quality of the Prisoner and Nature of the Offence, for his Appearance in the King's Bench, the Term following, or in such other Court wherein the Offence is properly Cognizable, as the Case shall require, and then shall certify the said Writ, with the Return thereof, and the Recognizance into such Court, unless it be made appear to the said Lord Chancellor, &c. that the Party so committed, is detained upon a legal Process, or Order, or Warrant, out of some Court that hath Jurisdiction of criminal Matters, or by some Warrant signed and sealed with the Hand and Seal of any of the said Justices or Barons, or some Justice or Justices of the Peace, for such Matters or Offences for which by Law the Prisoner is not bailable."

But it is provided, Par. 4. “That if any Person shall have wilfully neglected, by the Space of two whole Terms after his Imprisonment, to pray a Habeas Corpus for his Enlargement, he shall not have a Habeas Corpus to be granted in Vacation Time, in Pursuance of this Act.”

And it is further enacted, Par. 5. “That if any Officer, &c. shall neglect or refuse to make the Returns aforesaid, or to bring the Body of the Prisoner, according to the Command of the Writ, within the respective Times aforesaid, or shall not within six Hours after Demand, deliver a true Copy of the Commitment, &c. he shall forfeit for the first Offence 100 l. for the second 200 l. and be made uncapable to hold his Office.”

And it is further enacted, Par. 6. That no Person who shall be set at Large upon any Habeas Corpus, shall be again imprisoned for the same Offence, by any Person whatsoever, other than by the legal Order and Process of such Court wherein he shall be bound by Recognizance to appear, or other Court having Jurisdiction of the Cause, on Pain of 500 l.”

And it is further enacted, Par. 7. “That if any Person, who shall be committed for Treason or Felony, plainly and specially expressed in the Warrant of Commitment, upon his Prayer or Petition in open Court, the first Week of the Term, or the first Day of the Sessions of Oyer and Terminer, or General Gaol-Delivery, to be brought to his Trial, shall not be indicted sometime in the next Term, Sessions of Oyer and Terminer, or General Gaol-Delivery, after such Commencement, the Justices of the said Courts shall, upon Motion in open Court, the last Day of the Term or Sessions, set at Liberty the Prisoner upon Bail, unless it appear upon Oath, that the Witnesses for the King could not be produced the said Term, &c. and if such Prisoner upon his Prayer, &c. shall not be indicted and tried the second Term or Sessions, he shall be discharged from his Imprisonment.”

And it is further enacted, Par. 10. “That it shall be lawful for any Prisoner, as aforesaid, to move and obtain his Habeas Corpus, as well out of the Chancery or Exchequer, as the King’s Bench or Common Pleas; and if the said Lord Chancellor or Lord Keeper, or any Judge or Judges, Baron or Barons, for the Time being, of the Degree of the Coif, of any of the Courts aforesaid, in the Vacation Time, upon View of the Copy of a Warrant of Commitment or Detainer, or on Oath made that such Copy was denied, shall deny any Writ of Habeas Corpus by this Act required to be granted, being moved for as aforesaid, they shall severally forfeit to the Party grieved the Sum of 500 l.”

But it is provided, Par. 18. “That after the Assises proclaimed for that County where the Prisoner is detained, no Person shall be removed from the Common Gaol upon any Habeas Corpus granted in Pursuance of this Act; but upon such Habeas Corpus, shall be brought before the Judge of Assise in open Court, who thereupon shall do what to Justice shall appertain; but it is provided nevertheless, Par. 19. that after the Assises are ended, any Person detained may have his Habeas Corpus according to the Direction of this Act."

(K) IN WHAT FORM IT IS TO BE TAKEN.

WHERE a Person actually present in Court is bailed for a Crime punishable with Loss of Life or Member, it seems to be in the Discretion of the Court to take a Recognisance from each of the Bail, either in a certain Sum, or Body for Body, or both Ways; however such Recognisance of Body for Body doth not make the Bail liable to the same Punishment with the Prisoner, but only to be fined, &c.[47]

But for a Crime of an inferior Nature, it seems that the Recognisance ought to be only in a certain Sum of Money, and not Body for Body.[48]

(L) WHAT SHALL FORFEIT THE RECOGNISANCE.

IF the Recognisance be in the usual Form, ad standum recto de felonia praedicta & ad respondendum Domino Regi, and at the Trial the Party stands mute, though it may be reasonably argued from the Import of these Words, that in Strictness the Recognisance is forfeited, yet the later Opinions hold otherwise; for if a Man's Bail, who are his Gaolers of his own choosing, do as effectually secure his Appearance, and put him as much under the Power of the Court, as if he had been in the Custody of the proper Officer, they seem to have answered the End of the Law, and to have done all that can be reasonably required of them.[49]

If A. enters into a Recognisance that B. shall appear in the King's Bench such a Term, to answer such an Information, and not to depart till he shall be discharged by the Court, and afterwards a Nolle prosequi is entred on that Information, and another exhibited, whereto he refuses to appear, &c. the Recognisance is forfeited.[50]

14.3.1.2.bFelony

(H) WHERE THE OFFENDER IS TO BE TRANSPORTED.

IT is enacted by 4 Georg. 1. cap. 11. and 6 Georg. 1. cap. 23. “That where any Person or Persons shall be convicted of Grand or Petit Larceny, or any felonious stealing or taking of Money, Goods or Chattels, either from the Person or in the House of any other, or in any other Manner, and who by the Law shall be intitled to the Benefit of the Clergy, and liable only to the Penalties of Burning in the Hand or Whipping, (except Persons convicted for receiving or buying stolen Goods, knowing them to be stolen,) it shall and may be lawful for the Court before whom they were convicted, or any Court, held at the same or any other Place, with the like Authority, if they think fit, instead of ordering any such Offenders to be burnt in the Hand, or whipt, to order and direct that such Offenders shall be sent, as soon as conveniently may, to some of his Majesty’s Colonies and Plantations in America for the Space of seven Years; and that Court before whom they were convicted, or any subsequent Court, with like Authority as the former, shall have Power to convey, transfer and make over such Offenders, by Order of Court, to the Use of any Person or Persons who shall contract for the Performance of such Transportation to him or them, and his and their Assigns, for such Term of seven Years; and where any Person shall be convicted for any Crimes, for which they are excluded their Clergy, and the King shall extend his Mercy to them upon Condition of Transportation to any Part of America, and such Intention of Mercy be signified by a Principal Secretary of State, it shall be lawful for any Court having proper Authority, to allow such Offenders the Benefit of a Pardon, to order and direct the like Transportion to any Person, who will contract for the Performance thereof, of any such Offenders; as also of any Person convict of receiving or buying stolen Goods, knowing them to be stolen, for the Term of fourteen Years, in Case such Condition of Transportation be general, or else for such other Term as shall be made Part of such Condition; and such Person so contracting, and his Assigns, shall have an Interest in the Service of the said Offenders for such Term of Years; and if any such Offender return into Great Britain or Ireland, before the End of his Term, he shall be liable to be punished as any Person attainted of Felony, without the Benefit of Clergy, &c. Provided, that the King may pardon and dispense with any such Transportation, and allow of the Return of such Offender, paying his Owner, at the Time, such Sum as shall be adjudged reasonable by any two Justices of the Peace, where such Owner dwells, and where any such Offenders shall be transported, and shall have served their Terms, such Services shall have the Effect of a Pardon, as for the Crimes for which they were transported.”

And it is further enacted, "That every such Person, to whom any such Court shall order any such Offenders to be transferred or conveyed, shall, before such Offenders shall be delivered to them, contract with such Person as shall be appointed by such Court, and shall give sufficient Security, to the Satisfaction of such Court, for the Transporting such Offenders to some Plantation in America, to be ordered by such Court, and the procuring an authentick Certificate from the Governor, or chief Custom-House Officer, of the Place of the Landing of such Offenders, &c. and their not returning by the wilful Default of such Contractor."

And it is further enacted, by 6 Geo. 1. cap. 23. "That the Court may nominate two or more Justices of the Peace, for the Place where such Offenders shall be convicted, who shall have Power to contract with any Person or Persons for the Performance of the Transportation of such Offenders, and to order such and the like Security, as the said former Act directs, to be taken by Order of Court, and to cause such Felons to be delivered to such Contractors; which said Contracts and Security shall be certified by the said Justices to the next Court, held with like Authority, to be filed, &c."

And it is further enacted, "That all Charges, in or about such Contracts, &c. shall be born by each County, &c. for which the Court was held, and that the respective Treasurers shall pay the same; and that all Securities for Transportation shall be by Bond, in the Name of the Clerks of the Peace, &c. and the Money recovered shall be to the Use of the respective Counties."

And it is further enacted, "That the Persons so contracting, &c. may carry such Offenders towards the SeaPort, &c. and that if any Person shall rescue such Offenders, or aid them in making their Escape, &c. they shall be deemed guilty of Felony without Clergy; and that if any Felon ordered for Transportation shall be afterwards at large within any Part of Great Britain, without some lawful Cause, before the Expiration of his Term, and be lawfully convict thereof, he shall suffer Death without Clergy, and may be tried before Justices of Assise Qyer and Terminer, or Gaol-Delivery, for the County where he shall be apprehended, &c. or from whence he was ordered to be transported, &c. and that the Clerk of Assise, and Clerk of the Peace, where such Orders of Transportation shall be made, shall on Request of the Prosecutor, &c. certify briefly a Transcript, containing the Tenor of every Indictment, Conviction and Order of Transportation, to the Justices of Assise, &c. which shall be sufficient Proof of such Conviction, and Order of Transportation."

14.3.1.3.aForfeiture

Forfeiture is a Word often made use of in the Law, and in Civil Cases is usually applied to Alienations and Dispositions made by those who have but a particular Estate or Interest in Lands or Tenements, to the Prejudice of those in Remainder or Reversion; also the Omission or Neglect of a Duty, which the Party binds himself to perform, or to the Performance of which he is injoined by the Law, is upon the Breach or Neglect thereof called a Forfeiture, that is, the Advantages accruing from the Performance of the Thing are by his Omission defeated and determined.[51]

In this Sense of the Word the Principal Matters relating to Forfeiture are considered under the Titles Estate for Life, Copyhold, Conditions, Obligations, and Title Offices; and therefore in this Place we shall consider it only as it relates to Crimes and Offences, for which the Party is punished in his Estate and Posterity.

(A) For what Crimes an Offender shall forfeit his Lands at Common Law.

(B) For what Crimes his Goods and Chattels.

(C) For what Crimes by Statute.

(D) To what Time the Forfeiture shall have relation.

(E) What is to be done with the Offender's Goods before Conviction.

(F) Where the Wife shall lose her Dower.

(G) How far the Blood of the Offender is corrupted.

(A) FOR WHAT CRIMES AN OFFENDER SHALL FORFEIT HIS LANDS AT COMMON LAW.

BY the Common Law, all Lands of Inheritance whereof the Offender is seised in his own Right, and also all Rights of Entry to Lands in the Hands of a Wrong-doer, are forfeited to the King on an Attainder of High Treason, altho' the Lands are holden of another; for there is an Exception in the Oath of Fealty, which saves the Tenant's Allegiance to the King; so that if he forfeits his Allegiance, even the Lands held of another Lord are forfeited to the King, for the Lord himself cannot give out Lands but upon that Condition.[52]

Also upon an Attainder of Petit Treason or Felony, all Lands of Inheritance whereof the Offender is seised in his own Right, as also all Rights of Entry to Lands in the Hands of a Wrong-doer, are forfeited to the Lord of whom they are immediately holden; for this by the Feudal Law was deemed a Breach of the Tenant's Oath of Fealty in the highest Manner, his Body with which he had ingaged to serve the Lord being forfeited to the King, and thereby his Blood corrupted, so that no Person could represent him; and consequently dying without Heir the Lord is in by Escheat.[53]

But the Lord can't enter into the Lands holden of him upon an Escheat for Petit Treason or Felony without a Special Grant, till it appear by due Process, that the King hath had his Prerogative of the Year, Day and Waste.[54]

And as to this, since the Statute of Praerogativa Regis, it seems to have been generally holden, that the King has a Right, not only to Waste the Lands of Inheritance, which a Person attainted of Felony held immediately of any other Lord, but also to hold them over for a Year and Day; and by some he had always this Right, but according to others he had anciently a Right only to the Waste, and the Year and Day was given him in lieu of it.[55]

As to Lands whereof a Person attainted of High Treason (a) dies seised of an Estate in Fee, they are actually vested in the King without any Office, because they can't descend, the Blood being corrupted, and the Freehold shall not be in Abeyance.[56]

It is said, that the Inheritance of Things not lying in Tenure, as of Rents-Charge, Rents-Seck, Commons, &c. are forfeited to the King by an Attainder of High Treason; and that the Profits of them are also forfeited to him by an Attainder of Felony during the Life of the Offender, and that the Inheritance shall be extinguished by his Death; for it can't escheat, because it lies not in Tenure; neither can it descend, because the Blood is corrupted.[57]

It seems agreed, that no (b) Right of Action to Lands of Inheritance could ever be forfeited; neither could (c) a Right of Entry into Lands whereof there was a Tenant by Title, nor an (d) Use, (except where Land had been (e) fraudulently conveyed with an Intent to avoid a Forfeiture;) nor a (f) Condition forfeited before 33 H. 8. neither could Land in (g) Tail be forfeited after the making of Westm. 2. any longer than for the Life of the Tenant in Tail, till 26 H. 8.[58]

The Profits of Lands, whereof one attainted of Felony is seised of an Estate of Inheritance in his Wife's Right, or of an Estate for Life only in his own Right, are forfeited to the King, and nothing shall go to the Lord.[59]

All Customary Estates of Inheritance are forfeited by an Attainder of Treason or Felony, unless there be some particular Custom to the contrary, as in Gavelkind, because the Person is civiliter mortuus by the Attainder, and therefore is disabled to have or hold any Estate, or to have any Property in any Thing; and therefore if a Person be seised in Fee of a Copyhold, and be attainted of Treason or Felony, the Copyhold is in the Lord without any Presentment of the Homage, because it is against the Nature of a Court-Baron to inquire of Criminal Matters or Offences against the King; and such Homage is at the Will of the Lord, and often influenced by him; but if a Copyholder be convicted of Felony, and presented by the Homage, by Special Custom the Estate may be forfeited to the Lord; but this is only by the Special Custom, since the Copyholder is not disabled by the Conviction to hold the Estate, as he is if he were attainted; and therefore since it is by the Custom only that such Forfeiture accrues, it must be in the Manner which the Custom has settled it, which is by Presentment of the Homage; but if a Copyhold is granted for Life, and by another Copy the Reversion is granted to another, Habend. after the Death of the first Copyholder, or Surrender, Forfeiture or other Determination of the first Estate; the first Copyholder commits Murder, and is thereof attainted, the King Pardons the Murder and the Attainder and all Forfeitures thereby; in this Case, he in the Reversion is intitled to the Estate; for the King can't have it for the Business of the Tenure, since he can't be Tenant at Will to any Person; and the Lord can't have it, because he can't be Tenant to himself; therefore the particular Estate of Tenant for Life being extinguished, the Reversion immediately commences.[60]

(B) OF THE FORFEITURE OF GOODS AND CHATTELS.

ALL Things whatsoever, which come under the Notion of a Personal Estate, and which a Man is intitled to in his (a) own Right, whether they be in Action or Possession, are forfeitable in the following Instances to the (b) King, for the Trouble and Charge he has been at in holding Courts and bringing the Offenders to Justice.[61]

Also Personal Things settled by way of Trust on the Offender are as much forfeited, as if he had the Legal Interest, or were in Possession of them; as if a Bond be taken in another's Name, or a Lease made to another in Trust for a Person who is afterwards convicted of Treason or Felony; these are as much liable to be forfeited, as a Bond made to him in his own Name, or a Lease in Possession.[62]

Also the Trust of a Term granted by a Man for the Use of himself, his Wife and Children, &c. is liable in like Manner to be forfeited, if fraudulently made with an Intent to avoid a subsequent Forfeiture, but it shall be forfeited so far only, as it is reserved to the Benefit of the Party himself, if made bona fide, whether before or after Marriage, for good Consideration without Fraud, which is to be left to a Jury on the whole Circumstances of the Case, and shall never be presumed by the Court where it is not expresly found.[63]

But the Power of Revocation of the Trust of a Settlement reserved to the Grantor is not liable to be forfeited, if it depend upon something Personal to be done by the Grantor himself, as the making the Deed of Revocation under his Hand and Seal.[64]

A Man forfeits all such Personal Estate in the following Instances.

1. Upon a Conviction of Treason or (c) Felony, as is clearly agreed by all the Books.[65]
2. Upon the Coroner's Inquest taken on (a) View of a dead Body, and finding him guilty either as Principal or as Accessory (b) before the Fact, and that he fled for the same, whereby he forfeits his Goods absolutely, and the Issues of his Lands, till he be acquitted or pardoned.[66]
3. Upon a Jury's finding that the Defendant fled at the same Time that they acquit him of an Indictment of Capital Felony, or, as some say, of Larceny, before Justices of Oyer, &c. but such a Finding causes no Forfeiture of the Issue of the Land, because by the Acquittal the Land is discharged; neither will it have any Effect as to the Goods, if the Indictment were insufficient, or if the Flight be disproved on a Traverse, which, as all agree, may be taken to any such Finding, except that by a Coroner's Inquest, and, as (c) some say, even to that as well in respect of the Flight, as of the Particulars of the Goods.[67]
4. The Goods of Persons outlawed are forfeited to the King, for the Retiring from the Inquiries of Justice is held so criminal in the Eye of the Law, that it is punished with Loss of Goods so long as the Outlawry stands in Force. So (d) if a Person make Default till the Award of an Exigent, either upon an Appeal or Indictment of a Capital Felony, he forfeits his Goods, unless he was Pardoned before the Exigent was awarded; and it is (e) holden, that the Law is the same as to such a Default upon an Indictment of Petit Larceny, and that wherever Goods are so forfeited they are not saved by an Acquittal at the Trial; (f) but by a Reversal of the Award of the Exigent they are saved, whether such Reversal be for an Error either in Fact or in Law, as for the Imprisonment of the Defendant at the Time when the Exigent was awarded, or for a Defect in the Indictment, Appeal or Process.[68]

5. If a Man be Felo de se, or if a Felon be killed in the Robbery, or by resisting in order to escape, he forfeits his Goods and Chattels; for when a Man thus forsakes Life, all his Goods and Chattels are derelict; and therefore the King shall have them as the Maintainer of publick Justice.[69]

6. If a Felon waives, that is, leaves any Goods in his Flight from those who either pursue him, or are apprehended by him so to do, he forfeits them, whether they be his own Goods, or Goods stolen by him; and at Common Law, if the Owner did not pursue and appeal the Felon, he lost the Goods for ever; but by the (g) 21 H. 8. cap. 11. for incouraging the Prosecution of Felons it is provided, that if the Party comes in as Evidence on the Indictment, and attaint the Felon, he shall have a Writ of Restitution.[70]

And here we may observe a Difference between Goods waived, Strays and the like, and Goods forfeited for Felony or Flight; for, as it has been observed, Goods forfeited for Felony are not in the King without an Office found of such Felony or Flight, because the Property can't alter without Matter of Record; but Goods waived are in the King without Office, because there the Property is in no Body; and therefore by publick Agreement is put out of the Finder, in whom it was by the State of Nature, and is vested in the King as a Recompence for his Trouble and Charge in the Execution of Justice.[71]

(C) FOR WHAT CRIMES BY STATUTE.

BY the 26 H. 8. cap. 13. it is enacted, "That every Offender and Offenders being hereafter lawfully convicted of any Manner of High Treasons by Presentment, Confession, Verdict or Process of Outlawry, according to the due Course and Custom of the Common Laws of this Realm, shall lose and forfeit to the King, his Heirs and Successors, all such Lands, Tenements and Hereditaments, which any such Offender or Offenders shall have of any Estate of Inheritance in Use or Possession, by any Right, Title or Means, within the Realm of England or elsewhere, within any the King's Dominions, at the Time of any such Treason committed, or at any Time after, saving to every Person and Persons, their Heirs and Successors, other than the Offenders in any Treasons, their Heirs and Successors, and such Person and Persons as claim to any their Uses, all such Rights, Titles, Interests, Possessions, Leases, Rents, Offices and other Profits, which they shall have at the Day of committing such Treasons, or at any Time before, in as large and ample Manner, as if this Act had never been had nor made."

And by the 33 H. 8. cap. 20. it is enacted, "That if any Person or Persons shall be attainted of High Treason, by the Course of the Common Law or Statutes of this Realm, in every such Case every such Attainder by the Common Law shall be of as good Strength, Value, Force and Effect, as if it had been done by Authority of Parliament; and that the King, his Heirs and Successors shall have as much Benefit and Advantage by such Attainder, as well of Uses, Rights, Entries, Conditions, as Possessions, Reversions, Remainders, and all other Things, as if it had been done and declared by Authority of Parliament; and shall be deemed and adjudged in actual and real Possession of the Lands, Tenements, Hereditaments, Uses, Goods, Chattels, and all other Things of the Offenders so attainted, which his Highness ought lawfully to have, and which they being so attainted, ought or might lawfully lose or forfeit, if the Attainder had been done by Authority of Parliament, without any Office or Inquisition to be found of the same, any Law, Statute or Use of the Realm to the contrary thereof in any wise notwithstanding.

"Saving to all and every Person and Persons, and Bodies Politick, and their Heirs, Assigns and Successors, and every of them, (other than such Person and Persons, which hereafter shall be attainted of High Treason, and their Heirs and Assigns and every of them, and all and every other Person and Persons claiming by them or any of them, or to their Uses, or to the Uses of any of them after the said Treasons committed,) all such Right, Title, Use, Possession, Entry, Reversions, Remainders, Interests, Conditions, Fees, Offices, Rents, Annuities, Commons, Leases, and all other Commodities, Profits and Hereditaments whatsoever they or any of them should, might or ought to have had, if this Act had never been had or made."

In the Construction of these Statutes the following Opinions have been holden.

1. That neither of these Statutes are repealed by 1 Ma. Sess. 1. cap. 1. which enacts, "That no Pains of Death, Penalty or Forfeiture shall ensue to any Offender, for the doing any Treason, Petit Treason, or Misprision of Treason, other than such as be within the Statute of 25 E. 3. ordained and provided;" for the Words, other than such, &c. have been construed not to extend to the Pains, &c. mentioned in the Beginning of the Sentence, but to the Offences mentioned in the End of it.[72]

2. That Estates in Tail are forfeited by Force of these Words in 26 H. 8. of any Estate of Inheritance, which must be void, if they do not include Estates in Tail; (a) also Lands given to a Man and his Wife, and the Heirs of their two Bodies, are as much forfeited by his Attainder, as Lands given to him and the Heirs of his Body.[73]

3. That neither a Right to (b) a Writ of Error to reverse an erroneous Common Recovery, (c) nor a meer Right of Action to Lands in the Hands of a Stranger as of a Discontinuee, or of the Heir of the Disseisor, are forfeited by either of these Statutes; (d) but Rights of Entry are as much forfeited as Lands in Possession; yet the King shall (e) not be adjudged in Possession, by Virtue of such a Right, without an Office, and a Scire facias or Seisure on such Office, for the Words, The King shall be deemed in Possession without Office, &c. shall have this Construction, that he shall be in Possession without Office, in the same Manner as he should have been on an Office found at Common Law; but at Common Law, if a Disseisee had been attainted of High Treason, the King should not have been in Possession without Office, and a Scire facias or Seisure thereon.[74]

4. If Tenant in Tail of the Gift of the Crown makes a Feoffment in Fee, and then is attainted of High Treason, the Right of the tail is forfeited, for it could not be discontinued, because the Reversion continued always in the Crown; and tho' it be put in Abeyance by the Feoffment, as to any Benefit which the Feoffor could have claimed from it; yet since it is not turned to a Right of Action, but would have still continued in him for the Benefit of the Heir, if there had been no Attainder, it shall likewise continue in him for the Benefit of the Crown.[75]

5. That if one attainted of High Treason is seised of a defeasible Estate-tail, and hath also a Right to an antient Intail, which is discontinued, he forfeits both, for the first is within the express Words of 26 H. 8. and the other within those of 33 H. 8. and it doth not follow, that because naked Rights to Lands in the Hands of a Discontinuee, or of the Heir of a Disseisor, are not within the Meaning of the Statute, therefore a Right in the Party himself is not; for the Forfeiture of such naked Rights might not only be of dangerous Consequence in unsettling Possessions, but might also be prejudicial to Strangers, whom the Statute, by an express Saving, plainly intends to favour; but a Forfeiture of the Offender's Right to his own Lands can prejudice none but himself and his Heirs.[76]

6. In the Construction of the Statute of 33 H. 8. it is (f) agreed, that a Power of Revoking the Uses of a Settlement may be forfeited by Force thereof, if the Execution of it require nothing but what may be as well performed by any other Person, as by the Party himself by whom it was reserved; as the Tender of a Ring, &c. (g) Neither doth the Mention of such Considerations and Inducements for the Reserving such a Power in the Preamble of it, as are inseparable from the Person, alter the Case, if nothing of this Kind be inserted in the Proviso it self, by which it is reserved; but (a) if such Proviso require any Thing of this Kind, it prevents the Forfeiture; as if it be worded thus, That if the Party should be minded to alter and revoke the Uses, and signify his Mind in Writing under his Hand and Seal, or (b) if it only require, that the Revocation be under his Hand and Seal, without saying any Thing about his changing his Mind; or as (c) some say, if it only require the Tender of a Ring by the Party ipso adtunc declarante his Intent, &c.[77]

7. That neither an (d) Annuity granted pro consilio impendendo, (e) nor an Office granted for Life, and requiring Skill and Confidence, are forfeitable by these Statutes; but such Office in Fee may be forfeited without the Aid of them, because the Grantor in giving an Estate descendable to all the Heirs of the Grantee, however unqualified, appears not to have been induced to make his Grant from the Consideration of the peculiar Merit of the Persons who are to execute the Office.[78]

By an Act of Parliament made 13 Car. 2. it was enacted, That all the Manors, Messuages, Lands, Tenements, Possessions and Reversions, Remainders, Rights, Interests, Hereditaments, Leases, Chattels Real, and other Things of what Nature soever, that Sir John Danvers, or any other to his Use, or in Trust for him, had the 25th of March 1646. or at any Time after, should be forfeited to the King; and it was adjudged, that by Force of these Words, All Interests of what Nature soever; an Estate-tail was forfeited.[79]

But it is holden, that the Statutes of Praemunire, which give a general Forfeiture of all the Lands and Tenements of the Offender, extend not to Lands in Tail.[80]

It is agreed, that a Saving against Corruption of Blood in a Statute concerning Felony saves the Land to the Heir, because the Escheat to the Lord for Felony is only pro defectu tenentis, occasioned by the Corruption of Blood; also the Saving the Land to the Heir saves the Corruption of

Blood and Loss of Dower.[81]

But a Saving against the Corruption of Blood in a Statute concerning High Treason does not save the Land to the Heir, because the Land goes to the King by Way of immediate Forfeiture, and not by Way of Escheat.[82]

(D) TO WHAT TIME THE FORFEITURE SHALL HAVE RELATION.

THE Forfeiture upon an Attainder either of Treason or Felony shall have Relation to the (f) Time of the Offence, for the Avoiding all subsequent Alienations of the Lands, but to the Time of the Conviction, or fugam fecit found, &c. only as to Chattels, unless the Party were killed in flying from, or resisting those who had arrested him; in which Case it is said, that the Forfeiture shall relate to the Time of the Offence.[83]

No Attainder whatsoever shall have any Relation as to the mean Profits of the Lands of the Person attainted, (a) but only from the Time of the Attainder.[84]

The Forfeiture of a Person becoming Felo de se has Relation to the Time the mortal Wound was given, so that all intermediate Alienations are avoided.[85]

(E) WHAT IS TO BE DONE WITH THE OFFENDER'S GOODS BEFORE CONVICTION.

IT hath always been held, that one indicted or appealed of Treason or Felony may, bona fide, sell any of his Chattels Real or Personal, for the Sustenance of himself and Family, until they be actually forfeited.[86]

But where a Person being in Newgate for Robbery and Burglary, before Conviction, made a Bill of Sale of all his Goods to his Son; and on Trover brought by the Son against the Sheriffs of London, it was held by Holt, that the Bill was fraudulent, and that though a Sale, bona fide, and for a valuable Consideration, had been good, because the Party had a Property in the Goods till Conviction, and ought to be reasonably sustained out of them, yet that such a Conveyance as this cannot be intended to any other Purpose than to prevent a Forfeiture and defraud the King; and this he said was a Fraud at Common Law.[87]

It seems the better Opinion, that at (b) this Day, before Indictment, the Goods of the Offender cannot be searched and inventoried, and that after Indictment they cannot be seised and taken away till the Felon is convicted, for till the Conviction the Property remains in the Felon.[88]

And by the 25 E. 3. cap. 14. it is enacted, "That no Sheriff, Undersheriff, nor Escheator, Bailiff of Franchise, nor any other Person, take or seise the Goods of any Person arrested or imprisoned for Suspicion of Felony, before that the same Person so arrested and imprisoned be convicted or attainted of such Felony according to the Law; or else the fame Goods otherwise lawfully forfeited; upon Pain to forfeit the double Value of the Goods so taken to him that is so hurt in that Behalf by (c) Action of Debt, &c."[89]

This Statute is said to be in Affirmance of the Common Law, and hath been [(d)]adjudged to extend as well to the Seisure of Money, as of any other Chattel.[90]

It seems plain from this Statute, that Goods may be seised as soon as they are forfeited; and it seems the whole Township is answerable for them to the King, and may seise them where-ever they can be found.[91]

And at Common Law it was no Plea for such Township, that the Goods were delivered to the Custody of J. S. who imbezilled them, &c. but it is enacted by 31 E. 3. cap. 3. that if any Man or Town be charged in the Exchequer by Estreats of the Justices of the Chattels of Fugitives and Felons, and will alledge in Discharge of him another which is chargeable, he shall be heard, and Right done to the other.[92]

(F) WHERE THE WIFE SHALL LOSE HER DOWER.

BEfore the Statute of 1 E. 6. cap. 12. the Wife not only lost her Dower at Common Law, but also her Dower Ad ostium Ecclisiae, or ex assensu Patris, or by Special Custom (except that of Gavelkind), by the Husband's Attainder of Treason or (a) Capital Felony, whether committed before or after the Marriage.[93]

But the Wife never forfeited Lands given jointly to her Husband and her, whether by Way of Frank-marriage, or otherwise, but only for the Year and Day, and Waste.[94]

It is enacted by 1 E. 6. cap. 12. par. 17. that albeit any Person shall be attainted of any Treason or Felony whatsoever; yet that notwithstanding every Woman, that shall fortune to be the Wife of the Person so attainted, shall be endowable and enabled to demand, have, and enjoy her Dower, in like Manner and Form as tho' her Husband had [not] been attainted, &c.

But this is repealed as to Treason by 5 & 6 E. 6. cap. 11. par. 9. by which it is enacted, "That the Wife, whose Husband shall be attainted of any Treason (b) whatsoever, shall in no wise be received to ask, challenge, demand, or have Dowry of any the Lands, Tenements or Hereditaments of the Person so attainted, during the said Attainder in Force."[95]

If the Husband seised of Lands in Fee makes a Feoffment, and then commits Treason, and is attainted of it, the Wife shall not recover Dower against the Feoffee.[96]

So (c) if the Husband is attainted of Treason, and afterwards pardoned, yet the Wife shall not recover Dower; but (d) of Lands purchased by the Husband after the Pardon the Wife shall be endowed.[97]

If a Husband having levied a Fine with Proclamations is erroneously attainted of Treason, and the five Years pass after his Death, and then the Outlawry is reversed, the Fine and Nonclaim are no Bar till five Years are passed after the Reversal, because the Wife could not sue for her Dower while the Attainder stood in Force, neither could she any Way reverse.[98]

After the making of the Statute 1 E. 6. cap. 12. it seems to have been doubted, whether the Wife should not lose her Dower in Case of any new Felony made by Act of Parliament; and therefore where several Offences have been made Felony since, Care has been taken to provide for the Wife's Dower.[99]

(G) HOW FAR THE BLOOD OF THE OFFENDER IS CORRUPTED.

IT is clearly agreed, that by an Attainder of Treason or (a) Felony, the Blood of the Offender is so far stained or corrupted, that the Party loses all the Nobility or Gentility he might have had before, and becomes ignoble.[100]

Also it is clearly agreed, that he can neither inherit as Heir to any Ancestor, nor have an Heir, and the Policy of the Law herein is to make Men more mindful of their Allegiance, and to deter them from taking up Arms against the Crown; for as the natural Love Men have for their Posterity, often restrains them from Actions which would prejudice them, either by Intailing the Infamy of such Actions on them, or making them Sharers in the Punishment which the Law has appointed for such Offences; so Men are less careful of their Persons, when their Miscarriages will neither involve their Children in the Guilt or Punishment of them.[101]

Therefore it is (b) laid down as a sure Rule, that where-ever it is necessary for any one, who would make a Title to another, to derive the Descent thro' him, that the Attainder is an effectual Bar to such Title, (c) unless the Land were intailed, in which Case he claims per formam doni, and paramount his Title.[102]

As if there be Grandfather, Father and Son, and the Father is attainted, the Son cannot claim as Heir to the Grandfather of the Lands in Fee-simple, because he must of Necessity derive the Descent thro' the Father, which by Reason of the Attainder he cannot do.[103]

So if there be two Brothers, and one of them having Issue a Son be attainted, and either the Son or Uncle purchase Land, and die without Issue, the other cannot be his Heir, because the Blood of the Father, thro' whom the Descent must be conveyed, is corrupted.[104]

But it is also a general Rule, that the Attainder of a Person, who needs not be mentioned in the Conveyance of the Descent, does no hurt, let the Ancestor be never so remote; and that therefore where one may claim as immediate Heir to another, without deriving the Descent thro' any other, he shall not be barred by the Attainder of any other.

As if the Son of one attainted purchase Land, and have a Son and die, such Son shall inherit him, because he derives his Descent immediately from him.[105]

So if a Man hath two Sons, and is attainted, and one of the Sons purchase Lands, and die without Issue, the other shall be his Heir, because he may make his Title without mentioning the Father; and therefore there is no Disability in the one to be represented, or in the other to represent.[106]

So where a Person attainted hath Issue by a Woman seised of Lands of Inheritance, such Issue may inherit the Mother, tho' he never had any inheritable Blood from the Father.[107]

If the Father of a Person attainted die seised of an Estate of Inheritance during his Life, no younger Brother can be Heir, but the Land shall rather escheat; for the elder Brother, tho' attainted, is still a Brother, and no other can be Heir to the Father while he is alive; but if he die before the Father, the younger Brother shall be Heir, because there is no Default in the Father to be represented, nor in the younger Son to represent the Father after the Death of his Brother.[108]

But if the eldest Son had left Issue and died, such Issue could not have inherited, but such Land must have escheated, because the eldest Son could not have represented the Grandfather, but by the Mediation of the Father, and as standing in his Stead, and that in this Case he could not do, because the Father can have no Representatives, and the younger Son could not inherit, because the elder Line is still continuing, which excludes the Younger.[109]

If a Man be seised of Lands in Fee, and hath Issue two Daughters, and one of them is attainted of Felony, and the Father dies, both Daughters being alive, one Moiety shall descend to the innocent Daughter, and the other Moiety shall escheat.[110] being dead, who hath Issue two Daughters, whereof one is attainted of Felony, it seems the Remainder is not good for a Moiety, but void for the Whole.[111]

For in the first Case the Lord by Escheat must make a Title to devest the Estate which was once lawfully vested in the Ancestor; which he cannot do, because there is no Defect in this Case, since the Ancestor may be legally represented, and the innocent Daughter may legally represent; and therefore there can be no Title in the Lord to evict that Moiety, tho' he has Title to the Moiety of the offending Daughter, who after her Crime can represent no Man; but in the second Case, the Sisters are to make Title to the Remainder, which they cannot do, because to make Title to the Remainder, they must bring themselves within the Words of the Gift; and the innocent Daughter cannot take upon her the Character of an Heir alone, since they both make but one Heir to the Ancestor; and both cannot join, because one is attainted and incapable of that Character.[112]

Altho' a Person attainted be to many Purposes looked upon as dead in Law, yet he hath a Capacity to purchase Land, which the King shall have upon Office found, and not the Lord of the Fee, because his Person being forfeited to the King he can't Purchase but for the King.[113]

But if a Man attainted be pardoned by Act of Parliament he may Purchase as before, for he is totally restored and inheritable to all Persons; but if he be pardoned by Charter, he may thenceforth Purchase Lands, but can't inherit his former Relations; for the King's Charter can't alter the Law, or take away the Right of others, or restore the Relation that was lost.[114]

If a Man be attainted and after pardoned by Charter, the Children born before such Pardon shall not inherit; but if they fail, the Children born after such Pardon may inherit him; for the Pardon makes him capable of new Relations as well as of new Purchases, tho' all the old Legal Benefits and Relations are lost.[115]

Bacon Abridgment, vol. II, pp. 575–586.

14.3.1.3.bOutlawry

OUTLAWRY is a Punishment inflicted on a Person for a Contempt and Contumacy, in refusing to be amenable to and abide by the Justice of that Court which hath lawful Authority to call him before them; and as this is a Crime of the highest Nature, being an Act of Rebellion against that State or Community of which he is a Member, so doth it subject the Party to divers

Forfeitures and Disabilities; for hereby he loseth his Liberam legem, is out of the King's Protection, &c.[116]

And as to Forfeitures for refusing to appear, herein the Law distinguishes between Outlawries in Capital Cases and those of an inferior Nature; for as to Outlawries in Treason and Felony, the Law interprets the Party's Absence a sufficient Evidence of his Guilt, and without requiring further Proof or Satisfaction accounts him guilty of the Fact, on which ensues Corruption of Blood, and Forfeiture of his whole Estate Real and Personal.[117]

But Outlawry in lesser Crimes, or in personal Actions, does not occasion the Party to be looked upon as guilty of the Fact, nor does it occasion an entire Forfeiture of his real Estate, but yet is very fatal and penal in its Consequences; for hereby he is restrained of his Liberty, if he can be found, forfeits his Goods and Chattels and the Profits of his Lands, while the Outlawry remains in Force.[118]

Also it is said, that antiently Outlawry was looked upon as so horrid a Crime, that any one might as lawfully kill a Person outlawed as he might a Wolf, or other noxious Animal; but that the Law herein was changed in Ed. III.'s Time, which provides, that a Person outlawed shall be put to Death by the Sheriff only, having lawful Authority for that Purpose.[119]

Also from the Heinousness of the Offence the Sheriff may, on a Capias utlagatum, break open the House of the Person outlawed; for it would be unreasonable, that this Privilege or Protection, allowed of in other Cases, should be extended to him who is declared a Contemner and Violator of the Law; and therefore the Seising him as an Outlaw, doth imply the Liberty of entring and seising him wheresoever he lies hid.[120]

And as the Punishment of Outlawry is of a very severe Nature, so the Law hath provided and taken great (a) Care, that no Person should be outlawed without due Notice and apparent Contempt to the Court; as will appear under the following Heads:[121]

(A) In what Cases Process of Outlawry lies.

(B) By what Jurisdiction such Processes are to issue.

(C) Against whom Process of Outlawry may be awarded: And herein,

1. Whether it may be awarded against a Peer.
2. Whether Process of Outlawry may be awarded against an Infant.
3. Of awarding Process of Outlawry against a Feme Sole or Covert, and the Proceedings thereon.
4. Of awarding Process of Outlawry against several Defendants, and

4. Of awarding Process of Outlawry against several Defendants, and the Proceedings thereon.
5. Of awarding Process of Outlawry against Principal and Accessary.

(D) What Forfeitures and Disabilities an Outlawry subjects the Party to: And herein,

1. Where it is of the same Effect with a Sentence or Judgment.
2. Of the Forfeiture as to Lands, Goods, &c. and therein of the Difference between Outlawries in Criminal and Civil Cases, and of the King's and Party's Interest at whose Suit the Outlawry was had: And herein,
    1. Of the Difference between a Forfeiture in a Criminal and Civil Case.
    2. What Things are forfeited by the Outlawry.
    3. To what Time the Forfeiture shall relate.
    4. Of the King's and Party's Interest at whose Suit the Outlawry was had, in the Estate and Effects of the Party outlawed, and their Remedies for the same.
3. Of the Party's Disability to bring any Action.
4. What further Disabilities Outlawry subjects the Party to.

(E) Of the Regularity of the Proceeding on an Outlawry, and for what Errors it may be reversed: And herein,

1. Where, for want of such Process as required by Law, the Outlawry may be reversed.
2. Where for want of Form in such Processes the Outlawry may be reversed.
3. Where for Variance in such Processes the Outlawry may be reversed.
4. Where for a defective Execution and Return the Outlawry may be reversed: And herein,
    1. To whom such Process is to issue and be executed.
    2. To what Place the Process is to issue; and therein of the Quinto exactus, and Proclamations on an Outlawry.
    3. What shall be said a good Execution and Return.

(F) Of the Manner of reversing an Outlawry; and therein of the Difference between Errors in fact and in Law.

(G) What the Party must do in order to intitle him to a Reversal: And herein,

1. Of appearing in Person or by Attorney.
2. Of giving Bail.

2. Of giving Bail.
3. Of suing out a Scire facias.

(H) The Effects and Consequences of a Reversal: And herein,

1. Where the Proceedings on the Reversal are in the same Plight as if an Outlawry had been.
2. To what the Party shall be restored on Reversal of the Outlawry.

(A) IN WHAT CASES PROCESS OF OUTLAWRY LIES.

IT seems, that originally Process of Outlawry only lay in Treason and Felony, and was afterwards extended to Trespasses of an enormous Nature; and herein it is laid down by Serjeant (a) Hawkins, that Process of Outlawry at this Day lies in all Appeals, and in all Indictments of Treason or Felony, and in all Indictments of Trespass vi & armis, and on all Returns of Rescous, and as some say, in all Indictments of Conspiracy or Deceit, or other Crimes of a higher Nature than Trespass vi & armis; but it lies not in an Action, nor, as some say, on an Indictment on a (b) Statute, unless it be given by such Statute, either expresly, as in the Case of Praemunire, or impliedly, as in Cases made Treason or Felony by Statute, or where a Recovery is given by an Action in which such Process lay before, as in the Case of a (c) Forcible Entry.[122]

In an Assise a Capias pro fine lies, and upon that Process of Outlawry, if the Assise be found with Force, but being a mixed Action, as savouring of the Realty, it is out of the Statute of Additions, 1 H. 5. cap. 5. which extends only to Personal Actions, Appeals and (d) Indictments.[123]

So Process of Outlawry lies in Replevin, and is given by the Statute 25 E. 3. cap. 17. which gives the Capias in this Manner; when on the Pluries replegiari facias the Sheriff returns Averia elongata, then a Capias in Withernam issues, and on that's being returned Nulla bona, a Capias issues, and so to Outlawry; but it does not lie on the orignal Writ of Replevin, which is Vicountiel and determined; and therefore as no Addition is required in such original Writ, so neither ought there to be any in the second Writ; for where a Writ or Process is founded on a former, it must pursue the former, and cannot vary from it.[124]

By the Common Law, in all Actions of Trespass Quare vi & armis, and in which there is a Fine to the King, a Capias was the Process; and herein Process of Outlawry lay by the Common Law.[125]

But in Account, Debt, (e) Detinue, Annuity, Covenant, and such Actions as are grounded upon Negligence or Laches merely, no Capias lay at

Common Law, but only Summons and Distress infinite, and therefore the Capias and Outlawry in these Actions were introduced by divers Acts of Parliament.[126]

By the Statute of Marlebridge, cap. 23. the Writ of Monstravit de compoto was given, where before the Process in Account was Summons, Attachment and Distress infinite; and by Westm. 2. cap. 11. Process of Outlawry is given in Account.[127]

By the 25 E. 3. cap. 17. it is accorded, that such Process shall be made in a Writ of Debt and Detinue of Chattels, and taking of Beasts, by Writ of Capias, and by Process of Exigent, by the Sheriff's Return, as is used in a Writ of Account.[128]

And by the 19 H. 7. cap. 9. reciting, 'That for as much as before this Time there hath been great Delays in Actions of the Case that have been sued as well before the King in his Bench, as in the Court of his Common Bench, by Reason of which Delays many Persons have been put from their Remedy; it is therefore ordained, enacted and established, that like Process be had hereafter in Actions upon the Case as well sued and hanging, as to be sued in any of the said Courts, as in Actions of Trespass or Debt.'

But it hath been adjudged, that Process of Outlawry lies in no Case but where a Capias lies; and that therefore where the Proceeding is by Bill and not by Original, as there can be no Capias, so there can be no Process of Outlawry, as in a Bill of Privilege by or against an Attorney.[129]

(B) BY WHAT JURISDICTION SUCH PROCESSES ARE TO ISSUE.

IT is clear, that the Courts at Westminster may issue Process of Outlawry, and that the Court of King's Bench, either upon an Indictment originally taken there or removed thither by Certiorari, may issue Process of Capias and Exigent into any County of England, upon a Non est inventus returned by the Sheriff of the County where he is indicted, and a Testatum that he is in some other County.[130]

Also Justices of Oyer and Terminer may issue a Capias or Exigent, and so proceed to the Outlawry of any Person indicted before them, directed to the Sheriff of the same County where they held their Session at Common Law; and by the Statute of 5 E. 3. cap. 11. they may issue Process of Capias and Exigent to all the Counties of England, against Persons indicted or outlawed of Felony before them.[131]

existentibus, so that those whom they have to do with are always intended in Custody already.[132]

Justices of the Peace may make out Process of Outlawry upon (a) Indictments taken before themselves, or upon Indictments taken before the Sheriff, and returned to the Justices of the Peace, by the Statute of 1 E. 4. cap. 1. but the Power of the Sheriff, to make any Process upon Indictments taken before him, is taken away by that Statute.[133]

It is made a Quaere by Hale, whether a Coroner can by Law make out Process of Outlawry against a Man indicted by Inquisition before him.[134]

It hath been held, that tho' the Process in Inferior Courts be a Capias, that yet they cannot proceed to outlaw the Party.[135]

The Process to the Outlawry, viz. the Capias and Exigent, must be in the King's Name, and under the Judicial Seal of the King appointed to that Court that issues the Process, and with the (a) Teste of the Chief Justice or Chief Judge of that Court or Sessions.[136]

(c) AGAINST WHOM PROCESS OF OUTLAWRY MAY BE AWARDED: And herein,

1. WHETHER IT MAY BE AWARDED AGAINST A PEER.

IF a Nobleman, or Peer of the Realm, be indicted and cannot be found, Process of Outlawry shall be awarded against him, and he shall be outlawed per judicium Coronatorem.[137]

But in Civil Actions between Party and Party, regularly a Capias or Exigent lies not against a Lord of Parliament of England, whether Secular or (b) Ecclesiastical; yet in case of an Indictment for Treason or Felony, yea or but for a Trespass vi & armis, as an Assault or Riot, Process of Outlawry shall issue against a Peer of the Realm, for the Suit is for the King, and the Offence is a Contempt against him; and therefore, if a Rescue be returned against a Peer, or if a Peer be convict of a Disseisin with Force, or denies his Deed, and it be found against him, a Capias pro fine and Exigent shall issue, for the King is to have a Fine; and the same Reason holds upon an Indictment of Trespass or Riot, and much more in the Case of Felony.[138]

2. WHETHER PROCESS OF OUTLAWRY MAY BE AWARDED AGAINST AN INFANT.

An Infant above the Age of fourteen may be outlawed, and the Outlawry is not erroneous; but an Infant under the Age of fourteen cannot be outlawed, for if he be it is erroneous.[139]

But the Outlawry of such Infant is not void, it being of Record, but it is voidable only by Writ of Error.[140]

A Woman is said to be waived and not outlawed; and the Reason, says my Lord Coke, why the Outlawry of a Woman is legally called Waiviaria mulieris is, because Women are not sworn in Leets or Torns, as Men are, who are above the Age of twelve; and therefore, says he, Men are called utlagati, i. e. Extra legem positi, but Women are Waiviatae, i. e. Derelictae, left out or not regarded, because they are not sworn to the Law.[141]

Therefore, where a Capias and Exigent were awarded against three Men and two Women, and the Return was Utlagati existunt, where, as to the Women, it ought to have been Waiviatae existunt, this was held to be Error.[142]

If in an Action against Husband and Wife the Husband is outlawed, and Wife waived, and she is taken upon the Capias utlagat', tho' she is to be discharged of the Imprisonment, (because the Plaintiff cannot proceed against her alone) yet she still remains waived, and when her Husband is taken he must bring her in.[143]

In an Action for a Debt due by the Wife before Marriage, the Husband was returned outlawed and the Wife waived, but before the Return of the Exigent an Attorney procured for the Wife a Supersedeas, surmising, that the Wife had appeared by him as her Attorney; and on Motion that this Appearance of the Wife should be received, all the Court conceived, that if upon the Exigent the Sheriff had returned Reddidit se, or upon Pluries Capias had returned Cepi Corpus for the Wife, then her Appearance should be entered, but not by Attorney, as it is here; and the Exigent should only issue against the Husband, & idem dies should be given to the Wife; but when the Husband upon the Exigent is returned outlawed, then it shall be entered Aler sans jour for the Wife, for the Process is determined; and if he will purchase his Pardon, he shall not have any Allowance thereupon in a Scire facias, unless he appear for himself and his Wife; but if for the Husband, the Sheriff should return Cepi Corpus upon a Pluries Capias, and a Non est inventa for the Wife, yet an Exigent shall issue against both, because it must be presumed the Husband might bring in his Wife; but if upon the Exigent the Sheriff returned Reddidit se for the Husband and for the Wife, and she is waived, the Husband shall go sine die; but in this Case, because the Exigent was returned against both to be outlawed, the Supersedeas supposing the Appearance of the Wife is meerly idle and void; whereupon it was disallowed, and the Exigent appointed to be filed against both[144]

4. OF AWARDING PROCESS OF OUTLAWRY AGAINST SEVERAL DEFENDANTS, AND THE PROCEEDINGS THEREON.

If two are sued in a joint Action and neither of them will appear, Process of Outlawry must be taken out against both.[145]

If an Exigent be awarded against two, and the Return is primo exacti fuerunt & non comparuerunt, without saying, nec eorum aliquis comparuit, it is erroneous.[146]

If two in a Writ of Account are adjudged to account, and one is after (a) outlawed in the Suit, and the other appears, he shall account alone.[147]

When two are adjudged to account, and one is outlawed and accounts, if he discharges himself upon the Account, this shall be a Discharge to the other, when he sues a Scire facias upon a Charter of Pardon; and if he be charged by the Account, this shall be a Charge upon the other, because they were adjudged to account jointly.[148]

If in Debt upon an Obligation against B. and C. Sons and Heirs of the Obligor, and against D. the Daughter and Heir of A. who was another of the Sons and Heirs of the Obligor in Gavelkind, Process is continued till the Uncles are outlawed and the Niece waived, and after the Uncles are pardoned, and bring a Scire Facias against the Plaintiff, who thereupon declares against them simul cum the Niece; and the Uncles plead, their Niece is but of the Age of seven, unde non intendunt quod durante minori aetate sua they ought to answer, &c. yet the Parol shall not demur; for the Niece is out of Court, and quoad her the Original is determined, and at her full Age no Re-summons could be sued against her, but the Uncles only, because she never appeared in Court.[149]

An Action of Trespass was brought against two, one was outlawed, after the Entry of the Writ it was entered, & sciendum est quod praedict' J. S. (one of the Defendants) Utlagat' est, and then counts against one of them; and on Motion in Arrest of Judgment, the Court held the Declaration naught, and that the Course of pleading in such Cases, after the Entry of the Writ, was to say, & quod praedict' J. S. utlagat' est in Praec' illo, and that the last Words are essential, because that he might be outlawed in another Writ, and not in this.[150]

5. OF AWARDING PROCESS OF OUTLAWRY AGAINST PRINCIPAL AND ACCESSARY.

Herein we must first take Notice, that by the Statute of Westm. 1. cap. 14. it is recited, 'That it had been used in some Counties to outlaw Persons being appealed of Commandment, Force, Aid or Receipt, within the same Time that he which is appealed for the Deed is outlawed; and thereupon it is provided, that none be outlawed upon Appeal of Commandment, Force,

Aid or Receipt, unless he that is appealed of the Deed be attainted, so that one like Law be used therein thro' the Realm; nevertheless, he that will so appeal, shall not by reason of this intermit or leave off to commence his Appeal at the next County against them, no more than against their Principals which he appealed of the Deed, but their Exigent shall remain until such as be appealed of the Deed be attainted of Outlawry, or otherwise.'

In the Construction of this Statute, the following Particulars are laid down by Serjeant Hawkins as most remarkable.

1*st*, That it seems agreed, that it extends as well to Indictments as to Appeals, not only because the Word Appeal in the Statute may in a large Sense be taken for any Accusation in general; but because Indictments are certainly as much within the Reason of the Statute as Appeals; and the Common Law, for the settling whereof this Statute was made, did not make, any Distinction in this Respect between Appeals and Indictments.[151]

2*dly*, That it seems to be agreed, that where-ever some of the Defendants are expresly charged as Principals, and others as Accessaries, before the Award of this Exigent, the Outlawry thereon of those charged as Accessaries cannot but be reversible, because it appears upon the Record that the Exigent issued contrary to the Direction of the Statute; but if several be outlawed on a Writ of Appeal, which chargeth them all alike without any Distinction, there can be no Advantage taken of the Appellant's not having pursued the Statute, since it appears not but that he might have charged them all as Principals.[152]

3*dly*, That it is strongly holden, that if an Appellant take out the Exigent at the same Time against all the Defendants, he must, when they appear, count against them all as Principals, and shall be concluded from charging any of them as Accessaries, because he has taken out such Process as is erroneous where all are not Principals; but he makes a Doubt, whether this be Law at this Day, since all Errors, as the Law seems now to be holden, are salved by Appearance.[153]

4*thly*, That it seems the better Opinion, that where there are more than one Principal, the Exigent shall not issue till all of them are arraigned; and herein it is said by Hale, that if A. and B. be indicted as Principals in Felony, and C. as Accessary to them both, the Exigent against the Accessary shall stay till both be attainted by Outlawry or Plea; for that it is said, if one be acquitted, the Accessary is discharged, because indicted as Accessary to both, and therefore shall not be put to answer till both be attaint; but hereof he adds a Dubitatur, because tho' C. be Accessary to both, he might have been indicted as Accessary to one, because the Felonies are in Law several; but if he be indicted as Accessary to both, he must be proved so.[154]

In Treason all are Principals; and therefore Process of Outlawry may go against him that receives, at the same Time as against him that did the Fact.[155]

(D) WHAT FORFEITURES AND DISABILITIES AN OUTLAWRY SUBJECTS THE PARTY TO: And herein,

1. WHERE IT IS OF THE SAME EFFECT WITH A SENTENCE OR JUDGMENT.

IF a Man be outlawed of Treason or Felony, tho' there be no other Judgment (a) but Utlagatus est per judicium coronatorem, yet it is of it self an Attainder, and subjects the Party to such an Award thereupon to be made by the Court where he is brought, as is suitable to the Offence for which he is indicted and outlawed.[156]

But if such Outlawry appear to the Court to be erroneous, whereof any one as Amicus curiae may inform them, the Party shall have Counsel assigned him to take Advantage of the Error; but if he will neither bring a Writ of Error, nor plead in convenient Time, and the Outlawry be voidable only, and not void, the proper Execution shall be awarded against him, but no Sentence pronounced; because the Outlawry is a Judgment, and no Man shall have two Judgments for one Offence.[157]

And herein it is said by Hale, that tho' the Court ex officio is to prefix the Party a Day to purchase a Writ of Error, and in the mean Time to respite Execution; yet that must be on his alledging Error in Fact, or Error in Law upon the Outlawry; for if the Court be satisfied that it is merely a Pretence, they may chuse whether they will allow him a Day to sue forth a Writ of Error, but may award Execution presently.[158]

But tho' an Outlawry be an Attainder, and equal to a Conviction or Sentence by Verdict or Confession, yet it does not subject the Party to any severer Punishment than the Crime does for which the Outlawry was pronounced; and therefore, if it be in such a Crime for which Clergy is allowable, the Party outlawed shall be allowed his Clergy in the same Manner as he who is convicted by Verdict or Confession.

One was outlawed upon an Information for seducing a young Gentleman to marry a young Woman of a lewd Character, and fined 5000 l. and it was moved in Behalf of the Defendant, that he could not be fined upon the Outlawry; because in Misdemeanors the Outlawry does not enure as a Conviction for the Offence, as it does in Cases of Treason and Felony, but as a Conviction for the Contempt in not answering, which Contempt is punished by the Forfeiture of his Goods and Chattels; and if he might be fined now, he must be fined again upon the principal Judgment; and the first was held to be irregular; and that the Outlawry in these Cases is not a Conviction, as appears by Fleta, Quamvis quis pro contumacia & fuga utlagetur non propter hoc convictus est de facto principali.[159]

2. OF THE FORFEITURE AS TO LANDS, GOODS, &C. AND THEREIN OF THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN OUTLAWRIES IN CRIMINAL AND CIVIL CASES, AND OF THE KING'S AND PARTY'S INTEREST AT WHOLE SUIT THE OUTLAWRY WAS HAD: And herein, 1. OF THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN A FORFEITURE IN A CRIMINAL AND CIVIL CASE.

Herein we must observe that an Outlawry of Treason or Felony is Conviction and Attainder of the Offence wherewith the Party is charged; and such Outlawry corrupts the Blood, and causes an absolute Forfeiture of the Party's Estate both Real and Personal, viz. in case of Outlawry of Treason his Lands are forfeited to the King of whomsoever they are held; and in case of Outlawry of Felony, to the Lord by Escheat of whom they are immediately holden.[160]

Also in Civil Cases, the Retiring from the Inquiries of Justice is held so criminal in the Eye of the Law, that it is punished with the Loss of the Offender's Goods and Chattels, and the Issues and Profits of his Real Estate; but in Outlawries in Civil Cases the King has no Estate, but only a Pernancy of the Profits; nor can he manure or sow the Ground; and his Interest continues no longer than the Party hath an Estate, and determines with the Party's Death; and being originally introduced to compel the Defendant to come in the sooner and answer the Plaintiff's Demand, may more easily be superseded or reversed, and thereby the King's Pernancy of the Profits discharged, than an Outlawry in a Capital Case.[161]

Also if a Person make Default till the Award of an Exigent, either upon an Appeal or Indictment of a Capital Offence, he forfeits his Goods, unless he was pardoned before the Exigent was awarded; and it is holden, that the Law is the same, as to such a Default upon an Indictment of Petit Larceny, and that where-ever Goods are so forfeited, they are not saved by an Acquittal at the Trial, but by a Reversal of the Award of the Exigent they are saved, whether such Reversal be for an Error either in Fact or in Law; as for the Imprisonment of the Defendant at the Time when the Exigent was awarded, or for a Defect in the Indictment, Appeal or Process.[162]

2. WHAT THINGS ARE FORFEITED BY THE OUTLAWRY.

Outlawry in a Capital Case being, as has been said, an Attainder and Conviction, it is clear, that all Lands of Inheritance, as all other the Real and Personal Estate whereof the Party outlawed is seised or possessed in his own Right, are forfeited absolutely.[163]

Also the King hath by the Common Law such a Power to require his Subjects to answer all Demands of Law and Justice, that his not appearing on Process in a Civil Action, is such a Contempt, that the Party guilty is put out of the Law, forfeits his Goods and Chattels, his Leases for Years, and his Trust in such Leases, and the Profits of his Lands of Freehold.[164]

But Outlawry in Trespass or any Civil Action, works no Corruption of Blood; and therefore if the Husband be outlawed in any such Action, the Wife shall notwithstanding have Dower, and the Issue shall inherit; for it is a Forfeiture owf the Issues and Profits of the Lands only during the Life of the Party outlawed, and so long as the Outlawry remains unreversed; also it seems, that if the Wife herself be outlawed or waived in any such Action, yet her Dower is not forfeited.[165]

It is said to have been agreed by the whole Court, that Arrearages of Rent reserved upon an Estate for Life are not forfeited by Outlawry, because they are Real, and no (a) Remedy for them but by Distress; otherwise if upon a Lease for Years.[166]

Also it is held, that there are other Things which the Party outlawed may have, and are not forfeited to the King; and that therefore an Executor or Administrator cannot plead in Excuse of Assets, that his Testator or Intestate was outlawed, because he might have Debts (b) due upon Contract; also Goods taken for Trespass before the Outlawry, for which he may have Trespass, and recover the Value of the Goods, which shall be Assets in his Hands.[167]

So if the Testator had mortgaged his Land upon Condition, that if the Mortgagee pay not at such a Day to him, his Executors or his Heirs, 100 l. that then it shall be lawful for him or his Heirs to re-enter, and after, but before the Day, the Testator is outlawed, and makes his Executor, and dies, and at the Day the Mortgagee pays the Money to the Executors; this is Assets, and not forfeited to the King.

If Tenant for Term of Years be outlawed, the Term is forfeited to the King, and he may seise it, and use it at his Pleasure.

So if A. being possessed of a Lease for Years grants it over to B. in Trust for himself, and afterwards is outlawed in a personal Action, this Trust shall be forfeited to the King.

If Tenant at (c) Will sows the Land and afterwards is outlawed, the King shall have the Corn.[168]

If the Conuzee of a Statute-Staple take the Conuzor into Execution upon the Statute, and afterwards is outlawed in a personal Action, the Debt shall be forfeited to the King, and the King may discharge the Conuzor out of Execution.[169]

So if there are two Conuzees of a Statute, and they take the Body of the Conuzor into Execution, and one of the Conuzees is outlawed in a personal Action, it is said to be a Forfeiture of the Debt against both.[170]

If a Man be outlawed in a Personal Action the King shall present to his Churches, altho' he hath a Freehold or Inheritance in them.[171]

So if a Person outlawed hath an Advowson, that happens to become void (a) during the Time the Outlawry is in Force, such Avoidance is forfeited to the King, whether the Outlawry were in a Capital Case, an Action of Trespass, or other Personal Action.[172]

If pending a Quare impedit brought by A. he is outlawed, und Judgment is given for him in the Quare impedit, and thereupon the Incumbent resigns, and takes a new Presentation from the Queen by Virtue of the Outlawry, and accordingly he is instituted and inducted, and afterwards A. reverseth the Outlawry, and brings a Scire facias to have Execution of the Judgment; tho' the Presentation was vested in the Queen, and executed before the Outlawry reversed, yet A. shall have Execution of his Judgment; for upon a Recovery in a Quare impedit, any Incumbent that cometh in Pendente placito shall be removed.[173]

Things Personal, settled by way of Trust on the Offender, are as much forfeited as if he had the legal Interest, or were in Possession of them; as if a Bond be taken in another's Name, in Trust for a Person who is afterwards outlawed, this is forfeited in the same (b) Manner as if taken in his own Name.[174]

So the Trust of a Term granted by a Man for the Use of himself, his Wife and Children, &c. is liable in like Manner to be forfeited, if fraudulently made with an Intent to avoid a subsequent Forfeiture; but it shall be forfeited so far only as is reserved for the Benefit of the Party himself, if made bona fide, whether before or after Marriage for good Consideration, without Fraud, which is to be left to a Jury on the whole Circumstances of the Case, and shall never be presumed by the Court, where it is not expresly found.[175]

So where upon an Indictment of Recusancy the Party, intending to go beyond Sea, made a Deed of Gift of all his Goods and Chattels upon some feigned Consideration, and then he went out of the Realm, and was afterwards outlawed on the same Indictment; and it was adjudged, that the Deed of Gift was void to defeat the Queen of the Forfeiture of the Goods, and this by the Statute of 13 Eliz. cap. 5. and that the Queen was intitled to his Leases and Goods by the Forfeiture.[176]

The Forfeiture, as has been said, must be of Goods which the Party has in his (c) own Right, and not in Right of another; and therefore an Executor or Administrator outlawed forfeit nothing which they have in Right of their Testator or Intestate.[177]

So if an Executor recovers in Account against the Receiver of the Testator, and afterwards is outlawed, yet he shall not forfeit this Debt; for it continues the Debt of the Testator, and is only put in Certainty by the Judgment.[178]

Debts and Duties upon Simple Contract are forfeited to the King by the Outlawry of the Party, tho' the Debtor might have waged his Law on such Contract to an Action brought by the Creditor; of which Privilege he is deprived by the Outlawry.[179]

It hath been adjudged, that the Cattle of a Stranger (a) Levant and Couchant on Lands extended on an Outlawry, may be taken for the King upon a Levari facias as the Issues and Profits of the Lands; for that otherwise there might be no Issues at all, or the Person outlawed may take in other Mens Cattle to agist, and so defeat the Outlawry.[180]

So if the Person outlawed should after the Inquisition make a Feoffment of his Lands, the Cattle of the Feoffee may be taken for the Issues of those Lands, for the Land is (b) Debtor to the King.[181]

But if the Owner of the Soil is outlawed, the Cattle of a Commoner cannot be taken as Issues; but if they should be taken, he must plead his Title in the Exchequer, unless his Right of Common is found by Inquisition on the Outlawry.[182]

3. TO WHAT TIME THE FORFEITURE SHALL RELATE.

If a Man be outlawed upon an Indictment of Felony and Treason, and pending the Process he alien the Land, yet the King or Lord shall have the Land which he held at the Time of the Treason or Felony committed; for the Indictment contains the Year and Day when it was done, unto which the Attainder by Outlawry relates: But if a Man sue an Appeal by Writ of Felony or Murder, and pending it the Party aliens, and then is outlawed before Appearance, the Lord's Escheat is lost, because it relates only to the

Time of the Outlawry pronounced; in as much as the Writ of Appeal is general, and contains no (c) certain Time of the Offence committed.[183]

As to Goods and Chattels, the very Issuing of the Writ of Exigent in case of Treason or Felony gives to the King, or the Lord of a Franchise to whom that Liberty is granted, the Forfeiture of all the Goods of the Party so put in Exigent, from the Time of the Teste of the Writ of Exigent.[184]

And as the Award of the Exigent gives the Forfeiture, so if that be well awarded, the Forfeiture shall continue, tho' the Outlawry be reversed for Error in Law or in Fact, subsequent to the Award of the Exigent; for the King's Title being by the Exigent, and that being of Record must be awarded by Matter of as high a Nature; therefore it is necessary for a Party outlawed in Treason to bring his Writ of Error specially, tam in adjudicatione brevis de Exigi facias quam in promulgatione utlagariae: Also a Writ of Error lies to reverse the very Award of the Exigent; and tho' no subsequent Error to the Award of the Exigent will avoid it, yet if there be Error in the Exigent, or in the Appeal or Indictment upon which it issues, both Outlawry and Exigent shall be reversed.[185]

And as the Award of the Exigent gives the Forfeiture of the Goods, so the Outlawry gives the Forfeiture or Loss of the Lands of the Party outlawed; but the bare Judgment of Outlawry by the Coroners, without the Return thereof of Record, is no Attainder, nor gives any Escheat, but it must be returned by the Sheriff with the Writ of Exigi facias, and the Return indorsed.[186]

And therefore, if there be a Quinto exactus, and thereupon utlagatus est per judicium coronatorum, but no Return thereof is made, there lies a Writ of Certiorari to the Coroners, or to the Sheriff and Coroners, to certify the Outlawry into the King's Bench; but this is only either to ground a Charter of Pardon on it, or to amerce the Sheriff where he returned only a Quarto exactus; but as to the Effect it has otherwise, my Lord Chief Justice Hale thinks as follows,[187]

1*st*, That it doth not disable the Party to bring an Action, because in relation to Party and Party it stands as nothing, 'till returned by the Sheriff.[188]

2*dly*, That consequently, barely upon such a Return of an Outlawry upon a Certiorari, without the Writ of Exigent indorsed and returned together with the Certiorari, it seems no Escheat lies for the Lord; but this he makes a Quaere.[189]

3*dly*, But if the Writ of Certiorari be directed to the Sheriff and Coroners, and the Writ of Exigent be extant in Court, and they return this Outlawry;

possibly this may be a sufficient Warrant to enter it of Record, as a Return upon the Exigent for the King's Advantage, and to issue upon it a Capias utlagatum to have the Forfeiture of his Goods.[190]

4*thly*, But unless the Writ is some Way returned or extant, it gives the King no Title to Land or Goods; for the Writ of Exigi facias is the Warrant of the Outlawry, and that which gives the Coroners their Authority in such a Case to give Judgment of Outlawry; and it is not like the Case where there was once a Writ and Return of Outlawry, and the Record since lost, for that upon Circumstances a Jury, upon the General Issue, may find a Record, tho' not shewn in Evidence; but here the Writ was never in Truth indorsed nor returned.[191]

5*thly*, But if the Writ of Certiorari were directed to the Coroners alone, tho' it may be a Ground to cause the Sheriff to mend his Return, and make it according to the Truth; yet the Certificate of the Coroners will not make a Record to intitle the King or Lord to any Thing without the Writ of Exigent extant, and the Return upon it amended by the Sheriff; for without the Exigi facias, and the Return of the Outlawry upon it, there is neither Disability, Forfeiture nor Escheat; and therefore a Certiorari shall not be so much as granted to the Coroners to remove an Outlawry after the Party's Death.[192]

A. was outlawed, and afterwards made a Lease of his Lands, and afterwards these Lands amongst others were found by Inquisition; and this Lease was pleaded in Bar to bind the King, being before the Inquisition; and the Court held, that a Lease or other Estate made by the Party after Outlawry, and before an Inquisition taken, will prevent the King's Title, if it be made bona fide and upon good Consideration; but if it be in Trust for the Party only, it will not be a Bar; but that no Conveyance whatsoever made after the Inquisition will take away or discharge the King's Title.[193]

A. was outlawed at the Suit of B. and his Lands extended; afterwards C. claiming Title to them brought his Ejectment, and pleaded to the Inquisition; and upon a Bill in the Exchequer, an Injunction was prayed for the King to stay the Proceedings at Law, but denied; for tho' a Person outlawed cannot after an Extent prevent the King's Title by any Alienation whatsoever; yet such Outlawry gives no (a) Privilege to the Possession of a Disseisor, but that the Disseisee may enter and bring his Ejectment; for by the Outlawry the King had no Interest in the Land it self, but only a Title to recover the Profits.[194]

It was found by Special Verdict in Ejectment, that A. being outlawed in a personal Action levied a Fine, and the King seised the Lands in the Hands of the Conuzee; and it was resolved, that if the Seisure was before the Fine levied, the King may well retain against the Conuzee; but if the Fine was levied before the Seisure, the Conuzee may well take.[195]

From these Cases the Law seems to be now settled, as laid down in Salk. viz. That by a bare Outlawry the Party immediately forfeits his personal Goods, and they are vested in the King, but that he does not forfeit the Profits of his Lands, nor Chattels Real, 'till Inquisition taken; and that therefore an Alienation after Outlawry, and before Inquisition, is good to bar the King of the Pernancy; but if he makes a Feoffment after Inquisition, the Feoffee has the Estate, and the King shall have the Profits.[196]

4. OF THE KING'S AND PARTY'S INTEREST, AT WHOSE SUIT THE OUTLAWRY WAS HAD, IN THE ESTATE AND EFFECTS OF THE PARTY OUTLAWED, AND THEIR REMEDIES FOR THE SAME.

When the Outlawry is returned on the Exigi facias by the Sheriff, and recorded in Court, Execution may be taken out against the Party outlawed, either general, to arrest the Body, or special, to arrest the Body and extend the Goods and Lands, as also Debts and Choses in Action belonging to the Party outlawed; and when such Inquisition is returned by the Sheriff, a Transcript of the Outlawry and Inquisition is transmitted into the Exchequer; and thereupon, if any Debt be returned due from any one to the outlawed, on Application to the Exchequer a Scire facias issues to such Person, to shew Cause why the King should not have such Sum so found due on the Inquisition to the Outlawed; and the Reason of returning the Transcript of the Record into the Exchequer is, ad ulterior' Execution' praedicto Domino Reg' per eand' Cur' de Scacc' superinde fiend'; for when the Inquisition has returned the Outlawed to be possessed of any Goods or Lands, the Property of these Goods belong to the King, since the Outlawed being out of the King's Protection cannot enjoy any Thing, and the Profits of the Land are to be seised into the King's Hands; but the Lands themselves are not forfeited, unless it be in Capital Cases; but in other Cases the Profits are seised whilst the Party continues outlawed; and therefore the Transcript of this Record is sent into the Exchequer, that the Court of ordinary Revenue may have it in Charge; but the Court of Exchequer (a) usually grants a Custodiam to such Person as sued out the Outlawry.[197]

The King by his Prerogative is to have Bona felonum & fugitivorum; and (b) tho' the Lord of a Manor or other private Person may claim them, yet that cannot be by Prescription, but must be by way of Grant; for every Prescription must be immemorial; and the Goods of Felons and Fugitives cannot be forfeited without Matter of Record, which presupposes the Memory of that Continuance.[198]

There is a Difference said to be between an Outlawry on mesne Process and after Judgment; that as to the first the Party hath no Interest, but that the whole Benefit of the Forfeiture accrues to the King.[199]

If a Capias ad satisfaciendum issues upon a Judgment in an Action of Debt, and the Sheriff returns Non est inventus, and after a Capias utlagatum issues, upon which he is taken and imprisoned, and after he is let to go at large, the Party that recovered may have an Action of Debt for this Escape against the Sheriff, because of the Prejudice to him, (a) he being in Execution as well for his Benefit as for the King's. 1 Rol. Abr. 810. (b) Leighton ver. Walwin.[200]

So if a Capias utlagatum issues upon an Outlawry upon mesne Process, and the Defendant is taken and suffered to escape, an Action upon the Case lies; because the Plaintiff is thereby delayed of his Debt.[201]

If within the Year a Capias ad satisfaciendum issues on a Judgment, and the Defendant is thereupon outlawed, and two Years after taken upon a Capias utlagatum, and the Sheriff suffers him to escape, Debt will lie against him; for the Defendant was in Execution at the Suit of the Plaintiff, without Prayer, in as much as the Plaintiff was at the End of his Process, and no Continuance nor Scire facias lay after the Capias utlagatum, which being sued at the Charge of the Plaintiff imported an Election of the Body. Salk. 318. (c) Wolf ver. Davison adjudged.[202]

If A. hath Judgment in Debt against B. for 50 l. and thereupon he takes out a special Capias utlagatum against him, and J. S promises, that in Consideration of his staying any further Proceeding on that Writ, he the said J. S. would satisfy him the Debt, unless B. did it before such a Day; an Assumpsit lies on this Promise, for the Plaintiff is at the Charge of suing out the Writ, and hath the Carriage of it; and the Party shall be in Execution at his Suit, and the King is to satisfy him out of the Goods of the Party outlawed; altho' it was objected, that the Consideration was against Law, being in Delay of Justice, and that the whole Benefit accrued to the King.[203]

But it hath been adjudged, that an Action on the Case will not lie against the Sheriff for neglecting to extend or seise the Goods and Lands of a Person outlawed upon a Capias utlagatum, because it is the King's Loss; and tho' it was urged, the Sheriff's Extending and Seising would be a Means to enforce the Defendant to appear to the Plaintiff's Action; this the Court said was so remote, as not to be considered as a Ground to support an Action; but if it had been shewn, that the Sheriff might have taken his Body, and had neglected to do it, there might have been more Reason to support the Action.[204]

When after the Extent the Lands are leased out, or a Custodiam granted to him at whose Suit the Outlawry was had, the Lessee shall account only according to the extended Value; and if they happen to be extended too low, the Party hath no Remedy but by taking out a Melius inquirend', and thereby have them extended at a greater Value.[205]

If by the Inquisition the Lands of the Person outlawed are found in the particular Occupation of such and such Persons, but the Value of every particular Parcel is not found, but by the Lump that in toto the Lands are of such a Value; this is a good Finding.[206]

It was found by Inquisition upon an Outlawry, that the Party outlawed was seised in Fee de sex clausis prati & pasturae; and it was objected, that the Inquisition was void for Uncertainty; & per Hale Chief Baron, an Inquisition found de uno messuagio sive tenemento has been held good; because it is not an Office of Intitling, but of Instruction or Information, which does not require such precise Certainty as an Office of Intitling does; so in an Inquisition upon an Extent upon a Statute or Judgment, or in Dower, such Certainties suffice, else all such Inquisitions were liable to be quashed, which would annul all such Proceedings; which would be mischievous; and such Inquisitions have not used to be quashed for Want of such precise Certainty.[207]

A Bill was exhibited by the Attorney General against a Person outlawed, to discover his Real and Personal Estate, and what secret and fraudulent Gifts and Conveyances he had made, because by the Outlawry his Goods and the Profits of his Land were forfeited; to which the Defendant demurred; quia nemo tenetur prodere seipsum, and to discover his Estate upon a Forfeiture; but the Court held, that he ought to answer the Bill; because the King is intitled to his Estate by Course of Law, and the Outlawry is in the Nature of a Gift to the King, or a Judgment for him; and a common Person may have a Bill of Discovery in the like Case to intitle him to take out Execution.[208]

Also in Case of Outlawry, it is said to be the Course of the Exchequer to prefer an Information in Nature of Trover and Conversion against him who hath the Goods of a Person outlawed.[209]

3. OF THE PARTY'S DISABILITY TO BRING ANY ACTION.

A Person outlawed cannot regularly maintain any Action, for by his Contumacy he is out of the King's Protection, and shall have no Privilege or (a) Benefit from that Law of which he is a Violator, and to which he refuses to be amenable himself.[210]

This Disability may be taken Advantage of by pleading the same in Bar or Abatement, with this Diversity, that it may be pleaded in Abatement in all Cases, but it cannot be pleaded in Bar, unless the Ground or (b) Cause of the Action be forfeited; as in Felony, where it may be pleaded in Bar to all Actions concerning Lands and Tenements, as well as Goods and Chattels, because all are forfeited by the Felony.[211]

But tho' it cannot be pleaded in Bar, unless the Ground or Cause of Action be forfeited, nor in Actions where the Damages are incertain; yet it is now held, that in Actions on the Case, where the Debt to avoid the avoid the Law-Wager is turned into Damages, there Outlawry may be pleaded in Bar; for it was vested in the King by the Forfeiture as a Debt certain due to the Outlaw; and the turning it into Damages, whereby it becomes uncertain, shall not devest the King of what he was once lawfully possessed of.[212]

It hath also been held, that Outlawry may be pleaded in Bar after it is pleaded in Abatement; because the Thing is forfeited, and the Plaintiff has no Right to recover.[213]

The Disability cannot be taken Advantage of until the Exigent be returned; for the Inquirng after him in the County is in order that he may appear; and therefore if he does appear at the Return of the Exigent, the Law is satisfied, and the Outlawry must not be recorded against him.[214]

Also this Disability is only pleadable when the Plaintiff sues in his own Right; for if he sues in Auter droit as Executor, Administrator, or as Mayor with his Commonalty, Outlawry shall not disable him, because the Person whom he represents has the Privilege of the Law, and Outlawry being no Objection to his Representation, it is no Objection but he should be answered.[215]

But it hath been held, that to an Action qui tam Outlawry in the Informer is a good Plea, tho' objected that he sues in Right of the King; for as to a Moiety he recovers to his own Use, which he cannot do by Reason of this Disability.[216]

So where a Relator in his Information set forth, that he and the Defendants were Part-owners of several Coal-Mines in Derbyshire, that the King had a Duty of Lot and Cope out of all the Lead-Mines there; that by the Custom, if one Owner were at the Expence for the Improving and Working a Mine, all the Owners ought to contribute and bear their Part of the Charge; that the Relator had been at great Charges in making Soughs and other Things for Working and Improving the Mines, without which they could not be wrought, and so the King would lose his Duty; and that the Defendant would not contribute, nor pay any Part of the Charge; therefore to make him account with the Relator, and pay his Part of the Charge, was (amongst other Things) the Scope of the Information. To which the Defendant pleaded an Outlawry in the Relator; and after much Debate the Plea was held good; for tho' Mr. Attorney be Plaintiff, yet the Relator is to have the whole Benefit or Loss of the Suit, and is himself Party to it; for it would abate by his Death, &c. and the King's Name is only made use of by the Form of the Court, and he is not directly concerned at all, and very little by Consequence, and the Suit is not for the King's Duty, but the Relator's Interest.[217]

If there be two Tenants in Common of a Rectory for Years, and one of them is outlawed, yet the other, on setting forth this Matter, may have an Action of Debt for a Moiety.[218]

If the Party outlawed bring a Writ of Error to reverse the Outlawry, the Outlawry in that Suit, or any Stranger's, shall not disable him; for if he were outlawed at several Men's Suits, and one should be a Bar to another, he could never reverse any of them; and if it be for Error in the same Outlawry, the Outlawry it self is no Objection, for that would be Exceptio ejusdem rei cujus petitar dissolutio; nor is another Outlawry pleadable in Bar to such Writ of Error, for then two erroneous Outlawries would be irreversible, which would amount to exceptio ejusdem rei, &c. So if there be an Attaint brought on a Verdict, Outlawry grounded on that Verdict shall not be pleaded in Bar, for the above Reasons.[219]

As this is a dilatory Plea, when it is pleaded in another Court than where the Outlawry issued, the Defendant must bring it in immediately; for this being in Delay, if the Court should give Time, and it should not be brought in, Delay of Justice would be from the Court; and since there is a Way of having it immediately, by producing it under the Great Seal, no Time shall be given to bring it (a) sub pede sigilli; but otherwise when it is in the same Court, for then the Record is already in Court.[220]

In pleading Outlawry in Disability in another Court, the antient Way was to have the Record of the Outlawry it self sub pede sigilli by Certiorari and Mittimus; but this being very expensive, it is now held to be sufficient, to plead the Capias utlagatum under the Seal of the Court from whence it issues; for the Issuing of the Execution could not be without the Judgment, and therefore such Execution is a Proof to the Court that there is such a Judgment; which is a Proof, that the Defendant's Plea of a Matter of Record is proved by a Matter of Record, and therefore appears to the Court not to be a meer Dilatory; and therefore on shewing such Execution, if the Plaintiff will plead Nul tiel record, the Court will give the Defendant a Day to bring it in.[221]

Outlawry in a County Palatine cannot be pleaded in any of the Courts at Westminster, for he is only ousted of his Law within that Jurisdiction; and it shall not extend to disable a Man in another County where they have no Power; for the County Palatine being a Royal Jurisdiction within Bounds, the Losing the Privileges of the Law within that Jurisdiction can be no Disadvantage to him in another County; and if he does not live within the Palatine Jurisdiction, he is not obliged to attend there; but it seems, that Outlawry in the County Palatine of Lancaster may be pleaded in the Courts of Westminster; because that County was erected by Act of Parliament in Ed. III.'s Time, but Durham and Chester are by Prescription.[222]

If Outlawry be pleaded either in Bar or Abatement, and the Plaintiff replies Nul tiel record, and the Defendant has a Day given him to bring in the Record, and in the Interim the Plaintiff removes the Record by Writ of Error, and reverses it; tho' the Defendant fails in bringing in the Record, yet this shall not be fatal and peremptory on him; for in the first Case he shall have Liberty to plead a new Bar, and in the second, the Judgment shall only be a Respondeas ouster; because his Plea was a true Plea at the Time of pleading it, and the Plaintiff was actually disabled from suing, not having then his Liberam legem.[223]

So that Outlawry does not abate the Writ, but is only a Temporary Impediment that disables a Plaintiff from proceeding; for upon obtaining a Charter of Pardon, or reversing the Outlawry, he is restored to his Law, and shall oblige the Defendant to plead to the same Writ.[224]

Audita querela to avoid a Statute upon the Statute of Usury; to which the Defendant pleaded Outlawry in the Plaintiff at the Suit of J. S. and on Demurrer it was insisted, that Outlawry could not be pleaded in this Case, the Suit being only by way of Discharge, and not to recover any Thing; but it was held, that a Person outlawed is not receivable to sue in any Court, unless it be to reverse his own Outlawry; and the Chief Justice said, that where the Action is ad lucrandum, there ought to be Ability in the Person, and that it is all one to gain by way of Discharge, as by way of

Perquisition.[225]

But where Error was brought by six to reverse a Judgment in Ejectment, and the Defendant in Error pleaded Outlawry in one of the Plaintiffs; the Plea was held ill on Demurrer, because this was only a Commission which went in (b) Discharge, and in which all the Plaintiffs were obliged to join; it was also said in this Case, that it would be very mischievous upon an Outlawry in case of (c) Error, Attaint or Audita querela, which are only by way of Discharge, if this should be any Bar.[226]

A Person is outlawed in Debt, and taken upon a Capias and committed to the Fleet, the Keeper of the Fleet lets him escape voluntarily, and afterwards the Executor of the Plaintiff in Debt takes him in Execution again upon a new Writ, and upon this second Taking he brings an Audita querela; to which Outlawry in the Plaintiff in the Audita querela was pleaded; upon which Plea he demurred; and it was resolved, that Outlawry was a good Plea in this Case in Disability of the Plaintiff; because that this Writ is not directly to reverse the Outlawry, (as a Writ of Error is) but is founded upon a Wrong, viz. upon the Escape, and not upon the Record only.[227]

In Debt upon a Judgment brought in Trinity Term, the Defendant imparled 'till Michaelmas Term, and then pleaded in Bar, that the Plaintiff die lunae prox' post test' Sanct' Martini was outlawed; to which the Plaintiff demurred; it was urged, that the Outlawry was mesne between the Action brought and the Plea pleaded, and that all Matters in Discharge of the Action, which happen after the Action brought, ought to be pleaded puis darrein continuance; but the Court compared this to the common Case of a Judgment confessed by an Executor after an Action brought; which is never pleaded after Puis darrein continuance, but as this Case is; and in these Cases the Time of the Outlawry, and the Time of the Judgment, and when it was, appear in themselves.[228]

In pleading Outlawry, it hath been adjudged, that the Defendant must conclude his Plea with a prout patet per recordum, and not hoc paratus est verificare.[229]

If the Defendant after Imparlance pleads Outlawry in Bar, and the Plaintiff replies Nul tiel record, and the Defendant hath a Day to bring in the Record, and fails therein, Judgment shall be given absolutely against him, and not a Respondeas ouster.[230]

If ten Outlawries on mesne Process be pleaded in Disability of the Plaintiff this is naught for Duplicity; for tho' there be a Difference as to pleading double between Pleas in Bar and Abatement, there is likewise a Difference between a Plea of an Outlawry in Disability and other Pleas in Abatement; and the Court held this Plea ill for Duplicity, because the Plaintiff is disabled as well by one Outlawry as by all the other nine, to which several Answers are required.[231]

Outlawry may be pleaded to a Bill in Equity, as well as to an Action at Common Law; and in this Case the Defendant need not set down the Plea, as he must other Pleas and Demurrers, in eight Days, or they must stand overruled; but the Plaintiff must set it down, if there be any Insufficiency in Point of Form in pleading; for being sub pede sigilli it appears, upon shewing of it, to be a good Plea, and therefore not presumed to be necessary to be argued before the Court; also if an Outlawry be not pleaded, yet it may be shewed at the Hearing as a peremptory Matter against the Plaintiff's Demand, if it be personal; because it shews the Right of the Thing in Demand to be in the King. If a Plea of Outlawry stand allowed, whereby the Suit is put sine die, and after the Outlawry is reversed, the Plaintiff must bring his Bill of Revivor; because that Suit being abated, the Defendant has no Day in Court, and therefore must be brought into Court by a new Process.[232]

But if the Bill be for Relief against an Action at Law, and an Outlawry be pleaded by the Defendant in the same Action, it will not be allowed; (a) because the Outlawry is Part of the Grievance, and it is exceptio ejusdem rei cujus petitur dissolutio; also, as at Law, an Outlawry in an Executor, Administrator or Guardian, is no good Plea, because they do not claim in their own Right; and the real Actor being the Testator or Infant, the Outlawry in any third Person is no Exception against him why he should not share in judicio.[233]

4. WHAT FARTHER DISABILITIES OUTLAWRY SUBJECTS THE PARTY TO.

Persons outlawed are under several other Disabilities, besides that of bringing an Action; such a one cannot be a Juror, because he is not Liber & legalis homo, as the Law requires.[234]

But one outlawed in a personal Action may be a Witness, tho' he cannot be a Juror.[235]

A Person outlawed cannot be an (a) Auditor to take Accounts.[236]

One outlawed in a personal Action cannot be an Approver; because by his Outlawry he is out of the Law, and his Accusation shall not be of such Credit as to put any Person on his Trial.[237]

If a Man pledge Goods and then is outlawed, he cannot redeem them; because then the absolute Property of them is in the King; but if the Outlawry be reversed, then the outlawed Person is re-instated in his Property as if there had been no Outlawry, and therefore may redeem them.[238]

Persons outlawed in Debt, Trespass or other Civil Action, may be Heirs.[239]

If a Husband be outlawed in Trespass, or any Civil Action, the Wife shall have Dower, for this works no Corruption of Blood, or Forfeiture of Lands; so likewise it seems if the Wife be outlawed or waived in such Actions, yet her (b) Dower is not forfeited.[240]

A. being outlawed, the Queen granted him a Lease for Years, rendring Rent, he was again outlawed after the Grant, but before any Seisure there was a Pardon of all Goods and Chattels forfeited; and it was adjudged, that a Person outlawed was capable of receiving a Lease, and that by the Pardon, the Term which was forfeited revived, and was restored again.[241]

It is held, that where Clergy is allowable, it shall be as much allowed to one who is outlawed by Common Law for Felony, as to one who is convicted by Verdict or Confession; also a Statute taking away the Benefit of Clergy, from those who shall be found guilty, doth not thereby take it from Persons who are outlawed; neither doth the Statute of 25 H. 8. cap. 1. sect. 3. which takes away Clergy from those who are found guilty after the Laws of this Realm, extend to Persons outlawed.[242]

By the Statute of Westm. 1. cap. 15. it is enacted, that if a Person be attaint by Outlawry of any Felony, he is not bailable; but it is held, that the Court of King's Bench may in their Discretion, in some special Cases, bail a Person upon an Outlawry of Felony; as where he pleads, that he is not of the same Name with the Person that was outlawed, or alledges any other Error in the Proceedings.[243]

(E) OF THE REGULARITY OF THE PROCEEDINGS ON AN OUTLAWRY, AND (a) FOR WHAT ERRORS IT MAY BE REVERSED: And herein,[244]

1. WHERE, FOR WANT OF SUCH PROCESS AS REQUIRED BY LAW, THE OUTLAWRY MAY BE REVERSED.

THE Forfeitures and Penalties in an Outlawry being so severe, great Care hath been taken and Caution used, that no Person should be outlawed without sufficient Notice, and great Contumacy to the Process of the Court; and therefore the Law requires, that in all Civil Causes and in every Indictment or Appeal for any Crime under the Degree of Capital, there should be three Capias's to the Sheriff of the County where the Action or Prosecution is commenced, before the Exigent is awarded; and if any such Process is omitted, the Outlawry is erroneous.[245]

But (b) after Judgment upon a Capias ad satisfaciendum, an Exigent may be awarded, without an Alias and Pluries, and thereupon the Defendant be outlawed; because he having been already in Court before Judgment, and having Conusance of the Debt, ought to pay the Debt on the first suing out of the Capias; otherwise it is a Contumacy in not performing the Judgment of the Court, for which Disobedience he is put out of the King's Protection.[246]

It is said to be agreed, that one Capias before the Award of the Exigent hath alway been sufficient in an Indictment or Appeal of Death, or High Treason; but that it seems doubtful whether two Capias's were not required by the Common Law in all Indictments and Appeals of any other Felony; however, says Hawkins, it is (c) certain, that they are required in all Indictments of any other Felony by 25 E. 3. 14. by which it is recorded, 'That if after any Man be indicted of Felony before the Justices in their Sessions, to hear and determine, it shall be commanded to the Sheriff to attach his Body by Writ or Precept, which is called a Capias; and if the Sheriff return that the Body is not found, another shall be incontinently made, returnable at three Weeks after, wherein it shall be comprised, that the Sheriff shall cause to be seised his Chattels, and safely to keep them 'till the Day of the Writ or Precept returned; and if the Sheriff return, that the Body is not found, and the Indictee cometh not, the Exigent shall be awarded, and the Chattels shall be forfeit, as the Law of the Crown ordaineth; but if he come and yield himself, or be taken by the Sheriff or by other Minister, before the Return of the second Capias, then the Goods and Chattels shall be saved.'[247]

It is said to have been the general Opinion, that this Statute extends to Appeals, as well as to Indictments, tho' it mention only the latter; but that it extends not to any Indictment or Appeal of Death, tho' it speak of Felony in general.[248]

It is left a Quaere, if three Capias's be still necessary in an Appeal of Rape, as they were at the Common Law, notwithstanding it be made Felony by Statute.[249]

2. WHERE FOR WANT OF FORM IN SUCH PROCESSES THE OUTLAWRY MAY BE REVERSED.

If any Process required in an Outlawry be erroneous, the Outlawry for this may be reversed; for a Person shall not be subject to any Disadvantage in respect of having such Process awarded against him, nor shall he be condemned barely for not appearing, where that which should have compelled him to have appeared is (a) defective.[250]

As where the Capias was este Edmundo Anderson, without a T, for this Error the Outlawry was reversed; for the Capias and Exigent must be in the King's Name, and under the Judicial Seal of the King appointed to that Court that issues the Process, and with the Teste of the Chief Justice or Chief Judge of that Court or Sessions.[251]

Every Capias ought to be returnable the ensuing Term, for the Mischief that might otherwise befal the Prisoner in being kept always in Prison.[252]

The Capias utlagatum can issue only in Termtime, being a Judicial Writ; yet in pleading an Outlawry the Party need not alledge that it issued in Termtime; for that it shall be so intended, unless the contrary appears.[253]

If the Process be against a Feme, and the Words are, Quas recuperavit versus Eum, instead of Eam; this is (b) such an Error for which the Outlawry may be reversed.[254]

If the Writ be Praecipipimus vobis instead of Praecipimus vobis, this is erroneous; for without a Command to the Sheriff the Writ is not good, and here there is none; the Word Praecipipimus being senseless is of no greater Force than if omitted.[255]

3. WHERE FOR VARIANCE IN SUCH PROCESSES THE OUTLAWRY MAY BE REVERSED.

If there be a Variance between the Original and Extent or other Process, for this the Outlawry may be reversed.[256]

As a Variance between the original Writ and Filazer's Rule.[257]

So where in Error to reverse an Outlawry in Trespass, in the Original the Plaintiff was named Barnes, and in the Exigent Bernes; this was held Error; so where in the Original it was Blaba sua, and the Exigent was Blada; this was held a plain Variance, and the Outlawry was reversed.[258]

So where in the Original the Party was named Agnes Gargrave of Kingsly in Com' Ebor', and in the Exigent she is named Nuper de Kingsley; this was held Error.[259]

4. WHERE FOR A DEFECTIVE EXECUTION AND RETURN THE OUTLAWRY MAY BE REVERSED: and herein,

1. TO WHOM SUCH PROCESS IS TO ISSUE AND BE EXECUTED.

The Exigent and several Processes in Order to an Outlawry, are to be directed to the Sheriff of the proper County; and such Care hath been taken that there might be no Surprize in the Affair, that in Civil Cases there are three several Offices concerned in the Issuing of such Process; the first is the Chancery, out of which the Original issues; the second, the Philazer, who makes out the Capias, Alias and Pluries; and the third, the Exigenter, who makes out the Exigents; which several Process must be legally executed before the Party can be said to be outlawed; therefore if the Sheriff returns a Cepi, if he have not the Body at the Day, the Court will not award an Exigent on the Suggestion of an Escape, unless the Sheriff will return one.[260]

If the Exigent be directed to the Sheriffs of the City of Lincoln, and the Direction is Quod Capias Corpus ejus ita quod Habeas Corpus ejus, where (as it was objected) it ought to have been Capiatis & habeatis; yet this is no Error, for they are both but one Officer to the Court, and tho' in the End of the Writ it was Ita quod habeatis ibi hoc breve; this was likewise held to be good, and no way repugnant, being good both Ways.[261]

But if in the Direction of Process of Outlawry to the Sheriffs of London, it be Praecipimus tibi instead of vobis; this is such an Error for which the Outlawry will be reversed, because that the Court will ex officio take Notice that there are two Sheriffs in London.[262]

Judgment of Outlawry is given by the Coroner at the fifth County-Court, upon the Party's not appearing to the Exigent, (which is a Writ, commanding the Sheriff to cause the Defendant to be demanded from County-Court to County-Court until he be outlawed, &c.) and such Judgment is entered thus, Ideo, &c. per judicium Coronatoris Domini Regis Comitatus praedict' utlagatus est.[263]

If the Judgment appear not by the Return of the Exigent to have been given by the Coroner, it is erroneous, except in London, where the Mayor by Custom is Coroner, and the Judgment given by the Recorder.[264]

If there be two Coroners in a County, the Calling upon the Exigent may be by one of them, and likewise one alone may give the Judgment of Outlawry; but it seems, the Return must be by two in Ministerial Acts; the Name of the Coroner must be subscribed to the Judgment of Outlawry at the Quinto exactus upon an Outlawry of Felony; and it must be subscribed also by the Name of their Office, A. B. & C. D. Coronatores, unless in London, where the Mayor is Coroner; the Sheriff's Name and Office must also be subscribed to the Return of the Exigent, e. g. A. B. Armiger vicecomes.[265]

If after the Quinto exactus the Coroners refuse to give Judgment of Outlawry, the Court will grant an Attachment against them; and it is said, that the Coroners of Stafford for such an Offence were fined 10 l. but after the Judgment of the Outlawry pronounced, they may (a) stay the Return of the Exigent for to be advised, if the Case requires it.[266]

By the Statute of 34 H 8. cap. 14. The Clerks of the Crown, Clerks of Assise, and Clerks of the Peace, are to certify into the King's Bench the Names of all Persons outlawed, attainted or convicted; and upon Letter from the Justices aforesaid, Certificates shall be made of such Persons outlawed, attaint or convict, to the Justices of Gaol-Delivery.[267]

2. TO WHAT PLACE THE PROCESS IS TO ISSUE; AND THEREIN OF THE QUINTO EXACTUS, AND PROCLAMATIONS ON AN OUTLAWRY.

The Exigent must be sued to the County where the Party really resides, for there all Actions were originally laid; and because that Outlawries were at first only for Treason, Felony, or very enormous Trespasses, the Process was to be executed at the Torn, which is the Sheriff's Criminal Court; and this held not only before the Sheriff but before the Coroners, who were ancient Conservators of the Peace, being the best Men in each County, to preside with the Sheriff in his Court, and who pronounced the Outlawry in the County-Court on the Party's being Quinto exactus; and therefore anciently there was no Occasion for any Process to any other County than that in which the Party actually resided; but this Matter being since altered, and the Learning thereof depending on several Acts of Parliament, it will be necessary to take Notice of the Statutes themselves.[268]

And first, it is enacted by the 6 H. 6. cap. 1. 'That before any Exigents be awarded against Persons indicted in the King's Bench of Treason or Felony, Writs of Capias shall be directed as well to the Sheriff or Sheriffs of the County wherein they be indicted, as to the Sheriff or Sheriffs of the County whereof they be named in the Indictments; the same Capias having the Space of six Weeks at the least, or longer Time, by the Discretion of the said Justices, if the Case require it, before the Return of the same; which Writs so returned, the Justices shall proceed in the Manner as they had done before the Statute; and if any Exigent be awarded, or any Outlawry pronounced against such Persons, before the Return of the said Writs, the same Exigent so awarded, with the Outlawry thereof pronounced, shall be void and holden for none.'

And it is farther Enacted by 8 H. 6. cap. 10. 'That upon every Indictment or Appeal, by the which any Subject dwelling in other Counties than where such Indictment or Appeal shall be taken of Treason, Felony and Trespass, before the Justices of the Peace, or before any other having Power to take such Indictments or Appeals, or other Commissioners or Justices in any County, Franchise or Liberty of England, before any Exigent awarded, presently after the first Writ of Capias returned another Writ of Capias shall be awarded, directed to the Sheriff of the County whereof he who is indicted is or was supposed to be conversant, by the same Indictment, returnable before the same Justices, before whom he is indicted or appealed, at a certain Day, containing the Space of three Months from the Date of the said last Writ, where the Counties be holden from Month to Month, and where the Counties be holden from six Weeks to six Weeks, the Space of four Months, until the Day of the Return of the said Writ, by which Writ of second Capias the Sheriff shall be commanded to take him which is so indicted or appealed by his Body, if he can be found within his Bailiwick; and if he cannot be found within his Bailiwick, to make Proclamation in two Counties before the Return of the same Writ, that he which is so indicted or appealed shall appear before the said Justices, &c. at the Day contained in the said Writ, to answer, &c. after which Writ so served and returned, if he which is so indicted or appealed come not at the Day of such Writ returned, the Exigent shall be awarded; and that every Exigent and Outlawry otherwise awarded or pronounced shall be holden for none and void.'

But it is expresly provided, 'That the above recited Statute concerning Process to be made before the King in his Bench stand in Force, and that this present Statute shall not extend to Indictments or Appeals taken within the County of Chester; and that if any Persons shall be indicted or appealed of Felony or Treason, and at the Time of the same Felony or Treason supposed was conversant within the County whereof the Indictment or Appeal makes mention, the like Process to be made against them as was used before.'

And it is farther enacted by 10 H. 6. cap. 6. That such second Capias as is required by 8 H. 6. cap. 10. shall be awarded upon Indictments or Appeals removed into the King's Bench, or elsewhere, by Certiorari or otherwise.'

And by the 31 Eliz. cap. 3. it is enacted, 'That in every Action personal, wherein any Writ of Exigent shall be awarded out of any Court, one Writ of Proclamation shall be awarded and made out of the same Court having Day of Teste and Return, as the said Writ of Exigent shall have directed, and delivered of Record to the Sheriff of the County where the Defendant, at the Time of the Exigent so awarded, shall be dwelling; which Writ of Proclamation shall contain the Effect of the same Action: And that the Sheriff of the County, unto whom any such Writ of Proclamation shall be directed, shall make three Proclamations in this Form following, and not otherwise; that is to say, one of the same Proclamations in the open County-Court, and one other of the same Proclamations to be made at the General Quarter-Sessions of the Peace in those Parts where the Party Defendant, at the Time of the Exigent awarded, shall be dwelling, and one other of the same Proclamations to be made one Month at the least before the Quinto exactus by Virtue of the said Writ of Exigent, at or near the most usual Door of the Church or Chapel of that Town or Parish where the Defendant shall be dwelling at the Time of the Exigent so awarded; and if the Defendant shall be dwelling out of any Parish, then in such Place, as aforesaid, of the Parish in the same County, and next adjoining to the Place of the Defendant's Dwelling, and upon a Sunday immediately after Divine Service and Sermon, if any Sermon there be; and if no Sermon there be, then forthwith after Divine Service; and that all Outlawries had and pronounced, and no Writs of Proclamations awarded and returned according to the Form of this Statute, shall be utterly void and of none Effect.'

In the Construction of these Statutes the following Opinions have been holden:

That tho' the Words are express, that any Outlawry pronounced contrary to the Directions of the Statute shall be void; yet it is not to be taken, as if such Outlawries were absolutely void, but only voidable by Writ of Error.[269]

If a Defendant be expresly named of the same County wherein he is indicted or appealed, and be also named under an Alias dictus of another, it hath been adjudged, that there is no need of any Capias, with a Command for Proclamation according to 8 H. 6. because that which comes under the Alias dictus is no Way traversable nor material: Also if a Defendant be named of B. and late of C. there is no need of any Capias to the Sheriff of the County wherein C. lies; because that it appears, that the Defendant is at present conversant at B. but if a Defendant be named of no certain Place at present, but only late of B. and late of C. and late of D. &c. being all of them in Counties different from that in which the Prosecution is commenced, a Capias shall go to the Sheriff of every one of those Counties.[270]

On a Writ of Error to reverse an Outlawry upon the Statute of 5 Eliz. of Perjury, the first Error assigned was, that he was indicted by the Name of N. L. de parochia de Aldgate, and not shew in what County Aldgate is. 2*dly*,

For that a County-Court was held 23 Feb. and the next County-Court was held 23 March following, so as there were not twenty-eight Days between these two County-Courts, as there ought to be by the Law, exclusive and not inclusive. And for the first Cause it was reversed; altho' it was objected to be well enough, because Middlesex was in the Margin, so the Parish should be intended to refer thereto; but because an Indictment shall not be taken by Intendment, and because the County in the Margin shall be referred to the Place where the Offence was committed, and not to the Indictment of the Party; and by the Statute of 8 H. 6. there ought to be the Addition of the Place and County where the Party indicted inhabits; therefore it was held to be ill, and reversed for the second Cause; also it was held to be erroneous; but Tanfield said, that ought to be assigned as an Error in Fait, for it might be Leap-Year, and then it is good, and that Matter issuable.[270]

If an Exigi facias be delivered to the Sheriff, and there are but two County-Courts before the Return, and the Sheriff return the first and second Exactus, & non comparuit, and that there were no more County-Days between the Delivery of the Writ to him and the Day of the Return, there may issue a special Exigi facias with an Allocato comitatu, if it be prayed after the Return, and before any new County-Day be past; but if any County-Day be past between the last of the former County-Days and the Return, no Exigi facias shall issue with an Allocato comitatu, but an Exigi facias de novo; for the Demand of the Party must be at five County-Courts successively held one after another without any County-Court intervening; so if after the second Exactus the Offender render himself, and find Mainprize, and at the Day of the Return make Default, no Exigi facias with an Allocato Comitatu shall issue, because three County-Days intervened, but a new Exigent and a Capias against the Bail.[272]

And therefore it hath been holden, that in London, where the Holding of the Hustings is uncertain, no Exigi facias shall issue with an allocato Hustings, because the Court cannot take Notice of the set Times of holding it, as they may of the Times of holding the County-Courts; but it is now agreed, that if an Exigent issues in London, and they begin Husting de placito terrae (as they may) they shall proceed along at that Hustings to the Outlawry, without mingling their Hustings de communibus placitis; but if an allocato Husting comes, they shall proceed without omiting any Husting.[273]

Before a Person is pronounced outlawed he is to be Quinquies exactus, for he hath three Days for Appearance, one for Grace, and if he stands in Contempt at all these Days, at the fifth County-Court he is pronounced outlawed by the Coroners; and therefore (a) if a Person be outlawed the Day of the Quinto exactus, this is Error, because he hath all that Day to appear.[274]

But if an Exigent be awarded against A. and after he is Quinto exactus, and before the Return of the Exigent, he dies, yet the Outlawry shall stand in its Force, and shall not be reversed; for Judgment was by the Coroners upon the Quinto exactus, and they may certify the Outlawry; but otherwise (b) if A. had died before the Quinto exactus.[275]

If, on an Outlawry against two, it be returned, that Exacti non comparuerunt, without saying nec aliquis eorum comparuit, this is erroneous; for peradventure one of them did appear.[276]

So where a Capias, and thereupon an Exigent, was awarded against five, viz. three Men and two Women, and the Return was, Quod ad quartum comitatum, &c. non comparuerunt, without saying nec eorum aliquis comparuit; and this was held to be manifest Error; and it being likewise returned utlagati existunt, where for the Women it ought to have been Waviatae, this was likewise held to be Error.[277]

The Return must shew where the County-Court was held, and in what County, and this must be shewn on every Exactus; and therefore (a) an Outlawry was reversed, because the Place where the County-Court was held was not shewn on the secund' Exactus; so (b) where not shewn on the tertio Exactus.[278]

Also the Party must be named of such a Place (c) in Com' Midd', and not de Midd'.[279]

If the Sheriff returns, that ad Comitatum meum S. tent' apud C. and says not in Com' praed', or in Com' S. this is erroneous.[280]

So if it be ad Comitatum meum tentum apud S. in Com' Somers', and says not ad Comitatum meum Somers', or ad Comitatum Somers', without saying ad Comitatum meum Somerset; this is erroneous.[281]

So an Outlawry was reversed, for that the Proclamations were returned to be ad Comitat' meum tent' apud such a Place in Com' praedict', and not said pro Com'; for antiently one Sheriff had two or three Counties, and might hold the Court in one County for another.[282]

The Sheriff must return the Day and Year of the King to every Exactus; and therefore if the Day and Year of the King be inserted in the 1*st*, 2*d*, 3*d*, and 5*th Exactus*, but omitted in the 4*th*, it is erroneous, and shall not be supplied by Intendment.[283]

So if it be Anno Regni Dominae Reginae, without saying Elizabethae, without saying Reginae, or Anno Regni Domini Regis Jacobi, without saying Regni suae Angliae, for the Year of England and Scotland differ; so if there be less than a Month between the first and second Exactus; in these Cases the Outlawry is erroneous.[284]

So if the Return be ad Husting tent' apud Guildhall Civitatis London, without saying de communibus Placitis, it is erroneus; because they have two Hustings, one de Communibus Placitis, another de placitis terrae. [285]

If an Outlawry be returned, that the Party was exact' at three several Times, 10 Jac. and that he was Quarto exact' 25th Day of Feb' & non comparuit, without mentioning any Year, & Quinto exact' such a Day in March, 10 Jac', altho' it may be intended, that he was Quarto exact' in 10 Jac. yet the Outlawry shall not be good by Intendment; for perhaps the Clerk would have made it Quarto Exact' 8 Jac. which would have been clearly bad.[286]

(F) OF THE MANNER OF REVERSING AN OUTLAWRY; AND THEREIN OF THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN ERRORS IN FACT AND IN LAW.

OUtlawries are regularly to be reversed by Plea by Writ of Identitate nominis, or by Writ of Error, for any Errors, be they Errors in Fact or in Law.[287]

As to Errors in Fact; as that in Felony, the Party was an Infant under the Age of fourteen, was in Prison or beyond Sea; these can regularly be only taken Advantage of by Writ of Error; but it is agreed, that by the Common Law in favorem vitae an Outlawry of Treason or Felony might be avoided by Plea, that the Defendant was in Prison, or in the King's Service beyond Sea, &c. at the Time of the Outlawry pronounced against him; but that no Outlawry for any other Crime (against a Party rightly described) can be avoided by Plea of any Matter of Fact whatsoever.[288]

As to avoiding of an Outlawry of Felony, because the Party was beyond the Sea, these Differences are laid down by Rolle and Hale, as agreed to by the Court. 1st, That if a Man, having committed a Felony, goes beyond the Sea voluntarily, or upon his own Occasions, and not in the King's Service, before any Exigent awarded, tho' after the Indictment, and then an Exigent is awarded, and the Offender beyond the Sea is outlawed for the Felony, he may assign it for Error. 2*dly*, But if after the Exigent awarded upon the Indictment of Felony, then he goes beyond the Sea voluntarily, or upon his own Occasions, and being so beyond Sea is outlawed, he shall not avoid it by such being beyond Sea; because by the Exigent awarded he has Notice of the Prosecution, and by such a Means he may avoid his Conviction, by staying till all the Witnesses are dead. 3*dly*, But yet prima facie the Error in that Case is well assigned, by alledging he was ultra mare tempore promulgationis utlagariae ; and if he were in the Realm after the Exigent issued, it shall come in by the Plea of the King's Attorney to shew it. 4*thly*, But if he were within the Realm at the Time of the Exigent issued, and went beyond the Sea upon the Service of the King or Kingdom, and then is outlawed, being beyond the Sea, this Outlawry shall be reversed; if the Party alledge generally, that he was ultra mare tempore promulgationis utlagariae, and the King's Attorney reply, that he was in England tempore emanationis brevis de Exigi facias, it is a good Replication for the Plaintiff in the Writ of Error to alledge, that he went out after the Exigent, and before the Outlawry pronounced, upon the King's Command or Service, and shew it specially, and so confess and avoid the Plea.[289]

As to the Avoiding an Outlawry in Treason, on the Party's being beyond Sea, it is enacted by the 26 H. 8. cap. 13. and 5 & 6 E. 6. cap. 11. 'That all Process of Outlawry to be had or made within this Realm against any Offenders in Treason, being resiant [sic; resident] or inhabiting out of the Limits of this Realm, or in any of the Parts beyond the Seas, at the Time of the Outlawry pronounced against them, shall be as good and effectual in Law, to all Intents and Purposes, as if such Offenders had been resident and dwelling within this Realm at the Time of such Process awarded, and Outlawry pronounced ; (a) provided that the Party so to be outlawed shall, within one Year next after the said Outlawry pronounced, yield himself to the Chief Justice of England for the Time being, and offer to traverse the Indictment or Appeal whereon the said Outlawry shall be pronounced, as is aforesaid, that then he shall be received to the same Traverse; and being thereupon found Not guilty by the Verdict of twelve Men, he shall be clearly acquitted and discharged of the said Outlawry, &c.'[290]

It is the allowed Practice of the Court of Common Pleas to suffer a Defendant, coming in by Capias utlagatum the same Term on which an Exigent is returnable, to avoid the Outlawry without Writ of Error, by shewing, that he purchased a Supersedeas out of the same Court, and delivered it to the Sheriff before the Quinto exactus, &c. or by shewing any other Matter apparent on Record which makes the Outlawry erroneous; as the Want of an Original, or the Omission of Process, or Want of Form in a

Writ of Proclamation, &c. or a Return by a Person appearing not to be Sheriff, or a Variance between the Original and Exigent, or other Process, or the Want of such Addition as required by 1 H. 5. yet it is said in many Books to be the constant Course of the Court of King's Bench never to reverse an Outlawry on the Crown-side, either in the same or a different Term, for these or other Errors of a like Nature, without a Writ of Error.[291]

It is agreed, that any Outlawry whatsoever may be avoided by a Defendant's coming in upon the Capias utlagatum, and pleading a Misnomer either of the Name or Addition in the Writ, &c. as by shewing, that whereas he is called by such a Name of Baptism or Surname, he hath been always known by a different one, and not by that in the Writ, &c. or whereas he is named of such Estate, Degree or Mystery, that he hath some other Addition, and not that in the Writ, &c. also it is said in many Books, that he may plead, that there is no such Town as that whereof he is named; and it seems clearly agreed, that he may plead, that at the Time of the Writ purchased, and ever since, he hath made his Abode at some other Town, and not at that in the Writ, &c. and it is said, that by such Plea the Outlawry shall only be avoided as to the Person who pleads it, (who shall not be intended to be the Person meant) and shall stand in Force against the Person of the Name and Addition in the Record ; but it is said, that a Person of the same Name and Addition as are mentioned in a Record of Outlawry cannot avoid it, by averring, that there are two Persons of such Name and Addition, and that the Person intended is the Elder, and he himself is the Younger, but shall be put to his Writ De identitate nominis; which is said by some to be the only Remedy in such Case, after an Outlawry returned ; and it seems, that notwithstanding in Civil Cases, before an Outlawry is returned, one of the same Name may come into Court, and shew that he is not the Person intended; whereupon if the Plaintiff confess it, the Diversity of the Names shall be entered on the Roll, and a new Exigent shall issue, with a fuller Description of the Person intended; yet this cannot be done upon an Indictment without a Writ of Identitate nominis, because it would make the Process variant from the Indictment, which cannot be altered without the Consent of the Jurors.[292]

If A. brings an Audita querela against B. and declares, that whereas B. had recovered against A. 200 l. Debt, &c. and thereupon the said A. was outlawed, and upon a Capias utlagatum taken, and in Execution at the Suit of the said B. and after from the said Execution was delivered and suffered to go at large, &c. and yet B. hath taken out Execution upon the said

Judgment, and endeavours, &c. the Defendant may plead and shew how, that after the said Enlargement, and before the Purchase of the Audita querela, the Outlawry was set aside and made void; and so conclude Quod (a) non habetur tale recordum[293]

If a Person procures another to be outlawed clandestinely, who appears openly and in Publick, the Court will, on Motion, oblige such Person who procures the Outlawry to reverse the same at his own Costs; but if it appears, that the Party outlawed had lurked backward and forward between two Counties, and that the Person procuring the Outlawry had dealt openly, and had been regular in sending down the Proclamations to the Sheriff of the County where he sometimes resided; the Court will not interpose in this summary Manner, but will leave the Party to his ordinary Remedies by Plea or Writ of Error.[294]

(G) WHAT THE PARTY MUST DO IN ORDER TO INTITLE HIM TO A REVERSAL: And herein, 1. OF APPEARING IN PERSON OR BY ATTORNEY.

REgularly in all Outlawries, as well Personal as Criminal, the Party in order to reverse the same was to appear in Person, and could not appear by Attorney.[295]

But now by the 4 & 5 W. & M. cap. 18. For the more easy and speedy Reversing of Outlawries in the Court of King's Bench, it is enacted, 'That from and after the first Day of Easter Term thence ensuing, no Person or Persons whatsoever, who are or shall be outlawed in the said Court for any Cause, Matter or Thing whatsoever, (Treason and Felony only excepted,) shall be compelled to come in Person into or appear in Person in the said Court to reverse such Outlawry, but shall or may appear by Attorney and reverse the same without Bail in all Cases, (except where special Bail shall be ordered by the said Court.)'

And it is farther enacted by the said Statute, 'That if any Person or Persons outlawed, or hereafter to be outlawed, in the said Court, (other than for Treason or Felony,) shall from and after the said first Day of Easter Term be taken and arrested upon any Capias utlagatum out of the said Court, it shall and may be lawful to and for the Sheriff or Sheriffs, who hath or shall have taken and arrested such Person and Persons, (in all Cases were special Bail is not required by the said Court,) to take an Attorney's Engagement under his Hand to appear for the said Defendant or Defendants, and to reverse the said Outlawries, and thereupon to discharge the said Defendant and Defendants from such Arrests; and in those Cases, where special Bail is required by the said Court, the said Sheriff and Sheriffs shall and may take Security of the said Defendant or Defendants by Bond, with one or more sufficient Surety or Sureties, in the Penalty of double the Sum for which special Bail is required, and no more, for his, her or their Appearance by Attorney in the said Court at the Return of the said Writ, and to do and perform such Things as shall be required by the said Court; and after such Bond taken to discharge the said Defendant and Defendants from the said Arrests.'

And it is farther enacted by the said Statute, 'That if any Person or Persons outlawed as aforesaid, and taken and arrested upon a Capias utlagatum, shall not be able within the Return of the said Writ to give Security, as aforesaid, in Cases where special Bail is required, so as he or they are committed to Gaol for Default thereof, that whensoever the said Prisoner or Prisoners shall find sufficient Security to the Sheriff or Sheriffs, in whose Custody he or they shall be, for his or their Appearance by Attorney in the said Court at some Return in the Term then next following, to reverse the said Outlawry or Outlawries, and and to do and perform such other Thing and Things as shall be required by the said Court, it shall and may be lawful to and for the said Sheriff and Sheriffs, after such Security taken, to discharge and set at Liberty the said Prisoner and Prisoners for the same; any Law or Usage contrary notwithstanding.'

It hath been held, that if the Party outlawed comes in by Cepi Corpus, he shall not be admitted to reverse the Outlawry without appearing in Person, as in such Case he was obliged to do at Common Law; or putting in Bail with the Sheriff for his Appearance upon the Return of the Cepi Corpus, and for doing what the Court shall order.[296]

2. OF GIVING BAIL.

By Westm. 1. cap. 9. it is expresly provided, that those who are outlawed, have abjured the Realm, &c. should be excluded the Benefit of Replevin; yet it hath been always held, that the Court of King's Bench may in their Discretion, in special Cases, bail a Person upon an Outlawry of Felony; as where he pleads, that he is not of the same Name, and therefore not the same Person with him that was outlawed, or alledges any other Error in the Proceedings.[297]

By the 3 Eliz. cap. 3. Sect. 3. it is enacted, 'That before any Allowance of any Writ of Error, or Reversing of any Outlawry be had by Plea, or otherwise, through or by want of any Proclamation to be had or made according to the Form of this Statute, the Defendant and Defendants in the original Action shall put in Bail, not only to appear and answer to the Plaintiff in the former Suit in a new Action to be commenced by the said Plaintiff for the Cause mentioned in the first Action, but also to satisfy the Condemnation, if the Plaintiff shall begin his Suit before the End of two Terms next after the Allowing the Writ of Error, or otherwise Avoiding of the said Outlawry.'

A. who was a foreign Merchant and never in England, was outlawed at the Suit of B. in an Action on several Promises for Goods sold and delivered; and upon a special Capias utlagatum a Ship and other Effects belonging to A. were seised, as forfeited upon this Outlawry; and it was moved, that this Outlawry may be vacated, and Restitution awarded, upon Affidavits produced and read, that the Defendant was never Infra legem, i. e. that he never was in England, and therefore could not be outlawed, because that was putting him extra Legem. Sed per Cur' : This Outlawry shall not be vacated upon such Affidavits, but the Defendant may bring a Writ of Error, which he was compelled to do, and thereupon to put in Bail to the Action in which he was outlawed according to the new Statute of 4 & 5 W & M. and then the Plaintiff consented to the Reversal of the Outlawry.[298]

H. was outlawed in two Actions, one was for 10 l. the other for 40 s. and upon reversing the Outlawry the Court took special Bail for the first, and an Appearance for the other, upon the Statute 4 & 5 W. & M. and the Recognizance was taken pursuant to 31 Eliz.[299]

3. OF SUING OUT A SCIRE FACIAS.

It is clearly agreed, that an Attainder of Felony of a Person who had any Lands shall never be reversed by Writ of Error, without a Scire facias against all the Ter-tenants and Lords mediate and immediate; but it is (a) settled, that such Scire facias is not necessary in the Case of High Treason.[300]

Also it is said, that it is not necessary in the Case of Felony, when it is suggested on the Roll that the Party had no Lands, and the Attorney General confesses it.[301]

(h) the effects and consequences of a reversal:

And herein,

1. WHERE THE PROCEEDINGS ON THE REVERSAL ARE IN THE SAME PLIGHT AS IF NO OUTLAWRY HAD BEEN.

IT is agreed, that after an Outlawry of Treason or Felony is reversed, the Party shall be put to plead to the Indictment, for that stills remains good, and (b) he may be tried at the King's Bench Bar; or the Record may be remitted into the Country, if it were removed into the King's Bench by

Certiorari, with a Command to the Justices below to proceed by the Statute of 6 H. 6. cap. 6.[302]

So if a Man be outlawed by Process in an Information, and comes in and reverses the Outlawry, he must plead instanter to the Information. [303]

The Law is the same in Civil Cases; and therefore if an Outlawry in a personal Action be reversed, the Original remains.[304]

Trespass for taking and detaining his Beasts till he made a Fine, the Action was laid in Sussex; the Defendant pleads, that the Cause of Action did not accrue within six Years before Suing of the Writ. The Plaintiff replies, that at another Time he brought an Original in Battery in London, intending when the Defendant had appeared to have declared for this Trespass; and that the Defendant was outlawed in London; and that within such a Time after the Reversal of the Outlawry he declared here; the Defendant demurred ; and for the Defendant it was insisted, that the Original being laid in London, he could not in this Action declare in another County, tho' the Cause of Action be transitory; but upon Information by the Prothonotaries that the Course of the Court is, that altho' the Original be laid in London for expediting the Outlawry, yet when the Defendant comes in, the Plaintiff may declare against him in any other County, be the Action local or transitory; and the Statute 21 Jac. 1. cap. 16. gives to Plaintiffs generally a Power to commence a new Suit within the Year after the Outlawry reversed; and that so he may do in this Case to warrant his Declaration within the Course of the Court; and Judgment was given for the Plaintiff.[305]

2. TO WHAT THE PARTY SHALL BE RESTORED ON REVERSAL OF THE OUTLAWRY.

It hath been adjudged, that if the King grant over the Lands of a Person outlawed for Treason or Felony, and afterwards the Outlawry be (a) reversed, the Party may enter on the Patentee, and needs neither to sue a Petition to the King, nor a Scire facias against the Patentee.[306]

If the Goods of a Person outlawed are sold by the Sheriff upon a Capias utlagatum, and after the Outlawry is reversed by Writ of Error, he shall be restored to the Goods themselves; because the Sheriff was not compellable to sell those Goods, but only to keep them to the Use of the King.[307]

If an Advowson comes to the King by Forfeiture upon an Outlawry, and, the Church becoming void, the King presents, and then the Outlawry is reversed; yet the King shall enjoy that Presentment, because the Presentment there came to the King as the Profit of the Advowson.[308]

But if the Church be void at the Time of the Outlawry, and the Presentation is thereby forfeited as a Chattel principally and distinct of it self, there, upon the Reversal of the Outlawry, the Party shall be restored to the Presentation.[309]

If a Termor being outlawed for Felony grants over his Term, and after the Outlawry is reversed, the Grantee may have Trespass for the Profits taken between the Reversal of the Outlawry and the Assignment; for by the Reversal it is as if no Outlawry had been, and there is no Record of it.[310]

It is said, that if a Man be outlawed in the King's Bench, and the Party's Goods are seised into the King's Hands, and then the Outlawry is reversed, there can be no Restitution; the Reason whereof is, for that the Court of King's Bench cannot send a Writ to the Treasurer; and the Court of Exchequer have no Record before them to issue out a Warrant for Restitution.[311]

It hath been adjudged in Chancery, that if A. being possessed of several Houses for a long Term for Years, mortgages the same, and is outlawed for High Treason, upon which those Houses are seised into the King's Hands, and the same granted for valuable Consideration to J. S. who likewise gets an Assignment of the Mortgage; that yet the Representative of A. may redeem the Mortgage upon Reversal of the Outlawry; and herein the Lord Keeper said, that the Judgment upon the Reversal is, that the Party shall be restored to all that has not been answered to the King; which in all Cases has been understood of the mesne Profits answered to the King, and not as to the principal Thing it self, tho' seised into the King's Hands; and that it was undoubtedly so as to a Freehold or Inheritance, and he saw no substantial Difference in the Case of a Leasehold.[312]

Of the Powers of Punishment

Experience shows that in countries remarkable for the lenity of penal laws, the spirit of the inhabitants is as much thereby affected, as in other countries, with severer punishments.

If an inconveniency or abuse arises in the state, a violent government endeavors suddenly to redress it; and instead of putting the old laws in execution, it establishes some cruel punishment which instantly puts a stop to the evil. But the spring of government hereby loses its elasticity; the imagination grows accustomed to the severe as well as the milder punishment; and as the fear of the latter diminishes, they are soon obliged in every case to have recourse to the other.

Of the Just Proportion Betwixt Punishments and Crimes

It is an essential point that there should be a certain proportion in punishments, because it is essential that a great crime should be avoided rather than a lesser, and that which is more pernicious to society rather than that which is less.

It is a great abuse amongst us to subject to the same punishment a person that only robs on the highway, and another that robs and murders. Obvious it is that for the public security some difference should be made in the punishment.

Where there is no difference in the punishment, there should be some in the expectation of pardon. …

CHAP. XV.
Of Bail.

Sect. 1. AND now I am to consider in what Manner, and in what Cases Offenders are to be bailed; as to which it is to be observed, That wherever a Person is brought before a Justice of Peace upon an Accusation of Treason or Felony, he must be either bailed or committed, unless it manifestly appear that no such Crime was committed, or that the Cause for which alone the Party was suspected, was totally groundless; in which Cases only it is lawful to discharge him without Bail.[313]

For the better Understanding of the Nature of Bail, I shall consider the following Points:

1. The Nature of Bail and Mainprize in general.
2. What shall be said to be sufficient Bail.
3. The Offence of taking insufficient Bail.

4. The Offence of granting it where it ought to be denied.
5. The Offence of denying, delaying or obstructing it where it ought to be granted.
6. In what Cases it is grantable.
7. In what Form it is to be taken.
8. What shall forfeit the Recognizance.

And first, As to the Nature of Bail and Mainprize in general, I shall endeavour to shew,
1. In what Respect they agree.
2. In what they differ.

Sect. 2. As to the first Particular it seems, That the Words Bail and Mainprise, are often used promiscuously in our [a] Law-Books and [b] Acts of Parliament as signifying one and the same Thing; and it is [c] certain, That Bail and Mainprise agree in this Notion, that they save a Man from Imprisonment in the common Gaol, by his Friends undertaking for him before certain Persons for that Purpose authorized, that he shall appear at a certain Day, and answer the Crime with he is charged, and he justified by Law.

Sect. 3. As to the second particular, The chief, if not the [d] only, Difference between Bail and Mainprise seems to be this, That a Man's Mainpernors are [e] barely his Sureties, and cannot justice the Detaining or Imprisoning of him themselves, in Order to secure his Appearance: But that a Man's Bail are looked upon as his [f] Gaolers of his own choosing, and that the [g] Person bailed is in the Eye of the Law, for many Purposes, esteemed to be as much in the Prison of the Court by which he is bailed, as if he were in the actual Custody of the proper Gaoler. But I do not find this Point clearly settled in Relation to any other Court besides the King's Bench, as hath been more fully shewn Ch. 6. Sect. 4. However it seems certain in every Bailment, That if the Party bailed be [h] suspected by his Bail as likely to deceive them, he may be detained by them, and enforced to appear according to the Condition of the Recognizance, or may be [i] brought by them before the Justice of Peace, by whom he shall be committed, unless he find new Sureties.

Sect. 4. As to the second Point, viz. What shall be said to be sufficient Bail, it seems to be [k] agreed, That no Person ought in any Case to be bailed for Felony by less than two; and it is [l] said to be the Practice of the King's Bench, not to admit any Person to Bail upon a Habeas Corpus on a Commitment for Treason or felony without four Sureties: Also [m] it seems to have been anciently an established Rule, That none under the Degree of Subsidy-men, should be admitted to bail any Person for a capital Crime: But the Manner of granting Taxes by Way of Subsidy having been of late for many Years disused, this Rule at present seems to be of little Use: But the only sure Way of proceeding in this Case, is to take Care that every one of the Bail be of Ability sufficient to answer the Sum in which they are bound, which [n] ought never to be less than forty Pounds for a capital Crime, but may be as much higher as the Justices in Discretion shall think fit to require, upon Consideration of the Ability and Quality of the Prisoner, and the Nature of the Offence: And if it shall seem doubtful, whether the Persons who offer themselves to be Sureties, be able to answer such Sum; it is [o] said, That the Person who is to take the Bail, may examine them on their Oaths concerning their Sufficiency: And if a Person who has Power to take Bail be so far imposed upon as to suffer a Prisoner to be bailed by insufficient Persons, it is said, That either he, or any other Person who hath Power to bail him may require the Party to find better Sureties, and to enter into a new Recognizance with them, and may commit him on his Refusal, for what insufficient Sureties are as no Sureties.[314]

Sect. 5. But Justices must take Care, That under Pretence of demanding sufficient Surety, they do not make so excessive a Demand, as in effect amounts to a Denial of Bail; for this is looked on as a great Grievance, and is complained of as such by 1 W. & M. Sass. 2. by which it is declared, That Excessive Bail ought not to be required.

Sect. 6. As to the third Point, viz. the Offence of taking insufficient Bail, it seems clear; That where-ever a Sheriff, in Pursuance of the Statute of Westminster. cap. 15. Or Justices of Peace in Pursuance of the subsequent Statutes, grounded on the said Statute of Westminster 1. and set forth more at large in the following Part of this Chapter, shall admit any Person to bail for Felony, with insufficient Sureties, who shall not afterwards appear according to the Condition of the Recognizance, the Justices of Assise may, by Force of 27 Ed. 1. chap. 3. commonly called the Statute de finibus levatis, impose such Fine on such Sheriff or Justices of Peace, as to such Justices of Assise in their Discretion shall seem proper. But if a Prisoner, who is bailed by insufficient Sureties, do appear according to the Condition of the Recognizance, it seems that those who admitted him to bail are safe, inasmuch as the End of the Law is answered, and the Appearance of the Prisoner as effectually procured by such Sureties, as if they had been never so sufficient.[315]

Sect. 7. As to the fourth Point, viz. The Offence of granting Bail where it ought to be denied: There is no Doubt but that the Bailing of a Person who is not bailiable by Law, is punishable either at Common Law, as a negligent Escape, as shall be more fully shewn in the Chapter concerning Escapes, or as an Offence against the several Stautes concerning Bail.[316]

Sect. 8. And first it is enacted by the Statute of Westminster 1. 15. That if the Sheriff, or any other, let any go at large by Surety, that is not replevisable, if he be Sheriff, or Constable, or any other Bailiff of Fee, which hath keeping of Prisons, and be thereof attainted, he shall lose his Fee and Office for ever. And if the UnderSheriff, Constable, or Bailiff of such as have Fee for keeping of Prisons, do it contrary to the Will of his Lord, or any other Bailiff being not of Fee, they shall have three Years Imprisonment, and make Fine at the King's Pleasure.

Sect. 9. Also it is enacted by 27 Ed. 1. commonly called the Statute de finibus levatis, cap. 3. That the Justices assigned to take Assise, &c. where they deliver the Goods, &c. shall inquire if Sheriffs, or any other, have let out by Replevin Prisons not replevisable, ar have offended in any Thing contrary to the Form of the said Statute of Westminster 1. and whom they shall find Guilty they shall chasten and punish in all Things, according to the Form of the said Statute.[317]

Sect. 10. And it is farther enacted by 4 Ed. 3. 2. That at the Time of the Assignment of Keepers of the Peace, Mention shall be made, That such as shall be indicted, or taken by them, shall not be let to Mainprise by the Sheriffs, nor by none other Ministers, if they be not mainpernable by Law; nor that none who are indicted shall be delivered but by the Common Law. And that the Justices assigned to deliver the Gaols, shall have Power to inquire of Sheriffs, Gaolers, and others, in whose Word such Person indicted shall be, if they make Deliverance, or let to Mainprise, any so indicted, which be not mainpernable; and to punish the said Sheriffs, Gaolers, and others, if they do any Thing against the said Act.[318]

Sect. 11. And it is enacted by 1 & 2 Ph. & Mar. 13. That no Justice or Justices of Peace, shall let to Bail or mainprise any Person or Persons, which for any Offence or Offences, by them, or any of them committed, be declared not to be replevised or bailed, or be forbidden to be replevised or bailed, by the abovementioned Statute of Westminster the first, cap. 15. And that the Justices of Gaol-Delivery of the Place where such Justices of the Peace shall be guilty of such Offence, upon due Proof thereof, by Examination before them shall for every such Offence set such Fine on every such Justice, as the same Justices of Gaol-Delivery shall think meet, &c.

Sect. 12. It hath been resoved [sic; resolved], That it is no Excuse for Justices of Peace admitting a Person to Bail, who was in Truth committed for a Cause not bailable by law, that they did not know that he was committed for such Cause; and that no other Cause of his Commitment was mentioned in his Mittimus but the Suspicion of Felony; for that they ought, at their Peril, to have informed themselves of the Cause for which the Party was committed, that they might be satisfied that he was bailable by Law.[319]

Sect. 13. As to the fifth Point, viz. The offence of denying, delaying, or obstructing Bail, where it ought to be granted; this seems to be a Misdemeanor, not only by the Statute, but also by the Common Law, and punishable thereby as an Offence against the Liberty of the Subject, not only by Action at the Suit of the Party wrongfully imprisoned, but also by Indictment at the Suit of the King.[320]

Sect. 14. But it seems clear, That he who has Power to bail another is not bound to demand of him to find Sureties, and to forbear committing him ’till he shall refuse to find them; but may well justify his Commitment, unless the Party himself shall offer his Sureties.[321]

Sect. 15. The principal Statutes relating to this Offence, are the abovementioned Statute of Westminster 1. 15. and the Statute de finibus, cap. 3. and 31. Car. 2. cap. 2. commonly called the Habeas Corpus Act: By the first whereof it is enacted, That if any withhold Prisoners replevisable, after that they have offered sufficient Surety, he shall pay a grievous Amerciament to the King. And if he take any Reward for the Deliverance of such, he shall pay double to the Prisoner, and also shall be in the great Mercy of the King. And by the latter of the said Statutes it is enacted, That Justices of Assise shall inquire if Sheriffs, or any other, have offended in any Thing contrary to the said Statute of Westminster, and whom they shall find Guilty they shall punish in all Things according to the Form of the said Statute.

Sect. 16. Also it is recited by the above mentioned Statute of 31 Car. 2. That great Delays had been used by Sheriffs, Gaolers, and other Officers, to whose Custody the King’s Subjects had been committed for criminal, or supposed criminal Matters; in making Return of Writs of Habeas Corpus, by standing out an Alias and Pluries, and sometimes more, and by other Shifts to avoid their yielding Obedience to such Writs, contrary to their Duty, and the known Laws of the Land, whereby many Subjects had been long detained in Prison, in such Cases where by Law they were bailable, &c. And thereupon it is enacted, That whomsoever any Person shall bring any Habeas Corpus directed unto any Person whatsoever, for any Person in his Custody, and the said Writ shall be served upon the said Officer, or left at the Gaol or Prison with any of the Under-Officers, UnderKeepers, or Deputy of the said Officers or Keepers, that the said Officer or Officers, his or their Under-Officers, UnderKeepers, or Deputies, shall, within three Days after such Service thereof; (unless the Commitment were for Treason or Felony plainly and specially expressed in the Warrant of Commitment) upon Payment or Tender of the Charges of bringing the said Prisoner, to be ascertained by the Judge or Court that awarded the same, and endorsed on the said Writ, not exceeding 12 d. per Mile, and on Security given by his own Bond, to pay the Charges of carrying back the Prisoner, if the should be remanded, and that be will not make any Escape by the Way, make Return of such Writ, and bring, or cause to be brought, the Body of the Party so committed, or restrained, unto or before the Lord Chancellor, or Lord Keeper, or the Judges or Barons of the Court from which the said Writ shall issue, or such other Persons before whom the said Writ is made returnable, according to Command thereof; and shall then likewise certify the true Causes of his Detainer of Imprisonment, unless the Commitment be in a Place beyond twenty Miles Distance, &c. and if beyond the Distance of twenty, and not above one hundred miles, then within the Space of ten Days, and if beyond the Distance of one hundred Miles, then within the Space of twenty Days,

Sect. 17. And it is further enacted, Par. 3. That all such Writs shall be marked in this Manner, Per Statutum tricesimo primo Caroli Secundi Regis; and shall be signed by the Person that awards the same. And if any Person shall be, or stand committed or detained as aforesaid, for any Crime, unless for Treason or Felomy, plainly expressed in the Warrant of Commitment, in the Vacation-time, if shall be lawful for such Person so committed or detained (other than Persons convict, or in Execution by legal Process) or any one on his Behalf, to complain to the Lord Chancellor, or Lord Keeper, or any Justice of either Bench, or Baron of the Exchequer of the Degree of the Coif; and the said Lord Chancellor, &c. Justice of Baron, on View of the Copy of the Warrant of the Commitment, or otherwise on Oath that it was denied, are authorized and required, on request in Writing by such Persons, or any in his Behalf, attested and subscribed by two Witnesses, who were present at the Delivery of the same, to grant an Habeas Corpus under the Seal of the Court whereof he shall be one of the Judges, to be directed to the Officer in whose Custody the Party shall be returnable immediate before the said Lord Chancellor, &c. Justice or Baron; and on Service thereof as aforesaid, the Officer, &c. in whose Custody the Party is, shall within the Times respectively before limited, bring him before the said Lord Chancellor, Justice of Baron before whom the said Writ is returnable; and in Case of his Absence, before any other of them, with the Return of such Writ, and the true Cause of the Commitment and Detainer. And thereupon, within two Days after the Party shall be brought before them, the said Lord Chancellor, Justice of Baron, before whom the Prisoner shall be brought as aforesaid, shall discharge the said Prisoner from his Imprisonment, taking his Recognizance, with one or more Sureties, in any Sum according to their Discretion, having Regard to the Quality of the Prisoner and Nature of the Offence, for his Appearance in the King's Bench the Term following, or in such other Court wherein the Offence is properly cognisable, as the Case shall require; and then shall certify the said Writ with the Return thereof, and the Recognisance, into such Court; unless it be made appear to the said Lord Chancellor, &c. that the Party so committed is detained upon a legal Process, Order or Warrant, out of some Court that bath Jurisdiction of criminal Matters; or by some Warrant signed and sealed with the Hand and Seal of any of the said Justices or Barons, or same Justice or Justices of the Peace, for such Matter or offence, for the which by Law the Prisoner is not bailable:

Sect. 18. But it is Provided, Par. 4. That if any Person shall have wilfully neglected by the Space of two whole Terms after his Imprisonment, to pray a Habeas Corpus for his Enlargement, he shall not have a Habeas Corpus to be granted in Vacation-time, in Pursuance of this Act.

Sect. 19. And it is farther enacted, Par. 5. That if any Officer, &c. shall neglect or refuse to make the Returns aforesaid, or to bring the Body of the Prisoner according to the Command of the said Writ, within the respective Times aforesaid, or shall not within six Hours after Demand deliver a true Copy of the Commitment, &c. he shall forfeit for the first Offence 100 l. for the second 200 l. and be made incapable to hold his Office, &c.

Sect. 20. And it is farther enacted, Par. 6. That no Person who shall be set at large upon any Habeas Corpus, shall be again imprisoned for the same Offence by any Person whatsoever, other than by the legal Order and Process of such Court wherein he shall be bound by Recognizance to appear, or other Court having Jurisdiction of the Cause, on Pain of 500 l.

Sect. 21. And it is farther enacted, Par. 7. That if any Person who shall be committed for Treason of Felony, plainly and specially expressed in the Warrant of Commitment; upon his Prayer of Petition in open Court, the first Week of the Term, or the first Day of the Session of Oyer and Terminer, or general Gaol-Delivery, to be brought to his Trial, shall not be indicted some Time in the next Term, Sessions of Oyer and Terminer, of general Gaol-Deliver after such Commitment, the Justices of the said Courts shall, upon Motion in open Court, the last Day of the Term, or Sessions, set at Liberty the Prisoner upon Bail; unless it appear upon Oath, that the Witnesses for the King could not be produced the same Term, &c. And if such Prisoner, upon his Prayer, &c. shall not be indicted and tried the second Term, or Sessions, he shall be discharged from his Imprisonment.

Sect. 22. And it is farther enacted, Par. 10. That it shall be lawful for any Prisoner, as aforesaid, to move and obtain his Habeas Corpus, as well out of the Chancery or Exchequer, as the King's Bench or Common Pleas: And if the said Lord Chancellor or Lord Keeper, or any Judge or Judges, Baron or Barons for the Time being, of the Degree of the Coif, of any of the Courts aforesaid, in the Vacation-Time, upon View of the Copy of a Warrant of Commitment or Detainer, or on Oath made that such Copy was denied, shall deny any Writ of Habeas Corpus, by this Act required to be granted, being moved for as aforesaid, they shall severally forfeit to the Party grieved, the Sum of 500 l.

Sect. 23. But it is Provided, Par. 18. That after the Assises proclaimed for that Country where the Prisoner is detained, no Person shall be removed from the common Gaol upon any Habeas Corpus granted in Pursuance of this Act; but upon such Habeas Corpus shall be brought before the Judge of Assise in open Court, who thereupon shall do what to Justice shall appertain. But it is provided nevertheless, Par. 19. That after the Assises are ended, any Person detained may have his Habeas Corpus according to the Direction of this Act.

Sect. 24. It is observable, that this Statute makes the Judges liable to an Action at the Suit of the Party grieved in one Case only, which is the refusing to award a Habeas Corpus in Vacation-time; and seems to leave it to their Discretion in all other Cases, to pursue its Directions in the same Manner as they ought to execute all other Laws, without making them subject to the Action of the Party, or to any other express Penalty or Forfeiture: And this is most agreeable to the general Reason of the Law, which regularly will not suffer a Judge to be liable to an Action for what he does as Judge.[322]

As to the sixth Point. viz. In what Cases Bail is grantable, I shall endeavour to shew,

1. Where it is grantable by a Sheriff.
2. Where by a Justice of Peace.
3. Where by a Justices of Gaol-Delivery.
4. Where by the Courts of Westminster-Hall.

As to the first Point, I shall first consider, where Bail is grantable by a Sheriff ex Officio; and secondly, where by Virtue of a Writ.

Sect. 25. As to the first particular, it is holden by [a] some, That by the Common Law the Sheriff might, by Virtue of his Office, as principal Conservator of the Peace, bail any Person arrested on Suspicion of Felony, or for any other Offence which is bailable.

Sect. 26. Also it hath been holden, [b] that a Constable had the like Power by the Common Law: And it may [c] probably be inferred form the Recitals of the Writs of Mainprise in the Register, that by the Common Law the Sheriff had Power to bail Persons indicted of Larceny in a [d] Court-Leet, and also Persons indicted as [e] Accessaries to a Felon, and Persons appealed by Approvers, after the Death of the Approvers, &c. But it seems that Sheriff [f] had no Power ex Officio, to bail any Person indicted of any Crime before Justices of Peace. And it is certain, [g] that neither the Sheriff, nor Constable could, in any of the Cases above mentioned, take Bail by Recognizance, but only by Obligation. And some [h] have holden, That the Statutes which impower Justices of Peace to admit Persons to Bail, on an Accusation of Felony, and particularly prescribe in what Manner they shall do it, have taken away all Power of this Kind from the Sheriff and Constable; yet other seem to be of another Opinion, because the said Statutes are wholly in the Affimative.

Sect. 27. But it seems certain, [i] That by the Common Law, the Sheriff might bail any Person who was indicted before him at his Torn, for Felony, or any other Crime that is bailable; because he might both award Process and also give Judgment against the Person so indicted: And it is a general [k] Rule, That whosoever is Judge of the Offence, may bail the Offender. But it is holden, [l] That at this Day the Sheriff has lost his Power, by Reason of 1 Ed. 4. cap. 2. set forth more at large cap. 10. sect. 74. by which it is enacted, That the Sheriff shall not proceed on any such Indictment, but shall remove it to the next Sessions of Peace.[323]

As to the second Particular, it seems, That Bail is grantable by a Sheriff by Virtue of the following Writs.

1. That of Odio and Atia.
2. That of Mainprise.
3. That of Homine replegiando.

Sect. 28. But having already, in Book 1. Cap. 29. Sect. 20 and 24. incidently shewn the Nature of the first of these Writs which seems to be in great Measure obsolete at this Day, I shall refer the Reader to what is there said concerning it.

Sect. 29. Secondly, Of the Writ of Mainprise little Notice is taken in the late Books; yet the Law relating to it seems to be still in Force in many Cases; and consequently in such Cases, those who are bailable, and have been refused the Benefit of Bail, may still by Virtue thereof be delivered out of Prison (upon their Finding Sureties [m] to the Sheriff that they will appear and answer to the Crimes alledged against them, before the Justices in the Writ mentioned, &c.) as those [n] who are imprisoned for a slight Suspicion of Felony, or indicted of Larceny [o] before the Steward of a Leet, or of Trespass [p] before Justices of Peace, and many other [q] Persons all which it will be needless to enumerate.

Sect. 30. But as to that which is said in general, both by Sir Matthew Hale[a] and Sir Edward Coke, [b] in Relation to this Matter, from which it may seem to have been the Opinion of those Authors, That no Writ of Mainprise is grantable at this Day; it may be answered, That this is to be understood [c] only of the Writ of Mainprise for Persons indicted before the Sheriff in his Torn, in relation to whom he has no judicial Power at this Day, and consequently no Power to bail them ex Officio; from whence it follows, That the Writ of Mainprise for such Persons, being grounded on a Suggestion that the Sheriff had unjustly refused before to admit them to bail, cannot now be proper, because he cannot be said to have unjustly refused to do a Thing which he had no Power to do. But this can be no Manner of Reason why the Writ of Mainprise should not be still grantable in other Cases.

Sect. 31. Thirdly, As to the Writ of Homine replegiando, there seems to be no Doubt but that at the Common Law the Sheriff might deliver any Persons out of Prison by Virtue of this Writ, except in those special Cases mentioned in the Statute of Westminster 1. cap. 15. which is set forth more at large in the next Section: And if he had returned, that the plaintiff had been eloigned out of the County by the Defendant, he might afterward, by Virtue of a Capias in Withernam against such Defendant, whether he were a Peer or Commoner, have taken and imprisoned him till the Plaintiff should be replevied. But the Writ of Homine replegiando has been much disused of late, in such Cases wherein Justices of Peace have been authorized to admit Persons to bail; yet whether the statutes which gave such Authority to Justices of Peace, being wholly in the Affirmative, do take away the Sheriff's Power in the Cases mentioned in those Statutes, may deserve to be considered. However there can be do doubt but that in other Cases the Writ of Homine replegiando, [d] and Capias in Withernam, are very proper and effectual Remedies.[324]

Sect. 32. But for the better Understanding the Sheriff's Power in this Particular, I shall set down, and endeavour to explain so much of the said Statute of Westminster 1. cap. 15. as relates to it, which is enacted as followeth. Forasmuch as Sheriffs, and others who have taken and kept in Prison Persons detected of Felony, and incontinent have let out by Replevin such as were not replevisable, and have kept in Prison such as were replevisable, because they would gain of the one Party, and grieve the other: And forasmuch as before this Time it was not determined which Persons were replevisable, and which not; but only those that were taken for the Death of a Man, or by Commandment of the King, or of the Justices, or for the Forest: It is provided, and by the King commanded, that such Prisoners as before were outlawed, and they which have abjured the Realm, Provors, and such as be taken with the Manner [e] and those which have broken the King's Prison, Thieves openly defamed and know, and such as be appealed by Provors, so long as the Provors be living (if they be not of good Name) and such as be taken for House-burning feloniously done, or for false Money, or for counterfeiting the King's Seal, or Persons excommunicate, taken at the Request of the Bishop, or for manifest Offences, or for Treason touching the King himself, shall be in no wise replevisable by the common Writ, nor without Writ: But such as be indicted of Larceny by Enquests taken before Sheriffs, or Bailiffs by their Office, or of light Suspicion, or for Petit Larceny, that amounteth not above the Value of Twelvepence, if they were not accused of some other Larceny aforetime, or accused of Receipt of Thieves or Felons, or of Commandment, or Force or of Aid in Felony done, or accused of some other Trespass, for which one ought not lose Life or Member, and a Man approved by a Provor, after the Death of the Provor (if he be no common Theif, nor defamed) shall be henceforth let out by sufficient Surety, whereof the Sheriff will be answerable, and that without giving ought of their Goods.

For the better Exposition hereof, I shall distinctly consider,

1. That Part of the Preamble which declares, what Persons had always been agreed not to be replevisable.
2. That Part of the Purview which shews what other Persons shall not be replevisable.
3. That which shews what Persons shall be replevisable.

Of those who by the Preamble are declared to have always been agreed to be irreplevisable, there are four Kinds.[325]

1. Those who are taken for the Death of a Man.
2. Those who are taken by the Commandment of the King.
3. Those who are taken by the Commandment of the Justices.
4. Those who are taken for the Forest.

Sect. 33. As to the first of these Particulars, it is observable that the Statute declares generally, That those imprisoned for the Death of a Man have always been taken to be irreplevisable, without making any Distinction between such Homicide as is malicious, and that which happens by Misadventure, or in Self-Defence. And it is further to be observed, that the Statute of Glocester [sic; Gloucester], cap. 9. provided, That where a Man kills another by Misfortune, or in his Defence, or in other Manner without Felony, he shall be put in Prison till the next Coming of the Justices in Eyre, or Justices assigned to the Gaol-Delivery, &c. And agreeably hereto we find, That all Persons in general, who are taken for the Death of a Man, are excepted out of the Writ [a] de Homine replegiando: And that even the superior [b] Courts, which are not restrained by these Statutes, have yet been always cautious of bailing Persons imprisoned for any Homicide, except in such special Cases as shall be set forth more at large in the following Part of this Chapter:

Sect. 34. Also it seems agreed, That Justices of Peace, who have Power at this Day to bail a Man arrested for a light Suspicion of Homicide, cannot bail any such Person for Manslaughter, or even excusable Homicide, if it manifestly appear that he was guilty of the Fact, let it be ever so plain that it cannot amount to Murder, as shall be shewn more at large in the following Part of this Chapter [c].

Sect. 35. And it is enacted by 3 H. 7. 1. That if it happen, that any Person named as Principal or Accessary, be acquitted of any Murder at the King's Suit, within the Year and Day, that then the same Justices before whom he is acquitted, shall not suffer him to go at large, but either remit him to Prison, or bail him, after their Discretion, till the Year and Day be passed.

Sect. 36. As to the second Particular, viz. That concerning those who are taken by the Commandment of the King, it seems, That the Words of the Statute concerning them are to be understood of such only as are imprisoned either by the King's personal Command, or by the Command of his Privy Council, which is looked upon to be as it were incorporated with him and to speak with his Mouth; and accordingly we find the Exception in the Writ of Homine replegiando, relating to Persons imprisoned by the King, thus expressed in the Register, Nisi capti sunt per speciale praeceptum nostrum; by which it seems to be implied, That this Exception is not to be applied generally to every Command whatsoever of King: To which it may be added, That if it were to be understood in so large a Sense, it would extent even to those who are taken by a Capias in a personal Action, for that every such Capias is the Commandment of the King; but it seems certain, That a Defendant taken by such a Capias is replevisable by the Common Law. But Persons imprisoned by the special Command of the King, or of his Privy Council, are so far from being replevisable by the Sheriff, that they have formerly [a] been adjudged not to be bailable even by the Court of King's Bench: However at this Day the Law is otherwise declared and settled by Parliament, as shall be shewn more at large in the following Part of this Chapter.[326]

Sect. 37. As to the third Particular, viz That concerning Persons imprisoned by the Command of the Justices, it is observable, That the Exception in the Writ of Homine replegiando, in the Register, [b] concerning Persons so imprisoned, is restrained to those who are taken by the special Command of the King's Chief Justice. But by Fitzherbert [c] and Staunford [d], Coke [e] and Dalton, [f] the Words of the Statute relating to Persons so imprisoned, seem to be understood in a large Sense of any of the King's Justices in general, as of those of Assise, as well as of those of the Courts of Westminster-Hall. But it seems that they are not to be understood generally of Persons imprisoned by any Command whatsoever of such Justices, for that those who are imprisoned by their ordinary Command, not by Way of Punishment, but in Order only to be safely kept, are said to be replevisable by the Sheriff, in Cases not prohibited by the Statute; and therefore it seems, That they must be taken in a more restrained Sense of those only who are imprisoned by the absolute Command of such Justices by Way of Punishment, as for a Misdemeanor done in their Presence, or for other Contempts, or such like Matters, which lie rather in their Discretion than in their ordinary Power; and it seems that a Commitment by the Chief Justice, without shewing any Case whatsoever, shall be intended to be for some such Matter; and there can be no Doubt but that a Person under such a Commitment is irreplevisable by the Sheriff. Also it hath been holden, That a Person so committed is not bailable upon a Habeas Corpus: But how far Persons committed by the absolute Command of one Court, are bailable by another, shall be more fully considered in the following Part of this Chapter.

Sect. 38. As to the fourth Particular, viz. That concerning those who are imprisoned for the Forest, who also are excepted out of the Writ [g] of Homine Replegiando; it seems that the said Exception is to be understood as well of Forests in the Hands of Subjects, [h] as of those in the Hands of the King; but it seems, that it is to be understood strictly of proper Forests only, and not be extended [i] by Equity to Chases or Parks. And as to Imprisonments for Offences in Forests, the Law has been much mitigated by later statutes; for it is recited by I Ed. 3. cap. 8. That divers Persons had been undone by the Chief Keepers of Forests, &c. against the Form of the Great Charter [k] of the Forest, and against the Declaration[l] made by king Edward I. by which be granted, That Trespasses done, in his Forest, of Vert and Venison, should be presented at the next Swainmote, before the Forester, &c. and that such Presentments made before such Forester, &c. should by the Oaths of Knights, and other discreet and lawful Men, &c. by the common Assent of all the said Ministers, be solemnly written, and with their Seals ensealed: And that if any Indictment should be in any other Manner made, that the same should be void. And thereupon it is ordained, That from thenceforth no Man shall be taken nor imprisoned for Vert or Venison, unless he be taken with the Manner, or else indicted after the Form before specified: And then the chief Warden shall let him to mainprise till the Eyre of the Forest, without any Thing taken for his Deliverance. And if the said Warden will not so do, he shall have a [a] Writ out of the Chancery, &c. to be at Mainprise till the Eyre. And if the Warden shall not obey such Writ, the Plaintiff shall have a [b] Writ to the Sheriff to attach the said Warden before the King, at a certain Day, &c. And the Sheriff (the Verders being called to him) shall deliver him that is so taken, by good Mainprise, in the Presence of the Verders, and shall deliver the Names of the Mainpernors to the same Verders, to answer in the Eyre before the Justices, &c. And it is farther enacted, by 7 R. 2. 4. That no Man shall be imprisoned by any Officer of the Forest without due Indictment, or being taken with the Manner, or trespassing in the Forest, &c.[327]

Sect. 39. And Note, That Persons so indicted, or taken with the Manner, being imprisoned by such Officers, have their Election either to be mainprized by twelve Mainpernors, by Virtue of the Writ of Homine replegiando, given by the said Statute of 1 Ed. 3. 8. or to be bailed upon a Habeas Corpus, by the Judges of Westminster-Hall, &c. And if a Person be imprisoned for any Offence relating to the Forest, without having been first indicted for it, or taken with the Manner, there seems to be no Doubt but that he may have an Action of false Imprisonment, and may also be mainprised or bailed in the Manner abovementioned.[328]

And now I am to consider that Part of the Purview of the above recited Statute of Westminster 1. 15. which shews that other Persons are not replevisable, of which there are two Sorts.

1. Such as are excluded from the Benefit of a Replevin, in respect of the Notoriety of their offence.
2. Such as are excluded from it in respect of the Heinousness of the Crime alledged against them.

Persons excluded from the Benefit of a Replevin, in respect of the Notoriety of their Offence, are of two Kinds.

1. Those who by an express or implied Judgment, Sentence or Conviction, or their own Confession, appear to be Guilty.
2. Those who are under violent Presumptions of Guilt.

Sect. 40. And first [c], Of those who by Judgment, Sentence, Conviction or Confession, appear to be Guilty, some are excluded from the Benefit of a Replevin by the express Words of the Statute; as Those who are outlawed, or have abjured the Realm; Persons excommunicate, taken at the Request of the Bishop, and Provers. And all other Persons who are condemned, or convicted of Felony, or any other [d] heinous Crime whatsoever, where by their own Confession or by Verdict General or Special; [e] and also all those [f] who on their Examination own themselves guilty of a Felony alledged against them, and are charged in their Mittimus with the Felony so confessed, seem to be excluded from it by Parity of Reason, and the manifest Intent of the Statute; for [g] Bail is only proper where it stands indifferent whether the Party be Guilty or Innocent of the Accusation against him, as it often does before his Trial; but where that Indifferency is removed, it would, generally speaking, be absurd to bail him: And agreeably hereto the Statue of 2 H. 5. cap. 2. provides, even as to civil Causes, That if upon a Writ of Certiorari, or Corpus cum causa, out of Chancery, it shall be returned that the Prisoner is condemned by Judgment given against him, he shall be remanded, &c. Also 23 H. 6. cap. 10. which ordains, That Sheriffs, &c. shall let out of Prison Persons in their Custody by Force of any Writ, &c. in Personal Actions, or on Indictments of Trespass, by sufficient Sureties, &c. expresly excepts All such as shall be in their Ward by Condemnation, Execution, &c. And therefore it cannot but be reasonable to intend, That the said Statute of Westminster 1, put the Cases of Persons outlawed and excommunicate as Examples only; meaning thereby to intimate, That all other Persons under the like Circumstances should be in like Manner irreplevisable: Yet it is certain, that the Court of King's Bench may, in their Discretion, in some special Cases, bail a Person upon an Outlawry of Felony; as [a] where he pleads that he is not of the same Name, and therefore not the same Person with him that was outlawed; or alledges [b] any other Error in the Proceedings. Also it seems, That the Court of King's Bench, or Justices of Gaol-Delivery, may bail [c] a Person convicted of Manslaughter, or, as some say, of any other Felony, for which he afterwards gets the King's Pardon. And [d] there seems to be no Doubt at this Day, but that they may also bail any Person who is found guilty before them of Homicide in Self-defence, or by Misadventure. Also it is certain, That if a Person appear to be imprisoned for an Excommunication, in a Cause of which the Spiritual Court hath no Conusance, he may be delivered either upon a Habeas Corpus, or by quashing or superseding the Writ of Excommunicato capiendo.

Secondly, Of those who are under violent Presumptions of a Guilt, and in that respect are excluded by the Statute from the Benefit of of a Replevin, there are several Kinds.

Sect. 41. I. Those who are taken with the Manner (or rather the Mainer that is, with the thing stolen, as it were, in their Hands) and by Parity of Reason, those who are taken freshly upon a Hue and Cry.[329]

Sect. 42. II. Those who have broken the King's Prison, and by the same Reason those who have broken any other Prison, which the Law presumes that no innocent Person will do.

Sect. 43. III. Those who are appealed by Provers, who regularly are not bailable, because the Approver, by confessing his own Guilt, induces a strong Presumption against those whom he accuses of the same Crime of which he owns himself guilty; yet by the express Words of the Statute, If the Person appealed by an Approver be of good Reputation, he may be bailed, even in the Life of the Approver; and unless he be a notorious Felon, he may be bailed after his Death. And by Parity of Reason, he may also be bailed, if the Approver waive [e] his Appeal, or be vanquished, [f]

unless there be some other Cause to detain him in Prison, as the Appeal of some other Approver, &c. And if a Person disabled by Law to become an Approver, as one attainted, [g] &c. appeal another of High Treason, it seems that the Person so appealed ought to be bound [h] to his Good Behaviour towards the King: But [i] if such Person had appealed him of Felony only it seems that he ought to have been wholly discharged, if there had been no other Accusation against him.[330]

Sect. 44. IV. Thieves openly known and notorious, who, as it seems, ought not to be bailed for any fresh Felony, whereof there is probable Evidence against them. But how far Persons accused of any Crime shall be so far esteemed likely to have committed it, from their former scandalous Behaviour, as to be presumed guilty upon slight Evidence, seems in great measure to be left to the Discretion [k] of the Person who hath Power to bail them; who, upon Consideration of the Circumstances of the whole Matter, and the Probabilities of both Sides, if he find it reasonable strongly to presume them to be guilty, ought not to bail but commit them.

Sect. 45. V. Persons taken for open and manifest Offences, which seems to be understood of inferior Crimes of an enormous Nature, under the degree of Felony, as dangerous Riots, [a] favouring of High Treason, [b] scandalous Extortions, Conspiracies, [c] by Justices, &c. violent and exorbitant Rescouses [d] of Person arrested by Virtue of the King's Writs, Misprision [e] of Treason, Praemunire, [f] Maim, and such like heinous Offences, whereof no one who is notoriously guilty, seems to be bailable by the Intent of this Statute; for notwithstanding in the latter Part of it, it be said generally, That those who are accused of a Trespass, for which a Man shall not lose Life or Member, are replevisable; yet upon the Construction of the whole it seems reasonable to qualify the Generality of that Expression with this Limitation, that such Accusation ought to be either on a light Suspicion; or if it be on plain and unquestionable Evidence, that the Offence ought to be inconsiderable, for if all Persons whatsoever shall be replevisable for Offences not touching Life or Member, let their Guilt be never so notorious, the abovementioned general unlimited Clause, that those who are taken for open Offences shall be irreplevisable, must be restrained to Felonies and Offences touching Member, which seems contrary to the most obvious reasonable Purport of it, and also to common Practice, and that allowed general Rule, That Bail is only then proper where it stands indifferent whether the Party were Guilty or Innocent; sed quaere. Yet it seems to be in great Measure left to the Discretion of the Person who has Power to admit others to Bail, to judge in what Cases their Crime is so flagrant and enormous, that they ought not to have the Benefit of it.

Of those who are excluded by the Purview of the said Statute, from the Benefit of a Replevin, in respect of the Heinousness of the Crime alledged against them, there are four Kinds.

1. Those who are taken for Arson.
2. Those who are taken for false Money.
3. Those who are taken for falsifying the King's Seal.
4. Those who are taken for Treason, which touches the King himself.

Sect. 46. And all such Persons being expresly declared to be irreplevisable, it seems clear, That they can in no Case be delivered out of Prison by the Sheriff, either by Virtue of the said Writ of Homine replegiando, or without it: Yet if a Person at large be accused before a Sheriff, on a light Suspicion of any of these, or of any other of the abovementioned Crimes which always have been agreed to be irreplevisable, as of Homicide, &c. it seems by no means to follows either from the Words or Intention of the Statute, That the Sheriff is bound to keep him in Prison till he be delivered by due Course of Law; but in such a Case it seems to be more reasonable, that he take Surety of him to appear in a proper Court to answer such Accusation; for it seems extremely harsh, and contrary to the first Principles of the Law, which favours nothing more than the Liberty of the Subject, to put an Officer under a Necessity of depriving a Man of his Liberty upon every Accusation of such a Crime, be it never so weakly grounded. And the Words of the Statute, declaring Persons to be irreplevisable for such Crimes, seem clearly applicable to such only as are under an actual Imprisonment, and not to those who are barely accused; for that none can be properly said to be replevied, but those who being actually imprisoned, are, upon finding Pledges, delivered out of Custody; from which it follows, That Persons not imprisoned are not within the Statute: Nay, the Law if so far from obliging a Sheriff to imprison a Man on every Accusation whatsoever of such Crimes, that it subjects him, as well as any other Person, to an Action of False Imprisonment, if he does it without a reasonable Ground; as hath been more fully shewn in the Chapters concerning Arrests. But if a Person, actually under an Arrest, either of a Magistrate or private Person, for any of the abovementioned Crimes, it seems clear from the express Words of the Statute, that the Sheriff cannot replevy him; and it seems, that at the Common Law he ought to have safely detained the Party so arrested till he could have obtained his legal Deliverance, and that the Person so arrested had no Remedy but by Indictment or Action of False Imprisonment against those who arrested and delivered him to the Sheriff, on a groundless Suspicion. But how far the Law may at this Day be altered in this Point, by the universal and allowed Practice of Sheriffs receiving no Person into their Custody, for any Crime, without the Warrant of some Magistrate, shall be more fully Considered in the next Chapter.

Sect. 47. It is certain, That the Court of King's Bench still may, and always might, bail Persons in Custody for any of these Crimes, notwithstanding this Statute; yet in Discretion it seldom uses this power but in very special Cases, as shall be shewn in the following Part of this Chapter.[331]

And now I am to consider that Part of the Purview of the said Statute, which shews what Persons are replevisable; for the better Understanding whereof, I shall endeavour to explain,[332]

1. The Branch relation to Person accused as Principals.
2. That which concerns those who are charged as Accessaries.

Sect. 48. As to the first Branch, First, Those who are indicted of Larceny by Inquests taken before Sheriffs, or Bailiffs, by their Office, that is, before Sheriffs in their Torns, and Lords in their Leets, are expresly declared to be replevisable; and according to same Opinions, those who are indicted or appealed in any other Court, of any other Felony, not expresly declared by the Statute to be irreplevisable, as Robbery or Burglary, &c. are replevisable by the Sheriff ex officio, without Writ, within the Equity of this Clause: Yet the Authorities which are brought to warrant this Opinion, relate only to the Bailment of Persons by superior Courts, upon Indictments or Appeals of Such Crimes before such Courts, and do by no means prove that such Persons are replevisable by the Sheriff ex officio, without Writ: And it is observable, that the Writs of Mainprise in the Register, for Persons indicted only of Trespass, before Justices of Peace, expresly declare, That such Persons cannot be delivered out of Prison without the King's special Command, from whence it seems to follow, That such Persons are not within the common Benefit of a Replevin by the Sheriff, without same such special Command. And if Persons indicted of Trespass only, before Justices of peace, are not within the ordinary Remedy of a Replevin by the Sheriff without a Writ, surely it cannot be thought that Persons indicted of higher Crimes, and before Superior Courts, can be any way intitled to it: However, inasmuch as the said Statute of Westminster 1. expresly allows Persons indicted of Larceny before the Sheriff the ordinary Remedy of a Replevin, and expresly excludes same other particular Felonies, and say nothing of others, it seems a reasonable Construction of the Statute, That the Sheriff might by Virtue of it, either with or without Writ, replevy those who were indicted before himself, or at a Court-Leet, of those other Felonies not expresly excepted, as well as those indicted of Larceny only. And the Statute leaving such a Latitude to the Sheriff in Relation on the Persons so indicted before himself, or at a Court-Leet, it hath been usual for superior Courts, (who, though they be not within the Statute, have yet always had a great Regard to the Rules prescribed by it) to use the same Liberty in Relation to such Crimes, and sometimes greater, for such special Reasons, and in such special Cases, as shall be sat forth more at large in the following Part of this Chapter. Yet notwithstanding the Statute seems generally to allow the Benefit of a Replevin to all those who are indicted of Larceny, &c. without any Limitation; yet it hath been always construed to intend only, that such Persons indicted of a Grand larceny, as are of a good Reputation, shall be replevisable, and therefore if there be strong Presumptions of their Guilt, it seem that they ought not to be bailed; but this is in great Measure to be left to Discretion.[333]

Sect. 49. Secondly, Those who are imprisoned for a light Suspicion, are likewise declared by the Statute to be replevisable; yet notwithstanding the Words are general, it hath always been taken to be the Intent of them, That the Persons so imprisoned ought to be of a good Reputation: Also it seems clear, That the Statute means only such Person as are imprisoned for Crimes not expresly excepted by it from the Benefit of a Replevin; and therefore that this Branch cannot extend to Persons imprisoned for the Treasons mentioned in the Statute, Arson, or Homicide, but only to those taken for Larceny, Robbery, Burglary and such like Felonies, &c.[334]

Sect. 50. Thirdly, Those who are imprisoned for Petit Larceny, which does not amount to above the Value of 12 d. are also declared by the Statute to be replevisable, if they have not been accused of some other Larceny before: And it seems to be agreed, That there is no Necessity that such Persons be of good Reputation; yet upon the Construction of the whole Statute, if such Persons be taken with the Manner, or confess the Fact, &c. or their Crime be otherwise open and manifest, it seems that they ought not to be bailed; but if there be any Colour of Probability for their Innocence, it seems most agreeable to the Intention of the Statute to bail them.[335] ought not to lose Life or Member, are declared by the Statute to be replevisable; yet perhaps the Generality of this Clause is restrained by that other Clause which declares, That Persons taken for open and manifest Offences shall not be replevied, as hath been more fully shewn, Sect. 45.

Sect. 52. Fifthly, The Appellee of an Approver is also expresly declared to be bailable after Death of the Approver, unless he be a notorious Felon. But having already incidentally shewn, Sect. 43. in what Cases such an Appellee is replevisable, I shall refer the Reader, for this Matter, to what is said concerning it.

Sect. 53. Secondly, As to the Branch concerning those who are Charged as Accessaries, which is in the following Words, Those who are accused of the Receipt of Thieves or Felons, or of Commandment, or of Force, or of Aid of Felony done, shall be replevisable, &c. it is observable, That notwithstanding the Statute mentions only those who are Accessary by receiving Felons, or by Commandment, Force or Aid; yet all those who are accessary to a Felony any [a] other Way, as by Persuasion or any other Procurement, or Abetment, have always been taken to be within the Equity of it; and most [b] of the Books relating to this Matter seem generally to hold, That all Accessaries, whether to Homicide or any other Felony, are bailable till the Principal be convicted, or attained; and that they are bailable even after such Conviction or attainder, upon their [c] pleading to the Indictment, and do not express any Limitation or Restriction, that they be of good Fame, or but slightly suspected, &c. And in the Case [d] of 25 Ed. 3. 44. pl. 14. wherein a Person appealed of Murder, as having holden the Deceased in his Arms while the other killed him, was not let to Mainprise, the Reason given for it by the Reporter is, because the Defendant was in a Manner a Principal; for the otherwise being an Accessary only, he ought to have been let to Mainprise by the Intent of the Statute. Yet I find it made a Quaere in the Year-Book of 21 [e] Ed. 4. Whether Accessaries are to be let to Bail of Course? And perhaps it may be more reasonable to intend, in the above cited Case of 25 Ed. 3. That such Person was denied the Benefit of Mainprise by Reason of the Notoriety of his Guilt, for it seems clear, both from the [f] Register, [g] Fitzberbert, and [h] Dalton, That Accessaries to Felonies are not to be bailed unless they be of good Reputation; and if the Want of good Reputation, which is at most but a very slight Inducement to presume them guilty of a particular Crime, be a good Cause to exclude them from the Benefit of Mainprise, which is given them by the general Words of the Statute, it seems strange, the strong and unquestionable Evidence of their Guilt should not much more exclude them from it; especially considering, that it is an allowed Rule, [i] That Bail is only proper where it stands indifferent whether the Person accused were guilty or innocent. And since latter Statutes have, in many Cases, excluded Accessaries before the Fact from the Benefit of Clergy, it seems absurd to say, That Persons notoriously guilty of being Accessary to the Crimes which exclude them from the Benefit of Clergy, shall be admitted to Bail; whereas if they had been committed to Prison on the like Evidence of Guilt, as Principals, for Felonies within the Benefit of Clergy, or even for inferior Offences of an enormous Nature, they could not have had the like Privilege: And therefore since the general Words of the Statute concerning the Replevising of Accessaries, are agreed to receive the above mentioned Limitations, That they ought to be of a good Reputation, and also to plead first to the Indictment, if the Principal be attainted; why should it not be reasonable to admit this farther Restriction, That their Guilt be not notorious? Which seems admitted to be implied in most of the other Clauses of the Statute, which yet are penned in as general Words, as that relating to Accessaries. But this Matter seems at this Day to be put beyond all Question, by 31 Car. 2. cap. 2. Par. 21. By which it is recited, That many Times Persons charged with Petit Treason, or Felony, or as Accessaries thereunto, are committed on Suspicion only, whereupon they are bailable or not, according as the Circumstances making out that Suspicion, are more or less weighty, &c. And thereupon it is enacted, That no Person so charged, shall be removed or bailed by Virtue of that Act, in other Manner than he might before. From which it seems clearly to follow, That where there are strong Presumptions of Guilt against a Person so charged, he neither was bailable before that Statute, nor is now bailable by Virtue of it.

As to the second Point, viz. In what Cases Bail is grantable by a Justices of Peace, I shall endeavour to shew,

1. How far it is grantable by Construction of the Statutes and Commission, which gives Justices of Peace a Jurisdiction over certain Crimes, without saying any Thing concerning the Power of granting Bail.
2. How far it is grantable by the Statutes specially relating to the Power of granting Bail.

Sect. 54. As to the first Point it seems, That where-ever Justices of Peace have Jurisdiction of a Crime, they may bail the Person indicted before them of such Crime, upon such Circumstances for which other Courts may bail the Person so indicted before them; for that it seems to be a good general Rule, That so far as any Persons are Judges of any Crime, so far they have Power of bailing a Person indicted before them of such Crime: And upon this Ground it seems clear, That any two Justices of Peace, whereof one is of the Quorum, may, of common Right, bail Persons indicted before the Sessions of Justices of Peace, for that any two such Justices may hear and determine the Indictment. [a] Also it hath been holden, That any one Justice of Peace hath the like Power in Relation to Persons so indicted, because every such Justice being a Judge of the Court which is to determine of Offence, seems consequently to have a discretionary Power of Judging whether it be bailable, and of admitting the Party to Bail. And this seems to be implied by the Statute of 1 Ric. 3. cap. 3. which giving one Justice of Peace Power of bailing Persons arrested for Felony, in like Form as if such Persons had been indicted at Sessions, clearly supposes, that if such Persons had been indicted at Sessions, they might have been bailed by any one Justice: And if any one Justice of Peace had such Power of bailing the Persons so indicted at Sessions, before the Statutes specially relating to the Power of Justices of Peace in granting Bail, it seems, That he still has the same Power in Relation to Persons so indicted of any bailable Crime under the Degree of Felony, because the said Statutes seem not to restrain him in any such Case, under the Degree of Felony, from any Power which he lawfully might claim before. Also it seems to be agreed, That any one Justice of Peace might always in his Discretion either bail or imprison one who has given another a dangerous Wound, according as it shall appear from the whole Circumstances, that the Party is most likely to live or die, for that every such Justice being a principal Conservator of the Peace, the Offence at Present being only an enormous Breach thereof, and no Felony, seems properly to come under his Conusance.[336]

Sect. 55. As to the second Point, viz. How for Bail is grantable by Justices of Peace, by Virtue of the Statutes specially relating to their Power of granting Bail, it is recited by 1 R. 3. cap. 3. That divers Persons had been daily arrested and imprisoned for Suspicion of Felony, sometime of Malice, and sometime of a light Suspicion, and so kept in Prison, without Bail or Mainprise, to their great Vexation and Trouble: And thereupon it is enacted, That every Justice of Peace in every Shire, City or Town, may by his or their Discretion, let such Prisoners and Persons so arrested to Bail or Mainprise, in like Form as though the same Prisoners, or Persons, were indicted thereof of Record, before the same Justices at their Sessions.[337]

Sect. 56. But it is recited by 3 H. 7. cap. 3. That by Colour of the said

Statute of 1 R. 3. divers Persons which were not mainpernable, were oftentimes let to Bail and Mainprise by Justices of Peace, against the due Form of Law; whereby many Felons had escaped, to the great Displeasure of the King, and Annoyance of his Liege People; and thereupon it is enacted, That the Justices of Peace in every Shire, City, and Town, or two of them at least, whereof one to be of the Quorum, have Authority and Power to let any such Prisoners, or Persons mainpernable by Law, that have been imprisoned within their several Counties, City or Town, to Bail or Mainprise, unto their next general Sessions, or unto their next general Gaol-Delivery of the same Gaols, in every Shire, City, or Town, as well within Franchises as without, where any Gaols be or hereafter shall be: And that the said Justices of Peace, or one of them, so taking any such Bail or Mainprise, do certify the same at the next general Sessions of the Peace, or the next general Gaol-Delivery of any such Gaol, in every such County, City or Town, next following after any such Bail or Mainprise so taken; on Pain to forfeit to the King for every Default thereupon recorded, 10 l. And that the aforesaid Act, giving Authority and Power in the Premisses, to any Justice of the Peace by himself, be in that Behalf utterly void, and of none Effect.[338]

Sect. 57. And it is recited by 1 & 2 Ph. & M. 13. That since the said Statute of 3 H. 7. one Justice of Peace, in the Name of himself, and one other of the Justices his Companion, not making the said Justice Party nor Privy unto the Case wherefore the Prisoner should be bailed, had oftentimes by sinister Labour and Means, set at large the greatest and notablest Offenders, such as be not replevisable by the Laws of this Realm; and yet the rather to hide their Affections in that Behalf, had signified the Cause of their Apprehension to be only for Suspicion of Felony; whereby the said Offenders had and did daily escape Punishment, &c. And thereupon it is enacted, That from the first Day of April then next coming, no Justice or Justices of Peace shall let to Bail or Mainprise any such Person or Person, who for any Offence or Offences, by them or any of them committed, be declared not to be replevised or be forbidden to be replevised or bailed by the abovementioned Statute of Westminster 1.[339]

Sect. 58. And it is further enacted, Par. 3. That any Person or Persons arrested for Manslaughter or Felony, or Suspicion of Manslaughter or Felony, being bailable by the Law, shall not be let to Bail or Mainprise by any Justices of Peace, if it be not in open Sessions, except it be by two Justices of Peace at the least, whereof one to be the Quorum, and the same

Justices to be present together at the Time of the said Bailment or Mainprise; which Bailment or Mainprise they shall certify in Writing subscribed or signed with their own Hands, at the next general Gaol-Delivery to be holden within the County where the said Person or Person shall be arrested or suspected.

Sect. 59. And it is farther enacted, Par. 4. That the said Justices, or one of them, being of the Quorum, when any such Prisoner is brought before them for any Manslaughter or Felony, before any Bailment or Mainprise, shall take the Examination of the said Prisoner, and Information of them that bring him, of the Fact and Circumstances thereof, and the same, or as much thereof as shall be material to prove the Felony, shall put in Writing before they make the same Bailment; which said Examination, together with the said Bailment, the said Justices shall certify at the next general Gaol-Delivery to be holden within the Limits of their Commission.

Sect. 60. And it is farther enacted, Par. 5. That the said Justices shall have Authority to bind all such by Recognizance or Obligation, as do declare any Thing material to prove the said Offences or Felonies, to appear at the next general Gaol-Delivery to be holden within the County, City, or Town-Corporate where the Trial thereof shall be, and then and there to give Evidence, as such Bond or Bonds in writing as he shall take, at or before the Time of his said Trial thereof to be had or made. And in Case any Justice of Peace of Quorum shall offend in any Thing, contrary to the true Intent and Meaning of this Act; the Justices of Gaol-Delivery, where such Offence shall happen to be committed, upon due Proof thereof, by Examination before them, shall for every such Offence, set such Fine on every of the same Justices, as the same Justices of Gaol-Delivery shall think meet, &c.

Sect. 61. But it is provided, Par. 6. That Justices of Peace, and Coroners, within the City of London, and the County of Middlesex, and in other Cities, Boroughs, and Towns Corporate, shall within their several Jurisdictions, have Authority to let to bail Felons and Prisoners, in such Manner and Form as they had been before accustomed; and also shall take Examinations and Bonds, as is aforesaid, upon every Bailment by them made, and certify every such Bailment, Bond and Examination, at the next general Gaol-Delivery, &c.

From these Statutes the following Particulars appear most observable.

Sect. 62. First, That it seems clearly to be imply'd by the above mentioned Statute of 1 R. 3. 3. which authorized any one Justice of Peace to bail a Person on a slight Suspicion of Felony, in like Manner as if such Person had been indicted at Sessions, That before the Statute Justices of Peace could bail those only for Felony, who had been indicted of it before them. And by Parity of Reason it seems also to follow, That they had no Power to bail Persons for other Crime before such Indictment, unless it were an Offence directly tending to the Breach of the Peace, the Bailing of Persons for which seems properly to come under their Conusance as Conservators of the Peace: And therefore it seems difficult to maintain the Power of one Justice of the Peace to bail a Person for any other Crime, unless it be by some Statute limited to the Conusance of one Justice, or the Party have been indicted for it at Sessions because the Commission in giving a Justice a general Jurisdiction over any Crime, shall be construed so far only to give him a Power to bail a Person accused of it, as it makes him a Judge of it, which he cannot be till it come regularly before him by Indictment; and the Statutes above mentioned specially relating to the Power of Justices of Peace, in granting Bail, expressly require the Conusance of two Justices.[340]

Sect. 63. Secondly, That Justices of Peace have no Power to bail any Person not replevisable by the above mentioned Statute of Westminster 1. 15. from whence it seems to follow, That a Person under the actual Commitment or Arrest of any other Magistrate, or even of a private Person, for any Crime declared to be irreplevisable by that Statute, as Treason against the King's Person, Arson, &c. cannot be delivered from his Imprisonment by the Bailment of any Justice of Peace. Yet if a Person at large be only accused of any such Crime, on a slight Suspicion, before a Justice of Peace, it seems that the Justice ought not to commit him, but to take Surety of him to appear before a proper Court, as hath been more fully shewn in Relation to the Sheriff, Sect. 46. And inasmuch as the above mentioned Statute of 1 & 2 Ph. & M. 13. expressly mentions the Bailing of Persons for Manslaughter, as well as for other Felonies, there can be no Doubt, but that Justices of Peace may, by Force thereof, safely bail any Person imprisoned on a slight Suspicion of a Fact, clearly appearing to be no higher an Offence than Manslaughter, and much more if it appear to amount to no more than Homicide by Misadventure, or in Self-defence. Yet it seems to be agreed, That such Justices must, at their Peril, take Care that the Offence in Truth amounted not to Murder; and that they ought in no Case to bail any Person who manifestly appears to have been guilty of any of the Homicides above mentioned, either by his own Confession, or the Notoriety of the Fact, not only because the above mentioned Statute of Westminster 1. 15. which is the Pattern prescribed by 1 & 2 Ph. & M. for the Direction of Justices of Peace in Relation to bail, expressly excludes all Persons from the Benefit of it which are guilty of open and manifest Offences; but also because the Statute of Gloucester, cap. 9. is express, That all Persons who are guilty of Homicide, by Misadventure or in Self-defence, shall be kept in Prison till the next coming of the Justices Itinerant, or of Gaol-Delivery.

Sect. 64. Thirdly, That the chief Import of these Statutes is to shew in what Manner Persons are to be bailed by Justices of Peace, and not to declare what Persons are bailable by them; in Relation to which Matter, the old Rules of the Statute of Westminster 1. are generally still to be followed, which extending only to criminal offences punishable in the ordinary way by Indictment before the Sheriff, &c. give no Power to bail Persons taken on Process in Civil Actions, or for Contempts to Superior Courts, as by Process of Rebellion out of Chancery. And therefore by a reasonable Construction of all these Statutes, Justices of Peace have no Power in any such Cases to admit any Person to Bail.[341]

Sect. 65. As to the third Point, viz. Where Bail is grantable by the Justices of Gaol-Delivery, it seems to be clearly settled [a] at this Day, That such Justices may bail any Person convicted before them of Homicide by Misadventure, or in Self-defence, the better to enable him to purchase his Pardon: And if a Person convicted of Manslaughter before such Justices, purchase his Pardon, it seems, that they may [b] bail him, even after their Sessions is determined, till the next Sessions of Gaol-Delivery, that he may come in then and plead his Pardon, for that the Power of such Justices seems [c] to continue for such Purposes after their Sessions. Also [d] if a Man be convicted of Manslaughter before such Justices, against plain Evidence, it is said that they may bail him till the next Sessions of Gaol-Delivery, in order to purchase his Pardon in the mean Time. But it seems, [e] That Justices of Peace have no Power to bail a Man in any of these case, because they are tied up for the most part to the Rules prescribed by the abovementioned Statute of Westminster 1. But this Statute not [f] extending to Justices of Gaol-Delivery, seems to leave them a discretionary Power in those Cases wherein it restrains the Sheriff from admitting Persons to bail. And therefore if a Defendant in an Appeal of Death, plead an Excommunication in Disability of the Plaintiff, it seems to be holden by Staundford, [g] That such Justices may bail the Defendant from Day to Day, till the Plaintiff shall be absolved, for that otherwise the Defendant might lie in Prison for ever, without any Opportunity of coming to his Trial. But it is observable, That the Books [h], which are cited for the Maintenance of this Opinion, speak only of an Appeal of Robbery: Yet if Justices of Gaol-Delivery have such Power of Bailing Persons in the Case of Death, on the Circumstances abovementioned, as it seems agreed in the Case abovecited that they have, I do not find any Reason why they may not as well upon other such like Circumstances, bail Persons indicted or appealed before them of any other Crime, in such Manner as the Court of King's Bench may do, as shall be more fully shewn under the next Point.

As to the Fourth Point, viz. Where Bail is grantable by the Courts of Westminster-Hall, I shall endeavour to shew,

1. Where it is grantable by the Court of King's Bench.
2. Where by the other Courts of Westminster-Hall.

As to the first of these Points I shall consider,

1. Where Bail is grantable by the Court of King's Bench, to a Person imprisoned by the King's special Command, or by the Order of his Privy Council.
2. Where to a Person committed by either House of Parliament.
3. Where to one committed by the Court of Chancery.
4. Where to one committed by an Inferior Court of Record.
5. Where to one expresly excluded by the abovementioned Statute of Westminster 1. Chap. 15. from the common Benefit of a Replevin by the Sheriff.

Sect. 66. As to the first of these Particulars, viz. Where Bail is grantable by the Court of King's Bench to a Person imprisoned by the King's special Command, or by the Order of the Privy Council, I do not find but that where-ever [a] Commitment by the Privy Council hath specially expressed the Crime for which the Party hath been committed, this Court has always admitted him to Bail, on the like Circumstances on which, in Discretion, it will grant Bail on other Commitments: [b] And where-ever it has appeared, that Persons have been imprisoned by Colour of an usurped Authority, pretended to be derived from any patent whatsoever, contrary to Law, it seems that the said Court hath always discharged the Person so imprisoned, without Bail. But there have been formerly many Opinions [c] That Persons committed by the special Command of the King, or of his Privy Council, without expressing any other Cause of the Commitment, were not bailable by any Court whatsoever, without some Intimation of the King's Consent to such Bailment, by Letter from the Privy Council, or otherwise. And a Distinction [d] was taken by some between a Commitment by one of the Privy Council, and a Commitment by the whole Body; and that the former ought indeed to set forth some other Cause of the Commitment besides the Command of the Person who made it; but that the latter needed not any.

Sect. 67. But this Matter came afterwards to be very solemnly debated in the famous Case [e] of Sir John Corbet and others, who being imprisoned by a Warrant from the Privy Council, about the third Year of the Reign of King Charles the First, moved the Court of King's Bench to admit them to bail upon their Habeas Corpus; whereupon it was returned, that they were detained in the Prison of the Fleet by the special Command of the King, signified to the Warden by a Warrant of some of the Members of the Privy Council, in which Warrant no other Cause of the Imprisonment was contained but such special Command: And it was strongly urged on the Behalf of the Prisoners, That such Imprisonment is against the Statute of Magna Charta, cap. 29. which provides, That no Freeman shall be taken or imprisoned, and that the King will not pass upon him, nor condemn him, but by the Judgment of his Peers, or the Law of the Land; and also against many other Statutes [f] made in Affirmance of Magna Charta, by which it is ordained, That no Man shall be taken by Petition, or Suggestion, made to the King or to his Council, unless it be by Indictment or Presentment, or by Process by Original Writ; and that no Man shall be imprisoned, &c. without being brought to answer by due process of Law; nor be put to answer without Presentment before Justices, or Matter of Record, or by due Process, and Writ. Original. And it was argued, That the Liberty of the Subject would be precarious, and lie at the King's Mercy, if Persons who happen to incur his Displeasure, for what perhaps the Law esteems no Crime, should by Means of such a Commitment be liable to be for ever imprisoned, without any Possibility of Redress; and that it seems inconsistent with natural Justice to expose a Man to so severe a Punishment for a supported Crime alleged against him, without giving him an Opportunity of clearing himself by a lawful Trial. And it was farther urged, That, according to the Opinion of Sir John Markham, in the Time of King Edward the Fourth, the King could not so much as arrest a Man upon Suspicion of Treason or Felony, as any of his Subjects may; for that if the King should do wrong, the Party could have no Action against him. Also it was insisted, That the Preamble of the Statute of Westminster 1. 15. which declares, That Persons imprisoned by the King's Command have always been taken to be irreplevisable, must be intended only of a Replevin by the common Writ de Homine replagiando, or by the Sheriff ex officio without

Writ, for that it speaks only of a Replevin by the Sheriffs and others; and therefore shall not be taken to extend to superior Courts And it was never thought, that the Court of King's Bench was restrained by it from bailing Persons imprisoned for Homicide; and yet all such are equally declared by the Statute to be irreplevisable; Also many Precedents were alleged, whereby it appeared, That Persons committed by the King's special Command had been discharged upon Writs of Habeas Corpus.[342]

Sect. 68. But on the other Side it was argued, That such Commitments could not reasonably be intended to be against the Purview of the Statutes abovecited, inasmuch as the said Statute of Westminster 1. 15. which was made in the very next Reign after that in which the Statute of Magna Charta was made, it was declared to be a settled and undoubted Point, That Persons committed by the Command of the King (which, as it seems to agreed, is to be understood of the King's special, absolute, and extrajudicial Command) are not replevisable: And it cannot be imagined that so high a Regard should be paid to such a Commitment, if it were thought to be illegal, and contrary to Magna Charta. And it was insisted, That Commitments of this Kind have often been allowed by the Court [a] of Justice, and are mentioned by Authors [b] of the best Credit since the abovecited Statutes, without any the least Objection to their Legality, and as depriving the Party imprisoned by them from the common Benefit of the Writ of Replevin. And it was also strongly urged, That there are often secret Causes not fit to be divulged, which may make it necessary for the Safety of the State, in some particular Circumstances, to restrain some Person from their Liberty for a certain Time, and that the King, who is entirely entrusted with Management of State-Affairs, shall be presumed always to act for the Publick Good; and that it is immodest for any of his Courts to question the Justice of his Proceedings of this Kind, which the law seems wholly to have left to his Wisdom, or to suffer a Suggestion that he abuse his Prerogative to cover Oppression; and that the Subject is in no Danger of Perpetual Imprisonment of this Account, for that the Court of King's Bench hath always used a discretionary Power over such Commitments, as well as all other, and therefore upon special Circumstances of Hardship, may admit Persons under such Commitments of Bail; but that where was nothing extraordinary in the Case, it hath been the general Course of the Court not to do it without a special Order from the Council for it, as appeared from the Examination of most of the Precedents relating to this Matter. And therefore in the Case abovementioned the Court of King's Bench was unanimous in Opinion, That Sir John Corbet, and the other Gentlemen so committed by the King's special Command, as is abovementioned, had no Right, prima facie, to demand the benefit of Bail, without the Consent of the Council, and therefore remanded them.[343]

Sect. 69. But this Matter being afterward considered in Parliament, and it being the general Opinion, That the chief Reason why those Gentlemen incurred the King's Displeasure was their Refusal to pay the Loans, which, as they insisted, were demanded of them without sufficient Authority; and it being evident, That if there were no certain legal remedy for the Liberty of the Subject against such a Strain of the Prerogative, no Man could be safe in maintaining his Property, either in Parliament, or out of it, against a disputed Demand from the Crown, but would be liable to a discretionary Imprisonment, and that under Colour of Law, without any certain Redress from the Law; it was thought necessary on this Occasion to draw up the famous Petition of Right, which was afterwards assented to by the King, wherein, among other Things, the Lords and Commons complain to the King, That against the Tenor of the above [a] cited Statutes, divers Subjects had then of late been imprisoned, without any Cause shewed; and when for their Deliverance they had been brought before Justices by Writs of Habeas Corpus there to undergo and receive as the Court should order; and their Keeper commanded to certify the Causes of their Detainer, no Cause had been certified, but that they were detained by his Majesty's special Command signified by the Lords of his Privy Council, and yet were returned back to several Prisons, without being charged with any Thing to which they might make answer according to the Law: And thereupon the said Lords and Commons, among other Things, humbly pray, That no Freeman, in any such Manner as is before mentioned, be imprisoned, or detained, &c.[344]

Sect. 70. And it seems to have been generally agreed, since the Time of this Petition, That where-ever any Commitment by the Privy Council hath not expressed, with some convenient Certainty, the Crime alleged against the Party, he ought to be bailed upon his Habeas Corpus.[345]

Sect. 71. And for the greater Security of the Liberty of the Subject, against Commitments by the Command of the King, or of his Privy Council, it is father provided and enacted, by 16 Car. 10. Par. 8. That if any Person shall be committed, restrained of his Liberty, or suffer Imprisonment by the Command or Warrant of the King's Majesty, in his own Person, or by the Command or Warrant of the Council-Board, or of any of the Lords or others of his Majesty's Privy Council; That in every such Case, every such Person upon Demand or Motion of the Judges of the King's Bench or Common Pleas, in open Court, shall without Delay, upon any Pretence whatsoever, for the ordinary Fees usually paid for the same, have forthwith granted unto him a Writ of Habeas Corpus, to be directed generally unto all and every Sheriff, Gaoler, Minister, Officer, or other Person in whose Custody the Party committed or restrained shall be, and such Sheriff, &c. shall, at Return of the said Writ, and according to the Command thereof, on due and convenient Notice thereof given unto him, at the Charge of the Party who requires or procures such Writ, and on Security by his own Bond given, to pay the Charges of carrying back the Prisoner, if he shall be remanded by the Court, &c. which Charges shall be ordered by the Court, bring or cause to be brought the Body of the Party before the Judges of the Court, from whence the same Writ shall issue, in open Court, and shall then likewise certify the Cause of such his Detainer or Imprisonment, and thereupon the Court within three Court-Days after such Return made and delivered [a] in open Court shall proceed to examine and determine whether the Cause of such Commitment, appearing upon the said Return, be just and legal or not, and shall thereupon do what to Justice shall appertain, either by delivering, bailing, or remanding the Prisoner: And if any Thing shall be otherwise wilfully done, or omitted to be done by any Judge, Justice, Officer or other Person aforementioned, contrary to the true Meaning hereof, That then such Person so offending shall forfeit to the Party grieved, his treble Damages, &c.[346]

Sect. 72. But it is provided, Par. 9. That the above-recited Clause shall extend only to the Warrants and Directions of the Council-Board, and to the Commitments, Restraints and Imprisonments of any Person or Persons, made, commanded or awarded, by the King's Majesty, his Heirs or Successors, in their own Person, or by the Lords and other of the Privy Council, and every one of them.

Sect. 73. As to the second Particular, viz. Where Bail is grantable by the Court of King's Bench, to a Person imprisoned by either House of Parliament, There can be no Doubt but that the highest Regard is to be paid to all the Proceedings of either of those Houses, and that where-ever the contrary does not plainly and expresly appear, it shall be presumed that they act within their Jurisdiction, and agreeably to the Usages of Parliament, and the Rules of Law and Justice: And therefore, where-ever it stands indifferent upon the Return of a Habeas Corpus, whether a Commitment by either of those Houses were strictly legal or not, and the Parliament be still sitting, I can find no Precedent that the Prisoner hath been bailed by the Court of King's Bench. And it cannot but be expected, that those Houses would be apt to resent an Attempt of this Kind, which might seem to carry with it an implicit Reflection on their Honour, as unjustly depriving a Subject of his Liberty, and putting him under a Necessity of demanding Justice from another Court, by unreasonably refusing to restore him to it; which surely shall never be intended, where their Proceedings are capable of a more favourable Construction. And therefore in the Lord Shaftbury's Case, who, upon his Habeas Corpus in the King's Bench, was returned to have been committed by the House of Lords for his high Contempt committed against that House, the Court would not take Notice of any Exceptions against the Form of the Commitment, as that it was too general, and did not express the Nature of the Contempt, or in what Place it was committed, &c. for that it shall be presumed, That it was such for which the Lords might lawfully make such an Order, and no other Court shall prescribe to them in what Form they ought to make it. But if it be demanded, in Case a Subject should be committed by either of those Houses, for a Matter manifestly out of their Jurisdiction, what Remedy can he have? I answer, That it cannot well be imagined that the Law, which favours nothing more than the Liberty of the Subject, should give us a Remedy against Commitments by the King himself, appearing to be illegal, and yet give us no Manner of Redress against a Commitment by our Fellow Subjects, equally appearing to be unwarranted. But as this is a Case, which, I am perswaded, will never happen, it seems needless over nicely to examine it.[347]

Sect. 74. However it seems agreed, That a Person committed for a Contempt, by the Order of either House of Parliament, may be discharged by the Court of King's Bench after a Dissolution, or Prorogation of the Parliament, whether he were committed during the Sessions, or afterwards; for that all the Orders of Parliament are determined by a Dissolution, or Prorogation; and all Matters before either House must be commenced a-new at the next Parliament, except only in the Case of a Writ of Error: And if the Subject should be deprived of his Liberty till the next Parliament, which perhaps may not meet again in many Years, no one could say when his Imprisonment would end.[348]

Sect. 75. But it is holden in Shower's Reports, that a Lord committed by the House of Lords, on an Impeachment of Treason, and afterwards pardoned, cannot be discharged by the Court of King's Bench, because the Impeachment being in a superior Court, the Pardon must be pleaded there; and the Commitment being by the Lords, the King's Bench cannot take Conusance of it. Yet it seems to have been taken for granted in the Lord Stafford's Case, That the Court of King's Bench may, in their Discretion, bail a Lord upon an Impeachment of High Treason, which in that Case they refused to do, not as a Matter out of their Power, but as a Thing which they were not bound to do, and improper on Consideration of the whole Circumstances. And though the Reasons above cited from Shower's Reports seem proper to prove, That the Court of King's Bench cannot discharge a Prisoner from any Impeachment in Parliament whatsoever; yet they seem by no Means to prove, that they cannot bail him. But it is observable, That it doth not clearly appear, from either of the abovementioned Reports, whether any Parliament were sitting at the Times of the Motions for such Discharge and Bailment, or not; but it is certainly most likely to prevail in such a Motion, when no Parliament is sitting, nor likely soon to sit, and after the Party hath been long in Prison; because, in such a Case, if he should not be bailed, he might he perpetually imprisoned for a Crime, without any Opportunity of making his Defence.[349]

Sect. 76. As to the third Particular, viz. Where Bail is grantable by the King's Bench, to a Person committed by the Court of Chancery, little is said in the Books, except in the Reign of King James the First, at the Time when Sir Edward Coke was Chief Justice, when this Matter was very much litigated, and occasioned great Heats between the two Courts, and several Persons committed to the Fleet by the Chancellor, were bailed by the Court of King's Bench, upon Exceptions to the Generality of the Form of the Commitments, as [a] not shewing the Time of the Commitment, or setting [b] forth only the Command of the Lord Chancellor as the Ground of the Imprisonment, without mentioning any Crime at all, or mentioning the Crime in [c] general Terms, as for a Contempt to the Court of Chancery, without shewing what the Contempt was, or at what Time committed: And one [d] Glanvil, who was generally committed by the Command of the Lord Chancellor, without setting forth any Cause of such Command, seems to have been bailed upon Examination of the Merits of the Decree, for disobeying whereof he was in Truth committed; whereby it appeared that the Decree related to a Matter before adjudged at the Common Law, which was thought contrary to the Purport of the [f] Statutes of 27 Ed. 3. 1. & 4 H. 4. 23. But this Proceeding being resented by the Lord Chancellor, the said Glanvil was afterwards recommitted by him for the same Matter, and yet was afterwards, on another Habeas Corpus, bailed the second Time by the Court of King’s Bench: But I have not met with any Precedent of this Kind of late Years; and how far the long Disuse of such like Proceedings may have lessened the Authority of the Cases abovementioned, may deserve to be considered. However, it cannot but be expected, That the Superior Courts will pay the highest Regard to one another’s Proceedings, and be ready to presume, That they are agreeable to Law, unless the contrary appear, or the Case be very particular and extraordinary, which may perhaps reasonably induce them, in some Circumstances, to make Exceptions from those general Rules, which in common Case usually govern their Discretion. But what Case in particular may be said to be of so extraordinary a Nature, it would be needless and presumptuous for me to endeavour to examine. But as to the Case abovementioned, which was formerly so much litigated, concerning the Chancery’s giving Relief against a Judgment at Law, since it seems to be settled at this Day, that the Chancery may, in some Cases, give Relief against the unequitable Use of such a Judgment, especially as to a Point not relievable by Law; whenever it stands indifferent, whether the Matter examined by Chancery, after a Judgment at Law, be so such a Nature as is proper for Relief in Chancery, or not; it is not probable, That any other Court of Westminster-Hall will easily presume that it is not, when the Chancellor, who is the proper Judge, hath determined that it is; And agreeably hereto it hath been adjudged, That a Commitment from Chancery, for Disobedience to a Decree, is good, without shewing what the Decree was.

Sect. 77. As to the fourth Particular, viz. Where Bail is grantable by the Court of King’s Bench to one committed by an inferior Court of Record; it seems, That this Court, having the Supreme Controul of all inferior Courts, may, in Discretion, on Consideration of the whole Circumstances of any Case whatsoever, bail any Person who shall appear to have been unjustly or hardly deprived of his Liberty by any inferior Court. And therefore, where-ever it shall clearly and expressly appear, that a Person hath been committed by any such Court, for a Matter which either is in Truth no Crime at all, or if it be a Crime, is not within the Jurisdiction of such Court, there can be no doubt but that it is a proper Motion to the King’s Bench to bail him. But in what other Cases in particular one may hope for the like Success in a Motion of this Kind, it seems difficult to determine; for that every such Case depends upon its particular Circumstances, which have great Weight with the Court in its Determinations of this Kind, in which it is in great Measure left to its Discretion. And therefore, though perhaps it may bail a Man on a Commitment by a Mayor of a Town, or a Justice of Peace, or other inferior Magistrate, for a Contempt, without shewing the particular Nature of it; yet it cannot be expected, that it will with like Readiness hail a Man of such a general Commitment by a Court of higher [a] Dignity, as a Court of Oyer and Terminer, or any other Court of Westminster-Hall; to the honour of whose Proceedings the greatest Regard is always to be given; and on this Ground chiefly, as I suppose, where a Person on a Habeas Corpus, was returned to have been committed by an Order of the Exchequer, for not paying a Fine of 50 l. by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners imposed upon him, the Court of King's Bench [b] refused to bail him, though it was not shewn wherefore the said Fine was imposed. And as a great Regard is always paid to the Dignity of the Court by which the Party is committed; so is it likewise to the Notoriety of the Offence; and therefore, where a Person convicted of buying and selling old Money, before Justices of Oyer and Terminer, was committed in Execution for the Fine, by an Order of the Court, not strictly formal, yet the Court of King's Bench refused [c] to bail him, for this Reason chiefly, because he was in Execution, and his Commitment was defective only in Point of Form. Also where Persons taken in Execution for their Fines to the King, set on them by a Sessions of Justices of Peace, have not only brought their Habeas Corpus, but also their Writ of Error in the King's Bench, and assigned Errors, yet the Court has refused to bail them. But I take it for granted, in those Cases which are but briefly reported, That it appeared upon the whole Record, That such Fines were legally imposed. Also it seems, that the said Court has sometimes been induced to deny Persons committed by other Courts, by Warrants not strictly formal, the Benefit of Bail, for the Enormity, dangerous Tendency, or Obstinacy [a] of their Offence, which if it had been attended with less aggravating Circumstances might not have excluded them from it. Also the said Court, in determining whether it be proper to bail a Man committed by another Court, usually considers all the other Circumstances of the Case, as the Length [b] and Hardship [c] of the Imprisonment, and such like, in order to give such a Determination upon the whole, as may be most agreeable to the Honour and Prerogative of the Crown, and the Liberty and Safety of the Subject.[350]

Sect. 78. But it seems to be agreed, That no one can in any Case controvert the Truth of the Return to a Habeas Corpus, or plead or suggest any Matter repugnant to it: Yet it hath been holden, That a Man may confess and avoid such a Return, by admitting the Truth of the Matters contained in it, and suggesting others not repugnant, which take off the Effect of them. And upon this Ground, where one Swallow, a Citizen of

London, was committed for refusing to accept the Office of an Alderman of the said City to which he had been elected, and the Custom of the City justifying a Commitment for such a Refusal, and the Election and Refusal were set forth in the Return to the Habeas Corpus; he filed a Suggestion in the Crown-Office, That he was an Officer of the King's Mint, and that all such Officers were exempted from all City-Offices, both by Prescription and by the King's Charter; and thereupon the Patent of the Grant of his Office, and also the Patent of the exemption being inrolled in the Court, he was discharged.[351]

Sect. 79. Also the Court will sometimes examine by Affidavit, the Circumstances of a Fact on which a Prisoner brought before them by an Habeas Corpus hath been indicted, in order to inform themselves, on Examination of the whole Matter, whether it be reasonable to bail him or not. And agreebly hereto, where one Jackson, who had been indicted of Piracy before the sessions of Admiralty, on a malicious Prosecution, brought his Habeas Corpus in the said Court in order to be bailed; the Court examined the whole Circumstances of the Fact by Affidavits, upon which it appeared, That the Prosecutor himself, if any one, was guilty, and carried on the present Prosecution to screen himself; and thereupon the Court in Consideration of the Unreasonableness of the Prosecution, and the Uncertainty of the Time when another sessions of Admiralty might be holden, admitted the said Jackson to Bail, and committed the Prosecutor till he should find Bail to answer the Fact contained in the Affidavits.[352]

Sect. 80. As to the fifth Particular, viz. Where Bail is grantable by the Court of King's Bench, to one excluded by the above mentioned Statute of Westminster 1. chap. 15. From the common Benefit of a Replevin by the Sheriff; It cannot be doubted, but that notwithstanding neither [d] the Judges of this, nor of any other Superior Court of Justice, are strictly within the Purview of that Statute; yet [a] they will always, in their Discretion pay a due Regard to the Rules prescribed by it, and not admit a Person to Bail who is expressly declared by it to be irreplevisable, without some particular Circumstance in his Favour: And therefore it seems difficult to find an Instance where Persons attainted [b] of Felony, or but convicted thereof by Verdict general or [c] special, or notoriously [d] guilty of Treason or Manslaughter, &c. by their own Confession or otherwise; have been admitted to the Benefit of Bail, without some special Motive to induce the Court to grant it: As where [e] a Person taken by a Capias utlagatum, on an Appeal of Felony by the Name of J. S. Gentleman, pleads that his Name is

J. S. Yeoman, and not Gentleman, and so he is not the same Person who was outlawed, in which Case the Court in Discretion may bail him; for until the Plea is determined, it appears not whether he were the Person intended, or not. Or where [f] a Person outlawed alledges an Error in the Record, in which Case also the Court, ex gratia, may bail him, especially if the Error be apparent. Or where a Man is convicted [g] of Felony, upon Evidence by which it plainly appears to the Court that he is not guilty of it; in which Case even the Justices of Gaol-Delivery may bail him. Or where [h] it appears to the Court that the Prosecutor of an Indictment, or the Plaintiff in an Appeal, hath unreasonably delayed his Prosecution; as where two Nihils are returned upon two Writs of Scire facias, awarded against a Plaintiff in an Appeal removed by Certiorari into the King's Bench and the Prisoner hath lain a long Time under Confinement. Or where [i] the Defendant in an Appeal hath pleaded an Excommunication in Disability of the Plaintiff: In which Case it is apparent that the Plaintiff cannot proceed at present; and if the Defendant should be kept in Prison till the Plaintiff be absolved, he might be a Prisoner for Life. Or where [k] it appears to the Court, That the Defendant may be in Danger of losing his Life, either by Famine, or a dangerous Distemper, &c. if he continue longer in Prison.

As to the second Point, viz. In what Cases Bail is grantable by the other Courts of Westminster-Hall; I shall consider,

1. How far it is grantable by such Court, to Persons committed for Causes under the Degree of Treason or Felony.
2. How far to Persons committed for Treason or Felony.

Sect. 81. As to the first Point, viz. How far Bail is grantable by the said Courts, to Persons committed for Causes under the Degree of Treason or Felony; it seems,[1] That the Courts of Common Pleas and Exchequer, at any Time during Term, and the Court of Chancery, either in Term or Vacation, may award a Habeas Corpus by the Common Law, for any Person committed for any such Cause, and thereupon discharge him, if it shall clearly appear by the Return, That the Commitment was against Law (as being made by one who had no Jurisdiction of the Cause, or for a Matter for which by Law no Man ought to be punished) or bail him, if it shall be doubtful whether the Commitment were legal or not, &c. However it is certain at this Day, That by Force of the Habeas Corpus Act, Par. 3 & 10. set forth more at large Sect. 17 & 22. any of the said Court, in Termtime, and any Judge of either Bench, or Baron of the Exchequer, being of the Degree of the Coif, in the Vacation, may award a Habeas Corpus for any Prisoner whatsoever, who is bailable by the Intent of that Act, and thereupon bail him.

Sect. 82. As to the second Point, viz. How far Bail is grantable by the said Courts to Persons committed for Treason or Felony; it is observable, That the above mentioned Clauses of the said Habeas Corpus Act extend not to Persons committed for Treason, or Felony, plainly and specially expressed in the Warrant of Commitment; neither do I find any printed Case, wherein Persons committed for such Crimes have been bailed either by the Courts of Common Pleas or Exchequer. However it is certain, That in some Cases Persons committed for Felony are bailable by the Court of Chancery. But our Law-Books being generally silent in Relation to these Matters I shall refer the Reader for the more accurate Knowledge of them, of Observation and Experience.[353]

Sect. 83. As to the seventh general Point of this Chapter, viz. In what Form Bail is to be taken; it seems to be the Practice of the Court of King's Bench in admitting a Person to Bail,[a] who is actually present in Court,[b] upon an Indictment or Appeal of Felony, or other Crime, punishable with Loss [c] of Member, to take [d] a several Recognisance to the King in a certain Sum from each of the Bail, that the Prisoner shall appear at a certain Day, &c. and also,[e] That the Bail shall be liable for the Default of such Appearance, &c. Body for Body. And it seems to be left to the Discretion of Justices of Peace, in admitting any Person to Bail for Felony, to take the Recognisance either in a certain Sum, or else Body for Body. But [f] where a Person is bailed by the Court of King's Bench, before the Return of a Capias awarded against him for Felony, or (as it seems to be implied in the Book cited in the Margin that he may be,) in any Court for a Crime of an Inferior Nature, it seems, That the Recognisance ought to be only in a certain Sum of Money, and not Body for Body. However it is certain [g] at this Day, That Persons bound Body for Body, are not liable on the Forfeiture of the Recognisance, to such Punishment to which the Principal is to be adjudged, if found Guilty, but only to be fined, &c.[354]

Sect. 84. As to the eighth general Point of this Chapter, viz. What shall forfeit the Recognisance: If on a Bailment for Felony, the usual [h] Form, ad Standum recto de felonia praedicta, & ad respondendum Domino Regi, be made use of, and at the Trial the Party stand obstinately mute, it may reasonably be argued, that in Strictness the Recognisance is forfeited, for [i] that the Expressions above mentioned seem to import at least thus much, That the Prisoner shall make some Answer; and at the Common Law, before the Statute [k] of Marlebridge, cap. 28. if a Person under Bail had insisted on his Privilege as a Clerk, and refused to answer to the Crime alledged against him, his Sureties were to be amerced; and though the said Statute have in that Case excused the Bail, yet an obstinate Refusal to answer in other Cases may perhaps remain as it was at the Common Law. Mr. Dalton [1] indeed seems to be of another Opinion, because the Words above mentioned are always used of Course: But it seems strange, That Words should be looked on as idle and insignificant because they are most usual and proper. However, if late Practice and Experience have been agreeable to the above mentioned Opinion of Mr. Dalton, as I apprehend that they have, they will certainly be of great Force to maintain it: And indeed it must be confessed, That if a Man's Bail, who are his Gaolers of his own choosing, do as effectually secure his Appearance, and put him as much under the Power of the Court as if he had been in the Custody of the proper Officer, they seem to have answered the End of the Law, and to have done all that can be reasonably required of them: But howsoever the Law may stand in Relation to this Case, it is certain, That if Persons be bound by Recognisance, that J. S. shall appear in the King's Bench the first Day of such a Term, to answer to such an Information against him, and not depart till he shall be discharged by the Court, and afterwards the Attorney General enter a Nolle prosequi as to that Information, and exhibit another, on which the Defendant is convicted, and refuses to appear in Court after personal Notice, the Recognisance is forfeited; for being express that the Party shall not depart till he be discharged by the Court, it cannot be satisfy'd shall he be forthcoming, and ready to answer to any other Information exhibited against him while he continue not discharged, as much as to that which he was particularly bound to answer to. But in such Case it seems, That the Recongnisance shall not be forfeited by the Party's not appearing in Court the first Day of every Term, after he hath pleaded to the Information, as it may be before he hath pleaded.

14.3.1.6Burn, 1766

Transportation.

1. WHERE any person shall be convicted of grand or petit larceny, or any felonious stealing or taking of money or goods, within the benefit of clergy; and liable only to burning in the hand or whipping (except persons convicted for receiving or buying stolen goods, knowing them to be stolen) the court before whom he shall be convicted, or any subsequent court held with like authority, instead of ordering him to be burnt in the hand or whipt, may order him to be sent as soon as conveniently may be, to some of his majesty's plantations in America, for seven years; and shall have power to convey, transfer, and make over such offender, by order of court, to the use of any person who shall contract for the performance of such transportation, to him and his assigns, for seven years. 4 G. c. 11. s. 1. 6 G. c. 23. s. 1.

2. And where any offender shall be convicted of any crime, for which he is excluded the benefit of clergy, and the king shall be pleased to extend mercy to him, on condition of transportation to any part of America, and such intention of mercy be signified by a principal secretary of state, it shall be lawful for any court having proper authority, to allow such offender the benefit of a pardon under the great seal, and to order the like transfer and conveyance, to any person (who will contract for the performance of such transportation) and to his assigns, of such offender, as also of any person convicted of receiving or buying stolen goods knowing them to be stolen, for the term of 14 years, in case such condition of transportation be general, or else for such other term as shall be made part of such condition. 4 G. c. 11. s. 1.[355]

3. Every such person, to whom any such court shall order the offender to be transferred or conveyed, before he shall be delivered over to him or his assigns to be transported, shall contract with such person as shall be ordered by the court, and give sufficient security to the satisfaction of such court, that he will transport, or cause to be transported effectually, such offender, to such of his majesty's plantations in America as shall be ordered by the court, and procure an authentic certificate from the governor, or the chief custom house officer of the place (which they shall give without fee) of the landing of such offender (death and casualties of the sea excepted), and that the said offender shall not be suffered to return from the said place to any part of Great Britain or Ireland, by the wilful default of such person so contraction, or his assigns. 4 G. c. 11. s. 3.[356]

4. The court may appoint, if they think fit, two or more justices where the offender shall be convicted, who shall have power to contract with any person for performance of the transportation; and may order the like security, and cause the felons to be delivered by the gaoler to the person contracting or his assigns; which contracts and security shall be certified by the justices who shall make and take the same, to the next court held with like authority for the place where the felon was convicted, to be filed and kept among the records of such court. 6 G. c. 23. s. 2.[357]

5. And all securities for transportation shall be by bond in the name of the clerk of the peace, who shall (by such suit as the justices in sessions shall direct) prosecute such bond in his own name, and be paid such costs as he shall sustain in such suit for the penalty of such bond, or otherwise howsoever by reason thereof, out of the publick stock by the treasurer; and all money recovered on such bond, shall be to the use of the county or place, and be paid to the treasurer, and be part of the publick stock. 6 G. c. 23. s. 4.[358]

6. The person so contracting, and to whom any felon shall be delivered to be transported, or any person directed by the said justices (impowered to contract as aforesaid), or their assigns, may in such manner as they think fit, carry and secure the felon, in and through any county, toward the sea port; and if any person shall rescue such felon, or assist him in escaping, he shall be guilty of felony without benefit of clergy. 6 G. c. 23. s. 5.[359]

7. All charges in and about making the contracts, taking securities, and conveying of felons in order to be transported, shall be born by the county or place for which the court was held; and the treasurer shall, by order of the justices in sessions, pay the same to such persons as shall be employed for the purposes aforesaid. 6 G. c. 23. s. 3.[360]

8. If any person shall assist any felon to attempt his escape, from any boat or vessel carrying felons for transportation, he shall (being prosecuted within a year) be guilty of felony, and transported for seven years. 16 G. 2. c. 31. s. 3. 4.[361]

9. Where any person of the age of 15, and under 21, shall be willing to be transported, and to enter into any service in any of his majesty's plantations in America, it shall be lawful for any merchant or other, to contract with him for such service, not exceeding eight years; provided such person come before the lord mayor or a justice of the peace, if the contract be in London, or before two justices if elsewhere, and before him or them acknowledge such consent, and sign the contract in his or their presence, and with his or their approbation. And then it shall be lawful for such merchant or other, to transport such person, and keep him according to the contract: Which said contract, and approbation of such magistrate or magistrates, with the tenor of such contract, shall be certified by such magistrate or magistrates to the next sessions, to be registred by the clerk of the peace without fee. 4 G. c. 11. s. 5.[362]

10. And if any offender so ordered to be transported, shall return into Great Britain or Ireland, before the end of his term, he shall be liable to be punished as a person attainted of felony without benefit of clergy, and execution shall be awarded against him accordingly. 4 G. c. 11. s. 2.[363]
11. And by the 16 G. 2. c. 15. If any felon or other offender, ordered for transportation, or having agreed to transport himself on certain conditions either for life or any number of years, shall be afterwards at large in any part of Great Britain, without some lawful cause, before the expiration of the term; he shall be guilty of felony without benefit of clergy. s. 1.[364]
And he may be tried at the assizes of the county or liberty where he shall be apprehended, or from whence he was ordered to be transported; and the clerk of assize, and clerk of the peace, where such orders of transportation shall be made, shall, at the request of the prosecutor, or any other in the king's behalf, certify a transcript briefly and in a few words, containing the effect and tenor of every indictment and conviction of such felon, and of the order and contract for transportation, to the judges where he shall be indicted (not taking for the same above 2 s. 6 d.) which certificate being produced in court shall be a sufficient proof that such person hath been convicted and ordered to be transported. 6 G. c. 23. s. 6, 7. 16 G. 2. c. 15. s. 2.

Order and contract] So it is in the record; But in Mr. Hawkins's edition of the statutes, it is order or contract, which may induce a mistake: for as the words order or contract do imply, that a person may be convicted upon a certificate either of the one, or of the other, it may happen in such case that an innocent person shall be condemned; for if a contract for transportation shall be certified only, and not the order for transportation, it is possible there may never have been any such order, and then such contract, being without the party's own consent or knowledge, and without any order to support it, is void.
12. And whoever shall discover, apprehend, and prosecute to conviction of felony without benefit of clergy, any such offender, shall be intitled to a reward of 20 l. and shall have the like certificate, and like payments made, without fee as any persons may be intitled to for the apprehending, prosecuting, and convicting of highwaymen. 16 G. 2. c. 15. s. 3.[365]
13. But the king may at any time pardon and dispense with the transportation, and allow of the offender's return, he paying to his proprietor such as shall be adjudged reasonable by any two justices of the peace within the province where such proprietor dwells. And where the offender shall have served his term, such service shall have the effect of a pardon. 4 G. c. 11. s. 2.

And, first, to refuse or delay to bail any person bailable, is an offence against the liberty of the subject, in any magistrate, by the common law[d]; as well as by the statute Westm. 1. 3 Edw. I. c. 15 and the habeas corpus act, 31 Car. II c. 2. And lest the intention of the law should be frustrated by the justices requiring bail to a greater amount than the nature of the case demands, it is expressly declared by statute 1 W. & M. st. 2. c. 1. that excessive bail ought not be required: though what bail shall be called excessive, must be left to the courts, on considering the circumstances of the case, to determine. And on the other hand, if the magistrate takes insufficient bail, he is liable to be fined, if the criminal doth not appear[e]. Bail may be taken either in court, or in some particular cases by the sheriff, coroner, or other magistrate; but most usually by the justices of the peace. Regularly, in all offences either against the common law or act of parliament, that are below felony, the offender ought to be admitted to bail, unless it be prohibited by some special act of parliament[f]. …

… But, where the imprisonment is only for safe custody before the conviction, and not for punishment afterwards, in such cases bail is ousted or taken away, wherever the offence is of a very enormous nature: for then the public is entitled to demand nothing less than the highest security that can be given; viz. the body of the accused, in order to ensure that justice shall be done upon him, if guilty.

14.3.2 CASE LAW

14.3.2.1TITUS OATES' CASE, 1685

[Upon Titus Oates' conviction upon two indictments for perjury, the Court pronounced sentence:]

"First, the Court does order for a fine, that you pay 1000 marks upon each Indictment.

"Secondly, That you be stripped of all your Canonical Habits.

"Thirdly, The Court does award, That you do stand upon the Pillory, and in the Pillory, here before Westminster-hall gate, upon Monday next, for an hour's time, between the hours of 10 and 12; with a paper over your head (which you must first walk with round about to all the Courts in Westminster-hall) declaring your crime." And that is upon the first indictment.

"Fourthly, (on the Second Indictment), upon Tuesday, you shall stand upon, and in the Pillory, at the Royal Exchange in London, for the space of an hour, between the hours of twelve and two; with the same inscription.

"You shall upon the next Wednesday, be whipped from Aldgate to Newgate.

"Upon Friday, you shall be whipped from Newgate to Tyburn, by the hands of the common hangman."

But, Mr. Oates, we cannot but remember, there were several particular times you swore false about; and therefore, as annual commemoration, that it may be known to all people as long as you live, we have taken special care of you for an annual punishment.

"Upon the 24th of April every year, as long as you live, you are to stand upon the Pillory, and in the Pillory, at Tyburn, just opposite to the gallows, for the space of an hour, between the hours of ten and twelve.

"You are to stand upon, and in the Pillory, here at Westminster-hall gate, every 9th of August, in every year, so long as you live. And that it may be known what we mean by it, 'tis to remember, what he swore about Mr. Ireland's being in town between the 8th and 12th of August.

"You are to stand upon, and in the Pillory, at Charing-cross, on the 10th of August, every year, during your life, for an hour, between ten and twelve.

"The like over-against the Temple gate, upon the 11th.

"And upon the 2d of September, … you are to stand upon, and in the Pillory, for the space of one hour, between twelve and two, at the Royal Exchange; and all this you are to do every year, during your life; and to be committed close prisoner, as long as you live.

[Following the Revolution, Oates sought reversal unsuccessfully in the House of Lords. Several lords entered this dissent:]

"1. For that the king's bench, being a temporal court, made it part of the judgment, that Titus Oates, being a clerk, should for his said perjuries, be divested of his canonical and priestly habit, and to continue divested all his life; which is a matter wholly out of their power, belonging to the ecclesiastical courts only.

"2. For that the said judgments are barbarous, inhuman, and unchristian; and there is [sic] no precedents to warrant the punishments of whipping and committing to prison for life, for the crime of perjury; which yet were but part of the punishments inflicted upon him.

"3. For that the particular matters upon which the indictments were found, were the points objected against Mr. Titus Oates' own testimony in several of the trials, in which he was allowed to be a good and credible witness, though testified against him by most of the same persons, who witnessed against him on those indictments.

"4. For that this will be an encouragement and allowance for giving the like cruel, barbarous, and illegal judgements [sic] hereafter, unless this judgment be reversed.

"5. Because sir John Holt, sir Henry Pollexfen, the two chief justices, and sir Robert Atkins chief baron, with six judges more, (being all that were then present), for these and many other reasons, did, before us, solemnly deliver their opinions, and unanimously declare, That the said judgements [sic] were contrary to law and ancient practice, and therefore erroneous, and ought to be reversed.

"6. Because it is contrary to the declaration on the twelfth of February last, which was ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal and Commons assembled, and by their declarations engrossed in parchment, and enrolled among the records of parliament, and recorded in chancery; whereby it doth appear, that excessive bail ought not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel nor unusual punishments inflicted. …"

ORDERED, That it be referred to a committee of three, to prepare and report a proper arrangement of, and introduction to the articles of amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as agreed to by the House; and that Mr. Benson, Mr. Sherman, and Mr. Sedgwick be of the said committee.

15.1.2PROPOSALS FROM THE STATE CONVENTIONS

15.1.2.1New York, July 26, 1788

That all Power is originally vested in and consequently derived from the People, and that Government is instituted by them for their common Interest Protection and Security.

That the enjoyment of Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness are essential rights which every Government ought to respect and preserve.

That the Powers of Government may be reassumed by the People, whensoever it shall become necessary to their Happiness; that every Power, Jurisdiction and right, which is not by the said Constitution clearly delegated to the Congress of the United States, or the departments of the Government thereof, remains to the People of the several States, or to their respective State Governments to whom they may have granted the same; And that those Clauses in the said Constitution, which declare, that Congress shall not have or exercise certain Powers, do not imply that Congress is entitled to any Powers not given by the said Constitution; but such Clauses are to be construed either as exceptions to certain specified Powers, or as inserted merely for greater Caution.

State Ratifications, RG 11, DNA.

15.1.2.2North Carolina, August 1, 1788

WHEREAS all government ought to be instituted and supported for the security and protection of the community as such, and to enable the individuals who compose it to enjoy their natural rights, and the other blessings which the author of existence has bestowed upon man; and whenever these great ends of government are not obtained, the people have a right, by common consent to change it, and take such measures as to them may appear necessary to promote their safety and happiness. And whereas the inhabitants of this commonwealth have, in consideration of protection only, heretofore acknowledged allegiance to the king of Great Britain; and the said king has not only withdrawn that protection, but commenced, and still continues to carry on, with unabated vengeance, a most cruel and unjust war against them employing therein, not only the troops of Great Britain, but foreign mercenaries, savages and slaves, for the avowed purpose of reducing them to a total and abject submission to the despotic domination of the British parliament, with many other acts of tyranny, (more fully set forth in the declaration of congress) whereby all allegiance and fealty to the said king and his successors, are dissolved and at an end, and all power and authority derived from him ceased in these colonies. And whereas it is absolutely necessary for the welfare and safety of the inhabitants of said colonies, that they be henceforth free and independent states, and that just, permanent, and proper forms of government exist in every part of them derived from and founded on the authority of the people only, agreeable to the directions of the honourable American congress. government) in permitting the people of this state, by common consent, and without violence, deliberately to form for themselves such just rules as they shall think best, for governing their future society; and being fully convinced, that it is our indispensible duty to establish such original principles of government, as will best promote the general happiness of the people of this state, and their posterity, and provide for future improvements, without partiality for, or prejudice against any particular class, sect, or denomination of men whatever, do, by virtue of the authority vested in us by our constituents, ordain, declare, and establish, the following Declaration of Rights, and Frame of Government, to be the Constitution of this commonwealth, and to remain in force therein for ever, unaltered, except in such articles as shall hereafter on experience be found to require improvement, and which shall by the same authority of the people, fairly delegated as this frame of government directs, be amended or improved for the more effectual obtaining and securing the great end and design of all government, herein before mentioned.

15.2DISCUSSION OF DRAFTS AND PROPOSALS

15.2.1THE FIRST CONGRESS

15.2.1.1June 8, 17892

15.2.1.1.a Mr. Jackson.

The more I consider the subject of amendments, the more, mr. speaker, I am convinced it is improper. I revere the rights of my constituents as much as any gentleman in congress, yet, I am against inserting a declaration of rights in the constitution, and that upon some of the reasons referred to by the gentleman last up. If such an addition is not dangerous or improper, it is at least unnecessary: that is a sufficient reason for not entering into the subject at a time when there are urgent calls for our attention to important business. Let me ask, gentlemen, what reason there is for the suspicions which are to be removed by this measure? Who are congress that such apprehensions should be entertained of them? Do we not belong to the mass of the people? Is there a single right but, if infringed, will affect us and our connections as much as any other person? Do we not return at the expiration of two years into private life, and is not this a security against encroachment? Are we not sent here to guard those rights which might be endangered, if the government was an aristocracy or a despotism? View for a moment the situation of Rhode-Island and, say whether the people's rights are more safe under state legislatures than under a government of limited powers? Their liberty is changed to licentiousness. But do gentlemen suppose bills of rights necessary to secure liberty? If they do, let them look at New York, New Jersey, Virginia, South Carolina, and Georgia. Those states have no bills of rights, and are the liberty of the citizens less safe in those states, than in the other of the United States? I believe they are not.

There is a maxim in law, and it will apply to bills of rights, that when you enumerate exceptions, the exceptions operate to the exclusion of all circumstances that are omitted; consequently, unless you except every right from the grant of power, those omitted are inferred to be resigned to the discretion of the government.

Congressional Register, June 8, 1789, vol. 1, p. 437.

15.2.1.1.b Mr. Jackson observed, That the Hon. Gentleman's ingenious detail, so far from convincing him of the expediency of bringing forward the subject of amendments at this time, had confirmed him in the contrary opinion: The prospect which such a discussion opened, was wide and extensive, and would preclude other benefits, of much greater moment, at the present juncture — He differed widely from the Gentleman, with regard to bills of rights — several of the States had no such bills — Rhode-Island had none — there, liberty was carried to excess, and licentiousness triumphed — In some States, which had such a nominal security, the encroachments upon the rights of the people had been most complained of. …

15.2.1.2.a The 8th clause of the 4th proposition was taken up, which was "The enumeration in this constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people."

Mr. Gerry said it ought to be "deny or impair," for the word "disparage" was not of plain import; he therefore moved to make that alteration, but not being seconded, the question was taken on the clause, and it passed in the affirmative.

Congressional Register, August 17, 1789, vol. 2, p. 226.

15.2.1.2.b 11th Amendment. ["]The enumeration in this constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people."

This was agreed to without amendment.

15.2.2.1.aFebruary 4, 1788

Rev. Mr. THACHER. … There are other restraints, which, though not directly named in this Constitution, yet are evidently discerned by every man of common observation. These are, the government of the several states, and the spirit of liberty in the people.

15.2.2.1.bFebruary 5, 1788

Mr. PARSONS demonstrated the impracticability of forming a bill, in a national constitution, for securing individual rights, and showed the inutility of the measure, from the ideas, that no power was given to Congress to infringe on any one of the natural rights of the people by this Constitution; and, should they attempt it without constitutional authority, the act would be a nullity, and could not be enforced.

Elliot, vol. 2, pp. 161–62.

15.2.2.2New York, July 1, 1788

Mr. TREDWELL. Sir, little accustomed to speak in public, and always inclined, in such an assembly as this, to be a hearer rather than a speaker, on a less important occasion than the present I should have contented myself with a silent vote; but when I consider the nature of this dispute, that it is a contest, not between little states and great states, (as we have been told,) between little folks and great folks, between patriotism and ambition, between the navigating and non-navigating individuals, (for not one of the amendments we contend for has the least reference to the clashing interests of the states;) when I consider, likewise, that a people jealous of their liberties, and strongly attached to freedom, have reposed so entire a confidence in this assembly, that upon our determination depends their future enjoyment of those invaluable rights and privileges, which they have so lately and so gallantly defended at every risk and expense, both of life and property, — it appears to me so interesting and important, that I cannot be totally silent on the occasion, lest lisping babes should be taught to curse my name, as a betrayer of their freedom and happiness.

The gentleman who first opened this debate did (with an emphasis which I believe convinced every one present of the propriety of the advice) urge the necessity of proceeding, in our deliberations on this important subject, coolly and dispassionately. With how much candor this advice was given, appears from the subsequent parts of a long speech, and from several subsequent speeches almost totally addressed to our fears. The people of New Jersey and Connecticut are so exceedingly exasperated against us, that, totally regardless of their own preservation, they will take the two rivers of Connecticut and Delaware by their extremities, and, by dragging them over our country, will, by a sweeping deluge, wash us all into the Hudson, leaving neither house nor inhabitant behind them. But if this event should not happen, doubtless the Vermontese, with the British and tories our natural enemies, would, by bringing down upon us the great Lake Ontario, sweep hills and mountains, houses and inhabitants, in one deluge, into the Atlantic. These, indeed, would be terrible calamities; but terrible as they are, they are not to be compared with the horrors and desolation of tyranny. The arbitrary courts of Philip in the Netherlands, in which life and property were daily confiscated without a jury, occasioned as much misery and a more rapid depopulation of the province, before the people took up arms in their own defence, than all the armies of that haughty monarch were able to effect afterwards; and it is doubtful, in my mind, whether governments, by abusing their powers, have not occasioned as much misery and distress, and nearly as great devastations of the human species, as all the wars which have happened since Milton's battle of the angels to the present day. The end or design of government is, or ought to be, the safety, peace, and welfare of the governed. Unwise, therefore, and absurd in the highest degree, would be the conduct of that people, who, in forming a government, should give to their rulers power to destroy them and their property, and thereby defeat the very purpose of their institutions; or, in other words, should give unlimited power to their rulers, and not retain in their own hands the means of their own preservation. The first governments in the world were parental, the powers of which were restrained by the laws of nature; and doubtless the early succeeding governments were formed on the same plan, which, we may suppose, answered tolerably well in the first ages of the world, while the moral sense was strong, and the laws of nature well understood, there being then no lawyers to explain them away. But in after times, when kings became great, and courts crowded, it was discovered that governments should have a right to tyrannize, and a power to oppress; and at the present day, when the juris periti are become so skilful in their profession, and quibbling is reduced to a science, it is become extremely difficult to form a constitution which will secure liberty and happiness to the people, or laws under which property is safe. Hence, in modern times, the design of the people, in forming an original constitution of government, is not so much to give powers to their rulers, as to guard against the abuse of them; but, in a federal one, it is different.

Sir, I introduce these observations to combat certain principles which have been daily and confidently advanced by the favorers of the present Constitution, and which appear to me totally indefensible. The first and grand leading, or rather misleading, principle in this debate, and on which the advocates for this system of unrestricted powers must chiefly depend for its support, is that, in forming a constitution, whatever powers are not expressly granted or given the government, are reserved to the people, or that rulers cannot exercise any powers but those expressly given to them by the Constitution. Let me ask the gentleman who advanced this principle, whether the commission of a Roman dictator, which was in these few words — to take care that the state received no harm — does not come up fully to their ideas of an energetic government; or whether an invitation from the people to one or more to come and rule over them, would not clothe the rulers with sufficient powers. If so, the principle they advance is a false one. Besides, the absurdity of this principle will evidently appear, when we consider the great variety of objects to which the powers of the government must necessarily extend, and that an express enumeration of them all would probably fill as many volumes as Pool's Synopsis of the Critics. But we may reason with sufficient certainty on the subject, from the sense of all the public bodies in the United States, who had occasion to form new constitutions. They have uniformly acted upon a direct and contrary principle, not only in forming the state constitutions and the old Confederation, but also in forming this very Constitution, for we do not find in every state constitution express resolutions made in favor of the people; and it is clear that the late Convention at Philadelphia, whatever might have been the sentiments of some of its members, did not adopt the principle, for they have made certain reservations and restrictions, which, upon that principle, would have been totally useless and unnecessary; and can it be supposed that wise body, whose only apology for the great ambiguity of many parts of that performance, and the total omission of some things which many esteem essential to the security of liberty, was a great desire for brevity, should so far sacrifice that great and important object, as to insert a number of provisions which they esteemed totally useless? Why is it said that the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless, in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it? What clause in the Constitution, except this very clause itself, gives the general government a power to deprive us of that great privilege, so sacredly secured to us by our state constitutions? Why is it provided that no bill of attainder shall be passed, or that no title of nobility shall be granted? Are there any clauses in the Constitution extending the powers of the general government to these objects? Some gentlemen say that these, though not necessary, were inserted for greater caution. I could have wished, sir, that a greater caution had been used to secure to us the freedom of election, a sufficient and responsible representation, the freedom of the press, and the trial by jury both in civil and criminal cases.

These, sir, are the rocks on which the Constitution should have rested; no other foundation can any man lay, which will secure the sacred temple of freedom against the power of the great, the undermining arts of ambition, and the blasts of profane scoffers — for such there will be in every age — who will tell us that all religion is in vain; that is, that our political creeds, which have been handed down to us by our forefathers as sacredly as our Bibles, and for which more of them have suffered martyrdom than for the creed of the apostles, are all nonsense; who will tell us that paper constitutions are mere paper, and that parchment is but parchment, that jealousy of our rulers is a sin, &c. I could have wished also that sufficient caution had been used to secure to us our religious liberties, and to have prevented the general government from tyrannizing over our consciences by a religious establishment — a tyranny of all others most dreadful, and which will assuredly be exercised whenever it shall be thought necessary for the promotion and support of their political measures. It is ardently to be wished, sir, that these and other invaluable rights of freemen had been as cautiously secured as some of the paltry local interests of some of the individual states. But it appears to me, that, in forming this Constitution, we have run into the same error which the lawyers and Pharisees of old were charged with; that is, while we have secured the tithes of mint, anise, and cumin, we have neglected to weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy, and faith. …

In this Constitution, sir, we have departed widely from the principles and political faith of ’76, when the spirit of liberty ran high, and danger put a curb on ambition. Here we find no security for the rights of individuals, no security for the existence of our state governments; here is no bill of rights, no proper restriction of power; our lives, our property, and our consciences, are left wholly at the mercy of the legislature, and the powers of the judiciary may be extended to any degree short of almighty. Sir, in this Constitution we have not only neglected, — we have done worse, — we have openly violated, our faith, — that is our public faith.

Elliot, vol. 2, pp. 396–401.

15.2.2.3North Carolina, July 29, 1788

Mr. MACLAINE. Mr. Chairman, I beg leave to make a few observations. One of the gentleman's objections to the Constitution now under consideration is, that it is not the act of the states, but of the people; but that it ought to be the act of the states; and he instances the delegation of power by the states to the Confederation, at the commencement of the war, as a proof of this position. I hope, sir, that all power is in the people, and not in the state governments. If he will not deny the authority of the people to delegate power to agents, and to devise such a government as a majority of them thinks will promote their happiness, he will withdraw his objection. The people, sir, are the only proper authority to form a government. They, sir, have formed their state governments, and can alter them at pleasure. Their transcendent power is competent to form this or any other government which they think promotive of their happiness. But the gentleman contends that there ought to be a bill of rights, or something of that kind—something declaring expressly, that all power not expressly given to the Constitution ought to be retained by the states; and he produces the Confederation as authority for its necessity. When the Confederation was made, we were by no means so well acquainted with the principles of government as we are now. We were then jealous of the power of our rulers, and had an idea of the British government when we entertained that jealousy. There is no people on earth so well acquainted with the nature of government as the people of America generally are. We know now that it is agreed upon by most writers, and men of judgment and reflection, that all power is in the people, and immediately derived from them. The gentleman surely must know that, if there be certain rights which never can, nor ought to, be given up, these rights cannot be said to be given away, merely because we have omitted to say that we have not given them up. Can any security arise from declaring that we have a right to what belongs to us? Where is the necessity of such a declaration? If we have this inherent, this unalienable, this indefeasible title to those rights, if they are not given up, are they not retained? If Congress should make a law beyond the powers and the spirit of the Constitution, should we not say to Congress, "You have no authority to make this law. There are limits beyond which you cannot go. You cannot exceed the power prescribed by the Constitution. You are amenable to us for your conduct. This act is unconstitutional. We will disregard it, and punish you for the attempt."

But the gentleman seems to be most tenacious of the judicial power of the states. The honorable gentleman must know, that the doctrine of reservation of power not relinquished, clearly demonstrates that the judicial power of the states is not impaired. …

Mr. SPENCER answered, that the gentleman last up had misunderstood him. He did not object to the caption of the Constitution, but he instanced it to show that the United States were not, merely as states, the objects of the Constitution; but that the laws of Congress were to operate upon individuals, and not upon states. He then continued: I do not mean to contend that the laws of the general government should not operate upon individuals. I before observed that this was necessary, as laws could not be put in execution against states without the agency of the sword, which, instead of answering the ends of government, would destroy it. I endeavored to show that, as the government was not to operate against states, but against individuals, the rights of individuals ought to be properly secured. In order to constitute this security, it appears to me there ought to be such a clause in the Constitution as there was in the Confederation, expressly declaring, that every power, jurisdiction, and right, which are not given up by it, remain in the states. Such a clause would render a bill of rights unnecessary. But as there is no such clause, I contend that there should be a bill of rights, ascertaining and securing the great rights of the states and people. Besides my objection to the revision of facts by the federal court, and the insecurity of jury trial, I consider the concurrent jurisdiction of those courts with the state courts as extremely dangerous. …

15.2.2.4.aOctober 28, 1787

Mr. WILSON. … In a government possessed of enumerated powers, such a measure [adopting a bill of rights] would be not only unnecessary, but preposterous and dangerous. Whence comes this notion, that in the United States there is no security without a bill of rights? Have the citizens of South Carolina no security for their liberties? They have no bill of rights. Are the citizens on the eastern side of the Delaware less free, or less secured in their liberties, than those on the western side? The state of New Jersey has no bill of rights. The state of New York has no bill of rights. The states of Connecticut and Rhode Island have no bill of rights. I know not whether I have exactly enumerated the states who have not thought it necessary to add a bill of rights to their constitutions; but this enumeration, sir, will serve to show by experience, as well as principle, that, even in single governments, a bill of rights is not an essential or necessary measure. But in a government consisting of enumerated powers, such as is proposed for the United States, a bill of rights would not only be unnecessary, but, in my humble judgement, highly imprudent. In all societies, there are many powers and rights which cannot be particularly enumerated. A bill of rights annexed to a constitution is an enumeration of the powers reserved. If we attempt an enumeration, every thing that is not enumerated is presumed to be given. The consequence is, that an imperfect enumeration would throw all implied power into the scale of the government, and the rights of the people would be rendered incomplete. On the other hand, an imperfect enumeration of the powers of government reserves all implied power to the people; and by that means the constitution becomes incomplete. But of the two, it is much safer to run the risk on the side of the constitution; for an omission in the enumeration of the powers of government is neither so dangerous nor important as an omission in the enumeration of the rights of the peop e [sic].

MR. WILSON. … I consider that there are very few who understand the whole of these rights. All the political writers, from Grotius and Puffendorf down to Vattel, have treated on this subject; but in no one of those books, nor in the aggregate of them all, can you find a complete enumeration of rights appertaining to the people as men and as citizens.

… Enumerate all the rights of men! I am sure, sir, that no gentleman in the late Convention would have attempted such a thing. …

PROCEEDINGS OF THE MEETING [of citizens] AT HARRISBURG, IN PENNSYLVANIA

We, the conferees, … agree in opinion,— …

I. That Congress shall not exercise any powers whatever, but such as are expressly given to that body by the Constitution of the United States: nor shall any authority, power, or jurisdiction, be assumed or exercised by the executive or judiciary departments of the Union, under color or pretence of construction or fiction; but all the rights of sovereignty, which are not by the said Constitution expressly and plainly vested in the Congress, shall be deemed to remain with, and shall be exercised by, the several states in the Union, according to their respective constitutions; and that every reserve of the rights of individuals, made by the several constitutions of the states in the Union, shall remain inviolate, except so far as they are expressly and manifestly yielded or narrowed by the national Constitution.

Elliot, vol. 2, pp. 543, 545.

15.2.2.5North Carolina, July 29, 1788

MR. IREDELL. … The gentleman says that unalienable rights ought not to be given up. Those rights which are unalienable are not alienated. They still remain with the great body of the people. If any right be given up that ought not to be, let it be shown. Say it is a thing which affects your country, and that it ought not be surrendered: this would be reasonable. But when it is evident that the exercise of any power not given up would be a usurpation, it would be not only useless, but dangerous, to enumerate a number of rights which are not intended to be given up; because it would be implying, in the strongest manner, that every right not included in the exception might be impaired by the government without usurpation; and it would be impossible to enumerate every one. Let anyone make what collection or enumeration of rights he pleases, I will immediately mention twenty or thirty more rights not contained in it.

MR. BLOODWORTH. … By its not being provide for, it is expressly provided against. I still see the necessity of a bill of rights. Gentlemen use contradictory arguments on this subject, if I recollect right. Without the most express restrictions, Congress may trample on your rights. Every possible precaution should be taken when we grant powers. Rulers are always disposed to abuse them.

Elliot, vol. 4, pp. 166–67.

15.2.2.6South Carolina, May 20, 1788

Mr. PATRICK DOLLARD. … They are nearly all, to a man, opposed to this new Constitution, because, they say, they have omitted to insert a bill of rights therein, ascertaining and fundamentally establishing, the unalienable rights of men, without a full, free, and secure enjoyment of which there can be no liberty, and over which it is not necessary that a good government should have the control. They say that they are by no means against vesting Congress with ample and sufficient powers; but to make over to them, or any set of men, their birthright, comprised in Magna Carta, which this new Constitution absolutely does, they can never agree to.

Mr. HENRY. … When we see men of such talents and learning compelled to use their utmost abilities to convince themselves that there is no danger, is it not sufficient to make us tremble? Is it not sufficient to fill the minds of the ignorant part of men with fear? If gentlemen believe that the apprehensions of men will be quieted, they are mistaken, since our best-informed men are in doubt with respect to the security of our rights. Those who are not so well informed will spurn at the government. When our common citizens, who are not possessed with such extensive knowledge and abilities are called upon to change their bill of rights (which, in plain, unequivocable terms, secures their most valuable rights and privileges) for construction and implication, will they implicitly acquiesce? Our declaration of rights tells us that "all men are by nature free and independent," &c. … Will they exchange these rights for logical reasons?

15.2.2.7.bJune 14, 1788

Mr. GEORGE MASON. Mr. Chairman, gentlemen say there is no new power given by this clause. Is there any thing in this Constitution which secures to the states the powers which are said to be retained? Will powers remain to the states which are not expressly guarded and reserved? I will suppose a case. Gentlemen may call it an impossible case, and suppose that Congress will act with wisdom and integrity. Among the enumerated powers, Congress are to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, and to pay the debts, and to provide for the general welfare and common defence; and by that clause (so often called the sweeping clause) they are to make all laws necessary to execute those laws. Now, suppose oppressions should arise under this government, and any writer should dare to stand forth, and expose to the community at large the abuses of those powers; could not Congress, under the idea of providing for the general welfare, and under their own construction, say that this was destroying the general peace, encouraging sedition, and poisoning the minds of the people? And could they not, in order to provide against this, lay a dangerous restriction on the press? Might they not even bring the trial of this restriction within the ten miles square, when there is no prohibition against it? Might they not thus destroy the trial by jury? Would they not extend their implication? It appears to me that they may and will. And shall the support of our rights depend on the bounty of men whose interest it may be to oppress us? That Congress should have the power to provide for the general welfare of the Union, I grant. But I wish a clause in the Constitution, with respect to all powers which are not granted, that they are retained by the states. Otherwise, the power of providing for the general welfare may be perverted to its destruction.

Many gentlemen, whom I respect, take different sides of this question. We wish this amendment to be introduced, to remove our apprehensions. There was a clause in the Confederation reserving to the states respectively every power, jurisdiction, and right, not expressly delegated to the United States. This clause has never been complained of, but approved by all. Why not, then, have a similar clause in this Constitution, in which it is the more indispensably necessary than in the Confederation, because of the great augmentation of power vested in the former? In my humble apprehension, unless there be some such clear and finite expression, this clause now under consideration will go to any thing our rulers may think proper. Unless there be some express declaration that every thing not given is retained, it will be carried to any power Congress may please.

MR. HENRY moved to read from the 8th to the 13th article of the declaration of rights; which was done.

MR. GEORGE NICHOLAS, in reply to the gentlemen opposed to the clause under debate, went over the same grounds, and developed the same principles, which Mr. Pendleton and Mr. Madison had done. The opposers of the clause, which gave the power of providing for the general welfare, supposed its dangers to result from its connection with, and extension of, the powers granted in the other clauses. He endeavored to show the committee that it only empowered Congress to make such laws as would be necessary to enable them to pay the public debts and provided for the common defence; that this general welfare was united, not to the general power of legislation, but to the particular power of laying and collecting taxes, imposts, and excises, for the purpose of paying the debts and providing for the common defence,—that is, that they could raise as much money as would pay the debts and provide for the common defence, in consequence of this power. The clause which was affectedly called the sweeping clause contained no new grant of power. To illustrate this position, he observed that, if it had been added at the end of every one of the enumerated powers, instead of being inserted at the end of all, it would be obvious to any one that it was not augmentation of power. If, for instance, at the end of the clause granting power to lay and collect taxes, who could suspect it to be an addition of power? As it would grant no new power if inserted at the end of each clause, it could not when subjoined to the whole.

He then proceeded thus: But, says he, who is to determine the extent of such powers? I say, the same power which, in all well-regulated communities, determines the extent of legislative powers. If they exceed these powers, the judiciary will declare it void or else the people will have a right to declare it void. Is this depending on any man? But, says the gentleman, it may go to any thing. It may destroy the trial by jury; and they may say it is necessary for providing for the general defence. The power of providing for the general defence only extends to raise any sum of money they may think necessary, by taxes, imposts, &c. But, says he, our only defence against oppressive laws consists in the virtue of our representatives. This was misrepresented. If I understand it right, no new power can be exercised. As to those which are actually granted, we trust to the fellow-feelings of our representatives; and if we are deceived, we then trust to altering our government. It appears to me, however, that we can confide in their discharging their powers rightly, from the peculiarity of their situation, and connection with us. If, sir, the powers of the former Congress were very inconsiderable, that body did not deserve to have great powers.

It was so constructed that it would be dangerous to invest it with such. But why were the articles of the bill of rights read? Let him show us that those rights are given up by the Constitution. Let him prove them to be violated. He tells us that the most worthy characters of the country differ as to the necessity of a bill of rights. It is a simple and plain proposition. It is agreed upon by all that the people have all power. If they part with any of it, is it necessary to declare that they retain the rest? Liken it to any similar case. If I have one thousand acres of land, and I grant five hundred of it, must I declare that I retain the other five hundred? Do I grant the whole thousand acres, when I grant five hundred, unless I declare that the five hundred I do not give belong to me still? It is so in this case. After granting some powers, the rest must remain with the people.

Gov. RANDOLPH observed that he had some objections to the clause. He was persuaded that the construction put upon it by the gentlemen, on both sides, was erroneous; but he thought any construction better than going into anarchy.

MR. GEORGE MASON still thought that there ought to be some express declaration in the Constitution, asserting that rights not given to the general government were retained by the states. He apprehended that, unless this was done, many valuable and important rights would be concluded to be given up by implication. All governments were drawn from the people, though many were perverted to their oppression. The government of Virginia, he remarked, was drawn from the people; yet there were certain great and important rights, which the people, by their bill of rights, declared to be paramount to the power of the legislature. He asked, Why should it not be so in this Constitution? Was it because we were more substantially represented in it than in the state government? If, in the state government, where the people were substantially and fully represented, it was necessary that the great rights of human nature should be secure from the encroachments of the legislature, he asked if it was not more necessary in this government, where they were but inadequately represented? He declared that artful sophistry and evasions could not satisfy him. He could see no clear distinction between rights relinquished by a positive grant, and lost by implication. Unless there were a bill of rights, implication might swallow up all our rights.

MR. HENRY. Mr. Chairman, the necessity of a bill of rights appears to me to be greater in this government than ever it was in any government before. I have observed already, that the sense of the European nations, and particularly Great Britain, is against the construction of rights being retained which are not expressly relinquished. I repeat, that all nations have adopted this construction—that all rights not expressly and unequivocally reserved to the people are impliedly and incidentally relinquished to rulers, as necessarily inseparable from the delegated powers. It is so in Great Britain; for every possible right, which is not reserved to the people by some express provision or compact, is within the king's prerogative. It is so in that country which is said to be in such full possession of freedom. It is so in Spain, Germany, and other parts of the world. Let us consider the sentiments which have been entertained by the people of America on this subject. At the revolution, it must be admitted that it was their sense to set down those great rights which ought, in all countries, to be held inviolable and sacred. Virginia did so, we all remember. She made a compact to reserve, expressly, certain rights.

When fortified with full, adequate, and abundant representation, was she satisfied with that representation? No. She most cautiously and guardedly reserved and secured those invaluable, inestimable rights and privileges, which no people, inspired with the least glow of patriotic liberty, ever did, or ever can, abandon. She is called upon now to abandon them, and dissolve that compact which secured them to her. She is called upon to accede to another compact, which most infallibly supersedes and annihilates her present one. Will she do it? This is the question. If you intend to reserve your unalienable rights, you must have the most express stipulation; for, if implication be allowed, you are ousted of those rights. If the people do not think it necessary to reserve them, they will be supposed to be given up. How were the congressional rights defined when the people of America united by a confederacy to defend their liberties and rights against the tyrannical attempts of Great Britain? The states were not then contented with implied reservation. No, Mr. Chairman. It was expressly declared in our Confederation that every right was retained by the states, respectively, which was not given up to the government of the United States. But there is no such thing here. You, therefore, by a natural and unavoidable implication, give up your rights to the general government.

Your own example furnishes an argument against it. If you give up these powers, without a bill of rights, you will exhibit the most absurd thing to mankind that ever the world saw — a government that has abandoned all its powers — the powers of direct taxation, the sword, and the purse. You have disposed them to Congress, without a bill of rights — without check, limitation, or control. And still you have checks and guards; still you keep barriers — pointed where? Pointed against your weakened, prostrated, enervated state government! You have a bill of rights to defend you against the state government, which is bereaved of all power, and yet you have none against Congress, though in full and exclusive possession of all power! You arm yourselves against the weak and defenceless, and expose yourselves naked to the armed and powerful. Is not this a conduct of unexampled absurdity? What barriers have you to oppose to this most strong, energetic government? To that government you have nothing to oppose. All your defence is given up. This is a real, actual defect. It must strike the mind of every gentleman. When our government was first instituted in Virginia, we declared the common law of England to be in force.

That system of law which has been admired, and has protected us and our ancestors, is excluded by that system. Added to this, we adopted a bill of rights. By this Constitution, some of the best barriers of human rights are thrown away. Is there not an additional reason to have a bill of rights? By the ancient common law, the trial of all facts is decided by a jury of impartial men from the immediate vicinage. This paper speaks of different juries from the common law in criminal cases; and in civil controversies excludes trial by jury altogether. There is, therefore, more occasion for the supplementary check of a bill of rights now than then. Congress, from their general powers, may fully go into business of human legislation. They may legislate, in criminal cases, from treason to the lowest offence — petty larceny. They may define crimes and prescribe punishments. In the definition of crimes, I trust they will be directed by what wise representatives ought to be governed by. But when we come to punishments, no latitude ought to be left, nor dependence put on the virtue of representatives. What says our bill of rights? — “that excessive bail ought not to be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.” Are you not, therefore, now calling on those gentlemen who are to compose Congress, to prescribe trials and define punishments without this control? Will they find sentiments there similar to this bill of rights? You let them loose; you do more — you depart from the genius of your country. That paper tells you that the trial of crimes shall be by jury, and held in the state where the crime shall have been committed. Under this extensive provision, they may proceed in a manner extremely dangerous to liberty: a person accused may be carried from one extremity of the state to another, and be tried, not by an impartial jury of the vicinage, acquainted with his character and the circumstances of the fact, but by a jury unacquainted with both, and who may be biased against him. Is not this sufficient to alarm men? How different is this from the immemorial practice of your British ancestors, and your own! I need not tell you that, by the common law, a number of hundredors were required on a jury, and that afterwards it was sufficient if the jurors came from the same county. With less than this the people of England have never been satisfied. That paper ought to have declared the common law in force.

In this business of legislation, your members of Congress will loose the restriction of not imposing excessive fines, demanding excessive bail, and inflicting cruel and unusual punishments. These are prohibited by your declaration of rights. What has distinguished our ancestors? — That they would not admit of tortures, or cruel and barbarous punishment. But Congress may introduce the practice of the civil law, in preference to that of the common law. They may introduce the practice of France, Spain, and Germany — of torturing, to extort a confession of the crime. They will say that they might as well draw examples from those countries as from Great Britain, and they will tell you that there is such a necessity of strengthening the arm of government, that they must have a criminal equity, and extort confession by torture, in order to punish with still more relentless severity. We are then lost and undone. And can any man think it troublesome, when we can, by a small interference, prevent our rights from being lost? If you will, like the Virginian government, give them knowledge of the extent of the rights retained by the people, and the powers of themselves, they will, if they be honest men, thank you for it. Will they not wish to go on sure grounds? But if you leave them otherwise, they will not know how to proceed; and, being in a state of uncertainty, they will assume rather than give up powers by implication.

A bill of rights may be summed up in a few words. What do they tell us? — That our rights are reserved. Why not say so? Is it because it will consume too much paper? Gentlemen’s reasoning against a bill of rights does not satisfy me. Without saying which has the right side, it remains doubtful. A bill of rights is a favorite thing with the Virginians and the people of the other states likewise. It may be their prejudice, but the government ought to suit their geniuses; otherwise, its operation will be unhappy. A bill of rights, even if its necessity be doubtful, will exclude the possibility of dispute; and, with great submission, I think the best way is to have no dispute. In the present Constitution, they are restrained from issuing general warrants to search suspected places, or seize persons not named, without evidence of the commission of a fact, &c. There was certainly some celestial influence governing those who deliberated on that Constitution; for they have, with the most cautious and enlightened circumspection, guarded those indefeasible rights which ought ever to be held sacred! The officers of Congress may come upon you now, fortified with all the terrors of paramount federal authority. Excisemen may come in multitudes; for the limitation of their numbers no man knows. They may, unless the general government be restrained by a bill of rights, or some similar restriction, go into your cellars and rooms, and search, ransack, and measure, every thing you eat, drink, and wear. They ought to be restrained within proper bounds. With respect to the freedom of the press, I need say nothing; for it is hoped that the gentlemen who shall compose Congress will take care to infringe as little as possible the rights of human nature. This will result from their integrity. They should, from prudence, abstain from violating the rights of their constituents. They are not, however, expressly restrained. But whether they will intermeddle with that palladium of our liberties or not, I leave you to determine.

MR. GRAYSON thought it questionable whether rights not given up were reserved. A majority of the states, he observed, had expressly reserved certain important rights by bills of rights, and that in the Confederation there was a clause declaring expressly that every power and right not given up was retained by the states. It was the general sense of America that such a clause which was necessary; otherwise, why did they introduce a clause which was totally unnecessary? It had been insisted, he said, in many parts of America, that a bill of rights was only necessary between a prince and people, and not in such a government as this, which was a compact between the people themselves. This did not satisfy his mind; for so extensive was the power of legislation, in his estimation, that he doubted whether, when it was once given up, any thing was retained. He further remarked, that there were some negative clauses in the Constitution, which refuted the doctrine contended for by the other side. For instance; the 2d clause of the 9th section of the 1st article provided that “the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when, in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it.” And, by the last clause of the same section, “no title of nobility shall be granted by the United States.” Now, if these restrictions had not been here inserted, he asked whether Congress would not most clearly have had a right to suspend that great and valuable right, and to grant titles of nobility. When, in addition to these considerations, he saw they had an indefinite power to provide for the general welfare, he thought there were great reasons to apprehend great dangers. He thought, therefore, that there ought to be a bill of rights.

Elliot, vol. 3, pp. 441–49.

15.2.2.7.cJune 24, 1788

Mr. HENRY. … What is the inference when you enumerate the rights which you are to enjoy? That those not enumerated are relinquished.

Mr. HENRY. … Other essential rights—what are they? The world will say that you intend to give them up. When you go into an enumeration of your rights, and stop that enumeration, the inevitable conclusion is, that what is omitted is intended to be surrendered.

Mr. MADISON. With respect to the proposition of the honorable gentleman to my left, (Mr. Wythe) gentlemen apprehend that, by enumerating three rights, it implied there were no more. The observations made by a gentleman lately up, on that subject, correspond precisely with my opinion. That resolution declares that the powers granted by the proposed Constitution are the gift of the people, and may be resumed by them when perverted to their oppresion, and every power not granted thereby remains with the people, and at their will. It adds, likewise, that not right, of any denomination, can be cancelled, abridged, restrained, or modified, by the general government, or any of its officers, except in those instances in which power is given by the Constitution for these purposes. There cannot be a more positive and unequivocal declaration of the principle of the adoption — that everything not granted is reserved. This is obviously and self-evidently the case, without the declaration. Can the general government exercise any power not delegated? If an enumeration be made of our rights, will it not be implied that everything omitted is given to the general government? Has not the honorable gentleman himself admitted that an imperfect enumeration is dangerous? Does the Constitution say that they shall not alter the law of descents, or do those things which would subvert the whole system of the state laws? If it did, what was not excepted would be granted. Does it follow, from the omission of such restrictions, that they can exercise powers not delegated? The reverse of the proposition holds. The delegation alone warrants the exercise of any power.

15.2.4NEWSPAPERS AND PAMPHLETS

15.2.4.1John DeWitt, October 1787

The Compact itself is a recital upon paper of that proportion of the subject's natural rights, intended to be parted with, for the benefit of adverting to it in case of dispute. Miserable indeed would be the situation of those individual States who have not prefixed to their Constitutions a Bill of Rights, if, as a very respectable, learned Gentleman at the Southward observes, "the People, when they established the powers of legislation under their separate Governments, invested their Representatives with every right and authority which they did not, in explicit terms, reserve; and therefore upon every question, respecting the jurisdiction of the House of Assembly, if the Frame of Government is silent, the jurisdiction is efficient and complete." In other words, those powers which the people by their Constitutions expressly give them, they enjoy by positive grant, and those remaining ones, which they never meant to give them, and which the Constitutions say nothing about, they enjoy by tacit implication, so that by one means and by the other, they became possessed of the whole. — This doctrine is but poorly calculated for the meridian of America, where the nature of compact, the mode of construing them, and the principles upon which society is founded, are so accurately known and universally diffused. That insatiable thirst for unconditional controul over our fellow-creatures, and the facility of sounds to convey essentially different ideas, produced the first Bill of Rights ever prefixed to a Frame of Government. The people, altho' fully sensible that they reserved every title of power they did not expressly grant away, yet afraid that the words made use of, to express those rights so granted might convey more than they originally intended, they chose at the same moment to express in different language those rights which the agreement did not include, and which they never designed to part with, endeavoring thereby to prevent any cause for future altercation and the intrusion into society of that doctrine of tacit implication which has been the favorite theme of every tyrant from the origin of all governments to the present day.

15.2.4.2James Wilson, October 6, 1787

It will be proper however, before I enter into the refutation of the charges that are alledged, to mark the leading descrimination [sic] between the state constitutions, and the constitution of the United States. When the people established the powers of legislation under their separate governments, they invested their representatives with every right and authority which they did not in explicit terms reserve; and therefore upon every question, respecting the jurisdiction of the house of assembly, if the frame of government is silent, the jurisdiction is efficient and complete. But in delegating fœderal powers, another criterion was necessarily introduced, and the congressional authority is to be collected, not from tacit implication, but from the positive grant expressed in the instrument of union. Hence it is evident, that in the former case every thing which is not reserved is given, but in the latter the reverse of the proposition prevails, and every thing which is not given, is reserved. This distinction being recognized, will furnish an answer to those who think the omission of a bill of rights, a defect in the proposed constitution: for it would have been superfluous and absurd to have stipulated with a foederal body of our own creation, that we should enjoy those privileges, of which we are not divested either by the intention or the act, that has brought that body into existence.

15.2.4.3The Federal Farmer, No. 4, October 12, 1787

DEAR SIR, … It is said, that when the people make a constitution, and delegate powers, that all powers not delegated by them to those who govern, is reserved to the people; and that the people, in the present case, have reserved in themselves, and in there [sic] state governments, every right and power not expressly given by the federal constitution to those who shall administer the national government. It is said on the other hand, that the people, when they make a constitution, yield all power not expressly reserved to themselves. The truth is, in either case, it is mere matter of opinion, and men usually take either side of the argument, as will best answer their purposes: But the general assumption being, that men who govern, will, in doubtful cases, construe laws and constitutions most favourably for encreasing their own powers; all wise and prudent people, in forming constitutions, have drawn the line, and carefully described the powers parted with and the powers reserved.

Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 14, pp. 44–45.

15.2.4.4An Old Whig, No. 2, October 17, 1787

MR. PRINTER, … The principle is this: that "in delegating federal powers, the congressional authority is to be collected, not from tacit implication, but from the positive grant expressed in the instrument of union," "that everything which is not given is reserved." If this be a just representation of the matter, the authority of the several states will be sufficient to protect our liberties from the encroachments of Congress, without any continental bill of rights; unless the powers which are expressly given to Congress are too large.

[Philadelphia] Independent Gazetteer, Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 13, p. 400.

… We must consider this constitution, when adopted, as the supreme act of the people, and in construing it hereafter, we and our posterity must strictly adhere to the letter and spirit of it, and in no instance depart from them: … by the people's now establishing certain fundamental rights, it is strongly implied, that they are of opinion, that they would not otherwise be secured as a part of the federal system, or be regarded in the federal administration as fundamental. … — Further, the people, thus establishing some few rights, and remaining totally silent about others similarly circumstanced, the implication indubitably is, that they mean to relinquish the latter, or at least feel indifferent about them. Rights, therefore, inferred from general principles of reason, being precarious and hardly ascertainable in the common affairs of society, and the people, in forming a federal constitution, explicitly shewing they conceive these rights to be thus circumstanced, and accordingly proceed to enumerate and establish some of them, the conclusion will be, that they have established all which they esteem valuable and sacred. On every principle, then, the people especially having began, ought to go through enumerating, and establish particularly all the rights of individuals, which can by any possibility come in question in making and executing federal laws.

Storing, vol. 2, pp. 326–27.

15.2.4.6The Federalist, No. 84, May 28, 1788

I go further, and affirm that the bills of rights, in the sense and to the extent in which they are contended for, are not only unnecessary in the proposed Constitution, but would even be dangerous. They would contain various exceptions to powers not granted; and, on this very account, would afford a colorable pretext to claim more than were granted. For why declare that things shall not be done which there is no power to do? Why, for instance, should it be said that liberty of the press shall not be restrained, when no power is given by which restrictions may be imposed? I will not contend that such a provision would confer a regulating power; but it is evidence that it would furnish, to men disposed to usurp, a plausible pretense for claiming that power.

15.2.5LETTERS AND DIARIES

15.2.5.1George Washington to President of Congress, September 17, 1787

… Individuals entering into society, must give up a share of liberty to preserve the rest. The magnitude of the sacrifice must depend, as well on situation and circumstance, as on the object to be obtained. It is at all times difficult to draw with precision the line between those rights which must be surrendered, and those which may be reserved; and on the present occasion this difficulty was encreased [sic] by a difference among the several States as to their situation, extent, habits, and particular interests.

Kaminiski and Saladino, vol. 13, p. 211.

15.2.5.2James Madison to Thomas Jefferson, October 24, 1787

… A reform therefore which does not make provision for private rights, must be materially defective. The restraints agst. paper emissions, and violations of contracts are not sufficient. Supposing them to be effectual as far as they go, they are short of the mark. Injustice may be effected by such an infinitude of legislative expedients, that where the disposition exists it can only be controuled by some provision which reaches all cases whatsoever. The partial provision made, supposes the disposition which will evade it. … The great desideratum in Government is, so to modify the sovereignty as that it may be sufficiently neutral between different parts of the Society to controul one part from invading the rights of another, and at the same time sufficiently controuled itself, from setting up an interest adverse to that of the entire Society. …

Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 13, pp. 447, 449.

15.2.5.3Thomas Jefferson to James Madison, December 20, 1787

To say, as mr Wilson does that a bill of rights was not necessary because all is reserved in the case of the general government which is not given, while in the particular ones all is given which is not reserved, might do for the Audience to whom it was addressed, but is surely gratis dictum, opposed by strong inferences from the body of the instrument, as well as from the omission of the clause of our present confederation which had declared that in express terms. It was a hard conclusion to say because there has been no uniformity among the states as to cases triable by jury, because some have been so incautious as to abandon this mode of trial, therefore the more prudent states shall be reduced to the same level of calamity. It would have been much more just and wise to have concluded the other way that as most of the states had judiciously preserved this palladium, those who had wandered should be brought back to it, and to have established general right instead of wrong. Let me add that a bill of rights is what the people are entitled to against every government on earth, general or particular, and what no just government should refuse, or rest on inference.

Boyd, vol. 12, p. 440.

15.2.5.4 George Washington to Marquis de Lafayette, April 28, 1788

… For example: there was not a member of the convention, I believe, who had the least objection to what is contended for by the Advocates for a Bill of Rights and Tryal by Jury. The first, where the people evidently retained every thing which they did not in express terms give up, was considered nugatory as you will find to have been more fully explained by Mr. Wilson and others: — And as to the second, it was only the difficulty of establishing a mode which should not interfere with the fixed modes of any of the States, that induced the Convention to leave it, as a matter of future adjustment.

Kaminski and Saladino, vol. 17, p. 235.

15.2.5.5 James Madison to Thomas Jefferson, October 17, 1788

… It is true nevertheless that not a few, particularly in Virginia have contended for the proposed alterations from the most honorable & patriotic motives; and that among the advocates for the Constitution, there are some who wish for further guards to public liberty & individual rights. As far as these may consist of a constitutional declaration of the most essential rights, it is probable they will be added; though there are many who think such addition unnecessary, and not a few who think it misplaced in such a Constitution. There is scarce any point on which the party in opposition is so much divided as to its importance and its propriety. My own opinion has always been in favor of a bill of rights; provided it be so framed as not to imply powers not meant to be included in the enumeration. At the same time I have never thought the omission a material defect, nor been anxious to supply it even by subsequent amendment, for any other reason than that it is anxiously desired by others. I have favored it because I supposed it might be of use, and if properly executed could not be of disservice. I have not viewed it in an important light 1. because I conceive that in a certain degree, though not in the extent argued by Mr. Wilson, the rights in question are reserved by the manner in which the federal powers are granted. 2. because there is great reason to fear that a positive declaration of some of the most essential rights could not be obtained in the requisite latitude. I am sure that the rights of Conscience in particular, if submitted to public definition would be narrowed much more than they are likely ever to be by an assumed power. One of the objections in New England was that the Constitution by prohibiting religious tests opened a door for Jews Turks & infidels. 3. because the limited powers of the federal Government and the jealousy of the subordinate Governments, afford a security which has not existed in the case of the State Governments, and exists in no other. 4 because experience proves the inefficacy of a bill of rights on those occasions when its controul is most needed. Repeated violations of these parchment barriers have been committed by overbearing majorities in every State.

Rutland & Hobson, vol. 11, p. 297.

15.2.5.6Thomas Jefferson to James Madison, March 15, 1789

… In the arguments in favor of a declaration of rights, you omit one which has great weight to me, the legal check which it puts into the hands of the judiciary. This is a body, which if rendered independent, and kept strictly to their own department merits great confidence for their learning and integrity. … The Declaration of rights is like all other human blessings alloyed with some inconveniences, and not accomplishing fully it's [sic] object. But the good in this instance vastly overweighs the evil. I cannot refrain from making short answers to the objections which your letter states to have been raised. I. That the rights in question are reserved by the manner in which the federal powers are granted. Answer. a constitutive act may certainly be so formed as to need no declaration of rights. The act itself has the force of a declaration as far as it goes: and if it goes to all material points nothing more is wanting.

Boyd, vol. 14, pp. 659–60.

15.2.5.7Tench Coxe to James Madison, June 18, 1789

I observe you have brought forward the amendments you proposed to the federal Constitution. I have given them a very careful perusal, and have attended particularly to their reception by the public. The most decided friends of the constitution admit (generally) that they will meliorate the government by removing some points of litigation and jealousy, and by heightening and strengthening the barriers between necessary power and indispensable liberty. … Those who are honest are well pleased at the footing on which the press, liberty of conscience, original right & power, trial by jury &ca. are rested.

Veit, p. 253.

15.2.5.8Richard Parker to Richard Henry Lee, July 6, 1789

I observe the slip of the newspaper sent me and know the design, but I still think a Bill of rights not necessary here. … However I have no objection to such a bill of Rights as has been proposed by Mr. Maddison [sic] because we declare that we do not abridge our Rights by the reservation that we retain all that we have not specifically given. …

Veit, p. 260.

15.2.5.9Henry Gibbs to Roger Sherman, July 16, 1789

… All Ambiguity of Expression certainly ought to be remov'd; Liberty of Conscience in religious matters, right of trial by Jury, Liberty of the Press &c. may perhaps be more explicitly secur'd to the Subject & a general reservation made to the States respectively of all the powers not expressly delegated to the general Government. …

Veit, p. 263.

15.2.5.10William L. Smith to Edward Rutledge, August 10, 1789

… I shall support the Amendmts [sic] proposed to the Constitution that any exception to the powers of Congress shall not be so construed as to give it any powers not expressly given, & the enumeration of certain rights shall not be so construed as to deny others retained by the people — & the powers not delegated by this Constn. nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively. …

Veit, p. 273.

15.2.5.11James Madison to George Washington, December 5, 1789

[Randolph's] principle objection was pointed agst. the word 'retained,' in the eleventh proposed amendment [Ninth Amendment], and his argument if I understood it applied in this manner — that as the rights declared in the first ten of the proposed amendments were not all that a free people would require the exercise of, and that as there was no criterion by which it could be determined whether any other particular right was retained or not, it would be more safe and more consistent with the spirit of the 1st & 17th amendts. proposed by Virginia that this reservation agst. constructive power, should operate rather as a provision agst. extending the powers of Congs. by their own authority, than a protection to rights reducible to no definitive certainty. But others, among whom I am one, see not the force of this distinction. …

If a line can be drawn between the powers granted and the rights retained, it would seem to be the same thing whether the latter be secured by declaring that they shall not be abridged, or that the former shall not be extended. If no such line can be drawn, a declaration in either form would amount to nothing.

Hobson & Rutland, vol. 12, pp. 458–59.

15.3DISCUSSION OF RIGHTS

15.3.1.1Blackstone, 1765

> For the principal aim of society is to protect individuals in the enjoyment of those absolute rights, which were vested in them by the immutable laws of nature; but which could not be preserved in peace without that mutual assistance and intercourse, which is gained by the institution of friendly and social communities. Hence it follows, that the first and primary end of human laws is to maintain and regulate these absolute rights of individuals. Such rights as are social and relative result from, and are posterior to, the formation of states and societies: so that to maintain and regulate these, is clearly a subsequent consideration. And therefore the principle view of human laws is, or ought to be, to explain, protect, and enforce such rights as are absolute. …
>
> The absolute rights of man, considered as a free agent, endowed with discernment to know good from evil, and with power of choosing those measures which appear to him to be most desirable, are usually summed up in one general appellation, and denominated the natural liberty of mankind.

16.1.3.1DELAWARE, 1776

ART. 30. No article of the declaration of rights and fundamental rules of this state, agreed to by this convention, … ought ever be violated on any pretence whatever. No other part of this constitution shall be altered, changed or diminished without the consent of five parts in seven of the Assembly, and seven Members of the Legislative Council.

16.1.3.2Georgia, 1777

WHEREAS the conduct of the legislature of Great-Britain for many years past, has been so oppressive on the people of America, that of late years, they have plainly declared, and asserted a right to raise taxes upon the people of America, and to make laws to bind them in all cases whatsoever, without their consent; which conduct being repugnant to the common rights of mankind, hath obliged the Americans, as freemen, to oppose such oppressive measures, and to assert the rights and privileges they are entitled to, by the laws of nature and reason. …

Maryland Laws, November 3, 1776.

16.1.3.4Massachusetts: Constitution, 1780

Preamble.

THE end of the institution, maintenance, and administration of government, is to secure the existence of the body politick; to protect it; and to furnish the individuals who compose it, with the power of enjoying, in safety and tranquility, their natural rights, and the blessings of life: And whenever these great objects are not obtained, the people have a right to alter the government, and to take measures necessary for their safety, prosperity, and happiness.

PART I.

A Declaration Of The Rights Of The Inhabitants Of The Commonwealth Of Massachusetts.

ARTICLE

I. All men are born free and equal, and have certain natural, essential and unalienable rights: among which may be reckoned the right of enjoying and defending their lives and liberties: that of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property: in fine, that of seeking and obtaining their safety and happiness.

IV. The people of this Commonwealth, have the sole and exclusive right of governing themselves, as a free, sovereign, and independent state: and do, and forever herafter shall, exercise and enjoy every power, jurisdiction and right, which is not, or may not hereafter, be by them expressly delegated to the United States of America, in Congress assembled.

V. All power residing originally in the people, and being derived from them, the several magistrates and officers of government, vested with authority, whether legislative, executive, or judicial, are their substitutes and agents, and are at all times accountable to them.

VII. Government is instituted for the common good; for the protection, safety, prosperity and happiness of the people; and not for the profit, honour, or private interest of any one man, family, or class of men: Therefore the people alone have an incontestible, unalienable, and indefeasible right to institute government; and to reform, alter, or totally change the same, when their protection, safety, prosperity and happiness require it.

XXX. In the government of this Commonwealth, the legislative department shall never exercise the executive and judicial powers, or either of them: The executive shall never exercise the legislative and judicial powers, or either of them: The judicial shall never exercise the legislative and executive powers, or either of them: To the end it may be a government of laws and not of men.

Massachusetts Perpetual Laws, pp. 5–6, 8.

16.1.3.5New Hampshire: Constitution, 1783

[Part I, Article I.] All men are born equally free and independent; therefore, all government of right originates from the people, is founded in consent, and instituted for the general good.

II. All men have certain natural, essential, and inherent rights; among which are—the enjoying and defending life and liberty—acquiring, possessing and protecting property—and in a word, of seeking and obtaining happiness.

III. When men enter into a state of society, they surrender up some of their natural rights to society, in order to secure the protection of others; and, without such an equivalent, the surrender is void.

IV. Among the natural rights, some are in their very nature unalienable, because no equivalent can be given or received for them. Of this kind are the RIGHTS OF CONSCIENCE.

VII. The people of this State, have the sole and exclusive right of governing themselves as a free, sovereign, and independent State, and do, and forever hereafter shall, exercise, and enjoy every power, jurisdiction and right pertaining thereto, which is not, or may not hereafter be by them expressly delegated to the United States of America in Congress assembled.

16.1.3.9Pennsylvania

16.1.3.9.aConstitution, 1776

WHEREAS all government ought to be instituted and supported for the security and protection of the community as such, and to enable the individuals who compose it to enjoy their natural rights, and the other blessings which the author of existence has bestowed upon man; and whenever these great ends of government are not obtained, the people have a right, by common consent to change it, and take such measures as to them may appear necessary to promote their safety and happiness. And whereas the inhabitants of this commonwealth have, in consideration of protection only, heretofore acknowledged allegiance to the king of Great Britain: and the said king has not only withdrawn that protection, but commenced, and still continues to carry on, with unabated vengeance, a most cruel and unjust war against them employing therein, not only the troops of Great Britain, but foreign mercenaries, savages and slaves, for the avowed purpose of reducing them to a total and abject submission to the despotic domination of the British parliament, with many other acts of tyranny, (more fully set forth in the declaration of congress) whereby all allegiance and fealty to the said king and his successors, are dissolved and at an end, and all power and authority derived from him ceased in these colonies. And whereas it is absolutely necessary for the welfare and safety of the inhabitants of said colonies, that they be henceforth free and independent states, and that just, permanent, and proper forms of government exist in every part of them derived from and founded on the authority of the people only, agreeable to the directions of the honourable American congress. We, the representatives of the freemen of Pennsylvania, in general convention met, for the express purpose of framing such a government, confessing the goodness of the great Governor of the universe (who alone knows to what degree of earthly happiness mankind may attain, by perfecting the arts of government) in permitting the people of this state, by common consent, and without violence, deliberately to form for themselves such just rules as they shall think best, for governing their future society; and being fully convinced, that it is our indispensible duty to establish such original principles of government, as will best promote the general happiness of the people of this state, and their posterity, and provide for future improvements, without partiality for, or prejudice against any particular class, sect, or denomination of men whatever, do, by virtue of the authority vested in us by our constituents, ordain, declare, and establish, the following Declaration of Rights, and Frame of Government, to be the Constitution of this commonwealth, and to remain in force therein for ever, unaltered, except in such articles as shall hereafter on experience be found to require improvement, and which shall by the same authority of the people, fairly delegated as this frame of government directs, be amended or improved for the more effectual obtaining and securing the great end and design of all government, herein before mentioned.

CHAPTER I.

A DECLARATION of the RIGHTS of the Inhabitants of the State of Pennsylvania.

I. THAT all men are born equally free and independent, and have certain natural, inherent and unalienable rights, amongst which are, the enjoying and defending life and liberty, acquiring, possessing and protecting property, and pursuing and obtaining happiness and safety.

IV. That all power being originally inherent in, and consequently derived from, the people; therefore all officers of government, whether legislative or executive, are their trustees and servants, and at all times accountable to them.

V. That government is, or ought to be, instituted for the common benefit, protection and security of the people, nation or community; and not for the particular emolument or advantage of any single man, family, or set of men, who are a part only of that community: And that the community hath an indubitable, unalienable and indefeasible right to reform, alter or abolish government in such manner as shall be by that community judged most conducive to the public weal.

ARTICLE IX.

THAT the general, great, and essential Principles of Liberty and free Government may be recognized and unalterably established, WE DECLARE, SECTION I. THAT all men are born equally free and independent, and have certain inherent and indefeasible rights, among which are those of enjoying and defending life and liberty, of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property and reputation, and of pursuing their own happiness.

SECT. II. That all power is inherent in the people, and all free governments are founded on their authority, and instituted for their peace, safety and happiness: For the advancement of those ends they have, at all times, an unalienable and indefeasible right to alter, reform, or abolish their government, in such manner as they may think proper.

SECT. XXVI. To guard against transgressions of the high powers which we have delegated, WE DECLARE, That every thing in this article is excepted out of the general powers of government, and shall for ever remain inviolate.

It having been found from universal experience that the most express declarations and reservations are necessary to protect the just rights and liberty of mankind from the silent, powerful and ever active conspiracy of those who govern; and it appearing to be the sense of the good people of America, by the various bills or declarations of rights whereon the governments of the greater number of the states are founded. That such precautions are necessary to restrain and regulate the exercise of the great powers given to rulers. 16.2DISCUSSION OF DRAFTS AND PROPOSALS

16.2.1.1.a Mr. Jackson.

The more I consider the subject of amendments, the more, mr. speaker, I am convinced it is improper. I revere the rights of my constituents as much as any gentleman in congress, yet, I am against inserting a declaration of rights in the constitution, and that upon some of the reasons referred to by the gentleman last up. If such an addition is not dangerous or improper, it is at least unnecessary: that is a sufficient reason for not entering into the subject at a time when there are urgent calls for our attention to important business. Let me ask gentlemen, what reason there is for the suspicions which are to be removed by this measure? Who are congress that such apprehensions should be entertained of them? Do we not belong to the mass of the people? Is there a single right but, if infringed, will affect us and our connections as much as any other person? Do we not return at the expiration of two years into private life, and is not this a security against encroachment? Are we not sent here to guard those rights which might be endangered, if the government was an aristocracy or a despotism? View for a moment the situation of Rhode-Island and, say whether the people's rights are more safe under state legislatures than under a government of limited powers? Their liberty is changed to licentiousness. But do gentlemen suppose bills of rights necessary to secure liberty? If they do, let them look at New York, New Jersey, Virginia, South Carolina, and Georgia. Those states have no bills of rights, and are the liberty of the citizens less safe in those states, than in the other of the United States? I believe they are not.

There is a maxim in law, and it will apply to bills of rights, that when you enumerate exceptions, the exceptions operate to the exclusion of all circumstances that are omitted; consequently, unless you except every right from the grant of power, those omitted are inferred to be resigned to the discretion of the government.

Congressional Register, June 8, 1789, vol. 1, p. 437.

16.2.1.1.b Mr. Jackson observed, That the Hon. Gentleman's ingenious detail, so far from convincing him of the expediency of bringing forward the subject of amendments at this time, had confirmed him in the contrary opinion: The prospect which such a discussion opened, was wide and extensive, and would preclude other benefits, of much greater moment, at the present juncture — He differed widely from the Gentleman, with regard to bills of rights — several of the States had no such bills — Rhode-Island had none — there, liberty was carried to excess, and licentiousness triumphed — In some States, which had such a nominal security, the encroachments upon the rights of the people had been most complained of. …

Gazette of U.S., June 10, 1787, p. 67, col. 2.

Mr. Hartley

Observed that it had been asserted in the convention of Pennsylvania, by the friends of the Constitution, that all the rights and powers that were not given to the government, were retained by the states and the people thereof; this was also his own opinion, but as four or five states had required to be secured in those rights by an express declaration in the constitution, he was disposed to gratify them; he thought every thing that was not incompatible with the general good ought to be granted, if it would tend to obtain the confidence of the people in the government, and, upon the whole, he thought these words were as necessary to be inserted in the declaration of rights as most in the clause.

Congressional Register, August 15, 1789, vol. 2, pp. 198–99.

16.2.1.3August 18, 1789

16.2.1.3.a The 9th proposition, in the words following was considered, "The powers not delegated by the constitution, nor prohibited by it to the states, are reserved to the states respectively."

Mr. Tucker

Proposed to amend the proposition, by prefixing to it, "all powers being derived from the people," thought this a better place to make this assertion than the introductory clause of the constitution, where a similar sentiment was proposed by the committee. He extended his motion also, to add the word "expressly," so as to read "The powers not expressly delegated by this constitution."

Mr. Madison

Objected to this amendment, because it was impossible to confine a government to the exercise of express powers, there must necessarily be admitted powers by implication, unless the constitution descended to recount every minutiae. He remembered the word "expressly" had been moved in the convention of Virginia, by the opponents to the ratification, and after full and fair discussion was given up by them, and the system allowed to retain its present form.

Mr. Sherman

Coincided with mr. Madison in opinion, observing that corporate bodies are supposed to possess all powers incident to a corporate capacity, without being absolutely expressed.

Mr. Tucker

Did not view the word "expressly" in the same light with the gentleman who opposed him; he thought every power to be expressly given that could be clearly comprehended within any accurate definition of the general power.

Mr. Tucker's motion being negatived,

Mr. yarroll proposed to add to the end of the proposition, "or to the people," this was agreed to.

Congressional Record, August 18, 1789, vol. 2, pp. 234–35.

16.2.1.3.b 18th Amendment: "The powers not delegated by this Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively."

Mr. Tucker proposed an introductory clause to this amendment, viz. all power being derived from the people.

Mr. Madison objected to this, as confining the government within such limits as to admit of no implied powers, and I believe, he said, that no government ever existed which was not necessarily obliged to exercise powers by implication. This question was agitated in the Convention of Virginia; it was brought forward by those who were opposed to the Constitution, and was finally given up by them.

Mr. Sherman observed, that all corporations are supposed to possess all the powers incidental to their corporate capacity: It is not in human wisdom to provide for every possible contingency.

This motion was negatived.

Mr. Gerry then proposed to add, after the word "States," and people thereof.

Mr. Carroll objected to the addition, as it tended to create a distinction between the people and their legislatures.

The motion was negatived, and the amendment agreed to.

16.2.1.4August 21, 1789

The house proceeded in the consideration of the amendments to the constitution reported by the committee of the whole. …

The 9th proposition, mr. Gerry proposed to amend by inserting the word "expressly" so as to read the powers not expressly delegated by the constitution, nor prohibited to the states, are reserved to the states respectively or to the people; as he thought this an amendment of great importance, he requested the ayes and noes might be taken. He was supported in this by one fifth of the members present, whereupon they were taken. …

Mr. Sherman

Moved to alter the last clause so as to make it read, the powers not delegated to the United States, by the constitution, nor prohibited by it to the states, are reserved to the states respectively, or to the people.

The motion was adopted without debate.

Rev. Mr. THACHER. … There are other restraints, which, though not directly named in this Constitution, yet are evidently discerned by every man of common observation. These are, the government of the several states, and the spirit of liberty in the people.

Mr. PARSONS demonstrated the impracticability of forming a bill, in a national constitution, for securing individual rights, and showed the inutility of the measure, from the ideas, that no power was given to Congress to infringe on any one of the natural rights of the people by this Constitution; and, should they attempt it without constitutional authority, the act would be a nullity, and could not be enforced.

Elliot, vol. 2, pp. 161–62.

16.2.2.2New York, July 1, 1788

Mr. TREDWELL. Sir, little accustomed to speak in public, and always inclined, in such an assembly as this, to be a hearer rather than a speaker, on a less important occasion than the present I should have contented myself with a silent vote; but when I consider the nature of this dispute, that it is a contest, not between little states and great states, (as we have been told,) between little folks and great folks, between patriotism and ambition, between freedom and power; not so much between the navigating and the non-navigating individuals, (for not one of the amendments we contend for has the least reference to the clashing interests of the states;) when I consider, likewise, that a people jealous of their liberties, and strongly attached to freedom, have reposed so entire a confidence in this assembly, that upon our determination depends their future enjoyment of those invaluable rights and privileges, which they have so lately and so gallantly defended at every risk and expense, both of life and property, — it appears to me so interesting and important, that I cannot be totally silent on the occasion, lest lisping babes should be taught to curse my name, as a betrayer of their freedom and happiness.

The gentleman who first opened this debate did (with an emphasis which I believe convinced every one present of the propriety of the advice) urge the necessity of proceeding, in our deliberations on this important subject, coolly and dispassionately. With how much candor this advice was given, appears from the subsequent parts of a long speech, and from several subsequent speeches almost totally addressed to our fears. The people of New Jersey and Connecticut are so exceedingly exasperated against us, that, totally regardless of their own preservation, they will take the two rivers of Connecticut and Delaware by their extremities, and, by dragging them over our country, will, by a sweeping deluge, wash us all into the Hudson, leaving neither house nor inhabitant behind them. But if this event should not happen, doubtless the Vermontese, with the British and tories our natural enemies, would, by bringing down upon us the great Lake Ontario, sweep hills and mountains, houses and inhabitants, in one deluge, into the Atlantic. These, indeed, would be terrible calamities; but terrible as they are, they are not to be compared with the horrors and desolation of tyranny. The arbitrary courts of Philip in the Netherlands, in which life and property were daily confiscated without a jury, occasioned as much misery and a more rapid depopulation of the province, before the people took up arms in their own defence, than all the armies of that haughty monarch were able to effect afterwards; and it is doubtful, in my mind, whether governments, by abusing their powers, have not occasioned as much misery and distress, and nearly as great devastations of the human species, as all the wars which have happened since Milton's battle of the angels to the present day. The end or design of government is, or ought to be, the safety, peace, and welfare of the governed. Unwise, therefore, and absurd in the highest degree, would be the conduct of that people, who, in forming a government, should give to their rulers power to destroy them and their property, and thereby defeat the very purpose of their institutions; or, in other words, should give unlimited power to their rulers, and not retain in their own hands the means of their own preservation. The first governments in the world were parental, the powers of which were restrained by the laws of nature; and doubtless the early succeeding governments were formed on the same plan, which, we may suppose, answered tolerably well in the first ages of the world, while the moral sense was strong, and the laws of nature well understood, there being then no lawyers to explain them away. But in after times, when kings became great, and courts crowded, it was discovered that governments should have a right to tyrannize, and a power to oppress; and at the present day, when the juris periti are become so skilful in their profession, and quibbling is reduced to a science, it is become extremely difficult to form a constitution which will secure liberty and happiness to the people, or laws under which property is safe. Hence, in modern times, the design of the people, in forming an original constitution of government, is not so much to give powers to their rulers, as to guard against the abuse of them; but, in a federal one, it is different.

Sir, I introduce these observations to combat certain principles which have been daily and confidently advanced by the favorers of the present Constitution, and which appear to me totally indefensible. The first and grand leading, or rather misleading, principle in this debate, and on which the advocates for this system of unrestricted powers must chiefly depend for its support, is that, in forming a constitution, whatever powers are not expressly granted or given the government, are reserved to the people, or that rulers cannot exercise any powers but those expressly given to them by the Constitution. Let me ask the gentleman who advanced this principle, whether the commission of a Roman dictator, which was in these few words—to take care that the state received no harm — does not come up fully to their ideas of an energetic government; or whether an invitation from the people to one or more to come and rule over them, would not clothe the rulers with sufficient powers. If so, the principle they advance is a false one. Besides, the absurdity of this principle will evidently appear, when we consider the great variety of objects to which the powers of the government must necessarily extend, and that an express enumeration of them all would probably fill as many volumes as Pool's Synopsis of the Critics. But we may reason with sufficient certainty on the subject, from the sense of all the public bodies in the United States, who had occasion to form new constitutions. They have uniformly acted upon a direct and contrary principle, not only in forming the state constitutions and the old Confederation, but also in forming this very Constitution, for we do not find in every state constitution express resolutions made in favor of the people; and it is clear that the late Convention at Philadelphia, whatever might have been the sentiments of some of its members, did not adopt the principle, for they have made certain reservations and restrictions, which, upon that principle, would have been totally useless and unnecessary; and can it be supposed that wise body, whose only apology for the great ambiguity of many parts of that performance, and the total omission of some things which many esteem essential to the security of liberty, was a great desire of brevity, should so far sacrifice that great and important object, as to insert a number of provisions which they esteemed totally useless? Why is it said that the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless, in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it? What clause in the Constitution, except this very clause itself, gives the general government a power to deprive us of that great privilege, so sacredly secured to us by our state constitutions? Why is it provided that no bill of attainder shall be passed, or that no title of nobility shall be granted? Are there any clauses in the Constitution extending the powers of the general government to these objects? Some gentlemen say that these, though not necessary, were inserted for greater caution. I could have wished, sir, that a greater caution had been used to secure to us the freedom of election, a sufficient and responsible representation, the freedom of the press, and the trial by jury both in civil and criminal cases.

These, sir, are the rocks on which the Constitution should have rested; no other foundation can any man lay, which will secure the sacred temple of freedom against the power of the great, the undermining arts of ambition, and the blasts of profane scoffers — for such there will be in every age — who will tell us that all religion is in vain; that is, that our political creeds, which have been handed down to us by our forefathers as sacredly as our Bibles, and for which more of them have suffered martyrdom than for the creed of the apostles, are all nonsense; who will tell us that paper constitutions are mere paper, and that parchment is but parchment, that jealousy of our rulers is a sin, &c. I could have wished also that sufficient caution had been used to secure to us our religious liberties, and to have prevented the general government from tyrannizing over our consciences by a religious establishment — a tyranny of all others most dreadful, and which will assuredly be exercised whenever it shall be thought necessary for the promotion and support of their political measures. It is ardently to be wished, sir, that these and other invaluable rights of freemen had been as cautiously secured as some of the paltry local interests of some of the individual states. But it appears to me, that, in forming this Constitution, we have run into the same error which the lawyers and Pharisees of old were charged with; that is, while we have secured the tithes of mint, anise, and cumin, we have neglected the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy, and faith. …

In this Constitution, sir, we have departed widely from the principles and political faith of ‘76, when the spirit of liberty ran high, and danger put a curb on ambition. Here we find no security for the rights of individuals, no security for the existence of our state governments; here is no bill of rights, no proper restriction of power; our lives, our property, and our consciences, are left wholly at the mercy of the legislature, and the powers of the judiciary may be extended to any degree short of almighty. Sir, in this Constitution we have not only neglected, — we have done worse, — we have openly violated, our faith, — that is our public faith.

Respecting the power to make all laws necessary for the carrying the Constitution into execution,—

“Provided, That no power shall be exercised by Congress, but such as is expressly given by this Constitution; and all others, not expressly given, shall be reserved to the respective states, to be by them exercised.”

16.2.2.3.aJuly 29, 1788

Mr. MACLAINE. Mr. Chairman, I beg leave to make a few observations. One of the gentleman’s objections to the Constitution now under consideration is, that it is not the act of the states, but of the people; but that it ought to be the act of the states; and he instances the delegation of power by the states to the Confederation, at the commencement of the war, as a proof of this position. I hope, sir, that all power is in the people, and not in the state governments. If he will not deny the authority of the people to delegate power to agents, and to devise such a government as a majority of them thinks will promote their happiness, he will withdraw his objection. The people, sir, are the only proper authority to form a government. They, sir, have formed their state governments, and can alter them at pleasure.

Their transcendent power is competent to form this or any other government which they think promotive of their happiness. But the gentleman contends that there ought to be a bill of rights, or something of that kind — something declaring expressly, that all power not expressly given to the Constitution ought to be retained by the states; and he produces the Confederation as an authority for its necessity. When the Confederation was made, we were by no means so well acquainted with the principles of government as we are now. We were then jealous of the power of our rulers, and had an idea of the British government when we entertained that jealousy. There is no people on earth so well acquainted with the nature of government as the people of America generally are. We know now that it is agreed upon by most writers, and men of judgment and reflection, that all power is in the people, and immediately derived from them. The gentleman surely must know that, if there be certain rights which never can, nor ought to, be given up, these rights cannot be said to be given away, merely because we have omitted to say that we have not given them up. Can any security arise from declaring that we have a right to what belongs to us? Where is the necessity of such a declaration? If we have this inherent, this unalienable, this indefeasible title to those rights, if they are not given up, are they not retained? If Congress should make a law beyond the powers and the spirit of the Constitution, should we not say to Congress, “You have no authority to make this law. There are limits beyond which you cannot go. You cannot exceed the power prescribed by the Constitution. You are amenable to us for your conduct. This act is unconstitutional. We will disregard it, and punish you for the attempt.”

But the gentleman seems to be most tenacious of the judicial power of the states. The honorable gentleman must know, that the doctrine of reservation of power not relinquished, clearly demonstrates that the judicial power of the states is not impaired. …

Mr. SPENCER answered, that the gentleman last up had misunderstood him. He did not object to the caption of the Constitution, but he instanced it to show that the United States were not, merely as states, the objects of the Constitution; but that the laws of Congress were to operate upon individuals, and not upon states. He then continued: I do not mean to contend that the laws of the general government should not operate upon individuals. I before observed that this was necessary, as laws could not be put in execution against states without the agency of the sword, which, instead of answering the ends of government, would destroy it. I endeavored to show that, as the government was not to operate against states, but against individuals, the rights of individuals ought to be properly secured. In order to constitute this security, it appears to me there ought to be such a clause in the Constitution as there was in the Confederation, expressly declaring, that every power, jurisdiction, and right, which are not given up by it, remain in the states. Such a clause would render a bill of rights unnecessary. But as there is no such clause, I contend that there should be a bill of rights, ascertaining and securing the great rights of the states and people. Besides my objection to the revision of facts by the federal court, and the insecurity of jury trial, I consider the concurrent jurisdiction of those courts with the state courts as extremely dangerous. …

> Mr. WILSON. …In a government possessed of enumerated powers, such a measure [adopting a bill of rights] would be not only unnecessary, but preposterous and dangerous. Whence comes this notion, that in the United States there is no security without a bill of rights? Have the citizens of South Carolina no security for their liberties? They have no bill of rights. Are the citizens on the eastern side of the Delaware less free, or less secured in their liberties, than those on the western side? The state of New Jersey has no bill of rights. The state of New York has no bill of rights. The states of Connecticut and Rhode Island have no bill of rights. I know not whether I have exactly enumerated the states who have not thought it necessary to add a bill of rights to their constitutions; but this enumeration, sir, will serve to show by experience, as well as principle, that, even in single governments, a bill of rights is not an essential or necessary measure. But in a government consisting of enumerated powers, such as is proposed for the United States, a bill of rights would not only be unnecessary, but, in my humble judgement, highly imprudent. In all societies, there are many powers and rights which cannot be particularly enumerated. A bill of rights annexed to a constitution is an enumeration of the powers reserved. If we attempt an enumeration, every thing that is not enumerated is presumed to be given. The consequence is, that an imperfect enumeration would throw all implied power into the scale of the government, and the rights of the people would be rendered incomplete. On the other hand, an imperfect enumeration of the powers of government reserves all implied power to the people; and by that means the constitution becomes incomplete. But of the two, it is much safer to run the risk on the side of the constitution; for an omission in the enumeration of the powers of government is neither so dangerous nor important as an omission in the enumeration of the rights of the peop e. [sic]

> Mr. WILSON. … I consider that there are very few who understand the whole of these rights. All the political writers, from Grotius and Puffendorf down to Vattel, have treated on this subject; but in no one of those books, nor in the aggregate of them all, can you find a complete enumeration of rights appertaining to the people as men and as citizens.

… Enumerate all the rights of men! I am sure, sir, that no gentleman in the late Convention would have attempted such a thing. …

Sir, I think there is another subject with regard to which this Constitution deserves approbation. I mean the accuracy with which the line is drawn between the powers of the general government and those of the particular state governments. We have heard some general observations, on this subject, from the gentlemen who conduct the opposition. They have asserted that these powers are unlimited and undefined. These words are as easily pronounced as limited and defined. They have already been answered by my honorable colleague, (Mr. M'Kean;) therefore I shall not enter into an explanation. But it is not pretended that the line is drawn with mathematical precision; the inaccuracy of language must, to a certain degree, prevent the accomplishment of such a desire. Whoever views the matter in a true light, will see that the powers are as minutely enumerated and defined as was possible, and will also discover that the general clause, against which so much exception is taken, is nothing more than what was necessary to render effectual the particular powers that are granted.

But let us suppose — and the supposition is very easy in the minds of the gentlemen on the other side — that there is some difficulty in ascertaining where the true line lies. Are we therefore thrown into despair? Are disputes between the general government and the state governments to be necessarily the consequence of inaccuracy? I hope, sir, they will not be the enemies of each other, or resemble comets in conflicting orbits, mutually operating destruction; but that their motion will be better represented by that of the planetary system, where each part moves harmoniously within its proper sphere, and no injury arises by interference or opposition. Every part, I trust, will be considered as a part of the United States. Can any cause of distrust arise here? Is there any increase of risk? Or, rather, are not the enumerated powers as well defined here, as in the present Articles of Confederation?

PROCEEDINGS OF THE MEETING [of citizens] AT HARRISBURG, IN PENNSYLVANIA

We, the conferees, … agree in opinion, —…

I. That Congress shall not exercise any powers whatever, but such as are expressly given to that body by the Constitution of the United States: nor shall any authority, power, or jurisdiction, be assumed or exercised by the executive or judiciary departments of the Union, under color or pretense of construction or fiction; but all the rights of sovereignty, which are not by the said Constitution expressly and plainly vested in the Congress, shall be deemed to remain with, and shall be exercised by, the several states in the Union, according to their respective constitutions; and that every reserve of the rights of individuals, made by the several constitutions of the states in the Union, to the citizens and inhabitants of each state respectively, shall remain inviolate, except so far as they are expressly and manifestly yielded or narrowed by the national Constitution.

MR. IREDELL. … The gentleman says that unalienable rights ought not to be given up. Those rights which are unalienable are not alienated. They still remain with the great body of the people. If any right be given up that ought not to be, let it be shown. Say it is a thing which affects your country, and that it ought not to be surrendered: this would be reasonable. But when it is evident that the exercise of any power not given up would be a usurpation, it would be not only useless, but dangerous, to enumerate a number of rights which are not intended to be given up; because it would be implying, in the strongest manner, that every right not included in the exception might be impaired by the government without usurpation; and it would be impossible to enumerate every one. Let anyone make what collection or enumeration of rights he pleases, I will immediately mention twenty or thirty more rights not contained in it.

MR. BLOODWORTH. … By its not being provided for, it is expressly provided against. I still see the necessity of a bill of rights. Gentlemen use contradictory arguments on this subject, if I recollect right. Without the most express restrictions, Congress may trample on your rights. Every possible precaution should be taken when we grant powers. Rulers are always disposed to abuse them.

Mr. HENRY. … When we see men of such talents and learning compelled to use their utmost abilities to convince themselves that there is no danger, is it not sufficient to make us tremble? Is it not sufficient to fill the minds of the ignorant part of men with fear? If gentlemen believe that the apprehensions of men will be quieted, they are mistaken, since our best-informed men are in doubt with respect to the security of our rights. Those who are not so well informed will spurn at the government. When our common citizens, who are not possessed with such extensive knowledge and abilities, are called upon to change their bill of rights (which, in plain, and unequivocal terms, secure their most valuable rights and privileges) for construction and implication, will they implicitly acquiesce? Our declaration of rights tells us that "all men are by nature free and independent," &c. … Will they exchange these rights for logical reasons?

Mr. GEORGE MASON. Mr. Chairman, gentlemen say there is no new power given by this clause. Is there any thing in this Constitution which secures to the states the powers which are said to be retained? Will powers remain to the states which are not expressly guarded and reserved? I will suppose a case. Gentlemen may call it an impossible case, and suppose that Congress will act with wisdom and integrity. Among the enumerated powers, Congress are to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, and to pay the debts, and to provide for the general welfare and common defence; and by that clause (so often called the sweeping clause) they are to make all laws necessary to execute those laws. Now, suppose oppression should arise under this government, and any writer should dare to stand forth, and expose to the community at large the abuses of those powers; could not Congress, under the idea of providing for the general welfare, and under their own construction, say that this was destroying the general peace, encouraging sedition, and poisoning the minds of the people? And could they not, in order to provide against this, lay a dangerous restriction on the press? Might they not even bring the trial of this restriction within the ten miles square, when there is no prohibition against it? Might they not thus destroy the trial by jury? Would they not extend their implication? It appears to me that they may and will. And shall the support of our rights depend on the bounty of men whose interest it may be to oppress us? That Congress should have power to provide for the general welfare of the Union, I grant. But I wish a clause in the Constitution, with respect to all powers which are not granted, that they are retained by the states. Otherwise, the power of providing for the general welfare may be perverted to its destruction.

Many gentlemen, whom I respect, take different sides of this question. We wish this amendment to be introduced, to remove our apprehensions. There was a clause in the Confederation reserving to the states respectively every power, jurisdiction, and right, not expressly delegated to the United States. This clause has never been complained of, but approved by all. Why not, then, have a similar clause in this Constitution, in which it is the more indispensably necessary than in the Confederation, because of the great augmentation of power vested in the former? In my humble apprehension, unless there be some such clear and finite expression, this clause now under consideration will go to any thing our rulers may think proper. Unless there be some express declaration that every thing not given is retained, it will be carried to any power Congress may please.

Mr. HENRY moved to read from the 8th to the 13th article of the declaration of rights; which was done.

Mr. GEORGE NICHOLAS, in reply to the gentlemen opposed to the clause under debate, went over the same grounds, and developed the same principles, which Mr. Pendleton and Mr. Madison had done. The opposers of the clause, which gave the power of providing for the general welfare, supposed its dangers to result from its connection with, and extension of, the powers granted in the other clauses. He endeavored to show the committee that it only empowered Congress to make such laws as would be necessary to enable them to pay the public debts and provide for the common defence; that this general welfare was united, not to the general power of legislation, but to the particular power of laying and collecting taxes, imposts, and excises, for the purpose of paying the debts and providing for the common defence, — that is, that they could raise as much money as would pay the debts and provide for the common defence, in consequence of this power. The clause which was affectedly called the sweeping clause contained no new grant of power. To illustrate this position, he observed that, if it had been added at the end of every one of the enumerated powers, instead of being inserted at the end of all, it would be obvious to any one that it was no augmentation of power. If, for instance, at the end of the clause granting power to lay and collect taxes, it had been added that they should have power to make necessary and proper laws to lay and collect taxes, who could suspect it to be an addition of power? As it would grant no new power if inserted at the end of each clause, it could not when subjoined to the whole.

He then proceeded thus: But, says he, who is to determine the extent of such powers? I say, the same power which, in all well-regulated communities, determines the extent of legislative powers. If they exceed these powers, the judiciary will declare it void, or else the people will have a right to declare it void. Is this depending on any man? But, says the gentleman, it may go to any thing. It may destroy the trial by jury; and they may say it is necessary for providing for the general defence. The power of providing for the general defence only extends to raise any sum of money they may think necessary, by taxes, imposts, &c. But, says he, our only defence against oppressive laws consists in the virtue of our representatives. This was misrepresented. If I understand it right, no new power can be exercised. As to those which are actually granted, we trust to the fellow-feelings of our representatives; and if we are deceived, we then trust to altering our government. It appears to me, however, that we can confide in their discharging their powers rightly, from the peculiarity of their situation, and connection with us. If, sir, the powers of the former Congress were very inconsiderable, that body did not deserve to have great powers.

It was so constructed that it would be dangerous to invest it with such. But why were the articles of the bill of rights read? Let him show us that those rights are given up by the Constitution. Let him prove them to be violated. He tells us that the most worthy characters of the country differ as to the necessity of a bill of rights. It is a simple and plain proposition. It is agreed upon by all that the people have all power. If they part with any of it, is it necessary to declare that they retain the rest? Liken it to any similar case. If I have one thousand acres of land, and I grant five hundred acres of it, must I declare that I retain the other five hundred? Do I grant the whole thousand acres, when I grant five hundred, unless I declare that the five hundred I do not give belong to me still? It is so in this case. After granting some powers, the rest must remain with the people.

Gov. RANDOLPH observed that he had some objections to the clause. He was persuaded that the construction put upon it by the gentlemen, on both sides, was erroneous; but he thought any construction better than going into anarchy.

Mr. GEORGE MASON still thought that there ought to be some express declaration in the Constitution, asserting that rights not given to the general government were retained by the states. He apprehended that, unless this was done, many valuable and important rights would be concluded to be given up by implication. All governments were drawn from the people, though many were perverted to their oppression. The government of Virginia, he remarked, was drawn from the people; yet there were certain great and important rights, which the people, by their bill of rights, declared to be paramount to the power of the legislature. He asked, Why should it not be so in this Constitution? Was it because we were more substantially represented in it than in the state government? If, in the state government, where the people were substantially and fully represented, it was necessary that the great rights of human nature should be secure from the encroachments of the legislature, he asked if it was not more necessary in this government, where they were but inadequately represented? He declared that artful sophistry and evasions could not satisfy him. He could see no clear distinction between rights relinquished by a positive grant, and lost by implication. Unless there were a bill of rights, implication might swallow up all our rights.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Chairman, the necessity of a bill of rights appears to me to be greater in this government than ever it was in any government before. I have observed already, that the sense of the European nations, and particularly Great Britain, is against the construction of rights being retained which are not expressly relinquished. I repeat, that all nations have adopted this construction — that all rights not expressly and unequivocally reserved to the people are impliedly and incidentally relinquished to rulers, as necessarily inseparable from the delegated powers. It is so in Great Britain; for every possible right, which is not reserved to the people by some express provision or compact, is within the king's prerogative. It is so in that country which is said to be in such full possession of freedom. It is so in Spain, Germany, and other parts of the world. Let us consider the sentiments which have been entertained by the people of America on this subject. At the revolution, it must be admitted that it was their sense to set down those great rights which ought, in all countries, to be held inviolable and sacred. Virginia did so, we all remember. She made a compact to reserve, expressly, certain rights.

When fortified with full, adequate, and abundant representation, was she satisfied with that representation? No. She most cautiously and guardedly reserved and secured those invaluable, inestimable rights and privileges, which no people, inspired with the least glow of patriotic liberty, ever did, or ever can, abandon. She is called upon now to abandon them, and dissolve that compact which secured them to her. She is called upon to accede to another compact, which most infallibly supersedes and annihilates her present one. Will she do it? This is the question. If you intend to reserve your unalienable rights, you must have the most express stipulation; for, if implication be allowed, you are ousted of those rights. If the people did not think it necessary to reserve them, they will be supposed to be given up. How were the congressional rights defined when the people of America united by a confederacy to defend their liberties and rights against the tyrannical attempts of Great Britain? The states were not then contented with implied reservation. No, Mr. Chairman. It was expressly declared in our Confederation that every right was retained by the states, respectively, which was not given up to the government of the United States. But there is no such thing here. You, therefore, by a natural and unavoidable implication, give up your rights to the general government.

Your own example furnishes an argument against it. If you give up these powers, without a bill of rights, you will exhibit the most absurd thing to mankind that ever the world saw — a government that has abandoned all its powers — the powers of direct taxation, the sword, and the purse. You have disposed them to Congress, without a bill of rights — without check, limitation, or control. And still you have checks and guards; still you keep barriers — pointed where? Pointed against your weakened, prostrated, enervated state government! You have a bill of rights to defend you against the state government, which is bereaved of all power, and yet you have none against Congress, though in full and exclusive possession of all power! You arm yourselves against the weak and defenseless, and expose yourselves naked to the armed and powerful. Is not this a conduct of unexampled absurdity? What barriers have you to oppose to this most strong, energetic government? To that government you have nothing to oppose. All your defence is given up. This is a real, actual defect. It must strike the mind of every gentleman. When our government was first instituted in Virginia, we declared the common law of England to be in force.

That system of law which has been admired, and has protected us and our ancestors, is excluded by that system. Added to this, we adopted a bill of rights. By this Constitution, some of the best barriers of human rights are thrown away. Is there not an additional reason to have a bill of rights? By the ancient common law, the trial of all facts is decided by a jury of impartial men from the immediate vicinage. This paper speaks of different juries from the common law in criminal cases; and in civil controversies excludes trial by jury altogether. There is, therefore, more occasion for the supplementary check of a bill of rights now than then. Congress, from their general powers, may fully go into business of human legislation. They may legislate, in criminal cases, from treason to the lowest offence — petty larceny. They may define crimes and prescribe punishments. In the definition of crimes, I trust they will be directed by what wise representatives ought to be governed by. But when we come to punishments, no latitude ought to be left, nor dependence put on the virtue of representatives. What says our bill of rights? — “that excessive bail ought not to be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.” Are you not, therefore, now calling on those gentlemen who are to compose Congress, to prescribe trials and define punishments without this control? Will they find sentiments there similar to this bill of rights? You let them loose; you do more — you depart from the genius of your country. That paper tells you that the trial of crimes shall be by jury, and held in the state where the crime shall have been committed. Under this extensive provision, they may proceed in a manner extremely dangerous to liberty: a person accused may be carried from one extremity of the state to another, and be tried, not by an impartial jury of the vicinage, acquainted with his character and the circumstances of the fact, but by a jury unacquainted with both, and who may be biased against him. Is this not sufficient to alarm men? How different is this from the immemorial practice of your British ancestors, and your own! I need not tell you that, by the common law, a number of hundredors were required on a jury, and that afterwards it was sufficient if the jurors came from the same county. With less than this the people of England have never been satisfied. That paper ought to have declared the common law in force.

In this business of legislation, your members of Congress will loose the restriction of not imposing excessive fines, demanding excessive bail, and inflicting cruel and unusual punishments. These are prohibited by your declaration of rights. What has distinguished our ancestors? — That they would not admit of tortures, or cruel and barbarous punishment. But Congress may introduce the practice of the civil law, in preference to that of the common law. They may introduce the practice of France, Spain, and Germany — of torturing, to extort a confession of the crime. They will say that they might as well draw examples from those countries as from Great Britain, and they will tell you that there is such a necessity of strengthening the arm of government, that they must have a criminal equity, and extort confession by torture, in order to punish with still more relentless severity. We are then lost and undone. And can any man think it troublesome, when we can, by a small interference, prevent our rights from being lost? If you will, like the Virginian government, give them knowledge of the extent of the rights retained by the people, and the powers of themselves, they will, if they be honest men, thank you for it. Will they not wish to go on sure grounds? But if you leave them otherwise, they will not know how to proceed; and, being in a state of uncertainty, they will assume rather than give up powers by implication.

A bill of rights may be summed up in a few words. What do they tell us? — That our rights are reserved. Why not say so? Is it because it will consume too much paper? Gentlemen’s reasoning against a bill of rights does not satisfy me. Without saying which has the right side, it remains doubtful. A bill of rights is a favorite thing with the Virginians and the people of the other states likewise. It may be their prejudice, but the government ought to suit their geniuses; otherwise, its operation will be unhappy. A bill of rights, even if its necessity be doubtful, will exclude the possibility of dispute; and, with great submission, I think the best way is to have no dispute. In the present Constitution, they are restrained from issuing general warrants to search suspected places, or seize persons not named, without evidence of the commission of a fact, &c. There was certainly some celestial influence governing those who deliberated on that Constitution; for they have, with the most cautious and enlightened circumspection, guarded those indefeasible rights which ought ever to be held sacred! The officers of Congress may come upon you now, fortified with all the terrors of paramount federal authority. Excisemen may come in multitudes; for the limitation of their numbers no man knows. They may, unless the general government be restrained by a bill of rights, or some similar restriction, go into your cellars and rooms, and search, ransack, and measure, every thing you eat, drink, and wear. They ought to be restrained within proper bounds. With respect to the freedom of the press, I need say nothing; for it is hoped that the gentlemen who shall compose Congress will take care to infringe as little as possible the rights of human nature. This will result from their integrity. They should, from prudence, abstain from violating the rights of their constituents. They are not, however, expressly restrained. But whether they will intermeddle with that palladium of our liberties or not, I leave you to determine.

Mr. GRAYSON thought it questionable whether rights not given up were reserved. A majority of the states, he observed, had expressly reserved certain important rights by bills of rights, and that in the Confederation there was a clause declaring expressly that every power and right not given up was retained by the states. It was the general sense of America that such a clause was necessary; otherwise, why did they introduce a clause which was totally unnecessary? It had been insisted, he said, in many parts of America, that a bill of rights was only necessary between a prince and people, and not in such a government as this, which was a compact between the people themselves. This did not satisfy his mind; for so extensive was the power of legislation, in his estimation, that he doubted whether, when it was once given up, any thing was retained. He further remarked, that there were some negative clauses in the Constitution, which refuted the doctrine contended for by the other side. For instance; the 2d clause of the 9th section of the 1st article provided that “the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when, in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it.” And, by the last clause of the same section, “no title of nobility shall be granted by the United States.” Now, if these restrictions had not been here inserted, he asked whether Congress would not most clearly have had a right to suspend that great and valuable right, and to grant titles of nobility. When, in addition to these considerations, he saw they had an indefinite power to provide for the general welfare, he thought there were great reasons to apprehend great dangers. He thought, therefore, that there ought to be a bill of rights.

Mr. HENRY. … What is the inference when you enumerate the rights which you are to enjoy? That those not enumerated are relinquished.

Mr. HENRY. … Other essential rights — what are they? The world will say that you intended to give them up. When you go into an enumeration of your rights, and stop that enumeration, the inevitable conclusion is, that what is omitted is intended to be surrendered.

Mr. MADISON. … With respect to the proposition of the honorable gentleman to my left, (Mr. Wythe,) gentlemen apprehend that, by enumerating three rights, it implied there were no more. The observations made by a gentleman lately up, on that subject, correspond precisely with my opinion. That resolution declares that the powers granted by the proposed Constitution are the gift of the people, and may be resumed by them when perverted to their oppression, and every power not granted thereby remains with the people, and at their will. It adds, likewise, that no right, of any denomination, can be cancelled, abridged, restrained, or modified, by the general government, or any of its officers, except in those instances in which power is given by the Constitution for these purposes. There cannot be a more positive and unequivocal declaration of the principle of the adoption — that everything not granted is reserved. This is obviously and self-evidently the case, without the declaration. Can the general government exercise any power not delegated? If an enumeration be made of our rights, will it not be implied that every thing omitted is given to the general government? Has not the honorable gentleman himself admitted that an imperfect enumeration is dangerous? Does the Constitution say that they shall not alter the law of descents, or do those things which would subvert the whole system of the state laws? If it did, what was not excepted would be granted. Does it follow, from the omission of such restrictions, that they can exercise powers not delegated? The reverse of the proposition holds. The delegation alone warrants the exercise of any power.

16.2.4NEWSPAPERS AND PAMPHLETS

16.2.4.1John DeWitt, No. 2, October 1787

The Compact itself is a recital upon paper of that proportion of the subject's natural rights, intended to be parted with, for the benefit of adverting to it in case of dispute. Miserable indeed would be the situation of those individual States who have not prefixed to their Constitutions a Bill of Rights, if, as a very respectable, learned Gentleman at the Southward observes, "the People, when they established the powers of legislation under their separate Governments, invested their Representatives with every right and authority which they did not, in explicit terms, reserve; and therefore upon every question, respecting the jurisdiction of the House of Assembly, if the Frame of Government is silent, the jurisdiction is efficient and complete." In other words, those powers which the People by their Constitutions expressly give them, they enjoy by positive grant, and those remaining ones, which they never meant to give them, and which the Constitutions say nothing about, they enjoy by tacit implication, so that by one means and by the other, they become possessed of the whole. — This doctrine is but poorly calculated for the meridian of America, where the nature of compact, the mode of construing them, and the principles upon which society is founded, are so accurately known and universally diffused. That insatiable thirst for unconditional controul over our fellow-creatures, and the facility of sounds to convey essentially different ideas, produced the first Bill of Rights ever prefixed to a Frame of Government. The people, altho' fully sensible that they reserved very title of power that they did not expressly grant away, yet afraid that the words made use of, to express those rights so granted might convey more than they originally intended, they choose at the same moment to express in different language those rights which the agreement did not include, and which they never designed to part with, endeavoring thereby to prevent any cause for future altercation and the intrusion into society of that doctrine of tacit implication which has been the favorite theme of every tyrant from the origin of all governments to the present day.

[Boston] American Herald, Storing, vol. 4, p. 22.

16.2.4.2James Wilson, October 6, 1787

It will be proper however, before I enter into the refutation of the charges that are alledged, to mark the leading descrimination [sic] between the state constitutions, and the constitution of the United States. When the people established the powers of legislation under their separate governments, they invested their representatives with every right and authority which they did not in explicit terms reserve; and therefore upon every question, respecting the jurisdiction of the house of assembly, if the frame of government is silent, the jurisdiction is efficient and complete. But in delegating fœderal powers, another criterion was necessarily introduced, and the congressional authority is to be collected, not from tacit implication, but from the positive grant expressed in the instrument of union. Hence it is evident, that in the former case every thing which is not reserved is given, but in the latter the reverse of the proposition prevails, and every thing which is not given, is reserved. This distinction being recognized, will furnish an answer to those who think the omission of a bill of rights, a defect in the proposed constitution: for it would have been superfluous and absurd to have stipulated with a foederal body of our own creation, that we should enjoy those privileges, of which we are not divested either by the intention or the act, that has brought that body into existence.

16.2.4.3The Federal Farmer, No. 4, October 12, 1787

Dear Sir, … It is said, that when the people make a constitution, and delegate powers, that all powers not delegated by them to those who govern, is reserved to the people; and that the people, in the present case, have reserved in themselves, and in there [sic] state governments, every right and power not expressly given by the federal constitution to those who shall administer the national government. It is said on the other hand, that the people, when they make a constitution, yield all power not expressly reserved to themselves. The truth is, in either case, it is mere matter of opinion, and men usually take either side of the argument, as will best answer their purposes: But the general assumption being, that men who govern, will, in doubtful cases, construe laws and constitutions most favourably for encreasing their own powers; all wise and prudent people, in forming constitutions, have drawn the line, and carefully described the powers parted with and the powers reserved.

16.2.4.4An Old Whig, No. 2, October 17, 1787

MR. PRINTER, … The principle is this: that "in delegating federal powers, the congressional authority is to be collected, not from tacit implication, but from the positive grant expressed in the instrument of union," "that everything which is not given is reserved." If this be a just representation of the matter, the authority of the several states will be sufficient to protect our liberties from the encroachments of Congress, without an continental bill of rights; unless the powers which are expressly given to Congress are too large.

16.2.4.5Centinel, No. 2, October 24, 1787

In the plan of Confederation of 1778, it was thought proper by Article the 2d, to declare that "each State retains its sovereignty, freedom and independence, and every power, jurisdiction and right, which is not by this Confederation expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled." Positive grant was not then thought sufficiently descriptive and restraining upon Congress, and the omission of such a declaration now, when such great devolutions of power are proposed, manifests the design of reducing the several States to shadows. But Mr. Wilson will tell you that every right and power not specially granted to Congress is considered as withheld. … The lust for power is so universal, that a speculative unascertained rule of construction would be a poor security for the liberties of the people.

16.2.4.6Cincinnatus, No. 1, November 1, 1787

… The confederation, in its very outset, declares — that what is not expressly given, is reserved. This constitution makes no such reservation. The presumption therefore is, that the framers of the proposed constitution, did not mean to subject it to the same exception.

16.2.4.7A Landholder, No. 6, December 10, 1787

There is no declaration of rights. Bills of rights were introduced in England when its kings claimed all power and jurisdiction, and were considered by them as grants to the people. They are insignificant since government is considered as originating from the people, and all the power government now has is a grant from the people. The constitution they establish with powers limited and defined becomes now, to the legislator and magistrate, what originally a bill of rights was to the people. To have inserted in this Constitution a bill of rights for the states would suppose them to derive and hold their rights from the federal government, when the reverse is the case.

16.2.4.9A Citizen of New Haven, January 7, 1788

The powers vested in the federal government are particularly defined, so that each state still retains its sovereignty in what concerns its own internal government and a right to exercise every power of a sovereign state not particularly delegated to the government of the United States.

16.2.4.10The Federal Farmer, No. 16, January 20, 1788

We must consider this constitution, when adopted, as the supreme act of the people, and in construing it hereafter, we and our posterity must strictly adhere to the letter and spirit of it, and in no instance depart from them. … By the people's now establishing certain fundamental rights, it is strongly implied, that they are of opinion, that they would not otherwise be secured as a part of the federal system, or be regarded in the federal administration as fundamental. … Further, the people, thus establishing some few rights, and remaining totally silent about others similarly circumstanced, the implication indubitably is, that they mean to relinquish the latter, or at least feel indifferent about them. Rights, therefore, inferred from general principles of reason, being precarious and hardly ascertainable in the common affairs of society, and the people, in forming the constitution, explicitly shewing they conceive these rights to be thus circumstanced, and accordingly proceed to enumerate and establish all which they esteem valuable and sacred. On every principle, then, the people especially having began, ought to go through enumerating, and establish particularly all the rights of individuals, which can by any possibility come in question in making and executing federal laws.

Storing, vol. 2, pp. 326–27.

I go further, and affirm that the bills of rights, in the sense and to the extent in which they are contended for, are not only unnecessary in the proposed Constitution, but would even be dangerous. They would contain various exceptions to powers not granted; and, on this very account, would afford a colorable pretext to claim more than were granted. For why declare that things shall not be done which there is no power to do? Why, for instance, should it be said that liberty of the press shall not be restrained, when no power is given by which restrictions may be imposed? I will not contend that such a provision would confer a regulating power; but it is evidence that it would furnish, to men disposed to usurp, a plausible pretense for claiming that power.

16.2.5LETTERS AND DIARIES

16.2.5.1George Washington to President of Congress, September 17, 1787

… Individuals entering into society, must give up a share of liberty to preserve the rest. The magnitude of the sacrifice must depend as well on situation and circumstance, as on the object to be obtained. It is at all times difficult to draw with precision the line between those rights which must be surrendered, and those which may be reserved; and on the present occasion this difficulty was encreased [sic] by a difference among the several States as to their situation, extent, habits, and particular interests.

Kaminski and Saladino, vol. 13, p. 211.

16.2.5.2Roger Sherman and Oliver Ellsworth to Governor Huntington, September 26, 1787

… Some additional powers are vested in Congress, which was a principle object the states had in view in appointing the Convention; those powers extend only to matters respecting the common interests of the Union and are specially defined, so that the particular states retain their Sovereignty in all other matters.

Jensen, vol. 3, p. 351.

16.2.5.3James Madison to Thomas Jefferson, October 24, 1787

… A reform therefore which does not make provision for private rights, must be materially defective. The restraints agst. paper emissions, and violations of contracts are not sufficient. Supposing them to be effectual as far as they go, they are short of the mark. Injustice may be effected by such an infinitude of legislative expedients, that where the disposition exists it can only be controuled by some provision which reaches all cases whatsoever. The partial provision made, supposes the disposition which will evade it. … The great desideratum in Government is, so to modify the sovereignty as that it may be sufficiently neutral between different parts of the Society to controul one part from invading the rights of another, and at the same time sufficiently controuled itself, from setting up an interest adverse to that of the entire Society.

Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 13, pp. 447, 449.

16.2.5.4Thomas Jefferson to James Madison, December 20, 1787

To say, as mr Wilson does that a bill of rights was not necessary because all is reserved in the case of the general government which is not given, while in the particular ones all is given which is not reserved, might do for the Audience to whom it was addressed, but is surely gratis dictum, opposed by strong inferences from the body of the instrument, as well as from the omission of the clause of our present confederation which had declared that in express terms. It was a hard conclusion to say because there has been no uniformity among the states as to cases triable by jury, because some have been so incautious as to abandon this mode of trial, therefore the more prudent states shall be reduced to the same level of calamity. It would have been much more just and wise to have concluded the other way that as most of the states had judiciously preserved this palladium, those who had wandered should be brought back to it, and to have established general right instead of wrong. Let me add that a bill of rights is what the people are entitled to against every government on earth, general or particular, and what no just government should refuse, or rest on inference. …

Boyd, vol. 12, p. 440.

16.2.5.5George Washington to Marquis de Lafayette, April 28, 1788

… For example: there was not a member of the convention, I believe, who had the least objection to what is contended for by the Advocates for a Bill of Rights and Tryal by Jury. The first, where the people evidently retained everything which they did not in express terms give up, was considered nugatory as you will find to have been more fully explained by Mr. Wilson and others: — And as to the second, it was only the difficulty of establishing a mode which should not interfere with the fixed modes of any of the States, that induced the Convention to leave it, as a matter of future adjustment.

Kaminski & Saladino, vol. 17, p. 235.

16.2.5.6Thomas Jefferson to James Madison, March 15, 1789

… In the arguments in favor of a declaration of rights, you omit one which has great weight to me, the legal check which it puts into the hands of the judiciary. This is a body, which if rendered independent, and kept strictly to their own department merits great confidence for their learning and integrity. … The Declaration of rights is like all other human blessings alloyed with some inconveniences, and not accomplishing fully it's [sic] object. But the good in this instance vastly overweighs the evil. I cannot refrain from making short answers to the objections which your letter states to have been raised. I. That the rights in question are reserved by the manner in which the federal powers are granted. Answer. a constitutive act may certainly be so formed as to need no declaration of rights. The act itself has the force of a declaration as far as it goes: and if it goes to all material points nothing more is wanting.

16.2.5.7Abraham Baldwin to Joel Barlow, June 14, 1789

A few days since, Madison brought before us propositions of amendment agreeably to his promise to his constituents. Such as he supposed would tranquillize the minds of honest opposers without injuring the system. viz.

That what is not given is reserved, that liberty of the press & trial by jury shall remain inviolable. We are too busy at present in cutting away at the whole cloth, to stop to do any body's patching. There is no such thing as antifederalism heard of.

16.2.5.8Tench Coxe to James Madison, June 18, 1789

I observe you have brought forward the amendments you proposed to the federal Constitution. I have given them a very careful perusal, and have attended particularly to their reception by the public. The most decided friends of the constitution admit (generally) that they will meliorate the government by removing some points of litigation and jealousy, and by heightening and strengthening the barriers between necessary power and indispensable liberty. … Those who are honest are well pleased at the footing on which the press, liberty of conscience, original right & power, trial by jury &ca. are rested.

16.2.5.9Richard Parker to Richard Henry Lee, July 6, 1789

I observe the slip of the newspaper sent me and know the design, but I still think a Bill if rights not necessary here. … However I have no objection to such a bill of Rights as has been proposed by Mr. Maddison [sic] because we declare that we do not abridge our Rights by the reservation that we retain all that we have not specifically given. …

Veit, p. 260.

16.2.5.10Henry Gibbs to Roger Sherman, July 16, 1789

… All Ambiguity of Expression certainly ought to be remov'd; Liberty of Conscience in religious matters, right of trial by Jury, Liberty of the Press &c. may perhaps be more explicitly secur'd to the Subject & a general reservation made to the States respectively of all the powers not expressly delegated to the general Government. …

Veit, p. 263.

16.2.5.11 William L. Smith to Edward Rutledge, August 10, 1789

… I shall support the Amendmts. [sic] proposed to the Constitution that any exception to the powers of Congress shall not be so construed as to give it any powers not expressly given, & the enumeration of certain rights shall not be so construed as to deny others retained by the people — & the powers not delegated by this Constn. nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively. …

Veit, p. 273.

16.2.5.12 James Madison to George Washington, December 5, 1789

[Randolph's] principle objection was pointed agst. the word "retained," in the eleventh proposed amendment [Ninth Amendment], and his argument if I understood it applied in this manner — that as the rights declared in the first ten of the proposed amendments were not all that a free people would require the exercise of, and that as there was no criterion by which it could be determined whether any other particular right was retained or not, it would be more safe and more consistent with the spirit of the 1st & 17th amendts. proposed by Virginia that this reservation agst. constructive power, should operate rather as a provision agst. extending the powers of Congs. by their own authority, than a protection to rights reducible to no definitive certainty. But others, among whom I am one, see not the force of this distinction. …

If a line can be drawn between the powers granted and the rights retained, it would seem to be the same thing whether the latter be secured by declaring that they shall not be abridged, or that the former shall not be extended. If no such line can be drawn, a declaration in either form would amount to nothing.

16.3.1.1Blackstone, 1765

> For the principal aim of society is to protect individuals in the enjoyment of those absolute rights, which were vested in them by the immutable laws of nature; but which could not be preserved in peace without that mutual assistance and intercourse, which is gained by the institution of friendly and social communities. Hence it follows, that the first and primary end of human laws is to maintain and regulate these absolute rights of individuals. Such rights as are social and relative result from, and are posterior to, the formation of states and societies: so that to maintain and regulate these, is clearly a subsequent consideration. And therefore the principle view of human laws is, or ought to be, to explain, protect, and enforce such rights as are absolute. …

17.1.2.4New York: Act for the Better Securing the Liberty of the Citizens, 1787

CHAP. 39.

AN ACT for the better securing the liberty of the citizens of this State, and for prevention of imprisonments.

PASSED the 21st of February, 1787.

WHEREAS great delays have been used by sheriffs, gaolers and other officers, to whose custody persons have been committed for criminal or supposed criminal matters, in making returns of writs of habeas corpus to them directed, and by other shifts, to avoid their yielding obedience to such writs, contrary to their duty, and the known laws of the land, whereby many persons have been, and hereafter may be, long detained in prison, in such cases, where by law they are bailable, to their great charges and vexation: For the prevention whereof, and the more speedy relief of all persons imprisoned for any such criminal, or supposed criminal matters,[1]

Be it enacted by the People of the State of New York, represented in Senate and Assembly, and it is hereby enacted by the authority of the same, That whensoever any person or persons shall bring any habeas corpus, directed to any sheriff, gaoler, minister or other person or persons whatsoever, for any person in his, or their custody, and the said writ shall be served upon the said officer, or other person or persons, or left at the gaol or prison, with any of the under officers, under keepers or deputy of the said officers, or keepers, that the said officer or officers, his or their under officers, under keepers or deputies, or other person or persons, shall within three days after the service thereof as aforesaid, (unless the commitment aforesaid were for treason or felony, plainly and specially expressed in the warrant of commitment,) upon payment or tender of charges of bringing the said prisoner, to be ascertained by the judge or court that awarded the same, and indorsed upon the said writ, not exceeding twelve pence per mile, and upon security given by his own bond, to pay the charges of carrying back the prisoner, if he shall be remanded by the court or judge, to which he shall be brought, according to the true intent of this act, and that he will not make any escape by the way, make return of such writ, and bring or cause to be brought the body of the party so committed or restrained, unto or before the chancellor of this State for the time being, or the justices of the supreme court, or unto or before such of them before whom the said writ is made returnable, according to the command thereof, and shall then likewise certify the true causes of his detainer or imprisonment, unless the commitment of the said party be in a place beyond the distance of twenty miles from the place or places where such court or person is, or shall be residing; and if beyond the distance of twenty miles and not above one hundred miles, then within the space of ten days, and if beyond the distance of one hundred miles, then within the space of twenty days after such delivery as aforesaid, and not longer. And to the intent that no sheriff, gaoler or other officer, may pretend ignorance of the import of any such writ;[2]

Be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid That all such writs shall be marked in this manner, by the statute, and be signed by the person that awards the same; and if any person or persons shall be or stand committed, or detained as aforesaid, for any crime, unless for treason or felony plainly expressed in the warrant of commitment, in the vacation time, and out of term, it shall and may be lawful to and for the person or persons so committed or detained, (other than persons convict, or in execution by legal process) or any one, on his, or their behalf, to apply or complain to the chancellor, or any one of the justices of the supreme court, and the said chancellor or justices, or any of them, upon view of the copy or copies of the warrant or warrants of commitment, and detainer, or otherwise, upon oath made that such copy or copies were denied to be given by such person or persons in whose custody the prisoner or prisoners is, or are detained, are hereby authorized and required, upon request made in writing by such person or persons, or any on his, her, or their behalf, attested and subscribed by two witnesses who were present at the delivery of the same, to award and grant an habeas corpus, under the seal of such court whereof he shall then be one of the judges, to be directed to the officer or officers, or person or persons in whose custody the party so committed or detained shall be, returnable immediately before the said chancellor or justice of the said supreme court; and upon service thereof as aforesaid, the officer or officers, his or their under officer, or under officers, under keeper or under keepers, or their deputy, or person or persons in whose custody the party is so committed or detained, shall, within the times respectively before limited, bring such prisoner or prisoners before the said chancellor, or justices of the said supreme court, or one of them, before whom the said writ is made returnable; and in case of his absence, before any other of them, with the return of such writ, and the true causes of the commitment and detainer; and thereupon, within two days after the party shall be brought before them, the said chancellor, or such justice, before whom the prisoner shall be brought as aforesaid, shall discharge the said prisoner from his imprisonment, taking his or their recognizance, with one or more surety or sureties, in any sum according to their discretions, having regard to the quality of the prisoner, and nature of the offence, for his, or their appearance in the supreme court, the term following, or at the next general sessions or gaol delivery, of and for such county, city or place, where the commitment was, or where the offence was committed, or in such other court, where the said offence is properly cognizable, as the case shall require; and shall then certify the said writ, with the return thereof, and the said recognizance or recognizances, into the said court where such appearance is to be made; unless it shall appear unto the said chancellor or justice or justices, that the party so committed, is detained upon a legal process, order or warrant, out of some court that hath jurisdiction of criminal matters, or by some warrant signed and sealed with the hand and seal of any of the said justices, or some justice or justices of the peace, for such matters or offences, for the which by the law the prisoner is not bailable. But if any person shall have wilfully neglected by the space of two whole terms after his imprisonment, to pray a habeas corpus for his enlargement, such person so wilfully neglecting, shall not have any habeas corpus to be granted in vacation time in pursuance of this act.[3]

And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That if any officer or officers, his or their under officer or under officers, under keeper or under keepers, or deputy, or other person or persons, shall neglect or refuse to make the returns aforesaid, or to bring the body or bodies of the prisoner or prisoners, according to the command of the said writ, within the respective times aforesaid, or upon demand made by the prisoner, or any person in his behalf, shall refuse to deliver, or within the space of six hours after demand shall not deliver, to the person so demanding a true copy of the warrant or warrants of commitment and detainer of such prisoner, which he and they are hereby required to deliver accordingly, all and every the head gaolers, and keepers of such prisons, and such other person or persons in whose custody the prisoner shall be detained, shall for the first offence, forfeit to the prisoner or party grieved, the sum of one hundred pounds, and for the second offence the sum of two hundred pounds, and shall, if an officer, be and is hereby made incapable to hold or execute his said office; the said penalties to be recovered by the prisoner or party grieved, his or her executors or administrators, against such offender, his executors or administrators, by action of debt, suit, bill, plaint or information, in any court of record, wherein no privilege, injunction or stay of prosecution by non vult ulterius prosequi, or otherwise, shall be admitted or allowed, or any more than one imparlance: and any recovery or judgment at the suit of any party grieved, shall be a sufficient conviction for the first offence; and any after recovery or judgment at a suit of a party grieved, for any offence after the first judgment, shall be a sufficient conviction to bring the officers, or person or persons, within the said penalty, for the second offence.[4]

And for prevention of unjust vexation, by reiterated commitments for the same offence,

Be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That no person or persons, who shall be delivered or set at large, upon any habeas corpus, shall at any time thereafter be again imprisoned or committed for the same offence, by any person or persons whatsoever, other than by the legal order and process of such court, wherein he or they shall be bound by recognizance to appear, or other court having jurisdiction of the cause; and if any other person or persons shall knowingly, contrary to this act, recommit or imprison, or knowingly cause or procure to be recommitted or imprisoned for the same offence, or pretended offence, any person or persons delivered or set at large as aforesaid, or be knowingly aiding or assisting therein, then he or they shall forfeit to the prisoner or party grieved, the sum of five hundred pounds, any colourable pretence or variation in the warrant or warrants of commitment notwithstanding, to be recovered as aforesaid.[5]

And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That if any person or persons shall be committed, for any treason or felony, plainly and specially expressed in the warrant of commitment, upon his prayer or petition in open court, the first week of the term, or first day of the sessions of oyer and terminer, or gaol delivery, to be brought to his trial, shall not be indicted some time in the next term, sessions of oyer and terminer, or gaol delivery, after such commitment, it shall and may be lawful to and for the justices of the supreme court, and justices of oyer and terminer or gaol delivery, and they are hereby required, upon motion to them made in open court, the last day of the term, sessions or gaol delivery, either by the prisoner, or any one in his behalf, to set at liberty the prisoner, upon bail, unless it appear to the justices, upon oath made, that the witness against the prisoner could not be produced, the same term, sessions, or gaol delivery. And if any person or persons committed as aforesaid, upon his prayer or petition in open court, the first week of the term, or first day of the sessions of oyer and terminer, or gaol delivery, to be brought to his trial, shall not be indicted and tried the second term, sessions of oyer and terminer, or gaol delivery, after his commitment, or upon his trial, shall be acquitted, he shall be discharged from his imprisonment.[6]

Provided always, That nothing in this act shall extend to discharge out of prison, any person charged in debt, or other action, or with process in any civil cause, but that after he shall be discharged of his imprisonment for such his criminal offence, he shall be kept in custody according to the law for such other suit.[7]

And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That if any person or persons, citizens of this State, shall be committed to any prison, or in custody of any officer or officers whatsoever, for any criminal or supposed criminal matter that the said person shall not be removed from the said prison and custody, into the custody of any other officer or officers, unless it be by habeas corpus, or some other legal writ or process, or where the prisoner is delivered to the constable or other inferior officer, to carry such prisoner to some common gaol, or where any person is sent by order of any court or judge or justice of the peace, to any common work house, or house of correction, or where the prisoner is removed from one prison or place, to another within the same county, in order to his, or her trial, or discharge, in due course of law, or in case of sudden fire or infection, or other necessity; and if any person or persons shall, after such commitment aforesaid, make out and sign, or countersign, any warrant or warrants, for such removal aforesaid, contrary to this act, as well he who makes or signs, or countersigns such warrant or warrants, as the officer or officers who obey or execute the same, shall for every offence forfeit to the prisoner or party grieved two hundred pounds, to be recovered in manner aforesaid, by the party grieved.[8]

And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That it shall and may be lawful to and for any prisoner and prisoners as aforesaid, to move for and obtain his or their habeas corpus, as well out of the court of chancery, as out of the supreme court; and if the chancellor, or any justice of the supreme court, for the time being, in the vacation time, upon view of the copy or copies of the warrant or warrants of commitment, or detainer, or upon oath made that such copy or copies were denied as aforesaid, shall deny any writ of habeas corpus, by this act required to be granted, being moved for as aforesaid, they shall severally forfeit to the prisoner or party grieved, the sum of five hundred pounds, to be recovered in manner aforesaid.[9]

And for preventing illegal imprisonments of the citizens of this State, in prisons out of this State.

Be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That no citizen of this State, who now is, or hereafter shall be an inhabitant or resident within this State, shall or may be sent prisoner to any place whatsoever, out of this State for any crime or offence committed within this State; and that every such imprisonment, is hereby enacted and adjudged to be illegal; and that if any of the said citizens now is, or hereafter shall be so imprisoned, every such person and persons so imprisoned, shall and may for every such imprisonment, maintain, by virtue of this act, an action or actions of false imprisonment, in any court of record, against the person or persons by whom he or she shall be so committed, detained, imprisoned, sent prisoner, or transported, contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, and against all or any person or persons, who shall frame, contrive, write, seal, sign or countersign, any warrant or writing for such commitment, detainer, imprisonment or transportation, or shall be advising, aiding or assisting in the same, or any of them; and the plaintiff in every such action shall have judgment to recover treble costs, besides damages; which damages so to be given, shall not be less than five hundred pounds, in which action no delay, stay or stop of proceeding, by rule, order or command, nor no injunction or privilege whatsoever, nor any more than one imparlance shall be allowed, excepting such rule of the court wherein the action shall depend, made in open court, as shall be thought in justice necessary for special cause to be expressed in the said rule. And the person or persons who shall knowingly frame, contrive, write, seal, sign, or countersign, any warrant for such commitment, detainer or transportation, or shall so commit, detain, imprison or transport, any person or persons contrary to this act, or be any wise advising, aiding or assisting therein, being lawfully convicted thereof, shall be disabled from thenceforth to bear any office of trust or profit within this State, and shall forfeit to the people of this State, all his goods and chattels, and the issues and profits of his lands and tenements, during his natural life.[10]

Provided always, that nothing in this act shall extend to give benefit to any person who shall, by contract in writing, agree with any merchant or owner of any plantation, or other person whatsoever, to be transported to any place out of this State, or to any part beyond the seas, and receive earnest upon such agreement, although that afterwards such person shall renounce such contract.[11]

Provided also, that if any person or persons lawfully convicted of any felony, shall in open court pray to be transported beyond the seas, and the court shall think fit to leave him or them in prison for that purpose; such person or persons may be transported into any parts beyond the seas, this act, or any thing therein contained, to the contrary notwithstanding.[12]

Provided also, that if any person or persons at any time resident in this State, shall have committed or be charged with having committed any treason, felony, or other high misdemeanor, in any other of the United States of America, where he or she ought to be tried for such offence, such person or persons may be sent to such place, there to receive such trial, in such manner as the same might have been used, before the making of this act, any thing herein contained, to the contrary notwithstanding.[13]

Provided also, and be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That no person or persons shall be sued, impleaded, molested or troubled, for any offence against this act, unless the party offending be sued or impleaded for the same, within two years at most, after such time wherein the offence shall be committed, in case the party grieved shall not then be in prison; and if he or she shall be in prison, then within the space of two years after the decease of the person imprisoned, or his or her delivery out of prison, which shall first happen.[14]

And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That if any information, suit or action, shall be brought or exhibited against any person or persons, for any offence committed, or to be committed against the form of this law, it shall be lawful for such defendants, to plead the general issue, that they are not guilty, or that they owe nothing, and to give such special matter in evidence to the jury that shall try the same, which matter being pleaded, had been good and sufficient matter in law, to have discharged the said defendant or defendants against the said information, suit or action; and the said matter shall be then as available, to him or them, to all intents and purposes, as if he or they had suffiicently pleaded, set forth or alledged the same matter, in bar or discharge of such information suit or action.[15]

And to the intent that no person may avoid his trial, at the sessions of oyer and terminer or gaol delivery, by procuring his removal before the setting of the same court, at such times as he cannot be brought back to receive his trial there.

Be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That after the sessions of oyer and terminer, or gaol delivery proclaimed for that county where the prisoner is detained, no person shall be removed from the common gaol upon any habeas corpus granted in pursuance of this act; but upon any such habeas corpus, shall be brought before the justice or justices of the circuit court, in open court, who is or are thereupon to do what to justice shall appertain.[16]

Provided, that after the sessions of oyer and terminer, or gaol delivery are ended, any person or persons detained, may have his or their habeas corpus, according to the direction and intention of this act.

And because oftentimes persons charged with felony, or as accesssaies thereunto, are committed upon suspicion only, whereupon they are bailable, or not, according as the circumstances making out that suspicion, are more or less weighty, which are best known to the justices of the peace who committed the persons, and have the examinations before them, or to other justices of the peace in the county. Therefore

Be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That where any person shall appear to be committed by any judge or justices of the peace, and charged as accessory before the fact, to any felony, or upon suspicion thereof, or with suspicion of any felony, which felony shall be plainly and specially charged in the warrant of commitment, that such persons shall not be removed or bailed by virtue of this act, or in any other manner than they might have been, before the making of this act.[17]

17.1.2.6.a Act for Better Securing Personal Liberty, 1785

CHAPTER CLXXVIII.

An ACT for the better securing personal liberty, and preventing wrongful imprisonments.

SECT. I. WHEREAS personal liberty is a principal blessing derived from free constitutions of government, and certain methods of proceeding should be prescribed, so that all wrongful restraints thereof may be easily and speedily redressed: Be it therefore enacted, and it is hereby enacted by the Representatives of the Freemen of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in General Assembly met, and by the authority of the same, That if any person shall be or stand committed or detained for any criminal or supposed criminal matter, unless for treason or felony, the species whereof is plainly and fully set forth in the warrant of commitment, in vacation time and out of term, it shall and may be lawful to and for the person so committed or detained, or any one on his or her behalf, to appeal or complain to any Judge of the Supreme Court, or to the President of the court of Common Pleas for the county, within which the person is so committed or detained; and such Judge or Justice, upon view of the copy or copies of the warrant or warrants of commitment or detainer, or otherwise, upon oath or affirmation legally made, that such copy or copies were denied to be given by the person or persons, in whose custody the prisoner is detained, is hereby authorised and required, upon request made in writing by such prisoner, or any person on his or her behalf, attested and subscribed by two witnesses, who were present at the delivery of the same, to award and grant an Habeas Corpus, under the seal of the court, whereof he shall then be a Judge or Justice, to be directed to the person or persons, in whose custody the prisoner is detained, returnable immediate before the said Judge or Justice; and to the intent, that no officer, sheriff, goaler, keeper or other person, to whom such writ shall be directed, may pretend ignorance of the import thereof, every such writ shall be made in this manner, “By Act of Assembly, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-five,” and shall be signed by the Judge or Justice who awards the same. And whenever the said writ shall by any person be served upon the officer, sheriff, goaler, keeper, or other person whatsoever, to whom the same shall be directed, by being brought to him, or by being left with any of his under officers or deputies, at the goal or place where the prisoner is detained, he, or some of his under officers or deputies, shall, within three days after the service thereof as aforesaid, upon payment or tender of the charges of bringing the said prisoner, to be ascertained by the Judge or Justice who awarded the writ, and thereon endorsed, not exceeding twelve pence per mile, and upon security given by his own bond to pay the charges of carrying him back, if he shall be re-demanded, and not to escape by the way, make return of such writ, and bring or cause to be brought the body of the prisoner unto or before the Judge or Justice, before whom the said writ is made returnable, and, in case of his absence, before any other of the Judges or Justices aforesaid, and shall then likewise specifically and fully certify the true cause or causes of the commitment and detainer of the said prisoner, and when he was commited, unless the commitment be in any place beyond the distance of twenty miles from the place where such Judge or Justice shall be residing, and if beyond the distance of twenty miles, and not above one hundred miles, then within ten days, and if beyond the distance of one hundred miles, then within twenty days: And thereupon the Judge or Justice, before whom the prisoner shall be so brought, shall within two days discharge the prisoner from imprisonment, taking his or her recognizance, with one or more surety or sureties, in any sum, according to his discretion, having regard to the circumstances of the prisoner, and the nature of the offence, for his or her appearance at the next court of Oyer and Terminer, General Gaol Delivery, or General Quarter Sessions of or for the county, city or place, where the offence was committed, or in such other court where it may be properly cognizable, as the case shall require, and then shall certify the said writ, with the return thereof, and the said recognizances, into the court where such appearance is to be made, unless it shall appear to the said Judge or Justice, that the party so committed is detained upon legal process, order or warrant, for such matter or offences, for which by the law the said prisoner is not bailable, and that the said Judge or Justice may, according to the intent and meaning of this act, be enabled, by investigating the truth of the circumstances of the case, to determine whether, according to law, the said prisoner ought to be bailed, remanded or discharged; the return may, before or after it is filed, by leave of the said Judge or Justice, be amended, and also suggestions made against it, that thereby material facts may be ascertained.[18]

Sect. II. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That, in term time, it shall and may be lawful for any prisoner as aforesaid, in manner aforesaid, to move and obtain his or her Habeas Corpus out of the Supreme Court, or the court of Common Pleas for the county, in which he or she is imprisoned, whereupon proceedings shall be had as aforesaid.[19]

Sect. III. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That if any person shall be committed for treason or felony, and shall not be indicted and tried some time in the next term, session of Oyer and Terminer, General Gaol Delivery, or other court, where the offence is properly cognizable, after such commitment, it shall and may be lawful for the Judges or Justices thereof, and they are hereby required, upon the last day of the term, sessions, or court, to set at liberty the said prisoner upon bail, unless it shall appear to them, upon oath or affirmation, that the witnesses for the commonwealth, mentioning their names, could not then be produced; and if such prisoner shall not be indicted and tried the second term, sessions, or court, after his or her commitment, unless the delay happen on the application, or with the assent of the defendant, or upon trial shall be acquitted, he or she shall be discharged from imprisonment.[20]

Sect. IV. Provided always, That nothing in this act shall extend to discharge out of prison any person guilty of or charged with treason, felony, or other high misdemeanor, in any other state, and who by the confederation ought to be delivered up to the executive power of such state, nor any person guilty of or charged with a breach or violation of the laws of nations.[21]

Sect. V. Provided also, That nothing in this act shall extend to discharge out of prison any person charged with debt or other action, or with process in any civil cause, but that after discharge for such criminal or supposed criminal matter, he or she shall be kept in custody, according to law, for such other suit.[22]

Sect. VI. And that no person may avoid his or her trial, by procuring a removal, so that he or she cannot be brought back in time, Be it enacted by the authority aforesaid, That no person shall be removed upon any Habeas Corpus granted in pursuance of this act, within fifteen days next preceding the term, sessions of Oyer and Terminer, General Gaol Delivery, or other court, where the offence with which he or the stands charged is properly cognizable, but, upon such Habeas Corpus, shall be brought before the Judges or Justices thereof, who are thereupon to do what to justice shall appertain.[23]

Sect. VII. Provided nevertheless, That after such court the person detained may have his or her Habeas Corpus, according to this act.[24]

Sect. VIII. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That if any Judge or Justice aforesaid, being appealed or complained to as aforesaid, upon view of the copy or copies of the warrant or warrants of the commitment or detainer, or upon oath or affirmation made that such copy or copies were denied as aforesaid, shall refuse or neglect to award any writ of Habeas Corpus, by this act required to be granted, he shall forfeit to the prisoner, or party grieved, the sum of three hundred pounds, to be recovered by the said prisoner, or party grieved, his or her executors or administrators, against such offender, his executors or administrators, by action of debt, suit, bill, plaint, or information, in any court of record, wherein no essoin, protection, privilege, injunction, wager of law, or stay of prosecution, shall be allowed, or any more than one imparlance.[25]

Sect. IX. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That if any officer, sheriff, gaoler, keeper, or other person, to whom any such writ shall be directed as aforesaid, or any of his under officers or deputies, shall refuse or neglect to make the returns aforesaid, or to bring the body of the prisoner, according to the command of the said writ, within the respective times aforesaid, all and every such officer, sheriff, gaoler, keeper or other person, under officer or deputy, shall be guilty of a contempt of the court, under the seal of which the said writ shall have issued, and shall also for the first offence forfeit to the prisoner, or party grieved, one hundred pounds, and for the second offence two hundred pounds, and shall be and is hereby made incapable to hold or execute his said office; the said forfeitures to be recovered by the prisoner, or party grieved, in manner aforesaid.[26]

Sect. X. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That if any officer, sheriff, gaoler, keeper, or other person, to whom such writ shall be directed as aforesaid, or any of his under officers or deputies, upon demand by the prisoner, or some person in his or her behalf, shall refuse to deliver, or, within six hours after demand, shall not deliver to the prisoner, or person so demanding, a true copy or copies of the warrant or warrants of commitment and detainer of such prisoner, which are hereby required to be delivered, all and every such officer, sheriff, goaler, keeper, or other person, under officer or deputy, so offending, shall, for the first offence, forfeit to the prisoner, or party grieved, one hundred pounds, and for the second offence two hundred pounds, and shall also be and is hereby made incapable to hold or execute his said office; the said forfeitures to be recovered by the prisoner, or party grieved, in manner aforesaid.[27]

Sect. XI. And for preventing unjust vexation by reiterated commitments for the same offence, Be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That no person, who shall be delivered or set at large upon an Habeas Corpus, shall, at any time thereafter, be again committed or imprisoned for the same offence by any person or persons whatsoever, other than by the legal order and process of such court wherein he or she shall be bound by recognizance to appear, or other court having jurisdiction of the cause, and if any other person or persons shall, knowingly, contrary to this act, recommit or imprison, or knowingly procure or cause to be recommitted or imprisoned, for the same offence, or supposed offence, any person delivered or set at large as aforesaid, or be knowingly aiding or assisting therein, then he or they shall forfeit to the prisoner, or party grieved, any pretence of variation in the warrant or warrants of commitment notwithstanding, the sum of five hundred pounds, to be recovered by the prisoner, or party grieved, in manner aforesaid.[28]

Sect. XII. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That any person being committed to any prison, or in custody of any officer, sheriff, gaoler, keeper, or other person, or his under officer or deputy, for any criminal or supposed criminal matter, shall not be removed from the said prison or custody into any other prison or custody, unless it be by Habeas Corpus, or some other legal writ, or where the prisoner is delivered to the constable or other inferior officer, to be carried to some common gaol, or where any person is sent by any Judge or Justice, having proper authority, to some common workhouse or house of correction, or where the prisoner is removed from one place to another, within the same county, in order to his or her trial or discharge in due course of law, or in case of sudden fire or infection, or other necessity; and if any person or persons shall, after such commitment as aforesaid, make out, sign, countersign, and issue any warrant or warrants for such removal, except as before excepted, then he or they shall forfeit to the prisoner, or party grieved, two hundred pounds, to be recovered by the prisoner, or party grieved, in manner aforesaid.[29]

Sect. XIII. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That all the provisions herein before made for the awarding and granting writs of Habeas Corpus, and proceeding thereon, in case of commitment or detainer for any criminal or supposed criminal matter, shall, in like manner, extend to all cases where any person, not being committed or detained for any criminal or supposed criminal matter, shall be confined or restrained of his or her liberty, under any colour or pretence whatsoever, and that upon oath or affirmation made by such person, so confined or restrained, or by any other in his or her behalf, of any actual confinement or restraint, and that such confinement or restraint, to the best of the knowledge and belief of the person so applying, is not by virtue of any commitment or detainer for any criminal or supposed criminal matter, an Habeas Corpus, directed to the person or persons so confining or restraining the party as aforesaid, shall be awarded and granted, in the same manner, and under the same penalties, to be recovered from the same persons, as is herein before directed; and the Court, Judge or Justice, before whom the party so confined or restrained shall be brought, shall, after the return made, proceed, in the same manner as is herein before prescribed, to examine into the facts relating to the case, and into the cause of such confinement or restraint, and thereupon either bail, remand, or discharge the party so brought, as to justice shall appertain.[30]

SECT. XIV. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That whensoever any writ of Habeas Corpus, awarded and granted, either in term or vacation time, for any person so confined or restrained, without a commitment for any criminal or supposed criminal matter, shall be served upon the, person or persons so confining or restraining such party, by being brought to such person or persons, or by being left at the place where the party shall be so confined or restrained, the person or persons so confining or restraining such party shall make return of such writ, and bring, or cause to be brought, the body of such party, according to the command thereof, within the respective times limited, and under the provisions herein before prescribed, and every such person refusing or neglecting so to make return of such writ, or to bring, or cause to be brought, the body of the party, according to the command thereof, within the times respectively limited, and under the provisions herein before prescribed, shall be guilty of a contempt of the court, under the seal of which the said writ shall have issued, and shall also forfeit for the first offence, to the party grieved, one hundred pounds, and for the second offence, two hundred pounds, to be recovered by him or her, his or her executors or administrators, against the offender, his or her executors or administrators, in manner aforesaid.[31]

SECT. XV. Provided always, and be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That no person shall be sued, impleaded, molested or troubled, for any offence against this act, unless such person be sued or impleaded for the same within two years after the time wherein the said offence shall have been committed, in case the party grieved shall not be then in prison, or confined or restrained as aforesaid, and if the said party shall be then in prison, or so confined or restrained, then within two years after the decease of the person imprisoned, or so confined or restrained, or his or her delivery out of prison, or from such confinement or restraint.[32]

SECT. XVI. And be it also enacted by the authority aforesaid, That in or upon any action, suit, bill, plaint, or information, for any offence against this act, the defendant or defendants may plead the general issue, and give the special matter in evidence.[33]

17.1.2.7.aAct … to Execute and Put in Force, 1712

An Act to empower the Right Honourable the Governor of this Province, the Lords Deputies, the Chief Justice, or the Justices of the Peace, and other Officers or Ministers within this Province, to execute and put in Force in the same, an Act made in the Kingdom of England, in the Thirty-first Year of the Reign of the late King Charles the Second, entitled, An Act for the better securing the Liberty of the Subject, and for the Prevention of Imprisonments beyond the Seas, commonly called the Habeas Corpus Act.*

WHEREAS no law or statute hath hitherto been made or enacted, which better secures the liberty of the subject than an act made in the kingdom of England, in the 31st year of the reign of the late King Charles the Second, entitled, An Act for the better securing the Liberty of the Subject, and for the Prevention of Imprisonment beyond the Seas, commonly called the Habeas Corpus Act; but because the said act cannot fully, wholly and effectually be put in practice and execution in this Province, for want of such magistrates, justices and officers so impowered and qualified, as is directed and required by the said act, in order to put the same in execution; therefore for the effectual supplying the said defect, and that the people of this Province may not loose the benefit of so useful an act, Be it enacted, That the Right Honourable Charles Craven, Esquire, Governor of this Province, or the Governor for the time being, or any two of the Lords Proprietors Deputies, or the Chief Justice of this Province, or any one of the Lords Proprietors Deputies and any one Justice of the Peace, or any two Justices of the Peace, whereof one to be of the Quorum, within this part of the Province that lies South and West of Cape Fear, shall have power, and they are hereby authorised and impowered and required to do, act and put in execution the said act, commonly called the Habeas Corpus Act, and every matter, clause, or thing therein contained, according to their true intent and meaning, as fully, effectually and lawfully, as any Lord Chancellor, Lord Keeper, or any of her Majesty's Justices, either of the one bench or the other, or the Barons of the Exchequer of the degree of the Coif, may, can or ought to do within the kingdom of England.[34]

II. Every provost-martial, gaoler, or other person whatsoever, by what name soever called or known; which hath the keeping of any gaol or prison within the South-west part of this Province, shall have power, and are hereby impowered, authorised, required and commanded to give due obedience in the execution of every writ of Habeas Corpus, made or signed by any person or persons whatsoever by this act impowered to make, sign and grant the same, and to do and perform every other matter or thing which any sheriff, undersheriff, gaoler, minister, or other person whatsoever, which hath the keeping of any gaol or prison, by virtue of the said act ought, may or can do within the kingdom of England.[35]

III. Every person whatsoever to whom any power is given, either judicial or ministerial by this act, and which by virtue of this act he is required and commanded to do, and shall wilfully neglect, refuse or omit to do the same, when the same shall be legally requested and demanded, according to the direction of the said Habeas Corpus Act, and when the person or persons so requesting and demanding the same, are legally entitled to request or demand by the said act, and are within the benefit of the same, according to the true intent and meaning thereof, that then and in such case, such person, whether magistrate or officer, wilfully so refusing, neglecting or omitting what this act requireth and commandeth him or them, for each wilful neglect, refusal or omission, shall forfeit the sum of £.500, current money of this Province, loss of places or office, and undergo such penalties as by the said act is appointed for every respective magistrate, officer, minister or person whatsoever, within the kingdom of England, to be recovered in any of the courts of record in this Province, in such manner and form as by the said Habeas Corpus Act is appointed to be recovered in any of her Majesty's Courts at Westminster.[36]

IV. All and every person which now is, or hereafter shall be within any part of this Province, shall have to all intents, constructions and purposes whatsoever, and in all things whatsoever, as large, ample and effectual right to and benefit of the said act, commonly called the Habeas Corpus Act, as if he were personally in the said Kingdom of England.[37]

December 12, 1712.

An act for the better securing the Liberty of the Subject, and for Prevention of Imprisonments beyond the Seas.

WHEREAS great delays have been used by sheriffs, gaolers and other officers, to whose custody any of the King's subjects have been committed for criminal or supposed criminal matters, in making returns of writs of Habeas Corpus to them directed, by standing out on Alias and Pluries Habeas Corpus, and sometimes more, and by other shifts to avoid their yielding obedience to such writs, contrary to their duty and the known laws of the land, whereby many of the King's subjects have been and hereafter may be long detained in prison, in such cases where by law they are bailable, to their great charges and vexation:

II. For the prevention whereof, and the more speedy relief of all persons imprisoned for any such criminal or supposed criminal matters; (2) Be it enacted, That whensoever any person or persons shall bring any Habeas Corpus directed unto any sheriff or sheriffs, gaoler, minister or other person whatsoever, for any person in his or their custody, and the said writ shall be served upon the said officer, or left at the gaol or prison with any of the under-officers, underkeepers, or deputy of the said officers or keepers, that the said officer or officers, his or their under-officers, underkeepers, or deputies, shall within three days after the service thereof as aforesaid (unless the commitment aforesaid were for treason or felony, plainly and specially expressed in the warrant of commitment) upon payment or tender of the charges of bringing the said prisoner, to be ascertained by the Judge or Court that awarded the same, and endorsed upon the said writ, not exceeding 12 pence per mile, and upon security given by his own bond to pay the charges of carrying back the prisoner, if he shall be remanded by the Court or Judge to which he shall be brought according to the true intent of this present act, and that he will not make any escape by the way, make return of such writ; (3) and bring or cause to be brought the body of the party so committed or restrained, unto or before the Lord Chancellor, or Lord Keeper of the Great Seal of England for the time being, or the Judges or Barons of the said Court from whence the said writ shall issue, or unto and before such other person or persons before whom the said writ is made returnable, according to the command thereof; (4) and shall then likewise certify the true causes of his detainer or imprisonment, unless the commitment of the said party be in any place beyond the distance of 20 miles from the place or places where such court or person is or shall be residing; and if beyond the distance of 20 miles, and not above 100 miles, then within the space of 10 days, and if beyond the distance of 100 miles, then within the space of 20 days, after such delivery aforesaid, and not longer.[38]

III. And to the intent that no sheriff, gaoler or other officer may pretend ignorance of the import of any such writ; (2) Be it enacted, That all such writs shall be marked in this manner, Per Statutum tricesimo primo Caroli Secundi Regis, and shall be signed by the person that awards the same; (3) and if any person or persons shall be or stand committed or detained as aforesaid, for any crime, unless for felony or treason plainly expressed in the warrant of commitment, in the vacation-time, and out of term, it shall and may be lawful to and for the person or persons so committed or detained (other than persons convict or in execution by legal process) or any one on his or their behalf, to appeal or complain to the Lord Chancellor or Lord Keeper, or any one of his Majesty’s Justices; either of the one bench or of the other, or the Barons of the Exchequer of the Degree of the Coif; (4) and the said Lord Chancellor, Lord Keeper, Justices or Barons, or any of them, upon view of the copy or copies of the warrant or warrants of commitment and detainer, or otherwise upon oath made that such copy or copies were denied to be given by such person or persons in whose custody the prisoner or prisoners is or are detained, are hereby authorised, and required, upon request made in writing by such person or persons, or any on his, her or their behalf, attested and subscribed by two witnesses who were present at the delivery of the same, to award and grant an Habeas Corpus under the seal of such Court whereof he shall then be one of the Judges, (5) to be directed to the officer or officers in whose custody the party so committed or detained shall be, returnable immediate before the said Lord Chancellor or Lord Keeper, or such Justice, Baron, or any other Justice or Baron of the Degree of the Coif of any of the said courts; (6) and upon service thereof as aforesaid, the officer or officers, his or their under-officer or under-officers, underkeeper or underkeepers, or their deputy, in whose custody the party is so committed or detained, shall within the times respectively before limited, bring such prisoner or prisoners before the said Lord Chancellor, or Lord Keeper, or such Justices, Barons or one of them, before whom the said writ is made returnable, and in case of his absence before any other of them, with the return of such writ, and the true causes of the commitment and detainer; (7) and thereupon within two days after the party shall be brought before them, the said Lord Chancellor or Lord Keeper, or such Justice or Baron before whom the prisoner shall be brought as aforesaid, shall discharge the said prisoner from his imprisonment, taking his or their recognizance, with one or more surety or furcties, in any sum according to their discretions, having regard to the quality of the prisoner and nature of the offence, for his or their appearance in the Court of King's Bench the term following, or at the next assizes, sessions or general gaol-delivery of and for such county, city or place where the commitment was, or where the offence was committed, or in such other court where the said offence is properly cognizable, as the case shall require, and then shall certify the said writ with the return thereof, and the said recognizance, or recognizances into the said court where such appearance is to be made; (8) unless it shall appear unto the said Lord Chancellor or Lord Keeper, or Justice or Justices, or Baron or Barons, that the party so committed is detained upon a legal process, order or warrant, out of some court that hath jurisdiction of criminal matters, or by some warrant signed and sealed with the hand and seal of any of the said Justices or Barons, or some Justice or Justices of the Peace, for such matters or offences for the which by the law the prisoner is not bailable.[39]

IV. Provided always, and be it enacted, That if any person shall have wilfully neglected by the space of 2 whole terms after his imprisonment, to pray a Habeas Corpus for his enlargement, such person so wilfully neglecting shall not have any Habeas Corpus to be granted in vacation-time, in pursuance of this act.[40]

V. And be it further enacted, That if any officer or officers, his or their under-officer or under-officers, underkeeper or underkeepers, or deputy, shall neglect or refuse to make the returns aforesaid, or to bring the body or bodies of the prisoner or prisoners according to the command of the said writ, within the respective times aforesaid, or upon demand made by the prisoner or person in his behalf, shall refuse to deliver, or within the space of six hours after demand shall not deliver, to the person so demanding, a true copy of the warrant or warrants of commitment and detainer of such prisoner, which he and they are hereby required to deliver accordingly; all and every the head gaolers and keepers of such prisons, and such other person in whose custody the prisoner shall be detained, shall for the first offence forfeit to the prisoner or party grieved the sum of £100; (2) and for the 2d offence the sum of £. 200, and shall and is hereby made incapable to hold or execute his said office; (3) the said penalties to be recovered by the prisoner or party grieved, his executors or administrators, against such offender, his executors or administrators, by any action of debt, suit, bill, plaint, or information, in any of the King's Courts at Westminster, wherein no essoin, protection, privilege, injunction, wager of law, or stay of prosecution by Non vult ulterius prosequi, or otherwise, shall be admitted or allowed, or any more than one imparlance; (4) and any recovery or judgment at the suit of any party grieved, shall be a sufficient conviction for the first offence; and any after recovery or judgment at the suit of a party grieved for any offence after the first judgment, shall be a sufficient conviction to bring the officers or person within the said penalty for the second offence.[41]

VI. And for the prevention of unjust vexation by reiterated commitments for the same offence; (2) Be it enacted, That no person or persons which shall be delivered or set at large upon any Habeas Corpus, shall at any time hereafter be again imprisoned or committed for the same offence by any person or persons whatsoever, other than by the legal order and process of such court wherein he or they shall be bound by recognizance to appear, or other court having jurisdiction of the cause; (3) and if any other person or persons shall knowingly contrary to this act recommit or imprison, or knowingly procure or cause to be recommitted or imprisoned, for the same offence or pretended offence, any person or persons delivered or set at large as aforesaid, or be knowingly aiding or assisting therein, then he or they shall forfeit to the prisoner or party grieved the sum of £500; any colourable pretence or variation in the warrant or warrants of commitment notwithstanding, to be recovered as aforesaid.[42]

VII. Provided, That if any person or persons shall be committed for high treason or felony, plainly and specially expressed in the warrant of commitment, upon his prayer or petition in open court the first week of the term, or first day of the sessions of Oyer and Terminer and General Gaol-delivery, to be brought to his trial, shall not be indicted some time in the next term, Sessions of Oyer and Terminer or General Goal-delivery, after such commitment; it shall and may be lawful to and for the Judges of the Court of King's Bench and Justices of Oyer and Terminer or General Gaol-delivery, and they are hereby required, upon motion to them made in open court the last day of the term, Sessions or Goal-delivery, either by the prisoner or any one in his behalf, to set at liberty the prisoner upon bail, unless it appear to the Judges and Justices upon oath made, that the witnesses for the King could not be produced the same Term, Sessions, or General Gaol-delivery; (2) and if any person or persons committed as aforesaid, upon his prayer or petition in open Court the first week of the Term or first day of the Sessions of Oyer and Terminer and General Goal-delivery, to be brought to his trial, shall not be indicted and tried the second Term, Sessions of Oyer and Terminer or General Goal-delivery, after his commitment, or upon his trial shall be acquitted, he shall be discharged from his imprisonment.[43]

VIII. Provided always, That nothing in this act shall extend to discharge out of prison any person charged in debt, or other action, or with process in any civil cause, but that after he shall be discharged of his imprisonment for such his criminal offence, he shall be kept in custody according to the law, for such other suit.

IX. Provided always, That if any person or persons, subjects of this realm, shall be committed to any prison or in custody of any officer or officers whatsoever, for any criminal or supposed criminal matter, that the said person shall not be removed from the said prison and custody into the custody of any other officer or officers; (2) unless it be by Habeas Corpus or some other legal writ; or where the prisoner is delivered to the constable or other inferior officer to carry such prisoner to some common gaol; (3) or where any person is sent by order of any Judge of Assize or Justice of the Peace, to any common workhouse or house of correction; (4) or where the prisoner is removed from one prison or place to another within the same county, in order to his or her trial or discharge in due course of law; (5) or in case of sudden fire or infection, or other necessity; (6) and if any person or persons shall after such commitment aforesaid make out and sign, or countersign any warrant or warrants for such removal aforesaid, contrary to this act; as well he that makes or signs, or countersigns such warrant or warrants as the officer or officers that obey or execute the same, shall suffer and incur the pains and forfeitures in this act before mentioned, both for the first and second offence respectively, to be recovered in manner aforesaid by the party grieved.

X. Provided also, That it shall and may be lawful to and for any prisoner and prisoners as aforesaid, to move and obtain his or their Habeas Corpus as well out of the High Court of Chancery or Court of Exchequer, as out of the Courts of King's Bench or Common Pleas, or either of them; (2) and if the said Lord Chancellor or Lord Keeper, or any Judge or Judges, Baron or Barons for the time being, of the Degree of the Coif, of any of the Courts aforesaid, in the vacation-time, upon view of the copy or copies of the warrant or warrants of commitment or detainer, or upon oath made that such copy or copies were denied as aforesaid, shall deny any writ of Habeas Corpus by this act required to be granted, being moved for as aforesaid, they shall severally forfeit to the prisoner or party grieved the sum of £500, to be recovered in manner aforesaid.[44]

[NO PROVISION XI.]

XII. And for preventing illegal imprisonments in prisons beyond the seas, (2) Be it further enacted, That no subject of this realm that now is, or hereafter shall be an inhabitant or resiant of this kingdom of England, dominion of Wales, or town of Berwick upon Tweed, shall or may be sent prisoner into Scotland, Ireland, Jersey, Guernsey, Tangier, or into parts, garrisons, islands or places beyond the seas, which are or at any time hereafter shall be within or without the dominions of his Majesty, his heirs or successors; (3) and that every such imprisonment is hereby enacted and adjudged to be illegal; (4) and that if any of the said subjects now is or hereafter shall be so imprisoned, every such person and persons so imprisoned, shall and may for every such imprisonment maintain by virtue of this act an action or actions of false imprisonment, in any of his Majesty's Courts of Record, against the person or persons by whom he or she shall be so committed, detained, imprisoned, sent prisoner or transported, contrary to the true meaning of this act, and against all or any person or persons that shall frame, contrive, write, seal or countersign any warrant or writing for such commitment, detainer, imprisonment or transportation, or shall be advising, aiding or assisting in the same, or any of them; (5) and the plaintiff in every such action shall have judgment to recover his treble costs, besides damages, which damages so to be given, shall not be less than £.500; (6) in which action no delay, stay or stop of proceeding by rule, order or command, nor no injunction, protection or privilege whatsoever, nor any more than one imparlance shall be allowed, excepting such rule of the Court wherein the action shall depend, made in open Court, as shall be thought in justice necessary, for special cause to be expressed in the said rule; (7) and the person or persons who shall knowingly frame, contrive, write, seal or countersign any warrant for such commitment, detainer or transportation, or shall so commit, detain, imprison or transport any person or persons contrary to this act, or be any ways advising, aiding or assisting therein being lawfully convicted thereof, shall be disabled from thenceforth to bear any office of trust or profit within the said realm of England, dominion of Wales, or town of Berwick upon Tweed, or any of the islands, territories or dominions thereunto belonging; (8) and shall incur and sustain the pains, penalties and forfeitures limited, ordained and provided in and by the statute of provision and * Praemunire made in the sixteenth year of King Richard the Second; (9) and be incapable of any pardon from the King, his heirs and successors, of the said forfeitures, losses or disabilities or any of them.[45]

XIII. Provided always, That nothing in this act shall extend to give benefit to any person who shall by contract in writing agree with any merchant or owner of any plantation, or other person whatsoever, to be transported to any parts beyond the seas, and receive earnest upon such agreement, although that afterwards such person shall renounce such contract.[46]

XIV. Provided always, and be it enacted, That if any person or persons lawfully convicted of any felony, shall in open court pray to be transported beyond the seas, and the court shall think fit to leave him or them in prison for that purpose, such person or persons may be transported into any parts beyond the seas; this act, or any thing therein contained to the contrary notwithstanding.[47]

[NO PROVISION XV.]

XVI. Provided also, That if any person or persons at any time resiant in this realm, shall have committed any capital offence in Scotland or Ireland, or any of the islands, or foreign plantations of the King, his heirs or successors, where he or she ought to be tried for such offence, such person or persons may be sent to such place, there to receive such trial, in such manner as the same might have been used before the making of this act; any thing herein contained to the contrary notwithstanding.[48]

XVII. Provided also, That no person or persons shall be sued, impleaded, molested or troubled for any offence against this act, unless the party offending be sued or impleaded for the same within two years at the most after such time wherein the offence shall be committed, in case the party grieved shall not be then in prison; and if he shall be in prison, then within the space of two years after the decease of the person imprisoned, or his or her delivery out of prison, which shall first happen.[49]

XVIII. And to the intent no person may avoid his trial at the Assizes or General Gaol-delivery, by procuring his removal before the Assizes, at such time as he cannot be brought back to receive his trial there; (2) Be it enacted, That after the Assizes proclaimed for that county where the prisoner is detained, no person shall be removed from the common gaol upon any Habeas Corpus granted in pursuance of this act, but upon any such Habeas Corpus shall be brought before the Judge of Assize in open court, who is thereupon to do what to justice shall appertain.[50]

XIX. Provided nevertheless, That after the Assizes are ended, any person or persons detained, may have his or her Habeas Corpus according to the direction and intention of this act.

XX. And be it also enacted, That if any information, suit or action shall be brought or exhibited against any person or persons for any offence committed or to be committed against the form of this law, it shall be lawful for such defendants to plead the general issue, that they are Not Guilty, or that they owe nothing, and to give such special matter in evidence to the jury that shall try the same, which matter being pleaded had been good and sufficient matter in law to have discharged the said defendant or defendants against the said information, suit or action, and the said matter shall be then as available to him or them, to all intents and purposes, as if he or they had sufficiently plended, set forth or alleged the same matter in bar or discharge of such information suit or action.

17.1.2.8.b Act Directing the Mode of … Habeas Corpus, 1784

CHAPTER XXXV.

An act directing the mode of suing out of prosecuting writs of habeas corpus.

I. BE it enacted by the General Assembly. That when soever a habeas corpus shall be served, by delivering it to the officer or other person to whom it is directed, or by leaving it at the gaol or prison in which the party suing it out is detained, unless the warrant of commitment plainly and specially express the same to have been for treason or felony; if the charges of bringing the prisoner, to be ascertained by the court of judge who awarded the writ and thereon endorsed, not exceeding twelve pence per mile, be paid or tendered, and sufficient security to pay the charges of carrying him back in case he be remanded, and that he will not escape by the way, be given; then the officer or his deputy, within three days after such service, or if the prisoner is to be brought more than twenty miles, with in so many days more as will be equal to one day for every twenty miles of such further distance, shall make return of the writ, and bring the body of the prisoner, or cause it to be brought, before the proper judge or judges, according to the command thereof; and shall then likewise certify the true causes of his detainer or imprisonment. Every such writ shall be signed by him who awards it. And if any person shall be or stand committed or detained as aforesaid, for any crime, unless it be for treason or felony, plainly expressed in the warrant of commitment in the vacation time, the prisoner not being convict, or in complain to any judge of the high court of chancery or general court, who, at the request of such prisoner, or other person on his behalf, attested by two witnesses present at the delivery thereof, is hereby authorized, upon view of a copy of the warrant of commitment or detainer, or otherwise upon affidavit made that such copy was desired to be given by him in whose custody the prisoner is detained, to award and grant a habeas corpus, under the seal of the said court, to be directed to the officer in whose custody the party committed or detained shall be, returned immediately before the said judge, or any other judge of one of the said court; and upon service thereof as aforesaid, the officer or his deputy, in whose custody the party is so committed or detained, shall, within the times before respectively limited, bring the prisoner before the court, or one of the judges thereof, before any other of them, with the return of the writ and the true causes of the commitment and detainer; and thereupon the judge before whom the prisoner shall be brought, shall, within two days thereafter, discharge him from imprisonment, taking his recognizance with surety in any sum, according to the discretion of the judge, having regard to the circumstances of the prisoner, and nature of the offence for his appearance in the general court the term following, or in some other court where the offence is properly cognizable, as the case shall require; and then also certify the said writ with the return thereof, and the said recognizance into the said court where such appearance is to be made, unless it shall appear to the judge that the party so committed is detained upon a legal process order or warrant, out of some court that hath jurisdiction of criminal matters, or by some warrant signed and sealed with the hand and seal of any of the said judges, or some justice of the peace, for such matters or offences, for the which, by the law, the prisoner is not bailable.

If any person shall have willfully neglected, by the space of two terms after his imprisonment, to pray a habeas corpus for his enlargement, such writ shall not be granted to him in vacation, in pursuance of this act. Any officer neglecting or refusing to make the return aforesaid, or to bring the body of the prisoner according to the command of the writ within the time aforesaid, and not delivering a true copy of the warrant of commitment and detainer, within six hours after demand thereof made, to the prisoner, or person demanding it on his behalf, which copy the officer or his deputy is hereby required to deliver, shall forfeit to the prisoner, one hundred pounds; to recover which, the right of action shall not cease by the death of either of both the parties. No person who shall have been delivered upon a habeas corpus, shall afterwards be imprisoned or committed for the same offence, otherwise than by the order or process of the court wherein he shall be bound by recognizance to appear, or some other court having jurisdiction of the cause. A citizen of this commonwealth committed to prison in custody of an officer for any criminal matter, shall not be removed from thence into the custody of another officer, unless it be by habeas corpus, or some other legal writ, or where the prisoner shall be delivered to the constable, or other inferior officer, to be carried to some common gaol, or shall be sent by warrant of an alderman to some common workhouse, or shall be removed from one place to another within the same county, in order to his discharge or trial, in due course of law; or in case of sudden fire or infection, or other necessity, or where the prisoner shall be charged by affidavit with treason or felony, alleged to be done in any of the other United States of America, in which last case he shall be sent thither in custody, by order of the general court, or warrant of any two judges thereof in vacation time, or may be bound by recognizance, with sureties before them, to appear there, whichsoever shall seem most proper, if the said court of judges, upon consideration of the matter, shall think he ought to be put upon his trial. Any person as aforesaid may move for and obtain his habeas corpus, as well out of the high court of chancery as out of the general court: And if any judge of either of the said courts in the vacation time, upon view of the copy of the warrant of commitment or detainer, or upon affidavit made, that such copy was denied as aforesaid, shall refuse any writ of habeas corpus by this act required to be granted, being moved for as aforesaid, such judge shall be liable to the action of the party grieved.

17.1.3.2Petition of Right, 1629

THE Peticion Exhibited to His Majestie by the Lords Spirituall and Temporall and Cōmons in this psent Parliament assembled concning divers Rights; and Liberties of the Subjects: with the Kings; Majesties Royall Aunswere thereunto in full Parliament.[51]

To the Kings; most Excellent Majestic.

HUMBLY shew unto our Soveraigne Lord the King the Lords Spirituall and Temporall and Cōmons in Parliament assembled, That whereas it is declared and enacted by a Statute made in the tyme of the Raigne of King Edward the first cōmonly called Statutum de Tallagio non concedendo,[52] That no Tallage or Ayde should be layd or levyed by the King or his Heires in this Realme without the good will and assent of the Archbishopps Bishopps Earles Barons Knights Burgesses and other the Freemen of the Cōmonaltie of this Realme, And by Authoritie of Parliament holden in the five and twentith yeare of the raigne of King Edward the third, it is declared and enacted, That from thenceforth no p– son should be compelled to make any Loanes to the King against his will because such Loanes were against reason and the franchise of the Land, And by other Lawes of this Realme it is pp– vided, that none should be charged by any charge or Imposicion called a Benevolence nor by such like Charge by which the Statutes before mencioned and other the good Lawes and Statutes of this Realme your Subjects have inherited this Freedome That they should [not] [a] be compelled to contribute to any Taxe Tallage Ayde or other like Charge not sett by cōmon consent in Parliament.

Yet neverthelesse of late divers Cōmissions[53] directed to sundry Cōmissioners in severall Counties with Instruccions have issued, by meanes whereof your people have been in divers places assembled and required to lend certaine sōmes of mony unto your Majestie, and many of them uppon their refusall soe to doe have had an Oath administred unto them not warrantable by the Lawes or Statutes of this Realme and have been constrayned to become bound to make apparance and give attendance before your Prívie Councell and in other places; and others of them have been therefore imprisoned confined and sondry other waies molested and disquieted And divers other charges have been laid and levied upon your people in severall Counties by Lord Lieuten'nts Deputie Lieuten'nts Cōmissioners for Musters Justices of Peace and others by Cōmaund or Direccion from your Majestie or your Privie Councell against the Lawes and free Customes of the Realme.

And where alsoe by the Statute called The great Charter of the Liberties of England,[54] It is declared and enacted, That no Freeman may be taken or imprisoned or be disseised of his Freehold or Liberties or his free Customes or be outlawed or exiled or in any manner destroyed, but by the lawfull Judgment of his Peeres or by the Law of the Land.

And in the eight and twentith yeere of the raigne of King Edward the third it was declared and enacted by authoritie of Parliament,[55] that no man of what estate or condicion that he be, should be put out of his Land or Tenements nor taken nor imprisoned nor disherited nor put to death without being brought to aunswere by due p– cesse of Lawe.

Neverthelesse against the tenor of the said Statutes and other the good Lawes and Statutes of your Realme to that end p– vided, divers of your Subjects have of late been imprisoned without any cause shewed: And when for their deliverance they were brought before your Justices by your Majesties Writts of Habeas corpus there to undergoe and receive as the Court should order, and their Keepers cōmaunded to certifie the causes of their detayner, no cause was certified, but that they were deteined by your Majesties speciall cōmaund signified by the Lords of your Privie Councell, and yet were returned backe to severall prisons without being charged with any thing to which they might make aunswere according to the Lawe.[56]

And whereas of late great Companies of Souldiers and Marriners have been dispersed into divers Counties of the Realme,[57] and the inhabitants against their wills have been compelled to receive them into their houses, and there to suffer them to sojourne against the Lawes and Customes of this Realme and to the great greivance and vexacion of the people.

And whereas alsoe by authoritie of Parliament in the five and twentith yeare of the Raigne of King Edward the third[58] it is declared and enacted that no man should be forejudged of life or limbe against the forme of the Great Charter and the Lawe of the Land, And by the said Great Charter, and other the Lawes and Statutes of this your Realme no man ought to be adjudged to death but by the Lawes established in this your Realme, either by the customes of the same Realme or by Acts of Parliament. And whereas no offendor of what kinde soever is exempted from the pceedings; to be used and punishments to be inflicted by the Lawes and Statutes of this your Realme, Neverthelesse of late [tyme[59]] divers Cōmissions under your Majesties great Seale have issued forth, by which certaine p– sons have been assigned and appointed Cōmmissioners with power and authoritie to pceed within the land according to the Justice of Martiall Lawe against such Souldiers or Marriners or other dissolute p– sons joyning with them as should cōmitt any murther robbery felony mutiny or other outrage or misdemeanor whatsoever, and by such sūmary course and order as is agreeable to Martiall Lawe and as is used in Armies in tyme of warr to p– ceed to the tryall and condemnation of such offenders, and them to cause to be executed and putt to death according to the Lawe Martiall.[60]

By ptext whereof some of your Majesties Subjects have been by some of the said Cōmissioners put to death, when and where, if by the Lawes and Statutes of the land they had deserved death, by the same Lawes and Statutes alsoe they might and by no other ought to have byn judged and executed.

And alsoe sundrie greivous offendors by colour thereof clayming an exemption have escaped the punishments due to them by the Lawes and Statutes of this your Realme, by reason that divers of your Officers and ministers of Justic have unjustlie refused or forborne to p– ceed against such Offendors according to the same Lawes and Statutes uppon p– tence that the said offenders were punishable onelie by Martiall law and by authoritie of such Cōmissions as aforesaid. Which Cōmissions and all other of like nature are wholly and directlie contrary to the said Lawes and Statutes of this your Realme.

They doe therefore humblie pray your most Excellent Majestie,[61] that no man hereafter be compelled to make or yeild any Guift Loane Benevolence Taxe or such like Charge without cōmon consent by Acte of Parliament, And that none be called to make aunswere or take such Oath or to give attendance or be confined or otherwise molested or disquieted concerning the same or for refusall thereof. And that no freeman in any such manner as is before mencioned be imprisoned or deteined. And that your Majestie would be pleased to remove the said Souldiers and Mariners and that your people may not be soe burthened in tyme to come. And that the aforesaid Cōmissions for pceeding by Martiall Lawe may be revoked and annulled. And that hereafter no Cōmissions of like nature may issue forth to any p– son or p– sons whatsoever to be executed as aforesaid, lest by colour of them any of your Majesties Subjects be destroyed or put to death contrary to the Lawes and Franchise of the Land.

All which they most humblie pray of your most Excellent Majestie as their Rights; and Liberties according to the Lawes and Statutes of this Realme, And that your Majestie would alsoe vouchsafe to declare that the Awards doings and pceedings; to the p– judice of your people in any of the p– misses shall not be drawen hereafter into consequence or example. And that your Majestie would be alsoe graciouslie pleased for the further comfort and safetie of your people to declare your Royall will and pleasure, That in the things aforesaid all your Officers and Ministers shall serve you according to the Lawes and Statutes of this Realme as they tender the Honor of your Majestie and the prosperitie of this Kingdome.

17.2.1PHILADELPHIA CONVENTION

17.2.1.1August 28, 1787

Mr. Pinkney [sic], urging the propriety of securing the benefit of the Habeas corpus in the most ample manner, moved "that it should not be suspended but on the most urgent occasions, & then only for a limited time not exceeding twelve months"

Mr. Rutlidge [sic] was for declaring the Habeas Corpus inviolable—He did [not] conceive that a suspension could ever be necessary at the same time through all the States –

Mr. Govr Morris moved that "The privilege of the writ of Habeas Corpus shall not be suspended, unless where in cases of Rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it".

Mr. Wilson doubted whether in any case [a suspension] would be necessary, as the discretion now exists with Judges, in most important cases to keep in Gaol or admit to Bail.

The first part of Mr. Govr. Morris' [motion,] to the word "unless" was agreed to nem: con:—on the remaining part;

17.2.2.1Maryland, November 29, 1787

> Mr. McHenry … Public Safety may require a suspension of the Ha: Corpus in cases of necessity: when those cases do not exist, the virtuous Citizen will ever be protected by his opposition to power, 'till corruption shall have obliterated every sense of Honor & Virtue from a Brave and free People. …
>
> Farrand, vol. 3, p. 149.

> Mr. Martin … By the next paragraph, the general government is to have a power of suspending the habeas corpus act, in cases of rebellion or invasion.
>
> As the State governments have a power of suspending the habeas corpus act, in those cases, it was said there could be no good reason for giving such a power to the general government, since whenever the State which is invaded or in which an insurrection takes place, finds its safety requires it, it will make use of that power And it was urged, that if we gave this power to the general government, it would be an engine of oppression in its hands, since whenever a State should oppose its views, however arbitrary and unconstitutional, and refuse submission to them, the general government may declare it to be an act of rebellion, and suspending the habeas corpus act, may seize upon the persons of those advocates of freedom, who have had virtue and resolution enough to excite the opposition, and may imprison them during its pleasure in the remotest part of the union, so that a citizen of Georgia might be bastiled in the furthest part of New Hampshire or a citizen of New Hampshire in the furthest extreme to the south, cut off from their family, their friends, and their every connection. These considerations induced me, Sir, to give my negative also to this clause.

17.2.2.2Massachusetts

17.2.2.2.aJanuary 26, 1788

The paragraph which provides, that “the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless in cases of rebellion or invasion,” was read, when

Gen. THOMPSON asked the President, to please to proceed—we have, says he, read the book often enough—it is a consistent piece of inconsistency.

Hon. Mr. ADAMS, in answer to an enquiry of the Hon. Mr. Taylor, said, that this power given to the general government to suspend this privilege in cases of rebellion and invasion, did not take away the power of the several States to suspend it, if they see fit.

Dr. TAYLOR asked, why this darling privilege was not expressed in the same manner it was in the constitution of Massachusetts—(Here the Hon. Gentleman read the paragraph respecting it in the constitution of this State and then the one in the proposed Constitution)—He remarked on the difference of expression, and asked why the time was not limited.

Judge DANA, said the answer, in part, to the Hon. Gentleman must be that the same men did not make both Constitutions—that he did not see the necessity or great benefit of limiting the time—Supposing it had been, as in our Constitution, “not exceeding twelve months,” yet as our legislature can, so might the Congress continue the suspension of the writ from time to time, or from year to year.—The safest and best restriction, therefore, arises from the nature of the cases in which Congress are authorised to exercise that power at all, namely, in those of rebellion or invasion. These are clear and certain terms—facts of publick notoriety. And whenever these shall cease to exist, the suspension of the writ must necessarily cease also.—He thought the citizen had a better security for his privilege of the writ of habeas corpus under the federal than under the State Constitution; for our legislature may suspend the writ as often as they judge “the most urgent and pressing occasions” call for it. He hoped these short observations would satisfy the Hon. Gentleman’s enquiries, otherwise he should be happy in endeavouring to do it, by going more at large into the subject.

Judge SUMNER said, that this was a restriction on Congress, that the writ of habeas corpus should not be suspended, except in cases of rebellion and invasion. The learned Judge then explained the nature of this writ.—When a person, said he, is imprisoned, he applies to Judge of the Supreme Court—the Judge issues his writ to the jailor, calling upon him to have the body of the person imprisoned, before him, with the crime on which he was committed.—If it then appears that the person was legally committed, and that he was not bailable, he is remanded to prison; if illegally confined, he is enlarged [i.e., released]. This privilege, he said, is essential to freedom—and therefore the power to suspend it, is restricted. On the other hand, the state, he said, might be involved in danger—the worst enemy may lay plans to destroy us, and so artfully as to prevent any evidence against him, and might ruin the country, without the power to suspend the writ was thus given.—Congress have only power to suspend the privilege to persons committed by their authority. A person committed under the authority of this state, will still have a right to this writ.

Massachusetts Convention.

17.2.2.2.bFebruary 1, 1788

Mr. NASSON …The paragraph that gives Congress power to suspend the writ of habeas corpus, claims a little attention—This is a great bulwark—a great privilege indeed—we ought not, therefore, to give it up, on any slight pretence. Let us see—how long it is to be suspended? As long as rebellion or invasion shall continue. This is exceedingly loose. Why is not the time limited, as in our Constitution? But, sir, its design would then be defeated—It was the intent, and by it we shall give up one of our greatest privileges. Mr. N concluded by saying, he had much more to say, but as the House was impatient, he should sit down for the present, to give other gentlemen an opportunity to speak.

Timothy Winn…

I think the time for which our Legislators are chosen and are to stand, without alteration, much too long; and the power with which they are vested is so great, that the body of the people cannot reasonably expect to enjoy the rights of their persons and property under this system; more especially considering, that they are deprived of the benefit of the Habeas Corpus, which is so essential for preserving the rights of freemen, which we so earnestly contended for, with united efforts, and freely offered our lives and fortunes to obtain in the late British war. …

Smilie: … It seems however that the members of the Federal Convention were themselves convinced, in some degree, of the expediency and propriety of a bill of rights, for we find them expressly declaring that the writ of habeas corpus and the trial by jury in criminal cases shall not be suspended or infringed. …

Whitehill: … Upon the whole, therefore, I wish it to be seriously considered, whether we have a right to leave the liberties of the people to such future constructions and expositions as may possibly be made upon this system; particularly when its advocates, even at this day, confess that it would be dangerous to omit anything in the enumeration of a bill of rights, and according to their principle, the reservation of the habeas corpus and trial by jury in criminal cases may hereafter be construed to be the only privileges reserved by the people.

Dallas' Notes.

Smilie: There is no security for our rights in this Constitution. Preamble to Declaration of Independence. Why did they [delegates to the Philadelphia Convention] omit a bill of rights?

With respect to trial by jury and habeas corpus there is a bill of rights. Without one, we cannot know when Congress exceed their powers. There is no check but the people. No security for the rights of conscience.

Wilson's Notes.

Smilie: … Trials by jury in criminal cases are reserved and the privilege of the habeas corpus act. There are mere parts of our bill of rights and all that are given to us. In this Constitution there is no security for the right of conscience.

Yeates's Notes.

THOMAS MCKEAN … Though Congress will have power to declare war, it is here stipulated that "the privilege of the writ of Habeas Corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it"…

Elliott, vol. 2, p. 417.

17.2.2.4.bNovember 30, 1787

ROBERT WHITEHILL … No satisfactory reason has yet been offered for the omission of a bill of rights; but, on the contrary, the honorable members are defeated in the only pretext which they have been able to assign, that every thing which is not given is excepted, for we have shown that there are two articles expressly reserved, the writ of habeas corpus and the trial by jury in criminal cases; and we have called upon them in vain, to reconcile this reservation with the tenor of their favorite proposition. …

Dallas' Notes.

THOMAS HARTLEY … Some articles indeed, from their preeminence in the scale of political security, deserve to be particularly specified, and these have not been omitted in the system before us. The definition of treason, the writ of habeas corpus, and the trial by jury in criminal cases are here expressly provided for; and in going thus far, solid foundation has been laid. …

Dallas' Notes.

JASPER YEATES …1st Objection: The want of a bill of rights.

Response: Our governments differ in their formation from England and therefore, tho necessary there, not so here. New Hampshire, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, South Carolina, Georgia, and perhaps Virginia have no bill of rights. Are they not free? Do they hold their liberties as tenants at will? But an enumeration would be dangerous; part might be omitted and therefore excluded. Whatever is not expressly ceded to the federal government is still reserved.

But it is said we have adopted part of the bill of rights, as in reserving the trials by jury in criminal cases, and directing that the privilege of the habeas corpus act shall not be suspended except in time of immediate danger.

Response: This is restrictive of the general legislative powers of Congress. They might claim this right if not restrained. Their powers being enumerated, it became necessary to make exceptions. This clause does not form a bill of rights, but are the express exceptions from the general delegated powers of Congress.

Yeates's Notes.

JAMES WILSON: Summary of Objections to the Constitution.

(1) There is no bill of rights. Many of the state have bills of rights. There are some reservations; why not more? Powers given, and powers and rights reserved ought all to be enumerated. What harm in a bill of rights?
(2) There is no check but the people. Our liberties are not secured but as to habeas corpus.

Wilson's Notes.

17.2.2.4.d December 18, 1787

THE DISSENT OF THE MINORITY OF THE CONVENTION

The first consideration that this review suggests is the emission of a BILL OF RIGHTS ascertaining and fundamentally establishing those unalienable and personal rights of men, without the full, free, and secure enjoyment of which there can be no liberty, and over which it is necessary for a good government to have the control. The principal of which are the rights of conscience, personal liberty by the clear and unequivocal establishment of the writ of habeas corpus, jury trial in criminal and civil cases, by an impartial jury of the vicinage or county…

Mr. Nicholas.

… But it is complained, that they may suspend our laws. The suspension of the writ of habeas corpus is only to take place in cases of rebellion, or invasion. This is necessary in those cases—in every other case, Congress is restrained from suspending it.—In no other case can they suspend our laws —and this is a most estimable security…

Elliot, vol. 3, p. 102.

17.2.2.5.bJune 10, 1788

Governor [Edmund] Randolph.

… It is also objected, that the trial by jury, the writ of habeas corpus, and the liberty of the press, are insecure. But I contend that the habeas corpus is at least on as secure and good a footing as it is in England. In that country it depends on the will of the Legislature. That privilege is secured here by the Constitution, and is only to be suspended in cases of extreme emergency. Is not this a fair footing? After agreeing that the Government of England secures liberty, how do we distrust this Government? Why distrust ourselves? …

Elliot, vol. 3, p. 467.

17.2.2.5.cJune 15, 1788

Mr. Henry,—Mr. Chairman—We have now come to the ninth section, and I consider myself at liberty to take a short view of the whole. I wish to do it very briefly. Give me leave to remark, that there is a Bill of Rights in that Government. There are express restrictions which are in the shape of a Bill of Rights: But they bear the name of the ninth section. The design of the negative expressions in this section is to prescribe limits, beyond which the powers of Congress shall not go. These are the sole bounds intended by the American Government. Where abouts do we stand with respect to a Bill of Rights? Examine it, and compare it to the idea manifested by the Virginian Bill of Rights, or that of the other States. The restraints in this Congressional Bill of Rights, are so feeble and few, that it would have been infinitely better to have said nothing about it. The fair implication is, that they can do every thing they are not forbidden to do. What will be the result if Congress, in the course of their legislation, should do a thing not restrained by this ninth section? It will fall as an incidental power to Congress, not being prohibited expressly in the Constitution. The first prohibition is, that the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, but when in cases of rebellion, or invasion, the public safety may require it. It results clearly, that if it had not said so, they could suspend it in all cases whatsoever. It reverses the position of the friends of this Constitution, that every thing is retained which is not given up. For instead of this, every thing is given up, which is not expressly reserved.—It does not speak affirmatively, and say that it shall be suspended in those cases. But that it shall not be suspended but in certain cases; going on a supposition that every thing which is not negatived, shall remain with Congress. If the power remains with the people, how can Congress supply the want of an affirmative grant? They cannot do it but by implication, which destroys their doctrine. …

If Gentlemen think that securing the slave trade is a capital object; that the privilege of the habeas corpus is sufficiently secured; that the exclusion of ex post facto laws will produce no inconvenience; that the publication from time to time will secure their property; in one word, that this section alone will sufficiently secure their liberties, I have spoken in vain.—Every word of mine, and of my worthy coadjutor [George Mason], is lost. I trust that Gentlemen, on this occasion, will see the great objects of religion, liberty of the press, trial by jury, interdiction of cruel punishments, and every other sacred right secured, before they agree to that paper. These most important human rights are not protected by that section, which is the only safeguard in the Constitution.—My mind will not be quieted till I see something substantial come forth in the shape of a Bill of Rights.

Governor Randolph…

But the insertion of the negative restrictions has given cause of triumph it seems, to Gentlemen. They suppose, that it demonstrates that Congress are to have powers by implication. I will meet them on that ground. I persuade myself, that every exception here mentioned, is an exception not from general powers, but from the particular powers therein vested. To what power in the General Government is the exception made, respecting the importation of negroes? Not from a general power, but from a particular power expressly enumerated. This is an exception from the power given them of regulating commerce. He asks, where is the power to which the prohibition of suspending the habeas corpus is an exception. I contend that by virtue of the power given to Congress to regulate courts, they could suspend the writ of habeas corpus.—This is therefore an exception to that power. …

Elliott, vol. pp. 460–64.

17.2.2.5.dJune 21, 1788

Mr. Grayson… The conclusion then is, that they can hang any one they please by having a jury to suit their purpose. They might on particular extraordinary occasions suspend the privilege. The Romans did it on creating a Dictator. The British Government does it, when the habeas corpus is to be suspended—when the salus populi is affected. I never will consent to it unless it be properly defined.

Elliott, vol. 3.

17.2.2.5.eJune 24, 1788

Mr. [Patrick] Henry … We have infinitely more reason to dread general warrants here, than they have in England; because there, if a person be confined, liberty may be quickly obtained by the writ of habeas corpus. But here a man living many hundred miles from the Judges, may rot in prison before he can get the writ. …

Mr. Wythe reported, from the Committee appointed, such amendments to the proposed Constitution of Government for the United States, as were by them deemed necessary to be recommended to the consideration of the Congress which shall first assemble under the said Constitution…

That there be a Declaration of Bill of Rights asserting and securing from encroachment the essential and unalienable rights of the people in some such manner as the following:

10th. That every freeman restrained of his liberty is entitled to a remedy to enquire into the lawfulness thereof, and to remove the same, if unlawful, and that such remedy ought not to be denied nor delayed.

The next Article provides for the privilege of the Writ of Habeas Corpus—The Trial by Jury in all cases, Criminal as well as Civil—the Freedom of the Press, and the prevention of Religious Tests, as qualifications of Trust or Emolument: The three first essential in Free Governments; the last, a provision the world will expect from you, in the establishment of a System founded on Republican Principles, and in an age so liberal and enlightened as the present.

17.2.3.2Federal Farmer, No. 4, October 12, 1787

… If the federal constitution is to be construed so far in connection with the state constitutions, as to leave the trial by jury in civil causes, for instance, secured; on the same principles it would have left the trial by jury in criminal causes, the benefits of the writ of habeas corpus, &c. secured; they all stand on the same footing; they are the common rights of Americans, and have been recognized by the state constitutions: But the convention found it necessary to recognize or reestablish the benefits of that writ, and the jury trial in criminal cases. As to expost facto laws, the convention has done the same in one case, and gone further in another. It is part of the compact between the people of each state and their rulers, that no expost facto laws shall be made. But the convention, by Art. I Sect. 10 have put a sanction upon this part even of the state compacts. In fact, the 9th and 10th Sections in Art. I. in the proposed constitution, are no more nor less, than a partial bill of rights; they establish certain principles as part of the compact upon which the federal legislators and officers can never infringe. It is here wisely stipulated, that the federal legislature shall never pass a bill of attainder, or expost facto law; that no tax shall be laid on articles exported, &c. The establishing of one right implies the necessity of establishing another and similar one.

On the whole, the position appears to me to be undeniable, that this bill of rights ought to be carried farther, and some other principles established, as a part of this fundamental compact between the people of the United States and their federal rulers.

… The last trait which I remarked in the character of the Georgian was that he was averse to all such measures as would tend to restrain the enterprising. This is evident from his opposition to the suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus—an opposition that was surely well founded, for, if such a suspension was ever allowed, such worthy characters as Shays and Wheeler might be forced into prison, confined there till their trial, and at length be hung for attempting to introduce a desirable reformation in government. It may not be out of order to remark here that the Georgian has, with admirable foresight, given perpetuity to his system by insisting that the writ of habeas corpus shall remain inviolate forever. …

17.2.3.8Cassius, No. 6, December 18, 1787

Section 9th says, The writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless in case of rebellion, or the invasion of the publick safety may require it. It has been asserted by some, that a person accused of a crime, would be obliged to ruin himself, in order to prove his innocence; as he would be obliged to repair to the seat of federal government, in order to have his cause tried before a federal court, and be liable to pay all expense which might be incured [sic] in the undertaking. But the section beforementioned proves that assertion to be futile and false, as it expressly provides for securing the right of the subject, in regard to his being tried in his own state.

Of rights, some are natural and unalienable, of which even the people cannot deprive individuals: Some are constitutional or fundamental; these cannot be altered or abolished by the ordinary laws; but the people, by express acts, may alter or abolish them—These, such as the trial by jury, the benefits of the writ of habeas corpus, &c. individuals claim under the solemn compacts of the people, as constitutions, or at least under laws so strengthened by long usuage as not to be repealable by the ordinary legislature—and some are common or mere legal rights, that is, such as individuals claim under laws which the ordinary legislature may alter or abolish at pleasure.

In England, the people have been led uniformly, and systematically by their representatives to secure their rights by compact, and to abolish innovations upon the government: they successively obtained Magna Charta, the powers of taxation, the power to propose laws, the habeas corpus act, bill of rights, &c. they, in short, secured general and equal liberty, security to their persons and property; and, as an everlasting security and bulwark of their liberties, they fixed the democratic branch in the legislature, and jury trial in the execution of the laws, the freedom of the press, &c.

In the same section it is provided, that "the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in cases of rebellion and invasion, the public safety may require it." This clause limits the power of the legislature to deprive a citizen of the right of habeas corpus, to particular cases viz. those of rebellion and invasion; the reason is plain, because in no other cases can this power be exercised for the general good.

New-York Journal.

17.2.3.12Federal Farmer, No. 16, January 20, 1788

Security against expost facto laws, the trial by jury, and the benefits of the writ of habeas corpus, are but a part of those inestimable rights the people of the United States are entitled to, even in judicial proceedings, by the course of the common law. These may be secured in general words, as in New-York, the Western Territory, &c. by declaring the people of the United States shall always be entitled to judicial proceedings according to the course of the common law, as used and established in the said states. Perhaps it would be better to enumerate the particular essential rights the people are entitled to in these proceedings, as has been done in many of the states, and as has been done in England. In this case, the people may proceed to declare, that no man shall be held to answer to any offence, till the same be fully described to him; nor to furnish evidence against himself: that, except in the government of the army and navy, no person shall be tried for any offence, whereby he may incur loss of life, or an infamous punishment, until he be first indicted by a grand jury: that every person shall have a right to produce all proofs that may be favourable to him, and to meet the witnesses against him face to face: that every person shall be entitled to obtain right and justice freely and without delay: that all persons shall have a right to be secure from all unreasonable searches and seizures of their persons, houses, papers, or possessions; and that all warrants shall be deemed contrary to this right, if the foundation of them be not previously supported by oath, and there be not in them a special designation of persons or objects of search, arrest, or seizure: and that no person shall be exiled or molested in his person or effects, otherwise than by the judgment of his peers, or according to the law of the land.

It was my wish that the general government should not have the power of suspending the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, as it appears to me altogether unnecessary, and that the power given to it may and will be used as a dangerous engine of oppression, but I could not succeed.

17.2.3.16Federalist, No. 83 (Hamilton), May 28, 1788

But I must acknowledge that I cannot readily discern the inseparable connection between the existence of liberty, and the trial by jury in civil cases. Arbitrary impeachments, arbitrary methods of prosecuting pretended offences, and arbitrary punishments upon arbitrary convictions, have ever appeared to me to be the great engines of judicial despotism; and these have all relation to criminal proceedings. The trial by jury in criminal cases, aided by the habeas corpus act, seems therefore to be alone concerned in the question. And both of these are provided for, in the most ample manner, in the plan of the convention.

Cooke, pp. 562–63.

17.2.3.17Federalist, No. 84 (Hamilton), May 28, 1788

Independent of those which relate to the structure of the government, we find the following: Article I, section 3, clause 7 “Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States; but the party convicted shall, nevertheless, be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law.” Section 9, of the same article, clause 2 “The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it.” Clause 3. “No bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed.” Clause 7. “No title of nobility shall be granted by the United States; and no person holding any office of profit or trust under them, shall, without the consent of the Congress, accept of any present, emolument, office, or title of any kind whatever, from any king, prince, or foreign state.” Article III, section 2, clause 3 “The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury; and such trial shall be held in the state where the said crimes shall have been committed; but when not committed within any state, the trial shall be at such place or places as the congress may by law have directed.” Section 3, of the same article “Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort. No person shall be convicted of treason, unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court.” And clause 3, of the same section “The congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason, but no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood, or forfeiture, except during the life of the person attainted.”

It may well be a question whether these are not, upon the whole, of equal importance with any which are to be found in the constitution of this state. The establishment of the writ of habeas corpus, the prohibition of ex post facto laws, and of TITLES OF NOBILITY, to which we have no corresponding provisions in our constitution, are perhaps greater securities to liberty and republicanism than any it contains. The creation of crimes after the commission of the fact, or, in other words, the subjecting of men to punishment for things which, when they were done, were breaches of no law, and the practice of arbitrary imprisonments have been in all ages the favorite and most formidable instruments of tyranny. The observations of the judicious Blackstone in reference to the latter, are well worthy of recital: “To bereave a man of life, (says he) or by violence to confiscate his estate, without accusation or trial, would be so gross and notorious an act of despotism, as must at once convey the alarm of tyranny throughout the whole nation; but confinement of the person, by secretly hurrying him to gaol, where his sufferings are unknown or forgotten, is a less public, a less striking, and therefore a more dangerous engine of arbitrary government." And as a remedy for this fatal evil, he is every where peculiarly emphatical in his encomiums on the habeas corpus act, which in one place he calls "the BULWARK of the British Constitution."

… I will therefore make up the deficiency by adding a few words on the Constitution proposed by our Convention. I like much the general idea of framing a government which should go on of itself peaceably, without needing continual recurrence to the state legislatures. I like the organization of the government into Legislative, Judiciary & Executive. I like the power given the Legislature to levy taxes, and for that reason solely approve of the greater house being chosen by the people directly. For tho' I think a house chosen by them will be very illy qualified to legislate for the Union, for foreign nations &c. yet this evil does not weigh against the good of preserving inviolate the fundamental principle that the people are not to be taxed but by representatives chosen immediately by themselves. I am captivated by the compromise of the opposite claims of the great & little states, of the latter to equal, and the former to proportional influence. I am much pleased too with the substitution of the method of voting by persons, instead of that of voting by states: and I like the negative given to the Executive with a third of either house, though I should have liked it better had the Judiciary been associated for that purpose, or invested with a similar and separate power. There are other good things of less moment. I will now add what I do not like. First the omission of a bill of rights providing clearly & without the aid of sophisms for freedom of religion, freedom of the press, protection against standing armies, restriction against monopolies, the eternal & unremitting force of the habeas corpus laws, and trials by jury in all matters of fact triable by the laws of the land & not by the law of Nations. To say, as Mr. Wilson does, that a bill of rights was not necessary because all is reserved in the case of the general government which is not given, while in the particular ones all is given which is not reserved, might do for the Audience to whom it was addressed, but is surely a gratis dictum, opposed by strong inferences from the body of the instrument, as well as from the omission of the clause of our present confederation which had declared that in express terms. It was a hard conclusion to say because there has been no uniformity among the states as to the cases triable by jury, because some have been so incautious as to abandon this mode of trial, therefore the more prudent states shall be reduced to the same level of calamity. It would have been much more just and wise to have concluded the other way that as most of the states had judiciously preserved this palladium, those who had wandered should be brought back to it, and to have established general right instead of general wrong. Let me add that a bill of rights is what the people are entitled to against every government on earth, general or particular, & what no just government should refuse or rest on inference. …

17.2.4.3Thomas Jefferson to Alexander Donald, February 7, 1788

… I wish with all my soul that the nine first Conventions may accept the new Constitution, because this will secure to us the good it contains, which I think great & important. but [sic] I equally wish that the four latest conventions, which they be, may refuse to accede to it till a declaration of rights be annexed. this [sic] would probably command the offer of such a declaration, & thus give to the whole fabric, perhaps as much perfection as any one of that kind ever had by a declaration of rights I mean one which shall stipulate freedom of religion, freedom of the press, freedom of commerce against monopolies, trial by juries in all cases, no suspensions of the habeas corpus, no standing armies. these [sic] are fetters against doing evil which no honest government should decline.

Boyd, vol. 12, pp. 570–72.

17.2.4.4Thomas Jefferson to James Madison, July 31, 1788

I sincerely rejoice at the acceptance of our new constitution by nine states. It is a good canvas, on which some strokes only want retouching. What these are, I think are sufficiently manifested by the general voice from North to South, which calls for a bill of rights. It seems pretty generally understood that this should go to Juries, Habeas corpus, Standing armies, Printing, Religion and Monopolies. I conceive there may be difficulty in finding general modification of these suited to the habits of all the states. But if such cannot be found then it is better to establish trials by jury, the right of Habeas corpus, freedom of the press and freedom of religion in all cases, and to abolish standing armies in time of peace, and Monopolies, in all cases, than not to do it in any. The few cases wherein these things may do evil, cannot be weighed against the multitude wherein the want of them will do evil.

17.3DISCUSSIONS OF RIGHTS

17.3.1TREATISES

17.3.1.1Coke, 1642

CAP. XXIX.

Nullus liber homo capiatur, vel imprisonetur, aut disseisietur de libero tenemento suo, vel libertatibus, vel liberis consuetudinibus suis, aut utlagetur, aut exuletur, aut aliquo modo destruatur, nec super eum ibimus, nec super eum mittemus, nisi per legale judicium parium suorum, vel per legem terrae. Nulli vendemus, nulli negabimus, aut differemus [Ed. More commonly, justitiam, vel rectum].[1]

[Nullus liber, &c.] This extends to Villeins, saving against their Lord, for they are free against all men, saving against their Lord. See the first part of the Institutes, sect. 189.

[Nullus liber homo.] Albeit homo doth extend to both sexes, men and women, yet by Act of Parliament it is enacted, and declared, that this Chapter should extend to Duchesses, Countesses, and Baronesses, but Marchionesses, and Vicountesses, are omitted, but not withstanding they are also comprehended within this Chapter.[2]

Upon this Chapter, as out of a roote, many fruitfull branches of the Law of England have sprung.

And therefore first the genuine sense hereof is to be saene, and after how the same hath been declared, and interpreted. For the first, for more perspicuity, it is necessary to divide this Chapter into severall branches, according to the true construction and reference of the words.

This Chapter containeth nine severall branches.

1. That no man be taken or imprisoned, but per legem terrae, that is, by the Common Law, Statute Law, or Custome of England; for these words, Per legem terrae being towards the end of this Chapter, doe referre to all the precedent matters in this Chapter, and this hath the first place because the liberty of a mans person is more precious to him, them all the rest follow, and therefore it is great reason, that he should by Law be relieved therein, if he be wronged, as hereafter shall be shewed.[3]

2. No man shall be disseised, that is, put out of seison, or dispossessed of his freehold (that is) lands, or liveliood, or of his liberties, or frée-customes, that is, of such franchises, and fréedomes, and frée-customes, as belong to him by his frée birthright, unlesse it be by the lawfull judgement, that is, verdict of his equals (that is, of men of his own condition) or by the Law of the Land (that is, to speak it once for all) by the due course, and processe of Law.

3. No man shall be outlawed, made an exlex, put out of the Law, that is, deprived of the benefit of the Law, unless he be outlawed according to the Law of the Land.

4. No man shall be exiled, or banished out of his Country, that is, Nemo perdet patriam, no man shall lose his Country, unlesse he be exiled according to the Law of the Land.
5. No man shall be in any sort destroyed (Destruere. i. quod prius structum, & factum fuit, penitus evertere & diruere) unlesse it be by the verdict of his equals, or according to the Law of the Land.
6. No man shall be condemned at the Kings suite, either before the King in his Bench, where the pleas are Coram Rege, (and so are the words, Nec super eum ibimus, to be understood) nor before any other Commissioner, or Judge whatsoever, and so are the words, Nec super eum mittemus, to be understood, but by the judgement of his Peers, that is, equalls, or according to the Law of the Land.
7. We shall sell to no man Justice or Right.
8. We shall deny to no man Justice or Right.
9. We shall defer to no man Justice or Right.

The genuine sense being distinctly understood, we shall procéed in order to unfold how the same have been declared, and interpreted. 1. By authority of Parliament. 2. By our books. 3. By precedent.

[Nullus liber homo capiatur, aut imprisonetur.]

Attached and arrested are comprehended herein.

1. No man shall be taken, (that is) restrained of liberty, by petition, suggestion to the King, or to his Councell,* unlesse it be by indictment, or presentment of good, and lawfull men, where such deeds be done. This branch, and divers other parts of this Act have béen notably explained by divers [a] Acts of Parliament, &c. quoted in the margent.

2. No man shall be disseised, &c.

[b] Hereby is intended, that lands, tenements, goods, and chattells shall not be seised into the Kings hands, contrary to this great Charter, and the Law of the Land; Nor any man shall be disseissed of his lands, or tenements, or dispossessed of his goods, or Chattels, contrary to the Law of the Land.

[c]A custome was alledged in the town of C. that if the Tenant cease by two yeares, that the Lord should enter into the freehold of the Tenant, and hold the same untill he were satisfied of the arrerages, and it was adjudged a custome against the Law of the Land, to enter into a mans fréehold in that case without action or answer.

King H. 6. graunted to the Corporation of Diers within London, power to search. &c. and if they found any cloth died with Logwood, that the cloth should be forfeit: and it was adjudged, that this Charter concerning the forfeiture, was against the Law of the Land, and this Statute: for no forfeiture can grow by Letters Patents.[4]

No man ought to be put from his livelihood without answer.

3. No man outlawed, that is, barred to have the benefit of the Law. Vide for the word, the first part of the Institutes.[5]

Note to this word utlagetur, these words, Nisi per legem terrae, do refer.

¶ De libertatibus.] This word, libertates, liberties, hath three significations:

1. First, as it hath béen said, it signifieth the Laws of the Realme, in which respect this Charter is called, Charta libertatum.

2. It signifieth the fréedomes, that the Subjects of England have; For example, the Company of the Merchant Tailors of England, having power by their Charter to make Ordinances, made an Ordinance, that every brother of the same Society should put the one half of his clothes to be dressed by some Clothworker frée of the same Company, upon pain to forfeit x. s. &c. and it was adjudged that this Ordinance was against Law, because it was against the Liberty of the Subject, for every subject hath fréedome to put his clothes to be dressed by whom he will & sic de similibus: And so it is, if such or the like graunt had béen made by his Letters Patents.[6]

3. Liberties signifieth the franchises, and priviledges, which the Subjects have of the gift of the King, as the goods, and Chattels of felons, outlawes, and the like, or which the subject claim by prescription, as wreck, waise, straie, and the like.

So likewise, and for the same reason, if a graunt be made to any man, to have the sole making of Cards, or the sole dealing with any other trade, that graunt is against the liberty, and fréedome of the Subject that before did, or lawfully might have used that trade, and consequently against this great Charter.[7]

Generally all monopolies are against this great Charter, because they are against the liberty and fréedome of the Subject, and against the Law of the Land.

¶ Liberis consuetudinibus.] Of Customes of the Realme, some be generall, and some particular. Of these reade in the first part of the Institutes. And liberis is added, for that the Customes of England bring a fréedome with them.

4. No man exiled.

By the Law of the Land no man can be exiled, or banished out of his native Countrey, but either by authority of Parliament, or in case of abjuration for felony by the Common Law: and so when our books, or any Record speak of exile, or banishment, other then in case of abjuration, it is to be intended to be done by authority of Parliament: [*] as Belknap and other Judges, &c. banished into Ireland.[8]

This is a beneficially Law, and is construed benignly, and therefore the King cannot send any Subject of England against his will to serve him out of this Realme, for that should be an exile, and he should perdere patriam: no, he cannot be sent against his will into Ireland, to serve the King as his Deputy there, because it is out of the Realme of England: for if the King might send him out of this Realme to any place, then under pretence of service, as Ambassadour, or the like, he might send him into the furthest part of the world, which being an exile, is prohibited by this Act. And albeit it was accorded in the Upper-house of Parliament, Anno 6 E. 3. nu. 6. that such learned men in the Law, as should bee sent, as Justices, or otherwise, to serve in Ireland, should have no excuse, yet that being no Act of Parliament, it did not binde the Subject. And this notably appeareth by a Record, in 44. E. 3. Sir Richard Pembrughs Case, who was Warden of the Cinque Ports, and had divers offices annuities, and lands graunted to him for life, or in fee by the King under the great Seale, Pro servitio impenso, & impendendo, The King commanded Sir Richard to serve him in Ireland, as his Deputy there, which he absolutely refused, whereupon the King by advice of his Councell, seised all things graunted to him, pro servitio impendendo, (in respect of that clause) but he was not upon that resolution committed to prison, as by that Record it appeareth: And the reason was because his refusall was lawfull, and if the refusall was lawfull to serve in Ireland parcell of the Kings Dominions à fortiori, a refusall is lawfull to serve in any forein Country. And it séemeth to me, that the said seisure was unlawfull, for pro servitio impenso & impendendo, must be intended lawfull service within the Realme.[9]

5. No man destroyed, & c.

That is, forejudged of life, or limbe, disherited, or put to torture, or death.[10]

The Mirror writing of the auncient Laws of England, saith, Soloient les Roys faire droit a touts, per eux, ou per lour Chiefe Justices, et ore les faits les Royes per lour Justices Comissaries errants assignes a touts pleas: En aid de tiels eires sont Tornes de Viscounts necessaries, & views de frankpl. & quant que bones gents a tiels inquests inditerent de peche mortel, soloient les Royes destruere sans respons &c. Accord est, que nul appelee, ne enditee soit destroy sans respons.[11]

Thomas Earle of Lancaster was destroyed, that is, adjudged to die, as a Traitor, and put to death in 14.E.2. and a Record thereof made: And Henry Earle of Lancaster his brother, and heire was restored for two principall errors in the proceeding against the said Thomas Earle, 1.Quod non fuit araniatus, & ad responsionem positus tempore pacis, eo quod cancellaria, & aliae curiae Regis fuer' apertae, in quibus lex fiebat unicuique, prout fieri consuevit, 2. Quod contra cartam de libertatibus, cum dictus Thomas fuit unus parium, & magnatum Regni, in qua continetur. (and reciteth this Chapter of Magna Charta, and specially. quod Dominus Rex non super eum ibit, rec mittet, nisi per legale judicum parium suorum, tamen per recordum praedictum, tempore pacis absqi aranamento, seu responsione, seu legali judicio parium suorum, contra legem, & contra tenorem Magnae Chartae.) he was put to death: More examples of this kinde might be shewed.[12]

Every oppression against Law, by colour or any usurped authority, is a kinde of destruction, for, Quando aliquid prohibetur, prohibetur, & omne, per quod devenitur ad illud: And it is the worst oppression, that is done by colour of Justice.[13]

It is to be noted, that to this Verb destruatur, are added aliquo modo, and to no other Verb in this Chapter, and therefore all things, by any manner of meanes tending to destruction, are prohibited: As if a man be accused, or indicted of treason, or felony, his lands, or goods cannot be graunted to any, no not so much as by promise, nor any of his lands, or goods seised into the Kings hands, before attainder: For when a Subject obtaineth a promise of the forfeiture, many times undue meanes and more violent prosecution is used for private lucre, tending to destruction, then the quiet and just procéeding of Law would permit, and the party ought to live of his own untill attainder.[14]

of Parliament: and neither noblemen of any other Country, nor others that are called Lords, and are no Lords of Parliament, are accounted Pares, Péérs within this statute, Who shall be said Pares, Péeres, or Equalls, see before Cap. 14. § per Pares.[15]

Here note, as is before this, that this is to be interested of the Kings sute for the words be, nec super eum ibimus, nec super mittemus, nisi per legale judicium parium suorum. Therefore, for example, if a Noble man be indicted for murder, he shall be tried by his Peeres, but if an appeale be brought against him, which is the suite of the party, there he shall not be tried by his Peeres, but by an ordinary jury of twelve men: and that for two reasons. First, for that the appeale cannot be brought before the Lord high Steward of England, who is the only Judge of Noble men, in case of Treason, or Felony. Secondly, this Statute extendeth only to the Kings suite.[16]

And it extendeth to the Kings suite in case of treason, or felony, or of misprision of treason, or felony, or being accessory to felony before, or after, and not to any other inferior offence. Also it extendeth to the triall it selfe, whereby he is to be convicted: but a Nobleman is to be indicted of treason, or felony, or of misprison, or being accessary to, in case of felony, by an inquest under the degree of Nobility: the number of the Noble men that are to be triers are, 12. or more.

And a Peer of the Realme may be indicted of treason, or felony, before, commissioners of Oier & Terminer, or in the Kings bench, if the treason or felony be committed in the county where the Kings bench sit: he also may be indicted of murder, or manslaughter, before the Coroner,&c. But if he be indicted in the Kings bench, or the indictment removed thither, the Noble man may plead his pardon there before the Judges of the Kings bench, and they have power to allow it, but he cannot confesse the indictment, or plead not guilty before the Judges of the Kings bench, but before the Lord Steward; and the reason of this diversity, that the triall or judgement must be before or by the Lord Steward, but the allowance of the pardon may be by the Kings bench, is because that is not within this Statute.[17]

If a Noble man be indicted, and cannot be found, process of Outlawrie shall be awarded against him per legem terrae, and be shall be Outlawed per judicium Coronatorum, but he shall be tried per judicium parium suorum, when he appeares and pleads to issue.[18]

¶ Per legale judicium.] By this word legale, amongst others, three things are imputed, 1. That this manner of triall was by Law, before this Statute. 2. That their verdict must be legally given, wherein principally it is to be observed. 1. That the Lords ought to heare no evidence, but in the presence, and hearing of the prisoner. 2. After the Lords be gone together to consider of the evidence, they cannot send to the high Steward to aske the Judges any question of Law, but in the hearing of the prisoner, that he may heare, whether the case be rightly put, for de facto jus oritur; neither can the Lords, when they are gone together, send for the Judges to know any opinion in Law, but the high Steward ought to demand it in Court in the hearing of the prisoner. 3. When all the evidence is given by the Kings learned Councell, the high Steward cannot collect the evidence against the prisoner, or in any sort conferre with the Lords touching their evidence, in the absence of the prisoner, but he ought to be called to it; and all this is implied in this word, legale. And therefore it shall be necessary for all such prisoners, after evidence given against him, and before he depart from the Barre, to require Justice of the Lord Steward, and of the other Lords, that no question be demanded by the Lords, or speech or conference had by any with the Lords, but in open Court in his presence, and hearing, or else he shall not take any advantage thereof after verdict, and judgement given: but the handling thereof at large and of other things concerning this matter, belongs to another treatise, as before I have shewed, only this may suffice for the exposition of this Statute. See the 3. part of the Institutes, cap. Treason.[19]

And it is here called Judicium parium, and not veredictum, because the Noble men returned, and charged, are not sworne, but give their judgement upon their Honour, and ligeance to the King, for so are all the entries of record, separately beginning at the puisne Lord, and so ascending upward.

And though of ancient time the Lords, and Peeres of the Realms used in Parliament to give judgement, in case of treason and felony, against those, that were no Lords of Parliament, yet at the suite of the Lords it was enacted, that albeit the Lords and Peeres of the Realme, as judges of the Parliament, in the presence of the King, had taken upon them to give judgement, in case of treason and felony, of such as were no Peeres of the Realme, that hereafter no Peeres shall be driven to give judgement on any others, then on their Peeres according to the law.[20]

This triall by Peeres was very auncient, for I reade, that William the Conqueror, in the beginning of his raigne, created William Fitzosberne (who was Earle of Bretevil in Normandy) Earle of Hereford in England, his sonne Roger succeeded him, and was Earle of Hereford, who under colour of his sisters marriage at Exninge, neare Newmarket in Cambridge shire, whereat many of the Nobility, and others were assembled, conspired with them to receive the Danes into England, and to depose William the Conqueror, (who then was in Normandy) from his Kingdome of England: and to bring the same to effect, he with others rose. This treason was revealed by one of the conspirators, viz. Walter Earle of Huntingdon an English man, sonne of that great Syward Earle of Northumberland: for which treason this Roger Earle of Hereford was apprehended, by Urse Tiptoft then Sheriffe of Worcester shire, and after was tried by his Peeres, and found guilty of the treason per judicium Parium suorum, but he lived in prison all the daies of his life. You have heard in the exposition of the 14. Chapter, who are to be said Peeres, somewhat is necessary to be added thereunto. It is provided by the Statute of 20 H. 6. That Dutchesses, Countesses, and Baronesses, shall be tried by such Peeres as a Noble man, being a Péere of the Realme ought to be; which Act was made in declaration, and affirmance of the Common law: for Marquesses, and Vicountesses not names in the Act shall be also tried by their Peeres, and the Queene being the Kings consort, or dowager, shall also be tried, in case of treason, per Pares, as Queene Anne, the Wife of King Henry the eight was Termino Pasch. anno 28. H.8.in the Towre of London before the Duke of Norff. then high Steward.[21]

If a Woman that is Noble by birth, doth marry under the degree of Nobility, yet shee shall be tried by her Peeres, but if shee be noble by marriage, and marry under the degree of Nobility shee loseth her Dignity, for as by marriage it was gained, so by marriage it is lost, and shee shall not be tried by her Peers. If a Duchesse by marriage doe marry a Baron, shee loseth not her dignity, for all degrees of Nobility, as hath been said, are Pares, If a Queene Dowager marry any of the Nobility, or under that degree, yet loseth shee not her Dignity, as Katherine Queene Dowager of England, married Owen ap Meredith ap Theodore Esquire, and yet shee by the name of Katherine Queene of England, maintained an Action of Detinew, against the Bishop of Carlile.[22]

And the Queene of Navarra marrying with Edmund the brother of

E. 1. sued for her Dower by the name of Queene of Navarra and recovered.[23]

[Nisi per Legem terrae] But by the Law of the Land. For the true sense and exposition of these words, see the Statute of 37 E. 3. cap. 8. where the words, by the law of the Land, are rendred, without due proces of Law, for there it is said, though it be contained in the great Charter, that no man be taken, imprisoned, or put out of his freehold without process of the Law; that is, by indictment or presentment of good and lawfull men, where such deeds be done in due manner, or by writ originall of the Common law.

No man be put to answer without presentment before Justices, or thing of record, or by due process, or by writ originall, according to the old law of the land.

Wherein it is to be observed, that this Chapter is but declaratory of the old law of England. Rot. Parliament 42 E. 3. nu. 22.23. the case of Sir John a Lee, the Steward of the Kings house.

¶ Per legem terrae.] i. Per legem Angliae, and hereupon all Commissions are grounded, wherein is this clause, facturi quod ad justitiam pertinet secundum legem, & consuetudinem Angliae, &c. And it is not said, legem & consuetudinem Regis Angliae lest it might be thought to bind the King only, nor populi Angliae left it might be thought to bind them only, but that the law might extend to all, it is said per legem terrae, i. Angliae.

And aptly it is said in this Act, per legem terrae that is, by the Law of England: For into those places, where the law of England runneth not, other lawes are allowed in many cases, and not prohibited by this Act. For example: If any injury, robbery, felony, or other offence be done upon the high sea, Lex terrae extendeth not to it, therefore the Admirall hath conusance thereof, and may proceed, according to the marine law, by imprisonment of the body, and other proceedings, as have been allowed by the lawes of the Realme.[24]

And so if two English men doe goe into a foreine Kingdome, and fight there, and the one murder the other, lex terrae extendeth not hereunto, but this offence shall be heard, and determined before the Constable, and Marshall, and such proceedings shall be there, by attaching of the body, and otherwise, as the Law, and custome of that court have beene allowed by the lawes of the Realme.[25]

Against this ancient, and fundamentall Law, and in the face thereof,

I finde an Act of Parliament made, that as well Justices of Assise, as Justices of peace (without any finding or presentment by the verdict of twelve men) upon a bare information for the King before them made, should have full power, and authority by their discretions to heare, and determine all offences, and contempts committed, or done by any person, or persons against the forme, ordinance, and effect of any Statute made, and not repealed &c. By colour of which Act, shaking this fundamentall Law, it is not credible what horrible oppressions, and exactions, to the undoing of infinite numbers of people, were committeed by Sir Richard Empson knight, and Edm. Dudley being Justices of peace, throughout England; and upon this unjust and injurious Act (as commonly in like cases it falleth out) a new office was erected, and they made Masters of the Kings forfeitures.[26]

But at the Parliament, holden in the first yeare of H. 8. this Act of 11 H. 7. is recited, and made voide, and repealed, and the reason thereof is yeelded, for that by force of the said Act, it was manifestly known, that many sinister, and crafty, feigned, and forged informations, had been pursued against divers of the Kings subjects, to their great dammage, and wrongfull vexation: And the ill successe hereof, and the fearefull ends of these two oppressors, should deterre others from committing the like, and should admonish Parliaments, that in stead of this ordinary, and precious triall Per legem terrae they bring not in absolute, and partiall trialls by discretion.[27]

If one be suspected for any crime, be it treason, felony &c. And, the party is to be examined upon certaine interrogatories, he may heare the interrogatories, and take a reasonable time to answer the same with deliberation (as there the time of deliberation was tenne houres) and the examinate, if he will, may put his answere in writing, and keepe a Copie thereof: and so it was resolved in Parliament by the Lords Spirituall, and Temporall in the case of Justice Richill. See the Record at large.[28]

And the Lord Carew being examined, for being privy to the plot, for the escape of Sir Walter Rawleigh attainted of treason, desired to have a copy of his examination, and had it, as Per legem terrae be ought.[29]

Now here it is to be knowne, in what cases a man by the Law of the land, may be taken, arrested, attached, or imprisoned in case of treason or felony, before presentment, indictment, &c. Wherein it is to be understood, that Process of law is two fold, viz. By the kings Writ, or by due proceeding, and warrant, either in deed, or in law without Writ.

As first where there any witnesse against the offendor, he may be taken and arrested by lawfull warrant, and committed to prison.

When treason and felony is committed, and the common fame and voice is, that A is guilty, it is lawfull for any man, that suspects him, to apprehend him.[30]

[a] This same Bracton describeth well, Fama quae suspicionem inducit, oriri debet apud bonos, & graves, non quidem malevolos, & maledicos, sed providas & fide dignas personas, non semel, sed saepius, quia clamor minuit & defamatio manifestat.

[b] So it is of Hue and Cry, and that is by the Statute of Winchester, which is but an affirmance of the Common Law: Likewise if A. be suspected, and he fléeth, or hideth himselfe, it is a good cause to arrest him.

[c] If treason or felony be done, and one hath just cause of suspition this is a good cause, and warrant in Law, for him to arrest any man, but he must shew in certainty the cause of his suspition: and whether the suspition be just, or lawfull, shall be determined by the Justices in an action of false imprisonment brought by the party grieved, or upon a Habeas corpus, &c.

A felony is done and one is pursued Hue and Cry, that is not of ill fame, suspicious, unknown, nor indicted; he may be by a warrant in Law, attached and imprisoned by the Law of the Land.[31]

A Watchman may arrest a nightwalker by a Warrant in Law.[32]

If a man woundeth another dangerously, any may arrest him by a warrant in Law, untill it may be known, whether the party wounded shall die thereof, or no.[33]

If a man kéep the company of a notorious thiefe, whereby he is suspected, &c. it is a good cause, and a warrant in Law to arrest him.[34]

If an affray be made to the breach of the King's peace, any man may by a warrant in Law restrain any of the offenders, to the end the Kings peace may be kept, but after the affray ended, they cannot be arrested without an expresse warrant.[35]

Sée now the Statute of 1 & 2 Phil. & Mar. cap. 13. & 2 & 3 Phil. & Mar. cap. 10.

Now seeing that no man can be taken, attached, or imprisoned but by due processe of Law, and according to the Law of the Land, these conclusions hereupon doe follow.

First, that a commitment by lawfull Warrant, either in déed or in Law, is accounted in Law due processe or procéeding of Law, and by the Law of the Land, as well as by processe by force of the Kings Writ.
2. That he or they, which doe commit them, have lawfull authority.
3. That his warrant, or Mittimus be lawfull, and that must be in writing under his hand and seale.
4. The cause must be contained in the warrant, as for treason, felony, &c. or for suspition of treason or felony, &c. otherwise if the Mittimus contain no cause at all, if the Prisoner escape, it is no offence at all, whereas if the Mittimus contained the cause, the escape were treason, or felony, though he were not guilty of the offence; and therefore for the Kings benefit, and the Prisoner may be the more safely kept, the Mittimus ought to contain the cause.
5. The Warrant or Mittimus containing a lawfull cause, ought have a lawfull conclusion, viz. and him safely to kéep, untill he be delivered by Law, &c. and not untill the party committing doth further order. And this doth evidently appeare by the Writs of Habeas corpus, both in the kings Bench, and Common Pleas, Eschequer, and Chancery.[36]

Rex Vicecon. London. salutem. Praecipimus vobis, quod corpus A. B. in custodia vestra detent. ut dicitur, una causa detentionis suae, quocunq; nomine praed. A. B. censeatur in eisdem, habeatis coram nobis apud Westm. die Jovis prox' post Octabis S. Martini, ad subjiciend. & recipiend ea, quae curia nostra de eo adtunc, & ibidem ordinar. contigerit in hac parte, & hoc nullatenus ommitatis, periculo incumbente, &c. habeatis ibi hoc breve, Teste Edw. Coke 20. Nov. anno Regni nostri 10.

This is the usuall forme of the Writ of Habeas corpus in the King's Bench, Vide Mich. 5. E. 4. Rot. 143. Coram Rege, Kefars Case, under the Teste of Sir John Markham.

Rex Vicecom London salutem. Praecipimus vobis, quod habeatis coram Justiciariis nostris, apud Westm. die Jovis prox' post quinque septiman. Pasche, corpus A.B. quocunque nomine censeatur, in prisona vestra, sub custodia vestra detent. ut dicitur, una cum die, & causa captionis & detentionis ejusdem, ut iidem Justiciar nostri, visa causa illa, ulterius fieri fac', quod de jure, & secundum legem, & consuetudinem Regni nostri Angliae foret faciend, & habeatis ibi hoc breve, Teste,&c.[37]

The like Writ is to be graunted out of the Chancery, either in the time of the Terme, (as in Kings Bench) or in the Vacation; for the Court of Chancery is officina justitiae, and is ever open, and neither adjourned, so as the Subject being wrongfully imprisoned, may have justice for the liberty of his person as well in the Vacation time, as in the Terme.[38]

By these Writs it manifestly appeareth, that no man ought to be imprisoned, but for some certain cause: and these Words, Ad subjiciend. & recipiend, &c. prove that cause must be shewed: for otherwise how can the Court take order therein according to Law.

And this doth agrée with that which is fair in the holy History, Sine ratione mihi videtur, mittere vinctum in carcerem, & causas ejus non significare. But since we wrote these things, and passed over to many other Acts of Parliament; sée now the Petition of Right, Anno Tertio Caroli Regis, resolved in full Parliament by the King, the, Lords Spirituall, and Temporall, and the Commons, which hath made an end of this question, if any were.[39]

Imprisonment doth not onely extend to false imprisonment, and unjust, but for detaining of the Prisoner longer then be ought, where be was at the first lawfully imprisoned.

If the Kings Writ come so the Sheriffe, to deliver the Prisoner, if he detain him, this detaining is an imprisonment against the Law of the Land: If a man be in Prison, a warrant cannot be made to the Gaoler to deliver the Prisoner to the custody of any person unknown to Gaoler, for two causes; first, for that thereby the Kings Writ of Habeas corpus, or delivery, might be prevented. 2. The Mittimus ought to bee, as hath béene said, till hee bee delivered by Law.[40]

If the Sheriffe, or Gaoler detain a Prisoner in the Gaoler after acquitall, unlesse it be for his fées, this is false imprisonment.

In many cases a man may be by the Law of the Land taken, and imprisoned, by force of the Kings Writ upon a suggestion made.

Against these that attempt to subvert, and enervate the Kings Lawes, there lieth a Writ to the Sheriffe in nature of a commission, Ad capiendum impugnatores juris Regis, & ad ducendum eos ad Gaolam de Newgate; which you may reade in the Register at large. Ubi supra. And this is lex terrae by Processe of Law, to take a man without answer, or summons in this case; and the reason is, Merito beneficium legis amittit, qui legem ipsam subvertere intendit.[41]

If a Souldier after wages received, or press money taken, doth absent himself, or depart from the Kings service; upon the certificate thereof of the Captain into the Chancery, there lieth a Writ to the Kings serjeants at Armes, if the party be vagrant, and hideth himselfe, Ad capiendum conductos proficiscend in obsequium nostrum, &c. qui ad dictum obsequium nostrum venire non curaverint. And this is lex terrae, by processe of Law, pro defensione Regis, & Regni, or for the same cause, a Writ may be directed to the Sheriffe, De arrestando ipsum, qui pecuniam recepit ad proficiscendum in obsequium Regis, & non est profectus.[42]

It a man had entred into Religion, and was professed, and after he departed from his house, and became vagrant in the Country against the rules of his Religion, upon the Certificate of the Abbot, or Prior thereof into the Chancery, a Writ should be directed to the Sheriffe, De apostata capiendo, whereby he was commanded in these words; Praecipimus tibi quod praesatum, &c. Sine dilatione arrestes, & praesat Abbat; Abbat &c. liberes secundum regulam ordinis sui castigand'; And this was Lex terrae, by Processe of Law, in honorem religionis.[43]

If any lay men with force and strong hand, doe enter upon, of kéep the possession either of the Church, or of any of the houses, of glebe, &c. belonging thereunto, the Incumbent upon certificate thereof of the Bishop, or without certificate upon his own surmise may have a Writ to the Sheriffe, De vi laica amovenda, by which the Sheriffe is commanded in these words; Praecipimus tibi quod omnem vim laicam seu armatam, quae se tenet in dicta Ecclesia, seu domibus eidem annexis, ad pacem nostrum in Com. tuo perturband, sine dilatione amoveas, & si quos in hac parte resistentes inveneris, eos per corpora sua attachias, & in prisona nostra salvo custodias, &c. and this is lex terrae, by Processe of Law, pro pace Ecclesiae.[44]

Also a Writ of Ne exeas Regnum may be awarded to the Sheriffe, or Justices of Peace, or to both, that a man of the Church shall not depart the Realme; the effect whereof is; Quia datum est nobis intelligere, quod A.B. clericus versus partes exteras, ad quamplurima nobis, & quamplurima de populo nostro praejudicialia, & damnosa, ibidem prosequend. transire proponit, &c. tibi praecipimus, quod praedict' A.B. coram te corporaliter venire facias, & ipsum ad sufficientes manucaptores, inveniend, &c. Et si hoc coram te facere recusaverit, tunc ipsum A.B. proximae gaolae committas salvo custodiend, quousque hoc gratis facere voluerit. And there is another Writ in the Register directed to the party, either of the Clergy or Laity, And this is lex terrae, by Processe of Law, Pro bono publico Regis et Regni; Whereof you may reade more at large in the third part of the Institutes, Cap. Fugitives.[45]

Upon a surmise that a man is a Leper, one that hath morbum elephantiacum, so called, because he hath a skin like to an Elephant, there may be a Writ directed to the Sheriffe, Quia accepimus quod I. de N. leprosus existit, & inter homines Comitatus tui communiter conversatur, &c. ad grave damnum homin' praed, & propter contagionem morbi praed. periculum manifestum, &c., tibi praecipimus quod assumptis tecum aliquibus discretis & legalibus hominibus de Comitat praeđ non suspect, &c. ad ipsum I. accedas, &c. & examines, &c. & si ipsum leprosum inveveris, ut praedict' est, tunc ipsum honestiori modo, quo poteris à communione hominum praedict' amoveri, & se ad locum solitarium ad habitand' ibidem, prout moris est, transferre facias indilate, &c. And this is lex terrae, by Processe of Law, for saving of the people from contagion and infection.[46]

But if any man by colour of any authority, where he hath not any in that particular case, arrest, or imprison my man, or cause him to be arrested, or imprisoned, this is against this Act, and it is most batefull, when it is done by countenance of Justice.[47]

King Edw. 6. did incorporate the Town of S. Albons, and granted to them, to make ordinances, &c. they made an ordinance upon paine of imprisonment, and it was adjudged to be against this Statute of Magna Charta; So it is, if such an ordinance had béen contained in the patent it selfe.

All Communication that are consonant to this Act, are, as hath béen said, Secumdum legem, & consuetudinem Angliae

A Communication was made under the great Seale to take I. N. (a notorious felon) and to seise his lands, and goods: This was resolved to the against the Law of the Land, unless he had béen endicted, or appealed by the party, or by other due Processe of Law.[48]

It is enacted, if any man be arrested, or imprisoned against the forme of this great Charter, that he bée brought to his answer, and have right.[49]

No man to be arrested, or imprisoned contrary to the forme of the great Charter.

Sée more of the severall Lawes allowed within this Land, in the first part of the Institutes Sect. 3.

The Philosophicall Poet doth notably describe the damnable, and damned procéedings of the Judge of hell,[50]

Gnosius hic Radamanthus habet durissima regna, (Castigatque, auditque dolos, subigitque fateri.
And in another place,
——— leges fixit precio atque refixit.

First he Punisheth, and then he heareth: and lastly, compelleth to confesse and make and marre lawes at his pleasure; like as the Centurion in the holy history, did to S. Paul: For the text saith, Centurio apprehendi Paulum jussit, & se catenis ligari & tunc interrogabat, quis fuisset, & quid fecisset; but good Judges and Justices abhorre these courses.[51]

Now it may be demanded, if a man be taken, or committed to prison contra legem terrae, against the law of the land, what remedy hath the party grieved? To this it is answered: first, that every Act of Parliament made against any injury, mischiefe, or grievance doth either expresly, or impliedly give a remedy to the party wronged, or grieved: as in many of the Chapters of this great Charter appeareth; and therefore he may have an action grounded upon this great Charter. As taking one example for many, and that in a powerfull, and a late time. Pasch. 2. H. 8. coram Rege rot. 538. against the Prior of S. Oswin in Northumberland. And it is provided, and declared by the Statute of 36. Hereby it appeareth, that Justice must have three qualities, it must be Libera, quia nihil iniquius venali Justitia; Plena, quia Justitia non debet clandicare; & Celeris, quia dilatio est quaedam negatio; and then it is both Justice and Right.

[Nulli negabimus, aut differemus, &c.]. These words have beene excellently expounded by latter Acts of Parliament, that by no meanes common right, or Common law should be disturbed, or delayed, no, though it be commanded under the Great seale, or Privie seale, order, writ, letters, message, or commandement whatsoever, either from the King, or any other, and that the Justices shall proceede, as if no such Writs, letters, order, message, or other commandement, were come to them. Judicium redditum per defaltum affirmatar, non obstante breve Regis de prorogatione judicii.[53]

All Protections that are not legall, which appeare not in the Register, nor warranted by our books, are expresly against this branch, nulli differemus: As a Protection under the Great scale granted to any man, directed to the Sherifes, &c. and commanding them, that they shall not arrest him, during a certaine time at any other mans suite, which hath words in it, per praerogativam nostram, quam nolumus esse arguendam; yet such Protections have beene argued by the Judges, according to their oath and duty, and adjudged to be said: As Mich. 11. [Justitam vel rectum.] Wee shall not sell deny, or delay Justice and right. Justitiam vel rectum, neither the end, which is Justice, nor the meane, whereby we may attaine to the end, and that is the law.

Rectum, right, is taken here for law, in the same sense that jus, often is so called. 1. Because it is the right line, whereby Justice distributative is guided, and directed, and therefore all the Commissions of Oier, and Terminer, of goale delivery, of the peace &c. have this clause, Facturi quod ad justitiam peritinet, secundum legem, and consuetudinem, Angliae, that is, to doe Justice and Right, according to the rule of the law and custome of England; and that which is called common right in 2. E. 3. is called Common law, in 14. E. 3. &c. and in this sense it is taken, where it is said, ita qd. stet recto in curia, i. legi in curia. 2. The law is called rectum, because it discovereth that which is sort, crooked, or wrong, for as right signifieth law, so tort, crooked or wrong, signifieth injurie, and injuria est contra jus, against right: recta linea est index sui, & obliqui, hereby the crooked cord of that, which is called discretion, appeareth to be unlawfull, unlesse you take it, as it ought to be, Discretio est discernere per legem, quid fit justum. 3. It is called Right, because it is the best birthright the Subject hath, for thereby his goods, lands, wife, children, his body, life, honor, and estimation are protected from injury, and wrong: major haereditas venit unicuiq; nostrum à jure, & legibus, quam à parentibus.

4. Lastly, rectum is sometime taken for the right it selfe, that a man hath by law to land: As when wee say there lieth Breve de recto, in so much that some old readers have supposed, that rectun in this Chapter, should be understood of a writ of right, for which at this day no fine in the hamper is paid. As the goldfiner will not out of the dust, threds or shreds of gold, let passe the least crum, in respect of the excellency of the metall: so ought not the learned reader to let passe any syllable of this Law, in respect of the excellency of the matter.[54]

CHAP. XXIX.

None shall be Condemned without Trial: Justice shall not be sold or deferred.

NO Freeman shall be taken or imprisoned, or disseised of his Freehold, or Liberties, or free Customs, or be outlawed, or exiled, or any otherwise destroyed, nor will we pass upon him, nor condemn him, but by lawful Judgment of his Peers, or by the Law of the Land. We will sell to no Man, we will not deny or defer to any Man, either Justice or Right.

NOTES.

No Freeman shall be taken, &c. These Words deserve to be written in Letters of Gold, and I have often wondred that they are not inscribed in Capitals, in all our Courts of Judicature, Town-halls, and most Publick Edifices; they being so Essential to our English Freedom and Liberties, and because my Lord Coke in the second part of his Institutes, has many excellent Observations on this Chapter: I shall recite his very Words.

ss. This Chapter containeth nine several Branches.

(1.) That no Freeman shall be taken, or imprisoned, but by the law of the Land, (i. e.) by the Common Law, or by the Statute Law, for the Liberty of a Man’s person is more dear to him than any Thing, and therefore if he be wronged in that Liberty, ’tis very reasonable he should be relieved.

(2.) No Man shall be disseised, (i. e.) put out of Seisin, or be dispossessed of his Freehold, (i. e.) of his Lands or Tenements, or Livelihood, or of his Liberties, or Free-Customs, which belong to him as his Birthright, unless it be by Lawful Judgment (i.e.) by a Verdict of his Equals, or Men of his own Condition, or by the Law of the Land, (i. e) to speak once for all, by the due Course and Process of Law, [sic]
(3.) No Man shall be outlawed, (i. e.) deprived of the Benefit of the Law, unless he is outlawed according to the Course of the Law of the Land.
(4.) No Man shall be exiled, (i. e) banished out of his Country, unless it be by the same Law.
(5.) No Man shall in any sort be destroyed, unless it be by the Verdict of his Equals, &c.
(6.) No Man shall be Condemned at this King’s Suit, in the Court of Bench, for so are the Words, (nec supra cum ibimus) to be understood; nor before any other Commissioner or Judge whatsoever, and that is implied by the Words nec supra cum mittemus, but by the Judgment of his Peers or Equals, or according to the Law of the Land.

7. We shall sell to no Men Justice or Right.
8. We shall deny to no Men Justice or Right.
9. We shall defer to no Men Justice or Right.

Each of these Branches we shall briefly explain.

1. No Man shall be taken, &c. (i. e.) restrained of his Liberty, by Petition, or Suggestion to the King or Council, unless it be by Indictment or Presentment, of good and lawful Men, living near the place where such deeds were done.

2. No Man shall be disseised, &c. Hereby is intended, that Lands, Tenements, goods and Chattels, shall not be seized into the Kings Hands, contrary to this great Charter, and the Law of the Land; nor any Man shall be diffeized of his Lands or Tenements, or dispossessed of his Goods or Chattels, contrary to the Law of the Land.

A Custom was alledged in the Town of C. that if the Tenant cease by two Years, that the Lord should enter into the Freehold of the Tenant, and hold the same until he were satisfyed of the Arrearages: It was adjudged a Custom against the Land, to enter into a Man’s Freehold in that case, without Action or Answer.

King Henry VI. granted to the Corporation off Dyers within London, power to search, &c. And if they found any Cloth dyed with Logwood, that the Cloth should be Forfeit: And it was adjudged, that this Charter concerning the Forfeiture, was against the Law of the Land and this Statute; for no Forfeiture can grow by Letters Patents.

No Man ought to be put from his Livelihood without Answer.

3. No Man outlawed, that is, barred to have the Benefit of the Law. And note, to this Word Outlawed, these Words Unless by the Law of the Land, do refer. [Of his Liberties.] This Word hath three Sgnifications [sic]:

1. As it hath been said, it signifieth the Laws of the Realm, in which respect this Charter is called Charta Libertatum, as aforesaid.

2. It signifieth the Freedom the Subjects of England have. For Example, The Company of Merchant-Taylors of England, having power, by their Chater, [sic] to make Ordinances, made an Ordinance, that every Brother of the same Society, should put the one half of his Cloths to be dressed by some Cloth-Workers Free of the same Company, upon pain to Forfeit 10 s. &c. And it was adjudged, that this Ordinance was against Law, because it was against the Liberty of the Subject, for every Subject hath freedom to put his Cloths to be dressed by whom he will, & sic de similibus. And so it is, if such or the like Grant had been made by his Letters Patents.

3. Liberties signifie the Franchises and Privileges which the Subjects have of the Gift of the King, as the Goods and Chattels of Felons, Outlaws and like; or which the Subject claims by Prescription, as Wreck, Waif, Stray, and the like.

So likewise, and for the same reason, if a Grant be made to any Man, to have the sole making of Cards, or the sole dealing with any other Trade, that Grant is against the Liberty and Freedom of the Subject, that before did or lawfully might have used that Trade, and consequently against this great Charter.

Generally all Monopolies are against this great Charter, because they are against the Liberty and Freedom of the Subject, and against the Law of the Land.

4. No Man exiled, that is, Banish'd, or forced to depart or stay out to England without his consent. By the Law of the Land, no Man can be Exiled or Banished out of his Native Country, but either by Authority of Parliament, or in Case of Abjuration for Felony by the Common Law; And so when our Books, or any Record, speak of Exile, or Banishment, other than in case of Abjuration, it is to be intended to be done by Authority of Parliament, as Belknap and other Judges, &c. banished into Ireland, in the Reign of Richard the II.

This is a Beneficial Law, and is construed benignly; and therefore the King cannot send any subject of England against his Will, to serve him out of this Realm, for that should be an Exile, and he should perdere Pateriam: No, he cannot be sent against his will into Ireland, to serve the King or his Deputy there, because it is out of his Realm of England: For if the King might send him out his Realm to any Place, then under pretence of Service, as Ambassador or the like, he might send him unto the farthest part of the World, which being an Exile, is prohibited by this Act.

5. No Man destroyed, that is forejudged of Life or Limb, or put to Torture, or Death, every Oppression against Law, by colour of any usurped Authority, is a kind of destruction. And the Words Aliquo modo (any otherwise) are added to this Verb destroyed, and to no other Verb in this Chapter, and therefore all things, by any manner of means, tending to Destruction, are prohibited; as if a Man be accused or indicted of Treason or Felony, his Lands or Goods cannot be granted to any, no not so much as by Promise, not any of his Lands or Goods seized into the King's Hands before he is attainted; for when a Subject obtained a Promise of the Forfeiture, many times undue Means, and more violent Prosecution is used for private Lucre, tending to Destruction, than the quiet and just Proceeding of the Law would permit, and the Party ought to live of his own until Attainder.

6. By lawful Judgment of his Peers, that is, by Equals, Men of his own Rank and Condition. The general Division of Persons, by the Law of England, is either one that is Noble, and in respect of his Nobility of the Lords House of Parliament, or one of the Commons, and in respect thereof, of the House of Commons in Parliament. And as there be divers degrees in Nobility, as Dukes, Marquesses, Earls, Viscounts and Barons, and yet all of them are comprehended under this word Peers, and are Peers of the Realm: So of the Commons, there be Knights, Esquires, Gentlemen, Citizens and Yeomen, and yet all of them Commons of the Realm. And as every of the Nobles is one a Peer to another, though he be of a several Degree; so it is of the Commons, and as it hath been said of Men, so doth it hold of Noble Women, either by Birth or Marriage.

And forasmuch, as this Judgment by Peers is called lawful, it shews the Antiquity of this manner of Trial: it was the ancient, accustomed, legal Course, long before this Charter.

Or by the Law of the Land, that is, by due Process of Law, for so the Words are expertly expounded by the Statute of 37 Edw. 3. c. 8. And these Words are specially to be referred to those forgoing, to whom they relate. As none shall be condemned without a lawful Trial by his Peers, so none shall be taken, imprisoned, or put out of his Freehold, without due Process of the Law, that is, by the Indictment or Presentment of good and lawful Men of the Place, in due manner, or by Writ original of the Common Law.

Now, seeing that no Man can be taken, arrested, attached, or imprisoned, but by due Process of Law, and according to the Law of the Land, these Conclusions hereupon do follow.

1. That the Person or Persons who commit any, must have lawful Authority.
2. It is necessary that the warrant, or Mittimus, be lawful, and that must be in Writing under his Hand and Seal.
3. The Cause must be contained in the warrant, as for Treason, Felony, &c. Suspicion of Treason, or the like particular Crime; for if it do not thus specify the Cause, if the Prisoner bring his Habeas Corpus, he must be discharged, because no Crime appears on the Return; nor is it in such Case, any Offence at all, if the Prisoner make his Escape; whereas if the Mittimus contain the Cause, the Escape would respectively be Treason or Felony, though in Truth he were not guilty of the first Offence. And this mentioning the Cause, is agreeable to Scripture, Acts 5.
4. The Warrant or Mittimus, containing a lawful Cause, ought to have a lawful Conclusion, &c. and him safely to keep until he be delivered by Law, &c. and not until the Party committing shall farther order.

If any Man, by colour of Authority where he hath not any in that particular case, shall presume to arrest or imprison any Man, or cause him to be arrested or imprisoned, this is against this Act, and it is most hateful, when it is done by countenance of Justice. King Edward VI did incorporate the Town of St. Albans, and granted to them to make Ordinances, &c. they made a By-Law upon pain of imprisonment, and it was adjudged to be against the Statute of Magna Charta; so it has been, if such an Ordinance had been contained in the Patent it self.

We will sell to no Man, deny to no man, &c. This is spoken in the Person of the King, who in Judgment of the Law, in all his Courts of Justice, is present: And therefore every subject of this Realm, for Injury done to him, in Person, Lands or Goods, by any other Subject, Ecclesiastical or Temporal, whatever he be, may take his Remedy by the Course of the Law, and have Justice and Right for the Injury done him, freely, without Sale; fully, without denial; and speedily without delay; for Justice must have three Qualities, it must be Libera, free; for nothing is more odious than Justice set to sale: Plena, full, for Justice ought not to limp, or be granted by piece-meal: And Celeris, speedy: Quia Dilatio est quadam negatio, Delay is a kind of denial: and when all these meet, it is both Justice and Right.

We will not deny nor delay any Man, &c. These Words have been excellently expounded by latter Acts of Parliament, that by no means common Right, or common Law, should be disturbed or delayed; no, though it be commanded under the Great Seal, or Privy Seal, Order, Writ, Letters, Message, or Commandment whatsoever, from the King, or any other; and that the Justices shall proceed, as if no such Writs, Letters, Order, Message, or other Commandment were come to them: All our Judges swear to this; for 'tis part of their Oaths: so that if any shall be found wresting the Law, to serve a Court-turn, they are Perjur'd as well as Unjust. The Common Laws of the Realm should by no means be delayed, for the Law is the surest Sanctuary that a Man can take, and the strongest Fortress to protect the weakest of all; Lex est tutissima Cassis, the Law is a most safe Head plece, and sub Clypeo legis Nemo decipitur, no Man is deceived whilst the Law is his Buckler: But the King may stay his own Suit, as a Capias pro fine, for the King may respite his Fine, and the like.

All Protections that are not legal, which appear not in the Register, nor warranted in our Books, are expresly against this Branch, nulli differemus, we will not delay any Man: As a Protection under the Great Seal, granted to any Man, directed to the Sheriffs, &c. and commanding them that they shall not arrest him, during a certain time, at any other Man's Suit, which hath Words in it, By our Prerogative, which we will not have disputed: Yet such Protections have been argued by the Judges, according to their Oath and Duty, and adjudged to be void. As Mich. 11 H. 7. Rot. 124. a Protection granted to Holmes a Vintner of London, his Factors, Servants and Deputies, &c. Resolved to be against Law, Pasch. 7 H. 8. Rot. 66. Such a Protection disallowed, and the Sheriff amerced for not executing the Writ, Mich. 13 and 14 Eliz. in Hitchcock's Case, and many other of latter time: And there is a notable Record of ancient Time, in 22 E. 1. John de Marshal's Case; Non pertinet ad Vicecomitem de protectione Regis judicare imo ad Curiam.

Justice or Right, We shall not sell, deny or delay, Justice or Right; neither the end, which is Justice, nor the mean whereby we may attain to the end, and that is the Law: Right is taken here for Law, in the same Sense that Justice often is so called. 1. Because it is the right Line, whereby Justice distributive is guided and directed; and therefore all Commissioners of Oyer and Terminer, of Gaol-delivery, of the Peace, &c. have this Clause, Facturi quod ad Justitiam pertinet, secundum Legem & Consuetudinem Angliae, that is, to do Justice and Right, according to the Rule of the Law and Custom of England: And that which is called Common Right, in 2 E. 3. is called Common Law in 14 E. 3 &c. 2nd in this Sense it is taken, where it is said, Ita quod stat Rectus in Curia, id est, Legi in Curia,

2. The Law is called Rectum, because it discovereth that which is crooked or wrong; for as Right signifieth Law, so crooked or wrong signifieth Injuries; and Injuria est contra jus, Injury is against Right: Recta Linea est index sui & obliqui, a right Line is both declaratory of it self and the oblique. Hereby the crooked Cord of that which is called Discretion, appeaareth to be unlawful, unless you take it as it ought to be, Discretio est discernere per Legem, quid sit Justum, Discretion is to discern by the Law what is just.

3. It is called Right, because it is the best Birthright the Subject hath; for thereby his Goods, Lands, Wife and Children, his Body, Life, Honour and Estimation, are protected from Injury and Wrong: Major Haereditas venit unicuique nostrum a Jure & Legibus, quam a Paretilus: A greater Inheritance descends to us from the Laws, than from our Progenitors.

Thus far the very words of that Oracle of our Law, the Sage and Learned Coke, which so fully and excellently explains this incomparable Law, that it will be superfluous to add any thing further on this Chapter.

Care English Liberties, vol. I, Magna Charta, ch. 29, pp. 22–27

17.3.1.3Hale, 1736

III. The third usual writ for bailing of criminals is by habeas corpus, and this is a writ of a high nature, for if persons be wrongfully committed, they are to be discharged upon this writ returned; or if bailable, they are to be baild; if not bailable, they are to be committed.

This writ issues out of the great courts of Westminster, but hath different uses and effects.

1. It may issue out of the court of Common-pleas or Exchequer, but that is or ought to be always, where a person is privileged, or to charge him with an action.

If a person is sued in the common-pleas, or is supposed to be so sued, and is arrested for a presupposed misdemeanor, yea or for felony, an habeas corpus lies in the court of Common-pleas or Exchequer, and if it appears upon the return, that the party is wrongfully committed, or by one that hath not jurisdiction, or for a cause for which a man ought not to be imprisond, the privilege shall be allowed, and the person discharged from that imprisonment; or if it be doubtful, he may be baild to appear in the court of King's bench, which hath conusance of the crime returned. Coke Magn. Cart. cap. 29. 2 Instit. p. 55.

And upon this account, P. 43 Eliz. C. B. in the case of Bates, that was imprisond by the council-table, for not bringing in his subscription to the East-India company, and this being returned upon the habeas corpus together with a writ against him out of the common-bench, they adjudged the privilege to be allowd, and the party to be discharged (a).

But if a man be sued in the common-bench, and is arrested and imprisond for felony, tho the gaoler upon the habeas corpus ought to return the causes, as well criminal as that wherewith he is charged out of that court, yet the court of common-pleas ought not to commit him to the Fleet, nor discharge him of the imprisonment, nor yet to take bail of him to answer there, for they have not conusance of such crimes; the like it is, if he be returned committed for a riot or surety of the peace by justices of peace; and therefore all they can do is to take his appearance; and take him to mainprise upon the action, and remand him as to the matter of crime, for which he was well committed by the justices, and to remand his body to the sheriff's custody upon his commitment for the crime. 2 H. 7. 2. a.

But now by the statute of 16 Car. I. cap. 10. they have an original jurisdiction to bail, discharge, or commit upon an habeas corpus for one committed by the council-table, as well as the king's bench, and that altho there be no privilege for the person committed.

2. As to the King's-bench and Chancery, they have an original power both to grant an habeas corpus, and to bail, or discharge, or remand, as the case requires, tho there be no privilege returned. Coke on Mag. Cart. cap. 29. 2 Instit. p. 55. but some things they differ in.

The king's-bench in matters civil grant their habeas corpus ad faciendum & recipiendum, and this is done as well in vacation as term, and returnable before any particular judge of that court, or into the court itself.

And if there be returned even upon that writ any civil action, and also a matter of crime, as if a person be arrested for debt, and also charged with a warrant of a justice of peace for felony, in that case, 1. If it appear to the judge or court; that the arrest for debt or other civil action is fraudulent, they may remand him. Dyer 249. b. Harrison's case. 2. If it be found real, they may commit him to the king's-bench with his causes, tho they are matters of crime, for that court hath conusance, as well of the crime, as of the civil action; but then in the term the court may take his appearance or bail to the civil action, and remand him, if they see cause, as to the crime to be proceeded on below.

But upon the writ ad faciendum & recipiendum there ought not singly a matter of crime to be return'd, for that belongs to the habeas corpus ad subjiciendum.

The other writ is the habeas corpus ad subjiciendum, which is for matters only of crime, and is not regularly to issue nor be returnable but in the termtime, when the court may judge of the return, or bail, or discharge the prisoner (b).

Till the return filed the court may remand him, after it is filed the court is either to discharge, or bail, or commit him, as the nature of the cause requires.

If together with the habeas corpus there issue a certiorari to remove the indictment, yet in case of felony, tho the body and record be returned and filed, the court may remand him and the record by the statute of 6 H. 8. cap. 6. but in other cases the record cannot be remanded, but they must proceed in the king's bench both to pleading, trial, and judgment.

But if the body be removed by habeas corpus, and the record also by certiorari, but the record not filed, tho the return upon the habeas corpus be filed, a procedendo may issue to the court below.

And thus far for the habeas corpus in the king's bench.

By virtue of the statute of Magna Carta, and by the very common law an habeas corpus in criminal causes may issue out of the Chancery. Coke on Magna Carta, cap. 29. 2 Instit. p. 55.

But it seems regularly this should issue out of this court in the vacation time, but out of king's bench in the termtime, as in case of a supersedeas upon a prohibition. 38 E. 3. 14. a. B. Supersedeas, 13.

When the cause is returned, the chancellor may judge of the sufficiency or insufficiency thereof, and may discharge or bail the prisoner to appear in the king's bench, or may propriis manibus deliver the record into the king's bench, together with the body, and thereupon the court of king's bench may proceed to bail, discharge, or commit the prisoner.

But if the chancellor shall not discharge him, but bail him, this surety must be to appear in the king's bench, or if the chancellor shall do neither, it seems he may commit him to the Fleet till the term, and then he may be turned over to the king's bench, and there proceeded against, for the chancellor hath no power to proceed in criminal causes.

And if the habeas corpus, and also a certiorari be granted, returnable in Chancery, and the cause and body be returned there, they may be sent into the king's bench; if the body only be returnable with his causes by habeas corpus into the Chancery, and deliverd over into the king's bench, they may proceed to the determination of the return, and either by procedendo remand him, or grant a certiorari to certify the record also, and thereupon commit or bail the prisoner, as there shall be cause.

But the sending an habeas corpus ad faciendum & recipiendum by the chancellor for persons arrested in civil causes, especially being in execution, is neither warrantable by law, nor antient usage, and particularly forbidden by the statute 2 H. 5. cap. 2. as to persons in execution.

And thus far of bailing by habeas corpus.

HABEAS CORPUS.

(A) Of the Nature and several kinds of Writs of Habeas Corpus.

(B) Of the Habeas Corpus ad Subjiciendum: And herein,

1. What Courts have a Jurisdiction of granting it.
2. To what Places it may be granted.
3. In what Cases it is to be granted, and where it is the proper Remedy.
4. How far the Courts have a Discretionary Power in granting or denying it: And therein of the Habeas Corpus Act.
5. Of the Manner of suing it out, and the Form of the Writ.
6. To whom it is to be directed.
7. By whom to be returned.
8. Of the Manner of compelling a Return, and the Offence of a false Return.
9. What Matters must be returned together with the Body of the Party.
10. Where the Return shall be said to be sufficient, and to warrant the Commitment.

11. Whether the Party can suggest any Thing contrary to the Return.
12. Whether any Defect in the Return may be amended.
13. What is to be done with the Prisoner at the Return: And therein of bailing, discharging, or remanding him.
(C) Of the Habeas Corpus ad faciendum & recipiendum.

(A) OF THE NATURE AND SEVERAL KINDS OF WRITS OF HABEAS CORPUS.

WHEREVER a Person is restrained of his Liberty by being confined in a common Gaol, or by a private Person, whether it be for a Criminal or Civil Cause, he may regularly by Habeas Corpus have his Body and Cause removed to some superior Jurisdiction, which hath Authority to examine the Legality of such Commitment, and on the Return thereof either Bail, Discharge, or Remand the Prisoner.[1]

The Habeas Corpus ad Subjiciendum is that which issues in Criminal Cases, and is deemed (a)a Prerogative Writ, which the King may issue to any Place, as he has a Right to be informed of the State and Condition of the Prisoner, and for what Reasons he is confined. It is also in Regard to the Subject deemed his Writ of (b)Right, that is, such a one as he is intitled to (c) ex debito Justitiae, and is in Nature of a Writ of Error to examine the Legality of the Commitment; and therefore commands the Day, the Caption, and Cause of Detention to be returned.[2]

The Habeas Corpus ad faciendum & recipiendum issues (d) only in Civil Cases, and lies where a Person is sued, and in Gaol, in some inferior Jurisdiction, and is willing to have the Cause determined in some superior Court, which hath Jurisdiction over the Matter; in this Case the Body is to be removed by Habeas Corpus, but the Proceedings must be removed by Certiorari.[3]

There is likewise a Writ of Habeas Corpus ad respondendum, where a Person is confined in Gaol for a Cause of Action accruing within some inferior Court; and a third Person hath also a Cause of Action against him; in which Case he may have this Writ in order to charge him in such superior Court; for inferior Courts being tied down to Causes arising within their own Jurisdiction, the Party would be without Remedy, unless allowed to sue him in another Court; (e) but it seems, that regularly a Person confined in B. R. cannot be removed to the C. B. by this Writ, nor vice versa; for in these Cases there can be no Defect of Justice, as these Courts have (f) Conusance as well of Local as Transitory Actions.[4]

There are also besides these (g) other Writs of Habeas Corpus, as a Habeas Corpus ad deliberandum & recipiendum, which lies (h) to remove a Person to the proper Place or County, where he committed some Criminal Offence.[5]

(B) OF THE HABEAS CORPUS AD SUBJICIENDUM: And herein,

1. WHAT COURTS HAVE JURISDICTION OF GRANTING IT.

It is clear, that both by the Common Law, as also by the Statute, the Courts of Chancery and King's Bench have Jurisdiction of awarding this Writ of Habeas Corpus, and that without any Privilege in the Person for whom it is awarded; but it seems, that by the Common Law the Court of King's Bench could only have awarded it in Termtime, but that the Chancery might have done it as well out as in Term, because that Court is always open.[6]

If the Habeas Corpus issues out of Chancery, and on the Return thereof the Lord Chancellor finds that the Party was illegally restrained of his Liberty, he may discharge him, or if he finds it doubtful he may bail him; but then it must be to appear in the Court of King's Bench, for the Chancellor hath no Power to proceed in Criminal Causes; or the Chancellor may commit the Party to the Fleet, and in Termtime may Proprüs manibus deliver the Record into the King's Bench, together with the Body; and thereupon the Court of King's Bench may proceed to bail, discharge, or commit the Prisoner.[7]

If the Habeas Corpus, and also a Certiorari, be granted returnable in Chancery, and the Cause and Body be returned there, they may be sent into the King's Bench; if the Body only be returned with his Causes, by Habeas Corpus into the Chancery, and delivered over into the King's Bench, they may proceed to the Determination of the Return, and either by Procedendo remand him, or grant a Certiorari to certify the Record also, and thereupon commit or bail the Prisoner, as there shall be Cause.[8]

But the sending an Habeas Corpus ad faciendum & recipiendum by the Chancellor for Persons arrested in Civil Causes, especially being in Execution, is neither warrantable by Law nor ancient Usage, and particularly forbidden by the Statute 2 H. 5. stat. 1. cap. 2 as to Persons in Execution.[9]

There are several strong Opinions, that no Habeas Corpus ad Subjiciendum could by the Common Law issue of the Courts of Exchequer or Common Pleas, unless it were in the Case of Privilege, because these Courts are confined to Civil Causes meerly; and therefore unless the Party were an Attorney, or intitled to the Privilege of the Court as an Officer, &c. or unless there had been a Suit commenced against him in those Courts, they could not grant a Habeas Corpus ad Subjiciendum, tho' they might any other Writ of Habeas Corpus.[10]

But notwithstanding these Opinions it was holden in Bushel's Case, that the Court of Common Pleas may issue a Habeas Corpus ad Subjiciendum, and that if it appeared on the Return thereof that the Party was imprisoned and detained against Law, the Court might, tho' there was no Privilege in the Case, discharge him; for that to remand him would be an Act of Injustice in the Court, and contrary to Magna Charta.

Also by the Statute of 16 Car. 1. cap. 10. they have an original Jurisdiction to bail, discharge, or commit, upon an Habeas Corpus for one committed by the Council-Table, as well as the King's Bench, and that altho' there be no Privilege for the Person committed.[11]

Also by the Habeas Corpus Act, 31 Car. 2. any of the said Courts in Termtime, and any Judge of either Bench, or Baron of the Exchequer, being of the Degree of the Coif, in the Vacation, may award a Habeas Corpus for any Prisoner whatsoever, and on the Return thereof discharge him, if it shall clearly appear that the Commitment was against Law, as being made by one who had no Jurisdiction of the Cause, or for a Matter for which no Man ought by Law to be punished; or bail him, if it shall be doubtful whether the Commitment were legal or not; or remand him, according to the Nature and Circumstances of the Case.[12]

2. TO WHAT PLACES IT MAY BE GRANTED.

It hath been already observed, that the Writ of Habeas Corpus is a Prerogative Writ, and that therefore by the Common Law it lies to any Part of the King's Dominions; for the King ought to have an Account why any of his Subjects are imprisoned, and therefore no Answer will satisfy the Writ, but to return the Cause with Paratum habeo Corpus, &c.[13]

Hence it was held, that this Writ lay to (a) Calice at the Time it was subject to the King of England.[14]

It hath been held, that this Writ lies to the Marches of Wales, as it does to all other Courts which derive their Authority from the King, as all the Courts exercising Jurisdiction within his Dominions do, and that it being a Prerogative, it does not come within the Rule Brevia Domini Regis non currunt, &c. for that must be understood of Writs between Party and Party.[15]

Also it hath been adjudged that (b) this Writ lies to the (c) Cinque Ports, to Berwick, altho' objected to have been Part of Scotland, and to the (d) County Palatine.[16]

Also by the Habeas Corpus Act, 31 Car. 2. cap.—par. 11. it is enacted and declared, 'That an Habeas Corpus, according to the Intent and true Meaning of the Act, may be directed and run into any County Palatine, the Cinque Ports, or other privileged Places within the Kingdom of England, Dominion of Wales, or Town of Berwick upon Tweed and the Isles of Jersey or Guernsey; any Law, &c.'

3. IN WHAT CASES IT IS TO BE GRANTED, AND WHERE IT IS THE PROPER REMEDY.

A Habeas Corpus is a Writ of Right, which the Subject may demand and is the most usual Remedy by which a Man is restored again to his Liberty, if he hath been against Law deprived of it.[17]

By the 31 Car. 2. cap. 2. par. 9. it is enacted, 'That if any Subject of this Realm shall be committed to any Prison, or in Custody of any Officer or Officers whatsoever, for any criminal or supposed criminal Matter, that the said Person shall not be removed from the said Prison and Custody into the Custody of any other Officer or Officers, unless it be by Habeas Corpus, or some other legal Writ; or where the Prisoner is delivered to the Constable, or other inferior Officer, to carry such Prisoner to some common Gaol; or where any Person is sent by Order of any Judge of Assise, or Justice of the Peace, to any common Workhouse or House of Correction; or where the Prisoner is removed from one Prison or Place to another within the same County, in order to a Trial or Discharge by due Course of Law; or in case of sudden Fire or Infection, or other Necessity, upon Pain, that he who makes out Signs or Countersigns, or obeys or executes such Warrants, shall forfeit to the Party grieved One hundred Pounds for the first Offence, Two hundred Pounds for the second, &c.'

If a Party be imprisoned against Law, tho' he is intitled to a Habeas Corpus, yet may he have an Action of false Imprisonment, in which he shall recover Damages in Proportion to the Injury done him.[18]

But it was held in Bushel's Case, who together with the other Jurors appointed to try an Indictment for a Riot between the King and Pen and

Mead, were fined at the Old Baily, because they found a Verdict contra plenam evidentiam & directionem curiae in Materia legis; and for Nonpayment of the Fine, divers of them being committed to Prison, who brought their Habeas Corpus in C. B. and the Imprisonment (a) held illegal; in several Conferences with all the Judges, that yet no Action lay against the Commissioners, because they acted as Judges and Commissioners of Oyer and Terminer, can no more be punished for an erroneous Commitment, than they can be for an erroneous Judgment; and the highest Remedy the Party in this Case can have is a Writ of Habeas Corpus.[19]

If a Husband confine his Wife, she may have a Habeas Corpus; but the Judges on the Return of it cannot remove the Wife from her Husband.[20]

A Motion was made for a Habeas Corpus to the Lord Leigh, for having in Court the Body of his Wife; and the Case was, the Parties were married in 1669, and because they were both within Age, no Settlement was made; in 1671; Lord Leigh persuades his Wife to levy a Fine of some Lands of 900 l. per Ann. whereof she had the Inheritance, to him and his Heirs; and because she prayed to advise with her Friends, he confined her until her Mother had petitioned the King and Council, and there the Matter was referred to three Lords of the Council; and they made an Award, which the Lady Leigh was ready to perform; but the Lord Leigh brought to her an Instrument to be sealed, upon which she made the same Request as before, that she might advise with her Friends, but he refused to permit it, and presently compelled his Wife to go with him to his House in the Country, where he made her his Prisoner; and tho' by the barbarous Usage of her Husband she fell Sick, yet he would not let her have Physicians or Servants to attend her, or to be visited by her Friends; & per Cur. a Habeas Corpus was granted, for this is a Writ of Right, which the Subject may demand, and the King ought to have an Account of his Subject; and tho' it was objected that here was no Affidavit but of such Complaint as the Lady Leigh had made in a Letter to her Mother, yet the Habeas Corpus shall go to put the Lady in a Condition to make Oath of this Matter herself, and to exhibit Articles against her Husband; for here is sufficient Matter to compel him to find Sureties of the Peace, and of his good Behaviour also; for this Treatment the Lady may sue out a Divorce propter saevitiam; and in a like Case between Sir Philip Howard and his Wife a Habeas Corpus was granted; and in this Case an Attachment may be granted against my Lord Leigh, if he refuses Obedience to the Writ, for being a Contempt, a Peer has no Privilege.[21]

If a Person be taken in the Manner within a Forest killing or chasing Deer, &c. and the Officer upon Tender of sufficient Sureties refuses to bail him, he may have a Habeas out of the Courts at Westminster, which Courts may bail him to appear at the next Eyre holden for the Forest; and this the rather, because Justice-Seats are but seldom holden, and the Party, without this Remedy, might be obliged to continue a long Time in Confinement.[22]

If a Person be excommunicated, and the Significavit does not express that the Cause of Excommunication is for any of the Offences within the Statute 5 Eliz. cap. 23 the Remedy expresly appointed upon that Statute is a Habeas Corpus, and upon the Return of it the Parties shall be discharged.[23]

If the Chief Justice of the King's Bench commit one to the Marshal by his Warrant, he ought not to be brought to the Bar by Rule, but by Habeas Corpus.[24]

A Person convicted of Horse-stealing, and in Gaol at St. Albans, was brought by Habeas Corpus and Certiorari to B. R. and the Court demanded of him what he could say why Execution should not be done upon the Indictment; and because he could not shew good Cause to stay the Execution, he was committed to the Marshal, who was commanded to do Execution, and the next Day he was hanged.[25]

If a Person be in Custody, and also indicted for some Offence in the inferior Court, there must, beside the Habeas Corpus to remove the Body, be a Certiorari to remove the Record; for as the Certiorari alone removes not the Body, so the Habeas Corpus alone removes not the Record it self, but only the Prisoner with the Cause of his Commitment; and therefore, altho' upon the Habeas Corpus, and the Return thereof, the Court can judge of the Sufficiency or Insufficiency of the Return and Commitment, and bail or discharge, or remand the Prisoner, as the Case appears upon the Return; yet they cannot upon the bare Return of the Habeas Corpus give any Judgment, or proceed upon the Record of the Indictment, Order or Judgment, without the Record it self be removed by Certiorari; but the same stands in the same Force it did, tho' the Return should be adjudged insufficient, and the Party discharged thereupon of his Imprisonment; and the Court below may issue new Process upon the Indictment.[26]

But it is otherwise in an Habeas Corpus in Civil Causes, which suspends the Power of the inferior Court; so that if they proceed after, their Proceedings are coram non judice.[27]

4. HOW FAR THE COURTS HAVE A DISCRETIONARY POWER IN GRANTING OR DENYING IT: AND THEREIN OF THE HABEAS CORPUS ACT.

Notwithstanding the Writ of Habeas Corpus be a Writ of Right, and what the Subject is intitled to, yet the Provision of the Law herein being in a great Measure illuded by the Judges being only enabled to award it in Termtime, as also by an imagined Notion in the Judges, that they had a Discretionary Power of granting or refusing it; but especially by the Art and Contrivance of Officers, to whom it was directed, who used great Delays in making any Return to it.[28]

By the 31 Car. 2. cap. 2. commonly called the Habeas Corpus Act, reciting, ‘That great Delays had been used by Sheriffs, Gaolers, and other Officers, to whose Custody the King’s Subjects had been committed for Criminal or supposed Criminal Matters, in making Return of Writs of Habeas Corpus, by standing out an Alias and Pluries, and sometimes more, and by other Shifts, to avoid their yielding Obedience to such Writs, contrary to their Duty and the known Laws of the Land, whereby many Subjects had been detained in Prison in such Cases, where by Law they were bailable.’

Thereupon it is enacted, ‘That whensoever any Person shall bring any Habeas Corpus, directed unto any Person whatsoever, for any Person in his Custody, and the said Writ shall be served on the said Officer, or left at the Gaol or Prison with any of the Under-Officers, UnderKeepers, or Deputy of the said Officers or Keepers, that the said Officer or Officers, his or their Under-Officers, UnderKeepers, or Deputies, shall within three Days after such Service thereof, (unless the Commitment were for Treason or Felony, plainly and specially expressed in the Warrant of Commitment) upon Payment or Tender of the Charges of bringing the said Prisoner, to be ascertained by the Judge or Court that awarded the same, and endorsed on the said Writ, not exceeding 12 d. per Mile, and on Security given by his own Bond to pay the Charges of carrying back the Prisoner, if he should be remanded, and that he will not make any Escape by the Way, make Return of such Writ, and bring or cause to be brought the Body of the Party so committed or restrained unto or before the Lord Chancellor, or the Lord Keeper, or the Judges or Barons of the Court from which the said Writ shall issue, or such other Persons before whom the said Writ is made returnable, according to the Command thereof; and shall then likewise certify the true Causes of his Detainer or Imprisonment, unless the Commitment be in a Place beyond twenty Miles Distance, &c. and if beyond the Distance of twenty, and not above one Hundred Miles, then within the Space of ten Days; and if beyond the Distance of one Hundred Miles, then within the Space of twenty Days.’

And it is further enacted, par. 3. ‘That all such Writs shall be marked in this Manner, Per stat’um tricesimo primo Caroli Secundi Regis, and shall be signed by the Person that awards the same; and if any Person shall be or stand committed or detained as aforesaid for any Crime, unless for Treason or Felony, plainly expressed in the Warrant of Commitment, in the Vacation-time, it shall be lawful for such Person so committed or detained, (other than Persons convict or in Execution by legal Process) or any one on his Behalf, to complain to the Lord Chancellor, or Lord Keeper, or any Justice of either Bench, or Baron of the Exchequer, of the Degree of the Coif; and the said Lord Chancellor, &c. Justice or Baron, on View of the Copy of the Warrant of the Commitment, or otherwise on Oath that it was denied, are authorized and required, on Request in Writing, by such Person, or any in his Behalf, attested and subscribed by (a) two Witnesses who were present at the Delivery of the same, to grant an Habeas Corpus under the Seal of the Court, whereof he shall be one of the Judges, to be directed to the Officer in whose Custody the Party shall be, returnable immediate’ before the said Lord Chancellor, &c. Justice or Baron; and on Service thereof as aforesaid, the Officer, &c. in whose Custody the Party is, shall, within the Times respectively before limited, bring him before the said Lord Chancellor, Justice, or Baron, before whom the said Writ is returnable; and in cafe of his Absence, before any other of them, with the Return of such Writ, and the true Causes of the Commitment and Detainer; and thereupon, within two Days after the Party shall be brought before them, the said Lord Chancellor, Justice, or Baron, before whom the Prisoner shall be brought as aforesaid, shall discharge the said Prisoner from his Imprisonment, taking his Recognizance, with one or more Sureties, in any Sum, according to their Discretions, having Regard to the Quality of the Prisoner, and Nature of the Offence, for his Appearance in the King’s Bench the Term following, or in such other Court where the Offence is properly cognizable, as the Case shall require; and then shall certify the said Writ, with the Return thereof, and the Recognizance into such Court, unless it be made appear to the said Lord Chancellor, &c. that the Party so committed is detained upon a legal Process, Order or Warrant, out of some Court that hath Jurisdiction of Criminal Matters, or by some Warrant signed and sealed with the Hand and Seal of any of the said Justices or Barons, or some Justice or Justices of the Peace, for such Matters or Offences, for the which by Law the Prisoner is not bailable.’[29]

But it is provided, par. 4. ‘That if any Person shall have wilfully neglected, by the Space of two whole Terms after his Imprisonment, to pray a Habeas Corpus for his Enlargement, he shall not have a Habeas Corpus to be granted in Vacation-time in Pursuance of this Act.’

And it is further enacted by the said Statute, par. 6. ‘That no Person, who shall be set at large upon any Habeas Corpus, shall be again imprisoned for the same Offence by any Person whatsoever, other than by the legal Order and Process of such Court, wherein he shall be bound by Recognizance to appear, or other Court having Jurisdiction of the Cause, on Pain of 500 l.’

And it is further enacted, par. 7. ‘That if any Person, who shall be committed for Treason or Felony, plainly and specially expressed in the Warrant of Commitment, upon his Prayer or Petition in open Court the (a) first Week of the (b) Term, or the first Days of the Sessions of Oyer and Terminer, or General Gaol-Delivery, to be brought to his Trial, shall not be indicted some Time in the next Term, Sessions of Oyer and Terminer, or General Gaol-Delivery, after such Commitment, the Justices of the said Court shall, upon Motion in open Court, the last Day of the Term, or Sessions, set at Liberty the Prisoner upon Bail, unless it appear upon Oath, that the Witnesses for the King could not be produced the same Term; and if such Prisoner upon his Prayer, &c. shall not be indicted and tried the second Term of Sessions, he shall be discharged from his Imprisonment.’[30]

Provided, par. 8. ‘That nothing in this Act shall extend to discharge out of Prison any Person charged in Debt, or other Action, or with Process in any Civil Cause, but that after he shall be discharged of his Imprisonment for such his Criminal Offence, he shall be kept in Custody according to Law for such other Suit.’

And it is further enacted, par. 10. ‘ That it shall be lawful for any Prisoner, as aforesaid, to move and obtain his Habeas Corpus, as wel out of the Chancery or Exchequer, as the King’s Bench or Common Pleas; and if the said Lord Chancellor, or Lord Keeper, or any Judge or Judges, Baron or Barons, for the Time being, of the Degree of the Coif, of any of the Courts aforesaid, in the (c) Vacation-time, upon View of the Copy of a Warrant of Commitment or Detainer, or Oath made that such Copy was denied, shall deny any Writ of Habeas Corpus by this Act required to be granted, being moved for as aforesaid, they shall severally forfeit to the Party grieved the Sum of 500 l.’

It is provided, par. 18. ‘That after the Assises proclaimed for that County where the Prisoner is detained, no Person shall be removed from the common Gaol upon any Habeas Corpus granted in Pursuance of this Act, but upon such Habeas Corpus shall be brought before the Judge of Assise in open Court, who thereupon shall do what to Justice shall appertain.'

But it is provided, par. 19. 'That after the Assises are ended, any Person detained may have his Habeas Corpus, according to the Direction of this Act.'

In the Construction of this Statute it was held by two Judges, in the Absence of one, and contrary to the Opinion of the other, that Persons committed by Rule of Court are not intitled to the Benefit of this Act; and that none are intitled to make their Prayer but such as are committed by a Warrant of a Justice of Peace, or Secretary of State, and not those committed by Rule of Court, for that is not within the Meaning of the Act, which speaks of a Commitment by Warrant.[31]

5. OF THE MANNER OF SUING IT OUT, AND FORM OF THE WRIT.

By the (a) 1 & 2 Ph. & M. cap. 13. 'No Writ of Habeas Corpus or Certiorari shall be granted to remove any Prisoner out of any Gaol, or to remove any Recognizance, except the same Writs be (b) signed with the proper Hands of the Chief Justice, or in his Absence, of one of the Justices of the Court, out of which the same Writ shall be awarded or made, upon Pain that he that writeth any such Writs, not being signed, as is aforesaid, to forfeit for every such Writ 5 l.'

A Habeas Corpus was prayed to the Gaoler of the County Gaol of Worcester, to remove one Fox in B. R. to assign Errors in Person, upon the Record of his Conviction of a Praemunire for Recusancy; but this was not granted till the Writ of Error was brought into Court under Seal, and the Record certified.[32]

Every Habeas Corpus ad Subjiciendum must in Termtime be awarded on Motion and Leave of the Court, but a Habeas Corpus ad faciendum & recipiendum is usually granted without Motion, as it relates to a Civil Affair only.[33]

So where Debt was brought against Husband and Wife on an Obligation sealed by them both, and both being taken by Capias, it was moved for an Habeas Corpus to bring them into Court, to the Intent that the Husband only might be committed in Custody, and the Wife discharged; and it was held by the Court, that this Habeas Corpus for removing the Bodies might have been for them without Motion, but where the Party is committed for a Crime, there it ought to be on Motion.[34]

6. TO WHOM IT IS TO BE DIRECTED.

Wherever a Person is imprisoned by any Person whatsoever, whether he be one concerned in the Administration of Justice, as a Sheriff, Gaoler, &c. or a private Person, such as a Doctor of Physick, who confines a Person under Pretence of curing him of Madness, &c. the Habeas Corpus must be directed to him.[35]

A Habeas Corpus was directed to the Chancellor of Durham, by which he was directed to make a Precept to the Sheriff to have the Body of J. S. with the Cause of his Commitment, coram Domino Rege apud Westm'; the Chancellor returned, that he made a Precept to the Sheriff to have his Body before him, with the Cause of, &c. who accordingly returned the Cause and the Body before him, and sets out the Cause, & haec est Causa detentionis; & per Hale C. J. A Habeas Corpus ad faciendum & recipiendum directed in this Manner is good; secus of a Habeas Corpus ad Subjiciendum; for the King may send his Writ to whom he pleases, and he must have an Answer of his Prisoner wherever he be; there is a great deal of Difference between a Habeas Corpus ad Subjiciendum and other Habeas Corpus; for this is the Subject's Writ of Right, in which Case the County Palatine hath no Privilege; in 31 E. 1. a Habeas Corpus ad Subjiciendum was directed to the Bishop of Durham, who returned, that he was a Count Palatine, and therefore was not bound to Answer the Writ, for which he was fined 4000 l. Hill. 17 Car. 1. a Habeas Corpus was directed to the Bishop of Durham to return the Body of one Rickoby; and resolved, that the Writ did well run thither: In this Case the Writ is directed to the Chancellor, to command the Sheriff to have his Body here; but he commands him to have the Body before himself, which is ill; again, the Chancellor doth not return the Body to us, for here is no Cujus Corpus Parat' habeo; it is not enough for him to say, that the Sheriff returned the Body to him, but he ought to return it to us here; we have nothing before us, therefore he must be remanded, for he is brought up without a Warrant.[36]

A Habeas Corpus directed in the Disjunctive to the Sheriff or Gaoler is wrong; but where a Man is taken on a Warrant of the Sheriff, in Pursuance of a Writ to the Sheriff, the Habeas Corpus ought to be directed to the Sheriff, for the Party is in his Custody, and the Writ it self must be returned; otherwise it is where one is committed to the Gaoler immediately, as in Cases Criminal.[37]

7. BY WHOM IT IS TO BE RETURNED.

This Writ must be returned by the very same Person to whom it is directed.

A Habeas Corpus was awarded to the Sheriff of—— who before the Return leaves the Office, and a new Sheriff is made, who returns Languidus; this Return is not good, but it ought to be returned by them two, the first that he had the Body, and had delivered it to the new Sheriff, and the new Sheriff may then return Languidus.[38]

8. OF THE MANNER OF COMPELLING A RETURN, AND THE OFFENCE OF A FALSE RETURN.

The Method to compel a Return to a Habeas Corpus is by taking out an Alias and Pluries, which if disobeyed, an Attachment issues of Course; also the Court may make a Rule on the Officer to return his Writ, and if disobeyed, the Court may proceed against such Disobedience in the same Manner as they usually do against the Disobedience of any other Rule.[39]

And by the 31 Car. 2. cap. 2. par. 2. it is enacted, 'That if any Officer, &c. shall neglect or refuse to make Returns, as by the Act is directed, or to bring the Body of the Prisoner, according to the Command of the Writ, or shall not within six Hours after Demand deliver a true Copy of the Commitment, &c. he shall forfeit for the first Offence 100 l. for the second Offence 200 l. and be made incapable to hold his Office.'

A Habeas Corpus went to the Stannary Court, to which an insufficient Return was made, and therefore disallowed; & per Cur. the Warden of the Stannaries must be amerced, and you may go to the Coroners and get it affeered, and escheat it, and an Alias Habeas Corpus must go for the Insufficiency of the Return of the first, and upon that the Body and Cause must be removed up; if another Excuse be returned, we will grant an Attachment.[40]

And as a Gaoler, &c. is obliged to bring up the Prisoner at the Day prefixed by the Writ, it is no Excuse for not obeying of a Writ of Habeas Corpus ad Subjicieudum, that the Prisoner did not tender the Fees due to the Gaoler; nor yet is the Want of such Tender an Excuse for not obeying a Writ of Habeas Corpus ad faciendum & recipiendum; but if the Gaoler bring up the Prisoner by Virtue of such Habeas Corpus, the Court will not turn him over till the Gaoler be paid all his Fees.[41]

For a false Return there is regularly no Remedy against the Officer, but an (a) Action on the Case at the Suit of the Party grieved, and an Information or Indictment at the Suit of the King.[42]

But it has been held, that if a Gaoler return one Languidus when the Party himself brings his Habeas Corpus, and is in good Health, an Attachment shall issue against him; secus if the Habeas Corpus was brought by another.

9. WHAT MATTERS MUST BE RETURNED TOGETHER WITH THE BODY OF THE PARTY.

As upon the Return of the Writ the Court is to judge, whether the Cause of the Commitment and Detainer be according to Law or against it; so the Officer or Party, in whose Custody the Prisoner is, must, according to the Command of the Writ, certify on the Return thereof the Day, Cause of Caption and Detainer.[43]

A Habeas Corpus was directed to remove one J. S. to which no Return was made; then an Alias was granted, and it was returned quod traditur in ballium ante adventum istius Brevis; and the Truth of the Case was, that between the first and second Writ the Party was bailed; & per Cur. after an Habeas Corpus delivered, the Party cannot be bailed; and if it happens otherwise, yet the Cause of the Commitment ought to be returned, tho' the Body cannot be brought into Court; and in this Case the Officer having on the first Writ of Habeas Corpus taken 5 l. to have the Body in Court, and yet making no Return, the Court granted an Attachment against him.[44]

Where a Commitment is in Court to a proper Officer there present, there is no Warrant of Commitment; and therefore to a Habeas Corpus he cannot return a Warrant in haec verba, but must return the Truth of the whole Matter, under Peril of an Action; but if he be committed to one that is not an Officer, there must be a Warrant in Writing, and where there is one it must be returned; for otherwise it would be in the Power of the Gaoler to alter the Case of the Prisoner, and make it either better or worse than it is upon the Warrant; and if he may take upon him to return what he will, he makes himself Judge; whereas the Court ought to judge, and that upon the Warrant itself.[45]

If a Person in Custody on an Excommunicato capiendo brings a Habeas Corpus, the Writ of Excommunicato capiendo itself must be returned, as well as the Sheriff's Warrant for taking him, because the Warrant may be wrong when the Writ is right; and tho' the Warrant be wrong, yet if the Writ is right, the Party is rightfully in Custody of the Sheriff.[46]

Upon a Habeas Corpus directed to the Constable of Windsor-Castle, to remove the Body of one Mr. Taylor a Barrister, at the Day of the Return of the Writ, a Soldier brought in the Prisoner into Court, and the Writ, and the Warrant by which he was committed; but the Court held it no Manner of

Return, for it ought to be entred in Latin, and engrossed in due Form.[47]

10. WHERE THE RETURN SHALL BE SAID TO BE CERTAIN AND SUFFICIENT TO WARRANT THE COMMITMENT.

It is said in general, that upon the Return of the Habeas Corpus the Cause of the Imprisonment ought to appear as specifically and certainly to the Judges, before whom it is returned, as it did to the Court or Person authorized to commit.[48]

For if the Commitment be against Law, as being made by one who had no Jurisdiction of the Cause, or for a Matter for which by Law no Man ought to be punished, the Court are to discharge him, and therefore the Certainty of the Commitment ought to appear; and the Commitment is liable to the same Objection where the Cause is so loosely set forth, that the Court cannot adjudge whether it were a reasonable Ground of Imprisonment or not.[49]

Rudyard an Attorney of C. B. being committed to Newgate by the Lord Mayor and Sir John Robinson, for refusing to give Security for his good Behaviour, was brought by Habeas Corpus to the C. B. and it was returned as the Cause of his Commitment, that whereas he had been complained of to my Lord Mayor and Sir John Robinson for several Misdemeanors, particularly for inciting his Majesty's Subjects to the Disobedience of his Majesty's Laws, more particularly of an Act of Parliament made in the 22d Year of his Reign, against seditious Conventicles and whereas he had been examined before them for abetting such as abetted seditious Conventicles, contrary to the Statute 22 Car. 2. and upon his Examination they found Cause to suspect him, therefore they requested Sureties of him for his good Behaviour, and for Refusal committed him. Wild, Justice, was of Opinion, that by abetting such as frequented seditious Conventicles, must be intended abetting them in that Particular, and signifies as much as encouraging them to frequent such Conventicles, and finding Cause to suspect him, &c. (which cannot now be questioned, for the Return is admitted) they may well send him to Prison, and therefore he ought to be remanded. But Vaughan C. J., Tyrrel, and Archer, were of a contrary Opinion: 1. Because it does not appear but that he might abet the Frequenters of Conventicles in a Way which the Law allows, as by solliciting an Appeal for them, or the like 2. To say that he was complained of, or that he was examined, is no Proof that he was guilty; and then to say, that they had Cause to suspect him, is too cautious; for who can tell what they may count a Cause of Suspicion, and how can that ever be tried? At this Rate they would have Arbitrary Power, upon their own Allegation, to commit whom they pleased, whereas they cannot require Sureties for any Man's Behaviour, and consequently not commit for Refusal, unless the Justices have any Thing against him of their own Knowledge, or by Proofs of Witnesses that tend to a Breach of the Peace; upon this Return Archer declared his Opinion to be, that he should not be remanded, but give his own Recognizance to appear in Court the next Term, to answer any Thing that should be alledged against him; but Vaughan and Tyrrel were for his absolute Discharge; for seeing by the Return it did not appear there was any Cause for his Commitment, they thought they had no Reason to require a Recognizance of him. Thereupon Wild moved, that he could not be discharged, there being but two for it. But Archer replied, that it had been several times ruled, that where there were three Opinions, that was taken to be per Cur. which had two of the Judges for it: And accordingly Rudyard was discharged. Vaughan and Tyrrel made another Objection to the Return, viz. that they should have expressed the Sum in which they required him to give Security, (which they had not done;) for they said that those Persons, that might be willing to be bound for him in 40 l. might not be willing to be bound for him in 100 l. &c. and therefore till he knew the Sum he could not know whom to provide. But as to this it was said, that Rudyard had refused absolutely to give any Security, and therefore it was to no purpose to tell him of the Sum; if he had consented to give Security, then the Justices ought to have told him the Sum.[50]

11. WHETHER THE PARTY CAN SUGGEST ANY THING CONTRARY TO THE RETURN.

It seems to be agreed, that no one can in any Case controvert the Truth of the Return to a Habeas Corpus, or plead or suggest any Matter repugnant to it: Yet it hath been holden, that a Man may confess and avoid such a Return by admitting the Truth of the Matters contained in it, and suggesting others not repugnant, which take off the Effect of them.[51]

Upon a Habeas Corpus it was returned, that Swallow, a Citizen of London, was fined for Alderman, and was committed for his Fine by the Judgment of the Court in London. Swallow alledged, that he was an Officer of the Mint, and by an antient Charter of Privilege granted to the Minters or Moneyers he ought to be exempted. It was at first doubted whether he might not plead this to the Return, it being a Matter consistent with it. Upon the Statute W. 2. it is held the Parties may come in and plead, and so upon 5 Eliz. but here there is a Difference; for he might have pleaded this in the Court below, but now that is past, and here is a Judgment and Execution. Another Day Swallow brought into Court a Writ of Privilege upon that Charter, and the Recorder prayed that it might not be allowed against the antient Customs of the City; for if such a Way might exempt Men, they should have little Benefit by Fines in such Cases: But per Cur. the Privilege ought to be allowed, for it is very antient, and it appears he has an Office of necessary Attendance elsewhere, which makes the Privilege reasonable. The King may by his Charter exempt from Juries, if there be enough besides, much more here; and it there be not sufficient besides, upon showing of that, the Privilege ought to be suspended; and Swallow may be discharged by this Court now as well as he could at first, or as if he had taken upon him the Aldermanship. This Court is supreme and mandatory in such Cases. And he was accordingly discharged.[52]

Also the Court will sometimes examine by Affidavit the Circumstances of a Fact, on which a Prisoner brought before them by an Habeas Corpus hath been indicted, in order to inform themselves, on Examination of the whole Matter, whether it be reasonable to bail him or not: And agreeably hereto (a), where one Jackson, who had been indicted for Piracy before the Sessions of Admiralty on a malicious Prosecution, brought his Habeas Corpus in the said Court, in order to be discharged or bailed, the Court examined the whole Circumstances of the Fact by Affidavits; upon which it appeared that the Prosecutor himself, if any one, was guilty, and carried on the present Prosecution to skreen himself: And thereupon the Court, in Consideration of the Unreasonableness of the Prosecution, and the Uncertainty of the Time when another Sessions of Admiralty might be holden, admitted the said Jackson to Bail, and committed the Prosecutor till he should find Bail to answer the Facts contained in the Affidavits.[53]

12. WHETHER ANY DEFECT IN THE RETURN MAY BE AMENDED

It seems that, before the Return is filed, any Defect in Form, or the Want of an Averment of a Matter of Fact may be amended; but this must be at the Peril of the Officer, in the same manner as if the Return were originally what it is after the Amendment.[54]

But after the Return is filed it becomes a Record of the Court, and cannot be amended.[55]

So after a Rule to have the Return filed; as where a Habeas Corpus, Alias & Pluries was directed to Sir Robert Viner, Mayor of London, to have the Body of Bridget, Daughter and Heir of Sir Thomas Hyde, deceased; and upon the Pluries he returned quod tempore receptionis hujus Brevis nec unquam postea non fuit infra custodiam meam; and the Counsel of the Lord Mayor expounded this Return that she was within the House of the Lord Mayor, but not detained in Custody prout per Breve supponitur; & per Cur. this is an insufficient Return; for he ought to say not only tempore receptionis hujus Brevis, sed alieujus, upon Return of a Pluries. Then a Question was if the Return could be amended; for tho' a Rule was made that the Return should be filed, yet this was not actually done; but per Cur. this is filed by the Rule of the Court, and after cannot be amended; and this Return the Court held to be equivocal, for it is well enough known that the is not detained in Ferris; but tho' she hath the Liberty of the House, if she cannot go out of the House, or not without a Keeper, she is within his Custody; and the Court shall adjudge what sort of Custody is intended by the Writ.

13. WHAT IS TO BE DONE WITH THE PRISONER AT THE RETURN; AND THEREIN OF BAILING, DISCHARGING, OR REMANDING HIM.

Upon the Return of the Habeas Corpus the Prisoner is regularly to be discharged, bailed, or remanded; but if it be doubtful which the Court ought to do, it is said that the Prisoner may be bailed to appear de Die in Diem till the Matter is determined.[56]

By the Petition of Right, or (a) 17 Car. 1. cap. 10. the Court must within three Days after the (b) Return of the Habeas Corpus either discharge, bail, or remand the Prisoner. But it seems that a Commitment by the Court of King's Bench to the Marshalsea is a Remanding, being an Imprisonment within the Statute.[57]

Also it hath been ruled, that the Court of King's Bench may, after the Return of the Habeas Corpus is filed, remand the Prisoner to the (c) same Gaol from whence he came, and order him to be brought up from time to time, till they shall have determined whether it is proper to bail, discharge, or remand him absolutely.[58]

And tho' in doubtful Cases the Court is to bail or discharge the Party on the Return of the Habeas Corpus; yet if a Person be convicted, and the Conviction on the Return of the Habeas Corpus appears only defective in Point of Form, it is at the Election of the Court either to discharge the Party, or oblige him to bring his Writ of Error.[59]

If on the Return of the Habeas Corpus it appears that the Contest relates to the Right of Guardianship, tho' the Court will not determine that Point, yet will it set the Infant at Liberty, so as to let him chuse where he will go till that Matter is determined; or if there be any Danger of Abuse, will order him into such Hands as will take effectual Care of him.[60]

(C) OF THE HABEAS CORPUS AD FACIENDUM & RECIPIENDUM.

THE Habeas Corpus ad faciendum & recipiendum is used only in Civil Causes, and lies for removing Suits out of an inferior to some superior Court, at the Application of the Defendant, who may imagine himself injured by the Proceedings of such inferior Court.[61]

This Writ suspends the Power of the Court below; so that if they proceed after, the Proceedings are (a) void, and coram non Judice.[62]

By this Writ the Proceedings in the inferior Court are at an End; for the Person of the Defendant being removed to the superior Court, they have lost their Jurisdiction over him, and all the Proceedings in the superior Court are de novo, and (b) Bail de novo must be put in the superior Court.[63]

And altho' this Writ be a Writ of Right, yet where it is to abate a rightful Suit the Court may refuse it; as where an Action of Debt was brought against a Feme Sole in the Palace Court, who, after Appearance and Plea pleaded, married, and then removed the Cause by Habeas Corpus to B. R. where she pleaded her Coverture in Abatement; and the Court held, that if this Matter had been moved on the Return of the Habeas Corpus, they would have granted a Procedendo; but that now the Plea in Abatement must be held good; for the Proceedings are de novo, and the Court takes not Notice of the Proceedings below, or of what preceded the Habeas Corpus.[64]

After an Interlocutory, and before final Judgment in an inferior Court, a Habeas Corpus cum Causa was brought; before the Return of the Writ the Defendant died, and a Procedendo was awarded; because by the 8 & 9 W. 3. cap. 11. the Plaintiff may have a Scire facias against the Executors, and proceed to Judgment, which he cannot have in another Court; and by this means he would be deprived of the Effect of his Judgment, which would be unreasonable.[65]

If an Action be brought in London for calling a Woman Whore, this cannot be removed by Habeas Corpus, because the Words not actionable elsewhere; and if allowed to be removed, the Custom would be destroyed.[66]

Bacon Abridgment, vol. III, pp. 1–15.

Habeas Corpus.

(A) HABEAS CORPUS CUM CAUSA AD SUBJICIENDUM. WHOM IT MAY BE DIRECTED, AND BY WHOM.

1. IT seems that the king has supreme Power over all Courts, within the Dominions of the king, delegated by the king, and therefore if any man be Imprisoned by any, a Corpus cum Causa may be granted to them who Imprisoned him; for the King ought to have an Account given to him of the Liberty of his Subjects, and of the Restraint of it. P. 3 Ja. B. R. Resolved per Curiam between Wetherley and Wetherley. … . Tr. 5 Ja. B. R. Resolved per Curiam, in Case of Omer v. Mansel.[1]

2. If a Man be imprisoned by the Counsel of the Marches of Wales, B. R. may award a Corpus cum Causa to remove him, and this ought to be obeyed. P. 3 Jac. B. R. between Wetherley and Wetherley, adjudged upon great Controversy between the said Courts, and upon award of the king himself accordingly.

3. It shall always be directed to him that has the Custody of the Body Godb. 44. Pl. 52. Anon.——It lies to any Person, as well as to the Gaoler; per Holt Ch. J. 5 Mod. 21. in Case of the King v. Bethell.

4. 31 Car. 2. cap. 2. S. 11. Writs of Habeas Corpus shall run into any Liberties, and into the Counties Palatine, the Cinque Ports, Wales, Berwick, Guernsey and Jersey.[2]

5. Habeas Corpus was granted to the County Palatine of Chester, but afterwards superseded on Motion, two Precedents being cited. 1 Salk. 354. Mich. 4 Annae. Anon.

(B) HABEAS CORPUS CUM CAUSA, AD FACIENDUM & RECIPIENDUM. [IN WHAT CASES] AND TO WHAT COURTS[†]

1. If an Action he brought in London for these words, Thou art a Whore, and my Husband's Whore, this ought not be removed by a habeas Corpus. For at Common Law, no Action lies for those words, But in London Action lies, (as is pretended) by the Custom of the City, for the same words, because they use by the Custom of the City to Cart Whores, and for such words, a Suit may be in the ecclesiastical Court, and no Prohibition lies, and therefore this may be a good Custom in London, and Convenient for them, † that it is the Law of the Place. But if it be dubious whether it be a good Custom, it is better not to remove it; for if it be removed, it is final, and no writ of Error nor Appeal lies upon it, but the Party is without further Remedy. But if they proceed upon this in London, and a Judgment is given upon it, a Writ of Error lies in the Hustings by Commission, and so the Party may have a legal Remedy. Trin. 1650. between Penton and Harrison, per Curiam adjudged, and a Procedendo granted accordingly. M. 13 Car. B. R. between[*] Bavoize and his wife Plaintiffs, and Cooper Defendant. A Procedendo granted per Curiam, except Barkley, where the Words were, Thou art a Whore, and wilt play the Whore for two Pence. And another Judgment was vouched Trin. 8 Car. B. R. between Bond and Watson. Contra 4 Rep. Oxford.[3]

2. 21 Jac. 1. cap. 23. S. 4. When the Thing in demand exceeds not 5 l. the Suit shall not be removed by any Writ, save only by Writs of Error or Attaint.

3. Habeas Corpus Ad faciendum & recipiendum lies to the Cinque Ports. Sid. 431. pl. 21. Anon.

(B. 2) THE SEVERAL SORTS.

1. AN Habeas Corpus ad respondendum is when any one is imprisoned at the Suit of another, upon a legal Process in the Fleet or any other Prison except the King's Bench Prison, and a third Person would sue that Prisoner in the Court of B. R. and can't, because he is not in Custody of the Marshal of this Court. There he may have an Habeas Corpus to remove the Prisoner out of the Prison, where he is, into this Court, returnable at a Day certain, to answer unto this Action here; and for that Cause it is called Habeas Corpus ad respondendum, because he is to answer the Party's Action; Also, where a Person is in Custody in an inferiour Jurisdiction, the Plaintiff may bring his Habeas Corpus ad respondendum returnable in this Court; and then the Defendant cannot Nonsuit the Plaintiff, nor be bailed, but only by the Court of B. R. or be committed to the Custody of the Marshal. 2 L. P. R. 4.

2. There are three Sorts of Habeas Corpus's in C. B. 1. A Habeas Corpus ad Respondendum, and that is, when a Man hath a Cause of Suit against one that is in Prison, he may bring him up hither by Habeas Corpus, and charge him with a Declaration at his own Suit. 2. There is a Habeas Corpus Ad faciendum & recipiendum, and this Defendants may have that are sued in Courts below, to remove their Causes before us. Both these Habeas Corpus's are with Relation to the Suits properly be longing to the Court of C. B, So if an inferiour Court will proceed against the Law, in a Thing of which C. B. has Cognizance, and commit a Man C. B. may discharge him upon Habeas Corpus. 3. A third Sort of Habeas Corpus is for privileg'd Persons. But a Habeas Corpus Ad subjiciendum is not warranted by any Precedents that I have seen; per North. Hill. 28 & 29 Car. 2. in C. B. 1 Mod. 235. pl. 23. Anon.

3. 2. L. P. R. 2. takes Notice of a Habeas Corpus Ad satisfaciendum.[4]

(B. 3) GOOD OR NOT. AND QUASH'D FOR WHAT.

1. A Habeas Corpus, being directed to the Sheriff or Goaler in the Disjunctive, was held to be wrong, and that all the Precedents were otherwise, and therefore the Writ was quash'd. 1 Salk. 350. The King v. Fowler.

(C) * WHAT IT IS, AND HOW GRANTED, AND † BY WHOM.

1. 1 & 2 P. & M. cap. 13. S. 7. Habeas Corpus must be signed by a Judge.

2. This is a Prerogative Writ which concerns the King's Justice to be administer'd to his Subjects; For he ought to have Account why any of his Subjects are imprisoned, and it is agreeable to all Persons and Places, per Montague Ch. J. Cro. J. 543. in Bourn's Case.

3. All Habeas Corpus's in C. B. are Ad faciendum & recipiendum, and they issue of Course and without Motion. But otherwise in B. R. for they are Ad subjiciendum, which are in criminal Causes, and not to be granted without Motion; Per the Ch. J. Pasch. 30 Car. 2. C. B. 2 Mod. 306. Penrice and Wynn's Case.

4. Where the Party is committed for a Crime, there must be a Motion for the Habeas Corpus; but for the bringing in the Body of a Feme Covert arrested, and committed with her Baron in order to discharge the Feme, it may be had without Motion. Lev. 1. Mich. 12 Car. 2. B. R. Slater v. Slater & Ux.

5. Habeas Corpus is a Writ which lies to bring the Body of the Person into Court; who is committed to any Goal, either in civil or criminal Causes. 2 L. P. R. 1.[5]

6. A Habeas may be granted by the Court of B. R. or by a single Judge at his Chamber, to any private Person, who keeps another in his House, or elsewhere, in Custody against his Will, by Virtue of the Habeas Corpus Act. 2 L. P. R. 2.

7. By Newdigate Justice, Trin. 1659. If a Habeas Corpus be granted, to give Liberty to a Prisoner that lies in Prison upon an Execution longer than for one Day; this is not according to Law. 2 L. P. R. 3.

8. The Court useth not to put the Reason into a Habeas Corpus, why they send for the Prisoner; for it may be for Treason or great Conspiracy. By Catline J. 2 L. P. R. 3.

(C. 2) BY WHAT COURT GRANTED.

1. IF a Man be impleaded in C. B. and be imprison'd in the Marshalsea, upon Suit in B. R.—C. B. shall send for him to the Marshal, and he shall bring him, and when he has made Answer be shall be remanded; and this where he is impleaded by Writ. Br. Imprisonment, pl. 28. cites 38 H. 6 30. per Prisot.[6]

2. A Man may have an Habeas Corpus out of B. R. or Chancery, tho' there be no Privilege, &c. or in the Court of C. B. or the Exchequer for any Officer or privileged Person there. 2 Inst. 55.

3. Habeas Corpus is not an original Writ, and if it be in the Nature of a Judicial Writ, there must be a Cause for it. C. B. may grant an Habeas Corpus, but it is more natural for B. R. to do it, not in Point of Right, but Consequence; For if we send one, and it be a criminal Cause we can proceed no farther, but remand it. But B. R. may try it, if it be return'd for Felony, &c. per Vaughan Ch. J. to which Wild J. said, that in Q. Elizabeth's Time, one Court granted it as well as the other, and thought that in the principal Case they could not deny it, Salvo Juramento; But Vaughan answered, that they would find none in C. B. more ancient than Q. Elizabeth's Time. The other three Justices however granted the Habeas Corpus, which was for one imprisoned for Contumacy, for not paying Tithes upon a Certificate by the Bishop, according to 27 H. 8. 20. Cart. 221. Pasch. 23. Car. 2. Anon.

4. The Court of C. B. said, that they had often directed that no Habeas Corpus should be moved for in that Court, except it concerned a Civil Cause. Because, when the Party is brought in, and the Cause shewn, C. B. cannot proceed upon it, and therefore the proper Place for them is B. R. but they permitted it in the principal Case, (tho' it was a Commitment for abetting, &c. his Majesty's Subjects to the Disobedience of his Laws, and abetting &c. such as meet in seditious &c. Conventicles, contrary to the Form of the Statute &c.) because the Party was an Attorney of that Court. 2 Vent. 22. 24. Trin. 22 Car. 2. C. B. Rudyard's Case.

(D) IN WHAT CASES.

1. Habeas Corpus lies of Plea, which is in Court of Record. Br. Privilege, pl. 5. cites 9 H. 6. 58.

2. A Sheriff was committed to the Fleet by the Barons of the Exchequer for an Amercement, put upon him of 40 l. for a false Return, and the King pardoned him, and he had special Writ out of Chancery into B. R. in Nature of Aud. Quer. and therefore the Justices of B. R. sent for him by Writ of Habeas Corpus. Quod Nota. Br. Privilege, pl. 27. cites 36 H. 6. 21.

3. One was arrested by Warrant of the Peace by a Justice of Peace of Middlesex, and sent to Newgate, (which is the Prison for London, and also for Middlesex,) and Plaint was affirmed against him in London for Debt, to which he answered, and after brought Corpus cum Causa, alleging that the Suit was by Covin; And by the Chancellor, Needham, Choke and all the Court, the Prisoner shall be dismissed, because he was imprisoned for Middlesex and not for London; and therefore tho' this Prison serves as well for London as Middlesex, yet when he is imprisoned in Middlesex, Plaint cannot be taken against him in London; For if a Sheriff of London arrests a Man in London by Capias directed to the Sheriffs of Middlesex, Writ of false Imprisonment lies against him. Br. Privilege, pl. 44. cites 16 E. 4, 5.[7]

4. A Prohibition was granted to the Admiralty, and delivered by one G. to the Judge of that Court when he was hearing of a Cause, who commanded him to call a Register, which G. refusing to do, the Judge again commanded him to do it, and G. said that he would not, because he was not so commanded to do by the Writ; therefore the Judge committed the said G. to Prison. G. made Affidavit thereof, and prayed an Habeas Corpus, which was granted. Coke thought it was not sufficient Cause to imprison him for Refusal, and so the Prisoner was delivered. Roll. R. 315, 316. Hill. 13 Jac. B. R. Bruistone v. Baker.

5. It is not the Usage of the Court of B. R. to deliver one committed by the Decree of one of the Courts of Justice, and therefore the Prisoner was remanded. Cro. C. 168. Mich. 5 Car. B. R. in Chambers's Case.[8]

6. A Prisoner attainted for Felony, (viz. for Horse-stealing) was brought to the Bar of B. R. from St Albans by Habeas Corpus and Certiorari. And it was demanded of him, what he could say why Execution should not be done upon the Indictment; and because he could not shew good Cause to stay the Execution, he was committed to the Marshall, who was commanded to do Execution. And he was hanged the next Day. Cro. C. 176. Mich. 5 Car. B. R. R. C's. Case.

7. If the Sheriff arrests a Man upon Process, and lets him to Bail, and after returns a Cepi Corpus, and then a Habeas Corpus comes to the Sheriff to remove the Body, the Sheriff cannot justify the retaking of him upon this Writ, after he had let him to Bail before; but he ought to aid himself upon the Bail. Mich. 10 Car. B. R. between Lay and Strut, per Curiam, in an Action of false Imprisonment upon such retaking. See Trespass (C. a) pl. 1.

8. It was granted to the Prisoners in the King's Bench and Fleet, in Regard of the Pestilence increasing in London, and the Places adjacent. Hill. 11 Car. B. R. Cro. C. 466.

9. A Habeas Corpus was granted to bring up a Person arrested by a Latitat out of B. R. and who was carried to a Town in the same County, where the Arrest was, and there arrested by a Serjeant of the Town, by a Writ out of the Corporation, where the Plaintiff proceeded against him upon that Writ, and not upon the Latitat; and this being a Contempt, an Attachment also was granted. Sti. 239. Mich. 1650. B. R. Brian v. Stone

10. A Habeas Corpus was denied for a Prisoner to have him for a Witness at the Assises; by the Court. Trin. 1657. 2 L. P. R. 3.[9]

11. At Common Law if the Sheriff had arrested any Man by the King's Writ, he could not be delivered but by a Homine replegiando. 2 Saund. 60. Hill. 21 & 22 Car. 2. B. R. in Case of Postern v. Hanson.

12. J. S. a Parson libels for Tithes against J. D. he is certified Contumax; the Bishop, according to 27 H. 8. cap. 20. certifies to two Justices to imprison him without Bail or Mainprise. They do so. It was moved for an Habeas Corpus in C. B. and it was granted by three Justices, but the Ch. Justice was against it; because it was more properly grantable by the King's Bench. Cart. 221. Pasch. 23 Car. 2. C. B. Anon.

13. The 12 Car. 2. 23. of Excise, prohibits the bringing a Certiorari, but not a Habeas Corpus. 1 Mod. 102, 103. pl. 10. Mich. 25 Car. 2. B. R. Anon.

14. Two Persons were committed to the Poultry Compter by Commissioners of Bankrupts for refusing to be examined and sworn touching their Knowledge of the Bankrupt's Estate. The Process against them in C. B. was an Attachment of Privilege, which was a civil Plea; And on a Motion for a Habeas Corpus, the Ch. J. said, that it might be granted without Motion; because all the Habeas Corpus's in that Court were ad Faciendum & Recipiendum, and they issue of Course. 2 Mod. 306. Pasch. 30. Car. 2. C. B. Penrice and Wynn's Case.

15. Habeas Corpus was denied, on Suggestion that the Party was detained by a private Person. Cumb. 35. Mich. 2 Jac. 2. B. R. Anon.

16. Habeas Corpus was denied for one committed to Bridewell for Lewdness. Cumb. 74. Hill. 3 & 4 Jac. 2. B. R. Anon.

17. None ought to take out a Habeas Corpus for a Prisoner without his Consent. Trin. 23 Car. B. R. unless it be to turn him over to the King's Bench, or charge him with an Action in Court. 2 L. P. R. 2.

18. Before Bushell's Case no Man was ever delivered by Habeas Corpus, without Writ of Error delivered, from a Commitment of a Court of Oyer and Terminer; Per Cur. 1 Salk. 348. Trin. 7 W. 3. B. R. in Bethel's Case.
19. Whether Commitment by either House of Parliament be within the Habeas Corpus Act. See 12 Mod. 606. Mich. 13 W. 3. B. R. Paulhill v. Powell.
20. A Person was committed by the Admiralty in Execution upon a Sentence, and a Habeas Corpus issued to bring him into B. R. ad Respondendum to an Action to be brought against him; it was moved upon the Return to commit the Defendant here, because there was no other way to sue him; for that he was not chargeable in the Admiralty, and that there was no other way to sue him, and so there would be a Failure of Justice; To which Holt Ch. J. said, that this was new, and that though the Proceeding in the Admiralty was by the Civil Law, yet it was supported by the Custom of the Realm, and this Court must not elude their Process; and enquiring into the Action, and thinking it only a Pretence, he said, there being no Action pending in B. R. they ought not to commit him, and the Plaintiff could not declare against him till in Custody; otherwise, if an Action had been depending, and so the Defendant was remanded. 1 Salk. 351. Trin. 1 Annae. B. R. Keach's Case.
21. The Defendant was out on Bail in an Action in B. R. and was taken on an Extent at the Queen's Suit; the Bail brought him upon a Habeas Corpus, and prayed he might be committed to the Marshal in Discharge of his Bail; and notwithstanding great Opposition was made by the Attorney General, he was turned over, because the Action here was precedent to the Queen's Extent. 1 Salk. 353. Mich. 3 Annae. B. R. French's Case.
22. The Defendant pending an Action against him in B. R. was taken upon a Warrant in a criminal Matter, and committed to the Compter, and afterwards was there charged with an Extent for the Queen; And he was brought up by Habeas Corpus at the Suit of the Plaintiff in the Action, in order to be declared against in Custody of the Marshal, and Mr. Attorney General opposed it; because the Custody of the Marshal was precarious, and he would let him escape as he did French; and this Case differed from that, because by the late Act of Parliament the Plaintiff might declare against him in Custodia Vicecomitis, whereas the Bail had been without Remedy if French had not been committed; and as to the Defendant's being arrested on criminal Process, that was nothing; for tho' one so arrested cannot be charged at the Suit of a Subject in any Action, without Leave of the Court, yet the Queen may charge him. And the Defendant was remanded. 1 Salk. 353, 354. Mich. 4 Annae. B. R. Crackall v. Thompson.

23. Tho' a Habeas Corpus be a Writ of Right, yet where it is to abate a rightful Suit, the Court may refuse it. 1 Salk. 8. Mich. 6 Annae. B. R. Hetherington v. Reynolds.
24. Husband and Wife agreed to live separate, and he being willing afterwards to be reconciled to her, she refused; whereupon he and an Assistant forced her into a Coach as she was coming from Church on a Sunday, and carried her into the Mint. She being brought into Court by Habeas Corpus, it was moved that the Court would not interpose between Husband and Wife, &c. But the Court discharged her out of her Husband's Custody, upon her desiring to be so, and held, that the Agreement to live separate, shall bind both till they both agree to cohabit again. 8 Mod. 22. Mich. 7 Geo. Lister's Case.—— alias Lady Rawleigh's Case.
25. If a Person appear to be imprisoned for an Excommunication in a Cause of which the Spiritual Court hath no Conusance, he may be delivered either upon a Habeas Corpus, or by quashing or superseding the Writ of Excommunicato capiendo. 2 Hawk. Pl. C. 98. cap. 15. S. 40.

(D. 2) IN WHAT CASES; IN RESPECT OF PRIVILEGE.[10]

1. A Commission being granted to examine the Right of the Office of Exigenter of London, which belonged to the Chief Justice, and by him was granted to Scroggs; And a Bill thereupon exhibited against him before the Commissioners, Scroggs demurred upon their Jurisdiction, and would not answer, for which they committed him to the Fleet; But in that Case the Justices of the Common Pleas granted him a Habeas Corpus, because he was a necessary Minister to the Court. Hughe's Abr. 473. pl. 2. cites Mich. 2 Eliz. D. 175. Scroggs v. Coleshill.
2. The Defendant coming to execute a Commission was arrested, and had a Corpus cum Causa, and set him at Liberty. Toth. 218. cites Trin. 23 Eliz. Jackson v. Vaughan.
3. So the Plaintiff, having a Writ of Privilege, was taken in Execution, and ordered to go abroad by Habeas Corpus, and the Party that arrested him to be committed. Toth. 219. cites Hill. 17 or 18 Jac. Morgan v. Richardson.
4. S. was elected Alderman of London, and being summoned by the Court of Aldermen into Court, he there refused to take the Oath, wherefore they committed him to Gaol, and upon Habeas Corpus they returned the Custom of London, &c. But he was discharged by the Privilege of being Mint- master. Sid. 287. Trin. 18 Car. 2. B. R. Swallow v. the City of London.[11]

(D. 3) DIRECTED TO WHOM, AD FACIENDUM, &C.

1. THE Habeas Corpus shall always be directed to him who hath the Custody of the Body. Godb. 44. pl. 52. Mich. 28 & 29 Eliz. B. R. Anon.

2. Therefore where it was directed to the Mayor, Bailiffs, and Burgesses, an Exception was taken, because the Pleas were holden before the Mayor, Bailiffs and Steward; but the Exception was disallowed; But otherwise it is in a Writ of Error, for that shall be directed to those before whom the Judgment was given. Godb. 44. pl. 52. cites Wickham's Case.

3. And in London it shall be directed Majori & Vicecomitibus London, because they have the Custody, and not the whole Corporation. Godb. 44. pl. 52. ——— But the Reporter says, he conceives that the Course is, that the Writ be directed Majori, Aldermannis, & Vicecomitibus, &c. Ibid.

(E) AT WHAT TIME GRANTED AND ALLOWED.

1. Habeas Corpus was allowed after the Body was in Execution, but he was not dismissed, but was sent to the Fleet and had Aud. Quer. Quod Nota. Br. Privilege, pl. 49. cites 22 H. 6.

2. By 43 El. cap. 5. No Writ of Habeas Corpus, or * other Writ to remove a Cause out of an inferior Court shall be allowed, except the same be delivered to the Judge of the Court, before the Jury who are to try the Cause have appeared, and one of the Jury be sworn.[12]

3. By 21 Jac. 1. cap 23. No Writ, to remove a Suit commenced in an inferior Court of Record, shall be obeyed, unless delivered to the Steward of the Court before Issue or Demurrer joined, so as the said Issue or Demurrer be not joined within six Weeks after the Arrest or Appearance of the Defendant.

4. Judgment was entered against B. and afterwards the Bail of B. brought Habeas Corpus to the Marshalsea, where B. was Prisoner, to have his Body before the Judges of C. B. to be committed in Execution in discharge of the Bail; but before the Return of the Habeas Corpus, B. brought a Writ of Error returnable the Day following; and when he came to be committed, the Court doubted that their Hands were tied up by the Writ of Error, because he could not be committed upon the Judgment, and yet they would have discharged the Bail if they could tell which way; therefore Quaere. Brownl. 61. Pasch. 14 Jac. Whickstead v. Bradshaw.

5. A Judge of the Court of B. R. will not grant a Habeas Corpus in the Vacation for a Prisoner to follow his Suits; but the Court may grant a special Habeas Corpus for a Prisoner to be at his Trial in the Vacation Time. P. 1650. 24 May, B. R. For this may concern him more than the other can. 2 L. P. R. 3.

6. The Court will grant a Habeas Corpus to one to have a Prisoner who is not in Execution, out of Prison, to be a Witness for him at the Trial, but at the Charge of him that desires the Habeas Corpus, and at his Peril, to take Care that the Prisoner do not make an Escape. 2 L. P. R. 3. cites 29 June 1640. Trin. B. R.

7. If a Prisoner doth not make his Prayer the first Term, when the Law is open, he cannot do it afterwards on the Habeas Corpus Act; But where the Act is suspended, it must be understood, that he must do it the first Term after the Suspension determined. Per Cur. Cumb. 421. 9 W. 3. B. R. the King v. the Earl of Aylsbury.

8. One removed into B. R. by Habeas Corpus ad Respondendum shall not be removed into any other Court till he has answered the Cause in B. R. and shall not compel the Plaintiff to follow a prolling Defendant, and so vice versa of C. B. so that each Court, in which he is first attached, shall retain the Defendant; and after he has answered there, you may carry him where you will. 1 Salk. 350. Mich. 11 W. 3. B. R. Anon.——And said, that this was fit to be the settled Course, if there be any Difference between the two Courts. Ibid.

9. After an interlocutory Judgment, and before final Judgment in an inferior Court, a Habeas Corpus was brought, but before the Return of the Writ, the Defendant died, and a Procedendo was awarded; because by the 8 & 9 W. 3. 11. the Plaintiff may sue a Sci. Fa. against the Executors, and proceed to Judgment, which he cannot have in another Court; and by this Means he would be depriv'd of the Effect of his Judgment, which would be unreasonable. 1 Salk. 352. Hill. 1 Annae. B. R. Anon.[13]

(E. 2) TO WHAT PLACE.

1. A Habeas Corpus was directed to the Bishop of Durham, to bring a Prisoner into B. R. and he making no Return, another Writ was moved for, with a * Penalty in it; And one of the Clerks of the Crown said, that Certioraries had been frequently returned from Durham; But before the Bishop would make a Return on this Writ, he insisted to have his Privileges recited in the Writ. But Dodderidge and the Court said, that they would not change the ancient Course, and Forms, and Usages. Lat. 160. Johnson's Case.

2. Habeas Corpus's have gone beyond Sea; Dr. Prujean was to cure a Madman, Sir R. Carr's Brother; Common Pleas sent an Habeas Corpus for him beyond Sea. Per Wild J. Cart. 222. Pasch. 23 Car. 2. C. B. Anon.

3. In Error on a Judgment in Ireland, it was suggested that the Plaintiff was in Execution upon the Judgment in Ireland. And the Court seem'd to be of Opinion, that a Habeas Corpus might be sent thither to remove him as Writs Mandatory had been awarded to Calais, and now to Guernsey and Jersey, &c. Mich. 33 Car. 2. B. R. 1 Vent. 357. Anon.[14]

(F) RETURNS. HOW, AND WHAT, IN GENERAL.

1. Where one is committed by one of the Privy Council, the Cause of Commitment ought to be set down in the Return, but not where the Commitment is by the whole Privy Council. Le. 71. Mich. 29 & 30 El. C. B. Howell's Case.

2. If on a Corpus cum Causa the Cause returned be sufficient, but false, the Court must remand the Prisoner, and he is at no Mischief; For if they have not Authority, or the Cause be false, he may have a Writ of false Imprisonment, and where the Party is only removed, and a false Return is made, the Party grieved may have special Action on his Case. 11 Rep. 99. b. Trin. 13 Jac. B. R. Bagg's Case.

3. It was returned upon an Habeas Corpus, that there is a Custom in London, that if any Freeman devise any Legacy to an Orphan, that the Executor shall be constrained to find sufficient Sureties to pay the Legacy, or be imprisoned. Roll. R. 316. Hill. 13 Jac. B. R. Spencer's Case.

4. No Answer can satisfy it, but to return the Cause with a Corpus Paratum habeo, &c. per Montague Ch. J. Cro. J. 543. Mich. 17 Jac. B. R. in Bourne's Case.

5. Habeas Corpus's are always returned in the Preterperfect Tense. Sid. 273. Trin. 17 Car. 2. B. R. the King v. Wagstaff & al.

6. Where a Writ of Habeas Corpus Ad Satisfaciendum issues out of B. R. the Attorney for the Plaintiff must endorse the Number Roll of the Judgment on the Back of the Habeas Corpus. And in the Case of one Sadler Mich. 21 Jac. Car. 2. the Court granted a Pluries Habeas Corpus, with Penalty of 100 l. returnable immediate. 2 L. P. R. 2.

7. The Writ commands the Day, and the Cause of the Caption and Detaining of the Prisoner, to be certified upon the Return, which if not done, the Court cannot possibly judge whether the Cause of the Commitment and Detainer be according to Law, or against it. Therefore the Cause of the Imprisonment ought by the Return to appear as specially and certainly to the Judges of the Retorn, as it did appear to the Court or Person authorised to commit, otherwise the Retorn is insufficient. Vaugh. 137. about 22 Car. 2. in Bushell's Case.[15]

8. Where the Cause is returned without the Body, yet that is supplied by the Defendant's Appearance and Bail enter'd here; Per Holt. Cumb. 332. Trin. 7 W. 3. B. R. Coxall v. Manucaptors of Colecroft.

9. Conusance of Pleas, or exempt Jurisdiction, were never returned to a Habeas Corpus; For then they might return a Falsity to support their Jurisdiction, which would not be traversable, and so a Subject would be ousted of the Privilege of suing, or being sued in the King's superiour Court, without any Opportunity of controverting the Matter; and the Case of Bishop v. Percival in Hard. was quoted per Holt Ch. J. 12 Mod. 666. Hill. 13 W. 3. B. R. Taylor v. Reignolds.

10. If one be in Custody upon a Criminal and also upon a civil Matter, and he would move himself by Habeas Corpus, there ought to be but one Habeas Corpus either of the Crown Side or of the Plea Side, and both Causes ought to be returned. 6 Mod. 133. per Cur. Pasch. 3 Annae. B. R. Anon.

(F. 2) RETURN THEREOF. GOOD OR NOT; AND EXCEPTIONS TO RETURNS OF COMMITMENTS.

1. A Habeas Corpus issued out of C. B. to the Steward and Marshal of the House, &c. for W. S. which was returned thus, viz. Quod Domina Regina per Literas Patentes suas suscepit in Protectionem suam J. M. and his Sureties, et ex Uberiori Gratia voluit, that if any Person should arrest or cause to be arrested the said John Mabb, or any of the Sureties, then the Marsbal of her House, &c. might arrest every such Person, and detain them in Prison until such Person should answer before the Privy Council for the Contempt; And that W. S. caused one J. P. a Surety of the said J. M. to be arrested, &c. And upon this Return W. S. was discharged. And because, after such Discharge, the Parties caused W. S. to be again arrested for the same Cause, viz. by Colour of the said Protection, an Attachment was granted against them. Le. 71. Mich. 29 & 30 Eliz. pl. 93. Search's Case.[16]

2. Pasch. 34 Eliz. All the Judges and Barons delivered their Opinions in Writing, and signed by them; That if any Person be committed by her * Majesty's Commandment from her Person, or by Order from ‡ the Council-

Board, or if any † one or two of her Council commit one for High-Treason, such Persons, so in the Case before committed, may not be deliver'd by any of her Courts, without due Tryal by the Law and Judgment of Acquittal had. Nevertheless the Judges may award the Queen's Writ to bring the Bodies of such Persons before them; and if, upon Return thereof, the Causes of their Commitment be certified to the Judges as it ought to be, then the Judges in the Cases before ought not to deliver him, but to remand the Prisoner to the Place from whence he came, which cannot be conveniently done unless Notice in Generality or else specially be given to the Keeper, or Gaoler, that shall have the Custody of such Prisoner. 1 And. 297, 291. pl. 305.

3. One having a Suit pending in B. R. and coming to London was committed to Newgate, and on a Habeas Corpus to the Gaoler of Newgate, he returned that the Party was committed to his Custody by Warrant from the Lord Chancellor of England for certain Matters concerning the King, there to remain until the Lord Chancellor delivered him; and for that Cause he could not have his Body here. And Hutton moved that the Return was not good, because it is too general: For it shews not for what * Causes he was committed; For it might be for a Cause which would not hinder him of his Privilege. Here also the Return is, that he ought to remain there until he were delivered by the Lord Chancellor; therefore he said it was ill. And the Court thereto said, it was the first Time that such Exceptions had been taken. Therefore they would consider of the Case. And. 9 H. 6. 44. was cited, and 33 H. 6. 28. & 29. and 4 E. 4. 15. and 16. Cro. J. 219. Hill. 6 Jac. B. R. Addis's Case.

4. Divers Brewers were committed to Prison by the Council, and upon an Habeas Corpus the Cause was returned to be by Force of a Warrant importing, that they were committed per Concilium Regis, pro quibusdam Causis Regem & Servicium suum tangentibus. Exception was taken, because it is per Concilium Regis, and does not shew what Council it was, whether Council of State or Counsel at Law, and so uncertain. But it was answered, that it shall be intended the Council of State. And Coke Ch. J. said, that the Statute of W. 1. is, that a Man committed by Command of the King is not bailable, and that Stamf. expounds Command to be per Concilium Regis; For the Council is incorporate in the King. cites 33 H. 6. 28. b. Hill. 12 Jac. B. R. 1 Roll. R. 134. the Brewer's Case.

5. R. was brought to the Bar by Habeas Corpus; the Cause returned was two Warrants; 1. because he was committed by the Lord Conway Secretary of State, and there no Cause shewn. 2. There was another Warrant from the same Secretary, which recited the first Warrant, and said, that now upon further Examination, he commanded the Gaoler to keep him for Suspicion of High Treason. And it was said, that this second Warrant is no Cause to detain, because it is with Reference to the first Warrant, which is no Warrant; and there is no special Cause of Suspicion alleged, as that false Gold was found with him, or the like; nor is it shewn what Treason; And he who is taken upon Suspicion shall be let to Bail. Palm. 558. Trin. 4 Car. B. R. Melvine's Case.

6. A. was committed to the Marshalsea of the Houshold for Words. Upon an Habeas Corpus, the Return was, that he was committed by the Lords of the Council; and the Warrant was that he was committed for insolent Behaviour and Words spoken at the Council Table, which was subscribed by the Lord Keeper, and 12 others of the Council; and because it did not mention what the Words were, so as the Court might judge of them, the Return was held insufficient, and the Marshal advised to amend it. Cro. C. 133. Mich. 4 Car. B. R. Chambers's Case.[17]

7. So where the * Return was, that he was committed to the Gaol of O. by the Earl of Danby to remain there without Bail or Mainprise, until he should be delivered by the Justices in Eyre. It was ordered that he should be bailed for 12 Days, and that the Return in the Interim should be amended; For being General, and no special Cause shewn, it was held to be absolutely void; and if not amended and good Cause shewn at the Day, it was ordered that he should be absolutely dismissed. Cro. C. 593. Mich. 16 Car. B. R. Brice's Case.

8. The Steward of Windsor-Court, who was Surveyor [also] of the Castle was committed by the Lord M. Lieutenant of the said Castle, and after three Habeas Corpus's, Lord M. made Return that he was committed by the immediate Warrant of the King, because he refused to deliver certain Rooms in the Timber Yard there, when the King commanded them. And it was moved that he ought to continue committed. But per Cur. he was discharged; For tho' the Detainer of the King's Castles be Treason, yet Quarrels among his Servants concerning their Rights, does not make any Offence against the Publick. Sid. 278. Pasch. 18 Car. 2. B. R. the King v. Taylor.

9. The Return was that the Defendants were committed by Sir W. T, Secretary of State, for High Treason, for aiding Sir Ja. Montgomery to escape, who was committed to the Custody of a Messenger for Suspicion of High Treason. The Court held, 1st. That the Commitment by a Secretary of State was good. 2. That the Commitment to a Messenger was good; For they would intend it only in Order to carry him to Gaol. 3. That Sir James Montgomery's Treason ought to have been inserted in the Warrant with an Allegation, that Sir James did the Fact, because the Defendants by breaking the Prison are guilty of the same specifick Treason and Offence; and therefore they were bailed. 1 Salk. 347. Tr. 7 W. 3. The King v. Kendall and Roe. ——— 5 Mod. 78. S. C.

10. The Return upon a Habeas Corpus was, that the Party was committed for a Contempt for not performing a Decree made in the Court of Requests, and no other Cause appear'd in the Return. The Court were of Opinion, that they could not deliver him, because no Cause appeared in the Return to warrant their Delivery of him. And they said, that if the Return be false, yet they cannot deliver the Party, but the Party may have his Action of false Imprisonment, if the Imprisonment be not lawful. Godb. 198. Tr. 10 Jac. C. B. Lea v. Lea.[18]

11. A. was committed to the Fleet for disobeying a Decree in Chancery upon a Bill exibited there after a Judgment of the fame Matter in Bank, and affirmed in this Court; and upon an Habeas Corpus the Return was such, Certifico quod A. commissus fuit 28 Novembris 1608. propter contemptum extra Curiam Cancellariae eidem Curiae commissum & per Mandatum Domini Cancellarii; It was moved that the Return is not good, because it is Propter contemptum extra Curiam Cancellariae, which is utterly uncertain, which was agreed per Coke and Cur. and because it is that he was committed per Mandatum Domini Cancellarii, which is too general. 1 Roll. Rep. 192. Pasch. 13 Jac. B. R. Apsley's Case.[19]

12. C. was brought in upon a Habeas Corpus, and the Return was that he was committed by the High Commission, and the Warrant of the Commitment was, that he was committed because he had used diverse reproachful Words against the Proceedings of the High Commission, and this being drawn into Form of Law in diverse Articles, he refused to answer. It was moved that the Return is insufficient, because it is too general. Per Coke, the Return is not good, because it is not shewn what the Articles were; For Peradventure, they were Articles concerning Matters at the Common Law; also it is too general, that he was committed for divers reproachful Words, &c. 22 E. 4. Propter Multiplicem Contumaciam is not good; besides no Time is alleged when the Words were spoken, and perhaps they are pardoned by some Act of Parliament, if the Time had appeared. The Court held the Return not good, and so he was bailed. 1 Roll. R. 245. Mich. 13 Jac. B. R. Codde's Case.

13. The Return to an Habeas Corpus was, that he was committed by Order of the Exchequer 9 Car. for not paying a Fine imposed upon him by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners; and altho' it was not shewn for what the Fine was imposed; yet because the Commitment was by a judicial Court, this Court would neither bail nor discharge him. Cro. C. 579. Pasch. 16 Car. B. R. Anon.

14. A. was imprisoned by the Court of Admiralty, and prayed a Habeas Corpus, upon which was this Return, viz. First, The Custom of the Admiralty is set forth, which is to attach Goods in Causa civili & Maritimo, in the Hands of a third Person; and that upon four Defaults made, the Goods so attached should be delivered to the Plaintiff, upon Caution put to restore them, if the Debt or other Cause of Action be disproved within the Year; and after four Defaults made, if the Party in whose Hands the Goods were attached refuse to deliver them, that the Custom is to imprison him until, &c. Then is set forth how that one Kent was indebted to J. S. in such a Sum upon Agreement made super altum mare, and that Kent died, and that afterwards J. S. attached certain Goods of Kent's in the Hands of the said A. for the said Debt; and that after, upon Summons, four Defaults were made, and that J. S. did tender Caution for Re-delivery of the Goods so attached and condemned, if the Debt were disproved within the Year; and that notwithstanding the said A. would not deliver the Goods; for which he was imprisoned by the Court of Admiralty until, &c. Bramston Ch. J. asked the Proctor of the Admiralty, then present, this Question, Whether by their Law the Death of the Party did not abate the Action, and he said it did; then said the Ch. J. it is clear that an Attachment cannot be against the Goods, the Party being dead; wherefore, by the whole Court, the Custom to attach Goods after the Death of the Party is no good Custom, therefore they gave Judgment that the Prisoner should be discharged. Mar. 204. Pasch. 18 Car. B. R. Heaman's Case.[20]

15. The Return was that the Party was convicted of publishing a false Petition, supposed to be delivered to the King with a Subscription that the King was content to discharge the Fine of J. S. who was sued in the Court of the Marches, made in Deceptionem Curiae, & in Defraudationem Regis de debito suo, and that he, being present in Court, was committed to the Gaoler till he paid 100 l. to the King, and 40 l. to the Attorney of the Court for Costs; and that he was detained also * Virtute Ordinis decreti Curiae, &c. And this was held to be good without shewing the Proceedings, and that Virtute Ordinis, &c. was sufficient. And that tho' two Causes of Imprisonment and Detainment were alleged, and tho' in the second he shewed no Imprisonment, but only that he was detained Virtute Decreti, &c. yet Sir James Ley Ch. J. held it good; For it was shewn before that he was committed, and that he being before imprisoned for Cause, &c. was also detained; but that if it had been in Justification in Trespass, it had not been good. 2 Roll. R. 307. 21 Jac. B. R. Hancock's Case.

16. Upon a Habeas Corpus directed to the Keepers of the Porters Lodge, (being the Prison for the Council of the Marches of Wales) it being returned, that they were committed to him by Virtue of a Decree of the said Council, upon Information against them, that the one of them inveigled the Son and Heir of J. S. being of the Age of 17 Years, in the Night, and when he was drunk, to marry the Sister of another of the Defendants, whereupon they were every of them severally fined to the King; some of them 100 Marks, some 40 l. and 100 Marks Damages to the Father who was the Prosecutor, and committed to Prison for a Year, and until the said Fines paid and the said 100 Marks Damages satisfied to the said J. S. and until they entered into a Recognizance for their good Behaviour, and until the said Court took further Order; and it was returned also, that they were committed by Virtue of an Order from the Lords of the Council. And this Return was held utterly insufficient for the last Part; because it was not mentioned what was the Order of the Council. It was moved by Grimston that the Return was ill, to award to Prison, to remain there until further Order taken*, which is utterly incertain. It was doubted whether the Marches of Wales might meddle with a clandestine Marriage to punish it, being a meer Spiritual Act. As also about the Sentence for Damages to the Party, altho' it be within the express Words of the Instructions, &c. Whereupon Day was given until Octabis Michaelis. And in the Interim the Parties were bailed. Cro. C. 557. Trin. 15 Car. B. R. Seele's Case.[21]

17. The Return to a Habeas Corpus, directed to the Mayor of St Albans, was that He was committed to the Gaol by the Justices of the Peace of the said Liberty, at the Sessions of the Peace holden 11 Julii 1639. till he should obey an Order for taking the Office of Constable upon him; for that he being an Inhabitant within the Hundred of Casho, within the Liberty of St. Albans, had refused to execute the said Office: And because it was informed on the Part of the Prisoner, that he denied he was within the Liberty of St. Albans, but affirmed he was within the County of Hertford out of the said Liberty, All the Court held, that he was unjustly committed; because they ought not to have committed him, when he denied to be Constable, especially pretending he was not within the Liberty, but should have caused him to be indicted upon this Refusal; and if he were found to be within the Liberty should have assessed a good Fine, and then have committed him for that Cause. See 8 Rep. 38. Greisley's Case. But as it is now returned, the Imprisonment was not lawful; wherefore he, by the Opinion of the whole Court, was absolutely discharged without any Bail. Cro. C. 567. Hill. 15 Car. B. R. Crawley's Case.[22]

18. One was committed for not taking upon him the Office of a Livery-man, being chosen thereto, &c. Upon a Habeas Corpus to the Keeper of Newgate, he did not in his Return set forth his Warrant in Haec Verba, but only that Per quoddam Warrantum in Scriptis secundum Consuetudinem, &c. the Defendant was committed. The Court said, that the Warrant is always set forth at large upon an extrajudicial Commitment. But when a Man is committed by a Court of Record, there is no Warrant at all, and therefore the Court of Aldermen (who committed the Person) cannot be intended to proceed judicially, because the Commitment is per Warrantum in Scriptis; that they are the proper Judges of an Excuse, why Defendant will not take upon him the Livery, and if they adjudge it insufficient, and appoint him to accept it, and he refuses, it is a Contempt of their Authority, and they may commit him. 5 Mod. 156. to 162. Hill. 7 W. 3. B. R. Vintner's Company v. Clerk.[23]

19. In the Case above, another Exception was taken; that in the Return a Custom was laid for the Mayor to commit the Offender to the Custody of the Sheriffs of London, or other Officer; and the Keeper of Newgate, who was the Gaoler had returned, that he was committed Custodiae meae, when it doth not appear that he was either Sheriff or Officer at that Time. And the Court held, that tho' the Keeper of Newgate may be an Officer of the City, yet he may not be one attending the Court of Aldermen; so that it does not appear that he is a proper Officer of that Court to receive the Prisoner; neither did it appear that Newgate was in London, but if it did, he ought to be committed to the Sheriffs, and not to the Keeper of Newgate, tho' they might have taken him for their Officer. 5 Mod. 156. to 162. Vintner's Company v. Clerk.[24]

20. If a Cause be returned out of the City Courts by Habeas Corpus, the Custom must be returned, or no Procedendo can ever be granted. 10 Mod. 440. Trin. 5 Geo. 1. B. R. in Case of Asgill v. Hunt.

21. Upon the Return of an Habeas Corpus, it was certified that the Mayor of L. imprisoned one H. (Quia se Male gessit) and for using of undecent Speeches to him, and that in his Hall with a Spit, insultum fecit, & conatus fuit eum vulnerare; this he certifies for the Cause of his Imprisonment by way of Justification; and upon Exception taken to the Certificate of the Mayor, it was held by Haughton, Dodderidge and Croke J. that the Return is insufficient, because it ought to have shewed the certain Cause of his being imprisoned by him, and also to have expressed, for * how long Time, and what sort of Imprisonment it was; wherefore by Rule of the whole Court, H. was absolutely discharged of his Imprisonment. 2 Buls. 139, 140, 141. Mich. 11 Jac. Hodges v. Humkin the Mayor of Liskerret.[25]

22. The Return was that the Prisoners were committed by R. a Justice of Peace of the said County by force of the Statute of 5 R. 2. 7. upon Complaint of J. S. that he claimed Common in a Meadow of the said J. S. called Monk's Meadow, and that the Prisoners entered into the said Meadow and kept him out with Force and Arms from his Common, and that he came thither and found them holding the said Meadow with Force, whereupon he by Virtue of the said Statute committed them to Goal; and it was held by all the Court (absente Brampston) that this Commitment was not waranted by the Statute; For a Man cannot be indicted or committed for Entering his own Land with Force, or holding it with Force against a Commoner. Cro. C. 486. Mich. 13 Car. B. R. Sydnam and Parr's Case.

23. W. and 7 others were committed by the Mayor of London to Newgate, for refusing to enter into a Recognizance to appear before the Lords of the Council; and upon an Habeas Corpora returned by the Mayor and Sheriffs, it appeared, that by an Order from the Council Table, they were appointed to come before the Mayor and Sheriff's to treat concerning foreign Matters; and when they appeared being required by the Mayor then in Commission of Oyer and Terminer for the City, to perform the Order of the Lords of the Council, and to enter into Recognisance in a reasonable Sum, they refused, whereupon he Committed them. And Peard, Maynard and Keeling, jun., argued, that this Return was not good; 1st. Because it doth not mention the Order, nor shew what the Order was; so as the Court might adjudge thereof. 2dly. Because the Recognisance is demanded for them to appear before the Lords of the Council, but no Time nor Place is appointed nor Cause shewn why it was demanded; and because the Kings Counsel prayed Time to maintain the Return the Parties were bailed untill the next Term. Cro. C. 552. Trin. 15 Car. B. R. Wolnough's Case.[26]

24. P. was committed by the Lord Mayor of London, for that contemptuously and unseasonably he served him with a Process of Subpaena out of this Court when he was executing his Office as a Magistrate, and examining Offences of High Treason, in derogation of Magistracy, and in disturbance of the due Execution of Justice, till such Time as he should find Sureties for his good Behaviour. It was moved that he might be set at Liberty, because there did not appear (as was alleged) any good Cause of Commitment. But Hale held that he could not be remanded, because it does not appear by the Return that the Lord Mayor was then a Justice of Peace; but because the Process was unduly served upon such a Person, at such a time, the Court would not discharge him; but there was no Exception taken to the Lord Mayors committing a Person for an Affront done to himself. Hard. 182. Pasch. 13 Car. 2. in Scacc. Prince's Case.

25. Upon the Return of an Habeas Corpus it appeared that C. had forestalled a great Number of Lobsters, whereupon the Mayor, &c. of London caused him to appear, and he confess'd the same, and they Ordered him to desist from such forestalling; but he said Obstinately and in Contempt of the Court, that he would not obey their Order, whereupon they committed him to Newgate until he should Signify to the Court that he would conform himself, or otherwise be delivered by due Course of Law. This was moved to be insufficient; to which it was answered, that the Imprisonment in this Case was not for forestalling, but for the Contempt to the Court, which, per Twisden, they have Power to do; wherefore the Court remanded the Prisoner, he promising to make Submission at the next Court, and the Sheriff promising he should be discharged thereupon. Vent. 115, 116. Pasch. 23 Car. 2. B. R. City of London v. Coates.

26. A Justice of Peace committed a Brewer for not paying the Duty of Excise, and he being brought into Court, an Exception was taken that it ought to appear that he was a common Brewer. Hale Ch. J. said that the Statute 12 Car. 2. 23. prohibits the bringing a Certiorari, but not a Habeas Corpus; and want of Averment of a Matter of Fact may be amended in a Return in Court; and if it be not true at their Peril be it, and so it was amended. 1 Mod. 102, 103. pl. 10. Mich. 25 Car. 2. B. R. Anon.

27. An Habeas Corpus being brought upon a Commitment by the College of Physicians, it was excepted against, because it was Pro mala Praxi which is uncertain. 2dly, The Conclusion is ill, because it was to remain without Bail till discharged by the President and College, or others authorised, or by due Course of Law; For if a Commitment be for a Fine it ought to be Quousque be paid the Fine; and if for a Contempt, till he had submitted himself. 3dly. The Offence is pardoned; For tho' the King has granted Fines to the Corporation he might however Pardon the Offence, and the King in this Case has pardoned all that he can Pardon; and if the Commitment had been for a Punishment, it ought to have been a distinct Commitment, & ulterius quod committatur for 4 Months, and the Commitment ought to recite the Judgment; and per Cur. he was discharged. Skin. 676. Hill. 8 W.

3. B. R. the King v. Bowerbank.[27]
28. The Return was, that the Parties were committed by a Warrant under the Hands and Seals of the Commissioners of Bankrupts for refusing to be examined and sworn touching their Knowledge of the Bankrupt's Estate, and an Exception was taken to it for not averring their Refusal to come and be sworn; For it did not appear that they did refuse, and that it should have been positively averred, viz. That they did refuse and still do; For if they are willing at any Time, they ought to be discharged, and so they were; but the Process against them being an Attachment of Privilege they were order'd to put in Bail upon the Attachment. Pasch. 30 Car. 2. C. B. 2 Mod. 306. Penrice and Wynn's Case.
29. A. and four others of the Parish of St. Bartholomew were brought to the Bar by Habeas Corpora, and by the Return it appeared that they were committed to a Messenger for Contempt to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for not performing of their Order in paying the Parish Clerk his Wages, rated by their Order at 4*d*. the Quarter for every House in Great St. Bartholomew's, which they refused to pay but according to their Custom as they were rated by their Churchwardens and Vestry. And now Doctor Merrick and Doctor Ecleston moved, that they should be Remanded; For they said this Order was [*] grounded upon the King's Letters Patents, wherein it is Provided, that the Clerks should gather and receive their Wages as should be ordered by the High Commissioners, and pretended that for any Contempt they might Fine and Imprison; but upon this Return they were bailed untill the first Tuesday next Term. Cro. C. 582. Pasch. 16 Car. B. R. Torle's Case.[28]
30. Upon a Habeas Corpus was return'd the Warrant from the Sheriff, for taking the Prisoner, which was upon a Writ of Excomunicato Capiendo for Substraction of Tythes and other Ecclesiastical Duties; Resolv'd, that this Return was uncertain, and the (other Duties) might be such Matters as were out of their Jurisdiction, and they must shew the Matter to be within their Jurisdiction; and also that the Writ of Excom. cap. it self ought to be Returned, and it is not sufficient to return the Warrant; because that may be Wrong when the Writ is Right, and tho' the Warrant may be Wrong, yet if the Writ is Right the Party is Rightfully in Custody of the Sheriff, and the Writ was Quash'd. 1 Salk. 350. Trin. 12 W. 3. B. R. the King v. Fowler.
31. The Return was, that the Parties, being Jurors, refused to find Gosse and others indicted on the late Statute of Conformity, Guilty contrary to their Evidence which was full and pregnant, and upon this the Court fined them and ordered them to be Imprisoned till they paid the Fine; and upon mature Consideration they were remanded. Raym. 138. Tr. 17 Car. 2. B. R. the King v. Wagstaff & al.[29]

32. The Return was, that the Prisoner, being a Juryman among others charged at the Sessions Court of the Old-Baily to try the Issue between the King and Penn and Mead upon an Indictment for Assembling unlawfully and tumultuously, did Contra plenam & manifestam Evidentiam openly given in Court acquit the Prisoner indicted, in Contempt of the King, &c. This was held Insufficient, because the Evidence it self was not express'd so as that the Court might Judge of it. Vaugh. 135. to 158. about 22 Car. 2. Bushell's Case.

33. Where the Return was, that upon the Party's Examination they found just Cause to suspect him to be Guilty of the said Misdemeanors (mentioned before of incouraging Conventiclers and stirring up People to Disobedience) and that thereupon they did require him to find Sureties to be of the good Behaviour, which he refused, this was held an insufficient Retorn, neither shewing the Cause of Suspicion, nor the certainty of the Sum in which he and his Sureties should be bound. 2 Vent. 22, 23, 24. Trin. 22 Car. 2. C. B. Rudyard's Case.[30]

34. A Habeas Corpus issued to bring in the Body of an Heiress being in Custody (as was suggested in the Writ) of Sir R. V. then Lord Mayor of London; afterwards a Pluries issued, and thereupon he return'd Nullam habeo talem Personam in Custodia mea nec habui die Impetrationis hujus brevis vel unquam Postea. This was adjudged an ill Return; For tho' he had, no such Person then in his Custody at the Time of the Pluries, yet is might be that he had her at the Time of obtaining the first Writ. 2 Lev. 128. Hill. 26 & 27 Car. 2. B. R. the King v. Sir Robert Viner.

35. A Return was, that Issue was joined before the Writ came to him, but did not say that Issue was not joined within 6 Weeks, &c. as it ought to be by the Statute, and therefore ill. Comb. 127. Trin. 1 W. & M. B. R. Anon.[31]

36. And there was another Fault, because, it being in an Inferiour Court, it is not returned, that the Cause of Action arose within the Jurisdiction. Comb. 127. Anon.

37. Where an Action is founded on the Custom of London, and removed by Habeas Corpus a Difference was taken between an Action brought on a By-Law, and removed here into B. R. and an Action brought on the Custom of London; For in the Case of the By-Law, the special Matter of such Law ought in certain to be returned upon the Habeas Corpus, &c. otherwise the Court cannot take Notice of such a private Law; but 'tis not so in an Action founded on a Custom of London, because the Court ex Officio will take Notice of those Customs. Carth. 75. Mich. 1 W. & M. B. R. Watson v. Clerk.

(G) PROCEEDINGS.

1. No Habeas Corpus shall be made out in the Vacation Time to remove a Cause out of an Inferior Court, other than the Courts in London, Middlesex, or the Marshalsea, or other Courts within 10 Miles of London, retornable immediate, but at a Day certain in Court; and that every such Habeas Corpus, retornable in Trin. or Hill. Term, be not retornable after the second Return of the Term; Per Magistr. Livesay and Alios, Pasch. 21 Car. 2. 2 L. P. R. 1.

2. If a Cause be removed in the Vacation out of London, Middlesex; or the Marshalsea, or other Courts within 5 Miles of London by Habeas Corpus retornable immediate, and Bail put in by the first Retorn of the next Term, if the Declaration be delivered 8 Days before the end of the Term, then the Defendant is to plead to enter; and in Mich. Term, if it be delivered before the Retorn-day of Crastin. Anim. and in Easter Term, before the Retorn-day of Mens. Pasch. then the Defendant is to plead to Trial the same Term, per Magist. Livesay and Alios, Pasch. 21 Car. 2. Regis. 2 L. P. R. 1, 2.

3. After the Retorn of a Habeas Corpus is read and filed in Court, it cannot be amended. Trin. 23 Car. B. R. For it is then a Record of the Court, but before it be filed, it may. 2 L. P. R. 2.—S. P. Gibb. 266. Pasch. 4 Geo. 2. B. R. the King v. Catterall.

4. Every Habeas Corpus retornable at a Day certain, to remove a Cause out of an Inferior Court, must not be made retornable further than the second Retorn in Hillary and Trinity Terms; so that the Defendants may plead to Issue that Term, and the Cause may be tried at the Assises, and in Default of pleading to Trial, the Plaintiff may take his Judgment. 2 L. P. R. 3.[32]

5. Note, Holt Ch. J. made it a Rule, that when one is brought up by Habeas Corpus the Return should remain in Court and a Copy of it only given the Marshall, and so of a Committitur. 6 Mod. 180. Trin. 3 Annae. B. R. Anon.

6. Upon a Habeas Corpus a Rule may be made to bring the Prisoner up any Day in the same Term without filing it, but not to bring him up at a Day in another Term, unless the Return thereof be filed. 12 Mod. 441. Hill. 12 W. 3. B. R. the King v. Margason.

7. A Prisoner was brought up by Habeas Corpus returnable at a Day certain, and the Gaoler did not bring him into Court, but carried him back, and brought him in the next Day. In this Case, the Writ being returnable at a Day certain, the Gaoler could not bring him in at another Day by Virtue of it; but upon a Writ returnable immediate it is otherwise, and the Gaoler was ruled to be at the Charge of a new Writ. 12 Mod. 564. Mich. 13 W. 3. Anon.

8. On a Habeas Corpus to the Sheriffs of London they returned an Action on a By-Law with a Penalty for not weighing at the City Beam. Holt. Ch. J. held, that the Return in this Case may be filed; because the very Record below is not returned, and therefore will not be filed, and consequently a Procedendo may be granted, because it will not send out any Record filed in this Court but takes off the Suspension they were under by the Habeas Corpus; and the Writ was filed and a Procedendo awarded accordingly. 1 Salk. 352. Trin. 3 Annae B. R. Fazakerly v. Baldo.

(H) EFFECT. OR WHAT REMOVED.

1. AN Habeas Corpus cum Causa removes the Body of the Party for whom it is granted, and all the Causes which are then depending against him. 2 L. P. R. 2. cites 21 Car. B. R. and says, that for that Reason it is a Habeas Corpus cum Causa, and that the word Causa is Nomen Collectivum, and implies all Causes.

2. If a Habeas Corpus be directed to an Inferiour Court, returnable two Days after the end of the Term, yet the Inferiour Court cannot proceed contrary to the Writ. 1 Mod. 195. per Cur. Hill. 26 & 27 Car. 2. B. R. Haley's Case.

3. It was said that the Warden of the Fleet might detain a Prisoner after a Habeas Corpus directed to him out of B. R. for his Fees, but not for Chamber-Rent, &c. Comb. 109. Pasch. 1 W. & M. B. R. the Warden of the Fleet's Case.

4. The Record it self is never removed by a Habeas Corpus, as it is on a Certiorari, but remains below, and the Return is only an Account or History of their Proceedings stated and sent up to the Superiour Court to Judge and Determine the Matter there, therefore if a Cause be removed hither by Habeas Corpus, the Plaintiff here must begin de novo, and declare against the Defendant as in Custod. Marr. per Holt Ch. J. Trin. 3 Ann. B. R. 1 Salk. 352. in Case of Fazacharly v. Baldo.

5. The Habeas Corpus suspends the Power of the Court below, so that if they proceed, the Proceeding would be void, & coram non judice; per Holt Ch. J. 1 Salk. 352. in Case of Fazacharly v. Baldo.

6. When a Person comes to the Court of B. R. upon an Hab. Corp. and this Court thinks fit to turn him over to the Marshal, they commit him for no other Matter, than for the Cause or Causes returned on the Hab. Corp. 11 Mod. 52. pl. 24. Pasch. 4. Annae. Anon.

(H. 2) ABUSE THEREOF. WHAT SHALL BE SAID TO BE.

1. IT was resolved by 10 Judges, upon Conference with the Ld Keeper, (the other two Judges being out of Town), That an Habeas Corpus was an ancient and legal Writ; but that under colour thereof, the Warden of the Fleet and Marshal of B. R. ought not to suffer Prisoners to go at large, and that such Permission is an Abuse of the said Writ, and is an Escape in the Keeper of the Prison. Cro. C. 466. Trin. 12 Car. B. R. Anon.

2. A Habeas Corpus to the Town of N. was delivered to the Proper Officer in open Court, to remove a Plaint from that Court before Trial, notwithstanding which, the Court below went on to Trial. Defendant moved for an Attachment against the Sheriff of N. for proceeding to Trial after the Habeas Corpus delivered, as aforesaid, and a Rule was made to shew Cause; but upon shewing Cause, it appearing that Issue was joined April 27 before the Habeas Corpus delivered; the Court below was warranted by the Act of Parliament to proceed. Notes of Cases in C. B. 146. Mich. 8 Geo. 2. Hornbuckle v. Eaton.

(I) OBEYED. HOW IT MUST BE OBEYED,

1. IF the Steward of an Inferiour Court proceeds after an Habeas Corpus delivered, all their Proceedings are void, and the Court awarded a Supersedeas. Co. Car. 79 pl. 1. Mich. 3 Car. C. B. Clapham's Case.[33]

2. A Habeas Corpus was directed to the Bishop of Durham, who made no Return, whereupon Noy moved for another Writ, and to have a * Penalty contained in it. The Bishop insisted on having his Privileges recited in the Writ, before he would make a Return of it. But Doderidge and the Court said, they would not change the ancient Course and Forms in Forms and Usages. Lat. 160. Jobson's Case.

3. If a Prisoner will remove himself, he shall pay the Costs of the Removal; But if the Plaintiff will remove the Prisoner, he shall pay reasonable Charges. Mar. 89. pl. 143. Pasch. 15 Car. Anon.

4. On a Habeas Corpus, the Gaoler is bound to bring the Body, tho' he has not his Charges tendered him; but he may move the Court, and they shall rule, that he shall have his Charges first. 2 Show. 172. Mich. 33 Car. 2. B.

R. the King v. Greenaway.

5. The Sheriffs of London and Middlesex, where the Writ is Returnable immediate, must make their Return the same Day that the Writ is delivered and bring the Body immediately, as the Writ requires, and not suffer the Prisoner to wander abroad upon pretence thereof. So likewise where a Habeas Corpus is directed to the Warden of the Fleet. 2 L. P. R. 2.

6. A Rule was made to shew Cause, why an Attachment should not go against a Gaoler for denying to return a Habeas Corpus, and extorting a Note from the Prosecutor in his Custody, so as by Menaces, and Duress, he was forced to comply, and give the Note for Payment of the Money to the Gaoler. 8 Mod. 226. Hill. 10 Geo. The King v. Colvin.

(K) NECESSARY. IN WHAT CASES.

1. IF the Chief Justice of B. R. commits one to the Marshal by his Warrant, he ought not to be brought to the Bar by Rule, but by Habeas Corpus; per Holt Ch. J. 1 Salk. 349. pl. 4. Hill. 8 W. 3. B. R. Anon.

2. One committed to the Marshal by the Court may be brought up by Rule of Court; but one committed by a Judge in his Chamber cannot be brought up without a Habeas Corpus, to which a Return may be made; per Cur. 12 Mod. 641. Hill. 13 W. 3. B. R. Anon.

(L) PUNISHMENT OF INSUFFICIENT, OR NO RETURNS, AND WHAT IS TO BE DONE THEREUPON.

1. IN a Corpus cum Causa to the Warden of the Fleet, if he will not bring before the Justices of the Bank the Prisoner condemned, it is a Cause to seise his Office; per Babb. But Paston e Contra; For it may be he is escaped, and then the Warden shall pay the Condemnation. Br. Reseiser. pl. 41. cites 9 H. 6. 55.

2. W. was committed to the Fleet by the Lord Treasurer of England, and the Prisoner was brought to the Common Pleas by Habeas Corpus, which was returned, and no Cause of the Commitment expressed; and for that Cause the Prisoner was set at Liberty and Bailed. 1 Brownl. 44. Mich. 15 Jac. Warter's Case.

3. A Habeas Corpus having been awarded to the Cinque Ports to remove the Body cum Causa, and the Lord Warden pretending such Writ was not awardable to the Cinque Ports, or returnable by him, it was held by the whole Court, that a Habeas Corpus with a great Penalty, should be awarded returnable at another Day. Cro. J. 543. Mich. 17 Jac. B. R. Bourn's Case.

4. A Habeas Corpus went to the Stannary Court, to which an insufficient Return was made, and therefore disallowed. And the Court said, that the Warden of the Stanneries must be amerced, and you may go to the Coroners, and get it affeered and estreat it, (you know my Ld. Bath's Amercement is 5 1.) and an alias Habeas Corpus must go for the insufficiency of the Return of the first, and upon that, the Body and Cause must be removed up. And if another Excuse be returned, we will grant an Attachment. 1 Salk. 350. Trin. 12 W. 3. B. R. Anon.

(M) RETURNABLE AT WHAT TIME, AND OF AN[*] ALIAS AND PLURIES.

1. Habeas Corpus to all Prisons, except London and Middlesex, commanding the Sheriffs to bring the Prisoners must be returnable at a Day certain in Court. 2 L. P. R. 2.

(N) IN WHAT CASES THE PARTY SHALL NOT BE DISCHARGED ON HABEAS CORPUS, BUT SHALL BE PUT TO BRING WRIT OF ERROR.

1. ONE indicted for buying and selling old Money, was convicted at the Old-Baily, and fined 1000 l. and on a Habeas Corpus, the Return was, that he was committed by Order of the Sessions Court at the Old-Baily to his Custody, tenor cujus ordinis sequitur in Haec Verba, viz. W. B. convictus, &c. Ideo Consideratum est, that he be fined 1000 l. & quod ibidem, viz. in Custodia of the Keeper of Newgate in Gaola remaneat sub salva Custodia, quousque finem persolvet. The Commitment was held naught, because it was not to the Sheriff, who is the legal and immediate Officer to every Court of Oyer and Terminer, and because the Word (Committitur) is necessary to the Form of a legal Commitment. And per Cur. where a Commitment was without Cause, a Prisoner may be delivered by Habeas Corpus; But where there appears to be good Cause, as in the present Case, (which differences it from Bushell's Case), and a Defect only in the Form, as in this Case, he ought not to be discharged. 1 Salk. 348. Trin. 7 W. 3. B. R. Bethell's Case.[34]

2. And tho' the Commitment ought to be to the Sheriff, yet a Gaoler is a known Officer in the Law, and his Custody is the Custody of the Sheriff to many Purposes. Therefore the Court refused to discharge him on the Habeas Corpus, and left him to bring his Writ of Error. 1 Salk. 348. Bethel's Case.

3. Before Bushel's Case, no Man was ever delivered by Habeas Corpus, without Writ of Error from a Commitment of a Court of Oyer and Terminer; per Cur. 1 Salk. 348. in Bethel's Casé.

(O) THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN A HABEAS CORPUS AND A CERTIORARI. AND WHEN, AND HOW BAIL IS TO BE PUT IN.

1. A Certiorari removes the Record cum Omnibus ea tangentibus, but upon a Habeas Corpus, the Body only is removed, and they shall begin de Novo. Arg. Comb. 2. and that it was so at the Common Law, cites 3 H. 6. 3.

2. No Bail shall be put in upon a Writ of Habeas Corpus before the Writ be returned, and every Attorney of the Court of B. R. who shall put in any special Bail, before any Judge of the said Court, at the Time of the putting in of such Bail, shall deposite into the Hands of the Judge's Clerk of the said Court, before whom such Bail is put in, the due Fee for filing of that Bail, viz. For every Bail upon a Writ of Habeas Corpus 4s. 10d. and for every Bail upon a Cepi Corpus 2 s. 6d. and the Judges Clerks, whose Hands the Bails are put into, within 6 Days after the End of every Term, shall give a Note in Writing to the Secondary of the said Court, of all the Bails of the Vacation and precedent Term so put in, together with the Names of the Attorneys who put in those Bails, and they shall pay to the said Secondary the aforesaid Fee, by him received for those Bails in Manner aforesaid; per Cur. Pasch. 29 Car. 2. B. R. L. P. R. 172.

3. Holt Ch. J. said, he wondered that People did not bring a Habeas Corpus and not a Certiorari; For the Defendant might well say, I will not be sued in this Inferior Court, but will be sued above, and there I will put you in such Bail as the Court above will reach, tho' your Process cannot come at them, and that I cannot give you such Bail as you can reach, and so he may well remove the Cause by Habeas Corpus. And in such Case, if he do not put in such Bail above, as the Action would require below, a Procedendo should be granted; For if by the Course below there ought to be special Bail, tho' common Bail would do if it had commenced above originally, yet special Bail must be given above, or a Procedendo shall go. And if one Action require special Bail, and another not, and that do not appear to be done fraudulently to hold to special Bail, there we will hold it to special Bail or grant a Procedendo; but if Fraud appear we will retain it. 12 Mod. 646. Hill. 13 W. 2. in Case of Crosse v. Swift.

3. There is a Difference between a Habeas Corpus and a Certiorari, as to the removing a Record; For upon a Habeas Corpus we have not the Record itself, here in B. R. as we have upon a Certiorari; per Holt Ch. J. 6 Mod. 177. Trin. 3 Annae. B. R. in Case of Fazakerly v. Baldo.—Therefore, if the Cause be to be removed hither by Habeas Corpus, the Plantiff here must begin de Novo, and declare against the Defendant, as in Custodia Mareschalli. 1 Salk. 352. S. C.

(P) PLEADINGS.

1. THE Error assigned of a Judgment in an Inferior Court was, because after an Habeas Corpus cum Causa sued out of B. R. and delivered to the Mayor and Principal Officer of that Court, and Acceptance and Allowance thereof, they, notwithstanding, proceeded to Trial and Judgment. Defendant pleaded in nullo est erratum, and it was moved not to be Error; because he does not allege the Habeas Corpus to be upon Record, so as the Error now assigned is not triable. But it was held, that this Proceeding was Error & Coram non Judice, which is confessed by the Pleading in Nullo est Erratum. And that if it was not true, that the Habeas Corpus was delivered to the Mayor, and allowed, it should have been denied, and the Delivery or not Delivery is triable per Pais. But because it is not denied, it is a manifest Error, whereupon the Judgment was reversed. Cro. C. 261. Trin. 8 Car. B. R. Ellis v. Johnson.

2. So where a Habeas Corpus issued out of C. B. to the Palace Court, and was delivered to the Judges, and prayed to be allowed, and yet they proceeded to Judgment, and a Writ of Error being brought thereupon, it was insisted, that the bringing the Writ of Error had affirmed the Jurisdiction of the Court below; But the Court held, that it was manifest Error, and the Writ well lies. But the Chief Justice said, that it is merely a Matter of Favour, that Judgments in Inferiour Courts, in Causes not arising within their Jurisdiction, are not avoided without Writ of Error, and that such was the Opinion of the Court of C. B. and Judgment was reversed accordingly. 2 Jo. 209. Pasch. 34 Car. 2. B. R. Copping v. Fulford.

3. Upon a Habeas Corpus Returnable in Mich. Term, if the Declaration be delivered before Crastinum Animarum, the Defendant must plead to try; but upon a Cepi Corpus, he is only to plead to enter. So in Easter Term, if the Declaration be delivered before Mense Paschae, the Defendant on a Habeas Corpus must plead to try; but on a Cepi Corpus, to enter only. 2 Salk. 515. Mich. 8 W. 3. B. R. Hall v. Englestone.

(Q) RETURN AMENDED, IN WHAT CASES.

1. ONE that practised Physick in London, being committed by the College of Physicians, brought an Habeas Corpus. In the Return no Cause was shewn, for which Reason it was held insufficient. It was moved to amend the Return; but per Doderidge J. Matter of Form only is amendable, but not * Matter of Fact, which goes in Justification of the Impisonment and Fine. 2 Buls. 259. Mich 12 Jac. Dr. Alphonso v. the College of Physicians:[35]

2. The Court allowed the Officer to amend the Return of a Habeas Corpus, and to make it Special, because if a Procedendo should be granted, the Action would be lost. Carth. 76. Mich. 1 W. & M. B. R. Watson v. Clerk.

(R) REMANDED, BAIL'D, OR DISCHARGED. IN WHAT CASES THE PRISONER SHALL BE.

1. AUDITA Querela. The Party was in Newgate, and removed by Habeas Corpus into C. B, and the Sheriff of London came when the Party had pleaded Release * to the Issue, and said that he was also condemned in 200 l. in Writ of Account, at the Suit of the same Conusee, and pray'd to have him remanded; and it was said, that when this Matter is try'd, he shall be remanded. Br. Privilege. pl. 20. cites 24 E. 3. 27.

2. A Man was Outlaw'd in Debt for 19 l. in Banco, and after was taken in London at the Suit of the same Plaintiff, and was condemned for the same Debt, and committed to the Warden for Execution, and after was removed in Banco by Habeas Corpus, and shewed Acquittance of the same Debt, and prayed to go quit, sed non Allocatur, but was remanded to London, and there he may have Sci. fa. upon his Acquittance, against the Plaintiff; But upon his Removal, he had Sci. fa. upon Charter of Pardon of the Outlawry, and the Plaintiff warn'd and did not come, by which the Charter was allowed, but he was remanded upon the Condemnation, Br. Privilege. pl. 10. cites 48 E. 3. 22.

3. 2 H. 5. Stat. 1. cap. 2. If a Corpus cum Causa or Certiorari be granted out of the Chancery to remove one that is in Prison upon an Execution at another Man's Suit, he shall be remanded.

4. If one be impleaded in London before he be impleaded in Bank, he shall be * brought to answer and remanded; but if he be impleaded in Bank before he be impleaded in London, he shall be dismissed. Br. Privilege, pl. 53. cites 10 H. 6. 10.

5. Habeas Corpus was allowed after the Body was in Execution, but was not dismissed, but was sent to the Fleet and to have Aud. Quer. Quod Nota. And so the Practice is at this Day, that if a Man be condemned in London, and Matter is against him in B. R. they will send for him, and if he be condemned there, he shall be sent to the Marshalsea, and there remain for both Executions; but the Highest Court shall have the keeping of him, and so the first Plaintiff shall not lose his Execution. Br. Privilege, pl. 49. cites 22 H. 6.

6. One in Execution upon Statute Merchant was removed by Corpus cum Causa, and was awarded to the Fleet and not dismissed, because in Execution and cannot plead Release there but in Chancery. Br. Privilege, pl. 50. cites 22 H. 6. 56.

7. One came into B. R. by Cepi Corpus cum Causa to have the Privilege; because a Clerk of the Bank had Bill against him upon Obligation, and had Attachment of Privilege against him; and the Prisoner was arrested in London after the Attachment awarded, by which the Plaintiff prayed to be dismissed in London, and the Plaintiff in the Attachment shewed to him his Obligation, and the Defendant could not deny it, and therefore Judgment was given, that he recover his Debt and Damages, and that he be sent back to London as a Man condemned, and that he answer to others who have Action against him in London; Quod Nota; Quaere the Reason. Br. Privilege, pl. 46. cites 22 E. 4. 36.

8. A. is condemned in London for Debt, and is in Execution there; afterwards there is an Indictment and Verdict against him in the King's Bench for Trespass; A. is brought there by Habeas Corpus, and pleads Not Guilty to the Indictment, and afterwards is remanded to London; and after divers Processes of Distringas issued against the Jury, the Jury appears; and afterwards he is again removed into the King's Bench by Habeas Corpus; and the Jury being Sworn, he confesses the Indictment, and the Jury is discharged. Altho' this Indictment was by his own Procurement, and was Covinous; yet he was fined and committed to the Marshalsea for the said Fine, and for the Execution in London; by all the Judges of England, Volenti non fit injuria. Jenk. 169. pl. 31. cites 1 H. 7. 22.[36]

9. If the Sheriff returns Writ of Privilege, that the Party is retained for Surety of the Peace in London taken by J. N. in this Case J. N. shall be demanded, and if he comes, the Party shall find Surety in Bank, and if J. N. makes Default, the Prisoner shall be dismissed without Surety; per Bryan. Quod non negatur. Br. Privilege, pl. 52. cites 2 H. 7. 4.

10. When it appears upon the Return that the Imprisonment is not lawful, the Court may discharge the Prisoner. Resolved, per tot. Cur. 12 Rep. 83. Pasch. 9 Jac. Sir William Chancey's Case.

11. Where the Return of an Habeas Corpus was held Insufficient for not shewing Cause of the Imprisonment, the Party by Rule of Court was Bailed till the next Term, then to appear again, the Court conceiving it best for him; For if they should discharge him for the Insufficiency of the Return, then they would presently take him again and commit him, and then would amend their Return and make it better; and so by Rule of Court he was Bailed and not absolutely discharged for his own good to prevent his being taken up again if discharged, and then the Return amended. 2 Buls. 259. Mich. 12 Jac. Dr. Alphonso v. the College of Physicians.

12. On an Habeas Corpus, the Return was read and spoken to, and the Prisoner ordered to be remanded. Twisden said, the Return should have been first filed, and the Prisoner committed to the Marshalsea; For otherwise the Court have no Power over him, and he cited 1 H. 7. Humphry Stafford's Case, who being brought to the Bar upon an Habeas Corpus by the Lieutenant of the Tower, was committed to the Marshalsea, and afterwards remanded to the Tower; but the other Judges differed as to the Commitment, and said it was not necessary to keep the Prisoner in the Marshalsea until the Matter was determined, but he might be sent from Time to Time to the same Prison, and brought up by Rule of Court until he is either bailed, discharged, or remanded; and so they said it was lately done in the Earl of Shaftsbury's Case. Vent. 330. Trin. 30 Car. 2. B. R. Anon.

13. Where a Commitment is without Cause a Prisoner may be delivered by Habeas Corpus, but where there appears to be good Cause and a Defect in the Form only of Commitment, he ought not to be discharged. 1 Salk. 348. Trin. 7 W. 3 B. R. Bethell's Case.

14. Defendant was brought to the Bar by Habeas Corpus returnable in one Month from the Day of St Michael to be committed to the Fleet, and the Court committed him, tho' the Day of the Return was past. Notes of Cases in C. B. Mich. 8 Geo. 2. Hewit v. Powell.

17.3.1.6Jacob, 1750

Habeas Corpora, Is a Writ for the Bringing up a Jury, or so many of them as refuse to appear upon the Venire facias, for the Trial of any Cause brought to Issue. Old Nat. Br. 157. And the Habeas Corpora Juratorum in the Court of C. B. serves for the same Purpose as the Distringas Jurator. in B. R. It commands the Sheriff to have the Jurors before the Judges at such a Day, to pass on the Trial of certain Parties, in such a Cause, &c. Practis. Solic. 308, 309.

Habeas Corpus, The great Writ of English Liberty, lies where one is indicted for any Crime or Trespass before Justices of Peace, or in a Court of any Franchise, and being imprisoned for the same, hath offer'd sufficient Bail, but it is refused where bailable; he may then have this Writ out of the King's Bench to remove himself thither, and answer the Cause there. F. N. B. 250. And the Course in this Case is first to procure a Certiorari out of the Chancery, directed to the Justices for removing the Indictment into B. R. And upon that to procure this Writ to the Sheriff, for the Causing his Body to be brought at a Day. Reg. Jud. 81. This Writ is also used to bring the Body of a Person into Court, who is committed to any Gaol, either in Criminal or Civil Causes; and a Habeas Corpus will remove a Person and Cause from one Court and Prison to another. The Writ of Habeas Corpus was originally ordained by the Common Law of the Land, as a Remedy for such as were unjustly imprisoned, to procure their Liberty; and it is a mistaken Notion that this Writ is of a modem Date, and introduced with the Reign of King Charles 2. But before the Statute 31 Car. 2. 'tis true it was difficult to be obtained, because the Judges who had Authority to issue it, pretended to have Power either to grant or deny it; and the Sheriffs and Gaolers to whom the Writ was directed frequently put poor Prisoners to the Charges of a second, and third Habeas Corpus, before they would yield Obedience to the first; which being grievous to the People, the Stat. 31 Car. 2. was enacted to prevent Abuses of this Nature, and further our Laws for the Benefit of the Liberty of the Subject. Laws of Liberty, pag. 44, 45. By the Statute 31 Car. 2. c. 2. a Person in Prison may have an Habeas Corpus from any Judge, on Complaint made and View of the Copy of the Warrant of Commitment, (unless he be committed for Treason or Felony especially expressed in the Warrant, or other Offences or Matters not bailable) which Habeas Corpus shall be returnable immediately; and upon Certificate of the Cause of Commitment, the Prisoner shall be discharged on Bail to appear in the Court of B. R. the next Term, or at the next Assises, &c. where the Offence is cognisable: And Persons committed for Treason or Felony, (especially expressed in the Warrant) on Prayer in open Court, the first Week of the Term, or Day of Sessions, &c. are to be brought to Trial; and if not indicted the next Term, or Sessions after Commitment, upon Motion the last Day of the Term, &c. they shall be let out upon Bail; except it appears upon Oath, that the King's Witnesses are not ready; and if on Prayer they are not indicted or tried the second Term after Commitment, they shall be discharged. No Persons who shall be delivered upon an Habeas Corpus, shall be committed again for the same Offence, other than by legal Order and Process of such Court where they shall be bound to appear, or other Court having Jurisdiction of the Cause; on Pain of 500*l.* And if any Person be in Prison, or any Officer's Custody, for any Criminal Matter, he shall not be removed by him into the Custody of any other Officer but by Habeas Carpus, upon Pain of incurring the Penalty of 100*l*. for the first Offence, and 200*l*. for the second Offence, and, being disabled to execute his Office. No Person shall be sent Prisoner to Ireland, Scotland, or any Place beyond the Seas in the King's Dominions; which will be false Imprisonment, on which the Prisoner may recover treble Costs, and not less than 500*l*. Damages, &c. and the Party committing or detaining him also shall incur the Penalty of a Praemunire. Judges denying a Habeas Corpus shall forfeit 500*l*. And the Officer refusing to obey it, or to deliver a true Copy of the Commitment Warrant, is liable to a Forfeiture of 100*l*. for the first Offence, &c. Stat. Ibid. This is the Substance of the Habeas Corpus Act; which hath been suspended several Times in late Reigns, on Rebellions, &c. No Writ of Habeas Corpus, or other Writ to remove a Cause out of an Inferior Court, shall be allowed, except delivered to the Judge of the Court, before the Jury to try the Cause have appeared, and before any of them are sworn. 43 Eliz. cap. 5. And Writs to remove Suits commenced in an Inferior Court of Record shall not be obeyed, unless delivered to the Steward of the Court before Issue or Demurrer joined, &c. And a Suit shall never be removed again, after a Procedendo is allowed. 21 Jac. 1. 23. Nor shall any Suit be removed where the Thing in Demand doth not exceed 5*l*. or where the Freehold, Inheritance, Title of Land, &c. are concerned. And Judges are to proceed in Suits in Inferior Courts laid not to exceed the Sum of 5*l*. although there may be Actions against the Defendant, wherein the Plaintiff's Demands may exceed that Sum, by Stat. 12 Geo. 1. cap. 29. If the Steward of an Inferior Court proceeds after an Habeas Corpus delivered and allowed, the Proceedings are void; and the Court of B. R. will award a Supersedeas; and grant an Attachment against the Steward for the Contempt. Cro. Car. 79, 296. A Habeas Corpus suspends the Power of the Court below, so that if they proceed, it is void, and coram non judice. And on a Habeas Corpus, if the Record be filed, no Procedendo can go to the Court below; but where a Record below is not filed, or not returned, it may be granted. 1 Salk. 352. A Habeas Corpus cum Causa removes the Body of the Party for whom granted, and all the Causes depending against him; and if upon the Return thereof the Officer doth not return all the Causes, &c. it is an Escape in him. 2 Lill. Abr. 2. A Judge will not grant a Habeas Corpus in the Vacation, for a Prisoner to follow his Suits; but the Court may grant a special Habeas Corpus for a Prisoner to be at his Trial in the Vacation time. Ibid. 3. And the Court may grant a Habeas Corpus to bring a Prisoner, not in Prison on Execution, out of Prison, to be a Witness at a Trial; though it is at the Peril of the Party suing out the Writ, that the Prisoner do not escape. Style 119. Trin. 1640. But no Person ought to take out a Habeas Corpus for any one in Prison, without his Consent; except it be to turn him over to B. R. or charge him with an Action in Court. 2 Lill. A Man brought into B. R. by Habeas Corpus, shall not be removed thence till he has answered there; he shall be detained until then, and after he may be removed. 1 Salk. 350. A Person is in Custody upon a Criminal, and also on a Civil Matter, if he would move himself by Habeas Corpus, there ought to be but one Habeas Corpus of the Crown Side or Plea Side, and both Causes are to be returned. Mod. Cas. 133. If there be Judgment against a Defendant in the Court of B. R. and another in C. B. on which he is in Execution in the Fleet, he may have an Habeas Corpus to remove himself into B. R. where he shall be in Custody of the Marshal for both Debts. Dyer 132. Where the Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench commits a Person to the Marshal of the Court by his Warrant, he ought not to be brought to the Bar by Rule, but by Habeas Corpus. 1 Salk. 349. In extrajudicial Commitments, the Warrant of Commitment ought to be returned in haec verba on a Habeas Corpus; but when a Man is committed by a Court of Record, it is in the Nature of an Execution for a Contempt, and in such Case the Warrant is never returned. 5 Mod. 156. The Cause of the Imprisonment must be particularly set forth in the Return of the Habeas Corpus, or it will not be good; for by this the Court may judge of it, and with a Paratum habeo, that they may either discharge, bail, or remand the Prisoner. 2 Nels. Abr. 915. 2 Cro. 543. If a Commitment is without Cause, or no Cause is shewn, a Prisoner may be delivered by Habeas Corpus. 1 Salk. 348. But on a Habeas Corpus granted by the Court of B. R. a Difference was made as to a Return; that where a Prisoner is committed by one of the Privy Council, there the Cause of his Commitment is to be returned particularly; but when he is committed by the whole Council, no Cause need be alledged. 1 Leon. 70, 71. And it has been adjudged, that on a Commitment by the House of Commons, of Persons for Contempt and Breach of Privilege, no Court can deliver on a Habeas Corpus: But Holt Ch. Just. was of a contrary Opinion. 2 Salk. 503, 404. A Writ of Error may be allowed by the King in such a Case, &c. and it is not to be denied ex debitio Justitiae; though it has been a Doubt, whether any Writ of Error lay upon a Judgment given on a Habeas Corpus. Ibid. A Man may not be delivered from the Commitment of a Court of Oyer and Terminer by Habeas Corpus, without Writ of Error: And where there appears to be good Cause, and a Defect only in the Form of the Commitment, he ought not to be discharged. 1 Salk. 348. If a Person be committed by the Admiralty in Execution, he is not removeable by Habeas Corpus into B. R. to answer an Action brought against him there; but it might be otherwise if an Action had been before depending. Ibid. 351. Where there is a precedent Action in B. R. to the King's Suit, on which the Party is out on Bail, Habeas Corpus may be brought by the Bail, &c. and the Prisoner turned over; though this was greatly opposed in Favour of the King's Execution. Ibid. 353. A Habeas Corpus is a prerogative Writ, which concerns the Liberty of the Subject, and must be obeyed in Counties Palatine, &c. If it is not, an Alias Habeas Corpus will issue with a great Penalty. And on the Insufficiency of the Return of an Habeas Corpus, an Alias Habeas Corpus shall be granted. 2 Cro. 543. 12 W. 3. B. R. Where an Action is founded on the Custom of London, for a Thing actionable there, and not elsewhere; if it be removed by Habeas Corpus, a Precedendo shall be granted: But the Declaration itself ought to be returned upon the Habeas Corpus, and then the Court will see what was the Cause, &c. For the Special Matter and all the Proceedings are to be in the Return in this Case; as well as in an Action on a By-Law, to take Notice thereof. Carth. 75, 76. Before a Habeas Corpus is returned and filed, it may be amended; but not afterwards. 2 Lill. Abr. 2. A Habeas Corpus is grantable, without Motion, to remove a Person upon an Arrest; but not where committed for a Crime. 1 Lev. 1. In the suing out these Writs in B. R. to remove a Cause, &c. they are first to be carried to the other Court to be allowed; and some few Days after the Delivery, the Return must be called for, and special Bail put in at a Judge's Chamber; which being done, within four Days in Term, and six Days in the Vacation, the Cause is removed to the Superior Court. Practis. Solic. 262. And if the Defendant be actually a Prisoner, he shall not be delivered from Prison till the Bail on the Habeas Corpus be accepted, or justified in Court. Ibid. If a Defendant arrested cannot find Bail, and would be removed to the King's Bench or Fleet Prison, a Habeas Corpus is to be delivered there; and they will make out a Return, and send an Officer with the Defendant to a Judge's Chamber, and there a Committitur is made, whereupon the Judge's Tipstaff takes the Prisoner into Custody, and charges him in Prison; and he may agree with the Marshal or Warden, for the Liberty of the Rules, &c. Practis. Attorn. Edit. 1. p. 124. When the Defendant is in the Custody of a Bailiff, or in any other Prison, and would be turned over to the King's Bench, the Practice is the same; the Habeas Corpus directed to the Sheriff of London and Middlesex is to be delivered, and he, after Search in his Office for what Writs he hath against the Defendant, will make Return of them, and then the Bailiff or Keeper of the other Prison, who hath the Defendant in Custody, is to carry him to a Judge's Chamber, where he will be turned over, at supra. Ibid.

Form of a Habeas Corpus returnable immediate.

GEORGE the Second, &c. To the Mayor, Aldermen, &c. Greeting: We command you, that the Body of A. B. in our Prison under your Custody detained, as 'tis said, together with the Day and Cause of his Taking and Detaining, by whatsoever Name the said A. B. shall be charged in the same, you have under safe and secure Conduct, before our beloved and faithful Philip Lord Hardwick, our Chief Justice assigned to hold Pleas before us, at his Chamber situate in Serjeants Inn in Chancery Lane, immediately after the Receipt of this Writ, to do and receive all those Things which the same our Chief Justice shall then and there consider of in this Particular, &c.

The Habeas Corpus cum Causa, to remove the Body and Cause is made out as follows:

A Writ of Habeas Corpus to remove a Cause.

GEORGE the Second. &c. To the Mayor, Aldermen, and Sheriffs of the City of London, Greeting: We command you, that you have before as at Westminster on Tuesday next after the Octave of St. Hillary, under safe and secure Conduct, the Body of C. D. who is said to be detained in our Prison under your, or one of your Custodies, together with the Day and Cause of his being taken and detained, (by whatsoever Name the said C. D. be therein charged) to answer to A. B. of a Plea, or in an Action of Debt, &c. And further to do and receive all and singular those Things, which our Court before us shall then and there consider of in this Behalf: And have you then there this Writ. Witness, &c.

Habeas Corpus ad prosequendum, Is to remove a Man in order to Prosecution and Trial in the proper County, &c.

Habeas Corpus ad faciendum a Recipiendum, A Writ issuing out of the Common Pleas for Defendants that are sued in Courts below, to remove their Causes into this Court: And if an Inferior Court will proceed against the Law, in a Thing of which the Justices of C. B. have Cognisance, and commit a Man thereon, they may discharge him by Habeas Corpus. 1 Mod. 235.

Habeas Corpus ad Respondendum, Lies where a Person is imprisoned upon Process at the Suit of another, in any Prison, except the King's Bench Prison; and a third Person would sue the Prisoner in B. R. this Writ removes the Prisoner from the Prison where he was into the King's Bench, to answer the Action in that Court; and for that Reason it is called Habeas Corpus ad Respondend. 2 Lill. Abr. 4. And where a Person is in Custody in an Inferior Jurisdiction, the Plaintiff may bring his Writ returnable in B. R. and then the Defendant cannot nonsuit the Plaintiff, nor be bailed but by the Court of B. R. &c. Ibid. There is Mention in some of our Books of a Habeas Corpus ad Subjiciendum, for a Criminal to submit to the Order of the Court.

Habeas Corpus ad satisfaciendum, Is had against a Man in the Fleet Prison, &c. to charge him in Execution; which being delivered to the Warden will be sufficient. Practis. Attorn. Edit. 1. pag. 173.

17.3.1.7Wood, 1754

V. Liberty, consists in a Power to do as one thinks fit, unless restrained by Force, or the Law. [a] Imprisonment is a Restraint of a Man's Liberty under the Custody of another. One may be lawfully imprisoned by the King's Writ, &c. or unlawfully. [b] An unlawful Imprisonment is not only an unjust Imprisonment at the first, but when one is detained longer than he ought, though he was at first lawfully imprisoned. For if a Sheriff, or Gaoler detains a Prisoner in Gaol after his Acquittal (unless it be for his Fees, not for Meat, Drink, or Lodging) this is an unlawful Imprisonment. An Action of false Imprisonment doth lie against a Bailiff for Arresting One after the Return of the Writ is past, it being now without Writ. [c] He that is put into the Stocks, or is under an Arrest, is said to be in Prison. Unlawful Imprisonment is sometimes called Duress of Imprisonment (from Durities) [d] where one is wrongfully imprisoned or detained, 'till he seals a Bond, &c. But not where a Man is lawfully imprisoned for another Cause, and for his Delivery seals a Bond, &c. nor where being arrested at the Suit of another; and in Prison on such an Arrest, willingly seals a Bond to a Stranger. [e] A Son shall avoid the Action by Reason of the unlawful Imprisonment of His Father; a Husband by Reason of the unlawful Imprisonment of the Wife. So If One's Beasts are unlawfully imprisoned till He Seals a Deed, He may Avoid the Action. So if one is under a just [f] Fear of being imprisoned, killed, maimed, &c. and he seals a Bond to him that menaces him, it is Duress per Minas, and in both Cases he may plead the Duress, and avoid the Action. If it be only a Threatning of a Battery, which may be light, or to take away my Goods, or to burn my House, &c. this will not make the Deed made upon that occasion to be by Duress; for there One may have Satisfaction by Recovery of Damages. There must be some Threatning of Life, or Member, or of Imprisonment, and to the End of obtaining the Deed, and thereupon the Deed must be made. To threaten another to kill or maim, or imprison him if he will not seal a Deed to a third Person, and thereupon he do it, this is as voidable as if it were made to the Party himself.[1]

Even lawful Imprisonment is so far pitied, that by several Statutes, as well as by Common Law, Defaults are saved on that Account.

The Law [g] favours Liberty, and the Freedom of a Man from Imprisonment; and therefore kind Interpretations shall be made on its Behalf. If a Man is unlawfully imprisoned, he may have an Action of Trespass for false Imprisonment, and recover Damages: [a] Or he may have the Writ of Habeas Corpus, and upon Return of this Writ by the Gaoler, setting forth by whom he was committed, and for what Cause, He ought to be discharged if it appears to be against Law. [See Magna Charta, chap. 29.] But if the Case be doubtful, he may be bailed. If the Imprisonment appears to be just, He shall be remanded to the Prison, or bailed. [See Of Bail, Book 4. chap. 4. and 5.][2]

The King cannot send any Subject of England [b] against his Will to serve him out of the Kingdom; for that would be Banishment: No, he cannot send one into Ireland, against his Will, to serve as his Deputy there. [See the 7 Rep. 7, 8. Calvin's Case.][3]

Habeas Corpora, Is a writ that lies for the bringing-in of a jury, or so many of them as refuse to come upon the venire facias, for the trial of a cause brought to issue. Old Nat. Brev. fol. 157. See great diversity of this writ in the table of the Register Judicial, verbo Habeas Corpora, and the New Book of Entries, verbe eodem. Cowell.

Habeas Corpus, Is a writ which a man, indicted of a trespass before justices of peace, or in a court of franchise; and being apprehended for the same, may have out of the King's Bench to remove himself thither at his own costs, and to answer the cause there. F. N. B. fol. 250. And the order in this case is, first to procure a certiorari out of the Chancery directed to the said justices, for the removing the indictment into the King's Bench, and upon that to procure this writ to the sheriff, for the causing his body to be brought at a day, Reg. Jud. fol. 81. where you may find divers cases, wherein this writ is to be used. Cowell.

Wherever a person is restrained of his liberty by being confined in a common gaol, or by a private person, whether it be for a criminal or civil cause, he may regularly by habeas corpus have his body and cause removed to some superior jurisdiction, which hath authority to examine the legality of such commitment, and on the return thereof either bail, discharge, or remand the prisoner. Vaugh. 136. Bushel's case.

The habeas corpus ad subjiciendum is that which issues in criminal cases, and is deemed a prerogative writ, which the King may issue to any place, as he has a right to be informed of the state and condition of the prisoner, and for what reasons he is confined. It is also in regard to the subject deemed his writ of right, that is, such a one as he is intitled to ex debito justitiae, and is in nature of a writ of error to examine the legality of the commitment; and therefore commands the day, the caption, and cause of detention to be returned. 2 Inst. 55. 4 Inst. 182. Cro. Jac. 543. 2 Roll. Abr. 69.

The habeas corpus ad faciendum & recipiendum issues only in civil cases, and lies where a person is sued, and in gaol, in some inferior jurisdiction, and is willing to have the cause determined in some superior court, which hath jurisdiction over the matter; in this case the body is to be removed by habeas corpus, but the proceedings must be removed by certiorari. 3 Bac. Abr. 2. If upon this writ a civil action, and also a matter of crime be returned; as if a person be arrested for debt, and also charged with a warrant of a justice of peace for felony. 1. If it appears to the judge or court, that the arrest for debt, or other civil action, is fraudulent, they may remand him. 2. If it be found real, they may commit him to the King's Bench with his causes, tho' they are matters of crime; for that court has conusance as well of the crime as of the civil action; but then in the term the court may take his appearance or bail to the civil action, and remand him, if they see cause, as to the crime to be proceeded on below; but upon the writ ad faciendum & recipiendum, there ought not singly a matter of crime to be returned, for that belongs to the habeas corpus ad subjiciendum. 2 Hal. Hist. P. C. 145. and see 6 Mod. 133.

There is likewise a writ of habeas corpus ad respondendum, where a person is confined in gaol for a cause of action accruing within some inferior court; and a third person hath also a cause of action against him; in which case he may have this writ in order to charge him in such superior court; for inferior courts being tied down to causes arising within their own jurisdiction, the party would be without remedy, unless allowed to sue him in another court; but it seems, that regularly a person confined in B. R. cannot be removed to the C. B. by this writ, nor vice versa; for in these cases there can be no defect of justice, as these courts have conusance as well of local as transitory actions. Dyer 197. a. 249. pl. 84, 296, 307. 1 Mod. 235. Styl. Pract. Regist. 330.

There are also, besides these, other writs of habeas corpus, as a habeas corpus ad deliberandum & recipiendum, which lies to remove a person to the proper place or county, where he committed some criminal offence. 3 Bac. Abr. 2, 3.

There is also a writ of habeas corpus ad satisfaciendum after a judgment; and on this writ the attorney for the plaintiff must indorse the number roll of the judgment on the back of the writ. Styl. Regist. 331.—— Habeas corpus upon a cepi, where the party is taken in execution in the court below.—So upon an attachment out of Chancery, and a cepi corpus returned by the sheriff, the next step is a habeas corpus; for the sheriff having executed the command of the writ of attachment by taking the body, he cannot carry him out of the county without the King's writ.—There is also a writ of habeas corpus ad testificand', which is to remove a person in confinement, in order to give his testimony in some court of justice; for which vide Styl. 119, 126, 230. 3 Keb. 51. Comb. 17, 48. A person committing a crime in Barbadoes, and apprehended here, may be sent thither by habeas corpus, and tried. 3 Keb. 560, 566, 568. Warner's case.—Also since the habeas corpus act, a person committing a criminal offence in Ireland being here, may be sent to Ireland, and tried there. 2 Vent. 314. Colonel Lundy's Case. Also Justices of Gaol-delivery may send prisoners by habeas corpus to the Sheriff of another County, and a precept to the Sheriff of that other County to receive them, namely, for a felony committed in that county, though that county be out of the circuit of the justice that sends them. 2 Hale's Hist. P. C. 37.—That if any habeas corpus come to receive a prisoner from another gaol, the gaoler is to take notice of the offence for which he stood committed at the other gaol, and to inform the court, that if he shall happen to be acquitted, or have his clergy, he may yet be remanded to the former gaol if there be cause. Kelynge 4. And that if any habeas corpus come to the gaolers to remove a prisoner, that with the prisoner they also certify the cause for which he stood there committed. Kelynge 4.

1. What courts have jurisdiction of granting the habeas corpus ad subjiciendum; how far they have a discretionary power in granting or denying it; and of the habeas corpus act.
2. In what cases, and to what places, it may be granted.
3. Of the manner of suing it out; to whom to be directed; by whom to be returned; manner of compelling a return, and remedy for a false return.
4. What matters must be returned, together with the body of the party; and where the return shall be deemed certain and sufficient to warrant the commitment.
5. Of suggesting any thing contrary to the return; of amending any defect in the return; and of bailing, discharging or remanding the prisoner.
6. Of the habeas corpus ad faciendum & recipiendum.

1. WHAT COURTS HAVE JURISDICTION OF GRANTING THE HABEAS CORPUS AD SUBJICIENDUM; HOW FOR THEY HAVE A DISCRETIONARY POWER IN GRANTING OR DENYING IT; AND OF THE HABEAS CORPUS ACT.

It is clear, that both by the Common law, as also by the statute, the courts of Chancery and King's Bench have jurisdiction of awarding this writ of habeas corpus, and that without any privilege in the person for whom it is awarded; but it seems, that by the Common law the court of King's Bench could only have awarded it in termtime, but that the Chancery might have done it as well out of as in term, because that court is always open. 2 Inst. 55. 4 Inst. 290. 2 And. 297. 2 Jon. 13, 14, 17.

If the habeas corpus issues out of Chancery, and on the return thereof the Lord Chancellor finds that the party was illegally restrained of his liberty, he may discharge him, or if he finds it doubtful he may bail him; but then it must be to appear in the court of King's Bench, for the Chancellor hath no power in criminal causes; or the Chancellor may commit the party to the Fleet, and in termtime may propriis manibus deliver the record into the King's Bench, together with the body; and thereupon the court of King's Bench may proceed to bail, discharge, or commit the prisoner. 2 Hal. Hist. P. C. 147. 2 Hawk. P. C. 114-5.

If the habeas corpus, and also a certiorari be granted, returnable in Chancery, and the cause and body be returned there, they may be sent into the King's Bench; if the body only be returned with his causes, by habeas corpus into the Chancery, and delivered over into the King's Bench, they may proceed to the determination of the return, and either by procedendo remand him, or grant a certiorari to certify the record also, and thereupon commit or bail the prisoner, as there shall be cause. 2 Hal. Hist. P. C. 147-8.

But the sending an habeas corpus ad faciendum & recipiendum by the Chancellor for persons arrested in civil causes, especially being in execution, is neither warrantable by law nor ancient usage, and particularly forbidden by the statute 2 Hen. 5. cap. 2. as to persons in execution. 2 Hal. Hist. P. C. 148.

There are several strong opinions, that no habeas corpus ad subjiciendum could by the Common law issue out of the court of Exchequer or Common Pleas, unless it were in the case of privilege, because these courts are confined to civil causes merely; and therefore unless the party were an attorney, or intitled to the privilege of the court as an officer, &c. or unless there had been a suit commenced against him in those courts, they could not grant a habeas corpus ad subjiciendum, tho' they might any other writ of habeas corpus. Dyer 175. b. pl. 26. 2 Inst. 55. 3 Leon. 18. 4 Inst. 70, 182, 290. 1 Mod. 235. Vaugh. 155. Carter 221. 2 Vent. 22.

But notwithstanding these opinions, it was holden in Bushel's case, that the court of Common Pleas may issue a habeas corpus ad subjiciendum, and that if it appeared on the return thereof that the party was imprisoned and detained against law, the court might, tho' there was no privilege in the case, discharge him; for that to remand him would be an act of injustice in the court, and contrary to Magna Charta. Vaugh. 155.

Also by the statute of 16 Car. 1. cap. 10. they have an original jurisdiction to bail, discharge, or commit, upon an habeas corpus for one committed by the Council-Table, as well as the King's Bench, and that altho' there be no privilege for the person committed. 2 Hal. Hist. P. C. 144.

Also by the habeas corpus act, 31 Car. 2. Any of the said courts in termtime, and any judge of either bench, or baron of the Exchequer, being of the degree of the coif, in the vacation, may award a habeas corpus for any prisoner whatsoever, and on the return thereof discharge him, if it shall clearly appear that the commitment was against law, as being made by one who had no jurisdiction of the cause, or for a matter for which no man ought by law to be punished; or bail him, if it shall be doubtful whether the commitment were legal or not; or remand him, according to the nature and circumstances of the case. 2 Jon. 14, 17.

Notwithstanding the writ of habeas corpus be a writ of right, and what the subject is intitled to, yet the provision of the law herein being in a great measure eluded by the judges being only enabled to award it in termtime, as also by an imagined notion in the judges, that they had a discretionary power of granting or refusing it; but especially by the act and contrivance of officers, to whom it was directed, who used great delays in making any return to it. 4 Inst. 290. 3 Buls. 27.

By the 31 Car. 2. cap. 2. commonly called the habeas corpus act, reciting, "That great delays had been used by sheriffs, gaolers and other officers, to whose custody the King's subjects had been committed for criminal or supposed criminal matters, in making return of writs of habeas corpus, by standing out an alias and pluries, and sometimes more, and by other shifts, to avoid their yielding obedience to such writs, contrary to their duty, and the known laws of the land, whereby many subjects had been detained in prison in such cases where by law they were bailable:" Therefore be it enacted, "That whensoever any person shall bring any habeas corpus, directed to any person whatsoever, for any person in his custody, and the said writ shall be served on the said officer, or left at the gaol or prison with any of the under officers, under keepers, or deputy of the said officers or keepers, that the said officer or officers, his or their under officers, under keepers or deputies, shall within three days after such service thereof, (unless the commitment were for treason or felony, plainly and specially expressed in the warrant of commitment) upon payment or tender of the charges of bringing the said prisoner, to be ascertained by the judge or court that awarded the same, and indorsed on the said writ, not exceeding 12 d. per mile, and, on security given by his own bond to pay the charges of carrying back the prisoner, if he should be remanded, and that he will not make any escape by the way, make return of such writ, and bring or cause to be brought the body of the party so committed or restrained, unto or before the Lord Chancellor or the Lord-keeper, or the Judges or Barons of the court from which the said writ shall issue, or such other persons before whom the said writ is made returnable, according to the command thereof; and shall then certify the true causes of his detainer or imprisonment, unless the commitment be in a place beyond twenty miles distance, &c. and if beyond the distance of twenty miles, and not above one hundred miles, then within the space of ten days; and if beyond the distance of one hundred miles, then within the space of twenty days.[”]

And it is further enacted, sect. 3. “That all such writs shall be marked in this manner, per stat’um tricesimo primo Caroli Secundi Regis, and shall be signed by the person that awards the same; and if any person shall be or stand committed or detained as aforesaid, for any crime, unless for treason or felony plainly expressed in the warrant of commitment, in the vacation time, it shall be lawful for such person so committed or detained, (other than persons convict or in execution by legal process) or any one on his behalf, to complain to the Lord Chancellor or Lord-keeper, or any justice of either bench, or Baron of the Exchequer, of the degree of the Coif; and the said Lord Chancellor, &c. Justice or Baron on view of the copy of the warrant of the commitment, or otherwise on oath that it was denied, are authorised and required, on request in writing, by such person, or any in his behalf, attested and subscribed by two witnesses who were present at the delivery of the same, to grant an habeas corpus under the seal of the court whereof he shall be one of the Judges, to be directed to the officer in whose custody the party shall be, returnable immediately before the said Lord Chancellor, &c. Justice or Baron; and on service thereof as aforesaid, the officer, &c. in whose custody the party is, shall, within the time respectively before limited, bring him before the said Lord Chancellor, Justice or Baron, before whom the said writ is returnable; and in case of his absence, before any other of them, with the return of such writ, and the true causes of the commitment and detainer; and thereupon, within two days after the party shall be brought before them, the said Lord Chancellor, Justice, or Baron, before whom the prisoner shall be brought as aforesaid, shall discharge the said prisoner from his imprisonment, taking his recognizance, with one or more sureties, in any sum, according to their discretions, having regard to the quality of the prisoner, and nature of the offence, for his appearance in the King’s Bench the term following, or in such other court where the offence is properly cognizable, as the case shall require; and then shall certify the said writ, with the return thereof, and the recognizance, into such court, unless it be made appear to the said Lord Chancellor, &c. that the party so committed is detained upon a legal process, order or warrant, out of such court that hath jurisdiction of criminal matters, or by some warrant signed and sealed with the hand and seal of any of the said justices or barons, or some justice or justices of the peace, for such matters or offences, for the which by law the prisoner is not bailable. [”]

But it is provided, sect. 4. [“]That if any person shall have wilfully neglected, by the space of two whole terms after his imprisonment, to pray a habeas corpus for his enlargement, he shall not have a habeas corpus to be granted in vacation-time in pursuance of this act.[”]

And it is further enacted, sect. 6. [“]That no person, who shall be set at large upon any habeas corpus, shall be again imprisoned for the same offence by any person whatsoever, other than by the legal order and process of such court, wherein he shall be bound by recognizance to appear, or other court having jurisdiction of the cause, on pain of 500 l.[”]

And it is hereby further enacted, sect. 7. “That if any person, who shall be committed for treason or felony, plainly and specially expressed in the warrant of commitment, upon his prayer or petition in open court the first week of the term, or the first day of the sessions of oyer and terminer, or general gaol-delivery, to be brought to his trial, shall not be indicted some time in the next term, sessions of oyer and terminer, or general gaol-delivery, after such commitment, the justices of the said court shall, upon motion in open court, the last day of the term or sessions, set at liberty the prisoner upon bail, unless it appear upon oath, that the witnesses for the King could not be produced the same term; and if such prisoner upon his prayer, &c. shall not be indicted and tried the second term or sessions, he shall be discharged from his imprisonment.[”]

Provided, sect. 8. “That nothing in this act shall extend to discharge out of prison any person charged in debt, or other action, or with process in any civil cause, but that after he shall be discharged of his imprisonment for such his criminal offence, he shall be kept in custody according to law for such other suit.[”]

And it is further enacted, sect. 10. [“]That it shall be lawful for any prisoner as aforesaid, to move and obtain his habeas corpus, as well out of the Chancery or Exchequer, as the King’s Bench or Common Pleas; and if the said Lord Chancellor or Lord Keeper, or any judge or judges, baron or barons, for the time being, of the degree of the coif, of any of the courts aforesaid, in the vacation-time, upon view of the copy of a warrant of commitment or detainer, or on oath made that such copy was denied, shall deny any writ of habeas corpus by this act required to be granted, being moved for as aforesaid, they shall severally forfeit to the party grieved the sum of 500 l.[”]

It is provided, sect. 18. “That after the assizes proclaimed for that county where the prisoner is detained, no person shall be removed from the common gaol upon any habeas corpus granted in pursuance of this act, but upon such habeas corpus shall be brought before the judge of assize in open court, who thereupon shall do what to justice shall appertain.[”]

But it is provided, sect. 19. “That after the assizes are ended, any person detained may have his habeas corpus, according to the direction of this act.”

Sect. 3. Attested and subscribed by two witnesses] One witness, with an affidavit that the other is sick, is sufficient. Comb. 6.

Sect. 7. The first week of the term] A person need not enter his prayer the first week, if there be an act of parliament which suspends the habeas corpus act; and takes away the power of bailing for a time. 1 Salk. 103.—The grand sessions of Wales is in nature of a term; so that the party entring his prayer there on the want of prosecution for a term, B. R. may bail him. Comb. 6.

Sect. 10. In the vacation time] And therefore this statute makes the judges liable to an action at the suit of the party grieved in one case only, which is the refusing to award a habeas corpus in vacation-time, but leaves it to their discretion, in all other cases, to pursue its directions in the same manner as they ought to execute all other laws, without making them subject to the action of the party, or to any other express penalty or forfeiture, 2 Hawk. P. C. 92.

In the construction of this statute it was held by two judges, in the absence of one, contrary to the opinion of the other, that persons committed by rule of court are not intitled to the benefit of this act; and that none are intitled to make their prayer but such as are committed by a warrant of a justice of peace, or secretary of state, and not those committed by rule of court, for that is not within the meaning of the act, which speaks of a commitment by warrant. Cases in Law and Equity 429. See Bail.

2. IN WHAT CASES, AND TO WHAT PLACES, IT MAY BE GRANTED.

A habeas corpus is a writ of right, which the subject may demand, and is the most usual remedy by which a man is restored again to his liberty, if he hath been against law deprived of it. Vaugh. 136.

By the 31 Car. 2. cap. 2. sect. 9. it is enacted, “That if any subject of this realm shall be committed to any prison, or in custody of any officer or officers whatsoever, for any criminal or supposed criminal matter, that the said person shall not be removed from the said prison and custody into the custody of any other officer or officers, unless it be by habeas corpus, or some other legal writ; or where the prisoner is delivered to the constable, or other inferior officer, to carry such prisoner to some common gaol; or where any person is sent by order of any judge of assize, or justice of the peace, to any common workhouse or house of correction; or where the prisoner is removed from one prison or place to another within the same county, in order to a trial or discharge by due course of law; or in case of sudden fire or infection, or other necessity; upon pain, that he who makes out, signs or countersigns, or obeys or executes such warrants; shall forfeit to the party grieved one hundred pounds for the first offence, two hundred pounds for the second offence, &c.[”]

If a party be imprisoned against law, tho’ he is intitled to a habeas corpus, yet may he have an action of false imprisonment, in which he shall recover damages in proportion to the injury done him. Fitz. Corpus cum Causa 2. 9 H. 6. 44. a. 2 Inst. 55. 10 H. 7. 17. 5 Co. 64. 11 Co. 98, 99.

But it was held in Bushel’s case, (who together with the other juror appointed to try an indictment for a riot between the King and Pen and Mead, were fined at the Old Bailey, because they found a verdict contra plenam evidentiam & directionem curiae in materia legis; and for nonpayment of the fine, divers of them being committed to prison, who brought their habeas corpus in C. B. and the imprisonment held illegal, in several conferences with all the judges;) that yet no action lay against the commissioners, because they acting as judges and commissioners of oyer and terminer, can no more be punished for an erroneous commitment, than they can be for an erroneous judgment; and the highest remedy the party in this case can have is a writ of habeas corpus. 1 Mod. 119. 3 Keb. 322, 358. Vaugh. 153. 2 Jon. 13. 1 Sid. 273.

If a husband confine his wife, she may have a habeas corpus; but the judges on the return of it, cannot remove the wife from her husband. 2 Lev. 128.

A motion was made for a habeas corpus to the Lord Leigh, for having in court the body of his wife; and the case was, The parties were married in 1669, and because they were both within age, no settlement was made till 1671; Lord Leigh persuades his wife to levy a fine of some lands of 900 l. per ann. whereof she had the inheritance, to him and his heirs; and because she prayed to advise with her friends, he confined her until her mother had petitioned the King and council, and there the matter was referred to three lords of the council; and they made an award, which the Lady Leigh was ready to perform; but the Lord Leigh brought to her an instrument to be sealed, upon which she made the same request as before, that she might advise with her friends, but he refused to permit it, and presently compelled his wife to go with him to his house in the country, where he made her his prisoner; and tho' by the barbarous usage of her husband she fell sick, yet he would not let her have physicians or servants to attend her, or to be visited by her friends; & per cur. a habeas corpus was granted, for this is a writ of right, which the subject may demand, and the King ought to have an account of his subject; and tho' it was objected, that here was no affidavit but of such complaint as the Lady Leigh had made in a letter to her mother, yet the habeas shall go to put the Lady in a condition to make oath of this matter herself, and to exhibit articles against her husband; for here is sufficient matter to compel him to find sureties of the peace, and of his good behaviour also; for this treatment the Lady may sue out a divorce propter saevitiam; and in a like case between Sir Philip Howard and his wife, a habeas corpus was granted; and in this case an attachment may be granted against my Lord Leigh, if he refuses obedience to the writ, for being a contempt, a peer has no privilege. Lady Leigh's case, Mich. 26 Car. 2. in B. R. 2 Lev. 128. 3 Keb. 433. S. C.

If a person be taken in the manner within a forest killing or chasing deer, &c. and the officer upon tender of sufficient sureties refuses to bail him, he may have a habeas out of the courts at Westminster, which courts may bail him to appear at the next eyre holden for the forest; and this is the rather, because justice-seats are but seldom holden, and the party, without this remedy, might be obliged to continue a long time in confinement. 4 Inst. 290.

If a person be in custody, and also indicted for some offence in the inferior court, there must, besides the habeas corpus to remove the body, be a certiorari to remove the record; for as the certiorari alone removes not the body, so the habeas corpus alone removes not the record itself, but only the prisoner with the cause of his commitment; and therefore, although upon the habeas corpus, and the return thereof, the court can judge of the sufficiency or insufficiency of the return and commitment, and bail or discharge, or remand the prisoner, as the case appears upon the return, yet they cannot upon the bare return of the habeas corpus give any judgment, without the record itself be removed by certiorari; but the same stands in the same force it did, though the return should be adjudged insufficient, and the party discharged thereupon of his imprisonment; and the court below may issue new process upon the indictment. 2 Hal. Hist. 210, 211. 1 Salk. 352. Comb. 2.

But it is otherwise in a habeas corpus in civil causes, which suspends the power of the inferior court; so that if they proceed after, their proceedings are coram non judice. 1 Salk. 352.

If a person be excommunicated, and the significarit does not express that the cause of excommunication is for any of the offences within the statute 5 Eliz. the remedy expressly appointed upon that statute is a habeas corpus, and upon the return of it the parties shall be discharged. 1 Vern. 24. Dominus Rex v. Sneller; & vid. 2 Sid. 181. 1 Keb. 683.

If the Chief Justice of the King's Bench commit one to the marshal by his warrant, he ought not to be brought to the bar by rule, but by habeas corpus. 1 Salk. 349. Per Holt Ch. J.

A person convicted of horse-stealing, and in gaol at St. Albans, was brought by habeas corpus and certiorari to B. R. and the court demanded of him what he could say why execution should not be done upon the indictment; and because he could not shew good cause to stay execution, he was committed to the marshal, who was commanded to do execution, and the next day he was hanged. Cro. Car. 176.

It hath been already observed, that the writ of habeas corpus is a prerogative writ, and that therefore by the Common law it lies to any part of the King's dominions; for the King ought to have an account why any of his subjects are imprisoned, and therefore no answer will satisfy the writ, but to return the cause with paratum habeo corpus, &c. 2 Rol. Abr. 69. Cro. Jac. 543.

Hence it was held, that this writ lay to Calice at the time it was subject to the King of England. Palm. 54.

It hath been held, that this writ lies to the marches of Wales, as it does to all other courts which derive their authority from the King, as all the courts exercising jurisdiction within his dominions do, and that it being a prerogative writ, it does not come within the rule Brevia Domini Regis non currunt, &c. for that must be understood of writs between party and party. 2. Rol. Abr. 69. Wetherly and Wetherly.

Also it hath been adjudged, that this writ lies to the cinque ports and to Berwick, although objected to have been part of Scotland. Palm. 54, 96. Cro. Jac. 543. S. C. 2 Rol. Abr. 69. and this writ lies to a county palatine. Latch 160. Jobson's case. 3 Keb. 279.

Also by the habeas corpus act, 31 Car. 2. cap.—. par. 11. it is enacted and declared, "That an habeas corpus, according to the intent and true meaning of the act, may be directed and run into any county palatine, the cinque ports, or other privileged places within the kingdom of England, dominion of Wales, or town of Berwick upon Tweed, and the isles of Jersey or Guernsey; any law, &c.["]

3. OF THE MANNER OF SUING IT OUT; TO WHOM TO BE DIRECTED; BY WHOM TO BE RETURNED; MANNER OF COMPELLING A RETURN, AND REMEDY FOR A FALSE RETURN.

By the 1 & 2 Ph. & M. cap. 13. No writ of habeas corpus or certiorari shall be granted to remove any prisoner out of any gaol, or to remove any recognizance, except the same writ be signed with the proper hands of the Chief Justice, or in his absence, of one of the justices of the court, out of which the same writ shall be awarded or made; upon pain that he that writeth any such writs, not being signed, as aforesaid, to forfeit for every such writ 5 l.

A habeas corpus was prayed to the gaoler of the county gaol of Worcester, to remove one Fox in B. R. to assign errors in person, upon the record of his conviction of a praemunire for recusancy; but this was not granted till the writ of error was brought into court under seal, and the record certified. Mich. 26 Car. 2. Fox's case.

Every habeas corpus ad subjiciendum must in termtime be awarded on motion and leave of the court, but a habeas corpus ad faciendum & recipiendum is usually granted without motion, as it relates to a civil affair only. 2 Mod. 306.

So where debt was brought against husband and wife on an obligation sealed by them both, and both being taken upon a capias, it was moved for an habeas corpus to bring them into court, to the intent that the husband only might be committed into custody, and the wife discharged; and it was held by the court, that this habeas corpus for removing the bodies might have been for them without motion, but where the party is committed for a crime, there it ought to be on motion. 1 Lev. 1. Slater and Slater.

Wherever a person is imprisoned by any person whatsoever, whether he be one concerned in the administration of justice, as a sheriff, gaoler, &c. or a private person, such as a doctor of physick, who confines a person under pretence of curing him of madness, &c. the habeas corpus must be directed to him. Godb. 41.

A habeas corpus was directed to the Chancellor of Durham, by which he was directed to make a precept to the sheriff to have the body of J. S. with the cause of his commitment, Coram Domino Rege apud Westm'; the Chancellor returned, that he made a precept to the sheriff to have the body before him, with the cause of, &c. who accordingly returned the cause and the body before him, and sets out the cause, & haec est causa detentionis; & per Hale Ch. J. a habeas corpus ad faciendum & recepiendum directed in this manner is good; secus of a habeas corpus ad subjiciendum; for the King may send his writ to whom he pleases, and he must have an answer of his prisoner where-ever he be; there is a great deal of difference between a habeas corpus ad subjiciendum and other habeas corpus; for this is the subject's writ of right, in which case the county palatine has no privilege; in 31 Ed. 1. a habeas corpus ad subjiciendum was directed to the bishop of Durham, who returned, that he was a count palatine, and therefore was not bound to answer the writ, for which he was fined 4000 l. Hill. 17 Cor. 1. a habeas corpus was directed to the bishop of Durham to return the body of one Rickoby; and resolved, that the writ did well run thither: In this case the writ is directed to the Chancellor, to command the sheriff to have his body here; but he commands him to have the body before himself, which is ill; again, the Chancellor doth not return the body to us, for here is no cujus corpus parat' habeo; it is not enough to say, that the sheriff returned the body to him, but he ought to return it to us here; we have nothing before us, therefore he must be remanded, for he is brought up without a warrant. Hill. 25 & 26 Car. 2. in B. R. 3 Bac. Abr. 9. 3 Keb. 279. S. C.

A habeas corpus directed in the disjunctive to the sheriff or gaoler is wrong; but where a man is taken on a warrant of the sheriff, in pursuance of a writ to the sheriff, the habeas corpus ought to be directed to the sheriff, for the party is in his custody, and the writ itself must be returned, otherwise it is where one is committed to the gaoler immediately, as in cases criminal. 1 Salk. 350. per curiam.

This writ must be returned by the very same person to whom it is directed. A habeas corpus was awarded to the sheriff of ———, who before the return leaves the office, and a new sheriff is made, who returns Languidus; this return is not good, but it ought to be returned by them two, the first that he had the body, and had delivered it to the new sheriff, and the new sheriff may then return Languidus. Pasch. 26 Car. 2. Peck and Cresset, 3 Bac. Abr. 10.

The method to compel a return to a habeas corpus is by taking out an alias and pluries, which if disobeyed, an attachment issues of course; also the court may take a rule on the officer to return his writ, and if disobeyed, the court may proceed against such disobedience in the same manner as they usually do against the disobedience of any other rule. F. N. B. 68. 11 H. 4. 86. 1 Mod. 195. 2 Lev. 128-9. 5 Mod. 21.

And by the 31 Car. 2. cap. 2. sect. 2. it is enacted, "That if any officer, &c. shall neglect or refuse to make returns, as by the act is directed, or to bring the body of the prisoner, according to the command of the writ, or shall not within six hours after demand deliver a true copy of the commitment, &c. he shall forfeit for the first offence 100 l. for the second offence 200 l. and be made incapable to hold his office.["]

A habeas corpus went to the Stannary court, to which an insufficient return was made, and therefore disallowed; & per cur. The warden of the Stannaries must be amerced, and you may go to the coroners and get it affected, and estreat it, and an alias habeas corpus must go for the insufficiency of the return of the first, and upon that the body and cause must be removed up; if another excuse be returned, we will grant an attachment. 1 Salk. 350.

And as a gaoler, &c. is obliged to bring up the prisoner at the day prefixed by the writ, it is no excuse for not obeying of a writ of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum, that the prisoner did not tender the fees due to the gaoler; nor yet is the warrant of such tender an excuse for not obeying a writ of habeas corpus ad faciendum & recipiendum; but if the gaoler brings up the prisoner by virtue of such habeas corpus, the court will not turn him over till the gaoler be paid all his fees. 2 Jon. 178. March 89. 1 Keb. 272, 280. 2 Show. 172.

For a false return there is regularly no remedy against the officer, but an action on the case at the suit of the party grieved, and an information or indictment at the suit of the King. 6 Mod. 90. 1 Salk. 349. But no action lies until the return be filed. 1 Salk. 352.

But it has been held, that if a gaoler return one Languidus when the party himself brings his habeas corpus, and is in good health, an attachment shall issue against him; secus if the habeas corpus was brought by another. 3 Bac. Abr. 11.

As upon the return of the writ the court is to judge, whether the cause of the commitment and detainer be according to law, or against it; so the officer or party in whose custody the prisoner is, must, according to the command of the writ, certify on the return thereof the day, cause of caption and detainer. Vaugh. 137.

A habeas corpus was directed to remove one J. S. to which no return was made; then an alias was granted, and it was returned quad traditur in ballium ante adventum istius brevis; and the truth of the case was, that between the first and second writ the party was bailed; & per cur. after an habeas corpus delivered, the party cannot be bailed; and if it happens otherwise, yet the cause of the commitment ought to be returned, though the body can't be brought into court; and in this case the officer having on the first writ of habeas corpus taken 5 l. to have the body in court, and yet making no return, the court granted an attachment against him. 3 Bac. Abr. 11. Hill. 25 & 26 Car. 2. in B. R. Salmon ver. Slade.

Where a commitment is in court to a proper officer there present, there is no warrant of commitment; and therefore to a habeas corpus he cannot return a warrant in haec verba, but must return the truth of the whole matter, under peril of an action; but if he be committed to one that is not an officer, there must be a warrant in writing, and where there is one, it must be returned; for otherwise it would be in the power of the gaoler to alter the case of the prisoner, and make it either better or worse than it is upon the warrant; and if he may take upon him to return what he will, he makes himself judge; whereas the court ought to judge, and that upon the warrant itself. 1 Salk. 349.

If a person in custody on an excommunicato capiendo brings a habeas corpus, the writ of excommunicato capiendo itself must be returned, as well as the sheriff's warrant for taking him, because the warrant may be wrong when the writ is right; and though the warrant be wrong, yet if the writ is right, the party is rightfully in custody of the sheriff. 1 Salk. 350.

Upon a habeas directed to the constable of Windsor Castle to remove the body of one Mr. Tayler, a barrister, at the day of the return of the writ, a soldier brought in the prisoner into court, and the writ, and the warrant by which he was committed; but the court held it no manner of return, for it ought to be entered in Latin, and ingrossed in due form. Pasch. 18 Car. 2. Taylor's case. 3 Bac. Abr. 12.

It is said in general, that upon the return of the habeas corpus the cause of the imprisonment ought to appear as specifically and certainly to the judges, before whom it is returned, as it did to the court or person authorised to commit. Vaugh. 137.

For if the commitment be against law, as being made by one who had no jurisdiction of the cause, or for a matter for which by law no man ought to be punished, the court are to discharge him, and therefore the certainty of the commitment ought to appear; and the commitment is liable to the same objection where the cause is so loosely set forth, that the court cannot adjudge whether it were a reasonable ground of imprisonment or not. But for this title Commitment and Bail in criminal cases, and 1 Hal. Hist. P. C. 584. Skin. 676. 12 Co. 130-1.

Rudyard an attorney of C. B. being committed to Newgate by my Lord Mayor and Sir John Robinson, for refusing to give security for his good behaviour, was brought by habeas corpus to the C. B. and it was returned as the cause of his commitment, that whereas he had been complained of to my Lord Mayor and Sir John Robinson for several misdemeanors, particularly for inciting his Majesty's subjects to the disobedience of his Majesty's laws; more particularly of an act of parliament made is the 22d year of his reign, against seditious conventicles; and whereas he had been examined before them for abetting such as frequented seditious, conventicles, contrary to the statute 22 Car. 2. and upon his examination they found cause to suspect him, therefore they requested sureties of him for his good behaviour, and for refusal committed him. Wild, justice, was of opinion, that by abetting such as frequented seditious conventicles, must be intended abetting them in that particular, and signifies as much as encouraging them to frequent such conventicles, and finding cause to suspect him, &c. (which cannot now be questioned, for the return is admitted) they may well send him to prison, and therefore he ought to be remanded. But Vaughan Ch. Just. Tyrrel and Archer, were of a contrary opinion: 1. Because it does not appear but that he might abet the frequenters of conventicles in any way which the law allows, as by soliciting an appeal for them, or the like. 2. To say that he was complained of, or that he was examined, is no proof that he was guilty; and then to say, that they had cause to suspect him, is too cautious; for who can tell what they may count a cause of suspicion, and how can that ever be tried? at this rate they would have arbitrary power, upon their own allegation, to commit whom they pleased; whereas they cannot require sureties for any man's behaviour, and consequently not commit for refusal, unless the Justices have any thing against him of their own knowledge, or by proof of witnesses, that tend to a breach of the peace. Upon this return, Archer declared his opinion to be, That he should not be remanded, but give his own recognizance to appear in court the next term, to answer any thing that should be alledged against him; but Vaughan and Tyrrel were for his absolute discharge; for seeing by the return it did not appear there was any cause for his commitment, they thought they had no reason to require a recognizance of him. Thereupon Wild moved, that he could not be discharged, there being but two for it. But Archer replied, that it had been several times ruled, that where there were three opinions, that was taken to be per cur. which had two of the judges for it; and accordingly Rudyard was discharged. Vaughan and Tyrrel made another objection to the return, viz. that they should have expressed the sum in which they required him to give security, (which they had not done;) for they said that those persons, that might be willing to be bound for him in 40 l. might not be willing to be bound for him in 100 l. &c. But as to this it was said, that [ed. Rudyard] had refused absolutely to give any security, and therefore it was to no purpose to tell him of the sum; if he had consented to give security, then the justices ought to have told him the sum. Trin. 22 Car. 2. in B. R. Rudyard's case. 3 Bac. Abr. 12.

5. OF SUGGESTING ANY THING CONTRARY TO THE RETURN; OF AMENDING ANY DEFECT IN THE RETURN; AND OF BAILING, DISCHARGING, OR REMANDING THE PRISONER.

It seems to be agreed, that no one can in any case controvert the truth of the return to a habeas corpus, or plead or suggest any matter repugnant to it; yet it hath been holden, that a man may confess and avoid such a return by admitting the truth of the matters contained in it, and suggesting others not repugnant, which take off the effect of them. Cro. Eliz. 821. 5 Co. 71. b. 2 Hawk. P. C. 113.

Upon a habeas corpus it was returned, that Swallow, a citizen of London, was fined for alderman, and was committed for his fine by the judgment of the court in London. Swallow alleged, that he was an officer of the mint, and by an ancient charter of privilege granted to the minters or moneyers, he ought to be exempted. It was at first doubted whether he might not plead this to the return, it being a matter consistent with it. Upon the statute W. 2. it is held the parties may come in and plead, and so upon 5 Eliz. But here there is a difference; for he might have pleaded this in the court below, but now that is past, and here is a judgment and execution. Another day Swallow brought into court a writ of privilege upon that charter, and the recorder prayed that it might not be allowed against the ancient customs of the city; for if such a way might exempt men, they should have little benefit by fines in such cases: But per cur. The privilege ought to be allowed, for it is very ancient, and it appears he has an office of necessary attendance elsewhere, which makes the privilege reasonable; the King may by his charter exempt from juries, if there be enough besides, much more here; and if there be not sufficient besides, upon shewing of that, the privilege ought to be suspended; and Swallow may be discharged by this court now as well as he could at first, or as if he had taken upon him the aldermanship. This court is supreme and mandatory in such cases. And he was accordingly discharged. Pasch. 18 Car. 2. in B. R. Swallow's case, 1 Sid. 287. 2 Keb. 50, 54, &c.

Also the court will sometimes examine by affidavit the circumstances of a fact, on which a prisoner brought before them by an habeas corpus hath been indicted, in order to inform themselves, on an examination of the whole matter, whether it be reasonable to bail him or not: And agreeably hereto, where one Jackson, who had been indicted for piracy before the sessions of Admiralty on a malicious prosecution, brought his habeas corpus in the said court, in order to be discharged or bailed, the court examined the whole circumstances of the fact by affidavits; upon which it appeared that the prosecutor himself, if any one, was guilty, and carried on the prosecution to skreen himself: And thereupon the court, in consideration of the unreasonableness of the prosecution, and the uncertainty of the time when another sessions of Admiralty might be holden, admitted the said Jackson to bail, and committed the prosecutor till he should find bail to answer the facts contained in the affidavits. 5 Mod. 323, 454. 2 Jon. 222. Trin. 4 Geo 1.

It seems that, before the return filed, any defect in form, or the want of an averment of a matter of fact may be amended; but this must be at the peril of the officer, in the same manner as if the return were originally what it is after the amendment. 1 Mod. 102, 103.

But after the return is filed it becomes a record of the court, and cannot be amended. 1 Mod. 102, 103.

So after a rule to have the return filed; as where a habeas corpus, alias & pluries was directed to Sir Robert Viner, mayor of London, to have the body of Bridget, daughter and heir of Sir Thomas Hyde, deceased; and upon the pluries he returned quod tempore receptionis hujus brevis nec unquam postea non fuit infra custodiam meam; and the counsel of the lord mayor expounded this return that she was within the house of the lord mayor, but not detained in custody prout per breve suppenitur; & per cur. this is an insufficient return; for he ought to say not only tempore receptionis hujus brevis, sed alieujus, upon return of a pluries. Then a question was, if the return could be amended; for though a rule was made that the return should be filed, yet this was not actually done; but per cur. this is filed by the rule of the court, and after cannot be amended; and this return the court held to be equivocal; for it is well enough known that she is not detained in ferris; but though she hath the liberty of the house, if she cannot go out of the house, or not without a keeper, she is within his custody; and the court shall adjudge what sort of custody is intended by the writ. Hill. 26 & 27 Car. 2. in B. R. Emerton v. Sir Robert Vinere [sic]. 2 Lev. 128. 3 Keb. 434, 447. S. C. 3 Mod. 164. S. C. cited.

Upon the return of the habeas corpus the prisoner is regularly to be discharged, bailed or remanded; but if it be doubtful which the court ought to do, it is said that the prisoner may be bailed to appear de die in diem till the matter is determined. 5 Mod. 22. Styl. 16.

By the petition of right, or 17 Car. 1. cap. 10. the court must within three days after the return of the habeas corpus either discharge, bail or remand the prisoner. But it seems that a commitment by the court of King's Bench to the Marshalsea is a remanding, being an imprisonment within the statute. 5 Mod. 22. 3 Bac. Abr. 14.

Also it hath been ruled, that the court of King's Bench may, after the return of the habeas corpus is filed, remand the prisoner to the same gaol from whence he came, and order him to be brought up from time to time, till they shall have determined whether it is proper to bail, discharge, or remand him absolutely. 1 Vent. 330.

And tho' in doubtful cases the court is to bail or discharge the party on the return of the habeas corpus; yet if a person be convicted, and the conviction on the return of the habeas corpus appears only defective in point of form, it is at the election of the court either to discharge the party, or oblige him to bring his writ of error. 1 Salk. 348. 5 Mod. 19, 20.

If on the return of the habeas corpus it appears that the contest relates to the right of guardianship, tho' the court will not determine that point, yet will it set the infant at liberty, so as to let him choose where he will go till that matter is determined; or if there be any danger of abuse, will order him into such hands as will take effectual care of him. 3 Keb. 526. 2 Lev. 128. Stran. 982.

6. OF THE HABEAS CORPUS AD FACIENDUM & RECIPIENDUM.

The habeas corpus ad faciendum & recipiendum is used only in civil causes, and lies for removing suits out of an inferior to some superior court, at the application of the defendant, who may imagine himself injured by the proceedings of such inferior court. 1 Mod. 235. 2 Mod. 198.

This writ suspends the power of the court below; so that if they proceed after, the proceedings are void, and coram non judice. 1 Salk. 352.

By this writ, the proceedings in the inferior court are at an end, for the person of the defendant being removed to the superior court, they have lost their jurisdiction over him, and all the proceedings in the superior court are de novo, and bail de nevo must be put-in in the superior court. Skin. 244.

And altho' this writ be a writ of right, yet where it is to abate a rightful suit, the court may refuse it; as where an action of debt was brought against a feme sole in the Palace court, who, after appearance and plea pleaded, married, and then removed the cause by habeas corpus to B. R. where she pleaded her coverture in abatement; and the court held, that if this matter had been moved on the return of the habeas corpus, they would have granted a procedendo; but that now the plea in abatement must be held good; for the proceedings are de novo, and the court takes not notice of the proceedings below, or of what preceded the habeas corpus. 1 Salk. 8. Hetherington v. Reynold.

After an interlocutory, and before final judgment in an inferior court, a habeas corpus cum causa was brought; before the return of the writ the defendant died, and a procedendo was awarded; because by the 8 & 9 W. 3. cap. 11. the plaintiff may have a scire facias against the executors, and proceed to judgment, which he cannot have in another court; and by this means he would be deprived of the effect of his judgment, which would be unreasonable. 1 Salk. 352.

If an action be brought in London for calling a woman a whore, this cannot be removed by habeas corpus, because the words are not actionable elsewhere; and if allowed to be removed, the custom would be destroyed. 2 Rol. Abr. 69. and see Carth. 75. See 14 Viz. Abr. tit. Habeas Corpus.

17.3.1.9.a Of Persons

The absolute rights of every Englishman (which, taken in a political and extensive sense, are usually called their liberties) as they are founded on nature and reason, so they are coeval with our form of government; though subject at times to fluctuate and change: their establishment (excellent as it is) being still human. At some times we have seen them depressed by overbearing and tyrannical princes; at others so luxuriant as even to tend to anarchy, a worse state than tyranny itself, as any government is better than none at all. But the vigour of our free constitution has always delivered the nation from these embarassments, and, as soon as the convulsions consequent on the struggle have been over, the ballance of our rights and liberties has settled to it's proper level; and their fundamental articles have been from time to time asserted in parliament, as often as they were thought to be in danger.

FIRST, by the great charter of liberties, which was obtained, sword in hand, from king John; and afterwards, with some alterations, confirmed in parliament by king Henry the third, his son. Which charter contained very few new grants; but, as sir Edward Coke [h] observes, was for the most part declaratory of the principal grounds of the fundamental laws of England. Afterwards by the statute called confirmatio cartarum [i], whereby the great charter is directed to be allowed as the common law; all judgments contrary to it are declared void; copies of it are ordered to be sent to all cathedral churches, and read twice a year to the people; and sentence of excommunication is directed to be as constantly denounced against all those that by word, deed, or counsel act contrary thereto, or in any degree infringe it. Next by a multitude of subsequent corroborating statutes, (sir Edward Coke, I think, reckons thirty two [k],) from the first Edward to Henry the fourth. Then, after a long interval, by the petition of right; which was a parliamentary declaration of the liberties of the people, assented to by king Charles the first in the beginning of his reign. Which was closely followed by the still more ample concessions made by that unhappy prince to his parliament, before the fatal rupture between them; and by the many salutary laws, particularly the habeas corpus act, passed under Charles the second. To these succeeded the bill of rights, or declaration delivered by the lords and commons to the prince and princess of Orange 13 February 1688; and afterwards enacted in parliament, when they became king and queen: which declaration concludes in these remarkable words; "and they do claim, demand, and insist upon all and singular the premises, as their undoubted rights and liberties." And the act of parliament itself [l] recognizes "all and singular the rights and liberties asserted and claimed in the said declaration to be the true, antient, and indubitable rights of the people of this kingdom." Lastly, these liberties were again asserted at the commencement of the present century, in the act of settlement [m], whereby the crown is limited to his present majesty's illustrious house, and some new provisions were added at the same fortunate aera for better securing our religion, laws, and liberties; which the statute declares to be "the birthright of the people of England;" according to the antient doctrine of the common law[n].

THUS much for the declaration of our rights and liberties. The rights themselves thus defined by these several statutes, consist in a number of private immunities; which will appear, from what has been premised, to be indeed no other, than either that residuum of natural liberty, which is not required by the laws of society to be sacrificed to public convenience; or else those civil privileges, which society hath engaged to provide, in lieu of the natural liberties so given up by individuals. These therefore were formerly, either by inheritance or purchase, the rights of all mankind; but, in most other countries of the world being now more or less debased and destroyed, they at present may be said to remain, in a peculiar and emphatical manner, the rights of the people of England. And these may be reduced to three principal or primary articles; the right of personal security, the right of personal liberty[,] and the right of private property: because as there is no other known method of compulsion, or of abridging man's natural free will, but by an infringement or diminution of one or other of these important rights, the preservation of these, inviolate, may justly be said to include the preservation of our civil immunities in their largest and most extensive sense.

I. THE right of personal security consists in a person's legal and uninterrupted enjoyment of his life, his limbs, his body, his health, and his reputation.

1. LIFE is the immediate gift of God, a right inherent by nature in every individual; and it begins in contemplation of law as soon as an infant is able to stir in the mother's womb. For if a woman is quick with child, and by a potion, or otherwise, killeth it in her womb; or if any one beat her, whereby the child dieth in her body, and she is delivered of a dead child; this, though not murder, was by the antient law homicide or manslaughter [o]. But at present it is not looked upon in quite so atrocious a light, though it remains a very heinous misdemesnor [p].

AN infant in ventre sa mere, or in the mother's womb, is supposed in law to be born for many purposes. It is capable of having a legacy, or a surrender of a copyhold estate made to it. It may have a guardian assigned to it [q]; and it is enabled to have an estate limited to it's use, and to take afterwards by such limitation, as if it were then actually born [r]. And in this point the civil law agrees with ours [s].

2. A MAN's limbs, (by which for the present we only understand those members which may be useful to him in fight, and the loss of which only amounts to mayhem by the common law) are also the gift of the wise creator; to enable man to protect himself from external injuries in a state of nature. To these therefore he has a natural inherent right; and they cannot be wantonly destroyed or disabled without a manifest breach of civil liberty.

B OTH the life and limbs of a man are of such high value, in the estimation of the law of England, that it pardons even homicide if committed se defendendo, or in order to preserve them. For whatever is done by a man, to save either life or member, is looked upon as done upon the highest necessity and compulsion. Therefore if a man through fear of death or mayhem is prevailed upon to execute a deed, or do any other legal act; these, though accompanied with all other the requisite solemnities, are totally void in law, if forced upon him by a well-grounded apprehension of losing his life, or even his limbs, in case of his non-compliance [t]. And the same is also a sufficient excuse for the commission of many misdemesnors, as will appear in the fourth book. The constraint a man is under in these circumstances is called in law duress, from the Latin durities, of which there are two sorts; duress of imprisonment, where a man actually loses his liberty, of which we shall presently speak; and duress per minas, where the hardship is only threatened and impending, which is that we are now discoursing of. Duress per minas is either for fear of loss of life, or else for fear of mayhem, or loss of limb. And this fear must be upon sufficient reason; "non," as Bracton expresses it, "suspicio cujuslibet vani et meticulosi hominis, sed talis qui possit cadere in virum constantem; talis enim debet esse metus, qui in se contineat vitae periculum, aut corporis cruciatum [u]." A fear of battery, or being beaten, though never so well grounded, is no duress; neither is the fear of having one's house burnt, or one's goods taken away and destroyed; because in these cases, should the threat be performed, a man may have satisfaction by recovering equivalent damages [w]: but no suitable atonement can be made for the loss of life, or limb. And the indulgence shewn to a man under this, the principal, sort of duress, the fear of losing his life or limbs, agrees also with that maxim of the civil law; ignoscitur ei qui sanguinem suum qualiter qualiter redemptum voluit [x].

The law not only regards life and member, and protects every man in the enjoyment of them, but also furnishes him with every thing necessary for their support. For there is no man so indigent or wretched, but he may demand a supply sufficient for all the necessities of life, from the more opulent part of the community, by means of the several statutes enacted for the relief of the poor, of which in their proper places. A humane provision; yet, though dictated by the principles of society, discountenanced by the Roman laws. For the edicts of the emperor Constantine, commanding the public to maintain the children of those who were unable to provide for them, in order to prevent the murder and exposure of infants, an institution founded on the same principle as our foundling hospitals, though comprized in the Theodosian code[y], were rejected in Justinian's collection.

These rights, of life and member, can only be determined by the death of the person; which is either a civil or natural death. The civil death commences if any man be banished the realm [z] by the process of the common law, or enters into religion; that is, goes into a monastery, and becomes there a monk professed: in which cases he is absolutely dead in law, and his next heir shall have his estate. For, such banished man is entirely cut off from society; and such a monk, upon his profession, renounces solemnly all secular concerns: and besides, as the popish clergy claimed an exemption from the duties of civil life, and the commands of the temporal magistrate, the genius of the English law would not suffer those persons to enjoy the benefits of society, who secluded themselves from it, and refused to submit to it's regulations [a]. A monk is therefore accounted civiliter mortuus, and when he enters into religion may, like other dying men, make his testament and executors; or, if he makes none, the ordinary may grant administration to his next of kin, as if he were actually dead intestate. And such executors and administrators shall have the same power, and may bring the same actions for debts due to the religious, and are liable to the same actions for those due from him, as if he were naturally deceased [b]. Nay, so far has this principle been carried, that when one was bound in a bond to an abbot and his successors, and afterwards made his executors and professed himself a monk of the same abbey, and in process of time was himself made abbot thereof; here the law gave him, in the capacity of abbot, an action of debt against his own executors to recover the money due [c]. In short, a monk or religious is so effectually dead in law, that a lease made even to a third person, during the life (generally) of one who afterwards becomes a monk, determines by such his entry into religion: for which reason leases, and other conveyances, for life, are usually made to have and to hold for the term of one's natural life [d].

THIS natural life being, as was before observed, the immediate donation of the great creator, cannot legally be disposed of or destroyed by any individual, neither by the person himself nor by any other of his fellow creatures, merely upon their own authority. Yet nevertheless it may, by the divine permission, be frequently forfeited for the breach of those laws of society, which are enforced by the sanction of capital punishments; of the nature, restrictions, expedience, and legality of which, we may hereafter more conveniently enquire in the concluding book of these commentaries. At present, I shall only observe, that whenever the constitution of a state vests in any man, or body of men, a power of destroying at pleasure, without the direction of laws, the lives or members of the subject, such constitution is in the highest degree tyrannical: and that whenever any laws direct such destruction for light and trivial causes, such laws are likewise tyrannical, though in an inferior degree; because here the subject is aware of the danger he is exposed to, and may by prudent caution provide against it. The statute law of England does therefore very seldom, and the common law does never, inflict any punishment extending to life or limb, unless upon the highest necessity: and the constitution is an utter stranger to any arbitrary power of killing or maiming the subject without the express warrant of law. "Nullus liber homo, says the great charter [e], aliquo modo destruatur, nisi per legale judicium parium suorum aut per legem terrae." Which words, "aliquo modo destruatur," according to sir Edward Coke [f], include a prohibition not only of killing, and maiming, but also of torturing (to which our laws are strangers) and of every oppression by colour of an illegal authority. And it is enacted by the statute 5 Edw. III. c. 9. that no man shall be forejudged of life or limb, contrary to the great charter and the law of the land: and again, by statute 28 Ed. III. c. 3. that no man shall be put to death, without being brought to answer by due process of law.

3. BESIDES those limbs and members that may be necessary to man, in order to defend himself or annoy his enemy, the rest of his person or body is also entitled by the same natural right to security from the corporal insults of menaces, assaults, beating, and wounding; though such insults amount not to destruction of life or member.

4. THE preservation of a man's health from such practices as may prejudice or annoy it, and

5. The security of his reputation or good name from the arts of detraction and slander, are rights to which every man is intitled, by reason and natural justice; since without these it is impossible to have the perfect enjoyment of any other advantage or right. But these three last articles (being of much less importance than those which have gone before, and those which are yet to come) it will suffice to have barely mentioned among the rights of persons; referring the more minute discussion of their several branches, to those parts of our commentaries which treat of the infringement of these rights, under the head of personal wrongs.

II. Next to personal security, the law of England regards, asserts, and preserves the personal liberty of individuals. This personal liberty consists in the power of loco-motion, of changing situation, or removing one's person to whatsoever place one's own inclination may direct; without imprisonment or restraint, unless by due course of law. Concerning which we may make the same observations as upon the preceding article; that it is a right strictly natural; that the laws of England have never abridged it without sufficient cause; and, that in this kingdom it cannot ever be abridged at the mere discretion of the magistrate, without the explicit permission of the laws. Here again the language of the great charter [g] is, that no freeman shall be taken or imprisoned, but by the lawful judgment of his equals, or by the law of the land. And many subsequent old statutes [h] expressly direct, that no man shall be taken or imprisoned by suggestion or petition to the king, or his council, unless it be by legal indictment, or the process of the common law. By the petition of right, 3 Car. I, it is enacted, that no freeman shall be imprisoned or detained without cause shewn, to which he may make answer according to law. By 16 Car. I. c. 10. if any person be restrained of his liberty by order or decree of any illegal court, or by command of the king's majesty in person, or by warrant of the council board, or of any of the privy council; he shall, upon demand of his counsel, have a writ of habeas corpus, to bring his body before the court of king's bench or common pleas; who shall determine whether the cause of his commitment be just, and thereupon do as to justice shall appertain. And by 31 Car. II. c. 2. commonly called the habeas corpus act, the methods of obtaining this writ are so plainly pointed out and enforced, that, so long as this statute remains unimpeached, no subject of England can be long detained in prison, except in those cases in which the law requires and justifies such detainer. And, lest this act should be evaded by demanding unreasonable bail, or sureties for the prisoner's appearance, it is declared by 1 W. & M. st. 2. c. 2. that excessive bail ought not to be required.

Of great importance to the public is the preservation of this personal liberty: for if once it were left in the power of any, the highest, magistrate to imprison arbitrarily whomever he or his officers thought proper, (as in France it is daily practiced by the crown) there would soon be an end of all other rights and immunities. Some have thought, that unjust attacks, even upon life, or property, at the arbitrary will of the magistrate, are less dangerous to the commonwealth, than such as are made upon the personal liberty of the subject. To bereave a man of life, or by violence to confiscate his estate, without accusation or trial, would be so gross and notorious an act of despotism, as must at once convey the alarm of tyranny throughout the whole kingdom. But confinement of the person, by secretly hurrying him to gaol, where his sufferings are unknown or forgotten; is a less public, a less striking, and therefore a more dangerous engine of arbitrary government. And yet sometimes, when the state is in real danger, even this may be a necessary measure. But the happiness of our constitution is, that it is not left to the executive power to determine when the danger of the state is so great, as to render this measure expedient. For the parliament only, or legislative power, whenever it sees proper, can authorize the crown, by suspending the habeas corpus act for a short and limited time, to imprison suspected persons without giving any reason for so doing. As the senate of Rome was wont to have recourse to a dictator, a magistrate of absolute authority, when they judged the republic in any imminent danger. The decree of the senate, which usually preceded the nomination of this magistrate, "dent operam consules, nequid respublica detrimenti capiat," was called the senatus consultum ultimae necessitatis. In like manner this experiment ought only to be tried in cases of extreme emergency; and in these the nation parts with it's liberty for a while, in order to preserve it for ever.

The confinement of the person, in any wise, is an imprisonment. So that the keeping a man against his will in a private house, putting him in the stocks, arresting or forcibly detaining him in the street, is an imprisonment [i]. And the law so much discourages unlawful confinement, that if a man is under duress of imprisonment, which we before explained to mean a compulsion by an illegal restraint of liberty, until he seals a bond or the like; he may alledge this duress, and avoid the extorted bond. But if a man be lawfully imprisoned, and either to procure his discharge, or on any other fair account, seals a bond or a deed, this is not by duress of imprisonment, and he is not at liberty to avoid it [k]. To make imprisonment lawful, it must either be, by process from the courts of judicature, or by warrant from some legal officer, having authority to commit to prison; which warrant must be in writing, under the hand and seal of the magistrate, and express the causes of the commitment, in order to be examined into (if necessary) upon a habeas corpus. If there be no cause expressed, the goaler is not bound to detain the prisoner [l]. For the law judges in this respect, saith sir Edward Coke, like Festus the Roman governor; that it is unreasonable to send a prisoner, and not to signify withal the crimes alleged against him.

A NATURAL and regular consequence of this personal liberty, is, that every Englishman may claim a right to abide in his own country so long as he pleases; and not to be driven from it unless by the sentence of the law. The king indeed, by his royal prerogative, may issue out his writ ne exeat regnum, and prohibit any of his subjects from going into foreign parts without licence [m]. This may be necessary for the public service, and safeguard of the commonwealth. But no power on earth, except the authority of parliament, can send any subject of England out of the land against his will; no not even a criminal. For exile, or transportation, is a punishment unknown to the common law; and, wherever it is now inflicted, it is either by the choice of the criminal himself, to escape a capital punishment, or else by the express direction of some modern act of parliament. To this purpose the great charter[n] declares that no freeman shall be banished, unless by the judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land. And by the habeas corpus act, 31 Car. II. c. 2. (that second magna carta, and stable bulwark of our liberties) it is enacted, that no subject of this realm, who is an inhabitant of England, Wales, or Berwick, shall be sent prisoner into Scotland, Ireland, Jersey, Guernsey, or places beyond the seas; (where they cannot have the benefit and protection of the common law) but that all such imprisonments shall be illegal; that the person, who shall dare to commit another contrary to this law, shall be disabled from bearing any office, shall incur the penalty of a praemunire, and be incapable of receiving the king's pardon and the party suffering shall also have his private action against the person committing, and all his aiders, advisers and abettors, and shall recover treble costs; besides his damages, which no jury shall assess at less than five hundred pounds.

THE law is in this respect so benignly and liberally construed for the benefit of the subject, that, though within the realm the king may command the attendance and service of all his liegemen, yet he cannot send any man out of the realm, even upon the public service: he cannot even constitute a man lord deputy or lieutenant of Ireland against his will, nor make him a foreign embassador [o]. For this might in reality be no more than an honorable exile.

17.3.1.9.b Of Wrongs and their Remedies

4.THE writ of habeas corpus, the most celebrated writ in the English law. Of this there are various kinds made use of by the courts at Westminster, for removing prisoners from one court into another for the more easy administration of justice. Such is the habeas corpus ad respondendum, when a man hath a cause of action against one who is confined by the process of some inferior court; in order to remove the prisoner, and charge him with this new action in the courts above [o]. Such is that ad satisfaciendum when a prisoner hath had judgment against him in an action, and the plaintiff is desirous to bring him up to some superior court to charge him with process of execution [p]. Such also are those ad prosequendum, testificandum, deliberandum, &c; which issue when it is necessary to remove a prisoner, in order to prosecute or bear testimony in any court, or to be tried in the proper jurisdiction wherein the fact was committed. Such is, lastly the common writ ad faciendum et recipiendum, which issues out of any of the courts of Westminster-hall, when a person is sued in some inferior jurisdiction, and is desirous to remove the action into the superior court; commanding the inferior judges to produce the body of the defendant, together with the day and cause of his caption and detainer (whence the writ is frequently denominated an habeas corpus cum causa) to do and receive whatsoever the king's court shall confider in that behalf. This is a writ grantable of common right, without any motion in court [q]; and it instantly supersedes all proceedings in the court below. But, in order to prevent the surreptitious discharge of prisoners, it is ordered by statute 1 & 2 P. & M. c. 13. that no habeas corpus shall issue to remove any prisoner out of any gaol, unless signed by some judge of the court out of which it is awarded. And, to avoid vexatious delays by removal of frivolous causes, it is enacted by statute 21 Jac. I. c. 23. that, where the judge of an inferior court of record is a barrister of three years standing, no cause shall be removed from thence by habeas corpus or other writ, after issue or demurrer deliberately joined: that no cause, if once remanded to the inferior court by writ of procedendo or otherwise, shall ever afterwards be again removed: and that no cause shall be removed at all, if the debt or damages laid in the declaration do not amount to the sum of five pounds. But an expedient [r] having been found out to elude the latter branch of the statute, by procuring a nominal plaintiff to bring another action for five pounds or upwards, (and then by the course of the court the habeas corpus removed both actions together) it is therefore enacted by statute 12 Geo. I. c. 29. that the inferior court may proceed in such actions as are under the value of five pounds, notwithstanding other actions may be brought against the same defendant to a greater amount.

But the great and efficacious writ in all manner of illegal confinement, is that of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum; directed to the person detaining another, and commanding him to produce the body of the prisoner with the day and cause of his caption and detention, ad faciendum, subjiciendum, et recipiendum, to do, submit to, and receive, whatsoever the judge or court awarding such writ shall consider in that behalf [s]. This is a high prerogative writ, and therefore by the common law issuing out of the court of king's bench not only in termtime, but also during the vacation [t], by a fiat from the chief justice or any other of the judges, and running into all parts of the king's dominions: for the king is at all times intitled to have an account, why the liberty of any of his subjects is restrained [u], wherever that restraint may be inflicted. If it issues in vacation, it is usually returnable before the judge himself who awarded it, and he proceeds by himself thereon [w]; unless the term should intervene, and then it may be returned in court [x]. Indeed, if the party were privileged in the courts of common pleas and exchequer, as being an officer or suitor of the court, an habeas corpus ad subjiciendum might also have been awarded from thence [y]: and, if the cause of imprisonment were palpably illegal, they might have discharged him [z]; but, if he were committed for any criminal matter, they could only have remanded him, or taken bail for his appearance in the court of king's bench [a]; which occasioned the common pleas to discountenance such applications. It hath also been said, and by very respectable authorities [b], that the like habeas corpus may issue out of the court of chancery in vacation: but, upon the famous application to lord Nottingham by Jenks, notwithstanding the most diligent searches, no precedent could be found where the chancellor had issued such a writ in vacation [c], and therefore his lordship refused it.

In the court of king's bench it was, and is still, necessary to apply for it by motion to the court [d], as in the case of all other prerogative writs (certiorari, prohibition, mandamus, &c) which do not issue as of mere course, without shewing some probable cause why the extraordinary power of the crown is called in to the party's assistance. For, as was argued by lord chief justice Vaughan [e], "it is granted on motion, because it cannot be had of course; and there is therefore no necessity to grant it: for the court ought to be satisfied that the party hath a probable cause to be delivered." And this seems the more reasonable, because (when once granted) the person to whom it is directed can return no satisfactory excuse for not bringing up the body of the prisoner [f]. So that, if it issued of mere course, without shewing to the court or judge some reasonable ground for awarding it, a traitor or felon under sentence of death, a soldier or mariner in the king's service, a wife, a child, a relation, or a domestic, confined for insanity or other prudential reasons, might obtain a temporary enlargement by suing out an habeas corpus, though sure to be remanded as soon as brought up to the court. And therefore sir Edward Coke, when chief justice, did not scruple in 13 Jac. I. to deny a habeas corpus to one confined by the court of admiralty for piracy; there appearing, upon his own shewing, sufficient grounds to confine him [g]. On the other hand, if a probable ground be shewn, that the party is imprisoned without just cause [h], and therefore hath a right to be delivered, the writ of habeas corpus is then a writ of right, which "may not be denied, but ought to be granted to every man that is committed, or detained in prison, or otherwise restrained, though it be by the command of the king, the privy council, or any other [i]."

In a former part of these commentaries [k] we expatiated at large on the personal liberty of the subject. It was shewn to be a natural inherent right, which could not be surrendered or forfeited unless by the commission of some great and atrocious crime, nor ought to be abridged in any cafe without the special permission of law. A doctrine co-eval with the first rudiments of the English constitution; and handed down to us from our Saxon ancestors, notwithstanding all their struggles with the Danes, and the violence of the Norman conquest: asserted afterwards and confirmed by the conqueror himself and his descendants: and though sometimes a little impaired by the ferocity of the times, and the occasional despotism of jealous or usurping princes, yet established on the firmest basis by the provisions of magna carta, and a long succession of statutes enacted under Edward III. To assert an absolute exemption from imprisonment in all cases, is inconsistent with every idea of law and political society; and in the end would destroy all civil liberty, by rendering it's protection impossible: but the glory of the English law consists in clearly defining the times, the causes, and the extent, when, wherefore, and to what degree, the imprisonment of the subject may be lawful. This induces an absolute necessity of expressing upon every commitment the reason for which it is made; that the court upon an habeas corpus may examine into it's validity; and according to the circumstances of the case may discharge, admit to bail, or remand the prisoner.

And yet, early in the reign of Charles I, the court of king's bench, relying on some arbitrary precedents (and those perhaps misunderstood) determined [l] that they could not upon an habeas corpus either bail or deliver a prisoner, though committed without any cause assigned, in case he was committed by the special command of the king, or by the lords of the privy council. This drew on a parliamentary enquiry, and produced the petition of right, 3 Car. I. which recites this illegal judgment, and enacts that no freeman hereafter shall be so imprisoned or detained. But when, in the following year, Mr Selden and others were committed by the lords of the council, in pursuance of his majesty's special command, under a general charge of "notable contempts and stirring up sedition against the king and government," the judges delayed for two terms (including also the long vacation) to deliver an opinion how far such a charge was bailable. And, when at length they agreed that it was, they however annexed a condition of finding sureties for the good behaviour, which still protracted their imprisonment; the chief justice, sir Nicholas Hyde, at the same time declaring [m], that "if they were again remanded for that cause, perhaps the court would not afterwards grant a habeas corpus, being already made acquainted with the cause of the imprisonment." But this was heard with indignation and astonishment by every lawyer present; according to Mr Selden's own account of the matter, whose resentment was not cooled at the distance of four and twenty years [n].

These pitiful evasions gave rise to the statute 16 Car. I. c. 10. §.8. whereby it was enacted, that if any person be committed by the king himself in person, or by his privy council, or by any of the members thereof, he shall have granted unto him, without any delay upon any pretence whatsoever, a writ of habeas corpus, upon demand or motion made to the court of king's bench or common pleas; who shall thereupon, within three court days after the return is made, examine and determine the legality of such commitment, and do what to justice shall appertain, in delivering, bailing, or remanding such prisoner. Yet still in the case of Jenks, before alluded to[o], who in 1676 was committed by the king in council for a turbulent speech at Guildhall [p], new shifts and devices were made use of to prevent his enlargement by law; the chief justice (as well as the chancellor) declining to award a writ of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum in vacation, though at last he thought proper to award the usual writs ad deliberandum, &c, whereby the prisoner was discharged at the Old Bailey. Other abuses had also crept into daily practice, which had in some measure defeated the benefit of this great constitutional remedy. The party imprisoning was at liberty to delay his obedience to the first writ, and might wait till a second and a third, called an alias and a pluries, were issued, before he produced the party: and many other vexatious shifts were practiced to detain state-prisoners in custody. But whoever will attentively consider the English history may observe, that the flagrant abuse of any power, by the crown or it's ministers, has always been productive of a struggle; which either discovers the exercise of that power to be contrary to law, or (if legal) restrains it for the future. This was the case in the present instance. The oppression of an obscure individual gave birth to the famous habeas corpus act, 31 Car. II. c. 2. which is frequently considered as another magna carta [q] of the kingdom; and by consequence has also in subsequent times reduced the method of proceeding on these writs (though not within the reach of that statute, but issuing merely at the common law) to the true standard of law and liberty.

The statute itself enacts, 1. That the writ shall be returned and the prisoner brought up within a limited time according to the distance, not exceeding in any case twenty days. 2. That such writs shall be endorsed as granted in pursuance of this act, and signed by the person awarding them [r]. 3. That on complaint and request in writing by or on behalf of any person committed and charged with any crime (unless committed for treason or felony expressed in the warrant, or for suspicion of the same, or as accessory thereto before the fact, or convicted or charged in execution by legal process) the lord chancellor or any of the twelve judges, in vacation, upon viewing a copy of the warrant or affidavit that a copy is denied, shall (unless the party has neglected for two terms to apply to any court for his enlargement) award a habeas corpus for such prisoner, returnable immediately before himself or any other of the judges; and upon the return made shall discharge the party, if bailable, upon giving security to appear and answer to the accusation in the proper court of judicature. 4. That officers and keepers neglecting to make due returns, or not delivering to the prisoner or his agent within six hours after demand a copy of the warrant of commitment, or shifting the custody of a prisoner from one to another, without sufficient reason or authority (specified in the act) shall for the first offence forfeit 100*l*. and for the second offence 200*l*. to the party grieved, and be disabled to hold his office. 5. That no person, once delivered by habeas corpus, shall be recommitted for the same offence on penalty of 500*l*. 6. That every person committed for treason or felony shall, if he requires it the first week of the next term or the first day of the next session of oyer and terminer, be indicted in that term or session, or else admitted to bail; unless the king's witnesses cannot be produced at that time: and if acquitted, or if not indicted and tried in the second term or session, he shall be discharged from his imprisonment for such imputed offence: but that no person, after the assises shall be opened for the county in which he is detained, shall be removed by habeas corpus, till after the assises are ended; but shall be left to the justice of the judges of assise. 7. That any such prisoner may move for and obtain his habeas corpus, as well out of the chancery or exchequer, as out of the king's bench or common pleas; and the lord chancellor or judges denying the same, on sight of the warrant or oath that the same is refused, forfeit severally to the party grieved the sum of 500*l*. 8. That this writ of habeas corpus shall run into the counties palatine, cinque ports, and other privileged places, and the islands of Jersey and Guernsey. 9. That no inhabitant of England (except persons contracting, or convicts praying, to be transported; or having committed some capital offence in the place to which they are sent) shall be sent prisoner to Scotland, Ireland, Jersey, Guernsey, or any places beyond the seas, within or without the king's dominions: on pain that the party committing, his advisors, aiders, and assistants shall forfeit to the party grieved a sum not less than 500*l*. to be recovered with treble costs; shall be disabled to bear any office of trust or profit; shall incur the penalties of praemunire; and shall be incapable of the king's pardon.

THIS is the substance of that great and important statute: which extends (we may observe) only to the case of commitments for such criminal charge, as can produce no inconvenience to public justice by a temporary enlargement of the prisoner: all other cases of unjust imprisonment being left to the habeas corpus at common law. But even upon writs at the common law it is now expected by the court, agreeable to antient precedents [§] and the spirit of the act of parliament, that the writ should be immediately obeyed, without waiting for any alias or pluries; otherwise an attachment will issue. By which admirable regulations, judicial as well as parliamentary, the remedy is now complete for removing the injury of unjust and illegal confinement. A remedy the more necessary, because the oppression does not always arise from the ill-nature, but sometimes from the mere inattention, of government. For it frequently happens in foreign countries, (and has happened in England during temporary suspensions [t] of the statute) that persons apprehended upon suspicion have suffered a long imprisonment, merely because they were forgotten.

The satisfactory remedy for this injury of false imprisonment, is by an action of trespass, vi et armis, usually called an action of false imprisonment; which is generally, and almost unavoidably, accompanied with a charge of assault and battery also: and therein the party shall recover damages for the injury he has received; and also the defendant is, as for all other injuries committed with force, or vi et armis, liable to pay a fine to the king for the violation of the public peace.

17.3.1.9.c Of the Rise, Progress, and Gradual Improvement of the Laws of England

V. Fifth period, which I am next to mention, viz. after the restoration of king Charles II. Immediately upon which, the principal remaining grievance, the doctrine and consequences of military tenures, were taken away and abolished, except in the instance of corruption of inheritable blood, upon attainder of treason and felony. And though the monarch, in whose person the royal government was restored, and with it our antient constitution, deserves no commendation from posterity, yet in his reign, (wicked, sanguinary, and turbulent as it was) the concurrence of happy circumstances was such, that from thence we may date not only the reestablishment of our church and monarchy, but also the complete restitution of English liberty, for the first time, since it's total abolition at the conquest. For therein not only these slavish tenures, the badge of foreign dominion, with all their oppressive appendages, were removed from incumbering the estates of the subject; but also an additional security of his person from imprisonment was obtained, by that great bulwark of our constitution, the habeas corpus act. These two statutes, with regard to our property and persons, form a second magna carta, as beneficial and effectual as that of Runing-Mead. That only pruned the luxuriances of the feodal system; but the statute of Charles the second extirpated all it's slaveries: except perhaps in copyhold tenure; and there also they are now in great measure enervated by gradual custom, and the interposition of our courts of justice. Magna carta only, in general terms, declared, that no man shall be imprisoned contrary to law: the habeas corpus act points him out effectual means, as well to release himself, though committed even by the king in council, as to punish all those who shall thus unconstitutionally misuse him.

17.3.1.10Reeves, 1787

Of all the provisions made by this charter for the security of the person and property of the subject, none has so much engaged the attention and claimed the reverence of posterity as chap. 29, which contains a very plain and explicit declaration as to the protection every man might expect from the laws of his country. “No freeman shall be taken or imprisoned; or be disseised of his freehold, or liberties, or free customs; or be outlawed, or exiled, or any otherwise destroyed;” “nor will we pass upon him” (says the statute, in the name of the king), that is, he shall not be condemned in the court, coram rege; “nor will we send to him,” that is, he shall not be condemned before any other commissioner or judge; nisi per legale judicium parium suorum, vel per legem terrae, that is, by a lawful trial: either that by jury, which it was intended to promote and patronize; or by the ancient modes long known to the law of the land; namely, those mentioned just before, per legem manifestam, per juramentum, per duellum, or whatever it might be: though, in a larger sense, per legem terrae may comprehend every lawful process and proceeding, in contradistinction to that of trial by jury. The statute goes on and says, nulli vendemus, nulli negabimus, aut differemus rectum vel justitiam; whereby the king in his own person declares, that he will neither sell, deny, or delay to any man a due administration of the law.[1]

17.3.2.1Chambers’s Case, 1629

Chambers's Case.

A prisoner committed to the King's Bench prison, and brought up by hab. cor. may be remanded and brought up again without a new hab. cor. by rule or order of the Court; and if the commitment be by the Privy Council "for words" spoken at their board, without specifying what the words were, he shall be bailed. Post. 507. 579. 593.

Chambers, being in prison in the Marshalsea del hostel de roy, desired a habeas corpus, and had it; which being returnable upon the fifteenth day of October, the marshal returned that he was committed to prison the twenty-eighth day of September last by the command of the Lords of the Council. The warrant verbatim was, that he was "committed for insolent behaviour and words spoken at the Council table;" which was subscribed by the Lord Keeper and twelve others of the Council.—And because it was not mentioned what the words were, so as the Court might adjudge of them, the return was held insufficient, and the marshal advised to amend his return before the twenty-first of October following.

And he was, by rule of the Court, appointed to bring his prisoner then, without a new habeas corpus; and the prisoner was advised, that in the mean time he should submit to the Lords, and petition them for his enlargement. Upon the said 21st of October the marshal had his prisoner there; but because the great case of Sir William Withipole was to be debated that day, and time would not permit to treat of this matter, the marshal was commanded to bring again his prisoner, and have him in Court the 23d day of October.

Germine, for the prisoner, then moved, that forasmuch as it appeared by the return, that he was not committed for treason or felony, nor doth it appear what the words were, whereto he might give answer, he therefore prayed he might be dismissed or bailed.

But the King's attorney moved, that he might have day until the 25th of October to consider of the return, and be informed of the words, and that in the interim the prisoner might attend the Council-table and petition.

But the prisoner affirmed, that he oftentimes had assayed by petition, and could not prevail, although he had not done it since the beginning of October; and he prayed the justice of the law and the inheritance of a subject.

Whereupon, at his importunity, the Court commanded him to be bailed; and he was bound in a recognizance of four hundred pounds, and four good merchants his sureties were bound in recognizances of one hundred pounds a-piece, that be should appear here in Crastino Animarum, and in the interim should be of good behaviour; and advertised him, that they might for contemptuous words cause an indictment or information in this Court to be drawn against him, if they would.

17.3.2.2Bushell's Case, 1670

Bushell's Case.

The King's writ of habeas corpus, dat. 9 die Novembris, 22 Car. 2, issued out of this Court, directed to the then Sheriffs of London, to have the body of Edward Bushell, by them detained in prison, together with the day and cause of his caption and detention, on Friday then next following, before this Court, to do and receive as the Court should consider; as also to have then the said writ in Court.

Of which writ, Patient Ward and Dannet Foorth, then Sheriffs of London, made the return following, annex'd to the said writ.

That at the King's Court of a Session of Oyer and Terminer, held for the City of London, at Justice Hall in the Old Baily, London, in the parish of St. Sepulchres in Farringdon Ward without London, on Wednesday 31 die August, 22 Car. 2, before Sir Samuel Sterling then Mayor of London, and divers other His Majesties Justices, by virtue of His Majesties letters patents, under the Great Seal of England, to them, any four or more of them, directed to enquire, hear, and determine, according to the tenor of the said letters patents, the offences therein specified: and amongst others, the offences of unlawful congregating and assemblies, within the limits appointed by the said commission within the said city, as well within liberties as without. Edward Bushel, the prisoner at the Barr, was committed to the gaol of Newgate, to be there safely kept, under the custody of John Smith Knight, and James Edwards, then sheriffs of the said city, by virtue of a certain order, then, and there made by the said Court of Sessions, as followeth:

Ordinatum est per Curiam hic quod Finis 40 Marcarum separatim ponatur super Edwardum Bushell, and other eleven persons particularly named, and upon every of them, being the twelve jurors, then, and there sworn, and charg'd to try several issues, then, and there joyn'd between our Lord the King, and William Penn and William Meade, for certain trespasses, contempts, unlawful assemblies and tumults, made and perpetrated by the said Penn and Mead, together with divers other unknown persons, to the number of three hundred, unlawfully and tumultuously assembled in Grace-Church-Street in London, to the disturbance of the peace, whereof the said Penn, and Mead were then indicted before the said justices. Upon which indictment, the said Penn and Mead pleaded they were not guilty. For that they, the said jurors, then, and there, the said William Penn and William Mead, of the said trespasses, contempts, unlawful assemblies and tumults, Contra legem hujus Regni Angliae, & contra plenam & manifestam evidentiam, & contra directionem Curiae in materia legis, hic, de & super praemissis eisdem Juratoribus versus praefatos Will. Penn & Will. Mead, in Curia hic aperte datam, & declaratam de praemissis, iis impositis in Indictamento praedicto acquietaverunti, in contemptum Domini Regis nunc. legumque suarum, & ad magnum impedimentum & obstructionem Justitiae, necnon ad malum exemplum omnium aliorum Juratorum in consimili casu delinquentium. Ac super inde modo ulterius ordinatum est per Curiam hic quod praefatus Ed. Bushell, capiatur & committatur Gaolae, dicti Domini Regis de Newgate, ibidem remansurus quousque solvat dicto Domino Regi 40 Marcas pro fine suo praedicto, vel deliberatus fuerit, per debitum legis Cursum. Ac eodem Edwardo Bushell ad tunc, & ibidem capto & commissio existente ad dictam Gaolam de Newgate, sub custodia praefat. Johannis Smith & Jacobi Edwards adtunc Vic. Civitatis Lond. praedict. & in eorum Custodia in Gaola praedict. existente & remanente virtute ordinis praedict. idem Johannes Smith & Jacobus Edwards, postea in eorum exitu ab officio Vic. Civitatis Lond. praedict. scilicet 28 die Septembris, Anno 22, supra dicto eundem Edwardum Bushell in dicta Gaola dicti Domini Regis adtunc existentem, deliberaverunt nobis praefatis nunc Vicecomitibus Civitatis praedict. in eadem Gaola, salvo custodiendum secundum Tenorem, & effectum ordinis praedictae. Et quia praedictus Edwardus, nondum solvit dicto Domino Regi praedictum finem 40 Marcarum, nos iidem nunc Vicecomites Corpus ejusdem Edwardi in Gaola praedicta, hucusque detinuimus, & haec est causa captionis & detentionis praefati Edwardi, cujus quidem Corpus coram praefatis Justitiariis paratum habemus.

The writ of habeas corpus is now the most usual remedy by which a man is restored again to his liberty, if he have been against law deprived of it.

Therefore the writ commands the day, and the cause of the caption and detaining of the prisoner to be certified upon the retorn, which if not done, the Court cannot possibly judge whether the cause of the commitment and detainer be according to law, or against it.

Therefore the cause of the imprisonment ought, by the retorn, to appear as specifically and certainly to the Judges of the retorn, as it did appear to the Court or person authorized to commit; else the retorn is insufficient, and the consequence must be,

That either the prisoner, because the cause retorn'd of his imprisonment is too general, must be discharg'd; when as if the cause had been more particularly retorn'd, he ought to have been remanded; or else he must be remanded, when if the cause had been particularly retorn'd, he ought to have been discharg'd: both which are inconveniences not agreeing with the dignity of the law. (There is a specious exception to this rule, but doth not materially vary it, as shall appear.)

In the present case it is retorn'd, that the prisoner, being a juryman, among others charg'd at the Sessions Court of the Old Baily, to try the issue between the King, and Penn, and Mead, upon an indictment, for assembling unlawfully and tumultuously, did contra plenam & manifestum evidentiam, openly given in Court, acquit the prisoners indicted, in contempt of the King, &c.

The Court hath no knowledge by this retorn, whether the evidence given were full and manifest, or doubtful, lame, and dark, or indeed evidence at all material to the issue, because it is not retorn'd what evidence in particular, and as it was deliver'd, was given. For it is not possible to judge of that rightly, which is not expos'd to a mans judgment. But here the evidence given to the jury is not exposed at all to this Court, but the judgment of the Court of Sessions upon that evidence is only expos'd to us; who tell us it was full and manifest. But our judgment ought to be grounded upon our own inferences and understandings, and not upon theirs.

It was said by a learned Judge, if the jury might be fined for finding against manifest evidence, the retorn was good, though it did not express what the evidence particularly was, whereby the Court might judge of it, because retorning all the evidence would be too long. A strange reason: for if the law allow me remedy for wrong imprisonment, and that must be by judging whether the cause of it were good, or not, to say the cause is too long to be made known, is to say the law gives a remedy which it will not let me have, or I must be wrongfully imprison'd still, because it is too long to know that I ought to be freed? What is necessary to an end, the law allows is never too long. Non sunt longa quibus nihil est quod demere possis, is as true as any axiom in Euclid. Besides, one manifest evidence retorn'd had suffic'd, without retorning all the evidence. But the other Judges were not of his mind.

If the retorn had been, that the jurors were committed by an order of the Court of Sessions, because they did, minus juste, acquit the persons indicted.

Or because they did, contra legem, acquit the persons indicted.

Or because they did, contra sacramentum suum, acquit them.

The Judges cannot upon the present more judge of the legal cause of their commitment, than they could if any of these causes, as general as they are, had been retorn'd for the cause of their commitment. And the same argument may be exactly made to justifie any of these retorns, had they been made as to justifie the present retorn, they being equally as legal, equally as certain, and equally as far from possessing the Court with the truth of the cause: and in what condition should all men be for the just liberty of their persons, if such causes should be admitted sufficient causes to remand persons to prison.

To those objections made by the prisoners council against the retorn, as too general.

1. It hath been said, that institutum est quoad non inquiratur de discretione judicis.

2. That the Court of Sessions in London, is not to be look'd on as an Inferiour Court, having all the Judges commissioners. That the Court having heard the evidence, it must be credited, that the evidence given to the jury of the fact was clear, and not to be doubted.

As for any such institution pretended, I know no such, nor believe any such, as it was applyed to the present cause; but taking it in another, and in the true sense, I admit it for truth: that is, when the King hath constituted any man a Judge under him, his ability, parts, fitness for his place, are not to be reflected on, censured, defamed, or vilified by any other person, being allowed and stampt with the King's approbation, to whom only it belongs to judge of the fitness of his ministers.

And such scandalous assertions or inquiries upon the Judges of both Benches, is forbidden by the Statute of Scandalum Magnatum, 2 R. 2, c. 5. Nor must we, upon supposition only, either admit Judges deficient in their office, for so they should never do any thing right; nor on the other side, must we admit them unerring in their places, for so they should never do any thing wrong.

And in that sense the saying concerns not the present case.

But if any man thinks that a person concern'd in interest, by the judgment, action, or authority exercis'd upon his person or fortunes by a Judge, must submit in all, or any of these, to the implyed discretion and unerringness of his Judge, without seeking such redress as the law allows him, it is a perswasion against common reason, the received law, and usage both of this kingdome, and almost all others.

If a Court, inferiour or superiour, hath given a false or erroneous judgment, is any thing more frequent than to reverse such judgments by writs of false judgment, of error, or appeals, according to the course of the kingdome.

If they have given corrupt and dishonest judgments, they have in all ages been complained of to the King in the Starr-Chamber, or to the Parliament.

Andrew Horne, in his mirror of justices, mentions many Judges punisht by King Alfred before the Conquest, for corrupt judgments, and their particular names and offences, which could not be had but from the records of those times.

Our stories mention many punisht in the time of Edward the First, our Parliament Rolls of Edward the Third's time, of Richard the Second's time, for the pernicious resolutions given at Nottingham Castle, afford examples of this kind: in latter times, the Parliament Journals of 18 and 21 Jac. the judgment of the ship-mony in the time of Charles the First, question'd, and the particular Judges impeacht. These instances are obvious, and therefore I but mention them.

In cases of retorns too general upon writs of habeas corpus, of many I could urge, I will instance in two only.

One Astwick brought by habeas corpus to the Kings Bench, was retorn'd to be committed, per Mandatum Nicholai Bacon Militis, domini Custodis Magni Sigilli Angliae virtute cujusdam Contemptus in Curia Cancellar. facti, and was presently bail'd.

One Apsley, prisoner in the Fleet, upon a habeas corpus, was retorn'd to be committed, per considerationem Curiae Cancellar. pro contemptu eidem Curiae illato, and upon this retorn set at liberty.

In both these cases, no inquiry was made, or consideration had, whether the contempts were to the law Court, or equitable Court of Chancery, either was alike to the Judges, lest any man should think a difference might arise thence.

The reason of discharging the prisoners upon those retorns, was the generality of them being for contempts to the Court, but no particular of the contempt exprest, whereby the Kings Bench could judge, whether it were a cause for commitment or not.

And was it not as supposeable, and as much to be credited, that the Lord Keeper and Court of Chancery, did well understand what was a contempt deserving commitment, as it is now to be credited, that the Court of Sessions did understand perfectly what was full and manifest evidence against the persons indicted at the sessions, and therefore it needed not to be reveal'd to us upon the retorn?

Hence it is apparent, that the commitment and retorn pursuing it, being in it self too general and uncertain, we ought not implicitly to think the commitment was re vera, for cause particular and sufficient enough, because it was the act of the Court of Sessions.

And as to the other part, that the Court of Sessions in London is not to be resembled to other Inferiour Courts of Oyer and Terminer, because all the Judges are commission'd here (which is true) but few are there, at the same time, and as I have heard, when this tryal was, none of them were present. However persons of great quality are in the commissions of oyer and terminer, through the shires of the Kingdom, and always some of the Judges; nor doth one commission of oyer and terminer differ in its essence, nature, and power from another, if they be general commissions; but all differ in the accidents of the commissioners, which makes no alteration in their actings in the eye of law,

Another fault in the retorn is, that the jurors are not said to have acquitted the persons indicted, against full and manifest evidence corruptly, and knowing the said evidence to be full and manifest against the persons indicted, for bow manifest soever the evidence was, if it were not manifest to them, and that they believ'd it such, it was not a finable fault, nor deserving imprisonment, upon which difference the law of punishing jurors for false verdicts principally depends.

A passage in Bracton is remarkable to this purpose concerning attainting inquests.

Committit Jurator per jurium propter falsum Sacramentum, ut si ex certa scientia aliter Juraverit quam res in veritate se habuerit, si autem Sacramentum fatuum fuerit licet falsum, tamen non committit perjurium licet re vera res aliter se habeat quam juraverat, & quia jurat secundum conscientiam eo quod non vadit contra mentem. Sunt quidam qui verum dicunt. mentiendo, sed se pejerant—quia contra mentem vadunt.

The same words, and upon the same occasion, are in effect in Fleta. Committit enim Jurator perjurium quandoqu epropter falsum Sacramentum, ut si ex certa scientia aliter juraverit quam res in veritate se habuerit secus enim propter factum quamvis falsum; and lest any should think that these passages are to be understood only of jurymens perjuries in foro conscientiae, it is clearly otherwise by both those books, which shew how, by the discreet examination of the Judge, the error of the jury not wilfull, may be prevented and corrected, and their verdict rectified.

And in another place of Bracton, in the same chapter: Judex enim sive Justiciarius ad quem pertinet examinatio, si minus diligenter examinaverit, occasionem prebet perjurii Juratoribus. And after,

Et si examinati cum justo deducantur errore dictum suum emendaverint, hoc bene facere possunt, ante judicium & impune, sed post judicium non sine paenâ.

After these authorities,

I would know whether any thing be more common, than for two men students, barristers, or Judges, to deduce contrary and opposite conclusions out of the same case in law? And is there any difference that two men should inferr distinct conclusions from the same testimony: Is any thing more known than that the same author, and place in that author, is forcibly urg’d to maintain contrary conclusions, and the decision hard, which is in the right? Is any thing more frequent in the controversies of religion, than to press the same text for opposite tenents? How then comes it to pass that two persons may not apprehend with reason and honesty, what a witness, or many, say, to prove in the understanding of one plainly one thing, but in the apprehension of the other, clearly the contrary thing: must therefore one of these merit fine and imprisonment, because he doth that which he cannot otherwise do, preserving his oath and integrity? And this often is the case of the Judge and jury.

I conclude therefore, that this retorn, charging the prisoners to have acquitted Penn and Mead, against full and manifest evidence first and next, without saying that they did know and believe that evidence to be full and manifest against the indicted persons, is no cause of fine or imprisonment.

And by the way I must here note, that the verdict of a jury, and evidence of a witness are very different things, in the truth and falshood of them: a witness swears but to what he hath heard or seen, generally or more largely, to what hath fallen under his senses. But a juryman swears to what he can inferr and conclude from the testimony of such witnesses, by the act and force of his understanding, to be the fact inquired after, which differs nothing in the reason, though much in the punishment, from what a Judge, out of various cases consider'd by him, inferrs to be the law in the question before him. Therefore Bracton,

Et licet narratio facti contraria sit Sacramento, & dicto praecedenti, tamen falsum non faciunt Sacramentum licet faciunt fatuum Judicium, quia loquuntur secundum conscientiam quia falli possunt in Judiciis suis, sicut ipse Justitiarius.

There is one objection which hath been made by none, as I remember, to justifie this general retorn, I would give answer to.

A man committed for treason or felony, and bringing a habeas corpus, hath retorn'd upon it, that he was committed for high treason or felony; and this is a sufficient retorn to remand him, though in truth this is a general retorn: for if the specifical fact for which the party was committed, were expressed in the warrant, it might then perhaps appear to be no treason or felony, but a trespass, as in the case of The Earl of Northumberland, 5 H. 4, question'd for treason in raising power. The Lords adjudg'd it a trespass; for the powers raised were not against the King, but some subjects.

Why then by like reason may not this retorn be sufficient, though the fact for which the prisoners stood committed particularly express'd, might be no cause of commitment?

The cases are not alike; for upon a general commitment for treason or felony, the prisoner (the cause appearing) may press for his tryal, which ought not to be denied or delayed, and upon his indictment and tryal, the particular cause of his imprisonment must appear, which proving no treason or felony, the prisoner shall have the benefit of it. But in this case, though the evidence given were no full nor manifest evidence against the persons indicted, but such as the jury upon it ought to have acquitted those indicted, the prisoner shall never have any benefit of it, but must continue in prison, when remanded, until he hath paid that fine unjustly impos'd on him, which was the whole end of his imprisonment.

We come now to the next part of the retorn, viz. that the jury acquitted those indicted against the direction of the Court in matter of law, openly given and declared to them in Court.

1. The words, that the jury did acquit, against the direction of the Court, in matter of law, literally taken, and de plano, are insignificant, and not intelligible; for no issue can be joyn'd of matter in law, no jury can be charg'd with the tryal of matter in law barely, no evidence ever was, or can be given to a jury of what is law, or not; nor no such oath can be given to, or taken by, a jury, to try matter in law; nor no attaint can lye for such a false oath.

Therefore we must take off this vail and colour of words, which make a shew of being something, and in truth are nothing.

If the meaning of these words, finding against the direction of the Court in matter of law, be, that if the Judge having heard the evidence given in Court (for he knows no other) shall tell the jury, upon this evidence, the law is for the plaintiff, or for the defendant, and you are under the pain of fine and imprisonment to find accordingly, then the jury ought of duty so to do; every man sees that the jury is but a troublesome delay, great charge, and of no use in determining right and wrong, and therefore the tryals by them may be better abolish'd than continued; which were a strange new-found conclusion, after a tryal so celebrated for many hundreds of years.

For if the Judge, from the evidence, shall by his own judgment first resolve upon any tryal what the fact is, and so knowing the fact, shall then resolve what the law is, and order the jury penally to find accordingly, what either necessary or convenient use can be fancied of juries, or to continue tryals by them at all?

But if the jury be not oblig'd in all tryals to follow such directions, if given, but only in some sort of tryals (as for instance, in tryals for criminal matters upon indictments or appeals) why then the consequence will be, though not in all, yet in criminal tryals, the jury (as of no material use) ought to be either omitted or abolished, which were the greater mischief to the people, than to abolish them in civil tryals.

And how the jury should, in any other manner, according to the course of tryals us'd, find against the direction of the Court in matter of law, is really not conceptible.

True it is, if it fall out upon some special tryal, that the jury being ready to give their verdict, and before it is given, the Judge shall ask, whether they find such a particular thing propounded by him? or whether they find the matter of fact to be as such a witness, or witnesses have depos'd? and the jury answer, they find the matter of fact to be so; if then the Judge shall declare, the matter of fact being by you so found to be, the law is for the plaintiff, and you are to find accordingly for him.

If notwithstanding they find for the defendant, this may be thought a finding in matter of law against the direction of the Court; for in that case the jury first declare the fact, as it is found by themselves, to which fact the Judge declares how the law is consequent.

And this is ordinary, when the jury find unexpectedly for the plaintiff or defendant, the Judge will ask, how do you find such a fact in particular? and upon their answer he will say, then it is for the defendant, though they found for the plaintiff, or è contrario, and thereupon they rectifie their verdict.

And in these cases the jury, and not the Judge, resolve and find what the fact is.

Therefore alwaies in discreet and lawful assistance of the jury, the Judge his direction is hypothetical, and upon supposition, and not positive, and upon coercion. viz. if you find the fact thus (leaving it to them what to find) then you are to find for the plaintiff; but if you find the fact thus, then it is for the defendant.

But in the case propounded by me, where it is possible in that special manner, the jury may find against the direction of the Court in matter of law, it will not follow they are therefore finable; for if an attaint will lye upon the verdict so given by them, they ought not to be fined and imprisoned by the Judge for that verdict; for all the Judges have agreed upon a full conference at Serjeants Inn, in this case. And it was formerly so agreed by the then Judges in a case where Justice Hide had fined a jury at Oxford, for finding against their evidence in a civil cause. That a jury is not finable for going against their evidence, where an attaint lies; for if an attaint be brought upon that verdict, it may be affirmed and found upon the attaint a true verdict, and the same verdict cannot be a false verdict, and therefore the jury fined for it as such by the Judge, and yet no false verdict, because affirmed upon the attaint.

Another reason that the jury may not be fined in such case, is, because until a jury have consummated their verdict, which is not done until they find for the plaintiff or defendant, and that also be entred of record; they have time still of deliberation, and whatsoever they have answered the Judge upon an interlocutory question or discourse, they may lawfully vary from it if they find cause, and are not thereby concluded.

Whence it follows upon this last reason, that upon tryals wherein no attaint lies, as well as upon such where it doth, no case can be invented; wherein it can be maintained that a jury can find, in matter of law, nakedly against the direction of the Judge.

And the Judges were (as before) all of opinion, that the retorn in this latter part of it, is also insufficient, as in the former, and so wholly insufficient.

But that this question may not hereafter revive if possible, it is evident by several resolutions of all the Judges, that where an attaint lies, the Judge cannot fine the jury for going against their evidence or direction of the Court, without other misdemeanour.

For in such case, finding against, or following the direction of the Court barely, will not barr an attaint, but in some case the Judge being demanded by, and declaring to, the jury, what is the law, though he declares it erroneously, and they find accordingly, this may excuse the jury from the forfeitures; for though their verdict be false, yet it is not corrupt, but the judgment is to be revers'd however upon the attaint; for a man loseth not his right by the Judges mistake in the law.

Therefore if an attaint lies for a false verdict upon indictment not capital (as this is) either by the common or statute law, by those resolutions, the Court would not fine the jury in this case, for going against evidence, because an attaint lay.

But admitting an attaint did not lye (as I think the law clear it did not) for there is no case in all the law of such an attaint, nor opinion, but that of Thirnings, 10 H. 4, Attaint, 60 & 64, for which there is no warrant in law, though there be other specious authority against it, toucht by none that argued this case.

The question then will be, whether before the several Acts of Parliament, which granted attaints, and are enumerated in their order in the Register, the Judge by the common law, in all cases, might have fined the jury, finding against their evidence and direction of the Court, where no attaint did lye, or could so do, yet if the statutes which gave the attaints were repeal'd.

If he could not in civil causes before attaints granted in them, he could not in criminal causes, upon indictment (wherein I have admitted attaint lies not) for the fault in both was the same, viz. finding against evidence and direction of the Court, and by the common law; the reason being the same in both, the law is the same.

That the Court could not fine a jury at the common law, where attaint did not lye (for where it did, is agreed he could not) I think to be the clearest position that ever I consider'd, either for authority or reason of law.

After attaints were granted by statutes generally; as by Westminster the

First, c. 38, in pleas real, and by 34 E. 3, c. 7, in pleas personal, and where they did lye at common law (which was only in write of assise) the examples are frequent in our books of punishing jurors by attaint.

But no case can be offer'd, either before attaints granted in general, or after, that ever a jury was punish'd by fine and imprisonment by the Judge, for not finding according to their evidence, and his direction, until Popham's time, nor is there clear proof that he ever fined them for that reason, separated from other misdemeanor. If juries might be fined in such case before attaints granted, why not since? for no statute hath taken that power from the Judge. But since attaints granted, the Judges resolved they cannot fine where the attaint lies, therefore they could not fine before. Sure this latter age did not first discover that the verdicts of juries were many times not according to the Judges opinion and liking.

But the reasons are, I conceive, most clear, that the Judge could not, nor can fine and imprison the jury in such cases.

Without a fact agreed, it is as impossible for a Judge, or any other, to know the law relating to that fact, or direct concerning it, as to know an accident that hath no subject.

Hence it follows, that the Judge can never direct what the law is in any matter controverted, without first knowing the fact; and then it follows, that without his previous knowledge of the fact, the jury cannot go against his direction in law, for he could not direct.

But the Judge, quà Judge, cannot know the fact possibly, but from the evidence which the jury have, but (as will appear) he can never know what evidence the jury have, and consequently he cannot know the matter of fact, nor punish the jury for going against their evidence, when he cannot know what their evidence is.

It is true, if the jury were to have no other evidence for the fact, but what is depos'd in Court, the Judge might know their evidence, and the fact from it, equally as they, and so direct what the law were in the case, though even then the Judge and jury might honestly differ in the result from the evidence, as well as two Judges may, which often happens.

But the evidence which the jury have of the fact is much other than that; for,

1. Being return'd of the vicinage, whence the cause of action ariseth, the law supposeth them thence to have sufficient knowledge to try the matter in issue (and so they must) though no evidence were given on either side in Court, but to this evidence the Judge is a stranger.

2. They may have evidence from their own personal knowledge, by which they may be assur'd, and sometimes are, that what is depos'd in Court, is absolutely false; but to this the Judge is a stranger, and he knows no more of the fact than he hath learn'd in Court, and perhaps by false depositions, and consequently knows nothing.
3. The jury may know the witnesses to be stigmatiz'd and infamous, which may be unknown to the parties, and consequently to the Court.
4. In many cases the jury are to have view necessarily, in many, by consent, for their better information; to this evidence likewise the Judge is a stranger.
5. If they do follow his direction, they may be attainted, and the judgment revers'd for doing that, which if they had not done, they should have been fined and imprisoned by the Judge, which is unreasonable.
6. If they do not follow his direction, and be therefore fined, yet they may be attainted, and so doubly punisht by distinct judicatures for the same offence, which the common law admits not.
A fine revers'd in Banco Regis for infancy, per inspectionem & per testimonium del 4 fide dignorum. After upon examination of divers witnesses in Chancery, the suppos'd infant was prov'd to be of age, tempore finis levati, which testimonies were exemplified, and given in evidence after in Communi Banco, in a writ of entry in the quibus there brought. And though it was the opinion of the Court, that those testimonies were of no force against the judgment in the Kings Bench, yet the jury found, with the testimony in Chancery, against direction of the Court, upon a point in law, and their verdict after affirmed in an attaint brought, and after a writ of right was brought, and battle joyn'd.
7. To what end is the jury to be retorn'd out of the vicinage, whence the cause of action ariseth? To what end must hundredors be of the jury, whom the law supposeth to have nearer knowledge of the fact than those of the vicinage in general? To what end are they challeng'd so scrupulously to the array and pole? To what end must they have such a certain freehold, and be probi & legales homines, and not of affinity with the parties concern'd? To what end must they have in many cases the view, for their exacter information chiefly? To what end must they undergo the heavy punishment of the villanous judgment, if after all this they implicitly must give a verdict by the dictates and authority of another man, under pain of fines and imprisonment, when sworn to do it according to the best of their own knowledge:

A man cannot see by anothers eye, nor hear by anothers ear, no more can a man conclude or inferr the thing to be resolv'd by anothers understanding or reasoning; and though the verdict be right the jury give, yet they being not assur'd it is so from their own understanding, are forsworn, at least in foro conscientiae.

9. It is absurd a jury should be fined by the Judge for going against their evidence, when he who fineth knows not what it is, as where a jury find without evidence in Court of either side, so if the jury find, upon their own knowledge, as the course is if the defendant plead solvit ad diem, to a bond prov'd, and offers no proof. The jury is directed to find for the plaintiff, unless they know payment was made of their own knowledge, according to the plea.

And it is as absurd to fine a jury for finding against their evidence, when the Judge knows but part of it; for the better and greater part of the evidence may be wholly unknown to him; and this may happen in most cases, and often doth, as in Graves and Shorts case.

Error of a judgment in the Common Bench, the error assign'd was, the issue being, whether a feoffment were made? and the jurors being done together to conferr of their verdict, one of them shew'd to the rest an escrow pro perentibus, not given in evidence by the parties per quod, they found for the demandant upon demurrer adjudg'd no error; for it appears not to be given him by any of the parties, or any for them, it must be intended he had it as a piece of evidence about him before, and shew'd it to inform himself and his fellows, and as he might declare it as a witness, that he knew it to be true. They resolv'd, if that might have avoided the verdict, which they agreed it could not, yet it ought to have been done by examination, and not by error.

That decantatum in our books, ad quaestionem facti non respondent judices, ad quaestionem legis non respondent juratores, literally taken is true: for if it be demanded, what is the fact? the Judge cannot answer it: if it be asked, what is the law in the case, the jury cannot answer it.

Therefore the parties agree the fact by their pleading upon demurrer, and ask the judgment of the Court for the law.

In special verdicts the jury inform the naked fact, and the Court deliver the law; and so is it in demurrers upon evidence, in arrest of judgments upon challenges, and often upon the Judges opinion of the evidence given in Court, the plaintiff becomes nonsuit, when if the matter had been left to the jury, they might well have found for the plaintiff.

But upon all general issues; as upon not culpable pleaded in trespass, nil debet in debt, nul tort, nul disseisin in assize, ne disturba pas in quare impedit, and the like; though it be matter of law whether the defendant be a trespassor, a debtor, disseisor, or disturber in the particular cases in issue; yet the jury find not (as in a special verdict) the fact of every case by it self, leaving the law to the Court, but find for the plaintiff or defendant upon the issue to be tryed, wherein they resolve both law and fact complicately, and not the fact by it self; so as though they answer not singly to the question what is the law, yet they determine the law in all matters where issue is joyn'd, and tryed in the principal case, but where the verdict is special.

To this purpose the Lord Hobart in Needlers case against The Bishop of Winchester, is very apposite—legally it will be very hard to quit a jury that finds against the law, either common law, or several statute law, whereof all men were to take knowledge, and whereupon verdict is to be given, whether any evidence be given to them or not. As if a feoffment or devise were made to one imperpetuum, and the jury should find cross, either an estate for life, or in fee-simple against the law, they should be subject to an attaint, though no man informed them what the law was in that case.

The legal verdict of the jury to be recorded, is finding for the plaintiff or defendant, what they answer, if asked to questions concerning some particular fact, is not of their verdict essentially, nor are they bound to agree in such particulars; if they all agree to find their issue for the plaintiff or defendant, they may differ in the motives wherefore, as well as Judges, in giving judgment for the plaintiff or defendant, may differ in the reasons wherefore they give that judgment, which is very ordinary.

I conclude with the statute of 26 H. 8, c. 4, that if any jurors in Wales do acquit any felon, murderer, or accessary, or give an untrue verdict against the King, upon the tryal of any traverse, recognizance, or forfeiture, contrary to good and pregnant evidence ministred to them by persons sworn before the Kings Justiciar. That then such jurors should be bound to appear before the Council of the Marches, there to abide such fine or ransome for their offence, as that Court should think fit.

If jurors might have been fined before, by the law, for going against their evidence in matters criminal, there had been no cause for making this statute against jurors, for so doing in Wales only.

Objections out of the Ancient and Modern Books.

1. A juror kept his fellows a day and night, without any reason or assenting, and therefore awarded to the Fleet.

This book rightly understood is law, that he staid his fellows a day and a night, without any reason or assenting, may be understood, that he would not in that time intend the verdict all, more if he had been absent from his fellows, but wilfully not find for either side: in this sense it was a misdemeanor against his oath, for his oath was truly to try the issue, which he could never do, that resolv'd not to confer with his fellows.

And in this sense it is the same with the case 34 E. 3, where twelve being sworn, and put together to treat of their verdict, one secretly withdrew himself, and went away, for which he was justly fined and imprison'd; and it differs not to withdraw from a mans duty, by departing from his fellows, and to withdraw from it, though he stay in the same room, and so is that book to be understood.

But if a man differ in judgment from his fellows for a day and a night, though his dissent may not be as reasonable as the opinion of the rest that agree, yet if his judgment be not satisfied, one disagreeing can be no more criminal than four or five disagreeing with the rest.

2. A juror would not agree with his fellows for two dayes, and being demanded by the Judges, if he would agree; said, he would first die in prison; whereupon he was committed, and the verdict of the eleven taken; but upon better advice the verdict of the eleven was quasht, and the juror discharg'd without fine, and the justices said, the way was to carry them in carts, until they agreed, and not by fining them; and as the Judges err'd in taking the verdict of eleven, so they did in imprisoning the twelfth; and this case makes strongly that the juror was not to be fined, who disagreed in judgment only.

Much of the office of jurors, in order to their verdict, is ministerial, as not withdrawing from their fellows, after they are sworn, not withdrawing after challenge, and being tryed in before they take their oath; not receiving from either side evidence after their oath not given in Court, not eating and drinking before their verdict, refusing to give a verdict, and the like; wherein if they transgress, they are finable; but the verdict it self, when given, is not an act ministerial, but judicial, and according to the best of their judgment, for which they are not finable, nor to be punisht, but by attaint.

3. The case of 7 R. 2, title Coronae, Fitz. 108, was cited, where upon acquittal of a common thief, the Judge said, the jury ought to be bound to his good behaviour, during his life: but saith the book, quere per quel ley, but that was only gratis dictum by the Judge, for no such thing was done, as binding them.

4. Bradshaw and Salmons case was urg'd, where a jury had given excessive damages upon a tryal in an action of covenant, and the Court of StarChamber gave damages to the complainant almost as high as the jury had given upon the tryal: but the jury, who gave the damages, were not question'd: though, saith the book, they might have been, because they receiv'd briefs from the plaintiff, for whom they gave damages, which was a misdemeanor; but the express book is, that the jury could not be punisht by information for the excessive damages, but only by attaint, therefore not for their false verdict without other misdemeanor; which answers some other cases alledg'd.

Nor can any man shew (though it was said) that a jury was ever punisht upon an information, either in law, or in the StarChamber, where the charge was only for finding against their evidence, or giving an untrue verdict, unless imbracery, subordination, or the like, were joyn'd.

5. It was said, a perjury in facie Curiae is punishable by the Judge; and such is it if jurors go against their evidence; perhaps a witness may be punisht for perjury in facie Curiae (which I will not maintain to be law), but a jury can never be so punisht, because the evidence in Court is not binding evidence to a jury, as hath been shew'd.

6. Some records were cited, of fines pro concelamento; no doubt it is an article inquirable in every oyer and terminer, and one jury may find it upon another.

7. Braynes case was urg'd, but the jurors were there fined for a manifest combination to delude the Court, by agreeing upon two verdicts, and concealing the latter, if the Court would be satisfied with the former.

8. Wharton's case, reported by two reporters, Yelverton saith, that the Judges, whereof Popham was one, and a Privy Counsellor, were very angry, and fined the jury for their verdict, and finding against direction.

In those Reports that pass under the name of Noy's, the same case is reported with this, that the Judges conceiv'd the jury had been unlawfully dealt with to give that verdict; which, if true, the fining was lawful, and the case therein reported, short by Yelverton.

9. Wagstaff's case, in the King's Bench lately, was the same with the present case; but by the record it is reasonable to think the jurors committed some fault besides going against their evidence, for they were unequally fined.

But however, all the Judges having, upon this retorn, resolved, that finding against the evidence in Court, or direction of the Court barely, is no sufficient cause to fine; the jury answers all these cases, if not answered before.

10. There remains Southwell's case, reported by Leonard; some cases out of the Court of Wards in Lannoy's case, reported by Serjeant Moore, f. 730, where jurors were sent to the Fleet, or threatned to be sent, for not finding offices according to direction of the Court.

1. An inquest of office is not subject to an attaint.
2. It neither determines any mans right, nor doth any party put any tryal upon them.
3. They are only to find naked matter of fact, as the books are of 3 H. 7, f. 10 b. and 2 H. 4, f. 5 a. but principally an office for the King is in many cases, as necessary, as an entry for a common person, without which he can never come by, or try his right, nor can the King, without an office, know whether he hath a right to a ward, a mortmain, or the like; and as it is an injury to hinder a man from his entry, whereby his right may be tryed, so it is not to find an office for the King, whereby his right may be tryed, which concludes no man, but enables the, King to a tryal of his right, and in truth is only a finding of matter of fact, and no more.

Therefore perhaps it may be an offence, as of a witness refusing his testimony, not to find an office for the King, when clear proof is made of the matter of fact; but if proof be not made at all, or be altogether doubtful, or that the matter be matter of law, the inquest may find an ignoramus, which a jury, upon a tryal, can never do: but of this I shall say no more, it concerning not the case in question.

Presidents. That the Court of Common Pleas, upon Habeas Corpus, hath Discharg'd Persons Imprison'd by other Courts, upon the Insufficiency of the Retorn only, and not for Priviledge.

Sir Anthony Roper, committed by the High Commission Court discharg'd absolutely in the Common Pleas, as unlawfully committed and detain'd, without any mention of priviledge.

George Milton, imprisoned for contempt, scandalous words of the Court, and convicted of drunkenness; the causes resolv'd insufficient, and therefore dimittitur à prisona, and the goaler discharg'd of him; but he gave bayl to attend the pleasure of the Court.

Elizabeth Ash committed by High Commission, pro lenocinio, in like manner discharg'd; the cause being insufficient to detain her in prison, or to hinder her from the priviledge of that Court, but no other mention of priviledge put in bayl.

Richard Hayes, for refusing to do penance, as injoyn'd, committed by the High Commission, the cause judg'd insufficient to commit, but gave bayl as before; he demanded a habeas corpus by reason of priviledge.

But it is to be observ'd, that priviledge lies only where a man is officer of the Court, or hath a prior suit in the Common Pleas depending, and is elsewhere arrested to answer, and molested, that he cannot prosecute his suit, he is then priviledged justly, and without wrong, because his prosecutor elsewhere might have sued, if he pleas'd, in the Common Pleas.

All priviledge is either for officers, clerks, or attorneys of the Court, not to be sued elsewhere; or for persons impleading or impleaded, having priority of suit in the Common Pleas, arrested or sued in other jurisdictions; or for the menial servants of such officers.

These priviledges are not detrimental to any, because whoever hath occasion to sue an officer, or any other, having priority of suit as before, is not restrained to sue them in the Common Pleas, but is restrained from suing elsewhere. And this is the true priviledge of the Court.

And the way of enjoying this priviledge, was, by writs of priviledge to supersede the proceeding of other Courts against such, who had the priviledge of the Common Pleas, as is yet ordinary in the cases of attorneys, officers, and clerks.

And in such writs the cause of priviledge is mentioned, and as to their menial servants, if not true, may be travers'd. As 22 H. 6, 38. Debt was brought against baron and feme, and a supersedeas out of the Chancery, was cast for the baron, as menial servant to an officer of Chancery; whereupon the plaintiff said it was contain'd in the writ that the husband was menial servant to R. J. del Chancery, whereas he was not his menial servant, and thereupon issue was taken. But quere of the officers appearing of record in the Court may be travers'd.

Hence it follows, though proceeding in other Courts against a person priviledged in Banco, might be superseded, yet it was when the matter proceeded upon in such Courts, might as well be prosecuted in the Common Bench; but if a priviledg'd person, in Banco, were sued in the Ecclesiastical Courts, or before the High Commission, or constable and marshal, for things whereof the Common Pleas had no conuzance, they could not supersede that proceeding by priviledge. And this was the ancient reason and course of priviledge.

1. Another way of priviledge, by reason of suit depending in a Superior Court, is, when a person impleading or impleaded, as in the Common Bench, is after arrested in a civil action or plaint in London, or elsewhere, and by habeas corpus is brought to the Common Pleas, and the arrest and cause retorn'd; if it appear to the Court, that the arrest in London was after the party ought to have had the priviledge of the Common Pleas; he shall have his priviledg allow'd, and be discharg'd of his arrest, and the party left to prosecute his cause of action in London, in the Common Pleas, if he will.
2. If the cause of the imprisonment retorn'd, be a lawful cause, but which cannot be prosecuted in the Common Pleas, as felony, treason, or some cause wherein the High Commission, Admiralty, or other Court, had power to imprison lawfully, then the party imprison'd which did implead, or was impleaded in the Common Bench before such imprisonment, shall not be allow'd priviledge, but ought to be remanded.
3. The third way is, when a man is brought by habeas corpus to the Court, and upon retorn of it, it appears to the Court, that he was against law imprison'd and detain'd, though there be no cause of priviledge for him in this Court, he shall never be by the act of the Court remanded to his unlawful imprisonment, for then the Court should do an act of injustice in imprisoning him, de novo, against law, whereas the great charter is, quod nullus libet homo imprisonetur nisi per legem terrae; this is the present case, and this was the case upon all the presidents produc'd and many more that might be produc'd, where upon habeas corpus, many have been discharg'd and bail'd, though there was no cause of priviledge in the case.

This appears plainly by many old books, if the reason of them be rightly taken, for insufficient causes are as no causes retorn'd; and to send a man back to prison for no cause retorn'd, seems unworthy of a Court.

If a man be impleaded by writ in the Common Pleas, and is after arrested in London upon a plaint, there upon a habeas corpus he shall have priviledge in the Common Pleas, if the writ, upon which he is impleaded, bear date before the arrest in London, and be retorn'd, although the plaintiff in the Common Pleas be nonsuit, essoin'd, or will not appear, and consequently the case of priviledge at an end before the corpus cum causa retorn'd; but if the first writ be not retorn'd, there is no record in Court that there is such a defendant.

The like where a man brought debt, in Banco, and after for the same debt arrested the defendant in London, and became nonsuit in Banco; yet the defendant, upon a habeas corpus, had his priviledge, because he had cause of priviledge at the time of the arrest, 14 H. 7, 6, Br. Priviledge, n. 19.

The like case 9 E. 4, where a man appear'd in Banco, by a cepi corpus, and found mainprise, and had a day to appear in Court, and before his day was arrested in London, and brought a corpus cum causa in Banco Regis, at which day the plaintiff became nonsuit, yet he was discharg'd from the serjeant at London, because his arrest there was after his arrest in Banco, and consequently unlawful, 9 E. 4, f. 47, Br. Priviledge, 24, and a man cannot be imprison'd at the same time lawfully in two Courts.

The Court of Kings Bench cannot pretend to the only discharging of prisoners upon habeas corpus, unless in case of priviledge, for the Chancery may do it without question.

And the same book is, that the Common Pleas or Exchequer may do it, if upon retorn of the habeas corpus, it appear the imprisonment is against law.

An habeas corpus may be had out of the Kings Bench or Chancery, though there be no priviledge, &c. or in the Court of Common Pleas, or Exchequer, for any officer or priviledg'd person there; upon which writ the gaoler must retorn by whom he was committed, and the cause of his imprisonment; and if it appeareth that his imprisonment be just and lawful, he shall be remanded to the former gaoler; but if it shall appear to the Court that he was imprisoned against the law of the land, they ought, by force of this statute, to deliver him; if it be doubtful and under consideration, he may be bayl'd.—The Kings Bench may bayl, if they please, in all cases; but the Common Bench must remand, if the cause of the imprisonment retorn'd be just.

The writ de homine replegiando, is as well retornable in the Common Pleas, as in the Kings Bench.

All prohibitions for incroaching jurisdiction issue as well out of the Common Pleas as Kings Bench.

Quashing the order of commitment upon a certiorari, which the Kings Bench may do, but not the Common Pleas, is not material in this case.

1. The prisoner is to be discharg'd or remanded barely upon the retorn, and nothing else, whether in the Kings Bench, or Common Pleas.
2. Should the Kings Bench have the order of commitment certified and quash'd, before the retorn of the habeas corpus, or after, what will it avail the prisoners; they cannot plead nul tiel record, in the one case or the other.

3. In all the presidents shew'd in the Common Pleas, or in any that can be shew'd in the King's Bench, upon discharging the prisoner by habeas corpus, nothing can be shew'd of quashing the orders or decrees of that Court, that made the wrong commitment.
4. It is manifest, where the Kings Bench hath, upon habeas corpus, discharg'd a prisoner committed by the Chancery, the person hath been again recommitted for the same cause by the Chancery, and re-deliver'd by the Kings Bench; but no quashing of the Chancery order for commitment ever heard of.
5. In such cases of recommitment, the party hath other and proper remedy besides a new habeas corpus; of which I shall not speak now.
6. It is known, that if a man recover in assise, and after in a re-disseisin, if the first judgment be revers'd in the assise, the judgment in the re-disseisin is also revers'd. So if a man recover in waste, and damages given, for which debt is brought (especially if the first judgment be revers'd before execution) it destroys the process for the damages in debt, though by several originals. But it may be said, that in a writ of error in this kind, the foundation is destroy'd, and no such record is left.

But as to that in Drury's case, 8 Rep. an outlawry issued, and process of capias upon the outlawry, the sheriff retorn'd, non est inventus; and the same day the party came into Court and demanded oyer of the exigent, which was the warrant of the outlawry; and shew'd the exigent to be altogether uncertain and insufficient, and consequently the outlawry depending upon it to be null. And the Court gave judgment accordingly, though the record of the outlawry were never revers'd by error; which differs not from this case, where the order of commitment is judicially declar'd illegal, though not quasht or revers'd by error, and consequently whatever depends upon it, as the fine and commitment doth, and the outlawry in the former-case was more the Kings interest, than the fine in this.

The Chief Justice deliver'd the opinion of the Court, and accordingly the prisoners were discharg'd.

17.3.2.3Opinion on the Writ of Habeas Corpus, 1758

Die Martis, 9° Maij 1758. Opinion on the Writ of Habeas Corpus.

Upon the second reading of the bill, intituled, “An Act for giving a more Speedy Remedy to the Subject upon the Writ of Habeas Corpus” (a)3, it is ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, in Parliament assembled, that the Judges do attend this House, the first Thursday after the approaching recess, to deliver their opinions seriatim, with their reasons, upon the following questions:

1st. Whether, in cases not within the Act 31 Car. II. writs of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum, by the law as it now stands, ought to issue of course, or upon probable cause verified by affidavit?

2. Whether, in cases not within the said Act, such writs of habeas corpus, by the law as it now stands, may issue in the vacation by fiat from a Judge of the Court of King’s Bench, returnable before himself?

3d. What effect will the several provisions proposed by this bill, as to the awarding, returning, and proceeding upon returns to such writs of habeas corpus, have in practice; and how will the same operate to the benefit or prejudice of the subject?

4th. Whether, at the common law, and before the Statute of Habeas Corpus in the 31st of King Charles II. any, and which, of the Judges could regularly issue a writ of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum, in time of vacation, in all or in what cases particularly?

5th. Whether the Judges, at the common law and before the said statute, were bound to issue such writ of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum, in time of vacation, upon demand of any person under restraint; or might they refuse to award such writ, if they thought proper?

6th. Whether the Judges, at the common law and before the said statute, were bound to make such writs, so issued in time of vacation, returnable immediaté; and could they [ed. sic; enforce] obedience to such writ issued in time of vacation, if the party served therewith should neglect or refuse to obey the same, and by what means?

7th. Whether, if a Judge, before the said statute, should have refused to grant the said writ, upon the demand of any person under any restraint, the subject had any remedy at law, by action or otherwise, against the Judge for such refusal?

8th. Whether, in case a writ of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum at the common law be directed to any person returnable immediaté, such person may not stand out an alias & pluries habeas corpus, before due obedience thereto can be regularly enforced by the course of the common law?

9th. Whether the said statute of the 31st of King Charles II. and the several provisions therein made, for the immediate awarding and returning the writ of habeas corpus, extend to the case of any man compelled against his will in time of peace, either into the land or sea service, without any colour of legal authority; or to any cases of imprisonment, detainer or restraint whatsoever, except cases of commitment for criminal or supposed criminal matters?

10th. Whether in all cases whatsoever, the Judges are so bound by the facts set forth in the return to the writ of habeas corpus, that they cannot discharge the person brought up before them, although it should appear most manifestly to the Judges, by the clearest and most undoubted proof, that such return is false in fact, and that the person so brought up is restrained of his liberty, by the most unwarrantable means, and in direct violation of law and justice?

ANSWER of Mr. Justice Wilmot (a) to the questions proposed to the Judges by the House of Lords, on the second reading of the bill, intituled, "An Act for giving a more Speedy Remedy to the Subject, upon the Writ of Habeas Corpus."

1st. Question. "Whether in cases, not within the Act 31 Car. II. writs of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum, by the law as it now stands, ought to issue of course, or upon probable cause verified by affidavit?"

Answer. I am of opinion, that in cases not within the Act of the 31 Car. II. writs of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum, by the law as it now stands, ought not to issue of course, but upon probable cause verified by affidavit.

A writ which issues upon a probable cause, verified by affidavit, is as much a writ of right, as a writ which issues of course.

There are many other writs, besides the writ of habeas corpus, which fall exactly under the same circumstances: writs of mandamus, prohibition, 1 Syd. 65. Sir R. Raymond, 4. Supplicavit, ne exeat regnum, the writ of homine replegiando;—are all writs of right; but a proper case must be laid before the Court by affidavit, before the parties, praying such writs, may be entitled to them. They are the birthright of the people, subject to such provisions as the law has established for granting them. Those provisions are not a check upon justice, but a wise and provident direction of it.

The very learned and able men who framed the 31 Car. II. could not avoid taking these writs of habeas corpus for private custody, into their consideration. Three or four years before that Act passed, there had been two very great cases, extremely agitated in Westminster Hall, upon writs of habeas corpus for private custody, viz. the cases of Lord Leigh, 2 Lev. 128, and Sir Robert Viner, Lord Mayor of Kingdom, 3 Keb. 434, 447, 470, 504. 2 Lev. 128. Freem. 389. But they wisely drew the line between civil constitutional liberty, as opposed to the power of the Crown, and liberty as opposed to the violence and power of private persons. They thought this power of judging might be abused in favour of the Crown, but they saw no damage of an abuse of it as between one subject and another; and therefore they applied the remedy to the evil they had seen and experienced, and left the law as they found it in respect of private persons.

There is no such thing in the law, as writs of grace and favour issuing from the Judges: they are all writs, of right; but they are not all writs of course.

Writs of course, are those writs which lie between party and party, for the commencement of civil suits: and if they are sued without a good foundation, the common law punishes the plaintiff for suing out the writ vexatiously, by amercing him “pro falso clamore.” And by the statute law, he is to pay the costs of the suit.

But the writ of habeas corpus is not the commencement of a civil suit, where the party proceeds at the peril of costs, if his complaint is a groundless one: it is a remedial mandatory writ, by which the King’s Supreme Court of Justice, and the Judges of that Court, at the instance of a subject aggrieved, commands the production of that subject, and inquires after the cause of his imprisonment; and it is a writ of such a sovereign and transcendent authority, that no privilege of person or place can stand against it. It runs, at the common law, to all dominions held of the Crown. It is accommodated to all persons and places. 2 Cro. 543. Palmer, 54. And, as all these remedial mandatory writs were, originally, rather the suits of the King than of the subject, the King’s Courts of Justice would not suffer them to issue upon a mere suggestion; but upon some proof of a wrong and injury done to a subject.

Writs of habeas corpus, upon imprisonment for criminal matters, were never writs of course: they always issued upon a motion, grafted on a copy of the commitment; and cases may be put in which they ought not to be granted. 1 Lev. 1. Comber. 74. Habeas corpus was denied to one committed to Bridewell for lewdness. 3 Bul. 27. 2 Mod. 306. If malefactors, under sentence of death in all the gaols in the kingdom, could have these writs of course, the sentence of the law might be suspended, and perhaps totally eluded by them.

The 31 Car. II. makes no alteration in the practice of the Courts in granting them: they are still moved for, in term time, upon the same foundation as they were before: and when a single Judge in vacation grants them under the 31 Car. II. in criminal cases, a copy of the commitment, or an affidavit of the refusal of it, must be laid before him. He must judge, even in that case, whether treason or felony is specially expressed in the warrant of commitment: and there have been a great number of cases where a doubt has arisen on the frame and wording of the warrant; so that even upon the Act, the probable cause of bailing is really disclosed to the Judge, unless the copy of the commitment is refused, and then the law will presume every thing against it; and in cases out of the Act, which take in all kinds of confinement and restraint, not for criminal, or supposed criminal, matter, and to which this question relates, it has been the uniform uninterrupted practice, both of the Court of King's Bench, and of the Judges of that Court, that the foundation, upon which the writ is prayed, should be laid before the Court or Judge who awards it.

The reasons of guarding the writ in this manner, I take to be these: there are many kinds of private restraint that are lawful. There was a much greater number formerly. The Reformation opened the doors of religious prisons; and the abolition of military tenures unfettered an unhappy class of men, called villeins, who lived in a state of captivity under their masters.

There are many kinds of restraint that exist at this day; some in the nature of punishments. In domestic government, which takes in the ease of husbands, fathers, guardians, and masters, the law authorizes restraints, in order to enforce a performance of those natural, moral, and civil duties, which wives, children, wards, and apprentices, owe to their superiors, in their several relative capacities. These domestic governments could not subsist without such authorities; and therefore all States have endeavoured most anxiously, some in a greater degree, and others in a less degree, to preserve the greatest reverence for them.

The wisdom of our ancestors would not suffer this kind of authorities to be broken in upon wantonly, upon mere suggestion, and without seeing some reason for an interposition; because they saw it would have encouraged disobedience and rebellion in private families; and, at all events, must have abated that awe and respect which act so materially in the support of those authorities. They may be abused: if they are, the law says, let it be shewn, and the party shall have relief; but if he cannot shew they are abused, he is entitled to none. The legal presumption is certainly in favour of these authorities; the law will not presume they are unduly or irregularly executed.

But if these writs were to have issued without any case made, they must have issued indiscriminately, in the cases of lawful restraints, as well as unlawful ones; which would have been levelling all distinction between them, and have been subjecting the authority of fathers, husbands, guardians, and masters, to be canvassed and questioned in the same manner, and upon the same suggestions, as the extravagant outrages of persons acting without any authority at all.

It would have been proceeding upon an inversion of the legal presumption, and would thereby have destroyed all that order, discipline, and subordination in private families, which lead men into a habit of obedience, and dispose them early to obey the laws of their country.

When a Judge is called upon for a habeas corpus, in order to bail a man for a bailable offence, the injustice of the imprisonment is obvious and self-evident: for imprisonment before trial, being only to secure his being amenable to justice; if that security can be obtained by bail, in bailable offences, it is unjust that he should be kept in prison. The authority which committed him ought to have bailed him.

The authorities I have mentioned are equally legal, and therefore within the spirit and reason of the Habeas Corpus Act itself. The injustice of the imprisonment ought to appear in the first instance, before the party has a right to demand the remedy.

The law laid this check, to prevent that scene of disorder and confusion which must arise, if wives, children, wards, and apprentices, or any other person in their name, and on their behalf, were to be at liberty, without any foundation or cause shewn, to force a production of them in Westminster Hall, or before a Judge, where-ever he should happen to be, whenever they pleased, and as often as they pleased, at a risk of having them rescued out of their hands, “in transitu,” and without a possibility of a satisfaction from any body.

There are many other lawful restraints besides those arising under the authorities I have mentioned:—All persons who are in custody upon civil process, or under special authorities, created by Act of Parliament, proceeding “civiliter,” and not “criminaliter,” against the persons who are the objects of them:—Persons who are bailed, paupers in hospitals or workhouses, madmen under commissions of lunacy, or confined by parish officers, under the Vagrant Act of 17 Geo. II. are all under a lawful confinement.

If all these persons were to have had these writs of habeas corpus of course, without shewing any cause or foundation for granting them, it would have been suffering this great remedial mandatory writ to have been used as an instrument of vexation and oppression; it would have become a weapon in the hands of madmen, and of dissolute, profligate and licentious people, to harrass and disturb persons acting under the powers which the law had given them.—One most frightful instance occurs: the case of a crew performing quarantine.—If this writ were to issue of course, it might bring back pestilence and death along with it.

The check upon the writ, by requiring a probable cause to be shewn before it issues, is only saying, "shew you want redress, and you shall have it:" and if a person cannot disclose such a case himself, as to shew he is aggrieved when he tells his own story, and is not opposed or contradicted by any body; it is decisive against his being in such a condition as to want relief.

Besides the practice, which is a decisive evidence of the law, it appears from a case [(a)], Hilary, 8th King William, called Griffiths's case, that the Court would not grant this writ, until a probable cause was laid before the Court that the party was entitled to it.

When this writ was first applied to relieve against private restraints, does not appear; but whenever it was, the manner of issuing it seems to have been adopted from that of the writ of homine replegiando, which was the true common law remedy for the assertion of liberty against a private person: and that writ never issued of course, but was applied for by petition to the Great Seal, and an affidavit made, disclosing the foundation on which it was prayed. State Trials, 3 vol. 632. 2 Lill. Pr. Reg. 23. 2 Freeman, 27, Jennings's case, upon affidavit made, that Jennings had got a young heiress into his custody without the consent of the guardian, upon the motion of the Attorney-General, a homine replegiando was granted. And as the law checked that writ of homine replegiando; the habeas corpus, which seems by practice to have been substituted in its place, took the check along with it.

Careful as the law is to prevent this writ from being abused, it cannot always prevent it: for if a man does not disclose the whole case, it may issue sometimes where it would not have issued, if the case had been fairly stated.

I will mention one case, which happened last term, and which shews the reason of the law, in expecting to see a full state of the case before the writ issues.

A gentleman applied to a Judge of the Court of King's Bench in vacation time, for a habeas corpus to his wife's mother, to bring up his wife, upon an affidavit of detention of her from him. As it was near term, the writ was returnable first day of term.

The fact was, that they had entered into articles of separation, which had determined his right to the custody of his wife; the mother brought the wife into Court, and returned the articles of separation. The return was of great length, and the mother was put to a very great expence in the making it, and if she had brought her daughter from the remotest part of the Kingdom, she could have had no satisfaction at all.

If the affidavit had disclosed the articles of separation, as it ought to have done, the Court, or Judge, would have said, "You have no right to the relief you pray, and therefore must not put the parties to costs and vexation, in a case which is remediless of your own shewing."

2d Question. Whether in cases, not within the said Act, such writs of habeas corpus, by the law as it now stands, may issue in the vacation by fiat from a Judge of the Court of King's Bench, returnable before himself?

Answer. I am of opinion that in cases, not within the Act of the 31st Car. II. writs of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum, by the law as it now stands, may issue in the vacation by fiat from a Judge of the Court of King's Bench, returnable before himself.

From the best inquiry I can make, writs of habeas corpus, in criminal cases, have been awarded by the Chief Justice of the King's Bench, and the Judges of that Court, long before the 31st Car. II.

The files of the fiats for writs made out in the Crown Office before the reign of Car. II. are not to be found there, except for four or five terms in Queen Elizabeth's time, one or two in James I. and for six or seven terms in Car. I.

No information is to be had from the records; but there are traces from cases in print, and from fiats since the Restoration, and before the 31st Car. II. that there had been a kind of unsettled practice for the Chief Justice, and Judges of the Court of King's Bench, granting them in vacation; and as the Judges of that Court are justices of peace all over the kingdom, they have a power of bailing, as incident to that authority; and I don't see how that power of bailing could well be exercised, without removing the person to be bailed before them by habeas corpus.

Catesby's case in vacation, is in Hilary, 43 Eliz. in the 7th vol. of the State Trials, 175.

I have a list of fiats for habeas corpus, since the Restoration, and before the 31 Car. II. Thirty of them appear to have been granted and made returnable before the Judges in vacation. Since the 31 Car. II. these writs have issued, in criminal cases, under that Act, when granted at the instance of a subject.

As to writs of habeas corpus in cases of private custody, I cannot ascertain the commencement of their being first issued by the Court.

By the common law, the liberty of a man's person against private persons, acting without any legal authority, was protected in this manner:
1st. First, the law gave every man a right to repel force by force, and to defend his liberty in the same manner as he might his life.
2d. As every unlawful imprisonment was a breach of the peace, it must be proceeded against as such, by justices of peace; and the delivery of the party perhaps enforced by a rigorous execution of that authority. It might also be punished by indictment. Satisfaction might likewise be recovered for the injury, by an action of false imprisonment.

The writ of homine replegiando, as mentioned before, was the only specific remedy provided by the common law, for the protection and defence of his liberty, against any private invasion of it.

Though there is an "obiter" saying by Justice Wild, in Carter, 222, of a case where the Court sent a habeas corpus to Dr. Prujean, beyond sea, for Sir Robert Carr's brother, yet it is so loosely stated, I lay no stress upon it.

The first case is the case of Sir Philip Howard, mentioned in Lord Leigh's case, and therefore must have been before that time. Lord Leigh's case was in the 27 Car. II. where habeas corpus was granted to bring up his wife. And the case of Viner and Emmerion was in the 27th year of Car. II. where a habeas corpus was granted to Viner to bring up his daughter-in-law, viz. his wife's daughter by a first husband. From that time to this, the Court has constantly granted them.

When the practice of the Chief Justice, and the Judges of the Court of King's Bench, granting these writs in vacation, in cases of private custody, first began, does not appear; but in all probability, it was either coeval with what the Court did, or very soon followed it; because the principle which supports the one, concludes as forcibly to the supporting the other: and the principle is this; if the writ is applicable to one species of unlawful imprisonment, it is in reason equally applicable to another. They are cases “ejusdem generis;” and therefore let the usage of issuing this writ have begun sooner or later, it was in the first instance a warrantable extension of a legal remedy in one case, to another case of the same nature; and I consider the usage in this case as the voice and testimony of the Judges, for near eighty years together, to the legality of the very first application of it.

The principle upon which the usage was founded, lay in the law; and the usage is nothing but a drawing that principle out into action, and a legal application of it to attain the ends of justice. It is upon this foundation only, that an infinite variety of forms, rules, regulations, and modes of practice in all Courts of Justice must stand, and can only be supported.

In many instances, an usage for some time is considered as an evidence of an antecedent immemorial usage, and therefore may be called the common law. 2 Co. 16 b., Lane’s case. “The customs and courses of the King’s Courts are as a law. The course of a Court makes a law.”

But when the commencement of an usage can be fixed and ascertained, it cannot be supported by a presumption, and the legality of the usage must then depend upon some other principle; and that principle is this, “ubi eadem est ratio, ibi idem est jus;” a writ applicable to one kind of imprisonment, is in reason equally applicable to another.

It would be endless to enumerate instances where the King’s Supreme Courts of Justice in Westminster Hall have, for the ease and benefit of the suitors of the Court, reformed, amended, and new moulded and modified their practice, as from experience and observation they found it would best advance, improve, and accelerate the administration of justice; and all acts done by Judges at their chambers, and by officers of the Court, either in term or out of term, are under a delegated authority from the Court. They are controulable by the Court, and obedience to them must be enforced by the Court. And the acts done in Court and out of Court, taken together, form that system of practice by which the benefit of the law is dealt out to the people.

I will mention an instance where a writ has been extended by usage to a purpose much beyond the original intention of it, viz. “ne exeat regnum;” which is a State writ to restrain people from going abroad; first used to hinder the clergy from going to Rome; then extended to laymen, machinating and concerting measures against the State; now applied to prevent a subterfuge from the justice of the nation, though in matters of private concernment, in order to get bail for an equitable demand, upon affidavit of intention to go abroad.

The legality of that application was settled in Car. II.'s time, upon an usage first begun in the time of James I. 1 Ch. Ca. 115. Read against Read, 2 Ch. Ca. 245. If usage, where the commencement of it was known, could legitimate a process which is to take away a man's liberty, surely usage, founded upon a legal principle, will legitimate a process which is applied to protect it.

I will mention a case in the Year Book 13 Hen. VII. fol. 17, where the mode of proceeding, in one kind of action, was translated to another, in favour of liberty. Action of trespass.—Plaintiff sets forth that he was a freeman, and that the defendant claimed him to be a villein, so that he durst not go about his business, and that the defendant had taken some of his goods; and he prayed that the defendant might give security to deliver them, and not take any more of them, or his body, pending the writ. This was the practice in a "homine replegiando;" and in a "homine replegiando," the plaintiff was to give security to deliver his body in case the action was determined against him.

It was resolved they should find security to one another, as if it had been a "homine replegiando;" and the Court said, "it was good discretion to favour liberty as much as might be by reason." They applied the provisions applicable to one writ, to another writ, because it fell under the same reason, and was to favour liberty.

It has been lately said, that the practice of issuing these writs by the Judges in vacation, was taken up under an apprehension of their being within the 31 Car. II. and that they have been marked in the Crown Office by that statute. How such an apprehension or practice could have prevailed, is to me inexplicable! No man could ever have such an apprehension who had ever read the Act: it is confined in words, and by the nature almost of every provision in it, to criminal, or supposed criminal, matter.

As to marking them by the statute, as there were fifty writs in criminal cases, for one writ in the case of private custody, the mistake might easily be made; if observed, could do no harm: it might quicken the returns; or be an inaccuracy in the office: I lay no stress upon it; because we see some few writs of habeas corpus, issued by the Court, marked by the statute, and yet the Act gives the Court of King's Bench no power of awarding these writs, but leaves that power exactly as it found it; and therefore it might as well be inferred, that the Court thought their power was by the statute, when their writ was marked by the statute, as that a single Judge thought his power was by the statute, because the writ was marked so.

I will never offer such an indignity to the very great and eminent men who have presided in that Court, and to the succession of Judges who have sat in it for near eighty years, as to say, that they founded this practice upon a mistake which could not have infected the meanest capacity.

I must say they never read the Act if they thought so. And Griffiths cases, already cited, shews that these kinds of habeas corpus were understood not to be within the Act.

Lord Chief Justice Hale does say, in second volume of Pleas of the Crown, 145, that this writ is not regularly to issue but in the term time, when the Court may judge of the return, or bail or discharge the prisoner; and in page 147, he says, it seems, "regularly," is writ should issue out of the Court of Chancery in vacation time, and out of the King's Bench in term time.

That word " regularly," alludes to some unsettled practice of the Judges issuing that writ in vacation.

This was a noble, but a posthumous, work, not fitted by him for the press, nor corrected; and, I have heard, a collection of notes made by him before the Restoration.

If it was, then the precedents and practice since the Restoration, were not taken into his consideration; and yet the practice after the Restoration, and even his own practice, varied the law extremely from what he asserted it to be in his book: for he says, that this writ issues for matter only of crime; and that assertion is confuted by his own practice, because he was Chief Justice when the writs were awarded in Lady Leigh's case, and Viner's case, in the 27 Car. II. which were not for matters of crime, but for private custodies; and Viner's case seems to have been as much agitated as any case could be, and there never was the least objection to the Court's right of awarding the writ. That circumstance is decisive against his authority upon the nature of this writ; or rather a declaration that he changed his opinion, and thought it might issue for other matters.

In 2 Ins. 53, and 4 Ins. 81, 182, Lord Coke says, "It ought to issue out of the Court of King's Bench in term time, and out of Chancery either in term time or vacation." All writs, in supposition of law, do issue in the term; and he might mean no more, than that Judges could not grant them by their own proper authority, as separate and detached from the Court, as they issue warrants.

First, this was no judicial determination; a mere "prolatum," which, as to the Court of Chancery, is very doubtful. For no writ of habeas corpus can be found to have ever issued out of the Court of Chancery, except some returnable in the House of Lords. The 16 Car. I. takes no notice of the Court of Chancery, which it is most probable it would have done, if it had been thought that the writ had issued out of that Court in vacation. And the 31 Car. II. seems to proceed upon a supposition, that it could not issue out of the Court of Chancery, because the 10th section expressly empowers the Court of Chancery to grant it, which would have been unnecessary, if it could have granted the writ before; and it only shews, what I really take to be the truth of the case, that there was no settled fixed practice, then established, of their issuing in vacation; but if they could not, nor ever did issue out of the Court of Chancery, it is the strongest reason that can be urged in support of the practice of issuing these writs by the Judges of the Court of King's Bench, in vacation, before the statute, because there could not otherwise have been a perfect and complete remedy at all times for the subject against imprisonment, for a bailable offence at the common law, and before the Statute of 31 Car. II.

That Act proceeds upon a supposition of a practice of that kind then prevailing. To what purpose is the writ to be marked by the statute, if the Judges, in vacation, could issue no writ of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum, but under this statute? That direction was to distinguish this writ, when issued at the suit of a subject to be bailed, from every other writ of this nature, which the Judges in vacation might issue: not meant to give a power which they did not exercise before, but to reduce an unsettled, informal, vague practice, into a formal regular system, as to the bailing for bailable offences, and to correct the abuse of any power which they bad in fact exercised.

But upon Lord Coke's own principles, suppose no such practice when he wrote, yet a subsequent practice, founded upon legal principles, and an experience of its utility, has made the law; "per varios actus legem experientia fecit." Lord Coke's averment has not the weight it would have had, if made after 31 Car. II.; according to his own principles, the practice would have made it law; and as it appears by the fiats between the Restoration and the 31 Car. II. that three Chief Justices, Foster, Hyde, Keyling, and four Judges of the Court, Morton, Twisden, Mallet, and Wyld, granted these writs in vacation, and the practice is warranted by legal principles, and it is admitted they were always grantable "pro Rege," (which establishes the vacation right) the opinion both of Lord Hale and Lord Coke may be true; and, upon Lord Coke's own principle, if he had written twenty years after the Restoration, instead of thirty years before it, he must have been of the opinion I now give.

As to the 4th (a) and 5th questions upon your Lordships paper, viz.

4th question. Whether, at the common law, and before the Statute of Habeas Corpus in the 31 King Car. II. any, and which, of the Judges could regularly issue a writ of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum, in time of vacation, in all or in what cases particularly?

5th question. Whether the Judges at the common law, and before the said statute, were bound to issue such writs of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum, in time of vacation, upon the demand of any person under restraint, or might they refuse to award such writ if they thought proper?

Answer. I think the Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench, and the other Judges of that Court, did in fact issue them in vacation, before 31 Car. II. in criminal cases, and might do so on principles of law; possibly it might be done at first for the King only, and afterwards for the subject; but I do not think there was any settled course of practice observed in granting them before the statute, and that such unsettled manner of practice produced the statute in the cases of bailable offences: and, in cases out of the Act, usage has now fixed a regular course or manner of granting them; but I desire to be understood, that the present usage of granting them must be supported upon such principles of law, as would have supported the granting them when such usage first began. And I think they were not bound to grant them upon the demand of any person under restraint, at the common law, and before the statute, any more than they are bound to grant them now upon demand. There must have been some case made, before they could be bound to grant them at any time.

6th question. Whether the Judges, at the common law, and before the said statute, were bound to make such writs, so issued in time of vacation, returnable "immediaté;" and could they enforce obedience to such writ so issued in time of vacation, if the party served therewith, should neglect or refuse to obey the same, and by what means?

Answer. I am of opinion, that the Judges at the common law, and before the said statute, were not bound to make writs of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum, issued in vacation time, returnable "immediaté;" because I find by the files of fiats for these writs before the statute, that they were sometimes made returnable "immediaté," and sometimes in term time; and I think the Judges cannot enforce obedience to any writs of habeas corpus, issued in time of vacation, (whether they issue in cases within the 31 Car.

II. or in cases out of that Act) if the party served therewith, should neglect or refuse to obey the same, by any means but by attachment for a contempt, which can only issue out of Court in term time.

7th question. Whether, if a Judge, before the said statute, should have refused to grant the said writ upon the demand of any person under any restraint, had the subject any remedy at law, by action or otherwise, against the Judge for such refusal?

Answer. I think that the subject had no remedy at law, by action or otherwise, against the Judge for such refusal. The denying a writ stands upon the same ground as any other breach of duty.

8th question. Whether, in case a writ of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum, at the common law, be directed to any person returnable "immediaté," such person may not stand out an alias and pluries habeas corpus, before due obedience thereto can be regularly enforced by the course of the common law?

Answer. I am of opinion, that in case a writ of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum, at the common law, be directed to any person returnable "immediaté," the Court, upon the affidavit of the service of the writ, will grant a rule for an attachment.

By the course of the common law, he might have stood out an alias and pluries; but by practice the course is now altered, and in many cases the Court has enforced obedience to a writ for private restraints, in the first instance, by attachment, for the furtherance of justice. The method of proceeding by alias and pluries, is gone into disuse, in almost all cases, and the process by attachment substituted in its stead; and that practice stands upon this legal principle;—that disobeying the King's writ is a contempt, and equally a contempt to disobey the first writ as the last.

9th question. Whether the said Statute of the 31 Car. II. and the several provisions therein made for the immediate awarding and returning the writ of habeas corpus, extend to the case of any man compelled, against his will, in time of peace, either into the land or sea service, without any colour of legal authority; or to any cases of imprisonment, detainer, or restraint whatsoever, except cases of commitment for criminal, or supposed criminal, matters?

Answer. I think they do not extend to the case of a man so compelled; because the person who compels a man against his will, in time of peace, either into the land or sea service, without any colour of legal authority, is the criminal, and not the man impressed. And I think that Act doth not extend to any cases of imprisonment, detainer, or restraint whatsoever, except cases of commitment for criminal, or supposed criminal, matters.

10th question. Whether, in all cases whatsoever, the Judges are so bound by the facts set forth in the return to the writ of habeas corpus, that they cannot discharge the person brought up before them, although it should appear most manifestly to the Judges, by the clearest and most undoubted proof, that such return is false in fact, that the person so brought up is restrained of his liberty by the most unwarrantable means, and in direct violation of law and justice?

Answer. I am of opinion, that no cases whatsoever, the Judges are so bound by the facts set forth in the return to the writ of habeas corpus, that they cannot discharge the person brought up before them, if it shall most manifestly appear to the Judges, by the clearest and most undoubted proof, that such return is false in fact, and that the person so brought up is restrained of his liberty by the most unwarrantable means, and in direct violation of law and justice. But by the clearest and most undoubted proof, I mean the verdict of a jury, or judgment on demurrer, or otherwise in an action for a false return: and in case the facts averred in the return to a writ of habeas corpus, are sufficient in point of law to justify the restraint, I am of opinion, that the Court or Judge, before whom such writ is returnable, cannot try the facts averred in such return, by affidavits, in any proceeding grafted upon the return to such writ of habeas corpus.

The clearest and most undoubted proof in the law, is the verdict of a jury; and if the facts, set forth in a return, are disproved by a verdict, I think the Judges are not bound by those facts in any case whatsoever, from discharging the person brought up before them; but as I presume the question means, “proof by affidavit,” in order to examine the truth or falsity of a return; I shall consider the question in that view.

To get at the bottom of it, the nature of this writ must first be considered: it is a demand by the King’s Supreme Court of Justice to produce a person under confinement, and to signify the reason of his confinement.

In imprisonment for criminal offences, the Court can act upon it only in one of these three manners:

1st. If it appears clearly that the fact, for which the party is committed, is no crime; or that it is a crime, but he is committed for it by a person who has no jurisdiction, the Court discharges.

2d. If doubtful whether a crime or not, or whether the party be committed by a competent jurisdiction; or it appears to be a crime, but a bailable one, the Court bails him.

the Court bails him.
3d. If an offence not bailable, and committed by a competent jurisdiction, the Court remands or commits.

The nature and quality of the fact with which the party is charged, and the jurisdiction which has taken cognizance of it, are to be considered on the return; but the existence of the fact, that is, whether such a fact was committed, or whether there is such a warrant of commitment as the gaoler has returned, is a matter which belongs “ad aliud examen.” The Court says, “Tell the reason why you confine him.” The Court will determine whether it is a good or bad reason; but not whether it is a true or a false one. The Judges are not competent to this inquiry; it is not their province, but the province of a jury, to determine it: “ad questionem juris, non facti, judices respondent.” The writ is not framed or adapted to litigating facts: it is a summary short way of taking the opinion of the Court upon a matter of law, where the facts are disclosed and admitted; it puts the case exactly in the same situation as if an action of false imprisonment had been brought, and the defendant had set forth a series of facts to justify the imprisonment, and the plaintiff had demurred to the plea. A return is the same as the justification demurred to; but, in both cases, if the facts are controverted, they must go to a jury; and when the return to a habeas corpus is made and filed, there is an end of the whole proceeding, and the parties have “no day” in Court; and therefore it is impossible that a proceeding, by way of trial, should be grafted upon it.

All the arguments upon the habeas corpus, in the seventh volume of the State Trials, 123, 156, take it for granted that it is impossible to go out of the return; and Mr. Calthorp, who was recorder of London, a very ingenious man, and argued for the subject, lays it down, “that it ought to be precise and direct, so as to be able to judge of the cause, whether sufficient or not. For there may not any doubt be taken to the return, be it true or false; but the Court is to accept the same as true; and if it be false, the party must take his remedy by action upon the case.”

Mr. Selden likewise in his argument in the same book, page. 156, says, “The keeper of the prison returns by what warrant he detains the prisoner, and with his return fixed to his writ, brings the prisoner to the Bar at the time appointed: when the return is thus made, the Court judgeth of the sufficiency or insufficiency of it, only out of the body of it, without having respect to any other thing whatsoever, that is, they suppose the return to be true, whatever it be; if it be false, the prisoner may have his action on the case against the gaoler that brought him.” And it is for this reason the law requires such exact critical certainty in returns, because the party can have no answer to it upon the return. Nothing can be pleaded to it. It must be taken to be true, until twelve men, upon their oaths, have said that it is false.

To enter into a disquisition of this sort upon affidavits, would be confounding the offices of judge and jury, and introducing a mode of trial where no issue is or can be joined. The parties, in such a summary way of trial, must lose the benefit of a “viva voce” examination, where the looks, the manner, and deportment of the witness, are extremely material to confirm or discredit his testimony: it is found by the experience of ages, that nothing does so effectually explore the truth as a cross-examination, which strikes so suddenly that fiction can never endure it.

Another decisive reason against this mode of trial, is, that there is no compulsory method of forcing men to swear affidavits; so that if a person were obliged to prove the truth of his return by affidavit, he is totally destitute of any means of obliging men to make affidavits to prove them.

Another reason is, that the parties are entitled to no costs upon the return to a habeas corpus; and if the Court pronounces a wrong judgment upon the facts, there is no method of controverting it. But in an action for a false return, witnesses may be compelled to appear, and must be examined “viva voce.” Costs will follow the event of the trial. If the verdict is false, or contrary to evidence, the law has established a legal method of controuling it.

Writs of mandamus stood exactly upon the same foundation. They are both the King’s mandatory writs, issued at the instance and for the relief of the subject. The answer to them shall be taken to be true, till it has undergone that examination which the wisdom of our ancestors has established for the decision of facts. And the law gave such credit to returns of these writs, that they would not even suffer the facts to be denied and brought to trial before a jury in that course of proceeding. “You have asked a question; you shall take the answer as it is given you: if it is insufficient in point of law, the Judges will give instantaneous relief; if it is false in fact, you have received an injury; vindicate yourself against that injury by an action, and when you have proved the fact to be false, you will be entitled to a complete relief.”

This rule was adhered to so strictly, that even in the case of annual offices in corporations, where the offices would expire before the truth or falsity of a return to a mandamus could be tried in an action for a false return, the law would not suffer the return to be traversed.

In 9th Queen Anne, an Act of Parliament was obtained, to permit the traversing returns to mandamus's for such offices as are within that Act; and all offices, not within that Act, stand as they did at the common law; and the facts, though ever so false, cannot be disproved but in an action for a false return, or in some cases by an information.

This is a strong Parliamentary declaration of what the law is, upon returns to writs of mandamus, which are always considered as standing upon the same foundation as returns to writs of habeas corpus.

I have looked through the books as carefully as I can, and so far from finding an instance of their being controverted by affidavit, where a person has been in custody of an officer under a legal authority, there is not an instance where the party is let in upon the record of the return to traverse any of the facts contained in it; but if that might have been done, yet it does not contradict my assertion, because a traverse carries it to its proper manner of trial, a trial by jury.

There are two cases, King and Gardiner, Cro. Eliz. 821. Trem. 354. Swallow and The City of London, 1 Syd. 287, where facts, consistent with the return, have been let in to be averred: I will cite them, because they shew that even facts, confessing the truth of the return, and avoiding it, must go to the jury.

A bailiff going to arrest a justice of the peace, he carried with him a hand gun: the 33 Hen. VIII. prohibits all persons from carrying such weapons. The justice sends out his servant and apprehends him for carrying this hand-gun; the justice convicts him upon the statute for the penalty, and sends him to gaol till he paid the penalty. Gardiner brings a habeas corpus, and removes himself into Court. The return was the warrant of execution, where the fact of his being a sheriff's officer did not appear; but the matter being disclosed to the Court, it was thought to be no offence, and that a minister of justice might carry a hand-gun. How was it to be come at? This was a fact which did not contradict the return, but confessed and avoided it; and yet the Court would not interpose by affidavit: they ordered a plea to be put in, comprising the whole matter, and upon the King's coroner and attorney confessing the plea, the man was discharged. But if it had been controverted, the plea put it into such a method, as would bring the fact to that form of trial, which the law has established as the best for investigating truth.

In the other case, Swallow was committed by the Court of Aldermen to Newgate, for refusing to accept the office of alderman, to which he had been elected by the ward where he lived; he was brought up by habeas corpus; after the return filed, it was moved for him to have leave to plead to the return, that he was an officer of the Mint, and by charter exempt from all offices—not a hint at an affidavit, and they put him to a writ of privilege, besides the plea; and as facts confessed and avoided the return, it was admitted: but still it brought the point to trial by jury; and it was agreed in that case, that matter, contrary to the return, could not be pleaded, but the party is put to his action for the false return.

It appears by Sir G. Treby's report, February 1688, that the House of Commons came to twenty-eight resolutions, to be carried into the Bill of Rights. Many of them were afterwards dropped, and amongst the rest, the twenty-fifth, which was, "that the subject should have liberty to traverse returns to writs of habeas corpus and mandamus."

This doctrine is echoed through all the books for three or four hundred years together. Y. B. 9 Hen. VI. fol. 44. Babington, who was then Chief Justice; "If the cause appear to us sufficient in itself, notwithstanding it be false, it is enough for us upon the return, which the whole Court agreed. And if he had returned that he was his villein, this shall not make an issue here, whether he be his villein or not: wherefore, if you cannot prove but that the cause is sufficient in itself, he shall be sent back again." 11 Coke 99, Bagges's case. 12 Coke 129, Hawkeridges case: "that upon an insufficient return, the party must be bailed or discharged; otherwise, if return shall be sufficient, when it is false." Godbolt, 129. If the return is false, the party cannot be delivered. 8 Co. 127 b.

I find no authority which warrants a difference between returns, when filed to writs of habeas corpus in cases of private custody, and of public custody, where the facts justifying the imprisonment have been set forth; that is, where there has been a full, complete, sufficient return.

For as to returns of process, which are to bring parties into Court, in order to have the right tried and examined, when the Court is proceeding not "legem dicere," but only "sistere in judicio," the Court often proceeds in a summary way upon such returns for the expedition of justice; the Court will not see their process disobeyed and eluded by tricks and falsities; and the case of Emerton and Viner, which was in Hilary term, 26 and 27 Car. II. and Easter and Trinity terms, 27 Car. II. seems to have proceeded upon this principle. It is reported in 3 Keb. 434, 447, 470, and 504. 2 Lev. 128. Freeman, 389, 401, 522.

I will state the case particularly, as it appears upon the record. In Hilary term, 26 and 27 Car. II. a habeas corpus issued to Sir Robert Viner, Lord Mayor of London, for the body of Bridget, the only daughter and heir of Sir Thomas Hyde. (Note, Sir Robert Viner had married Lady Hyde, the mother of Bridget, who was then dead.) In the same Hilary term, an “alias” habeas corpus issued under the penalty of £40; and afterwards in the same term, a “pluries” habeas corpus issued under the penalty of £500.

Sir Robert Viner to the “pluries” returned, that Bridget, the only daughter and heir of Sir Thomas Hyde, Knight, mentioned in the writ, at the time of the receipt of the aforesaid writ, or ever afterwards to that time, was not in his custody, as by the said writ is supposed; and for that reason he could not have the said Bridget before the King at the day and place mentioned in the writ, as by the said writ he was commanded.

A rule was then made that the return should be filed, and counsel be heard thereupon the next day. Upon that next day, the day after was given to Sir Robert Viner’s counsel to speak to the return, and upon that next day, which was Saturday, this rule was made. “Upon the undertaking of Mr. Jefferys, as counsel for Sir Robert Viner, upon the writ of habeas corpus for the body of Bridget Hyde, that the said Robert Viner should bring the said Bridget into Court on Wednesday next, it is ordered, that no process in the mean time should be made out thereupon against the said Sir Robert Viner.”

Upon the Wednesday, the following entry was made: “Bridget the only daughter and heir of Sir Thomas Hyde, Knight, being brought here into Court, in the custody of Sir Robert Viner, Knight, desired to remain in the custody of the said Sir Robert Viner.” Upon the Friday afterwards, which was either the last day of the term, or very near the last day of the term, the following rule appears to have been made: “It is ordered, that Sir Robert Viner, before the end of next week, shall bind himself before the justices of this Court, or one of them, in a recognizance of £40,000 upon condition that the said Sir Robert Viner, before the end of the next week, between the entering into that recognizance, and one month next after Easter then next ensuing, should not, directly or indirectly, cause or procure, or knowingly consent, that the said Bridget, then being in the house of the said Sir Robert Viner, should be married or contracted in marriage with or to any person whatsoever, or should be solicited in order to marry with any person whatsoever, or should be delivered into the hands or custody of any person whatsoever, out of the custody of the said Sir Robert Viner; and if the said Sir Robert Viner shall not enter into such recognizance before the end of the next week, then let a writ of attachment issue against him for a contempt: and it is further ordered, that the said Sir Robert Viner shall permit Lady Acheson, the godmother, and the uncles and aunts of the said Bridget, and the sons and daughters of the said uncles and aunts (except John Emerton, one of her cousins) to have access to her, in order only to visit her, every Monday, Wednesday, and Friday, in every week, between the time of entering into the said recognizance and one month next after Easter, between the hours of four and seven in the afternoon: and it is further ordered" by the consent of counsel on both sides, "that the several affidavits now delivered here into Court, of and concerning the said Bridget, should be filed here in Court upon record." No affidavits are mentioned or taken notice of in any of the subsequent rules.

These are all the rules which appear to have been made in Hilary term; but Emerton brought an ejectment in that Hilary term, upon the demise of himself and Bridget his wife, for a messuage and some lands in North Mymms, in the county of Hertford, in order to establish his marriage, and that ejectment appears by the record to have been tried upon Tuesday next after five weeks from the Feast of Easter; and after this trial at Bar, by which Mr. Emerton established his marriage with Bridget Hyde, and upon the very same day of the trial, a habeas corpus issued to Sir Robert Viner, tested 11th May, to bring up the body of Bridget, the wife of John Emerton, lately called Bridget Hyde, the only daughter and heir of Sir Thomas Hyde, returnable on Friday next after the morrow of the Ascension; then an "alias" issued, tested 14th of May, and then a "pluries" issued, tested 15th May; and to all these writs of habeas corpus Sir Robert Viner made the same return, which was, "that Bridget, the wife of John Emerton, lately called Bridget Hyde, the only daughter and heir of Sir Thomas Hyde, in the said writ mentioned, at the time of the receipt of the aforesaid writ, or of any other writ of the King to him directed, or ever afterward to this time, was not, nor yet is, in his custody, as by the said writ is supposed, and for that reason he could not have the said Bridget at the day and place mentioned in the said writ, as by the said writ he was commanded." And upon the same day that these writs were returned, it was ordered, that the returns should be filed; and it does not appear that there were any other proceedings on those returns in that term.

But in the beginning of Trinity term, there appears to have been a rule made in the following words: "It is ordered, that unless Sir Robert Viner shall immediately permit William Emerton and Owen Davies to see Bridget, the wife of John Emerton, the son of the said William Emerton, or shall give notice to the said William Emerton and Owen Davies, where the said Bridget now is, that the said Robert Viner should attend the Court tomorrow;" and the next day, which was Saturday, a rule was made, "that the said Sir Robert Viner do attend the Court on Tuesday next without any further notice." But upon the Monday a rule was made, whereby "it was ordered, that the said Sir Robert Viner should attend the Court on Wednesday next peremptorily."

Upon the Thursday afterwards, "it was ordered, that Sir Robert Viner should attend the Court the next day, and that Mr. Francis Woodward, one of the officers of the Court, should give him notice of the order." Upon that next day, which was Friday, a rule was made, "that Sir Robert Viner should attend the Court upon the day after, to inform the Court where Bridget Emerton, wife of John Emerton, then was; otherwise a tipstaff should take him up and bring him into Court; and it was ordered, that Mr. Barrington should attend the Court the same day." Upon the Wednesday afterward a rule was made, "that the marshal should take up Sir Robert Viner upon the 30th day of October then next ensuing (the day after Lord Mayor's Day, when he would have been out of office) or as soon afterwards as he could take him, and bring him into Court." Early in Michaelmas term, to wit on Wednesday after one month of St. Michael, a rule was made, "that the marshal should take up Sir Robert Viner on the 13th November then next ensuing, or so soon afterward as he could take him; and that Mr. Emerton and his wife, and the other relations of the said Bridget, should, in the mean time, have free access to her at all convenient times."

By these proceedings it appears, that the Court was proceeding against him for a contempt in disobeying the writ; and as Sir Robert Viner had returned, that the said Bridget was not in his possession at the receipt of any writ, which was disproved by the record of their own Court, (for the rules I have stated shew she was in his possession) the fact, averred by the return upon the record, was falsified by evidence of equal dignity, viz. the records of the Court, grafted upon Sir Robert Viner's own acts and admissions.

In the next place, it does not appear by any acts of the Court, that any affidavits were read; for though the last rule of Court in Hilary term mentions, that the several affidavits delivered into Court concerning the said Bridget Emerton, should be filed; yet it does not appear from the records that they were ever read; and it is observable, that they were filed by consent of both parties; and if any affidavits were read, it could only be the affidavits mentioned in that rule; because no notice is taken of any affidavit in the subsequent rules, and consequently none could have been read to contradict the return to the second habeas corpus, because they were made two months before the second habeas corpus issued.

But suppose there had been no such proceedings upon the record, and affidavits had been read to shew that Bridget was in the custody of Sir Robert Viner, it would not encounter the doctrine I lay down; for it was not a return, averring facts justifying the cause of imprisonment, but only an excuse for not obeying the writ; and if it be false, the Court proceeds for a contempt in a summary way in this case as they would in all others. In Godbolt, 219, Smith, one of the officers of the Court of Admiralty, was committed by the Court of Common Pleas to the prison of the Fleet, because he had made return of a writ, contrary to what he had said in the same Court the day before. And to bring it home to my point, I would suppose there had been no verdict, evidencing the marriage of Bridget with Emerton, and that Sir Robert Viner had returned, that Bridget was not the wife of Emerton, but his own wife: in case there had been no legal disability, would the Court, upon affidavits, have tried the fact of that marriage?—If it were a case of that nature, it had been in point—I apprehend clearly they could not, without usurping a power which the law has not given them.

And it is further observable in that case, that there never was any rule made upon Sir Robert Viner to produce her. The compulsory rule was, that unless he should permit William Emerton and Owen Davies to see her, or give them notice where she was, he should attend the Court.

The next compulsory rule is, “that he should attend to inform the Court where she was, or otherwise that a tipstaff should take him up and bring him into Court;” and the two subsequent rules, for the marshal to take him up, and to bring him into Court, were in consequence of his non-attendance.

If they had considered the return as duly falsified by affidavit, and had proceeded upon that principle, they would have issued an attachment for the contempt in the first instance, as they had ordered in Hilary term upon the insufficiency of the first writ. And as Sir Robert Viner was indictable for making a false return, the affidavits might be properly read, as a foundation for the apprehending him; and the rather, because the marriage was established, and the Court saw he was guilty of a great offence in secreting and withholding a wife from her husband.

Affidavits may be read to collateral purposes; as in order to bail, or adjust the sum for which bail is to be given; and in the cases of madmen, when they have been brought up without any formal return at all, or only a return, "that I have the body ready according to the command of the writ." 22 Ass. pl. 56, battery and false imprisonment: defendant says plaintiff was in a rage, and did great mischief, whereupon the defendant and his other relations took him and bound him, and put him into a house, and chastised and beat him with a stick or rod.

As there was no return of a fact justifying the cause of imprisonment, the Judges were at liberty to look into it, and read affidavits, to direct them what to do upon it. For as the facts do not appear upon every return, the Court, or Judge, can be enabled only from affidavits to know whether they should interpose or not;—if satisfied the party was mad; though under no legal custody—they would not interpose. If doubtful,—they would direct an application for a commission, or put it into some way of inquiry; if quite satisfied it was a scene of oppression,—they would set the party at liberty.

So in cases of wives, children, and wards—all the Court, or Judge, does, is to see that the party is under no illegal restraint. The law so laid down, 1 Str. 445. 2 Str. 982, The King and Smith.

In the case of The King and Smith, habeas corpus was brought by the father against an aunt, for a child near fourteen; the return was only "ready in Court." She made an affidavit that the uncle had devised an estate to trustees, upon trust to pay her a yearly sum for the child's maintenance, and directed the money should be paid only to her; that the child had lived with her from its birth; that it was the uncle's desire it might so continue, the father being a very extravagant person.

The noble Lord (a), who then presided in the Court, said, "The detention being undefended, we must set the child at liberty: we can take no notice of the justification in the affidavit; we can determine nothing about the possession of the child: all the Court can do is to see that persons are not unlawfully confined."

In all these cases, the parties have opportunities of asserting their title at law, and may have the benefit of a writ of error. If we should take upon us the summary determination of this question, it would debar the parties of their writ of error, and such other privilege as the law has given.

The remedies, which the law has provided in different cases, should not be confounded. If there are any cases where facts have been entered into by affidavit, upon habeas corpus, yet unless there have been returns to such writs filed, and those returns have set forth a sufficient cause of the imprisonment, and affidavits have been read to contradict that cause in point of fact, such cases will not encounter the position I am now advancing.

A difference is made between the case of an officer and a mere private person—a difference in favour of interposing upon the return of an officer, rather than of a private person, because an officer is a minister of justice, and more under the controul of the Court than a mere stranger. If said to be a wrong-doer—that is begging the question; for it depends upon the truth or falsity of the return, whether he is a wrong-doer.

If a lawful cause of restraint is not returned, the party will be discharged for the insufficiency of it; but the facts, evidencing the legality, must not be presumed to be false, in order to warrant an examination whether they be false or not.

But suppose there was a distinction between custody by a public officer, and a private person acting without any authority whatsoever; yet, in regard to pressed men, they are in the custody of public officers, acting under an authority given by Act of Parliament; they are under a necessity of receiving them; they take them as persons within the description of the Act; and if they return them to be so, they have a right to have that fact tried by a jury as well as any other person. But it is not the privilege of an officer, but of an Englishman, to have a fact, justifying his conduct, and which he has averred upon record, tried by a jury.

It is said, that it is a very hard case, and that a man may be sent to the West Indies before the falsity of the return is proved in an action.—If there be any particular hardship, the Act which produces the case, must provide for it.

Judges will construe the law as liberally as possible in favour of liberty, but they cannot make laws; they are only to expound them: particular cases must yield to the law, and not the law to particular cases.

There is no difference between facts in a return, and any other facts averred upon record.

Suppose an action brought upon a bond for any given sum of money, and the party is arrested upon it, and he pleads that he never executed the bond; suppose he could shew by affidavits ever so clearly, that he did not execute the bond, or, by a copy of the register, that he was not born when it is dated. The Court could not interpose; why? Because the law says, the fact must be tried by a jury: the Judges have no more cognizance or power to try it than if they were not Judges.

If they were to do it where there was the clearest and most undoubted proof, they must do it in every case: for the degree of proof cannot alter or vary the mode of trial, and translate the examination of the fact from the jury to the Judge.

If a man is arrested and in custody, in a civil action, upon an affidavit made by the plaintiff of the debt, the Court will not, even for the purpose of discharging him out of custody, enter into any examination of the reality of the debt, though there is the most clear and undoubted proof laid before the Court of the falsity of the demand; it must be tried by a jury. The Court cannot look at it. We must administer justice, not as we wish the law to be, but as it is.

Laws are framed upon principles of general utility, and adapted to such cases as most frequently happen. Judges cannot set up natural reason against the reason of the law—cannot dispense with the law, for the sake of a particular case, arising upon an act which will expire with the session, and perhaps may never be enacted again; and in a case, where the hardship may be prevented by making a rule upon all the parties concerned in supporting the right to the recruit, that he shall not be carried away till the merits are tried in an action; or by letting him out, on security to return, if the merits are against him: and if the case was ever so remediless, I think we are not warranted to impeach, by affidavits, the truth of the return of an officer, acting under an Act of Parliament, which the law says ought to be impeached by a verdict.

But the case is not a remediless one: by the common law, the writ of "homine replegiando" will clearly relieve him. That writ, which is obtained out of the Court of Chancery upon an affidavit, goes to the sheriff, and commands him to replevy the man. If he cannot replevy him, he returns it, and a process goes out instantly to seize the body of the person who is supposed to have him in custody, and he is imprisoned himself till he produces the body. Fitzherbert, Nat. Bre. 67 b. (edition 1616), 5 Hen. 7, 3.

If a person is seized by virtue of the first writ, and the party, who has him in custody, claims any right to the detention of him, still he is to be delivered, upon giving security for his appearance, and to try the right in a Court of Justice; and if the point is determined against him, to deliver himself up to the person in whose custody he was: so that, by this writ, the party may be instantly set at liberty, without violating any rule of law whatsoever; and where a person is in actual custody, the sheriff will be sure to find him and deliver him; and it is a more sure and certain remedy in that case, than where a man is imprisoned by a mere private person, and may be shifted about so secretly, that the sheriff cannot find him.

There is another method by which a man impressed may get at his liberty, laying the gaoler and the return quite out of the case: and that is, by appealing to that summary jurisdiction, which the Court of King's Bench exercises over all inferior jurisdictions, powers, and authorities whatsoever.

The authority given to the commissioners, being a particular, special authority, if it is abused, they are answerable to the Court for it; and the Court will relieve the party oppressed by it in a summary way, by affidavits. But in that case, the complaint is founded on affidavits, and therefore must be answered by affidavits; and the fact is tried, between the persons who did the wrong, and the person who sustained it.

The Crown, being interested in the recruit, is likewise heard "pro interesse." The gaoler is no party to that complaint or inquiry; and as to him, the fact, which he has averred upon record, stands unimpeached; and if it is false, he must and can only be answerable for it in an action: and by this mode of proceeding, the party acquires such a discharge as will completely work a manumission of him from his condition of a soldier.

For if a gaoler should let a man go, or return only that he had his body ready, without shewing any cause of his imprisonment, or should make an insufficient return, or a false return; no man can say that an act of the gaoler can affect the right which the public have in the recruit. That must and can only be determined between the commissioners and the Crown on the one side, and the party imprisoned on the other.

The distinction, between a proceeding by habeas corpus and upon motion, I take to be this: In a proceeding by motion, the Court goes upon affidavits; and it may take its rise collaterally, various ways, out of disputes which come before the Court upon record. For instance, the return to a habeas corpus cannot be tried and set aside by affidavits; but the Court may take the matter up "diverso intuitu," in order to grant an information against a man who has seized another by outrage and violence, and detains him without any colour of authority; or perhaps to proceed against such person by way of information for a false return, which Hale says is an indictable offence; or in order to commit him for an outrageous breach of the peace.

Suppose habeas corpus for a maid taken away, according to the Statute of Philip and Mary, or of 3 Henry VII.; by the one, a great misdemeanor,—by the other a felony; and the party returns that he is married, that she is his wife. The fact, or validity of the marriage, cannot be controverted upon the return; but upon affidavits the Court might commit him for a misdemeanor in one case, and for a felony in the other. And in cases where the Court has a discretion as to bailing, the Court might put such terms upon him as would force the immediate relief of the person imprisoned and agreeable to these principles, is The King and White, Trin. 1745, where the Court would not discharge the impressed man, T. Reynolds, upon the affidavits contradicting the return; but being brought up on a Monday, and the writ and return, which was full and sufficient, being filed, the Court ordered him to be brought up again on Wednesday; and upon reading the several affidavits of Reynolds and others on his behalf, made a rule upon the commissioners and the Master, to shew cause the next day, why he should not be discharged out of the custody of the said Richard White. The rule was as follows:

Monday, 1st July 1745. "The defendant being brought here into Court, in custody of Richard White, Esquire, Major of the Tower of London, by virtue of His Majesty's writ of habeas corpus, it is ordered, by consent of counsel on both sides, that the name Thomas White, mentioned in the said writ, be made Richard White: and it is further ordered, that the said writ and returns thereto be filed, and that the said Richard White bring into this Court the body of the said defendant Thomas Reynolds on Wednesday next; and upon reading the several affidavits of Thomas Kell and others, George Stewart and others, Thomas Reynolds and John Mangaar, it is further ordered, that Thomas Bedwell, Francis Bedwell, Charles Scriven, John West, and John Robinson (commissioners under the Act) do tomorrow shew cause why the said defendant should not be discharged out of the custody of the said Richard White, upon notice of this rule to be given to them respectively in the mean time."

There is a decisive mark upon this rule, which shews the Court industriously avoided twisting the complaint against the commissioners with the return; because they ordered the rule on the commissioners to come on at a different day: whereas, if the affidavits had been levelled and pointed at the return, the Court would have directed them to have come on together; and it is extremely material, that Major White is not so much as a party to that part of the rule which is upon the commissioners; the Court considered the return with regard to him as sacred, and not to be litigated by affidavits against him.

If the Court had meant to have impeached the truth of the return by affidavits, as between Reynolds the man impressed, and White the gaoler, they would have certainly given White an opportunity of supporting the truth of his return by affidavits.

Wednesday. Sir John Strange for Major White, said, the question was of great consequence to the liberty of the subject on the one hand, and to the service of the public on the other, and that there had not been time for him to be sufficiently prepared: he proposed therefore, without prejudice to the question, to admit him to bail. The rule upon the commissioners was discharged; and it appears that the defendant's recognizance was afterwards discharged.

I have searched for writs of habeas corpus and returns to them, in Queen Anne's time. There are many; eight of the persons are remanded, seven are discharged; as to some, it does not appear what was done. And in every case where the party was remanded, the return appears to be good upon the face of it; where discharged, insufficient upon the face of it.

I directed a search to be made for affidavits, or for any rules that might have been made upon the discharge or remanding of the parties. The affidavits were stolen many years ago out of the office; and there are no rules to be found in the rule-book except one, in Bolton's case, which I will mention by and by, and submit to your Lordships, as the most decisive instance which can be produced, that the return was sacred, and could not be touched but by consent.

As no more light could be got from that inquiry, I then examined the returns where the parties were remanded and where they were discharged; and if I could have found two returns in the same words, one where the person was remanded, and another where he was discharged, it would have afforded a very strong reason to have believed that some extrinsic collateral evidence had been received, which had produced a remand in the one case, and a discharge in the other; but as all the returns where the parties were remanded are sufficient, and all the discharges are in cases where the returns are insufficient, it demonstrates most clearly to my satisfaction, that the Court proceeded only upon the sufficiency or insufficiency of the return, on the face of it.

There is one return of an enlisted soldier, Alexander James, committed by the captain to the Savoy, plainly insufficient. The captain is not stated to have had any authority to commit, and no offence is stated for which the soldier was committed; he is not so much as said to be a captain of the regiment in which he was enlisted.

The case of Bolton is in Hil. 3d of Queen Anne. A rule (a)1 was made by consent to refer it to arbitrators, to determine whether he was such a person as was within the description of the Act. If the Court could have discharged upon reading affidavits, why put it into any other mode of enquiry? They saw it could be done only by action for a false return; but upon consent, they might have directed an issue to try, or fixed upon referees, who are a jury of the party's own choosing, to try whether he was within the Act or not: it is nothing more than if the parties, upon a return to a mandamus, should agree to refer the fact to referees, instead of going to trial by a jury: it is so far from proving, that the Court could try the question by affidavits, it proves that they could not; and that inference is strengthened by seeing no traces of such an examination. There is no mention of it in any books of that time; and it is not to be conceived that it should by accident have happened, that all the men, remanded upon good returns, had no evidence, and that all the persons discharged, had.

I am clearly of opinion that Judges are not bound down by any fact set forth on a return, if disproved by a verdict; but that the Court can look at no other proof, as to any facts averred on a return, admitting and justifying the imprisonment.

The other Judges delivered their opinions "seriatim" on the same questions, the 25th, 26th, and 30th May 1758; and on the 2d June,

It was ordered, that the bill, intituled, "An Act for giving a more Speedy Remedy to the Subject upon the Writ of Habeas Corpus," be Rejected (a)2.

17.3.2.4Brass Crosby's Case, 1771

THE CASE OF BRASS CROSBY, ESQ. Lord Mayor of London. C. B. [The Court of C. P. will not bail or discharge a prisoner, committed by warrant of the Speaker of the House of Commons, for a breach of privilege of that House, expressed in the warrant.]

2 Black. Rep. 754, S. C.

The Lieutenant of the Tower of London was commanded to have before the Justices of the Bench here, the body of Brass Crosby, Esq. Lord-Mayor of London, by him detained in the King's prison, in the Tower of London, by whatsoever name he was called, together with the day, and cause of his caption and detention, on Monday next, after three weeks from Easter-Day; that the said justices seeing the cause, might do that which of right, and according to the law and custom of England, ought to be done; and further, to do and receive what the same justices here should then consider in that behalf. And now here, at this day, (to wit) Monday* next, after three weeks from Easter-Day, in this term cometh the said Brass Crosby, in his proper person, under the custody of Charles Rainsford, Esq. Deputy-Lieutenant of the Tower of London, brought to the Bar here; and the said deputy-lieutenant then here returneth, that before the coming of the said writ, (to wit) on the 27th day of March last, the said Brass Crosby was committed to the Tower of London, by virtue of a certain warrant under the hand of Sir Fletcher Norton, Knt., Speaker of the House of Commons, which follows in these words: "Whereas the House of Commons have this day adjudged, that Brass Crosby Esq. Lord Mayor of London, a member of this House, having signed a warrant for the commitment of the messenger of the House, for having executed the warrant of the Speaker, issued under the order of the House, and held the said messenger to bail, is guilty of a breach of privilege of the House; and whereas the said House hath this day ordered, that the said Brass Crosby Esq. Lord-Mayor of London, and a member of this House, be for his said offence committed to the Tower of London: these are therefore to require you to receive into your custody the body of the said Brass Crosby Esq. and him safely keep during the pleasure of the said House, for which this shall be your sufficient warrant. Given under my hand, the twenty-fifth day of March, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-one." And that this was the cause of the caption and detention of the said Brass Crosby in the prison aforesaid; the body of which said Brass Crosby he hath here ready, as by the said writ he was commanded, &c. Whereupon, the premises being seen, and fully examined and understood by the justices here, it seemeth to the said justices here, that the aforesaid cause of commitment of the said Brass Crosby Esq. to the King's prison of the Tower of London aforesaid, in the return above specified, is good and sufficient in law to detain the said Brass Crosby Esq. in the prison aforesaid; therefore the said Brass Crosby Esq. is by the Court here remanded to the Tower of London, &c.

Serjeants Glynn and Jephson argued, that it appeared by the return of this habeas corpus, that the cause of commitment of the Lord-Mayor to the Tower of London was insufficient in law for the detention of him there; and therefore this Court ought to discharge him out of the custody of the Lieutenant of the Tower of London.

Here follows the substance of Serjeant Glynn's argument, after the writ and return were filed.

Serjeant Glynn.—The question now before the Court, is, whether it does not appear by the return of this writ, that the lord-mayor ought to be discharged? and is a very important and constitutional question indeed.

The return states, that the imprisonment of his lordship is by virtue of a certain warrant under the hand of Sir Fletcher Norton Knt. Speaker of the House of Commons, reciting, that whereas the House had adjudged, that his lordship having signed a warrant for the commitment of a messenger of the House, for having executed the warrant of the Speaker, issued under the order of the House, and held that messenger to bail, is guilty of a breach of privilege of the House; and also reciting, that the House had ordered, that his lordship, a member of the House, should for his said offence be committed. So that it appears what that breach of privilege is.

When any person is brought to this Bar by the King's writ of habeas corpus, the Judges must look into, see and consider the cause of his detention, and are bound to do that which of right, and according to the law and custom of England, ought to be done.

Acts done by the highest authority are subject to the inquiry of the Courts in Westminster-Hall; whose jurisdiction extends not only to inquire into, control and correct the acts of inferior, but also of co-ordinate and superior powers.

A breach of privilege of the House of Commons is stated, and also in what manner, and by what fact their privilege was broken; therefore this Court must determine, whether the fact charged is by law a contempt or breach of privilege. When it is returned, that a person was committed by any other Court in this Hall, for a contempt generally, without specifying the fact or nature of the contempt, this Court cannot inquire into the matter, but must remand the prisoner. Every Court of Justice of Record in the Hall, must necessarily have absolute power to enforce obedience to their own orders, or justice could not possibly be administered to the King's subjects. The House of Commons is not a Court of Justice of Record, for it cannot administer an oath; it has a certain limited jurisdiction; and this Court must judge, whether it has not transgressed, and gone beyond the bounds of its jurisdiction, and must pronounce upon it. If the King doth exercise any power which is not conformable to law, this Court will remedy it; the old writ de homine replegiando did not comprehend the mandates of the King;

but the habeas corpus extends to them, and to all acts of power not conformable to law. If the Court of Chancery, which is a Superior Court in civil causes, should exceed it's jurisdiction, and interefere by injunction in criminal cases, the Inferior Court would determine against the Court of Chancery, and would discharge any one from imprisonment whom that Court should commit for disobedience to such injunction.

This Court must inquire, whether the House of Commons has not exceeded its lawful jurisdiction. The lord-mayor is charged with a contempt: the question is, whether he is guilty of a contempt? that is to say, whether the fact charged upon him, amounts by law to a contempt? The House of Commons makes an order for committing a printer, and that order expresses who shall take him into custody, namely, the serjeant, or deputy serjeant at arms of the House: the printer is taken into custody by a messenger, within the City of London; he complains to the lord-mayor; who examines into his complaint, proceeds judicially and according to law; and after such examination, according to the best of his judgment, is of opinion, that the warrant of Sir Fletcher Norton does not justify the taking the printer into custody by a messenger of the House, in the City of London. How does this interfere with the lawful jurisdiction of the House of Commons? And how does it exceed the lawful jurisdiction of the lord-mayor, within the City of London? The jurisdiction of the House must be limited to some particular objects: the claim of an unlimited power in this country is absurd, and destroys itself. In the great question, in Ashby and White, about the Aylesbury men, we find, that in a conference between the Lords and Commons, it was agreed, that the Commons cannot, by any vote or resolution of their own, assume or acquire any new jurisdiction or privilege. Here is a warrant under the hand of Sir Fletcher Norton, Speaker. Sir Fletcher Norton has no personal authority to commit whom he pleases. The Speaker, as such, has no official authority; whatever authority he can have, must be merely as the instrument of the House of Commons: his act can be valid only by the order of the House; but that the warrant is made contrary to the order of the House, appears to this Court by the return of the habeas corpus; consequently, the Speaker having no authority of his own, and the warrant being contrary to the order, the same is invalid. The messenger executed the warrant in the city; the Speaker had no authority to impower him to execute it in the City of London. The House of Commons have not an unlimited jurisdiction; the lord-mayor was therefore obliged to examine, whether the act of power exerted by them within the city, was within their jurisdiction. The printer had been charged with printing the speeches of some members of the House, for which he was ordered to be taken into custody; the lord-mayor thought the House of Commons had no right to order the printer to be taken into custody by their messenger in the City of London, and that the printer ought not to be committed for the act with which he was charged. There is nothing to be pretended in favour of this proceeding of the House of Commons, but their assumed transcendent power: now it would totally destroy all the benefit, and the very end of the habeas corpus, if the transcendency of any power whatever could blind the eyes of a Court of Justice, and prevent their inquiry into its acts; such a decision by Judges sworn to administer faithfully the laws, would be fatal to every thing that is worth preserving in our boasted constitution, and would leave the unhappy subjects of this country in a state much worse than a state of savage nature. The great Chief Justice Holt was clearly of opinion, and held it for good law, that if it appeared upon the face of the return of a habeas corpus, that what the House of Commons called a contempt, was not by law a contempt, the person committed for it must be discharged; that the privileges of the House of Commons are part of the law of the land, and therefore the Courts here must take notice of them incidentally; and though this was the opinion of a single Judge against three others, yet it was agreed to and supported by the House of Lords, who, in those days, remembered that they were the hereditary guardians of the people. Again.—Holt held, that the order of the House of Commons forbidding any one to seek or pursue a legal remedy against their orders, was illegal and naught; and boldly said so: and accordingly he was of opinion, that the persons committed for contempt of that order ought to have been discharged; though the three other Judges were of a contrary opinion; and the persons were remanded to Newgate. Upon petition to the Queen, a writ of error was allowed, and brought; and before it was argued, the Parliament, for good reasons, was dissolved: but I will venture to say, if it had been argued, there would have been judgment given by the House of Lords according to Holt’s opinion. If the lex et consuetudo Parliamenti, of which we hear so much and know so little, be indeed a part of the law of the land, the Judges are bound to take notice of it, and to decide upon it, as they do upon every other part of the law. It has been said, that Lord Chief Justice Holt was single in his opinion; nevertheless, I may venture to say, that his opinion, in the judgment of every honest and unprejudiced mind, will not be found light in the scale, against that of the three other Judges. He was single: but he had truth and integrity with him, as well as the strongest arguments on his side, which the conference with the Lords demonstrated; arguments which have never yet been, and which cannot now be answered. The other three Judges differing in opinion from him, there was a writ of error (as I said before) granted, returnable in Parliament; and if the temper of the times would have permitted it to have been proceeded in, and the Parliament had not been then dissolved, it may easily be collected, from the arguments above referred to, that it would have had from the Lords a most solemn and just decision.

Lord Chief Justice de Grey.—Brother Glynn! that writ of error you mention, was never brought before the Lords.

Serjeant Glynn.—It is true, my Lord! it was never brought directly in question before them; because doubts were started, whether it was a writ of right, or of favour, which might be refused by the particular officer. This occasioned a petition to the Queen, who in answer to the petition said, she was come to a resolution to grant a writ of error, because she was desirous to have the matter of law settled for the good of her subjects; but unhappily for us, the particular circumstances of those times prevented it; and the Parliament was dissolved.

Lord Chief Justice de Grey.—In all cases, except treason and felony, I think a writ of error is grantable of right; the two Houses addressed the Queen for different purposes, the Lords said, it was time enough to decide upon the writ of error, when it came before them.

Serjeant Glynn.—My Lord! it is for that reason I said, I collect it from other arguments, which make it very reasonable to suppose, that the subject would have had satisfaction and redress from the decision of the House of Lords.

The question at present is, whether this Court has not power to examine into the jurisdiction of the House of Commons? I submit it, with deference to the Court, that you have lawful power to inquire, whether the House of Commons had any jurisdiction in this case, and that their privileges are not to be supposed so transcendent and mystical, as to exclude all inquiry. My Lord! I deny that the mayor’s act is a breach of privilege of the House of Commons, the lord-mayor was in full possession of jurisdiction in the case; he was obliged to decide upon the question before him; he was obliged to form an opinion upon a case within his jurisdiction: shall his opinion be adjudged a contempt? Is this the law of the land; that when different Courts, having jurisdiction of the same nature, differ in their decisions, they are guilty of contempts one against the other, and may be punished for such contempts? It is no contempt in me, a private man, to have an opinion different from the greatest authorities in this kingdom; it was the lord-mayor's opinion upon the case before him, he was bound by his oath to act pursuant to that opinion, it was his bounden duty to act accordingly: he would have been perjured, if, out of respect for any persons, he had not obeyed the call of his conscience. It was no crime for him to entertain the opinion; entertaining it, he was bound to declare it, and it was his duty to act in consequence of it. The conscientious act of a magistrate, within the limits of his jurisdiction, can never be a contempt, or punishable; unless a magistrate acts wrong from corrupt motives, he cannot be punished. But suppose for a moment, the lord-mayor did not act from his opinion, but from some corrupt motive, it is not the House of Commons, but a jury, that must judge of it. The duty of a magistrate differs widely from that of an officer; from the latter, a full and ready obedience is required to be paid to the orders of the Court, whose officer and minister he is, and such orders, rightly pursued and executed by him, are his sufficient justification; but the magistrate is bound by his oath, and has an opinion and judgment of his own which he must follow; and he is answerable to the law, and cannot be justified for the breach of his oath and the law, by any order or resolution of the greatest authority.

Your Lordships are now called upon to say, whether the Lord-Mayor of London, in a case where he bad indisputable jurisdiction, acting by his opinion, and according to his oath, is guilty of a contempt of the House of Commons, and can by law be imprisoned.

Serjeant Jephson.—My Lords! as I shall not have an opportunity of answering any argument from the Bench, nor can possibly know the objections your Lordships may have, to discharging the lord-mayor out of custody, I shall endeavour to anticipate and answer such objections against discharging him, as occur to me, and may possibly be made by the Court.

The question is, whether sufficient cause appears to the Court upon the return of this writ, to imprison the lord-mayor? if no legal cause appears for detaining him in custody, he must be discharged.

I shall consider the nature, the return, and the consequence of the writ of habeas corpus. It is a prerogative writ of right, to inquire into the cause of the imprisonment of any of the King's subjects; if a legal cause of detention doth not appear upon the return of the writ, the subject must be discharged, and set at liberty: therefore, if a legal cause does not appear upon the return of this writ, the lord-mayor must be discharged out of custody; this position cannot be denied.

It appears from the cases of Sir William Thicknesse, 4 Inst. 434, Sir William Chancey, 12 Rep. 83, and from Bushel's case, Vaugh. 135, &c. that the cause of imprisonment ought to be as specifically returned to those who judge upon the writ of habeas corpus, as it did to those who first committed the party. Again, Bethell's case, 1 Salk. 348, where the commitment is not to the legal and immediate officer, it is naught. Again, Search's case, 1 Leon. 70, where the Queen had taken a person into her protection, who, notwithstanding, was arrested, and the person arresting committed, and on a habeas corpus was discharged. See again Doctor Alponso's case, 2 Bulst. 259, where the return was bad, no cause being therein shewed; also, Thomas Barkham's case, Cro. Car. 507, the like case, ibid. 579. 1 Rol. Rep. 192, 218, Apsley's case, and Ruswell's case, ibid. 245. Codde's case. The determination in all the cases the same; if the legal charge is not returned, the person must be discharged: the Court must judge of the cause of commitment returned; if not, why should the writ command the return of the cause? the cause is returned, that the Court may judge, whether the person is intitled to his liberty, or not. It is no objection in this case, to say, that the House of Commons having a power to commit, therefore this Court must not judge of the cause of commitment returned; for this would prove too much; because it would go to every other Court having jurisdiction to commit. Suppose the Court of King's Bench, which is equal, and perhaps superior in some respect to this Court, should commit a person; and the person committed should be brought here by habeas corpus; this Court would certainly take notice, and inquire into the cause returned; and if this Court thought it not a sufficient cause, would discharge the person; otherwise how would the end of bringing the writ of habeas corpus be answered?

It is no objection in this case, to say, that the Court cannot examine the cause as stated in the return, because the Court would then determine upon the privileges of the House of Commons: the Court must, and doth frequently determine upon the privileges of Parliament, when they come incidentally before them. See The Earl of Banbury's case, 2 Ld. Raym. 1247. Salk. 512. 2 Stra. 987, 8. This Court made no sort of hesitation to determine in Wilkes's case, upon the privilege of Parliament. 2 Wilson 151. Why then should they not now enter into this question, touching the privilege of Parliament? In Lord Shaftesbury's and Mr. Murray's cases, the returns were general, for contempts of the House, without stating the particular facts; but the facts of the supposed contempt in this case appear, which we contend cannot by any legal construction amount to a contempt, and therefore that the lord-mayor must be discharged. The House of Commons having determined it to be a contempt does not alter the case: a fact does not become a contempt by being recited to be such. The Court must consider, whether the warrant for my lord-mayor's commitment is the warrant of the Speaker as Speaker of the House of Commons, as Sir Fletcher Norton may act in a double capacity; (whereupon a loud laugh).

Lord Chief Justice de Grey.—Sir Fletcher Norton signs himself Speaker.

Serjeant Jephson.—His signing himself Speaker will not help the warrant, if the cause is not sufficient; and the Court may rather suppose, the mistake committed by Sir Fletcher Norton, in his private capacity, than by the House of Commons. Suppose some future Speaker, of some future House of Commons, should recite in his warrant, that the House of Commons had adjudged it a breach of privilege, and contempt, to sue out a Statute of Bankrupt against one of their members, which by Act of Parliament any one is permitted to do; and should, in consequence, commit a person for such legal act; if the person was brought by writ of habeas corpus before this Court, would not the Court take cognizance of the commitment? Would they not determine it no breach of privilege? Are Acts of Parliament of less force than such a recital in a Speaker's warrant? Suppose a person is committed by a similar warrant, for proceeding according to Act of Parliament against a member of the House in an action of debt; shall he have no remedy from the law, which led him into the supposed transgression? Suppose a justice of peace should commit a member of the House of Commons, for treason, felony, or breach of the peace, and the Speaker's warrant should recite it to be a contempt, will this Court say, they can take no cognizance of such a commitment by the House of Commons? Suppose all the officers of this Court should be recited in the Speaker's warrant, to be in contempt, for executing the process of this Court, will this Court give no remedy? and must this and every other Court of Justice be annihilated, whenever the Speaker's warrant declares all its officers in contempt? How is it possible to distinguish the present case from those I have mentioned, if you must not examine the cause returned, but say it is sufficient, if a contempt is charged? Serjeant Hawkins, in his 2 vol. 110, gives us clearly enough his thoughts upon this subject; he says there, (among other things) that if a subject should be committed by either of the Houses of Parliament, it cannot be imagined that the law, which favours nothing more than the liberty of the subject, should give us a remedy against commitments by the King himself, appearing to be illegal, and give us no manner of redress against a commitment by our fellow-subjects, equally appearing to be unwarranted.

I think I have now sufficiently cleared this case from all the objections that can be brought against its being inquired into. The question therefore is, whether on the return there appears sufficient cause of detention? Three causes are mentioned, and all urged as breaches of privilege. 1. For discharging a printer; 2. For having signed a warrant for the commitment of the messenger; and 3. For holding him to bail.

To make the lord-mayor guilty of the first supposed contempt, it ought surely to appear to the Court, that Miller the printer was in the legal custody of the messenger: now, Miller never was in the legal custody of the messenger; for the warrant to take up Miller was directed to the serjeant at arms of the House of Commons, or his deputy, and not to the messenger, so that Miller was in the illegal custody of the messenger, therefore the lord-mayor did right.—Miller was ordered into the custody of the serjeant at arms, or his deputy, but the contrary appears upon the return, in the recital of the order; for that intimates, that he was taken into custody by the messenger, by virtue of the warrant of the Speaker of the House, issued under the order of the House. Miller was taken into custody by the messenger in the City of London, neither the serjeant at arms or his deputy being present; the messenger, I say, was guilty of false imprisonment, having no warrant directed to himself, nor acting in aid and assistance of the serjeant at arms, or his deputy, to whom the warrant to take up Miller was directed, for neither of them were present; so that if an action of false imprisonment was to be brought against the messenger, he could not justify what he has done; and if he cannot justify in an action of false imprisonment, how could he justify before the lord-mayor? As for the other supposed contempt, of signing a warrant against the messenger and holding him to bail; the messenger had been guilty of an assault and false imprisonment, in taking Miller the printer into custody, in the City of London, without any legal warrant or authority; what contempt is it to sign a warrant against the messenger?

Gould Justice.—The messenger was committed for having executed a warrant of the Speaker.

Serjeant Jephson.—That does not appear; your Lordships cannot know that; for the return only says, for signing a warrant against the messenger. For these reasons, I pray the lord-mayor may be discharged out of the custody of the Lieutenant of the Tower of London.

Lord Chief Justice de Grey.—If either myself, or any of my brothers on the Bench, had any doubt in this case, we should certainly have taken some time to consider, before we had given our opinions; but the case seems so very clear to us all, that we have no reason for delay.

The writ by which the lord-mayor is now brought before us, is a habeas corpus at common law, for it is not signed per statutum; it is called a prerogative writ for the King; or a remedial writ; and this writ was properly advised by the counsel for his Lordship, because all the Judges (including Holt) agreed, that such a writ as the present case required, is not within the statute: this is a writ by which the subject has a right of remedy to be discharged out of custody, if he hath been committed, and is detained contrary to law; therefore the Court must consider, whether the authority committing is a legal authority; if the commitment is made by those who have authority to commit, this Court cannot discharge or bail the party committed, nor can this Court admit to bail, one charged or committed in execution. Whether the authority committing the lord-mayor, is a legal authority or not, must be adjudged by the return of the writ now before the Court; the return states the commitment to be by the House of Commons, for a breach of privilege, which is also stated in the return; and this breach of privilege or contempt is, as the counsel has truly described it, threefold; discharging a printer in custody of a messenger by order of the House of Commons; signing a warrant for the commitment of the messenger, and holding him to bail; that is, treating a messenger of the House of Commons as acting criminally, in the execution of the orders of that House. In order to see whether that House has authority to commit, see Co. 4 Inst. 23. Such an assembly must certainly have such authority, and it is legal because necessary: Lord Coke says they have a judicial power; each member has a judicial seat in the House, he speaks of matters of judicature of the House of Commons. 4 Inst. 23. The House of Commons, without doubt, have power to commit persons examined at their Bar touching elections, when they prevaricate or speak falsly; so they have for breaches of privilege, so they have in many other cases. Thomas Long gave the Mayor of Westbury 41. to be elected a burgess; he was elected, and the mayor was fined and imprisoned, and Long removed. Arthur Hall, a member, was sent to the Tower, for publishing the conferences of the House. 4 Inst. 23. This power of committing must be inherent in the House of Commons, from the very nature of its institution, and therefore is part of the law of the land; they certainly always could commit in many cases: in matters of elections, they can commit sheriffs, mayors, officers, witnesses, &c. and it is now agreed that they can commit generally for all contempts. All contempts are either punishable in the Court contemned, or in some higher Court; now the Parliament has no Superior Court; therefore the contempts against either House can only be punished by themselves. The stat. 1 Jac. 1, cap. 13, sect. 3, sufficiently proves, that they have power to punish, it is in these words, viz. "Provided always, that this Act, or any thing therein contained, shall not extend to the diminishing of any punishment to be hereafter by censure in Parliament inflicted upon any person which hereafter shall make, or procure to be made, any such arrest as is aforesaid." So that it is most clear, the Legislature have recognized this power of the House of Commons. In the case of The Aylesbury men, the counsel admitted, Lord Chief Justice Holt owned, and the House of Lords acknowledged, that the House of Commons had power to commit for contempt and breach of privilege. Indeed, it seems, they must have power to commit for any crime, because they have power to impeach for any crime. When the House of Commons adjudge any thing to be a contempt, or a breach of privilege, their adjudication is a conviction, and their commitment in consequence, is execution; and no Court can discharge or bail a person that is in execution by the judgment of any other Court. The House of Commons therefore having an authority to commit, and that commitment being an execution, the question is, what can this Court do? It can do nothing when a person is in execution, by the judgment of a Court having a competent jurisdiction; in such case, this Court is not a Court of Appeal.

It is objected; 1, that the House of Commons are mistaken, for that they have not this power, this authority; 2, that supposing they have, yet in this case they have not used it rightly and properly; and 3, that the execution of their orders was irregular. In order to judge, I will consider the practice of the Courts in common and ordinary cases. I do not find any case where the Courts have taken cognizance of such execution, or of commitments of this kind; there is no precedent of Westminster-Hall interfering in such a case. In Sir J. Paston's case, 13 Rep. there is a case recited from the Year-Book, where it is held that every Court shall determine of the privilege of that Court; besides, the rule is, that the Court of remedy must judge by the same [law] as the Court which commits: now this Court cannot take cognizance of a commitment by the House of Commons, because it cannot judge by the same law; for the law by which the Commons judge of their privileges is unknown to us. If the Court of Common Pleas should commit a person for a contempt, the Court of King's Bench would not inquire into the legality or particular cause of commitment, if a contempt was returned; yet in some cases the Court of King’s Bench is a Court of inquiry, but in this case is only co-ordinate with this Court. In the case of Chambers, Cro. Car. 168, Chambers was brought up by habeas corpus out of the Fleet; and it was returned, that he was committed by virtue of a decree in the StarChamber, by reason of certain words he used at the council-table, &c. for which he was censured to be committed to the Fleet, till he made his submission at the council-table, and paid a fine of 20001. and at the Bar he prayed to be delivered, because the sentence was not warranted by any law or statute: for the Statute 3 Hen. 7, which is the foundation of the Court of StarChamber, doth not give them any authority to punish for words only. But all the Court informed him, that the Court of StarChamber was not erected by the Stat. 3 Hen. 7, but was a Court many years before, and one of the most high and honourable Courts of Justice; and to deliver one who was committed by the decree of one of the Courts of Justice, was not the usage of this Court, and therefore he was remanded. The Courts of B. R. or C. B. never discharged any person committed for contempt, in not answering in the Court of Chancery, if the return was for a contempt; if the Admiralty Court commits for a contempt, or one be taken up and committed on an excommunicato capiendo, this Court never discharges the persons committed. Formerly, when many abuses were committed, and the people could not obtain a remedy, the subject was not contented with the ancient habeas corpus, but did not complain of the Courts for refusing them what they could not by law grant them; instead of that, they sought redress by petition to the Throne. In Chief Justice Wilmot’s time, a person was brought by habeas corpus before this Court, who had been committed by the Court of Chancery of Durham; that Court being competent, and having jurisdiction, the man was not discharged, but recommitted. How then can we do any thing in the present case, when the law by which the lord-mayor is committed, is different from the law by which he seeks to be relieved? He is committed by the law of Parliament, and yet he would have redress from the common law; the law of Parliament is only known to Parliament-men, by experience in the House. Lord Coke says, Every man looks for it, but few can find it. The House of Commons only know how to act within their own limits; we are not a Court of Appeal; we do not know certainly the jurisdiction of the House of Commons; we cannot judge of the laws and privileges of the House, because we have no knowledge of those laws and privileges; we cannot judge of the contempts thereof, we cannot judge of the punishment therefore.

I wish we had some code of the law of Parliament; but till we have such a code, it is impossible we should be able to judge of it. Perhaps a contempt in the House of Commons, in the Chancery, in this Court, and in the Court of Durham, may be very different; therefore we cannot judge of it, but every Court must be sole judge of its own contempts. Besides, as the Court cannot go out of the return of this writ, how can we inquire into the truth of the fact, as to the nature of the contempt? We have no means of trying whether the lord-mayor did right or wrong: this Court cannot summon a jury to try the matter; we cannot examine into the fact; here are no parties in litigation before the Court: we cannot call in any body; we cannot hear any witnesses, or depositions of witnesses; we cannot issue any process; we are even now hearing ex parte, and without any counsel on the contrary side. Again, if we could determine upon the contempts of any other Court, so might the other Courts of Westminster-Hall; and what confusion would then ensue! none of us knowing the law by which persons are committed by the House of Commons. If three persons were committed for the same breach of privilege, and applied severally to different Courts, one Court perhaps would bail, another Court discharge, a third recommit.

Two objections have been made, which I own have great weight; because they hold forth, if pursued to all possible cases, consequences of most important mischief. 1st, it is said, that if the rights and privileges of Parliament are legal rights, for that very reason the Court must take notice of them, because they are legal. And 2dly, if the law of Parliament is part of the law of the land, the Judges must take cognizance of one part of the law of the land, as well as of the other. But these objections will not prevail. There are two sorts of privileges which ought never to be confounded; personal privilege, and the privilege belonging to the whole collective body of that assembly. For instance, it is the privilege of every individual member, not to be arrested; if he was arrested, before the Stat. 12 & 13 W. 3, the method in Westminster-Hall was, to discharge him by writ of privilege under the Great Seal, which was in the nature of a supersedeas to the proceedings; and as soon as it came into the Court of B. R. and was pleaded there, then it became a record, and the pleading concluded, si Curia domini Regis placitum praedictum cognoscere velit aut debeat. The Stat. 11 & 12 W. 3, has altered this, and there is now no occasion to plead the privilege of a member of Parliament. 2 Stran. 985, Holiday & Al. versus Colonel Pitt. There is a great difference between matters of privilege coming incidentally before the Court, and being the point itself directly before the Court; in the first case the Court will take notice of them, because it is necessary, in order to prevent a failure of justice; as in Lord

Banbury's case, where the Court of King's Bench determined against the determination of the House of Lords; but in that case they considered the legality and validity of the letters patent, without regarding the other right of a seat in the House of Lords, with which the Court did not concern themselves. The counsel at the Bar have not cited one case where any Court of this Hall ever determined a matter of privilege which did not come incidentally before them. If a question is to be determined in this Court touching a descent, whereby property is to be determined, and which depends upon legitimacy; that is, whether the father and mother were married lawfully; this Court must determine by the bishop's certificate; but in some cases, where the legitimacy of marriage does not come in question, but cohabitation only for a great length of time, which is evidence of a marriage, comes in question, this Court will determine according to the verdict of a jury, although the Courts of Westminster-Hall go by a different rule from the Spiritual Courts. But the present case differs much from those which the Court will determine; because it does not come incidentally before us, but is brought before us directly, and is the whole point in question; and to determine it, we must supersede the judgment and determination of the House of Commons, and a commitment in execution of that judgment.

Another objection has been made, which likewise holds out to us, if pursued in all its possible cases, some dreadful consequences; and that is, the abuses which may be made by jurisdictions from which there is no appeal, and for which abuses there is no remedy: but this is unavoidable; and it is better to leave some Courts to the obligation of their oaths. In the case of a commitment by this Court or the King's Bench, there is no appeal. Suppose the Court of B. R. sets an excessive fine upon a man for a misdemeanor; there is no remedy, no appeal to any other Court. We must depend upon the discretion of some Courts. A man not long ago was sentenced to stand in the pillory, by this Court of Common Pleas, for a contempt. Some may think this very hard, to be done without a trial by jury; but it is necessary. Suppose the Courts should abuse their jurisdiction, there can be no remedy for this: it would be a public grievance; and redress must be sought from the Legislature. The laws can never be a prohibition to the Houses of Parliament; because, by law, there is nothing superior to them. Suppose they also, as well as the Courts of Law, should abuse the powers which the constitution has given them, there is no redress, it would be a public grievance. The constitution has provided checks to prevent its happening; it must be left at large; it was wise to leave it at large: some persons, some Courts, must be trusted with discretionary powers; and though it is possible, it is in the highest degree improbable, that such abuses should ever happen, and the very supposal is answered by Serjeant Hawkins, in the place cited at the Bar. As for the case of the Chancery committing for crimes, that is a different thing, because the Chancery has no criminal jurisdiction; but if that Court commits for contempts, the persons committed will not be discharged by any other Court. Many authorities may be drawn from the reign of Charles, but those were in times of contest. At present, when the House of Commons commits for contempt, it is very necessary to state what is the particular breach of privilege; but it would be a sufficient return, to state the breach of privilege generally: this doctrine is fortified by the opinion of all the Judges, in the case of Lord Shaftesbury, and I never heard this decision complained of till 1704: though they were times of heat, the Judges could have no motive in their decision, but a regard to the laws: the Houses disputed about jurisdiction, but the Judges were not concerned in the dispute. As for the present case, I am perfectly satisfied, that if Lord Holt himself were to have determined it, the lord-mayor would be remanded. In the case of Mr. Murray, the Judges could not hesitate concerning the contempt by a man who refused to receive his sentence in a proper posture: all the Judges agreed, that he must be remanded, because he was committed by a Court having competent jurisdiction: Courts of Justice have no cognizance of the Acts of the Houses of Parliament, because they belong ad aliud examen. I have the most perfect satisfaction in my own mind in that determination. Sir Martin Wright, who felt a generous and distinguished warmth for the liberty of the subject; Mr. Justice Denison, who was so free from connections and ambition of every kind; and Mr. Justice Foster, who may be truly called the magna charta of liberty of persons, as well as fortunes; all these revered Judges concurred in this point: I am therefore clearly and with full satisfaction of opinion, that the lord-mayor must be remanded.

Gould Justice.—I entirely concur in opinion with my Lord Chief Justice, that this Court hath no cognizance of contempts or breach of privilege of the House of Commons: they are the only judges of their own privileges; and that they may be properly called judges, appears in 4 Inst. 47, where my Lord Coke says, an alien cannot be elected of the Parliament, because such a person can hold no place of judicature. Much stress has been laid upon an objection, that the warrant of the Speaker is not conformable to the order of the House, and yet no such thing appears upon the return, as has been pretended. The order says that the lord-mayor shall be taken into the custody of the serjeant or his deputy; it does not say, by the serjeant or his deputy. This Court cannot know the nature and power of the proceedings of the House of Commons; it is founded on a different law; the lex et consuetudo Parliamenti, is known to Parliament-men only. Trewynnard's case, Dier 59, 60. When matters of privilege come incidentally before the Court, it is obliged to determine them to prevent a failure of justice. It is true this Court did, in the instance alluded to by the counsel at the Bar, determine upon the privilege of Parliament in the case of a libel; but then that privilege was promulged and known; it existed in records and law-books, and was allowed by Parliament itself; but even in that case, we now know that we were mistaken, for the House of Commons have since determined, that privilege does not extend to matters of libel. The cases produced respecting the High Commission Court, &c. are not to the present purpose, because those Courts had not a legal authority; the resolution of the House of Commons is an adjudication, and every Court must judge of its own contempts.

Blackstone Justice.—I concur in opinion, that we cannot discharge the lord-mayor; the present case is of great importance, because the liberty of the subject is materially concerned. The House of Commons is a Supreme Court, and they are judges of their own privileges and contempts, more especially with respect to their own members: here is a member committed in execution by the judgment of his own House. All Courts, by which I mean to include the two Houses of Parliament, and the Courts of Westminster-Hall, can have no controul in matters of contempt. The sole adjudication of contempts, and the punishment thereof, in any manner, belongs exclusively, and without interfering, to each respective Court. Infinite confusion and disorder would follow, if Courts could by writ of habeas corpus, examine and determine the contempts of others. This power to commit results from the first principles of justice; for if they have power to decide; they ought to have power to punish: no other Court shall scan the judgment of a Superior Court, or the principal seat of justice; as I said before, it would occasion the utmost confusion, if every Court of this Hall should have power to examine the commitments of the other Courts of the Hall, for contempts; so that the judgment and commitment of each respective Court, as to contempts, must be final, and without controul. It is a confidence, that may, with perfect safety and security, be reposed in the Judges, and the Houses of Parliament. The Legislature since the Revolution (see 9 & 10 W. 3, c. 15) have created many new contempts. The objections which are brought of abusive consequences prove too much, because they are applicable to all Courts of dernier resort: et ab abusu ad usum non valent consequentia, is a maxim of law as well as of logic. General convenience must always outweigh partial inconvenience; even supposing (which, in my conscience, I am far from supposing) that in the present case the House has abused its power. I know, and am sure, that the House of Commons are both able and well inclined to do justice. How preposterous is the present murmur and complaint! the House of Commons have this power only in common with all the Courts of Westminster-Hall: and if any persons may be safely trusted with this power, they must surely be the Commons, who are chosen by the people; for their privileges and powers are the privileges and powers of the people. There is a great fallacy in my brother Glynn's whole argument, when he makes the question to be, whether the House have acted according to their rights or not? Can any good man think of involving the Judges in a contest with either House of Parliament, or with one another? and yet this manner of putting the question would produce such a contest. The House of Commons is the only judge of its own proceedings: Holt differed from the other Judges in this point, but we must be governed by the eleven, and not by the single one. It is a right inherent in all Supreme Courts: the House of Commons have always exercised it. Little nice objections of particular words and forms, and ceremonies of execution, are not to be regarded in the acts of the House of Commons; it is our duty to presume the orders of that House, and their execution, are according to law. The habeas corpus in Murray's case was at common law. I concur intirely with my Lord Chief Justice.

Nares Justice.—I shall ever entertain a most anxious concern for whatever regards the liberty of the subject; I have not the vanity to think I can add any thing to the weight of the arguments used by my Lord Chief Justice and my brothers: I have attended with the utmost industry, to every case and argument that has been produced, and most heartily and readily concur with my Lord Chief Justice and my brothers.

The lord-mayor was remanded to the Tower.

(b) By the statute of 31 Car. 2. cap. 2. such writ may issue in the vacation time on behalf of any person, who stands committed for any crime, (unless for felony or treason plainly exprest in the warrant of commitment, or as accessary before to any petit-treason, or felony, or upon suspicion thereof,) other than persons convict or in execution; for by that statute it is provided, "That if any such person, or any one on his behalf, complain to the lord chancellor or lord keeper, or any one of his majesty's justices either of the one bench or of the other, or the barons of the exchequer of the degree of the coif, and the said lord chancellor, &c. or any of them, upon view of the copy of the warrant of commitment or detainer, or otherwise upon oath made, that such copy was denied to be given by such person in whose custody the prisoner is detaind, are hereby authorizd [sic] and required under the penalty of 500 l. upon request made in writing by such person or any on his behalf, attested and subscribed by two witnesses, who where present at the delivery of the same, to award an habeas corpus under the seal of such court, whereof he shall then be one of the judges, to be directed to the officer, in whose custody the party so committed or detained shall be, returnable immediatè before the said lord chancellor or such justice, &c. and upon service thereof, as aforesaid, the officer or his under officer shall (within three days after such service, if not beyond the distance of twenty miles, or ten days, if above twenty miles, and not beyond the distance of an hundred miles, or twenty days, if above the distance of one hundred miles,) under the penalty of 100 l. bring such prisoner before the said lord chancellor, or such justice, &c. before whom the said writ is made returnable, and in case of his absence before any other of them, with the return of such writ and the true causes of the commitment and detainer, and thereupon, within two days after the party shall be brought before them, the said lord chancellor, &c. before whom the prisoner shall be brought, as aforesaid, shall discharge him from his imprisonment, taking his recognizance with one or more sureties in any sum according to their discretions, having regard to the quality of the prisoner, and nature of the offense, for his appearance in the court of king's bench the term following, or at the next assizes, &c. or in such other court, where the said offense is properly cognizable, as the case shall require, and then shall certify the said writ with the return thereof, and the said recognizances into the said court, unless it shall appear unto the said lord chancellor, &c. that the party so committed is detained upon a legal process, order, or warrant out of some court, that hath jurisdiction of criminal matters, or by some warrant signed and sealed with the hand and seal of any of the said justices, or barons, or some justice of the peace for such matters or offences, for which by law the prisoner is not bailable.

"No person to be intitled to the benefit hereof, unless he first pay or cause to be paid or tenderd the charges of bringing, to be ascertained by the judge or court, that awarded the writ, and indorsed thereon, not exceeding 12 d. per mile, and give security by his own bond to pay the charges of carrying back, if remanded by the court or judge, and that he will not make any escape by the way."

It is further provided by this statute, "That no person set at large upon any habeas corpus shall be recommitted for the same offense, but by order of court having jurisdiction of the cause; any person knowingly offending herein to forfeit 500 l."

This writ to run into counties palatine and privileged places.

"That no subject to England be sent prisoner into Scotland, or any place beyond the sea, either within or without his Majesty's dominions, under the penalty of a praemunire, except persons orderd to be transported, or offenders sent to be tried, where their offenses were committed.

"That after the assizes proclaimed and during the continuance thereof no prisoner be removed but before the judge of assise in open court, nor at any other time, but by habeas corpus, or other legal writ, except where the prisoner is delivered to the constable, &c. to be carried to the common gaol; or where any person is sent by order of any judge of assise, or justice of peace, to any common workhouse or house of correction; or is removed from one place to another within the same county in order for his trial or discharge in due course of Law; or in case of sudden fire, infection, or other necessity."

(d) If upon this Writ a Civil Action, and also a Matter of Crime be returned; as if a Person be arrested for Debt, and also charged with a Warrant of a Justice of Peace for Felony. 1. If it appear to the Judge or Court, that the Arrest for Debt, or other Civil Action, is fraudulent, they may remand him. 2. If it be found Real, they may commit him to the King's Bench with his Causes, tho' they are Matters of Crime; for that Court hath Conusance as well of the Crime as of the Civil Action; but then in the Term the Court may take his Appearance or Bail to the Civil Action, and remand him, if they see Cause, as to the Crime to be proceeded on below; but upon the Writ ad faciendum & recipiendum, there ought not singly a Matter of Crime to be returned, for that belongs to the Habeas Corpus ad Subjiciendum. 2 Hal. * This Statute means Certioraries, by the Words (other Writs,) and it is remarkable, that the Thing complained of there is not that the Writs were used, when in Truth they did not lie, but that an Abuse was made of them, viz. that they were brought after Trial; and therefore it provides, that no Certiorari or Habeas Corpus shall be brought or allowed, unless it be delivered before the Jury sworn. And again, the Stat. of 21 Jac. 1. cap. 23. takes Notice of Certiotari, and only complains of the oppressive Manner of using them, viz. after the Party had proceeded a considerable Way below, and likewise where the Certiorari or Habeas Corpus is not delivered before Issue joined, so that it be not joined in six Weeks after, &c. both which Statutes shew this Writ was lawful, but abused, and the Abuses are only cured; And if the Writ were not legal, the Parliament would have condemned it as well as the Abuse of it; Per Holt Ch. 1 Nullus liber homo, &c.

"And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that the several penalties inflicted by this Act shall be recovered by the party grieved, his or her executors or administrators, against the offender, his or her executors or administrators, in like manner as the penalties inflicted by the said Act are to be recovered.

"And, to the intent that no person may pretend ignorance of the import of any such writ, be it enacted, that all writs of habeas corpus, awarded or to be returned under the authority of this Act, shall be marked by the Court, or person respectively awarding the same, in this manner:

" 'By an Act passed in the thirty-first year of the reign of King George the Second.' And shall also be signed by order of the Court, or by the person respectively awarding the same.

"And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that if any action, plaint, suit, or information, shall be commenced or prosecuted against any person or persons for any offence against this Act, the same shall be commenced within twelve calendar months after the time of the offence committed, unless the party grieved be then under confinement or restraint; and if he or she shall be then under confinement or restraint, then within the space of twelve calendar months after the decease of the party so confined or restrained, or his or her delivery from such confinement or restraint, which shall first happen; and such person or persons so sued in any Court whatsoever, shall and may plead the general issue, not guilty, or that he or she owes nothing; and upon any issue joined, may give the special matter in evidence: and if the plaintiff or prosecutor shall become nonsuit, or forbear further prosecution, or suffer a discontinuance; or if a verdict pass against him or her, the defendant shall recover his or her costs; for which he or she shall have the like remedy as in any case where costs by the law are given to defendants."

(a) The following was found among Sir Eardley Wilmot's Papers, endorsed by him, "State of the case on the Press Act. April 1758."

"A little before Hilary term twelvemonth, some applications having been made to Mr. Justice Foster by persons in the Savoy, raised under the annual Act then in force, viz. 29 Geo. II. c. 4, for the speedy and effectually recruiting of His Majesty's Land Forces and Marines, he issued writs of habeas corpus, upon which the men were brought up, and let go by acquiescence or consent, without any return ever being made: but conceiving it to be a matter of doubt and consequence how to proceed in such cases, he desired the assistance of all the other Judges of the Court of King's Bench, to consider the said Act and what ought to be done.

"All the Judges of the Court accordingly met, and the great object of their deliberation was how they might relieve with expedition and effect, in case the great power given by the Act was abused, without defeating the end of the Act and the view of the Legislature where the power was not abused.

"They considered the matter together and separately; they talked with some of the most eminent counsel, and it has since been sifted to the bottom. The more it is examined, the more it will be found that what the Court did, was not only the best, but the sole remedy that could be devised to relieve the subject under immediate oppression from an abuse of the great power given by that Act, until the Parliament should expressly declare their pleasure in the new bill for the next year, which, from the ordinary course of business, was expected to pass in about six weeks or two months. To shew this, it may be proper,

"1st. To consider the nature of the Act.

"2d. How men, wronged by the commissioners in the first instance, might afterwards be speedily and effectually relieved.

"1st.—The Act is founded in the violation of private liberty; and the cause alledged for such violation, is the want of a speedy and effectual recruit.

"There cannot be a speedy and effectual recruit, unless the law receives a speedy and immediate execution; therefore the Parliament entrusted commissioners, named by the Act, to execute the powers therein mentioned.

"The power given to the commissioners, is to change the condition of men, under certain descriptions, into the condition of soldiers, against their will.

"The Act requires several circumstances to be observed before the condition of the recruit is to be completely changed: but when those circumstances are observed, the Act declares him a soldier to all intents and purposes whatsoever.

“The custody or imprisonment in any secure place, whether private house or prison authorized by the Act, is temporary, casual, and a mere consequence of the man’s condition being changed into that of a soldier. It is only a detention, to secure him till he can join the corps; and gives him no other right to controvert his being a soldier, than he would be entitled to when he has joined the corps.

“It seems from the words and meaning of the Act, that where all the circumstances have been observed, the persons under whose care or authority the recruit happens to be delivered, are authorized to treat him as a soldier, to all intents and purposes, without being obliged to prove him within the description.

“1st. From the words:—

“Every clause is studiously penned, to avoid the possibility of a supposition that the recruit’s being within the description was necessary to be proved by every person to whom he was delivered, and that the change of his condition was for ever to depend upon proving that he was within such description.

“The parish officers are directed ‘to bring before the commissioners all such persons as they can find, who are or shall appear to them to be within the description of the Act.’

“And the commissioners are strictly to examine all such persons as shall be so brought before them; and if, upon examination, they shall find that such persons shall come within the descriptions therein mentioned; and the commissioners, and the officer who shall be appointed to receive the recruits, shall judge them to be such as shall be thereby intended to be entertained as soldiers in His Majesty’s service, then the commissioners are to cause such persons to be delivered over to the person appointed to receive them.

“The clause enabling the parish officers, after the second meeting of the commissioners, to take up and detain, without any warrant, such persons as they should find, or should appear to them to be within the description of the Act, directs the lifting and delivering of them over at the next meeting, if judged within the description of the Act.

“The clause relating to the age, size, religion, and bodily condition of the recruits, refers to what shall appear in the opinion of the commissioners and officer appointed to receive them.

“The clause relating to the voters, is conceived in such terms as shews the validity of the lifting was not to depend upon the right to vote; but upon the recruits making it appear to the satisfaction of the commissioners then present, that he had a right to vote.

“After reading the Articles of War, the Act says, ‘He shall be deemed a soldier to all intents and purposes, and shall be subject to the discipline of war, and in case of desertion, shall be proceeded against as a deserter.’

“The Acts directs many entries to be made; but directs no entry of the examination or grounds upon which the commissioners find him to be within the description of the Act.

“2dly. From the intention of the Act.

“The cause of the Act was a speedy and effectual recruit; but after all the trouble and expence the public has been at, they would scarce have the benefit of a single man against his will, if the persons to whom he is delivered, were obliged to prove him within the description: they are strangers to the proof upon which the commissioners proceeded; and if they knew it, they could not avail themselves of the same kind of proof, which the Act authorizes the commissioners to receive; for they are warranted by the Act to proceed upon the examination of the persons themselves, and to judge from what they do or do not say; but a person cannot be examined against himself in any legal proceeding.

“No officer could inquire into the qualifications of recruits brought from all parts of the kingdom. In what condition must they be, if they could not justify treating or punishing the recruit as a soldier, without proving he was within the description?

“Upon the perusal of the Pressing Acts which passed in Queen Anne’s reign, many observations occur:

“The 5th of Queen Anne gives a power of review to the commissioners, at any time, which was not in the former Acts.

“The 7th of Queen Anne omits the power of review; and the proviso as to voters is varied, and describes such persons as shall make it appear that they have a vote.

“The 10th of Queen Anne is the same as the 7th; but restores the clause of review, limiting it to six weeks.

“The clause of review was omitted in the 29th George II. and in all the Acts made in this King’s reign, before the 29th George II.

“The execution of the special powers given by this Act, for the purposes therein mentioned, is like no other case whatsoever. It is not like a conviction: it is not in writing: it is not by way of punishment for an offence. There is no other evidence required than what the man says, or does not say, upon his examination. If it was to be compared to an order, then the evidence need not be set forth; and there never was an instance, upon any of those Acts, of an application for a certiorari.

This being the nature and intent of the Act;

“2d.—The second question is, what relief a man, who complained that he was wrongfully pressed by the commissioners, could have by writ of habeas corpus?

“When he was at liberty, with the regiment to which he was delivered, he could have no habeas corpus. If he happens to be secured in a private house, or public prison, or other safe place, the accidental custody gives a pretext to apply for a habeas corpus to be set at large from that restraint.

“The officer or keeper must in his return, either aver, not only that all the circumstances required by the Act were observed, but that the man was within the description; or else, that all the circumstances were observed, and rely upon them as a sufficient cause and justification, without averring the man to be within the description.

“The first form of return could only be made upon the credit of what the commissioners had done, and a presumption that they had done right.

“It is impossible for the officer or gaoler to proceed upon any other ground; and in execution of the trust reposed in him, he ought to give credit to their judgment, and proceed upon that foundation.

“In this case, the only remedy of the recruit would be an action for a false return; and no jury would give more than trifling damages against an officer acting ‘bonâ fide,’ and making a return in support of the trust which was reposed in him, the truth of which he could no otherwise come to the knowledge of.

“Suppose the return made in the other form, the observations before mentioned tend to shew that it would be sufficient. In that case, no man who admitted all the circumstances in the Act to have been observed, could be entitled to relief by habeas corpus; because upon his own shewing there appeared sufficient cause.

“In this form the King’s Counsel had prepared and settled the draft of a return: suppose that form not sufficient; the other must have been followed of course, as the only one possible to be made by the officer or gaoler.

“But to go farther; suppose the man set at large by virtue of the habeas corpus, from the custody of his temporary keeper for want of cause, or sufficient cause, shewn by the officer or gaoler, or upon any other reason; he would be in no better condition than if he had never been secured at all, and would be liable to be taken up, prosecuted, and shot for desertion.

“The end of the habeas corpus is only to set him loose from the custody, not to determine whether he is a soldier. The merits of that question could not be determined in proceeding upon a writ of habeas corpus against the gaoler or temporary keeper. The gaoler’s acquiescence to let men go, by making no defence to a writ of habeas corpus, could no more release them from being soldiers, than his voluntarily giving them leave to go.

“In this light, a discharge by habeas corpus, for want of defence by the keeper, might be a cruel snare to poor and ignorant men: no effectual relief can be given, but in some way which may, as between proper parties, decide the question whether the man’s condition was changed into that of a soldier. If such a way cannot be devised, a recruit so raised by the commissioners, must be absolutely without remedy.

“In other cases, if a man be treated as a soldier, who is not duly lifted or subject to military discipline, he has his action; nay, the officer who so treats him, may, according to the nature of the case, be criminally liable. But where a man is raised under the Act by the commissioners, though wrongfully, yet, the circumstances of the Act being observed, it is a sufficient justification for treating him as a soldier. The officer is a stranger to the grounds upon which the commissioners proceeded.

“Diligent inquiry has been made into the practice under the former annual Acts of the like kind, and no cases have been discovered of more than two or three instances, from the 2d of Queen Anne to the year 1746, of applications for writs of habeas corpus, by men pressed under the authority given by any of the Acts during that period.

“Only one return has been found, The Queen and Chamberlayne; and there, upon the face of the return, the Court sent the man back without any other inquiry.

“In the year 1746, in the case of King and White, the Lieutenant of the Tower made a return in the same form.

“It was impossible to say the return was not sufficient. The Court could not admit affidavits to contradict the return; for though in the case of a wife, where the cause is totally immaterial; or of a lunatic, where no legal custody under a commission is returned, affidavits may have been let in for collateral purposes; yet the truth of a return, setting forth the execution of a special authority, jurisdiction, or power, cannot be contradicted by affidavits. It is contrary to all the principles and authorities of law; and in the year 1746 there never had existed an instance.

“Had the Court then made a precedent to contradict the truth of the facts contained in a return by affidavits, it could only have been justified by the end; but it would have been dangerous, as a deviation from a general rule of law, and applicable to other eases.

“The Court took another way: upon reading affidavits, they made a rule upon the commissioners to shew cause; and for want of cause being shewn, discharged the man. After a sufficient return to the habeas corpus, the use of the writ was at an end. No relief could be given by it. The relief was given in consequence of the rule, and by virtue of the rule only.

“We were glad to follow and improve the plan of this precedent, by directing notice likewise to be given to the officers of the Crown, that Mr. Attorney General might be heard in behalf of His Majesty. The King, in behalf of the public, is alone concerned in the question, whether the recruit’s condition be changed into that of a soldier.

“If that question were determined in any method where the King was really, not nominally a party, and by his officers substantially heard or consenting; we thought the man might be discharged from the condition of a soldier, and set at liberty.

“An intimation was given to the practisers, and also in Court, of the Judges conference.

“In the first case, the then Attorney General being ill, Mr. Solicitor General came into Coart and declared on behalf of the Crown, that there was no objection to discharging such men as should appear to the Court to have been unjustly pressed.

“No person ever applied afterwards for a habeas corpus, who, upon being asked which he meant, did not change his application into a motion for the rule.

“No counsel desired to argue the question, whether they ought not to have a habeas corpus instead of the rule; if they had, they would certainly have been heard; had it been insisted upon, for the more solemn determination of the question, a habeas corpus would have been granted; but it would have been cruel to the particular person not to have given notice of the result of the consultation among the Judges, or to have put a poor man to the delay and expence of litigating a point, contrary to the opinion the Court had once conceived, when he had another and easy remedy.

“The consent given on the part of the Crown was never retracted; the most eminent counsel who practise in the Court of King’s Bench, have publicly averred, that the Court in fact never refused a writ of habeas corpus to any pressed man in custody; and no man, who pretended to know any thing of the matter, has from his own knowledge said the contrary. The Legislature, by the bill now in force, made alterations tending to explain the law in the same way; for they have directed that the commissioners should levy such able bodied men, who could not, upon examination, prove themselves not to be within the description of the Act.

“They have given a power of review to the commissioners themselves within ten days; and if the recruit is discharged, the levy money is directed to be returned; and they have likewise prescribed a particular form of entries to be made in columns; but no entry is required of the proof or examination upon which the recruit is raised.

“By this Act the Legislature gave more than a silent sanction to what the Court has done, and strengthened the reasons for pursuing it. There is now depending a case upon the rule, in which no habeas corpus could possibly have issued.”

(a)2 Lords Journals, 29th vol. p. 353.

(a)3 Which “bill” was as follows: “Whereas the writ of habeas corpus hath, in all times, been deemed to be the most effectual security for the liberty of the subject, against every kind of wrongful imprisonment or restraint: and whereas any delay in the awarding or returning of such writ may be attended with the most fatal consequences to the person under restraint; and, by reason of such delay, the relief intended to be given may come too late for such person to be discharged from his restraint, or to receive any benefit from such writ; be it therefore enacted by the King’s Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that the several provisions which, by an Act made in the thirty-first year of King Charles the Second, intituled, ‘An Act for the Better Securing the Liberty of the Subject, and for Prevention of Imprisonment beyond the Seas,’ are made for the awarding of writs of habeas corpus, in cases of commitment or detainer for any criminal or supposed criminal matter, shall, in like manner, extend to all cases where any person, not being committed or detained for any criminal or supposed criminal matter, shall be confined or restrained of his or her liberty, under any colour or pretence whatsoever; and that upon oath being made by such person so confined or restrained, or by any other on his or her behalf, of any actual confinement or restraint, and that such confinement or restraint, to the best of the knowledge and belief of the person so applying, is not by virtue of any commitment or detainer for any criminal or supposed criminal matter; an habeas corpus directed to the person or persons so confining or restraining the party as aforesaid, shall be awarded and granted in the same manner as is directed, and under the same penalties as are provided, by the said Act, in the ease of persons committed or detained for any criminal or supposed criminal matter; and that the person or persons before whom the party so confined or restrained shall be brought by virtue of any habeas corpus granted in the vacation time under the authority of this Act, may and shall, within three days after the return made, proceed to examine into the facts contained in such return, and into the cause of such confinement or restraint; and thereupon either discharge, or bail, or remand the parties so brought, as the case shall require, and as to justice shall appertain.

“And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that whensoever any writ of habeas corpus, granted either in term or vacation time, on the behalf of any party so confined or restrained without a commitment for any criminal or supposed criminal matter, shall be served upon the person so confining or restraining such party, or shall be left at the place where such party shall be so confined or restrained, the person so confining or restraining such party shall make return of such writ, and bring or cause to be brought the body or bodies, according to the command thereof, within the respective times limited, and under the provisions prescribed by the said Act to sheriffs and other officers, in case of commitment or detainer for criminal or supposed criminal matters; and every such person neglecting or refusing so to make return of such writ, or to bring or cause to be brought the body or bodies, according to the command thereof, within the times respectively limited, and under the provisions prescribed by the said Act to sheriffs and other officers, shall be guilty of a contempt of the Court under the seal of which the said writ of habeas corpus shall issue; and shall also for the first offence, forfeit to the party grieved the sum of three hundred pounds, and for the second offence, the sum of five hundred pounds.

18.1.2STATE CONSTITUTIONS AND LAWS; COLONIAL CHARTERS AND LAWS

18.1.2.1Connecticut

18.1.2.1.aDeclaration of Rights, 1776

An Act containing an Abstract and Declaration of the Rights and Privileges of the People of this State, and securing the same.

THE People of this State, being by the Providence of God, free and independent, have the sole and exclusive Right of governing themselves as a free, sovereign, and independent State; and having from their Ancesters derived a free and excellent Constitution of Government, whereby the Legislature depends on the free and annual Election of the People, they have the best Security for the Preservation of their civil and religious Rights and Liberties. And for as much as the free Fruition of such Liberties and Privileges as Humanity, Civility and Christianity call for, as is due to every Man in his Place and Proportion, without Impeachment, and Infringement, hath ever been, and will be the Tranquility and Stability of Churches and Commonwealths; and the denial thereof, the Disturbance, if not the Ruin of both.[1]

That all the free Inhabitants of this or any other of the United States of America, and Foreigners in Amity with this State, shall enjoy the same Justice and Law within this State, which is general for the State, in all Cases, proper for the Cognizance of the Civil Authority and Courts of Judicature within the same, and the without Partiality or Delay.[2]

Connecticut Acts, 1786, pp. 1–2.

18.1.2.1.bAct for Promoting and Encouraging the Commerce of this State, 1784

Be it further enacted by the Authority aforesaid, That Foreigners and Citizens of any of the United States, who shall come into or reside in either of said Ports or Cities, shall be holden to pay no other or greater Duties or Taxes, than the Citizens of this State residing in said Cities, shall by Law be holden to pay.[3]

Connecticut Acts, 1786, p. 268.

18.1.2.2Delaware

18.1.2.2.aCharter of Privileges, 1701

The Charter of Privileges, granted by William Penn, esq. to the inhabitants of Pennsylvania, and territories.

WILLIAM PENN, Proprietary and Governor of the province of Pennsylvania and territories thereunto belonging, to all to whom these presents shall come, sendeth greeting.[4]

And whereas, for the encouragement of all the freemen and planters, that might be concerned in the said province and territories, and for the good government thereof, I the said William Penn, in the year One Thousand Six Hundred Eighty and Three, for me, my heirs and assigns, did grant and confirm unto all the freemen, planters and adventurers therein, divers liberties, franchises and properties, as by the said grant, entituled, The frame of the government of the province of Pennsylvania, and territories thereunto belonging, in America, may appear;

Know ye therefore, That for the further well being and good government of the said province, and territories; and in pursuance of the rights and powers before mentioned, I the said William Penn do declare, grant and confirm, unto all the freemen, planters and adventurers, and other inhabitants in this province and territories, these following liberties, franchises and privileges, so far as in me lieth, to be held, enjoyed and kept, by the freemen, planters and adventurers, and other inhabitants of and in the said province and territories thereunto annexed, for ever.

I. Because no people can be truly happy, though under the greatest enjoyment of civil liberties, if abridged of the freedom of their consciences, as to their religious profession and worship: And Almighty God being the only Lord of conscience, Father of lights and spirits; and the Author as well as Object of all divine knowledge, faith and worship, who only doth enlighten the minds, and persuade and convince the understandings of people, I do hereby grant and declare, That no person or persons, inhabiting in this province or territories, who shall confess and acknowledge One Almighty God, the Creator, Upholder and Ruler of the world; and profess him or themselves obliged to live quietly under the civil government, shall be in any case molested or prejudiced, in his or their person or estate, because of his or their conscientious persuasion or practice, nor be compelled to frequent or maintain any religious worship, place or ministry, contrary to his or their mind, or to do or suffer any other act or thing, contrary to their religious persuasion.[5]

And that all persons who also profess to believe in Jesus Christ, the Saviour of the world, shall be capable (notwithstanding their other persuasions and practices in point of conscience and religion) to serve this government in any capacity, both Legislatively and Executively, he or they solemnly promising, when lawfully required, allegiance to the King as Sovereign, and fidelity to the Proprietary and Governor, and taking the attests as now established by the law made at New-Castle, in the year One Thousand and Seven Hundred, entitled, An act directing the attests of several officers and ministers, as now amended and confirmed this present Assembly.[6]

II. For the well governing of this province and territories, there shall be an Assembly yearly chosen, by the freemen thereof,[7]

Which Assembly shall have power to chuse a Speaker and other their officers; and shall be judges of the qualifications and elections of their own Members; sit upon their own adjournments; appoint Committees; prepare bills in order to pass into laws; impeach criminals, and redress grievances; and shall have all other powers and privileges of an Assembly, according to the rights of the freeborn subjects of England, and as is usual in any of the King’s plantations in America.[8]

V. That all criminals shall have the same privileges of witnesses and council as their prosecutors.[9]

VI. That no person or persons shall or may, at any time hereafter, be obliged to answer any complaint, matter or thing whatsoever, relating to property, before the Governor and Council, or in any other place, but in ordinary course of justice, unless appeals thereunto shall be hereafter by law appointed.[10]

VII. That no person within this government, shall be licensed by the Governor to keep an ordinary, tavern, or house of public entertainment, but such who are first recommended to him, under the hands of the Justices of the respective counties, signed in open court; which Justices are and shall be hereby impowered, to suppress and forbid any person keeping such public house as aforesaid, upon their misbehaviour, on such penalties as the law doth or shall direct; and to recommend others, from time to time, as they shall see occasion.[11]

VIII. If any person, through temptation or melancholy, shall destroy himself, his estate, real and personal, shall notwithstanding descend to his wife and children, or relations, as if he had died a natural death; and if any person shall be destroyed or killed by casualty or accident, there shall be no forfeiture to the Governor by reason thereof.[12]

And no act, law or ordinance whatsoever, shall at any time hereafter, be made or done, to alter, change or diminish the form or effect of this charter, or of any part or clause therein, contrary to the true intent and meaning thereof, without the consent of the Governor for the time being, and six parts of seven of the Assembly met.[13]

But, because the happiness of mankind depends so much upon the enjoying of liberty of their consciences, as aforesaid, I do hereby solemnly declare, promise and grant, for me, my heirs and assigns, That the first article of this charter relating to liberty of conscience, and every part and clause therein; according to the true intent and meaning thereof, shall be kept and remain, without any alteration, inviolably for ever.[14]

And lastly, I the said William Penn, Proprietary and Governor of the province of Pennsylvania, and territories thereunto belonging, for myself, my heirs and assigns, have solemnly declared, granted and confirmed, and do hereby solemnly declare, grant and confirm, That neither I, my heirs or assigns, shall procure or do any thing or things whereby the liberties in this charter contained and expressed, nor any part thereof, shall be infringed or broken: And if any thing shall be procured or done, by any person or persons, contrary to these presents, it shall be held of no force or effect.[15]

18.1.2.3Georgia

18.1.2.3.aCharter, 1732

GEORGE the second, by the grace of God, of Great Britain, France and Ireland, king, defender of the faith, and so forth. To all to whom these presents shall come, greeting.

Whereas we are credibly informed, that many of our poor subjects are, through misfortunes and want of employment, reduced to great necessity, insomuch as by their labor they are not able to provide a maintenance for themselves and families; and if they had means to defray their charges of passage, and other expences, incident to new settlements, they would be glad to settle in any of our provinces in America where by cultivating the lands, at present waste and desolate, they might not only gain a comfortable subsistence for themselves and families, but also strengthen our colonies and increase the trade, navigation and wealth of these our realms. And whereas our provinces in North America, have been frequently ravaged by Indian enemies; more especially that of South-Carolina, which in the late war, by the neighboring savages, was laid waste by fire and sword, and great numbers of English inhabitants, miserably massacred, and our loving subjects who now inhabit them, by reason of the smallness of their numbers, will in case of a new war, be exposed to the late calamities; inasmuch as their whole southern frontier continueth unsettled, and lieth open to the said savages—And whereas we think it highly becoming our crown and royal dignity, to protect all our loving subjects, be they never so distant from us; to extend our fatherly compassion even to the meanest and most infatuated of our people, and to relieve the wants of our above mentioned poor subjects; and that it will be highly conducive for accomplishing those ends, that a regular colony of the said poor people be settled and established in the southern territories of Carolina. And whereas we have been well assured, that if we will be graciously pleased to erect and settle a corporation, for the receiving, managing and disposing of the contributions of our loving subjects; divers persons would be induced to contribute to the purposes aforesaid—Know ye therefore, that we have, for the considerations aforesaid, and for the better and more orderly carrying on of the said good purposes; of our special grace, certain knowledge and mere motion, willed, ordained, constituted and appointed, and by these presents, for us, our heirs and successors, do will, ordain, constitute, declare and grant, that our right trusty and well beloved John, lord-viscount Purcival, of our kingdom of Ireland, our trusty and well beloved Edward Digby, George Carpenter, James Oglethorpe, George Heathcote, Thomas Tower, Robert Moore, Robert Hucks, Roger Holland, William Sloper, Francis Eyles, John Laroche, James Vernon, William Beletha, esquires, A. M. John Burton, B. D. Richard Bundy, A. M. Arthur Bedford, A. M. Samuel Smith, A. M. Adam Anderson and Thomas Corane, gentlemen; and such other persons as shall be elected in the manner herein after mentioned, and their successors to be elected in the manner herein after directed; be, and shall be one body politic and corporate, in deed and in name, by the name of the Trustees for establishing the colony of Georgia in America; and them and their successors by the same name, we do, by these presents, for us, our heirs and successors, really and fully make, ordain, constitute and declare, to be one body politic in deed and in name forever; and that by the same name, they and their successors, shall and may have perpetual succession; and that they and their successors by that name shall and may forever hereafter, be persons able and capable in the law, to purchase, have, take, receive and enjoy, to them and their successors, any manors, messuages, lands, tenements, rents, advowsons, liberties, privileges, jurisdictions, franchises, and other hereditaments whatsoever, lying and being in Great Britain, or any part thereof, of whatsoever nature, kind or quality, or value they be, in fee and in perpetuity, not exceeding the yearly value of one thousand pounds, beyond reprises; also estates for lives, and for years, and all other manner of goods, chattels and things whatsoever they be; for the better settling and supporting, and maintaining the said colony, and other uses aforesaid;

—Know ye, that we greatly desiring the happy success of the said corporation, for their further encouragement in accomplishing so excellent a work have of our aforesaid grace, certain knowledge and mere motion, given and granted by these presents, for us, our heirs and successors, do give and grant to the said corporation and their successors under the reservation, limitation and declaration, hereafter expressed, seven undivided parts, the whole in eight equal parts to be divided, of all those lands, countrys and territories, situate, lying and being in that part of South-Carolina, in America, which lies from the most northern part of a stream or river there, commonly called the Savannah, all along the sea coast to the southward, unto the most southern stream of a certain other great water or river called the Alatamaha, and westterly from the heads of the said rivers respectively, in direct lines to the south seas; and all that share, circuit and precinct of land, within the said boundaries, with the islands on the sea, lying opposite to the eastern coast of the said lands, within twenty leagues of the same, which are not inhabited already, or settled by any authority derived from the crown of Great-Britain: together with all the soils, grounds, havens, ports, gulfs and bays, mines, as well royal mines of gold and silver, as other minerals, precious stones, quarries, woods, rivers, waters, fishings, as well royal fishings of whale and sturgeon as other fishings, pearls, commodities, jurisdictions, royalties, franchises, privileges and preeminences within the said frontiers and precincts thereof and thereunto, in any sort belonging or appertaining, and which we by our letters patent may or can grant, and in as ample manner and sort as we may or any of our royal progenitors have hitherto granted to any company, body politic or corporate, or to any adventurer or adventurers, undertaker or undertakers, of any discoveries, plantations or traffic, of, in, or unto any foreign parts whatsoever; and in as legal and ample manner, as if the same were herein particularly mentioned and expressed: to have, hold, possess and enjoy, the said seven undivided parts, the whole into eight equal parts, to be divided as aforesaid, of all and singular the lands, countries and territories, with all and singular other the premises herein before by these presents granted or mentioned, or intended to be granted to them, the said corporation, and their successors forever, for the better support of the said colony, to be holden of us, our heirs and successors,

18.1.2.3.bConstitution, 1777

Whereas the conduct of the legislature of Great-Britain for many years past, has been so oppressive on the people of America, that of late years, they have plainly declared, and asserted a right to raise taxes upon the people of America, and to make laws to bind them in all cases whatsoever, without their consent; which conduct being repugnant to the common rights of mankind, hath obliged the Americans, as freemen, to oppose such oppressive measures, and to assert the rights and privileges they are entitled to, by the laws of nature and reason; and accordingly it hath been done by the general consent of all the people of the States of New-Hampshire, Massachusetts-Bay, Rhode-Island, Connecticut, New-York, New-Jersey, Pennsylvania, the counties of New-Castle, Kent, and Sussex on Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North-Carolina, South-Carolina, and Georgia, given by their representatives met together in General Congress, in the city of Philadelphia;

We therefore the representatives of the people, from whom all power originates, and for whose benefit all government is intended, by virtue of the power delegated to us, Do ordain and declare, and it is hereby ordained and declared, that the following rules and regulations be adopted for the future government of this State.

ART. XXIV. The governor's oath:

"I, A B, elected governor of the State of Georgia, by the representatives thereof, do solemnly promise and swear, that I will, during the term of my appointment, to the best of my skill and judgment, execute the said office faithfully and conscientiously, according to law, without favor, affection, or partiality; that I will, to the utmost of my power, support, maintain, and defend the State of Georgia, and the constitution of the same; and use my utmost endeavors to protect the people thereof in the secure enjoyment of all their rights, franchises and privileges; and that the laws and ordinances of the State be duly observed, and that law and justice in mercy be executed in all judgments. And I do further solemnly promise and swear, that I will peaceably and quietly resign the government to which I have been elected, at the period to which my continuance in the said office is limited by the constitution: And, lastly, I do also solemnly swear, that I have not accepted of the government whereunto I am elected, contrary to the articles of this constitution. So help me God."

ART. LVIII. No person shall be allowed to plead in the courts of law in this State, except those who are authorized so to do by the house of assembly; and if any person so authorized shall be found guilty of mal-practice [sic] before the house of assembly, they shall have power to suspend them. This is not intended to exclude any person from that inherent privilege of every freeman, the liberty to plead his own cause.

18.1.2.4.aCharter, 1632

Charles, by the Grace of God, of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, king, Defender of the Faith, &c. To all to whom these Presents come, Greeting.

II. Whereas our well beloved and right trusty Subject Caecilius Calvert, Baron of Baltimore, in our Kingdom of Ireland, Son and Heir of George Calvert, Knight, late Baron of Baltimore, in our said Kingdom of Ireland, treading in the steps of his Father, being animated with a laudable, and pious Zeal for extending the Christian Religion, and also the Territories of our Empire, hath humbly besought Leave of us, that he may transport, by his own Industry, and Expense, a numerous Colony of the English Nation, to a certain Region, herein after described, in a Country hitherto uncultivated, in the Parts of America, and partly occupied by Savages, having no knowledge of the Divine Being, and that all that Region, with some certain Privileges, and Jurisdiction, appertaining unto the wholesome Government, and State of his Colony and Region aforesaid, may by our Royal Highness be given, granted and confirmed unto him, and his Heirs.

IV. Also We do grant and likewise Confirm unto the said Baron of Baltimore, his Heirs, and Assigns, all Islands and Inlets within the Limits aforesaid, all and singular the Islands, and Islets, from the Eastern Shore of the aforesaid Region, towards the East, which had been, or shall be formed in the Sea, situate within Ten marine Leagues from the said shore; with all and singular the Ports, Harbours, Bays, Rivers, and Straits belonging to the Region or Islands aforesaid, and all the Soil, Plains, Woods, Marshes, Lakes, Rivers, Bays, and Straits, situate, or being within the Metes, Bounds, and Limits aforesaid, with the Fishings of every kind of Fish, as well of Whales, Sturgeons, and other royal Fish, as of other Fish, in the Sea, Bays, Straits, or Rivers, within the Premises, and the fish t here taken; And moreover all Veins, Mines, and Quarries, as well opened as hidden, already found, or that shall be found within the Region, Islands, or Limits aforesaid, of Gold, Silver, Gems, and precious Stones, and any other whatsoever, whether they be of Stones, or Metals, or of any other Thing, or Matter whatsoever; And furthermore the Patronages, and Advowsons of all Churches which (with the increasing Worship and Religion of Christ) within the said Region, Islands, Islets, and Limits aforesaid, hereafter shall happen to be built, together with License and Faculty of erecting and founding Churches, Chapels, and Places of Worship, in convenient and suitable places, within the Premises, and of causing the same to be dedicated and consecrated according to the Ecclesiastical Laws of our Kingdom of England, with all, and singular such, and as ample Rights, Jurisdictions, Privileges, Prerogatives, Royalties, Liberties, Immunities, and royal Rights, and temporal Franchises whatsoever, as well by Sea as by Land, within the Region, Islands, Islets, and Limits aforesaid, to be had, exercised, used, and enjoyed, as any Bishop of Durham, within the Bishoprick or County Palatine of Durham, in our Kingdom of England, ever heretofore hath had, held, used, or enjoyed, or of right could, or ought to have, hold, use, or enjoy.

X. We will also, and of our more abundant Grace, for Us, our Heirs and Successors, do firmly charge, constitute, ordain, and command, that the said Province be of our Allegiance; and that all and singular the Subjects and LiegeMen of Us, our Heirs and Successors, transplanted, or hereafter to be transplanted into the Province aforesaid, and the Children of them, and of others their Descendants, whether already born there, or hereafter to be born, be-and shall be Natives and LiegeMen of Us, our Heirs and Successors, of our Kingdom of England and Ireland; and in all Things shall be held, treated, reputed, and esteemed as the faithful LiegeMen of Us, and our Heirs and Successors, born within our Kingdom of England; also Lands, Tenements, Revenues, Services, and other Hereditaments whatsoever, within our Kingdom of England, and other our Dominions, to inherit, or otherwise purchase? receive, take, have, hold, buy, and possess, and the same to use and enjoy, and the same to give, sell, alien and bequeath; and likewise all Privileges, Franchises and Liberties of this our Kingdom of England, freely, quietly, and peaceably to have and possess, and the same may use and enjoy in the same manner as our LiegeMen born, or to be born within our said Kingdom of England, without Impediment, Molestation, Vexation, Impeachment, or Grievance of Us, or any of our Heirs or Successors; any Statute, Act, Ordinance, or Provision to the contrary thereof, notwithstanding.

XIV. Moreover, left in so remote and far distant a Region, every Access to Honors and Dignities may seem to be precluded, and utterly barred, to Men well born, who are preparing to engage in the present Expedition, and desirous of deserving well, both in Peace and War, of Us, and our Kingdom; for this Cause, We, for Us, our Heirs and Successors, do give free and plenary Power to the aforesaid now Baron of Baltimore, and to his Heirs and Assigns, to confer Favors, Rewards and Honors, upon such Subjects, inhabiting within the Province aforesaid, as shall be well deserving, and to adorn them with whatsoever Titles and Dignities they shall appoint; (so that they be not such as are now used in England) also to erect and incorporate Towns into Boroughs, and Boroughs into Cities, with suitable Privileges and Immunities, according to the Merits of the Inhabitants, and Convenience of the Places; and to do all and singular other Things in the Premises, which to him or them shall seem fitting and convenient; even although they shall be such as, in their own Nature, require a more special Commandment and Warrant than in these Presents may be expressed.

XVI. And furthermore, of our more ample special Grace, and of our certain Knowledge, and mere Motion, We do, for Us, our Heirs and Successors, grant unto the aforesaid now Baron of Baltimore, his Heirs and Assigns, full and absolute Power and Authority to make, erect, and constitute, within the Province of Maryland, and the Islands and Islets aforesaid, such, and so many SeaPorts, Harbors Creeks, and other Places of Unlading and Discharge of Goods and Merchandizes out of Ships, Boats, and other Vessels, and of Lading in the same, and in so many, and such Places, and with suck Rights, Jurisdictions, Liberties, and Privileges, unto such Parts respecting aS to him or them shall seem most expedient: And, that all and every the Ships, Boats, and other Vessels whatsoever, coming to, or going from the Province aforesaid, for the Sake of Merchandizing, shall be laden and unladen at such Ports only as shall be so erected and constituted by the said now Baron of Baltimore, his Heirs and Assigns, any Usage, Custom, or other Thing whatsoever to the contrary notwithstanding, Saving always to Us, our Heirs and Successors, and to all the Subjects of our Kingdoms of England and Ireland, of Us, our Heirs and Successors, the Liberty of Fishing for Sea-Fish, as well in the Sea, Bays, Straits, and navigable Rivers, as in the Harbors, Bays, and Creeks of the Province aforesaid; and the Privilege of Salting and Drying Fish on the Shores of the same Province; and, for that Cause, to cut down and take Hedging-Wood and Twigs there growing, and to build Huts and Cabins, necessary in this in the same Manner, as heretofore they reasonably might, or have used to do.

Which Liberties and Privileges, the said Subjects of Us, our Heirs anal Successors, shall enjoy, without notable Damage or Injury in my wise to be done to the aforesaid now Baron of Baltimore, his Heirs or Assigns, or to the Residents and Inhabitants of the same Province in the Ports, Creeks, and Shores aforesaid, and especially in the Woods and Trees there growing. And if any Person shall do Damage or Injury of this Kind, he shall incur the Peril and Pain of the heavy Displeasure of Us, our Heirs and Successors, and of the due Chastisement of the Laws, besides making Satisfaction.

18.1.2.4.bConstitution, 1776

The DECLARATION of RIGHTS, And The CONSTITUTION and Form of Government of The State of Maryland.

A DECLARATION of RIGHTS.

THE parliament of Great-Britain, by a declaratory act, having assumed a right to make laws to bind the Colonies in all cases whatsoever, and, in pursuance of such claim endeavored by force of arms to subjugate the United Colonies to an unconditional submission to their will and power, and having at length constrained them to declare themselves independent States, and to assume government under the authority of the people;—Therefore we, the delegates of Maryland, in free and full convention assembled, taking into our most serious consideration the best means of establishing a good constitution in this State, for the surer foundation and more permanent security thereof, declare,

21. That no free man ought to be taken, or imprisoned, or disseized of his freehold, liberties or privileges, or outlawed, or exiled, or in any manner, destroyed, or deprived of his life, liberty, or property, but by the judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land.

37. That the city of Annapolis ought to have all its rights, privileges and benefits, agreeable to its Charter, and the acts of Assembly confirming and regulating the same, subject nevertheless to such alteration as may be made by this Convention, or any future legislature.

I. THAT the Legislature consist of two distinct branches, a senate and house of delegates, which shall be styled, The General Assembly of Maryland.

XII. That the house of delegates may punish, by imprisonment, any person who shall be guilty of a contempt in, their view, by any disorderly or riotous behaviour, or by threats to, or abuse of, their members, or by any obstruction to their proceedings; they may also punish, by imprisonment, any person who shall be guilty of a breach of privilege, by arresting on civil process, or by assaulting, any of their members, during their sitting, or on their way to or return from the house of delegates, or by any assault of or obstruction to their officers, in the execution of any order or process, or by assaulting or obstructing any witness, or any other person, attending on, or on their way to or from, the house, or by rescuing any person committed by the house: and the senate may exercise the same power, in similar cases.

WE, the members of the Congress of New-Hampshire, Chosen and Appointed by the Free Suffrages of the People of said Colony, and Authorized and Impowered by them to meet together, and use such means and Pursue Such Measures as we Should Judge best for the Public Good; and in Particular to establish Some Form of Government, Provided that Measure should be recommended by the Continental Congress; And a Recommendation to that purpose having been Transmitted to us From the Said Congress: Have taken into our Serious Consideration the Unhappy Circumstances, into which this Colony is Involved by means of many Grievous and Oppressive Acts of the British Parliament, Depriving us of our Natural and Constitutional rights [sic] and Privileges; To Enforce Obedience to which Acts A Powerful Fleet and Army have been Sent to this Country by the ministry of Great Britain, who have Exercised a Wanton and Cruel Abuse of their Power, in Destroying the Lives and Properties of the Colonists in many Places with Fire and Sword; Taking the Ships and Lading from many of the Honest and Industrious Inhabitants of this Colony Employed in Commerce, agreeable to the Laws and Customs a long time used here.

The Sudden and Abrupt Departure of his Excellency John Wentworth, Esq.,r our Late Governor, and Several of the Council, Leaving us Destitute of Legislation, and no Executive Courts being open to Punish Criminal Offenders; whereby the Lives and Properties of the Honest People of this Colony are Liable to the Machinations and Evil Designs of wicked men, Therefore, for the Preservation of Peace and good order, and for the Security of the Lives and Properties of the Inhabitants of this Colony, We Conceive ourselves Reduced to the Necessity of establishing A Form of Government to Continue During the Present Unhappy and Unnatural Contest with Great Britain; Protesting and Declaring that we Never Sought to throw off our Dependance upon Great Britain, but felt ourselves happy under her Protection, while we Could Enjoy our Constitutional Rights and Privileges. — And that we Shall Rejoice if Such a reconciliation between us and our Parent State can be Effected as shall be Approved by the Continental Congress, in whose Prudence and Wisdom we confide.

XV. No subject shall be held to answer for any crime or offence, until the same is fully and plainly, substantially and formally described to him; or be compelled to accuse or furnish evidence against himself. And every subject shall have a right to produce all proofs that may be favourable to himself; to meet the witnesses against him face to face; and to be fully heard in his defence, by himself, and counsel. And no subject shall be arrested, imprisoned, despoiled, or deprived of his property, immunities, or privileges, put out of the protection of the law, exiled or deprived of his life, liberty, or estate, but by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land.

XXI. In order to reap the fullest advantage of the inestimable privilege of the trial by Jury, great care ought to be taken, that none but qualified persons should be appointed to serve; and such ought to be fully compensated for their travel, time and attendance.

New Hampshire Constitution, pp. 13–14, 17.

18.1.2.7New Jersey: Constitution, 1776

I. That the Government of this Province shall be vested in a Governor, Legislative Council, and General Assembly.

II. That the Legislative Council, and General Assembly, shall be chosen, for the first Time, on the second Tuesday in August next; the Members whereof shall be the same in Number and Qualifications as are herein after mentioned; and shall be and remain vested with all the Powers and Authority to be held by any future Legislative Council and Assembly of this Colony, until the second Tuesday in October, which shall be in the year of our Lord One Thousand Seven Hundred and Seventy-Seven.

III. That on the second Tuesday in October yearly, and every year forever (with the Privilege of adjourning from Day to Day as Occasion may require) the Counties shall severally choose one Person, to be a Member of the Legislative Council of this Colony, who shall be, and have been, for one whole Year next before the Election, an Inhabitant and Freeholder in the County in which he is chosen, and worth at least One Thousand Pounds Proclamation Money, of Real and Personal Estate, within the same County;

VI. That the Council shall also have Power to prepare Bills to pass into Laws, and have other like Powers as the Assembly, and in all Respects be a free and independent Branch of the Legislature of this Colony; save only, that they shall not prepare or alter any Money Bill—which shall be the Privilege of the Assembly; that the Council shall, from Time to Time, be convened by the Governor or Vice-President, but must be convened, at all Times, when the Assembly sits; for which Purpose the Speaker of the House of Assembly shall always, immediately after an Adjournment, give Notice to the Governor, or Vice-President, of the Time and Place to which the House is adjourned.

XVI. That all Criminals shall be admitted to the same Privileges of Witnesses and Counsel, as their Prosecutors are or shall be entitled to.

XVII. That the Estates of such Persons as shall destroy their own Lives, shall not, for that Offence, be forfeited; but shall descend in the same Manner as they would have done, had such Persons died in the natural Way; nor shall any Article, which may occasion accidentally the Death of any one, be henceforth deemed a Deodand, or in anywise forfeited, on Account of such Misfortune.

XVIII. That no Person shall ever, within this Colony, be deprived of the inestimable Privilege of worshipping Almighty God in a Manner agreeable to the Dictates of his own Conscience; nor, under any Pretence whatever, be compelled to attend any Place of Worship, contrary to his own Faith and Judgment; nor shall any Person, within this Colony, ever be obliged to pay Tithes, Taxes, or any other Rates, for the Purpose of building or repairing any other Church or Churches, Place or Places of Worship, or for the Maintenance of any Minister or Ministry, contrary to what he believes to be Right, or has deliberately or voluntarily engaged himself to perform.

XIX. That there shall be no Establishment of any one religious Sect in this Province, in Preference to another; and that no Protestant Inhabitant of this Colony shall be denied the Enjoyment of any civil Right, merely on Account of his religious Principles; but that all Persons, professing a Belief in the Faith of any Protestant Sect, who shall demean themselves peaceably under the Government, as hereby established, shall be capable of being elected into any Office of Profit or Trust, or being a Member of Either Branch of the Legislature, and shall fully and freely enjoy every Privilege and Immunity, enjoyed by others their Fellow-Subjects.

XXII. That the Common Law of England, as well as so much of the Statute Law, as have been heretofore practised in this Colony, shall still remain in Force, until they shall be altered by a future Law of the Legislature; such Parts only excepted, as are repugnant to the Rights and Privileges contained in this Charter; and that the inestimable Right of Trial by Jury shall remain confirmed as a Part of the Law of this Colony, without Repeal, forever.

New Jersey Acts, 1776, pp. 4–5, 8–9.

18.1.2.8New York: Constitution, 1777

IX. That the assembly thus constituted, shall chuse [sic] their own speaker, be judges of their own members, and enjoy the same privileges, and proceed in doing business, in like manner as the assemblies of the colony of New-York of right formerly did; and that a majority of the said members, shall, from time to time, constitute a house, to proceed upon business.

XIII. And this convention doth further, in the name, and by the authority of the good people of this state, ordain, determine, and declare, That no member of this state shall be disfranchised, or deprived of any the rights or privileges secured to the subjects of this state, by this constitution, unless by the law of the land, or the judgment of his peers.

XXXVI. AND BE IT FURTHER ORDAINED, That all grants of lands within this STATE, made by the king of Great-Britain, or persons acting under his authority, after the fourteenth day of October, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-five, shall be null and void; But that nothing in this constitution contained shall be construed to affect any grants of land within this state, made by the authority of the said King or his predecessors, or to annul any charters to bodies politic, by him or them, or any of them, made prior to that day. And that none of the said charters shall be adjudged to be void by reason of any non-user or misuser of any of their respective rights or privileges, between the nineteenth day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and seventy-five, and the publication of this constitution. And further, That all such of the officers described in the said charters, respectively, as by the terms of the said charters, were to be appointed by the governor of the colony of New-York, with or without the advice and consent of the council of the said king, in the said colony, shall henceforth be appointed by the council established by this constitution, for the appointment of officers in this state, until otherwise directed by the legislature.

18.1.2.9.cSecond Charter of Carolina, 1665

CHARLES the Second, by the grace of God, of Great-Britain, France and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith, &c. WHEREAS, by our Letters Patents, bearing date the twenty-fourth day of March, in the fifteenth year of our reign, We were graciously pleased to grant unto our right trusty and right well-beloved Cousin and Counsellor Edward Earl of Clarendon, our High Chancellor of England …

NOW Know ye, That We, at the humble request of the said grantees, in the aforesaid Letters Patents named, and as a further mark of our especial favour to them, we are graciously pleased to enlarge our said grant unto them, … And furthermore, the patronage and advowsons of all the churches and chapels, which, as Christian religion shall increase within the province, territory, isles, and limits aforesaid, shall happen hereafter to be erected; together with licence and power to build and found churches, chapels and oratories, in convenient and fit places, within the said bounds and limits; and to cause them to be dedicated and consecrated, according to the ecclesiastical laws of our kingdom of England; together with all and singular the like and as ample rights, jurisdictions, privileges, prerogatives, royalties, liberties, immunities, and franchises of what kind soever, within the territory, isles, islets and limits aforesaid …

AND that the province or territory hereby granted and described, may be dignified with as large tythes and privileges, as any other parts of our dominions and territories in that region; Know ye, That we, of our further grace, certain knowledge, and mere motion, have thought fit to annex the same tract of ground or territory unto the same province of Carolina; and out of the fullness of our royal power and prerogative, we do, for us, our heirs and successors, annex and unite the same to the said province of Carolina.

AND forasmuch as we … do grant , , , the said Edward Earl of Clarendon, … full power and authority, to erect, constitute, and make several counties, baronnies, and colonies, of and within the said provinces, territories, lands, and hereditaments, in and by the said Letters Patents, granted, or mentioned to be granted, as aforesaid, with several and distinct jurisdictions, powers, liberties, and privileges: …

AND we will also, and of our especial grace, for us, our heirs and successors, do straitly enjoin, ordain, constitute, and command, that the said province and territory shall be of our allegiance; and that all and singular the subjects and liege people of us, our heirs and successors, transported, or to be transported into the said province, and the children of them, and such as shall descend from them there born, or hereafter to be born be, and shall be denizens and lieges of us, our heirs and successors, of this our kingdom of England, and be in all things, held, treated, and reputed, as the liege faithful people of us, our heirs and successors, born within this our said kingdom, or any other of our dominions; and may inherit or otherwise purchase and receive, take, hold, buy and possess, any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, within the said places, and them may occupy and enjoy, sell, alien, and bequeath; as likewise, all liberties, franchises, and privileges, of this our kingdom, and of other our dominions aforesaid, may freely and quietly have, possess, and enjoy, as our liege people, born within the same, without the molestation, vexation, trouble, or grievance, of us, our heirs and successors: Any act, statute, ordinance, or provision, to the contrary, notwithstanding.

AND furthermore, of our more ample and especial grace, certain knowledge, and mere motion, we do, for us, our heirs and successors, grant unto the said Edward Earl of Clarendon, … full and absolute power and authority, to make, erect, and constitute, within the said province or territory, and the isles and islets aforesaid, such and so many seaports, harbours, creeks, and other places, for discharge and unlading of goods and merchandises, out of ships, boats and other vessels, and for lading of them, in such and so many places, with such jurisdictions, privileges and franchises, unto the said ports belonging, as to them shall seem most expedient …

AND further also, we do, by these presents, for us, our heirs and successors, give and grant … And to the said cities, boroughs, towns, villages, or any other place or places, within the said province or territory, to grant letters or charters of incorporation, with all liberties, franchises, and privileges, requisite or usual, or to or within this our kingdom of England granted or belonging …

18.1.2.9.dThe Fundamental Constitutions of Carolina, 1669

Our sovereign Lord the King, having, out of his royal grace and bounty, granted unto us the Province of Carolina, with all the royalties, properties, jurisdictions, and privileges of a County Palatine, as large and ample as the County Palatine of Durham, with other great Privileges; for the better settlement of the government of the said place, and establishing the interest of the Lords Proprietors with equality, and without confusion; and that the government of this Province may be made most agreeable to the Monarchy under which we live, and of which this Province is a part; and that We may avoid erecting a numerous democracy: We, the Lords and proprietors of the Province aforesaid, have agreed to this following form of government, to be perpetually established amongst us, unto which we do oblige ourselves, our heirs and successors, in the most binding ways that can be devised.

Five. At any time before the year one thousand seven hundred and one, any of the lords proprietors shall have power to relinquish, alienate, and dispose to any other person his proprietorship, and all the signiories, powers, and interest thereunto belonging, wholly and entirely together, and not otherwise. But after the year one thousand seven hundred, those who are then Lords Proprietors shall not have power to alienate or make over their proprietorship, with the signiories and privileges thereunto belonging, or any part thereof, to any person whatsoever, otherwise than in section eighteen …

Eighteen. The lords of signiories and baronies shall have power only of granting estates not exceeding three lives, or twenty-one years, in two-thirds of said signiories or baronies, and the remaining third shall be always demesne.

Nineteen. Any lord of a manor may alienate, sell, or dispose to any other person and his heirs forever, his manor, all entirely together, with all the privileges and leetmen thereunto belonging, so far forth as any colony lands; but no grant of any part thereof, either in fee, or for any longer term than three lives, or one-and-twenty years, shall stand good against the next heir.

Twenty. No manor, for want of issue male, shall be divided amongst coheirs; but the manor, if there be but one, shall all entirely descend to the eldest daughter and her heirs. If there be more minors than one, the eldest daughter first shall have her choice, the second next, and so on, beginning again at the eldest, until all the manors be taken up; that so the privileges which belong to manors being indivisible, the lands of the manors, to which they are annexed, may be kept entire and the manor not lose those privileges which, upon parcelling out to several owners, must necessarily cease.

Twenty-one. Every lord of a manor, within his own manor, shall have all the rights, powers, jurisdictions, and privileges which a landgrave or cazique hath in his baronies.

18.1.2.10.cCharter of Privileges for Pennsylvania, 1701

WILLIAM PENN, Proprietary and Governor of the Province of Pensilvania and Territories thereunto belonging, To all to whom these Presents shall come, sendeth Greeting. WHEREAS King CHARLES the Second, by His Letters Patents, under the Great Seal of England, bearing Date the Fourth Day of March, in the Year One Thousand Six Hundred and Eighty-one, was graciously pleased to give and grant unto me, and my Heirs and Assigns for ever, this Province of Pensilvania, with divers great Powers and Jurisdictions for the well Government thereof.[18]

KNOW YE THEREFORE, That for the further Well-being and good Government of the said Province, and Territories; and in Pursuance of the Rights and Powers beforementioned, I the said William Penn do declare, grant and confirm, unto all the Freemen, Planters and Adventurers, and other Inhabitants of this Province and Territories, these following Liberties, Franchises and Privileges, so far as in me lieth, to be held, enjoyed and kept, by the Freemen, Planters and Adventurers, and other Inhabitants of and in the said Province and Territories thereunto annexed, for ever.

FIRST.

II.

FOR the well governing of this Province and Territories, there shall be an Assembly yearly chosen, by the Freemen thereof, to consist of Four Persons out of each County, of most Note for Virtue, Wisdom and Ability, (or of a greater number at any Time, as the Governor and Assembly shall agree) upon the First Day of October for ever; and shall sit on the Fourteenth Day of the same Month, at Philadelphia, unless the Governor and Council for the Time being, shall see Cause to appoint another Place within the said Province or Territories: Which Assembly shall have Power to chuse a Speaker and other their Officers; and shall be Judges of the Qualifications and Elections of their own Members; sit upon their own Adjournments; appoint Committees; prepare Bills in order to pass into Laws; impeach Criminals, and redress Grievances; and shall have all other Powers and Privileges of an Assembly, according to the Rights of the freeborn Subjects of England, and as is usual in any of the King's Plantations in America.

V.

THAT all Criminals shall have the same Privileges of Witnesses and Council as their Prosecutors.

AND NOTWITHSTANDING the Closure and Test of this present Charter as aforesaid, I think fit to add this following Proviso thereunto, as Part of the same, That is to say, That notwithstanding any Clause or Clauses in the abovementioned Charter, obliging the Province and Territories to join together in Legislation, I am content, and do hereby declare, that if the Representatives of the Province and Territories shall not hereafter agree to join together in Legislation, and that the same shall be signified unto me, or my Deputy, in open Assembly, or otherwise from under the Hands and Seals of the Representatives, for the Time being, of the Province and Territories, or the major Part of either of them, at any Time within Three Years from the Date hereof, that in such Case, the Inhabitants of each of the Three Counties of this Province, shall not have less than Eight Persons to represent them in Assembly, for the Province; and the Inhabitants of the Town of Philadelphia (when the said Town is incorporated) Two Persons to represent them in Assembly; and the Inhabitants of each County in the Territories, shall have as many Persons to represent them in a distinct Assembly for the Territories, as shall be by them requested as aforesaid.

NOTWITHSTANDING which Separation of the Province and Territories, in Respect of Legislation, I do hereby promise, grant and declare, That the Inhabitants of both Province and Territories, shall separately enjoy all other Liberties, Privileges and Benefits, granted jointly to them in this Charter, any Law, Usage or Custom of this Government heretofore made and practised, or any Law made and passed by this General Assembly, to the Contrary hereof, notwithstanding.

WILLIAM PENN.

THIS CHARTER of PRIVILEGES being distinctly read in Assembly; and the whole and every Part thereof, being approved of and agreed to, by us, we do thankfully receive the same from our Proprietary and Governor, at Philadelphia, this Twenty-Eighth Day of October, One Thousand Seven Hundred and One. Signed on Behalf, and by Order of the Assembly,

VII. That the legislative authority be vested in the president and commander-in-chief, the general assembly and legislative council. All money-bills for the support of government shall originate in the general assembly, and shall not be altered or amended by the legislative council, but may be rejected by them. All other bills and ordinances may take rise in the general assembly or legislative council, and may be altered, amended, or rejected by either. Bills having passed the general assembly and legislative council may be assented to or rejected by the president and commander-in-chief. Having received his assent, they shall have all the force and validity of an act of general assembly of this colony. And the general assembly and legislative council, respectively, shall enjoy all other privileges which have at any time been claimed or exercised by the commons house of assembly, but the legislative council shall have no power of expelling their own members.

XIX. That justices of the peace shall be nominated by the general assembly and commissioned by the president and commander-in-chief, during pleasure. They shall not be entitled to fees except on prosecutions for felony, and not acting in the magistracy, they shall not be entitled to the privileges allowed to them by law.

XXXI. That the president and commander-in-chief, the vice-president of the colony, and privy council, respectively, shall have the same personal privileges as are allowed by act of assembly to the governor, lieutenant-governor, and privy council.

XXXVIII. That all persons and religious societies who acknowledge that there is one God, and a future state of rewards and punishments, and that God is publicly to be worshipped, shall be freely tolerated. The Christian Protestant religion shall be deemed, and is hereby constituted and declared to be, the established religion of this State. That all denominations of Christian Protestants in this State, demeaning themselves peaceably and faithfully, shall enjoy equal religious and civil privileges. To accomplish this desirable purpose without injury to the religious property of those societies of Christians which are by law already incorporated for the purpose of religious worship, and to put it fully into the power of every other society of Christian Protestants, either already formed or hereafter to be formed, to obtain the like incorporation, it is hereby constituted, appointed, and declared that the respective societies of the Church of England that are already formed in this State for the purpose of religious worship shall still continue incorporate and hold the religious property now in their possession. And that whenever fifteen or more male persons, not under twenty-one years of age, professing the Christian Protestant religion, and agreeing to unite themselves in a society for the purposes of religious worship, they shall, (on complying with the terms hereinafter mentioned,) be, and be constituted, a church, and be esteemed and regarded in law as of the established religion of the State, and on a petition to the legislature shall be entitled to be incorporated and to enjoy equal privileges. That every society of Christians so formed shall give themselves a name or denomination by which they shall be called and known in law, and all that associate with them for the purposes of worship shall be esteemed as belonging to the society so called. But that previous to the establishment and incorporation of the respective societies of every denomination as aforesaid, and in order to entitle them thereto, each society so petitioning shall have agreed to and subscribed in a book the following five articles, without which no agreement or union of men upon pretence of religion shall entitle them to be incorporated and esteemed as a church of the established religion of this State:

1st. That there is one eternal God, and a future state of rewards and punishments.

2d. That God is publicly to be worshipped.

3d. That the Christian religion is the true religion.

4th. That the holy scriptures of the Old and New Testaments are of divine inspiration, and are the rule of faith and practice.

5th. That it is lawful and the duty of every man being thereunto called by those that govern, to bear witness to the truth.

XLI. That no freeman of this State be taken or imprisoned, or disseized of his freehold, liberties, or privileges, or outlawed, exiled, or in any manner destroyed or deprived of his life, liberty, or property, but by the judgment of his peers or by the law of the land.

PLAN OR FRAME OF GOVERNMENT.

XII. The representatives, having met, and chosen their speaker and clerk, shall each of them, before they proceed to business, take and subscribe, as well the oath or affirmation of allegiance herein after directed (except where they shall produce certificates of their having heretofore taken and subscribed the same) as the following oath or affirmation, viz.

You ——— do solemnly swear, (or affirm) that, as a member of this Assembly, you will not propose or assent to any bill, vote, or resolution, which shall appear to you injurious to the people; nor do nor consent to any act or thing whatever, that shall have a tendency to lessen or abridge their rights and privileges as declared by the Constitution of this State; but will, in all things, conduct yourself as a faithful, honest representative and guardian of the people, according to the best of your judgment and abilities. (In case of an oath) So help you God. (And in case of an affirmation) Under the pains and penalties of perjury.

And each member, before he takes his seat, shall make and subscribe the following declaration, viz.

You do believe in one God, the Creator and Governor of the Universe, the rewarder of the good, and punisher of the wicked. And you do acknowledge the scriptures of the Old and New Testament to be given by divine inspiration; and own and profess the Protestant religion.

And no further or other religious test shall ever hereafter be required of any civil officer or magistrate, in this State.

XVIII. Every man, of the full age of twenty-one years, having resided in this State, for the space of one whole year, next before the election of representatives, and is of a quiet and peaceable behaviour, and will take the following oath, (or affirmation) shall be entitled to all the privileges of a freeman of this State.

You solemnly swear, (or affirm) that whenever you give your vote or suffrage, touching any matter that concerns the State of Vermont, you will do it so as in your conscience you shall judge will most conduce to the best good of the same, as established by the Constitution, without fear or favour of any man.

XXXVIII. Laws for the encouragement of virtue, and prevention of vice and immorality, ought to be constantly kept in force, and duly executed; and a competent number of schools ought to be maintained in each town for the convenient instruction of youth; and one or more grammar schools be incorporated, and properly supported in each county in this State. And all religious societies, or bodies of men, that may be hereafter united or incorporated, for the advancement of religion and learning, or for other pious and charitable purposes, shall be encouraged and protected in the enjoyment of the privileges, immunities, and estates, which they in justice ought to enjoy, under such regulations as the General Assembly of this State shall direct.

18.1.2.14.aThe Second Charter of Virginia, 1609

JAMES, by the Grace of God, King of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c. To all, to whom these Presents shall come, Greeting. Whereas, at the humble Suit and Request of sundry our loving and well-disposed Subjects, intending to deduce a Colony, and to make Habitation and Plantation of sundry our People in that Part of America, commonly called Virginia, and other Parts and Territories in America, either appertaining unto Us, or which are not actually possessed of any Christian Prince or People, within certain Bounds and Regions, We have formerly, by our Letters patents, bearing Date the tenth Day of April, in the fourth Year of our Reign of England, France, and Ireland, and of Scotland the nine and thirtieth, Granted to Sir Thomas Gates, Sir George Somers, and others, for the more speedy Accomplishment of the said Plantation and Habitation, that they should divide themselves into two Colonies (the one consisting of divers Knights, Gentlemen, Merchants, and others, of our City of London, called the First Colony; And the other consisting of divers Knights, Gentlemen, and others, of our Cities of Bristol, Exeter, and Town of Plimouth, and other Places, called the Second Colony). And have yielded and granted many and sundry Privileges and Liberties to each Colony, for their quiet settling and good Government therein, as by the said Letters-patents more at large appeareth.

Now, forasmuch as divers and sundry of our loving Subjects, as well Adventurers, as Planters, of the said first Colony, which have already engaged themselves in furthering the Business of the said Colony and Plantation, and do further intend, by the Assistance of Almighty God, to prosecute the same to a happy End, have of late been humble Suitors unto Us, that (in Respect of their great Charges and the Adventure of many of their Lives, which they have hazarded in the said Discovery and Plantation of the said Country) We would be pleased to grant them a further Enlargement and Explanation of the said Grant, Privileges, and Liberties, and that such Counsellors, and other Officers, may be appointed amongst them, to manage and direct their Affairs, as are willing and ready to adventure with them, as also whose Dwellings are not so far remote from the City of London, but they may, at convenient Times, be ready at Hand, to give their Advice and Assistance, upon all Occasions requisite.

… And we do also of our special Grace, certain Knowledge, and mere Motion, give, grant and confirm, unto the said Treasurer and Company, and their Successors, … And also all the Islands lying within one hundred Miles along the Coast of both Seas of the Precinct aforesaid; Together with all the Soils, Grounds, Havens, and Ports, Mines, as well Royal Mines of Gold and Silver, as other Minerals, Pearls, and precious Stones, Quarries, Woods, Rivers, Waters, Fishings, Commodities, Jurisdictions, Royalties, Privileges, Franchises, and Preheminences within the said Territories, and the Precincts thereof, … ALSO we do for Us, our Heirs and Successors, DECLARE by these Presents, that all and every the Persons being our Subjects, which shall go and inhabit within the said Colony and Plantation, and every their Children and Posterity, which shall happen to be born within any of the Limits thereof, shall HAVE and ENJOY all Liberties, Franchizes, and Immunities of Free Denizens and natural Subjects within any of our other Dominions to all Intents and Purposes, as if they had been abiding and born within this our Realm of England, or in any other of our Dominions. … AND further, our Will and Pleasure is, that in all Questions and Doubts that shall arise upon any difficulty of Construction or Interpretation of any Thing contained either in this, or in our said former Letters-patents, the same shall be taken and interpreted in most ample and beneficial Manner for the said Treasurer and Company, and their Successors, and every Member thereof. AND further, we do, by these Presents RATIFY and CONFIRM unto the said Treasurer and Company, and their Successors, all the Privileges, Franchises, Liberties, and Immunities granted in our said former Letters-patents, and not in these our Letters-patents, revoked, altered, changed, or abridged. AND finally our Will and Pleasure is, and we do further hereby for Us, our Heirs, and Successors, GRANT and AGREE, to and with the said Treasurer and Company, and their Successors, that all and singular Person and Persons, which shall at any Time or Times hereafter adventure any Sum or Sums of Money, in and towards the said Plantation of the said Colony in Virginia, and shall be admitted by the said Council and Company, as Adventurers of the said Colony in Form aforesaid, and shall be enrolled in the Book or Records of the Adventurers of the said Company, shall and may be accounted, accepted, taken, held, and reputed Adventurers of the said Colony, and shall, and may enjoy all and singular Grants, Privileges, Liberties, Benefits, Profits, Commodities and Immunities, Advantages and Emoluments whatsoever, as fully, largely, amply, and absolutely, as if they and every of them, had been precisely, plainly, singularly, and distinctly named and inserted in these our Letters-patents.

18.1.2.14.bThe Third Charter of Virginia, 1611–12

JAMES, by the Grace of God, King of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith; To all to whom these Presents shall come, Greeting. … And whereas also for the greater Good and Benefit of the said Company, and for the better Furtherance, Strengthening, and Establishing of the said Plantation, we did further Give, Grant and Confirm, by our Letters-patents unto the said Company and their Successors, for ever, all those Lands, Countries or Territories, situate, lying and being in that Part of America called Virginia, from the Point of Land called Cape or Point Comfort all along the Sea Coasts to the Northward two hundred Miles; and from the said Point of Cape Comfort all along the Sea Coast to the Southward two hundred Miles; and all that Space and Circuit of Land lying from the Sea Coast of the Precinct aforesaid, up into the Land throughout from Sea to Sea West and Northwest; and also all the Islands lying within one hundred Miles along the Coast of both the Seas of the Precinct aforesaid; with divers other Grants, Liberties, Franchises and Preheminences, Privileges, Profits, Benefits, and Commodities granted in and by our said Letters-patents to the said Treasurer and Company and their Successors for ever. … together with all and singular Soils, Lands, Grounds, Havens, Ports, Rivers, Waters,

Fishings, Mines and Minerals, as well Royal Mines of Gold and Silver, as other Mines and Minerals, Pearls, precious Stones, Quarries, and all and singular other Commodities, Jurisdictions, Royalties, Privileges, Franchises, and Preheminences, both within the said Tract of Land upon the Main, and also within the said Islands and Seas adjoining whatsoever and thereunto or thereabouts, both by Sea and Land being or situate;

And further, Our Will and Pleasure is, and We do by these Presents, grant and confirm, for the Good and Welfare of the said Plantation, and that Posterity may hereafter know who have adventured and not been sparing of their Purses in such a noble and generous Action for the general Good of their Country, and at the Request and with the Consent of the Company aforesaid, that Our trusty and well-beloved Subjects George Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, Henry, Earl of Huntington, Edward Earl of Bedford, Richard Earl of Clanrickard, &c. who since Our said last Letters-Patents are become Adventurers, and have joined themselves with the former Adventurers and Planters of the said Company and Society, shall from henceforth be reputed, deemed, and taken to be, and shall be Brethren and free Members of the Company; and shall and may respectively, and according to the Proportion and Value of their several Adventures, have, hold, and enjoy, all such Interest, Right, Title, Privileges, Preheminences, Liberties, Franchises, Immunities, Profits, and Commodities whatsoever, in as large and ample and beneficial Manner, to all Intents, Constructions, and Purposes, as any other Adventures nominated and expressed in any our former Letters-Patents, or any of them have or may have by Force and Virtue of these Presents, or any our former Letters-Patents whatsoever.

And We do, for Us, our Heirs and Successors, further give and grant to the said Treasurer and Company, or their Successors forever, that the said Treasurer and Company, or the greater Part of them for the Time being, so in a full and general Court assembled as aforesaid, shall and may from Time to Time, and at all times forever hereafter, elect, choose and admit into their Company, and Society, any Person or Persons, as well Strangers and Aliens born in any Part beyond the Seas wheresoever, being in Amity with us, as our natural Liege Subjects born in any our Realms and Dominions: And that all such Persons so elected, chosen, and admitted to be of the said Company as aforesaid, shall thereupon be taken, reputed, and held, and shall be free Members of the said Company, and shall have, hold, and enjoy all and singular Freedoms, Liberties, Franchises, Privileges, Immunities, Benefits, Frofits, and Commodities whatsoever, to the said Company in any Sort belonging or appertaining, as fully, freely and amply as any other Adventurers now being, or which hereafter at any Time shall be of the said Company, hath, have, shall, may, might, or ought to have and enjoy the same to all Intents and Purposes whatsoever.

And lastly, we do, by these Presents, ratify and confirm unto the said Treasurer and Company, and their Successors, for ever, all and all Manner of Privileges, Franchises, Liberties, Immunities, Preheminences, Profits, and Commodities, whatsoever, granted unto them in any our former Letters-patents, and not in these Presents revoked, altered, changed, or abridged.

18.1.3.2Thomas Jefferson, A Bill Declaring Who Shall Be Deemed Citizens of the Commonwealth, 1779

THE FOUNDERS CONSTITUTION

Be it enacted by the General Assembly, that all white persons born within the territory of this commonwealth and all who have resided therein two years next before the passing of this act, and all who shall hereafter migrate into the same; and shall before any court of record give satisfactory proof by their own oath or affirmation, that they intend to reside therein, and moreover shall give assurance of fidelity to the commonwealth; and all infants wheresoever born, whose father, if living, or otherwise, whose mother was, a citizen at the time of their birth, or who migrate hither, their father, if living, or otherwise their mother becoming a citizen, or who migrate hither without father or mother, shall be deemed citizens of this commonwealth, until they relinquish that character in manner as herein after expressed: And all others not being citizens of any the United States of America, shall be deemed aliens. The clerk of the court shall enter such oath of record, and give the person taking the same a certificate thereof, for which he shall receive the fee of one dollar. And in order to preserve to the citizens of this commonwealth, that natural right, which all men have of relinquishing the country, in which birth, or other accident may have thrown them, and, seeking subsistance and happiness wheresoever they may be able, or may hope to find them: And to declare unequivocably what circumstances shall be deemed evidence of an intention in any citizen to exercise that right, it is enacted and declared, that whensoever any citizen of this commonwealth, shall by word of mouth in the presence of the court of the county, wherein he resides, or of the General Court, or by deed in writing, under his hand and seal, executed in the presence of three witnesses, and by them proved in either of the said courts, openly declare to the same court, that he relinquishes the character of a citizen, and shall depart the commonwealth; or whensoever he shall without such declaration depart the commonwealth and enter into the service of any other state, not in enmity with this, or any other of the United States of America, or do any act whereby he shall become a subject or citizen of such state, such person shall be considered as having exercised his natural right of expatriating himself, and shall be deemed no citizen of this commonwealth from the time of his departure. The free white inhabitants of every of the states, parties to the American confederation, paupers, vagabonds and fugitives from justice excepted, shall be intitled to all rights, privileges, and immunities of free citizens in this commonwealth, and shall have free egress, and regress, to and from the same, and shall enjoy therein, all the privileges of trade, and commerce, subject to the same duties, impositions and restrictions as the citizens of this commonwealth. And if any person guilty of, or charged with treason, felony, or other high misdemeanor, in any of the said states, shall flee from justice and be found in this commonwealth, he shall, upon demand of the Governor, or Executive power of the state, from which he fled, be delivered up to be removed to the state having jurisdiction of his offence. Where any person holding property, within this commonwealth, shall be attainted within any of the said states, parties to the said confederation, of any of those crimes, which by the laws of this commonwealth shall be punishable by forfeiture of such property, the said property shall be disposed of in the same manner as it would have been if the owner thereof had been attainted of the like crime in this commonwealth.

18.1.3.3Patterson, New Jersey Plan, June 15, 1787

Whereas it is necessary in Order to form the People of the U. S. of America into a Nation, that the States should be consolidated, by which means all the Citizens thereof will become equally intitled to and will equally participate in the same Privileges and Rights, and in all waste, uncultivated, and back Territory and Lands; it is therefore resolved, that all the Lands contained within the Limits of each State individually, and of the U. S. generally be considered as constituting one Body or Mass, and be divided into thirteen or more integral Parts.

18.2DISCUSSIONS OF DRAFTS AND PROPOSALS

18.2.1PHILADELPHIA CONVENTION

18.2.1.1June 19, 1787

Mr. Madison. … Examine Mr. P.s plan, & say whether it promises satisfaction in these respects.

3. Will it prevent trespasses of the States on each other? Of these enough has been already seen. He instanced Acts of Virga. & Maryland which give a preference to their own citizens in cases where the Citizens (of other states) are entitled to equality of privileges by the Articles of Confederation. He considered the emissions of paper money (& other kindred measures) as also aggressions. The States relatively to one an [sic] other being each of them either Debtor or Creditor; The Creditor States must suffer unjustly from every emission by the debtor States. We have seen retaliating acts on this subject which threatened danger not to the harmony only, but the tranquillity of the Union. The plan of Mr. Paterson, not giving even a negative on the Acts of the States, left them as much at liberty as ever to execute their unrighteous projects agst. each other.

18.2.1.3September 15, 1787

The 4th article, respecting the extending the rights of the Citizens of each State, throughout the United States; the delivery of fugitives from justice, upon demand, and the giving full faith and credit to the records and proceedings of each, is formed exactly upon the principles of the 4th article of the present Confederation, except with this difference, that the demand of the Executive of a State, for any fugitive, criminal offender, shall be complied with. It is now confined to treason, felony, or other high misdemeanor; but, as there is no good reason for confining it to those crimes, no distinction ought to exist, and a State should always be at liberty to demand a fugitive from its justice, let his crime be what it may.

18.2.3.2Cassius, No. 6, December 21, 1787

Section 2, of article IV. provides, that the citizens of each state shall be intitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states. This section must also be a source of much advantage to the inhabitants of the different states, who may have business to transact in various parts of the continent, as being equally intitled to the rights of citizenship in one as well as another. They will find less difficulty in pursuing their various concerns than if it were otherwise.

Massachusetts Gazette.

18.2.3.3A Freeman, No. 1, January 23, 1788

The consolidation of the United States into one government by the operation of the proposed constitution (in contradistinction from a confederacy) appears to you to be the consequence of the system, and the intention of its framers. This is the point of difference which I mean to treat of, and for the present I shall confine my observations to it alone.

Were the parts of the fœderal government which you have particularized as much of the nature of consolidation as you seem to suppose, real nature and design, and the state sovereignties, would indeed be finally annihilated. The appearances which have misled you I shall remark on in the course of these papers, and I shall endeavour to exhibit clear and permanent marks and lines of separate sovereignty, which must ever distinguish and circumscribe each of the several states, and prevent their annihilation by the fœderal government, or any of its operations.

When the people of America dissolved their connexion with the crown of Britain, they found themselves separated from all the world, but a few powerless colonies, the principal of which indeed they expected to induce into their measures. The crown having been merely a centre of union, the act of independence dissolved the political ties that had formerly existed among the states, and it was attended with no absolute confederacy; but many circumstances conspired to render some new form of connexion desirable and necessary. We wished not to continue distinct bodies of people, but to form a respectable nation. The remains of our ancient governments kept us in the form of thirteen political bodies, and from a variety of just and prudent considerations, we determined to enter into an indissoluble and perpetual union. Though a confederacy of sovereign states was the mode of connexion which was wisely desired and actually adopted, yet in that feeble and inadequate bond of union to which we assented, articles strongly partaking of the nature of consolidation are observable.

We see, for example, that the free inhabitants of each state were rendered, to all intents and purposes, free citizens of all the rest. Persons fleeing from justice in one state were to be delivered up by any other in which they might take refuge, contrary to the laws prevailing among distinct sovereignties, whereby the jurisdiction of one state pervaded the territories of all the rest, to the effectual length of trial, condemnation and punishment. The right to judge of the sums that should be expended for the use of the nation lies, even under the old confederation, solely with Congress, and after the demand is fixed by them, and formally made, the states are bound, as far as they can be bound by any compact, to pay their respective quotas into the fœderal treasury, by which the power of the purse is fully given to them; nor can the states constitutionally refuse to comply. It is very certain that there is not in the present fœderal government vigor enough to carry this actually delegated power into execution; yet, if Congress had possessed energy sufficient to have done it, there is no doubt but they would have been justifiable in the measure, though the season of invasion was unfavorable for internal contests.

Pennsylvania Gazette.

18.2.3.4The Federal Farmer, No. 18, January 25, 1788

ARTICLE IV.

Sect. 1. Full faith and credit shall be given in each State to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other State. And the Congress may by general laws prescribe the manner in which such acts, records, and proceedings shall be proved, and the effect thereof.

Sect. 2. The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States.

A person charged in any State with treason, felony, or other crime, who shall flee from justice, and be found in another State, shall, on demand of the executive authority of the State from which he fled, be delivered up, to be removed to the State having jurisdiction of the crime.

No person held to service or labour in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labour, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labour may be due.

The convenience, justice, and utility, of these sections, are obvious.

At present, slaves absconding and going into some of the northern States, may thereby effect their freedom: But under the Federal Constitution they will be delivered up to the lawful proprietor.

Virginia Independent Chronicle.

18.2.3.5A Native of Virginia, April 2, 1788

Further, the federal city and districts, will be totally distinct from any state, and a citizen of a state will not of course be a subject of any of them; and to avail himself of the privileges and immunities of them, must he not be naturalized by congress in them? and may not congress make any proportion of the citizens of the states naturalized subjects of the federal city and districts, and thereby entitle them to sue or defend, in all cases, in the federal courts? I have my doubts, and many sensible men, I find, have their doubts, on these points; and we ought to observe, they must be settled in the courts of law, by their rules, distinctions, and fictions.

Petersburg, Virginia

18.2.3.6The Federalist, No. 80, Publius (Hamilton), May 28, 1788

It may be esteemed the basis of the union, that “the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several states.” And if it be a just principle that every government ought to possess the means of executing its own provisions by its own authority, it will follow, that in order to the inviolable maintenance of that equality of privileges and immunities to which the citizens of the union will be entitled, the national judiciary ought to preside in all cases in which one state or its citizens are opposed to another state or its citizens. To secure the full effect of so fundamental a provision against all evasion and subterfuge, it is necessary that its construction should be committed to that tribunal, which, having no local attachments, will be likely to be impartial between the different states and their citizens, and which, owing its official existence to the union, will never be likely to feel any bias inauspicious to the principles on which it is founded.

18.2.4LETTERS AND DIARIES

A Legislature without corresponding Judicial Courts is of no Consequence to the People—That this must result from the System; that the State Legislatures will have no Judicial Courts, is not difficult to make apparent —The continental Judicial is to decide on Controversies between Citizens of different States—A Citizen of Masstts. commences Process against a fellow Citizen—Altho the Plaintiff is not in fact a Citizen of New hampshire, yet in Law he is so, & entitled to all the Priviledges & Immunities of a Citizen of New hampshire, one of which is to try a Massachusetts Man before a continental Court.—Therefore the ingenious Lawyer, will always make one appear before the Court as a Citizen in Law, & the other as a Citizen in fact—which will give the continental Court Cognizance of Controversies between two Citizens of the same State— What Use then for a State Judicial? of what Consequence will be the State Bill of Rights—The continental Judicial are not bound by it.

18.3DISCUSSIONS OF RIGHTS

18.3.1.1Cowell, 1672

Priviledge, Privilegium, Is defined by Cicero in his Oration pro domo sua, to be lex privata homini irrogata. It is, Sayes another, Jus singulare, whereby a private man, or a particular Corporation, is exempted from the rigor of the Common Law. It is sometimes used in the Common Law for a place that hath any special immunity, Kitchin, fol. 118. Priviledge is either personal or real; a personal priviledge is that which is granted to any person either against or beyond the course of the Common Law: As for example, A Member of Parliament may not be arrested, nor any of his Servants, during the sitting of the Parliament; nor for a certain time before and after. A priviledge real, is that which is granted to a place, as to the universities, that none of either may be called to Westminster-Hall, upon any Contract made within their own Precincts, or prosecuted in other Courts: And one belonging to the Court of Chancery cannot be sued in any other Court, certain Cases excepted, and if he be, he may remove it by Writ of Priviledge, grounded upon the Stat. 18 E. 3. 18.3.1.2.bPrivileges

Privilege, (Privilegium) Is defined to be a private or particular Law, whereby a private Person or Corporation is exempted from the Rigour of the Common Law; or it is some Benefit or Advantage granted or allowed to any Persons contrary to the Course of Law, and is sometimes used for a Place that hath a special Immunity: A Privilege is therefore Personal, or Real; Personal, as of Members of Parliament, and of Convocation, and their menial Servants, not to be arrested in the Time of Parliament or Convocation, nor for certain Days before or after; Peers, Ambassadors and their Servants, &c. Real, that which is granted to a Place, as to the King's Palaces, the Courts at Westminster, the Universities, &c. that their Members or Officers must be sued within their Precincts or Courts, and not in other Courts. Cowel. 2 Roll. Abr. 272. Finch 321. Also the Counties Palatine, Cinque Ports, and many Cities and Towns, &c. have Privileges as to Pleas, that none shall be compelled to appear or answer out of their Jurisdiction. 4 Inst. 212. Crompt. Jurisd. 137. The King's Servants are privileged from Arrests; for that the King shall not be deprived of them, without Leave. Raym. 152. And the Queen's Servants are the King's, and his Chamberlain may privilege them. 2 Keb. 455. A Member of Parliament is privileged, as well in his Lands and Goods, as in his Person; because being disturb'd in any of them, he is hinder'd in serving of the Commonwealth, which is to be preserr'd before all private Interests. 2 Lill. Abr. 370. The Lord Mayor of London is privileged from all Actions, that he may not be hindered in the Government of the City: And so is an Alderman from serving Offices, &c. Ibid. Cro. Car. 585. Privileges are of Parliament; of Courts, and their Officers and Suitors; and of Attornies, &c. 2 Lill. Abr. 368. According to Holt Chief Justice, Privilege is either of Court or of Process; as in the Court of Common Pleas, every Person who belongs to that Court, such as Attornies, and their Clerks, &c. shall have the Privilege of being sued there, and not elsewhere; and this is the Privilege of the Court: But none shall be allowed the Privilege of Process but those who are the Officers of the Court, and are supposed to be always attending therein. 3 Salk. 283. And there are two Kinds of Privileges in the Court of C. B. the one is of the Officers of the Court, to be sued there by Bill; and the other of the Clerks to be sued there by Original. Ibid. In the Court of Exchequer there are three Sorts of Persons who are privileged, i. e. Debtors to the King, Accountants, and Officers; against the first of these Persons, any Man who has a Privilege in another Court, as an Officer or Attorney thereof, shall have his Privilege; for the Privilege of a Person as Debtor, is but a general Privilege: But if an Accountant begin his Suit here, he hath in such Case a special Privilege, and no other Privilege shall be allowed against him, because of his Attendance to pass his Account, in which the King hath a particular Concern; and it is the same in an Officer of the Court, who commences a Suit here, no Privilege shall prevail against him: Though where the Account is closed and reduced to a Debt, there the Accountant hath only the general Privilege as Debtor; and the like of a Servant to an Officer or Minister of the Court, he has no Privilege against a privileged Person elsewhere. Hardr. 267, 507. By Hale Chief Baron, a general Privilege of a Person as a Member of the University, of a Clerk in Chancery, doth not take away the particular Privilege of the Court of Exchequer, where the Person is Debtor and Accountant to the King. Ibid. 189. But one who was Receiver General of the Revenues of the Crown in W. being sued in the Common Pleas, brought a Writ of Privilege out of the Exchequer, and it was disallowed by the Court. Dyer 328. 2 Nels. Abr. 1296. And the King's Debtors shall not be privileged by Parliament. Stat. 12 W. 3. In the Exchequer it hath been held, that there are two Ways of pleading Privilege; one is, if the Party is an Officer on Record, to go to Trial, and at the Trial to produce the Record; and if he is no Officer, but Attendant on the Court, that must be tried by a Jury: The other Way is, if he be an Officer on Record, then to produce a Writ of Privilege, at the Time of the Plea pleaded, upon which there can be no Issue joined; and being otherwise pleaded, &c. Judgment may be given to answer over. Mod. Cas. 305. Writ of Privilege lies for an Officer of the Courts at Westminster, that is sued in any other Court than where he attends, to remove the Cause to his own Court. 2 Inst. 551. Stat. 18 Ed. 3. A Defendant pleaded his Privilege, that he was an Attorney of C. B. and upon Demurrer to his Plea, it was objected, that it ought to be concluded with a Prosert hic in Curia the Writ of Privilege testifying him to be an Attorney, which is true, and that he ought to have said prout patet per Recordum; but that must be in such Case where he sets forth the Writ, and he may plead Privilege upon the Writ, or Exemplification of the Record of his Admission, or without it. 2 Salk. 545. If Privilege of an Attorney be pleaded with a Writ, the Defendant cannot be denied to be an Attorney; if without, he may, and then a Certiorari shall be awarded to certify whether he be an Attorney or not. Ibid. By Order of the Court of C. B. the Clerk of the Warrants is to certify that an Attorney's Name is upon the Roll of Attornies, before he shall have a Writ of Privilege; and Writs of Privilege are to be signed by the Clerk of the Warrants, to shew the Person is an Attorney of the Court, or they shall not be allowed. Trin. 29 Car. 2. Trin. 9 W. 3. And to save Arrest upon Process, an Attorney must deliver his Writ of Privilege to the Sheriff, and allow it with him; otherwise the Sheriff will not discharge him upon the Writ of Privilege, unless it be on Process issuing out of an inferior Court, but he must plead his Privilege sub pede sigilli. Pract. Solic. 322. Privilege is not to be pleaded in the Negative; as that an Attorney or Clerk, ought not to be sued elsewhere but in such a Court, without saying it is usual for them to be sued there, &c. and it should not be pleaded too general. 2 Sid. 164. But see 2 Salk. 543. In Trespass against an Attorney of C. B. be pleaded his Privilege per Attornatum, to which Plea the Plaintiff demurred; because he ought to have pleaded it in Person, and pleading by Attorney destroys the very Reason of his Privilege, which is his Attending the Court in Person; but the Plea was adjudged good, for he may be sick, or have Business in another Court to attend. Style 413. But an Information being brought against a Custos Brevium of B. R. for several Abuses in his Office, he insisted not to appear in Person, but by Attorney; and it was ruled that he should appear in Person, because he is an Officer of the Court, and is presumed to be always present; and if he doth not appear, Judgment shall be given against him without any other Process. Sid. 134. Privilege has been allowed for a Clerk in the Office of Custos Brevium, and a Writ of Privilege signed by the Justices of C. B. to exempt him from being arrested or pressed, &c. It being the Custom and Privilege of that Court, that the Attornies and Clerks shall not be pressed, nor chose in any Office, sine voluntate, but ought to attend the Service of the Court. Cro. Car. 8. Though it is said an Attorney shall not be excused by Privilege from Offices which may be executed by Deputy; only those which require personal Duty, as that of Churchwarden, Constable, &c. March 30. 2 Lill. Abr. 374. A Filizer's Clerk claimed to be privileged in B. R. but was denied it; for though the Master may be privileged, the Court takes no Notice of the Servant, he having no necessary Dependence on the Court. Mich. 23 Car. And Privilege extends only to such Attornies, &c. who have an immediate Dependance on the Court; and not so their Servants: It hath been held, that although an Attorney doth not practise, he shall have Privilege so long as he continues an Attorney upon Record. Lutw, 1667. Attornies or Filizers of the Common Pleas, if sued in B. R. may plead their Privilege, because they owe a personal Attendance to that Court: But a Serjeant at Law being sued in the Court of B. R. cannot plead Privilege of C. B. for he may sign Pleas, be of Counsel, and Practice in other Courts in Westminster-Hall, and is not confined to Practice in the C. B. though if he is sued in any inferior Court, he shall have his Privilege. 2 Lev. 129. 1 Mod. 298. And yet formerly a Serjeant at Law claiming his Privilege to be sued in the Court of C. B. had his Privilege allowed; so a Serjeant's Clerk. Trin. 6 Ed. 6. and 28 Hen. 8. Dyer 24. Cro. Car. 59. A Barrister at Law, attending on the Court, ought to have Privilege to be sued in all transitory Actions in Middlesex: And an Attorney of C. B. &c. may chuse whether he will sue or be sued out of the County of Middlesex; because his Attendance is always supposed to be there. 2 Lill. 370. Where an Attorney is sued as Executor or Administrator, he shall not be allowed his Privilege; nor in a joint Action, with another not privileged; though if the Action may be severed, the Want of Privilege of one shall not take away the Privilege of the other. 1 Salk. 2, 245. 2 Nels. Abr. 1295. Privilege shall not be allowed to a Man, where his Wife is joined in the Action with him: The Wife of an Attorney of B. R. if she be arrested, shall not have Privilege; but her Husband is to put in Bail for her, or for Want thereof she is to be committed to Prison; for the Husband is privileged only in Regard of his personal Attendance upon the Court, and his Privilege is annexed to his Person, and concerns not his Wife. Noy 68. 2 Lill. Abr. 371. An Attorney of the Common Pleas was indebted to A. B. who was indebted to C. D. who according to the Custom of London attached the Money in the Attorney's Hands; and he brought a Writ of Privilege, which was allowed by the Court, because the Attorney was not indebted to C. D. but only by Custom; and the Privileges of those attending the Courts at Westminster, shall not be impeach'd by any Custom whatsoever. 2 Leon. 156. But where Money was attached in London, in the Hands of an Attorney of B. R. it was held, he shall not have his Writ of Privilege, because the Plaintiff cannot follow his Attachment against him in the King's Bench, but only in the Court of London; and if this Court should stay Proceedings there, then there would be a Failure of Justice. 2 Lill Abr. 371, 372. One that hath a Suit depending in B. R. &c. is privileged from being arrested in coming to the Court from his House or Lodging, to follow his Cause, and also in going back again directly to his House or Lodging; and if he be arrested in so doing, the Court upon Motion made to inform them of it, will set the Party at Liberty, and punish the Person that arrested him, if he knew the other had a Suit depending here, and came hither to attend it. 2 Lill. 371. One that was coming to the Court of King's Bench to attend upon his Cause, was arrested as he was coming, and forced to put in Bail; and on Motion, making it appear to the Court, he and his Bail were both discharged; and the Party that arrested him had been also punished, had he not alleged that he knew not that the Party arrested came about his Business depending in the Court. Mich. 22 Car. B. R. An Action of Assault, &c. was brought in the Common Pleas, and the Parties were at Issue, and after the Trial, when the Jury went out to consider of their Verdict, the Defendant in this Action arrested the Plaintiff by Process out of B. R. for an Assault made before that Time on him; and this appearing to the Court, they order'd him to release the Party from the Arrest, and they set a Fine upon him for the Contempt, which he immediately paid in Court: And the Court declared, that the Suitors ought safely to come and go, by the Privilege of the Court, without Vexation elsewhere. Golds. 33. One arrested in Westminster Hall sedente Curia, may be discharged upon Motion, if the Arrest was on Mesne Process; but not if he was taken in Execution, though even in that Case, the Officer is punishable per Curiam. Bulst. 85. Where a Man is arrested in an inferior Court, coming to Westminster upon a Suit brought for or against him, he shall have the Privilege to be discharged from the Suit below: But this ought to appear by the Examination of the Party. Jenk. Cent. 172. And if the Defendant be in Execution in any such inferior Court, and he had Cause of Privilege at that Time; if the Writ of Privilege be delivered before it, he shall be discharged: 'Tis otherwise if not delivered till after the Execution. Ibid. Privilege of the Court was prayed to protect a Witness from being arrested in coming to and going from the Court, which was granted. Hill. 1655. 2 Lill. 370. In Treason, Felony, or Breach of the Peace, no Privilege shall be allowed; nor on an Indictment, &c. It has been adjudged, that where Proceedings are merely at the Suit of the King, as upon Indictments or Informations brought by the Attorney General, in such Cases Privilege shall not be allowed; but where the Proceedings are at the Suit of the King and the Party, as in Case of a common Informer, &c. there the Defendant may have his Privilege. 1 Lutw. 193. If a privileged Person in one Court, do sue a privileged Person in another, in a Civil Action, the Person sued shall not have his Privilege. 2 Leon. 41. 2 Lill. Abr. 368. A privileged Person shall not be generally allowed his Privilege upon Motion; but he must plead it, and on Pleading it shall be allowed. Mich. 23 Car. B. R. But there is no Need to plead the Privilege of the Exchequer; for it shall be granted upon producing the Red Book of the Exchequer by a Baron of the Court. 1 Lutw. 46. And of later Times, the Party hath been admitted to Privilege upon Prayer to the Court. 2 Lill. 370. By some Opinions, Privilege may be allowed, after Bail put in; and not after Imparlance: By others, that Privilege of Attornies may not be pleaded after Bail given in, which allows the Jurisdiction. &c. 3 Lev. 343. 1 Salk. 1, 2. To sue an Attorney privileged, or any Clerk or Officer of the Court of B. R. they are not to be arrested, but be proceeded against as follows: A Declaration is to be filed against the Party privileged, and a Copy of it delivered to him, and then Rules given in order for his Plea; and the Declaration and Rules being delivered and served in Time, he will be obliged to plead the same Term; and if he do not appear and plead, after called in Court, &c. he may be forejudged the Court: If such Attorney, Clerk or Officer be Plaintiff, and his Declaration is delivered, and the Rules given in Time, the Defendant is to plead the same Term, and cannot imparl over to the next; which ought to be remember'd, for fear of Executions when not thought of. Pract. Solic. 259, 260. In B. R. where an Attorney is Plaintiff, he cannot by his Privilege have special Bail where other Persons cannot have it; except it be for Fees, as a Minister of the Court, in which Case he may. In the Court of C. B. if an Attorney is Defendant in any Suit, it is not required that he shall give in Bail; and by giving Bail, he waves his Privilege: Yet by the Usage of the Court, on Attachment at the Suit of an Attorney Plaintiff, though the Debt be but 40 *s.*special Bail shall be given. Ibid. 260, 323. A Bill must be filed, though an Attorney agrees to appear and dispense with it; but it may in such Case be filed afterwards: And a Bill cannot be filed against a Person privileged in Vacation, for then he is not present in Court. Hill. and Pasch. 9 W. 3. B. R. If without filing a Declaration, an Action is brought against an Attorney, &c. he may bring Attachment of Privilege, and supersede the Action.

Yet, whatever way is made use of, it is incumbent on the promulgators to do it in the most public and perspicuous manner; not like Caligula, who (according to Dio Cassius) wrote his laws in a very small character, and hung them up upon high pillars, the more effectually to ensnare the people. There is still a more unreasonable method than this, which is called making of laws ex post facto; when after an action is committed, the legislator then for the first time declares it to have been a crime, and inflicts a punishment upon the person who has committed it; here it is impossible that the party could foresee that an action, innocent when it was done, should be afterwards converted to guilt by a subsequent law; he had therefore no cause to abstain from it; and all punishment for not abstaining must of consequence be cruel and unjust[e]. All laws should be therefore made to commence in futuro, and be notified before their commencement; which is implied in the term "prescribed." But when this rule is in the usual manner notified, or prescribed, it is then the subject's business to be thoroughly acquainted therewith; for if ignorance, of what he might know, were admitted as a legitimate excuse, the laws would be of no effect, but might always be eluded with impunity.

Privilege, (Privilegium,) Is defined by Cicere in his oration pro domo sua, to be lex privata homini irrogata. It is, says another, Jus singulare, whereby a private man, or a particular corporation is exempted from the rigour of the Common law. It is sometimes used in the Common law for a place that hath some special immunity. Kitchin, fol. 118.

Privilege is either personal or real: A personal privilege is that which is granted to any person, either against, or beyond the course of the Common law: As for example, A member of parliament may not be arrested, nor any of his servants, during the sitting of the parliament; nor for a certain time before and after. A privilege real is that which is granted to a place, as to the universities, that none of either may be called to Westminster Hall, upon any contract made within their own precincts, or prosecuted in other courts: And one belonging to the court of Chancery cannot be sued in any other court, certain cases excepted; and if he be, he may remove it by writ of privilege, grounded upon the statute 18 E. 3. Cowell.

Privilege* is an exemption from some duty, burthen or attendance, to which certain persons are intitled, from a supposition of law, that the stations they fill, or the offices they are engaged in, are such as require all their time and care; and that therefore without this indulgence it would be impracticable to execute such offices to that advantage which the publick good requires. 4 Bac. Abr. 215.

1. OF PRIVILEGE IN SUITS ALLOWED OFFICERS AND ATTENDANTS ITS THE COURTS OF JUSTICE.

The officers, ministers and clerks of the courts in Westminster Hall are allowed particular privileges in respect of their necessary attendance on those courts; they are regularly to sue and be sued in the courts they respectively belong to, and cannot, except in certain cases, be impleaded elsewhere; which privilege arises from a supposition of law, that the business of the court or their clients causes would suffer by their being drawn into another, than that in which their personal attendance is required. 2 Inst. 551. 4 Inst. 71. Vaugh. 154. Dyer 377. a: pl. 30.

Anderson* Ch. J. of C. B. brought trespass by bill for breaking his house in the city of Worcester, against a citizen of the said city; the mayor and commonalty came and shewed a charter granted by Edward VI. and demanded conusance of pleas; but it was refused, because the privilege of that court, of which the plaintiff was a chief member, is more ancient than the patent; for the justices clerks and attornies of this court ought to be here attending to do their business, and shall not be impleaded or compelled to implead others elsewhere; and this privilege was given this court upon the original erection of it. 3 Leon. 149. Lord Anderson's case.

An attorney so long as he remains on record, shall have his privilege; and therefore where it was moved, that J. S. shall put in special bail, being an attorney at large, and having discontinued his practice, the court said, that attornies at large have the same privilege with the clerks of the courts, and are to appear de die in diem; and they were not satisfied that he had discontinued his practice. Bro. tit. Attorney 67. Tit. Bill 24. 1 Vent. 1. Sir John How v. Walley.

But where J. S. was arrested in B. R. and after the arrest he procured himself to be made an attorney of C. B. and prayed his privilege, it was disallowed, because it accrued pendente lite. 2 Rol. Rep. 115.

In debt against the warden of the Fleet, by bill of privilege, he refused to appear; the court doubted how they could compel him, as they could not forejudge him the court, he having an inheritance in his office; but it being surmised that he made a lease of his office, it was held, that he should not have his privilege, for that the lessee, and not he, was the officer during the lease. 2 Leon. 173. Gittinson v. Tyrrel.

So if the marshal of B. R. grants his place for life; the grantor has no privilege during that time. 1 Vent. 65.

A clerk of B. R. was sued in an inferior court for a debt under five pounds, and had a writ of privilege allowed; for the stat. 21 Jac. 1. cap. 23. never intended to take away the privilege of attornies. Palm. 403.

In the court of Exchequer there are three sorts of privilege: 1st, As debtor. 2dly, As accountant. 3dly, As officer. Hard. 365.

J. S*. was sued in an action of battery in London, which he removed into B. R. and afterwards prayed his privilege of the court of Exchequer; and upon the puisne Baron's coming into court, and bringing the red book of the Exchequer, which shewed that he was an escheator, and so an accountant to the King, the privilege was allowed. Noy 40. Walrend v. Winroll.

If one holds of the Queen as of her manor, he shall not have the privilege of the Exchequer for that cause; but if the King grants tithes, and thereupon reserves a rent nomine decima, and a tenure of him, there he shall have privilege. 2 Leon. 21. Lightfood v. Butler.

On a latitat's being sued out against the commissioners of the Treasury, the puisne Baron of the Exchequer came into the court of B. R. and brought into court the red book of the Exchequer, which is deemed a record in that court; and thereby it appeared, that the Treasurer had privilege of being sued only in that court; and the patent being produced in court which constituted the defendants, &c. and granted them the office of Treasurer of England, their privilege was allowed them without putting them to bring a writ of privilege; the court grounding themselves on the record before them. 2 Show. 299. Lampen v. Sir Edward Deering & al'.

It hath been held, that the Treasurer of the navy is eo ipso an accountant; and that an accountant's privilege will hold against a special privilege in another court, as officer of the court or otherwise; though it be not alleged, that such an accountant is entred upon his account; for that every accountant may be attached by the court to make up his account, and must attend for that purpose de die in diem. Hard. 316. See Moor 753. 2 Inst. 23, 551. Bro. Privilege. 16.

In debt in B. R. against J. S. be pleaded to the jurisdiction, That none of the privy chamber ought to be sued in any other court, without the special licence of the lord chamberlain of the houshold, and that he was one of the privy chamber; on demurrer to this plea, the court overruled it with great resentment, and awarded a Respondeas ouster. Raym. 34. 1 Keb. 137. Barrington v. Venables.

It was agreed in Serjeant Scrogg's case, That the privilege of the court of C. B. which Serjeants claimed, extended only to inserior courts, not to the courts in Westminster-Hall; and that he essy be sued in any of these, because he is not confined to that court alone, but may practise in any other court; but it is otherwise as to attornies or philazers, who cannot practise in their own name in any other court but such as they respectively belong to; and that therefore a Serjeant at law is to be sued by original, and not by bill of privilege, 2 Lev. 129. 3 Keb. 42. Moor 296. S. C.

So in action by bill brought in C. B. against a Serjeant at law, for work done, he pleaded that he ought to have been sued by original, and not by bill; and on demurrer, the court held, that the case of a serjeant and prothonotary's clerk were upon the same foot, neither of them being bound to personal attendance, as prothonotaries and attornies were; and that therefore be ought to have been sued by original, and accordingly gave a judgment for the defendant. Trin. 7 Geo. 2. Serjeant Girdler's case.

J. S*. being arrested by a writ out of C. B. brought his writ of privilege as clerk of the crown office; but it appearing that he was only a clerk to Mr. Ward (clerk of that office) and not an immediate clerk of the office, a supersedeas to the writ of privilege was granted on motion; the court having agreed, That he had no more privilege than an attorney's clerk. 2 Show. 287. Ward v. Lawrence.

A Serjeant at law, barrister, attorney or other privileged person, whose attendance is necessary in Westminster-Hall, may lay his action in Middlesex, though the cause of action accrued in another county; and the court on the usual affidavit will not change the venue. Stil. 460. Moor 64. 2 Show. 242.

But it hath been held, That if a privileged person be sued, and the action brought against him in the right county, his privilege will not intitle him to have it tried in Middlesex. Carth. 126. 1 Show. 148. Bisse v. Harcourt.

If an attorney lays his action in London, the court will change the venue on the usual affidavit; for by not laying it in Middlesex, he seems regardless of his privilege, and ist o [sic; is to]be considered as a person at large. 2 Vent. 47. Salk. 668.

On a motion to discharge a rule which had been obtained for changing the venue, it appeared, That the plaintiff was a barrister and master in Chancery; and the court held that he had a privilege, by reason of his attendance, to lay his action in Middlesex, and therefore discharged the rule. 2 Lord Raym. 1556. Fitz. 40. S. C. Burroughs v. Willis.

2. OF THE PRIVILEGE OF PEERS AND MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT.

All peers, without any distinction as to degree or rank, are intitled to privilege; for they are equally obliged to attend the service of the publick, and are always supposed amenable, and to have sufficient property to answer in suits and actions brought against them, and on these grounds are not to be arrested or molested in their persons. This privilege extended formerly to abbots, as it does to bishops, members of the convocation, and members of the house of commons at this day. 4 Inst. 24. Stil. 222, 253. Dyer 314. 1 Mod. 66. Bro. Exig. 3 Moor 767. Scobel's memorials 88, 103. Sir Simon Dew's Journals 414. Finch 355.

Dyer 60. a. in margin. Noy 102. Moor 78. Stamdf. P. C. 38.

The privilege of parliament according to the law of parliament is of a very extensive nature; but all that is here intended to be treated of is only the taking notice of and pointing out such cases and resolutions relative hereto, as are to be found in the books of law; not to determine concerning this privilege as settled by the rules and orders of each house, of which they themselves are the sole judges, though the King's Courts incidently take notice thereof, and are bound to determine in matters of privilege when so directed by act of parliament. Lord Coke says of this law, ab omnibus quaerenda est, a multis ignorata, a paucis cognita. 4 Inst. 15. 13 Co. 63. 4 Inst. 23, 50, 363. Prinne's Animad. on 4 Inst. 12. Cro. Car. 181, 604. 2 Lord Raym. 1111. See 1 Mod. 66.

This privilege extends only to the peers of Great Britain; so that a nobleman of any other country, or a lord of Ireland, hath not any other privileges in this kingdom than a common person; also the son and heir apparent of a nobleman is not entitled to the privilege of being tried by his peers, which is confined to such person as is a lord of parliament at the time; but it seems that an infant peer is privileged from arrests, his person being held sacred. Co. Lit. 156. 2 Inst. 48. 3 Inst. 30.

The peers of Scotland had no privilege in this kingdom before the union, but now by the 23d article of the union, the sixteen elected peers shall have all the privileges of the peerage of England, excepting only that of sitting and voting in parliament. 9 Co. 117. 1 P. Will. 583.

A peeress by birth is intitled to privilege; so of a peeress by marriage, and that as well during the coverture as after; but as a peeress by marriage is said to lose her dignity by marrying a commoner, Q. If after such marriage she is intitled to any privilege. 2 Inst. 50. Still. 222, 234, 252. 2 Cha. Ca. 224. Co. Lit. 16. 6 Co. 53. Dyer 79.

It was holden by my Ld. Ch. J. Holt, in the case of the Lord Banbury, that where a person is called by writ to the house of Peers, he is no peer 'till he sits in parliament, the writ giving him no nobility or honour; but that it was the sitting in the house of Lords, and associating himself with them that ennobled his blood; and that therefore, if the King or he dies before a parliament meets, the writ is determined, and the party remains as commoner; but he held it otherwise in a creation by letters patents, by which the party is immediately noble without any other act or ceremony; and though the parliament never meets, or the King dies, the nobility remains to him and his posterity, according to the limitations in the patent. 4 Bac. Abr. 229.

A member of parliament shall have privilege of parliament, not only for his servants, but for his horses, &c. or other goods distrainable. 4 Inst. 24.

J.S*. brought debt for rent against H. who pleaded that he was tenant and servant to Lord Moon, and prayed his writ of privilege might be allowed him; the plaintiff demurred; it was argued, that the matter of the plea was against the Common statute law; but per Roll Ch. J. you ought not to argue generally against the privilege of parliament; every court hath its privilege; I conceive a writ of privilege belongs to a parliament man, so far as to protect his lands and estate; and you have admitted his privilege by your demurrer. Stil. 139. Smith v. Hale. See Latch 150, and the S. C. Stil. 167, 223. 1 Jon. 155.

The warden of the Fleet insisted on a writ of privilege, alleging that he was obliged to attend the house of Lords; but it appearing that he was sued upon an escape, and the court considering the great inconvenience that would ensue, and being of opinion that it was in their discretion whether they would grant such a writ or no, upon a motion they said he might plead it if he would, but they would not award such a writ, or if his privilege was infringed, he might complain to the house of Lords. 2 Vent. 154.

In debt, the defendant pleads he was a servant to a member of parliament, and ideo capi seu arrestari non debet; the plaintiff prays judgment, and quia videtur quod tale privilegium quod magnates, &c. & eorum familiares capi seu arrestari non debent; sed nullum habetur privilegium quod non debent implacitari, ideo respondeat ouster. 1 Mod. 146.

Defendant after a general imparlance pleaded, That he was a servant to a peer, viz. the Earl of Pembroke; and by North Ch. J. it is not receivable, for it is the privilege of the master and not the servant's; but the defendant ought to sue his writ of privilege, for perhaps his master will not protect him; and if he will not, he is then left to answer; like to the case of a counsellor, where it is the privilege of the client that he shall not be compelled to discover the secrets of his client; but if the client be willing, the court will compel the counsel to discover what he knows; which Serjeant Maynard said was his father's case before the Lord Cecil, in the court of Wards. North said, as it was a matter of great consequence, he would advise with Lord Chancellor and the rest of the judges, what used to be done in such cases; afterwards it was moved again, and North said it was moved in the house of Lords, and that they had left it to the judges; and therefore the plea was rejected. Pasch. 30 Car. 2. in C. B. Lea v. Wheatley.

By an order of the 24th of January 1696, in the house of Lords, it was resolved, That no common attorney or solicitor, though employed by any peer, should have the privilege of this house.

By an order of the 24th of May 1724, this privilege was restrained to menial servants, and others necessarily employed about the estates of peers.

By an order of the 22d of January 1715, it was resolved, That every peer should upon his honour certify to the house, that the persons protected were within the privilege of the house; and should by letter acquaint the party, arresting such privileged person, with the same.

An attorney was taken in execution upon a ca. sa. about two years ago, but upon a letter under the hand and seal of the Lord Say and Seal, the sheriff discharged him as steward to his lordship; a rule was obtained at the side-bar for the return of the writ; and now on motion in court to discharge this rule, it was urged in behalf of the sheriff, that this privilege belonged only to the peer, and not to the party, and was not returnable to the process; and that therefore the court ought not to insist upon a return, as the sheriff could not justify the detention of the defendant, but under peril of the house of peers; but on consideration of the abovementioned orders, and on considering the nature of this case, that the plaintiff was within the ordinary justice of the court intitled to a return of his writ; that without such return he might be debarred from any further execution; but principally from the great inconveniency that might arise by allowing attornies, who are officers to the courts in which they respectively practise, and therefore amenable to those courts, this kind of privilege; the court gave the plaintiff liberty to proceed against the sheriff, but gave him time 'till next term to make his return. Mich. 10 Geo. 2. in B. R. Wickham v. Hobart, 4 Bac. Abr. 230.

In all civil causes this privilege is regularly to be allowed; so that a peer of the realm, or a member of the house of Commons, is not to be arrested or molested in his person or estate. Bro. Exigent.

But privilege of parliament doth not extend to high treason, felony, breach of the peace, or surety of the peace. 4 Inst. 25. Prinn's Survey of Parliament Writs.

And therefore in an indictment for treason or felony, trespass vi & armis, assault or riot, process of outlawry shall issue against a peer of the realm; for the suit is for the King, and the offence is a contempt against him; but in civil actions between party and party, regularly a capias or exigent lies not against a lord of parliament. 2 Hal. Hist. P. C. 199. 2 Hawk. P. C. 424.

If a peer of parliament be convicted of a disseisin with force, a capias pro fine and exigent shall issue; for the fine is given by statute, in which no person is exempted. Cro. Eliz. 170. Lord Stafford v. Thynne. See Dyer 314.

So in debt upon an obligation against the Earl of Lincoln, who pleaded non est factum, which being found against him, the judgment was ideo capiatur; which on a writ of error brought by him was objected to, in that a capias does not lie against a peer of the realm; sed non allocatur; for by this plea found against him, a fine is due to the King, against whom none shall have any privilege. Cro. Eliz. 503. Earl of Lincoln v. Flower.

An information was exhibited in B. R. against the Earl of Devonshire, for striking in the King's palace; which being in time of parliament, he insisted on his privilege of a peer, and refused to plead in chief, but put in his plea of privilege, to which there was a demurrer, and the plea overruled, and he was fined 30000 l. Comb. 49. The King v. Earl of Devonshire.

In the case of the seven bishops it was insisted, that peers of the realm could not be committed in the first instance, for a misdemeanor before judgment; and that no precedent could be shewed where a peer had been brought in by a capias, which is the first process for a bare misdemeanor; and they put in a plea in writing of their being peers, &c. but the plea was rejected. 3 Mod. 215.

Also peers of the realm are punishable by attachment for contempts in many instances; as for rescuing a person arrested by due course of law; for proceeding in a cause against the King's writ of prohibition; for discharging other writs, wherein the King's prerogative, or the liberty of the subject are nearly concerned; and for other contempts which are of an enormous nature. 2 Hawk. P. C. 152.

If a peer be returned on a jury, on his bringing a writ of privilege he may be discharged; also it seems the better opinion, that without such writ he may either challenge himself, or be challenged by the party. Dyer 314. Moor 767. 9 Co. 49. Co. Lit. 157. 1 Jon. 153.

Also in the case of Sir Edward Bainton, who being returned on a jury, the court would not force him to be sworn against his will, he being a parliament man, and the parliament then sitting. Pasch. 27 Car. 2. in B. R.

A day of grace shall not be given against a lord of parliament; for he is presumed to be attendant on the service of the publick. 9 Co. 49. a.

So if a peer be made steward of a base court, or ranger of a forest, he may from the dignity of his person, and the presumption that he is engaged in the more weighty affairs of the Commonwealth, exercise these offices by deputy; though there are no words for this purpose in his creation. 9 Co. 49. a.

So if a licence be granted to a peer to hunt in a chase or forest, he may take such a number of attendants with him as are suitable to his state and dignity. 9 Co. 49. b.

A peer or lord of parliament cannot be an approver; for it is against Magna Charta for him to pray a coroner. 3 Inst. 129.

If a peer of the realm bring an appeal, the defendant shall not be admitted to wage battle, by reason of the dignity of his person. 2 Hawk. P. C. 427.

In Jenkins the following privileges are laid down as belonging to peers: 1. They are intitled to a letter missive. 2. They have a knight to try an issue which concerns them. 3. They are not to be arrested for debt, trespass or any personal action. 4. They are exempted from serving on juries. 5. To have no day of grace against them. 6. Upon the trial of a peer for treason or felony, they try him upon their honour only, and not upon oath. 7. When they pass through any of the King's forests to attend upon the King, upon blowing a horn they may have a buck or doe, as the season of the year is. 8. They have power in their house to reverse judgments given in the King's Bench. 9. They have the benefit of clergy, tho' they cannot read. 10. They are not liable to find carriages for the King when he removes from one place to another. Jenk. 107.

In the case of Colonel Pit, the parliament was prorogued the 16th of April 1734, dissolved the 17th, and the new writs bore teste the 18th following, and the defendant Pit, who was a member of that parliament, was arrested on the 20th; one of the questions in this case was, Whether the arrest was within the time of privilege? And it was determined that it was, although the defendant had lived for two years before no farther distant from London than Hammersmith; but the court did not think it necessary, in the determination of this cause, to ascertain the exact time of privilege that members of the house of Commons were intitled to after a dissolution of parliament. Trin. 8 Geo. 2. in B. R. Col. Pit's case. See Stran. Rep. 985. and Reports in Time of Lord Hardwicke 16—27.

3. OF THE PROCEEDINGS IN COURTS BY AND AGAINST PERSONS INTITLED TO PRIVILEGE OF PARLIAMENT.

By the statute 12 & 13 W. 3. cap. 13. sect. 1. It is enacted, That any person may prosecute any suit in any of his Majesty's courts at Westminster, or Chancery, or Exchequer, or the Dutchy court, or in the court of Admiralty; and in all causes matrimonial and testamentary in the courts of arches, the prerogative courts of Canterbury and York, and the delegates, and all courts of appeal, against any lord of parliament, or any of the knights, citizens and burgesses of the house of Commons, or their servants, or any other person intitled to privilege of parliament, at any time immediately after the dissolution or prorogation of parliament until a new parliament shall meet, or the same be re-assembled, and immediately after any adjournment of both houses for above fourteen days until both houses shall meet; and the said courts may after such dissolution, prorogation or adjournment, proceed to give judgment, and to make final Decrees and sentences thereupon; any privilege of parliament notwithstanding.

Sect*. 2. Provided, That this act shall not subject the person of any of the knights, citizens and burgesses, or any other person intitled to privilege of parliament, to be arrested during the time of privilege; nevertheless if any person have cause of action or complaint against any peer, such person after such dissolution, prorogation or adjournment as aforesaid, or before any sessions of parliament, may have such process out of his Majesty's courts of King's Bench, Common Pleas and Exchequer against such peer, as he might have had out of time of privilege; and if any person have cause of action against any of the knights, citizens or burgesses, or any other person intitled to privilege of parliament, after any dissolution, prorogation or such adjournment, &c. such person may prosecute such knight, citizen or burgess, or other person intitled to privilege, in his Majesty's courts of King's Bench, Common Pleas and Exchequer, by summons and distress infinite, or by original bill and summons, attachment and distress infinite, which the said courts are impowered to issue, until they enter a common appearance, or file common bail; and any person having cause of suit or complaint may in the times aforesaid exhibit any bill or complaint against any peer, or against any of the said knights, citizens or burgesses, or other person intitled to privilege, in the Chancery, Exchequer or Dutchy court, and proceed thereupon by letter or subpœna as usual; and upon leaving a copy of the bill with the defendant, or at his last place of abode, may proceed thereon; and for want of an appearance or answer, or for non-performance of any order or decree, may sequester the estate of the party, as is used where the defendant is a peer, but shall not arrest the body of any of the said knights, citizens and burgesses, or other privileged person, during the continuance of privilege of parliament.

Sect.* 3. Where any plaintiff shall by reason of privilege of parliament be stayed from prosecuting any suit commenced, such plaintiff shall not be barred by any statute of limitation, or nonsuited, dismissed, or his suit discontinued for want of prosecution, but shall upon the rising of the parliament be at liberty to proceed.

Sect.* 4. No suit or proceeding in law or equity against the King's original and immediate debtor, for the recovery of any debt originally and immediately due to his Majesty, or against any person liable to render an account to his Majesty for any part of his revenues, or other original or immediate duty, or the execution of any such process, shall be impeached or delayed by privilege of parliament; yet so that the person of such debtor or accountant, being a peer, shall not be liable to be arrested, or being a member of the house of Commons, shall not, during the continuance of privilege, be arrested by any such proceeding. See the stat. 2 & 3 Ann. cap. 18. 11 Geo. 2. cap. 24.

Sect.* 5. This act shall not give any jurisdiction to any court to hold plea of any real or mixed action in other manner than such court might have done before.

It hath been always held, that a peer is to put in his answer to a bill in equity, on his honour only, and not on his oath; but when he is examined as a witness, he must be sworn.

Also if a peer is by order of court to be examined on interrogatories, or to make an affidavit, the same must be on oath. Salk. 513. & vid. Preced. Chan. 92.

As where the Lord Stourton brought a bill against Sir Thomas Meers, to compel him to a specifick performance of articles for the purchasing of Lord Stourton's estate, Sir Thomas in his defence insisted, that there were defects in Lord Stourton's title to the estate; and it being ordered that Lord Stourton should be examined on interrogatories touching his said title; it was objected, that Lord Stourton being a peer of the realm ought to answer upon honour only; but it was ruled by Lord Harcourt, that tho' privilege of peerage did allow a peer to put in his answer upon honour only, yet this was restrained to an answer; and as to all affidavits, or where a peer is examined as a witness, he must be upon oath; and that this examination upon interrogatories, being in a cause wherein his Lordship was plaintiff, to enforce the Execution of an agreement, as his lordship would have equity, so he should do equity, and allow the other side the benefit of a discovery, and that in a legal manner; and accordingly ordered Lord Stourton to put in his examination on oath. 1 P. Will. 145. Salk. 513. S. C. Sir Tho. Meers v. Lord Stourton.

It hath been held, that though a court of equity will not proceed against a member that hath privilege of parliament, yet if a parliament man sues at law, and a bill is brought here to be relieved against that action, the court will make an order to stay proceedings at law 'till answer or further order. 1 Vern. 329.

R. T*. being chose a burgess for Buckingham, and having a trial at bar to be had on Tuesday before the sitting of the parliament, moved to have his privilege allowed him; but was denied, in regard the parliament was not sitting, nor to sit 'till after the trial had. Raym, 12. 1 Sid. 42. S. C.

It hath been held, that in an action founded on the abovementioned statute 12 W. 3. the defendant shall have an imparlance; and it was said in this case, that the practice is to file a bill in nature of a special capias against the defendant, and then to summon him; and if he appers [sic] upon such summons, the plaintiff may declare against him, as in custodia marescalli, Hill. 10 Geo. 1. in B. R. Wadsworth v. Handiside.

Peers are intitled to a letter missive, which method was introduced upon a presumption that peers would pay obedience to the Chancellor's letter; and is founded on that respect that is due to the peerage. Jenk. 107.

If the lord doth not appear upon the letter, a subpœna on motion is awarded against him; because no subsequent process can be awarded but upon a contempt to the Great seal, and the Chancellor's letter is only ex gratia.

If on the service of the subpoena, the peer doth not appear, or if he appears, and does not put in his answer, no attachment can be awarded against him, because his person cannot be imprisoned; but the proceedings must be by sequestration, unless cause, &c. and this is regularly made out, upon affidavit made of the service of the letter and the subpœna, though sometimes it is moved for without, since the peer may shew want of service at the day assigned to shew cause why the sequestration should not issue; and this order for a sequestration is never made absolute without an affidavit of the service of the order to shew cause, and a certificate of no cause shewn. 2 Vent. 342.

A bill being filed against a peer or peeress, the first application is for my Lord Chancellor's letter returnable in term time; or it may be immediate, if the peer or peeress lives in town; but in this case there must be an affidavit, that the original letter is left with the peer at his house, with a copy of the petition as answered; and therewith also is left an office copy of the bill signed by the six clerk; for if the bill is not signed, the service is irregular. 4 Bac. Abr. 238.

This letter is only a compliment, and no process to found proceedings on; so that the peer may appear or not, as he pleases; if he fails a subpœna issues against him, and his time for appearing and answering being out, an attachment must be actually sealed and entred against him, though never executed, to ground a sequestration upon. It is a motion of course for a sequestration upon an attachment for want of an answer. 4. Bac. Abr. 238.

The peer must be personally served with this order, and he hath eight days to shew cause after personal service of the order; if no cause, the order is absolute; but if the sequestration is for want of an appearance, and he appears, the plaintiff must run the same race over again for want of an answer, and the peer must pray time to answer, as suitors do. 4 Bac. Abr. 238.

The same proceeding is against a member of the house of Commons; there the party proceeds by way of sequestrations, only with this difference, that instead of a letter, there is always a subpœna sued out; and when a cause either against a peer or a commoner stands in the paper, and is called, and cannot proceed (privilege being in) the court never strikes it out as they do in other cases; where the party is not ready, they let it stand over from one term to another, till privilege is out, and never put the party to sue out a subpœna to hear judgment; and the direction of the court to the register is to put privileged causes (which have been put off on that account) the very first causes in the paper when the court sits after privilege is out. 4 Bac. Abr. 238.

A sequestration was granted, unless cause, against the Lord Clifford for want of an answer; he afterwards put in an answer, which being reported insufficient, it was moved for a sequestration absolutely, an insufficient answer being as no answer; but the court thought it a hardship in the case of a peer or member of the house of Commons, that a sequestration, which in some respects is in nature of an execution, should be the first process against them; and therefore allowed, that in case of an answer which is reported insufficient, the plaintiff is to move again de novo, for a sequestration nisi. 2 P. Will. 385. Lord Clifford's case.

It was moved for a sequestration nisi, for want of an answer, against a menial servant of a peer of the realm, as the first process for contempt, in the same manner as in the case of the peer himself; and though the motion was granted by the Master of the Rolls, yet the register refused to draw it up as thinking it against the course of the court; which being moved again before the Lord Chancellor, his Lordship, upon reading the statute 12 W. 3. likewise granted the motion, it appearing to be both within the meaning and words of the statute; and if it were not so, as it was plain no attachment would lie against their persons; consequently there would be no remedy against them, and they would have a greater privilege than their lord, if the process against such menial servant were to be a subpoena. 1 P. Will. 535.

18.3.2CASE LAW

18.3.2.1Bayard v. Singleton

Ejectment. This action was brought for the recovery of a valuable house and lot, with a wharf and other appurtenances, situate in the town of New Bern.

The defendant pleaded not guilty, under the common rule.

He held under a title derived from the State, by a deed, from a Superintendent Commissioner of confiscated estates.

At May Term, 1786, Nash for the defendant, moved that the suit be dismissed, according to an act of the last session, entitled an act to secure and quiet in their possession all such persons, their heirs and assigns, who have purchased or may hereafter purchase lands and tenements, goods and chattels, which have been sold or may hereafter be sold by commissioners of forfeited estates, legally appointed for that purpose, 1785, 7, 553.

The act requires the Courts, in all cases where the defendant makes affidavit that he holds the disputed property under a sale from a commissioner of forfeited estates, to dismiss the suit on motion.

The defendant had filed an affidavit, setting forth that the property in dispute had been confiscated and sold by the Commissioner of the district.

This brought on long arguments from the counsel on each side, on constitutional points.

The Court made a few observations on our constitution and system of government.

ASHE, J., observed, that at the time of our separation from Great Britain, we were thrown into a similar situation with a set of people ship wrecked and cast on a maroon'd island—without laws, without magistrates, without government, or any legal authority—that being thus circumstanced, the people of this country, with a general union of sentiment, by their delegates, met in Congress, and formed that system or those fundamental principles comprised in the constitution, dividing the powers of government into separate and distinct branches, to wit: the legislative, the judicial and executive, and assigning to each, several and distinct powers, and prescribing their several limits and boundaries: this he said without disclosing a single sentiment upon the cause of the proceeding, or the law introduced in support of it.

CURIA ADVISARE VULT.

At May term, 1787, Nash's motion was resumed, and produced a very lengthy debate from the bar.

Whereupon the Court recommended to the parties to consent to a fair decision of the property in question, by a jury according to the common law of the land, and pointed out to the defendant, the uncertainty, that would always attend his title, if this cause should be dismissed without a trial; as upon a repeal of the present act, (which would probably happen sooner or later) suit might be again commenced against him for the same property, at the time when evidences, which at present were easy to be had, might be wanting. But this recommendation was without effect.

Another mode was proposed for putting the matter in controversy on a more constitutional footing for a decision, than that of the motion under the aforesaid act. The Court then, after every reasonable endeavor had been used in vain for avoiding a disagreeable difference between the Legislature and the Judicial powers of the State, at length with much apparent reluctance, but with great deliberation and firmness, gave their opinion separately, but unanimously for overruling the aforementioned motion for the dismission of the said suits.

In the course of which the Judges observed, that the obligation of their oaths, and the duty of their office required them in that situation, to give their opinion on that important and momentous subject; and that notwithstanding the great reluctance they might feel against involving themselves in a dispute with the Legislature of the State, yet no object of concern or respect could come in competition or authorize them to dispense with the duty they owed the public, in consequence of the trust they were invested with under the solemnity of their oaths.

That they therefore were bound to declare that they considered, that whatever disabilities the persons under whom the plaintiffs were said to derive their titles, might justly have incurred, against their maintaining or prosecuting any suits in the Courts of this State; yet that such disabilities in their nature were merely personal, and not by any means capable of being transferred to the present plaintiffs, either by descent or purchase; and that these plaintiffs being citizens of one of the United States, or citizens of this State, by the confederation of all the States; which is to be taken as a part of the law of the land, unrepealable by any act of the General Assembly.

That by the constitution every citizen had undoubtedly a right to a decision of his property by a trial by jury. For that if the Legislature could take away this right, and require him to stand condemned in his property without a trial, it might with as much authority require his life to be taken away without a trial by jury, and that he should stand condemned to die, without the formality of any trial at all: that if the members of the General Assembly could do this, they might with equal authority, not only render themselves the Legislators of the State for life, without any further election of the people, from thence transmit the dignity and authority of legislation down to their heirs male forever.

But that it was clear, that no act they could pass, could by any means repeal or alter the constitution, because if they could do this, they would at the same instant of time, destroy their own existence as a Legislature, and dissolve the government thereby established. Consequently the constitution (which the judicial power was bound to take notice of as much as of any other law whatever,) standing in full force as the fundamental law of the land, notwithstanding the act on which the present motion was grounded, the same act must of course, in that instance, stand as abrogated and without any effect.

Nash's motion was overruled.

And at this term the cause was tried.

Both the plaintiffs and the defendant admitted the title of the premises to have been in Samuel Cornell, Esq., at and before the time when the independence of this State commenced.

The case appeared to be this: Mr. Cornell, once an inhabitant of New Bern, leaving his family, together with the premises in question, and a variety of property in this town, took shipping on the 19th of August, 1775, and went to Great Britain, where he continued till some time in the latter part of the year 1777, when he came to New York, then occupied by a British garrison; and as a British subject came from thence and arrived in New Bern, on the 11th of December, 1777, and under the protection of a British flag.

His principal design, in coming to this State at that time, was to take his wife and family with him, to reside under the British Government, if he did not find our new government agreeable to his wishes. Not being pleased with the appearance of things here, and thereupon preparing to leave the State, and to carry with him his wife and family, he executed on board the vessel he came in, a deed to his daughter, one of the plaintiffs (under which they claim) for the premises in question, on the 19th of December, 1777.

This deed for the purpose of execution had been handed to him without a date, and being asked what date he chose it should bear, he hesitated and said he would look at the copy of a bill which was then in his possession, which bill he understood to be on its passage in the legislature, for confiscating the property of all persons of his description, who should not within a limited time come into this State, and be made citizens thereof, which bill afterwards in the same session passed into a law. After looking at the aforesaid copy of that bill, he chose that the deed should bear date on the 11th of the same month, being the day he arrived in the harbour of New Bern; which deed was accordingly dated that day. After which Mr. Cornell returned with his family from this State, and from thenceforth lived and died a British subject, under the British Government.

The Court, ASHE, J., SPENCER, J., and WILLIAMS, J., gave their opinion seriatim, but unanimously.

They observed that the cause turned chiefly on the point of alienage in Mr. Cornell. For this gentleman, having from his birth to the time of his death, been always a British subject, and having always lived under the British government, he owed allegiance to the King of Great Britain, and consequently was never a citizen of this, or any other of the United States, nor owed allegiance thereto. For when here, at the time of the transaction aforementioned, he was under the protection of a British flag. That he was therefore, in contemplation of law, as much an alien, and at the time of executing the deed, and, from the time of our independence as much an alien ENEMY, as if we had been a separate and independent nation, for any number of years or ages before the commencement of the war which was then carried on.

That it is the policy of all Nations and States, that the lands within their government should not be held by foreigners. And therefore it is a general maxim, that the allegiance of a person who holds land ought to be as permanent to the government who holds it, as the tenure of the soil itself.—That therefore by the civil, as well as by the common law of England, aliens are incapacitated to hold lands. For that purpose the civil law has made the contracts with aliens void. The law of England, which we have adopted, allows them to purchase, but subjects them to forfeiture immediately; and does not allow an alien ENEMY any political rights at all.

That the premises in question, upon these invariable principles of law, could not from the time our government commenced, have been held by Mr. Cornell; because that in consequence of his owing no allegiance to the State, he had no capacity to hold them, and according to the letter of the law of the land, they must have consequently been forfeited to the sovereignty of the State. That the act of confiscation, in which Mr. Cornell was expressly named, and more particularly the act which especially directed the sale of the very premises in question, must have been at least as effectual in vesting them in the State, as any office found, according to the practice in England can be, for vesting any forfeited property in the King.

That the circumstances and limited privileges of persons who were sent out of this State under a particular act of our General Assembly, are not applicable to this case. That the case in Vattel, of the majority of the inhabitants of any country deliberately dissolving their old government, and setting up a new one, is neither in reason, nor in the most essential circumstances, anyways similar to this case. That Calvin's case, reported in Coke, does by no means reach the leading and characteristic circumstances of this case.

The jury found a verdict for the defendant.

1 N.C. 42 (1787).

18.3.2.2Apthorp v. Backus

In this action, the plaintiff was described by the name of "Henrietta Apthorp, of the island of Jamaica, in the West Indies, a minor, of the age of sixteen years, who sues by Perez Morton, Esq. of Boston, in the county of Suffolk, and commonwealth of Massachusetts, her next friend and guardian."–Then followed the declaration, in these words:–"That to the plaintiff the defendant render the seisin and peaceable possession of a certain lot or parcel of land, with the buildings thereon; which lot consists of about one-eighth part of an acre in quantity, is situated at a place called Chelsea, or Norwich Landing (then describing the boundaries) and is the same estate which, on the 18th day of February, A. D. 1768, was, by deed of mortgage, conveyed by Eleazer Fitch, Esq. of Windham, in the county of Windham, to Mr. Stephen Apthorp, then of Bristol, in the kingdom of Great Britain, but late of said island of Jamaica, now deceased, as by the records of said town of Norwich may appear; which said Stephen, when in life, was parent of the said Henrietta. Of which described premises the said Stephen being in full life, on the 2d day of May, A. D. 1770, became well and legally seised, in his own right, in fee, and so thereof continued to be seised and possessed, until the day of his death, which happened on or about the 1st day of January, A. D. 1773, when the said Stephen died, leaving issue and only heir the forenamed Henrietta; who thereupon, at the death of her said parent, by virtue of her right of inheritance in the demanded premises, by her said next friend, became immediately well and legally seised, in her own right in fee, of the same estate, and thereof continued seised and possessed, until on or about the 1st day of January, A. D. 1774; at which time the defendant, with force and arms, entered into said described premises, against law and without right, and disseised the plaintiff thereof, and put her out therefrom, and every part thereof, described as aforesaid (excepting two stores standing on said land, and the land covered by said stores;) and ever since the defendant hath and still doth continue to deforce and hold the plaintiff out therefrom, taking to himself the whole profits, use, and improvements of the demanded premises, to this time; to the damage of the plaintiff the sum of, etc. to recover which, together with the seisin and quiet possession of said demanded premises, and his cost, she brings this suit," etc.

The general issue was pleaded, and a verdict for the plaintiff.–The defendant moved in arrest of judgment, and assigned five reasons:–

2. That the declaration is insufficient to found any judgment upon; for that it appears the plaintiff is an alien;–and therefore, cannot, by law, hold or recover any real estate.

But the motion was ruled insufficient.

By Law, C. J., and Ellsworth, J.

The second exception moved in arrest, is–That the declaration is ill; because the plaintiff is an alien; and cannot, therefore, maintain a real action:–

A state may exclude aliens from acquiring property within it of any kind, as its safety or policy may direct; as England has done, with regard to real property, saving that in favor of commerce, alien merchants may hold leases of houses and stores, and may, for the recovery of their debts, extend lands, and hold them, and upon ouster have an assize. Dyer, 2, 6.–Bac. Abrid. 84.–But it would be against right, that a division of a state or kingdom should work a forfeiture of property, previously acquired under its laws, and that by its own citizens; which is the case here.–The plaintiff's title to the land in question accrued while she was not an alien, nor could she be affected by the disability of an alien, but was as much a citizen of the now state of Connecticut, as any person at present within it, and her descent was cast under its laws;–her title is also secured by the treaty of peace, which stipulates, that there should be no further forfeitures or confiscations, on account of the war, upon either side.

The subsequent statute of this state, declaring aliens incapable of purchasing or holding lands in this state, does not affect the plaintiff's title, otherwise than by recognizing and enforcing it; for it hath a proviso, that the "act shall not be construed to work a forfeiture of any lands which belonged to any subjects of the king of Great Britain before the late war, or to prevent proprietors of such lands from selling and disposing of the same to any inhabitant of any of the United States."–It is not, indeed, expressly said, that the proprietors of such lands may maintain actions for the possession of them, but this is clearly implied; for lands without the possession are of no use; and wherever the law gives or admits a right, it gives or admits also everything incident thereto, as necessary to the enjoyment and exercise of that right:–And besides, they cannot sell their lands till they first get possession of them; for all sales of land in this state, whereof the grantor is dispossessed, except to the person in possession, are, by express statute, void–So that the plaintiff is not barred of her title, or right of action, either at common law, or by statute.

So the motion in arrest was ruled insufficient.

Sherman and Pitkin, JJ., contra.

We are of opinion, that the motion in arrest is sufficient.–

As to the second and fifth exceptions–We agree in opinion with the chief justice and Judge Ellsworth, for the reasons given by them.

But if, notwithstanding these reasons to the contrary, judgment shall be rendered for the infant, we think that the execution ought to be stayed, until she arrive at full age, or until a guardian legally appointed appears to take possession of the estate for her benefit.

Kirby 407 (Conn. 1788).

APPENDIX

Bill of Rights[1]

Article the third … Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press,[2] or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Article the fourth … A well regulated militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear arms, shall not be infringed.[3]

Article the fifth … No soldier shall, in time of peace be quartered in any house, without the consent of the owner, nor in time of war, but in a manner prescribed by law.[4]

Article the sixth … The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.[5]

Article the seventh … No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb, nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.[6]

Article the eighth … In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defence.

Article the ninth … In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise reexamined in any Court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law.[7]

Article the tenth … Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

Article the eleventh … The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

Article the twelfth … The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.
